Preface

This fifth edition of Mass Communication Law adds two new coauthors: Professor Todd Simon of the School of Journalism at Michigan State University and Professor Herbert Terry of the Department of Telecommunications at Indiana University at Bloomington.

In this edition, as in previous ones, we continue to let the courts and administrative agencies speak for themselves. We tried, in our editing, to select those excerpts from court decisions which are most relevant to problems of law and mass communication.

In our comments and background notes we explain the evolving course of the law of the mass media in language as free from legalese as we could make it without forfeiting accuracy. In cases where portions of decisions have been omitted, we generally indicate the omission through the use of ellipses; but for space considerations and other reasons we have not always been able to do this.

We have striven, however, to ensure that all case material is in chronological order. Each sentence or paragraph of a case is reported in its original sequence. Similarly, when we have reprinted footnotes from the decisions, the same numbers as were found in the original decisions are retained. The footnotes of the authors are numbered separately and consecutively in each chapter.

This area of the law continues to be dynamic, fundamental, and unnerving. This is emphasized by the fact that, virtually on the eve of publication, the Supreme Court handed down two bitterly controversial decisions–the dial-a-porn case, Sable Communications, Inc. v. FCC, and the now famous flag desecration case, Texas v. Johnson. As a result, we have created two special Appendices at the end of the book in order to include these two cases.

The fifth edition, like its predecessors, contains an up-to-date diagram of state and federal court systems, a revised glossary of legal terms, an outline on legal research, and the text of the Constitution of the United States.

A short preface cannot set forth in detail all the new developments chronicled in this book. But we shall mention some highlights. The introductory chapter on the First Amendment–Chapter One–provides a streamlined but comprehensive look at the complexities of the Supreme Court's work on the theory of free press and free speech. We know it has one virtue over the previous chapter in the fourth edition–it is ten pages shorter.

The libel chapter–Chapter Two–confronts the student and the teacher with some of the baffling issues now dominating that field: Can (will) the New York Times v. Sullivan doctrine survive? If it does not, with what will it be replaced? Will jury awards of excessive damages in libel cases continue to terrify the media defendant? Or will alternatives to the damage suit as the exclusive remedy for defamation be developed?

The privacy chapter–Chapter Three–shows in concise and clear fashion how beleaguered that tort has become. The chapter also contains a new and valuable section on the emerging right of publicity. The journalist's privilege chapter–Chapter Four–surveys the common law, statutory, and constitutional sources of the concept of journalist's privilege. It also focuses on important specialized issues such as the scope of state shield laws and the role of journalist's privilege in libel litigation.

Chapter Five, on access to the judicial process, inquires into the ancient and perplexing problem of reconciling a free press with a fair trial. It also addresses more modern developments such as the arrival of the TV camera in the courtroom and the struggle to open up the courtroom to journalists for coverage of pre-trial and preliminary hearings and the selection of jurors.

Chapter Six, on access to executive and legislative information, sets forth short, clear summaries of each of the exemptions to the federal Freedom of Information Act. It also provides a useful guide to the law on open records and meetings in the states.

The chapter on public access to the media–Chapter Seven–chronicles the pros and cons of the celebrated Tornillo case: Does freedom of the press, as A.J. Liebling caustically suggested, belong to the man who owns one? This chapter also contains new sections on access dimensions of antitrust laws, access to the press, and new developments in public access to cable television.

Chapter Eight comprises ten short but comprehensive sections on selected problems of media laws. This chapter covers discrete areas where law intersects with journalism: (1) advertising; (2) antitrust law; (3) labor law; (4) taxation; (5) postal law; (6) lotteries; (7) lobbying law; (8) copyright and unfair competition in both print and electronic media; (9) students and the First Amendment; and finally, (10) the regulation of obscenity. These sections capture the key issues in the fields covered. For example, the obscenity section examines the new dimension that feminist criticism has brought to the problem of regulating obscenity. This section also focuses on the increasingly important role assumed by zoning and other political means of coping with the problem of obscenity.

Chapter Nine, on regulation of the electronic media, begins with an introductory section on the various theories justifying broadcast regulation. This, we think, is a necessary inquiry in view of the critical scrutiny now being given to the once dominant scarcity theory. Besides the scarcity rationale, theories of viewers' and listeners' rights, market-based theories, and the social impact rationale are given new attention.

Chapter Nine gives special emphasis to cable, with its attendant problems of "must carry" and exclusive franchising. The future impact of telephony as a player in the communications marketplace of ideas is also considered. Chapter Nine reflects the impact that the philosophy of deregulation has had on the traditional system of broadcast regulation.

In summary, this book remains primarily intended for use in journalism and mass communication programs. It is designed for both beginning and advanced media law courses. The book is also used in advanced undergraduate freedom of speech and press theory courses. It has been widely used in graduate seminars in both print and broadcast journalism. The book is also used in second and third year law school courses and seminars on communication law.

As we have said in previous editions, we have been mindful that in a textbook one can become too attached to old furniture which, although attractive, is no longer useful. In such cases, we have tried hard to discard the old and replace it with newer, more valuable material.

Finally, we would like to thank two people at West Publishing Company—Susan Tubb, Acquisitions Editor and Jayne Lindesmith, Production Assistant—for their work in the planning, editing, and production of this book. With patience and skill they have labored with four separate authors to bring this book accuracy, clarity, and uniformity of style. We thank them for all of their help.

Professor Simon thanks Michigan State University Ph.D. students Catherine Cassara, Mary Cronin, and Rob Ducoffe, M.A. student Diane Kightlinger, and B.A. student Stephen Dravis for their research assistance, and Ph.D. student Rosemarie Alexander for research help, copyediting and comments, and classroom assistance during work on this book.

We say now–as we have said before–our goal is not to write an encyclopedia of mass media law, but to create a teaching tool, a tool which will be informative and interesting at the same time. We shall hear from you, our students and colleagues, as to whether or not we have succeeded.

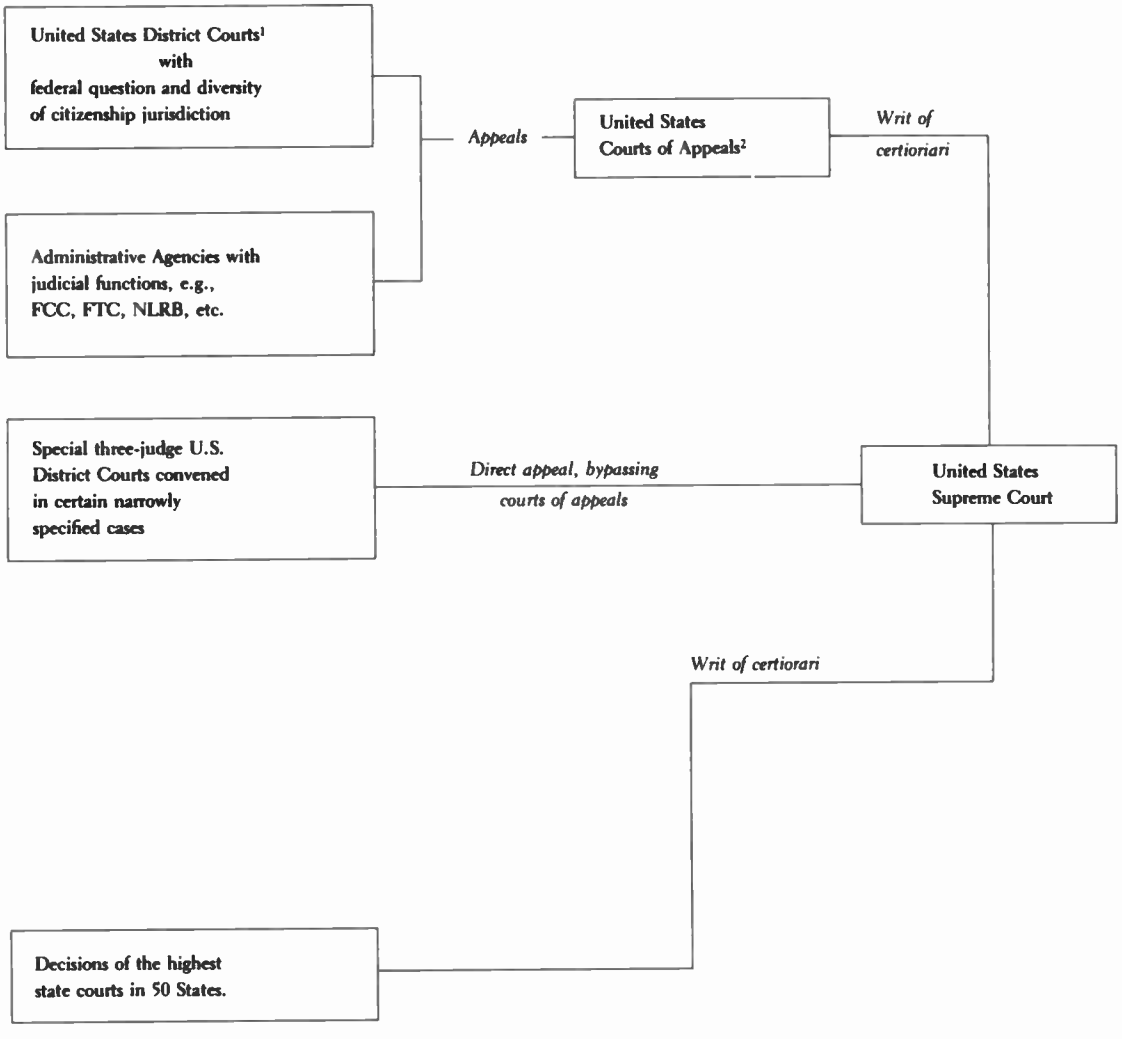
The Federal Court System

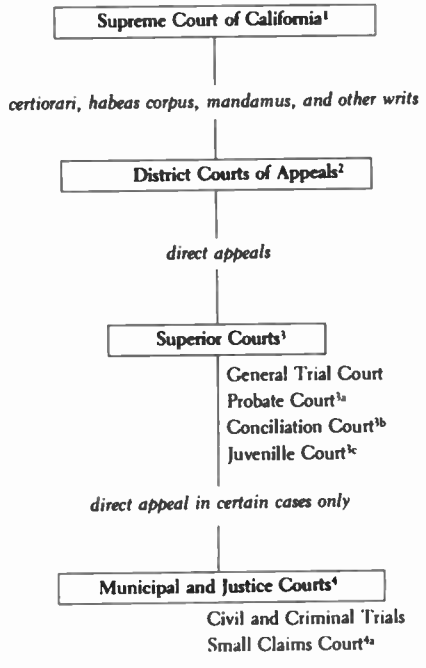


1. There is at least one federal district court in every state.

2. The United States is divided into eleven numbered federal judicial circuits, plus the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. In addition, there is the United States Courts of Appeals for the Federal Circuit which was established by the Congress in 1982. This court succeeded to the appellate jurisdiction of the United States Court of Claims and the United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, both of which were abolished.

A State Court System

The state court system outlined below is one example of a state court system. It is intended to provide a guide to the state judicial process for the student who is unfamiliar with the organization of state courts. There is substantial variation from state to state. The following figure illustrates the California Court system.



1. Has no obligatory appellate jurisdiction; that is, it reviews cases by granting petitions for writs of certiorari and thus retains complete discretionary control of its jurisdiction.

2. Consequently the great bulk of cases reach final decision in these five District Courts of Appeals.

3. Superior Court, the trial court of general jurisdiction, also has three special divisions: the General Trial Court, Probate Court, Conciliation Court and Juvenile Court.

3a. This court has jurisdiction over the administration of estates, wills, and related matters.

3b. The conciliation court is a rather unique institution that takes jurisdiction over family disputes that could lead to the dissolution of a marriage to the detriment of a minor child.

3c. The juvenile court considers certain types of cases involving persons under 18 years of age.

4. There is one Superior Court in each county. The Municipal and Justice Courts represent subdivisions of each county by population. These courts are trial courts with limited jurisdiction. Their civil jurisdiction is in cases involving generally less than $25,000 in controversy. They also have original and exclusive criminal jurisdiction for violations of local ordinances within their districts.

4a. The small claims court is the familiar forum used to settle small disputes, here generally less than $2,000, using informal procedure and prohibiting lawyers for the disputing parties.

Note: Superior Court is usually the last state court to which a decision of these lowest courts can be appealed. It is possible that a case from one of these courts could be ineligible for further state review and could have further review only in the U.S. Supreme Court.

A "BRIEF" ON LEGAL RESEARCH FOR JOURNALISTS

Cases, statutes, and constitutions are the primary stuff of the law. If you cannot retrieve and read them, you are forever doomed to secondary sources—someone else will have read and interpreted them for you.

Many campuses will not have law school libraries. There are alternatives. Metropolitan counties often have substantial law libraries in their courthouses or government centers. State capitols usually house law libraries. In addition, general public libraries, political science departments, and private law firms may be able to assist you.

An invaluable resource for college, school, or department is the Bureau of National Affairs Media Law Reporter (Med.L.Rptr.). On a weekly basis it reports almost all court cases having a bearing on journalism and communication law. Issues include news notes, occasional bibliographies, Supreme Court schedules or dockets, and special reports (for example, a 1977 report on the federal Freedom of Information Act). The heart of its content is the presentation of complete decisions or substantial case excerpts covering the broadest spectrum of mass communication law. The service is a must for schools and departments of journalism.

A more general publication is United States Law Week (U.S.L.W.). It comes in two parts, one providing Supreme Court opinions shortly after they are rendered, the other federal statutes, administrative agency rulings, and significant lower court decisions.

If you have access to a law library, you have at your fingertips an ingenious information retrieval system, much of which is now, or soon will be, computerized and thereby accessible in less laborious ways.

On-line data bases include the Legal Resource Index (law and other academic journals, legal newspapers, and selected material from general newspapers and magazines, on microfilm, WESTLAW and LEXIS, from 1980); WESTLAW (federal and state court opinions, statutes, regulations, and topical materials including First Amendment, Communications, and Administrative Law); LEXIS (a similar service); Legi-Slate (follows congressional bills, from 1978, and federal regulations, from 1981); Congressional Information Service (CIS) (congressional hearings and reports from 1970); Government Printing Office (GPO) Monthly Catalog (documents issued by federal agencies, congressional reports, conferences and statistics, from 1976).

The computer greatly speeds up the traditional processes of legal research and performs some tasks that would be prohibitively time-consuming. Among myriad uses, the computer permits the organizing of cases by judges, time frames, classes of plaintiffs and defendants; the surveying of footnotes; and the updating of any source.

In addition, there are a number of "general purpose" database vendors, such as DIALOG NEXIS, Wilsonline, State Net, Electronic Legislative Search System (ELSS), and InfoMaster, which contain hundreds of databases not specifically linked to the law but are nonetheless valuable for legal research. A scholar looking into the impact of a judge's political involvement in his or her voting habits might want to do some work with a database called "PACs and Lobbies," available on InfoMaster, which "reports on actions of the Federal Election Commission, Internal Revenue Service, and other federal agencies which influence campaign financing and lobbying and lists recent PAC, lobby, and foreign agent registrations."

There are a number of lesser-known legal databases available such as "Child Abuse and Neglect," "Healthlawyer," "LaborLaw" and the "National Criminal Justice Reference Service" (all available on InfoMaster) which contain information some databases may not have. WESTLAW, however, does include much material useful to media law students such as law reviews, texts, bar journals, Practicing Law Institute materials, Bureau of National Affairs materials, Commerce Clearing House materials, Dow Jones, Dialog, VU/TEXT, PHINet, and Information America.

It's easy to draw incorrect conclusions from information that is voluminous and unrelated. Use data bases cautiously and thoughtfully.

Abbreviations used in the following section are part of a Uniform System of Citation 14th ed. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard Law Review Ass'n., 1986), frequently used in legal writing and reporting and designed for precise communication and for brevity.

Remember that constitutions, legislative enactments, and court decisions of the jurisdiction involved are primary authorities. Treatises, law reviews, the Restatements of the American Law Institute, for example, are secondary sources. These sources, however, are frequently cited and accepted as persuasive authority by all levels of courts in various jurisdictions and at the federal level throughout the country. Annotations, encyclopediae, loose-leaf services, and dictionaries are primarily used to find references to primary materials such as court reporters, statutes, or constitutional provisions. The primary materials may, after thorough examination, then be cited as actual authority for a legal proposition or definition. Digests, citators, and indexes are used principally to lead a researcher to primary materials.

A first step in legal research might be to find the words, the legal vocabulary of your problem. Any one of a number of law dictionaries would serve this purpose (Black's, Ballentine's, Gifis', or Oran's Law Dictionary for Non-Lawyers). Assuming you have some legal knowledge of your topic, you might prefer to begin with a resource that demonstrates how state and federal courts have construed your concept. Such a work is Words and Phrases, an alphabetical list of words and phrases followed by abstracts of judicial decisions using them. Pocket parts or supplements inside the back cover keep this and many other legal publications up-to-date. Don't overlook them.

Legal encyclopediae—notably Corpus Juris Secundum (CJS) and American Jurisprudence 2d (Am.Jur.2d)—provide yet wider sweeps of legal issues and principles. Use their general index volumes and, again, don't forget the updating pocket supplements. American Jurisprudence 2d will refer you to American Law Reports (ALR, ALR 2d, ALR 3d, ALR 4th, and ALR Fed.) which contains brief essays or annctations on significant legal topics suggested by the approximately 10 percent of state and federal appellate court decisions this service considers leading cases. A good annotation may discuss all previously reported decisions on your topic. There are topical Digests and Word Indexes to the first two series and a Quick Index to all five ALRs. ALR and ALR 2d are updated by a Blue Book and a Later Case Service respectively, ALR 3d, ALR 4th, and ALR Fed. by pocket supplements. There is now a six-volume Index to Annotations for all but ALR. ALRs are cross-referenced to American Jurisprudence 2d, and you may find it easier to begin there.

By now you have encountered a good many case citations and, in West Publishing Company's Words and Phrases and Corpus Juris Secundum, Key Numbers.

All reported cases can be found in West's National Reporter System, a description of which follows.

National Reporter System

West Publishing Company's National Reporter System reprints decisions of all of the highest state courts, many state appellate courts, the U.S. Supreme Court, U.S. Courts of Appeals, The United States Claims Court, and selected decisions of U.S. District Courts and Bankruptcy Courts, as well as military courts.

Decisions of the Federal Court System

Decisions of the United States Supreme Court are found in the Supreme Court Reporter (S.Ct.). A second major unofficial publication of United States Supreme Court decisions is United States Supreme Court Reports (Lawyer's Edition—L.Ed. and L.Ed.2d), which annotates leading cases. The official publication of Supreme Court decisions is United States Reports (U.S.). Thus a complete (sometimes called parallel) citation for a United States Supreme Court decision will include both official and unofficial publications and appear as: New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 245, 84 S.Ct. 710, 11 L.Ed.2d 686 (1964). The first number in a citation refers to a volume number, the second to a page number.

Secondary unofficial publications of Supreme Court decisions are United States Law Week and the Commerce Clearing House (CCH) United States Supreme Court Bulletin, the first publications to print the full text of Supreme Court decisions, normally within a few days, and the newer Media Law

Reporter. Begun in 1978, Landmark Briefs and Arguments of the Supreme Court of the United States: Constitutional Law (Kurland & Casper, eds.) presents oral arguments and written briefs of landmark Supreme Court cases going back to 1793. The publisher is University Publications of America, Inc., Frederick, Maryland.

Summaries of lawyers' written briefs are found in L.Ed.2d. Complete briefs can sometimes be obtained from the law firms on either side of a case. Their addresses can be found in a legal directory called Martindale Hubbell. Most large law libraries maintain microforms or microfiche of U.S. Supreme Court records, oral arguments, and written briefs.

The Federal Reporter (F. and F.2d) currently prints decisions of the U.S. Courts of Appeals and Temporary Emergency Court of Appeals.

The Federal Supplement (F.Supp.) contains selected decisions of U.S. District Courts and of the U.S. Court of International Trade plus rulings of the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation.

Federal Rules Decisions (F.R.D.) prints U.S. District Court Decisions primarily involving the Federal Rules of Criminal and Civil Procedure, and also contains miscellaneous reports and articles.

West's Bankruptcy Reporter prints bankruptcy cases from Bankruptcy Courts, District Courts, and in a special section, U.S. Courts of Appeals and the U.S. Supreme Court. West's Military Justice Reporter includes cases decided in the United States Court of Military Appeals and selected decisions of the Courts of Military Review.

Decisions of State Courts

Official reports of each state's highest court and some intermediate courts are usually published by the state. Some states have discontinued their own reporters and have designated West's publication as official. West publishes seven regional reporters that contain decisions of the highest state court and selected intermediate appellate court decisions. The New York Supplement (N.Y.S.) contains decisions of all New York state courts including its highest court, the New York Court of Appeals, whose opinions are also published in the North Eastern Reporter. The California Reporter (Cal.Rptr.) contains decisions of the California Supreme Court, Courts of Appeal, and Appellate Department of Superior Court. Decisions of the California Supreme Court are also reprinted in the Pacific Reporter. The map below indicates states included in each regional reporter.

Cases, of course, can be cited as persuasive authority. But in reading cases it is important to learn how to distinguish between what a court rules and what it says in passing (dicta) and in concurring and dissenting opinions. Dicta, of course, can influence future decisions.

The next task is to find aids that will lead quickly to all the cases in point. For this purpose we use Digests, Indexes, and Citators. A Digest is a case finder or an index to the law. The best known Digests are units of all reported state and federal cases in ten-year segments or decennials, the most recent being the Ninth Decennial Digest, Part I, 1976–1986, cumulating ten years of cases. Current cases are found in the monthly General Digest and organized around the Key Number System. Cases decided between 1658 and 1896 are found in the Century Digest.

Key Numbers represent principles or points of law organized under topics and subtopics. Once having found one or more Key Numbers relating to your problem, you should be able to find all the relevant cases in the American Digest System. Digests have been prepared for most individual states (e.g. the Minnesota Digest), groups of neighboring states in a regional digest (e.g. the Pacific Digest), single courts (e.g. the United States Supreme Court Digest), or for an entire court system (e.g. West's Federal Practice Digest, 3d), which covers decisions of all federal courts including the U.S. Supreme Court. Each digest has a Descriptive Word Index to help you get started. A Cumulative Table of Key Numbers in the General Digest Descriptive Word Index will tell you which volumes of the set have digest material relating to the Key Numbers you have found.

Citators trace the life history of a case, a statute, or an administrative ruling. Has it been modified, reversed, affirmed, superseded, criticized, distinguished, explained, limited, overruled or questioned? What have attorneys general and law review writers said about a case? Is it still good authority? Has a statute been amended, appealed, or declared unconstitutional? How has it been treated by courts and periodical commentators? There are Shepard's Citations for every state, for each region of West's National Reporter System, for lower federal courts and the U.S. Supreme Court, for federal administrative agencies, for the Code of Federal Regulations, for state and federal constitutions, the U.S. and various state codes, municipal ordinances, labor law, and for the law reviews. Shepard's Citations are updated by white, yellow, and red pamphlets or advance sheets.

If you know approximately when a federal statute or an amendment to a statute was passed, it can often be located in U.S. Code, Congressional and Administrative News. From it you can construct the legislative histories of federal statutes and review congressional committee reports. United States Code Annotated (U.S.C.A.) and United States Code Service (U.S.C.S.) are the best places to go for federal law. Both are updated by pocket parts and intervening pamphlets. Annotations include summaries of court decisions interpreting the laws, texts of the Constitution and their interpretation, opinions of attorneys general, and, occasionally, citations to law reviews or other secondary sources. There are also indexed, annotated codes for most states. Each compilation has a multivolume index.

The Congressional Record provides an edited transcript of congressional debates. It has a Daily Digest. The Commerce Clearing House (CCH) Congressional Index provides a weekly update of bills introduced in Congress. The Congressional Information Service monthly Index and CIS Annual Abstracts provide much of the raw material of the legislative process. Full text of hearings and debates is available on microfiche.

Rules and regulations of the federal administrative agencies, indexed by subject matter, are found in the Code of Federal Regulations supplemented by the daily Federal Register. The latter includes official notices of each rulemaking and other proceedings to be conducted by agencies such as the Federal Communications Commission (FCC). In the rulemaking process, FCC dockets or files, unfortunately located in Washington, D.C., often contain primary evidence in support of one regulatory position or another.[1]

One of the many loose-leaf services necessary to the study of administrative law is Pike and Fischer Radio Regulation (R.R. and R.R.2d). This is the most comprehensive source of FCC decisions and regulations and it includes statutes and court decisions pertaining to broadcasting and cable television.[2] The key to using Pike and Fischer expeditiously is to begin with the volume titled Finding Aids, which includes a "Master Index" to the Federal Communications Act paragraph numbers by which all materials are ordered. The Current Service volumes—presently six of them—contain up-to-date versions of law and regulations and any pending proposals for change. The four Digest volumes contain subject matter digests of FCC and court actions and decisions, while the Cases volumes (currently in Vol. 63) contain full texts. Index paragraphs in Pike and Fischer are referenced to sections of the amended Federal Communications Act of 1934 and to the Code of Federal Regulations.

1. Erwin G. Krasnow and G. Gail Crotts, Inside the FCC: An Information Searcher's Guide, Public Telecommunications Review 5:49–56 (July/August 1975).

If you do not find what you want in the Federal Register, the official FCC Annual Reports, Broadcasting Cablecasting Yearbook, Television Factbook, or Pike and Fischer, call the FCC's public information officer and specify what you are looking for.

After you have a Pike and Fischer or official FCC Reports citation, you can use Shepard's United States Administrative Citations to find all subsequent citations to that FCC action. Broadcasting magazine will keep you posted on pending FCC actions. Trade Regulation Reporter (CCH) provides a like service for advertising communication and the work of the Federal Trade Commission (FTC). Advertising Age is the most useful counterpart trade publication. Broadcasting and Advertising Age are indexed in Business Periodicals Index and in Topicater. Editor & Publisher is the newspaper industry's leading trade journal.

There is a monthly U.S. Catalog of Government Publications and a State Checklist of Government Documents. The U.S. Catalog is a monthly compilation of all federal executive, legislative, and administrative documents open to the public. It has cumulative annual indexes and some cumulative multiyear indexes.

When primary research is completed, it is time to survey the Index to Legal Periodicals to see what others have written about your topic. Some advise beginning legal research with the Index in order to survey the boundaries of a topic. It is tempting, however, to rely too heavily on these secondary sources at too early a stage. There is also an Index to Foreign Legal Periodicals and a new (Jan. 1, 1980) more comprehensive Legal Resource Index on microfilm with paper edition counterpart, Current Law Index. LRI is much broader in coverage than the older Index to Legal Periodicals and includes the New York Times, Wall Street Journal, and Christian Science Monitor.

Books or textbooks on legal topics are called treatises and a library's holdings are indexed in its card catalogue or on-line data base. A Horn Book is a single volume summary of a field of law. A Nutshell is an even more drastic summary. There are a number of legal bibliographies, among them Law Books in Print, edited by Nicholas Triffin.

The American Law Institute's Restatements of the Law are attempts to reorganize, simplify, and move case law toward comprehensible codes. Begin searching with the General Index to the Restatement of the Law.

For legal style and citation forms see A Uniform System of Citation published by the Harvard Law Review Association, and sometimes referred to as the Harvard Blue Book. There is also the University of Chicago Manual of Legal Citation, known as the Maroon Book. Any standard text on legal research and writing will provide similar information.[3]

The First Amendment Impact on Mass Communication: The Theory, the Practice, and the Problems

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE STUDY OF THE FIRST AMENDMENT

Historical Background

In 1791, the First Amendment to the United States Constitution was enacted:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances.

The First Amendment wisely guarantees, but does not define, freedom of speech and press. It should be noted that the specific addressee of First Amendment protection is Congress. Nothing in the original Constitution which was ratified by the states imposed any limitations on state legislatures with regard to freedom of speech or press. Whether postrevolutionary America would follow the darker pages in colonial history and hold newspaper editors guilty of legislative contempt and whether the new state governors would follow the precedent set by the royal colonial governors and seek to have newspaper editors indicted for seditious libel were matters that the First Amendment was basically helpless to resolve. All such issues were governed by state rather than federal constitutions.

There the matter stood until 1925 when, in an otherwise insignificant case involving a now forgotten and ultimately repentant Communist, Benjamin Gitlow, the Supreme Court in Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652, 666 (1925), in a casual statement not necessary to the decision said:

> For present purposes we may and do assume that freedom of speech and of the press—which are protected by the First Amendment from abridgment by Congress—are among the fundamental personal rights and "liberties" protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment from impairment by the states.

The textual justification in the Constitution for guaranteeing constitutional protection to freedom of speech and press under the federal constitution was achieved by interpretation of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment enacted in 1868 by the Reconstruction Congress to assure legal equality to the recently emancipated slaves. The second sentence of Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment stated:

> No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. [Emphasis added.]

The consequence of saying that freedom of speech and of the press were protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment from infringement by the states was an important advance in securing liberty of the press. Although the state constitutions have provisions protecting freedom of expression, often their language offers more comfort to state regulation of the press than is the case with the more protective and encompassing language of the First Amendment. To be sure, it is possible to argue that since freedom of the press on the state level is based on the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment rather than on explicit language in the First Amendment, the latitude for state regulation of the press is greater than that allowed the federal government. This two-tiered First Amendment theory was advanced by Justice John Marshall Harlan in a special concurring opinion he wrote in Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957), the case in which the Court held that obscenity was not constitutionally protected speech.

The use of the Fourteenth Amendment to make constitutional limitations such as the guarantee of free speech and press binding on the states as well as the federal government has given that amendment an enormous role in the development of constitutional liberty in the United States. The extension of the constitutional guarantee of freedom of speech and press to the states has been of great significance. For a view that state constitutions themselves gave early nurture to freedom of speech and press and greatly influenced the federal courts, see Blanchard, "Filling in the Void: Speech and Press in State Courts Prior to Gitlow," in Chamberlin and Brown (eds.), The First Amendment Reconsidered (1982).

The First Amendment has rarely been used to invalidate federal legislation on the ground that the legislation is impermissibly restrictive of freedom of speech and press. Indeed when the most dangerous federal legislation limiting freedom of expression ever to come before the Supreme Court in peacetime, the anti-Communist Smith Act case, Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951) was reviewed, the Court held the challenged law valid, even though it undoubtedly restricted First Amendment values in the interest of governmental self-preservation.

But as the cases and comment on free speech and freedom of the press in this chapter illustrate, numerous state statutes have been declared invalid as violative of the First Amendment, since that Amendment is now binding on the states through the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The determination on the part of the Framers of the American Constitution to assure protection for freedom of speech and press did not arise in a vacuum. English and American history prior to the American Revolution had persuaded the drafters of the First Amendment of the need for such assurance. Basic to an understanding of the First Amendment, both in terms of its origins and development, is John Milton's great essay in defense of a free press, The Areopagitica.

John Milton (1608–1674) was one of the great English poets. A republican in a monarchical age, the power of Milton's language and thought in his Areopagitica has made the essay a formidable obstacle to licensing and restraint of the press through the centuries. The Areopagitica was written as a protest to government licensing and censorship of the press, although Milton later was himself to serve as a censor for Oliver Cromwell.

In the middle of the seventeenth century, the Parliament of England passed a law licensing the press. The Order of the Lords and Commons, June 14, 1643, forbade the publication of any book, pamphlet, or paper which was published or imported without registration by the Stationers' Company. The Stationers' Company, formed in 1557, has been described as follows:

> The exclusive privilege of printing and publishing in the English dominions was given to 97 London stationers and their successors by regular apprenticeship. All printing was thus centralised in London under the immediate inspection of the Government. No one could legally print, without special license, who did not belong to the Stationers' Company. The Company had power to search for and to seize publications which infringed their privilege. Jebb, ed., Introduction, Milton, Areopagitica, xxiii (Cambridge University, 1918).

Later the licensing authority was divided between various royal and ecclesiastical authorities. The 1643 law, against which Milton directed his famous 1644 pamphlet in defense of freedom of the press, authorized official searches for unlicensed presses and prohibited the publication of anything unlicensed. The 1643 statute was designed to prevent the "defamation of Religion and Government." In Milton's view, truth in both the spheres of religion and government was more likely to emerge from free discussion than from repression. What follows is the most famous and widely quoted passage from The Areopagitica:

> And though all the winds of doctrine were let loose to play upon the earth, so Truth be in the field, we do injuriously by licensing and prohibiting to misdoubt > her strength. Let her and Falsehood grapple; who ever knew truth put to the worse, in a free and open encounter? Jebb at 58.

This passage marked the beginnings of what has become an underlying theme of First Amendment theory. This is the marketplace of ideas theory which was given fresh life by Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes in a famous dissent after World War I in Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616 (1919). In this view, truth is best secured in the open marketplace of ideas. Therefore, any government restraint which tends to distort or chill the free play of ideas, and thus the quest for truth, should not be permitted. The challenge that the idea of liberty of expression makes to the infirmity of the human condition should not be underestimated. Also we should remember that even Milton was not an absolutist with regard to freedom of expression. He did not believe in religious freedom for Roman Catholics. But Milton's hostility to the licensing of the press by government and his evident passion for a higher plateau of freedom of expression has been a powerful influence in the development of freedom of the press in the United States. See Siebert, Freedom of the Press in England, 1476–1766 (1952).

The licensing system ended in England in 1695, but licensing continued in the American colonies several decades thereafter. Gradually, prosecution for criminal or seditious libel supplanted licensing as the instrument for governmental restraint of the press in America in the period prior to the advent of the American Revolution. The common law crime of seditious libel made criticism of government a matter for criminal prosecution. While such prosecutions were not frequent in colonial America, they did occur.

The most famous such prosecution involved a New York printer, John Peter Zenger, editor of the New York Weekly Journal. Zenger's paper was used by politicians as a relentless forum for criticism of the colonial governor of New York, William Cosby. Zenger was arrested in 1734 on a charge of publishing seditious libels and jailed for eight months before trial. In August 1735, a jury, ignoring a judge's instructions, determined that Zenger was not guilty. The case thus became the most celebrated victory for freedom of the press in the pre-Revolutionary period.

It was no mean achievement for Zenger's attorney, Andrew Hamilton, to win the case, since, under the common law of seditious libel, the truth of the utterance was irrelevant.

In a recent book on the early history of freedom of the press in eighteenth-century America, Professor Norman Rosenberg points out that Zenger's lawyer, Andrew Hamilton, sought help from the jury for his editor: "Hamilton extolled the superior nature and wisdom of local juries." Hamilton "seldom mentioned the rights of a free press." Instead, he emphasized the right to resist an oppressive ruler and the right of "ordinary New Yorkers" to "complain about a bad administration." In short, instead of talking about the right of a free press, Hamilton talked about the free speech rights of a free people. See Rosenberg, Protecting the Best Men: An Interpretive History of the Law of Libel, 38–39 (1986).

In colonial seditious libel cases, the judge rather than the jury had the responsibility of deciding whether the publication complained of constituted seditious libel. The role of the jury was simply to ascertain whether the defendant had published the offending article. These features of the law of seditious libel gave freedom of expression little breathing space. In England it wasn't until 1792 that Fox's Libel Act finally altered the law of seditious libel to make truth a defense and to give the jury rather than the judge the power to determine whether the publication was or was not seditious libel. See Emerson, The System of Freedom of Expression, 99 (1970).

Unfortunately, seditious libel had proponents in the newly independent United States.

Congress in 1798, at the behest of the Federalist Party, enacted four acts directed against the subversive activities of foreigners in the United States. These became known as the Alien and Sedition Acts. The Federalist fear of radical sympathizers with France, French agents, and hostility toward Republican journalist critics of the Federalist administration led to the passage of the laws. These Acts were the Naturalization Act, the Act Concerning Aliens, the Act Respecting Enemies, and the Act for the Punishment of Crimes. The last mentioned, known as the Sedition Act, has been of great interest to First Amendment historians. Unlike the common law crime of seditious libel, the new law permitted truth as a defense, proof of malice was required, and the jury was permitted to pass on both questions of law and fact. Punishment was set by the statute. Specifically the Act provided that the publishing or printing of any false, scandalous, or malicious writings to bring the government, Congress, or the president into contempt or disrepute, excite popular hostility to them, incite resistance to the law of the United States, or encourage hostile designs against the United States was a misdemeanor. Republicans led by Jefferson and Madison held the law to be a violation of the First Amendment, and among those convicted of violating the law were some of the leading Republican editors. The Republicans contended that the law was being interpreted to punish and silence Republican critics of the Federalist Administration.

Federalists defended the statute as necessary to the right of government to self-preservation. The question of the constitutionality of the Act was never brought before the Supreme Court, although constitutional historians contend that it would have been upheld by the justices who sat on the Court during John Adams's presidency.

For those who viewed the First Amendment as a rejection of the English law of seditious libel, the enactment of the Sedition Act was obviously unconstitutional. For those who viewed the First Amendment as not promising an absolute protection of speech, the passing of the Act so soon after the Revolution and ratification of the constitution was proof that not all governmental restraint of expression was prohibited by the First Amendment.

The question of whether the Sedition Act could be consistent with the First Amendment was not directly resolved because the issue of its validity never came to the Court. The Sedition Act expired on March 3, 1801.

One noted American constitutional scholar, Leonard Levy, has argued that the First Amendment was designed to prohibit only prior restraint of the press (administrative censorship, such as licensing), not punishment for seditious libel. See Levy, The Legacy Of Suppression, 247–48 (1960).

Professor Levy has greatly moderated his views since the publication of The Legacy of Suppression. In a later book, Professor Levy says he erred when he said that "freedom of the press meant to the Framers merely the absence of prior restraints." Levy says he now considers that "freedom of the press merely began with its immunity from previous restraints." See Levy, Emergence of a Free Press, xi (1985).

Professor Levy has also altered his view that the eighteenth-century American understanding of freedom of the press did not include freedom from seditious libel:

> Some states gave written constitutional protection to freedom of the press after Independence; others did not. Whether they did or not, their presses operated as if the law of seditious libel did not exist. Id. at x.

The question of the constitutional status of the Alien and Sedition Acts was finally put to rest in the famous case of New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), in which the Supreme Court narrowly contracted the scope of libel law. In Sullivan, Justice William Brennan, speaking for the Court, declared: "Although the Sedition Act was never tested in this Court, the attack upon its validity has carried the day in the court of history." 376 U.S. 254 at 276.

For one commentator, the New York Times v. Sullivan statement on seditious libel was a crucial step in the continuous reinterpretation the First Amendment receives from the Supreme Court. The distinguished First Amendment scholar Professor Harry Kalven considered the crime of seditious libel incompatible with freedom of expression:

> The concept of seditious libel strikes at the very heart of democracy. Political freedom ends when government can use its powers and its courts to silence the critics. See Kalven, The New York Times Case: A Note On 'The Central Meaning of the First Amendment', Supreme Court Review 191 at 205 (1964).

Professor Kalven believed the repudiation of seditous libel had furnished a new key to understanding the meaning of First Amendment protection:

> The Court did not simply, in the face of an awkward history, definitively put to rest the status of the Sedition Act. More important, it found in the controversy over seditious libel the clue "to the central meaning of the First Amendment." The choice of language was unusually apt.
>
> The central meaning of the Amendment is that seditious libel cannot be made the subject of government sanction. * * * It is now not only the citizen's privilege to criticize his government, it is his duty. At this point in its rhetoric and sweep, the opinion almost literally incorporated the citizen as ruler, Alexander Meiklejohn's thesis that in a democracy the citizen as ruler is our most important public official. Kalven, supra, 208–209.

In New York Times v. Sullivan, the Court cited John Stuart Mill as well as Milton for its view that even a false statement, so long as it is not calculated falsehood, merits First Amendment protection when the communication at issue involves criticism of elected government officials.

One of the great influences on modern First Amendment law was this English political philosopher and economist who lived long after the enactment of the First Amendment. Mill (1806–1873), wrote widely on philosophy and economics, but it has been justly said that his essay, On Liberty Of Thought And Discussion (1859), was his "most lasting contribution to political thought." For Mill, "freedom of thought and investigation, freedom of discussion, and the freedom of self-controlled moral judgment were goods in their own right."

Actually, it is not surprising that Mill, like Milton, should be cited frequently in the vast literature that has arisen interpreting the meaning of freedom of speech and press, much of it in the form of the decisions of the justices of the United States Supreme Court. Modern First Amendment law did not get any extended or serious attention from the Supreme Court until cases involving a clash between governmental censorship and freedom of expression came about in the period after American involvement in World War I.

Constitutional scholars have more or less agreed with Professor Zechariah Chafee's observation that the Framers of the Constitution had no very clear idea of what they intended the guarantee of freedom of speech and press to mean. Chafee, Free Speech in the United States (1954). For thoughtful justices, like Justice Holmes, it became important to try to develop a rationale for constitutional protection of freedom of speech and press.

Marketplace of Ideas Theory

In cases like Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616, (1919), Holmes used the marketplace of ideas metaphor to give theoretical underpinning to the First Amendment. The similarity between the Holmesian marketplace of ideas concept of freedom of expression and Mill's rationale for liberty of thought and discussion is striking. It should be noted also that even when justices serving after Holmes returned to the marketplace of ideas theory, words used to describe the theory are very close to the language of Mill.

Thus, Justice William O. Douglas wrote, dissenting in the Supreme Court decision validating the anti-Communist prosecutions of the fifties, Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 at 584 (1951):

> When ideas compete in the market for acceptance, full and free discussion [exposes] the false and they gain few adherents. Full and free discussion even of ideas we hate encourages the testing of our own prejudices and preconceptions. Full and free discussion keeps a society from becoming stagnant and unprepared for the stresses and strains that work to tear all civilizations apart.

Mill had defended freedom of expression for very similar reasons nearly a century before in On Liberty Of Thought And Discussion:

> But the peculiar evil of silencing the expression of an opinion is, that it is robbing the human race; posterity as well as the existing generation; those who dissent from the opinion, still more than those who hold it. If the opinion is right, they are deprived of the opportunity of exchanging error for truth; if wrong, they lose, what is almost as great a benefit, the clearer perception and livelier impression of truth, produced by its collision with error. See Lindsay, ed., Mill, Utilitarianism, Liberty and Representative Government, 104 (1951).

The marketplace of ideas theory of freedom of speech, with its traditional aversion to governmental intervention, has been crucially and controversially altered in the case of the electronic media. But even in that area of First Amendment concern, the continuing impact and resiliency of Mill's thought is demonstrated by the Supreme Court's citation of Mill in 1969 when the Court sustained the FCC's fairness doctrine and personal attack rules against a claim of invalidity under the First Amendment. Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969). In Red Lion, Mill was cited by the Court in support of the governmental regulatory doctrines as follows:

> The expression of views opposing those which broadcasters permit to be aired in the first place need not be confined solely to the broadcasters themselves as proxies. "Nor is it enough that he should hear the arguments of his own adversaries from his own teachers, presented as they state them, and accompanied by what they offer as refutations. That is not the way to do justice to the arguments, or bring them into real contact with his own mind. He must be able to hear them from persons who actually believe them; who defend them in earnest, and do their very utmost for them." J. S. Mill, On Liberty, 32 (R. McCallum ed. 1947).

For some, the citation of Mill to support any kind of governmental interference with the press will seem heretical. For others, it will be seen as entirely consistent with Mill's passion for liberty of discussion and hostility to censorship, whether that censorship is public or private.

Despite the emphasis which the foregoing discussion has given the principle of unfettered free discussion as advocated by thinkers such as Mill and Milton, it should not be thought there is any unanimity with regard to the principle of free discussion as an ultimate value.

Thus, the New Left political philosopher, Herbert Marcuse, believed Mill's writings assumed that rational beings participate in free discussion, while in reality most of contemporary humanity are not rational but are manipulated beings, manipulated by media for commercial purposes and by government for political ones. Thus, the glorious concept of tolerance for all ideas, advocated by Milton and Mill, is for Marcuse a repressive tolerance. Marcuse was hostile to the marketplace of ideas. He thought traditional tools for elaborating the proper claims of freedom of expression against the claims of the state for curtailment of expression in the interest of security, such as the clear and present danger doctrine, were unusable. Marcuse wanted to substitute "precensorship" for "the more or less hidden censorship that permeates the free media." See Marcuse, Repressive Tolerance in Wolff, Moore, and Marcuse, a Critique of Pure Tolerance (1965).

For still others, the wisest course for the future would be to cleave to the following distillation of First Amendment experience as described by Justice Douglas:

> What kind of First Amendment would best serve our needs as we approach the 21st century may be an open question. But the old fashioned First Amendment that we have is the Court's only guideline; and one hard and fast principle has served us through days of calm and eras of strife and I would abide by it until a new First Amendment is adopted. That means, as I view it, that TV and radio, as well as the more conventional methods for disseminating news, are all included in the concept of "press" as used in the First Amendment and therefore are entitled to live under the laissez faire regime which the First Amendment sanctions. Columbia Broadcasting System v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. 94 (1973).

For a view that a First Amendment model which posits a self-correcting marketplace of ideas is a romantic and unrealistic description of the opinion process in late twentieth-century America, see Barron, Access to the Press—A New First Amendment Right, 80 Harv.L.Rev. 1641 (1967):

> There is inequality in the power to communicate ideas just as there is inequality in economic bargaining power; to recognize the latter and deny the former is quixotic. The "marketplace of ideas" has rested on the assumption that protecting the right of expression is equivalent to providing for it. But changes in the communications industry have destroyed the equilibrium in that marketplace. * * * A realistic view of the first amendment requires recognition that a right of expression is somewhat thin if it can be exercised only at the sufferance of the managers of mass communications.

In classic marketplace of ideas theory the role of government is nonintervention. The marketplace of ideas functions on a basis similar to the Darwinian theory of evolution. The assumption is that the best ideas will emerge, after combat, triumphant. But the unstated assumption from the quotation from Professor Barron is that if the marketplace of ideas is to be something more than a metaphor, some government intervention is required. See Red Lion v. FCC, text p. 795.

Marcuse submitted the traditional marketplace of ideas concept of freedom of expression to the following Marxist critique:

> The tolerance which was the great achievement of the liberal era is still professed and (with strong qualifications) practiced, while the economic and political process is subjected to an ubiquitous and effective administration in accordance with predominant interests. The result is an objective contradiction between the economic and political structure on the one side, and the theory and practice of toleration on the other. See Marcuse, Repressive Tolerance in Wolff, Moore, and Marcuse, A Critique Of Pure Tolerance 110 (1965).

Marcuse's evident wish to have an intellectual elite direct the media for predetermined social ends will not seem to many an improvement over the present situation. Yet there is disquiet as to whether a marketplace of ideas theory is meaningful when the marketplace is increasingly characterized by concentration of ownership and similarity of viewpoint.

Professor Edwin Baker rejects both the classic marketplace of ideas theory and what he calls the market failure model of the First Amendment. Advocates of the latter theory seek governmental intervention in the opinion process in order to correct the actual deficiencies or imbalances which they perceive in the actual workings of the communications marketplace (marketplace of ideas). Professor Baker argues: "If provision of adequate access is the goal, the lack of criteria for 'adequacy' undermines the legitimacy of government regulation. For the government to determine what access is adequate involves the government implicitly judging what is the correct resolution of the marketplace debates."

See Baker, Scope of the First Amendment Freedom of Speech, 25 U.C.L.A. L.Rev. 964 at 986 (1978).

Professor Baker calls for adoption of a liberty model as the appropriate First Amendment model: "On the liberty theory, the purpose of the First Amendment is not to guarantee adequate information. * * * Speech is protected because without disrespecting the autonomy of other persons, it promotes both the speaker's self-fulfillment and the speaker's ability to participate in change."

In an essay which goes against the contemporary First Amendment current, Professor Owen Fiss makes a plea for a role for the state in First Amendment theory. He recognizes that free speech is "the one plea for limited government that appears to be embraced by all." Well, not quite all. Professor Fiss argues that we should begin "with the fact of state intervention in economic matters, and then use that historical experience to understand why the state may have a role to play in furthering free speech values." See Fiss, Why the State? 100 Harv.L.Rev. 781 at 782–783 (1987). He distinguishes those who see the First Amendment as a limit on government or state action. Such people tend to regard the First Amendment as a protection of autonomy, with the understanding that autonomy includes individuals, groups, and corporations.

Professor Fiss argues that "[p]rotecting autonomy by placing a zone of noninterference around the individual or certain institutions is likely to produce a public debate that is dominated, and thus constrained, by the same forces that dominate social structure, not a debate that is 'uninhibited, robust and wide open.' " Fiss contrasts the autonomy principle with the public debate principle: "But now action is judged by its impact on public debate, a social state of affairs, rather than by whether it constrains or otherwise interferes with the autonomy of some individual or institution." The focus, says Fiss, is not on the "frustration of would-be speakers" but with the "quality of public discourse." Id. at 786 Professor Fiss concludes: "The aim is not to free the various agencies of the state from the forces that dominate social structure (surely an impossible task), but only to make it more likely that they will exert a countervailing force. This goal might be achieved by creating within state agencies certain processes or mechanisms that would enhance the power of the weaker elements of society." Id. at 792. Is this a Marxist view of public debate? Would Marcuse be sympathetic to it? See text, p. 6. When Fiss talks about the development of new mechanisms to counter market forces, what mechanisms would you suggest? See Barron, text, p. 489.

Professor Scott Powe distinguishes Fiss from Barron: "For Barron, access was a way to add voices and ideas to the marketplace." Both marketplace and individual would thereby be promoted. "Fiss makes no such claim. His proposals are designed to abridge some speech so that what is thereafter allowed in the marketplace will be capable of proper evaluation by listeners." For Fiss, autonomy is subordinated to a more important value: the quality of public discourse. See Powe, Scholarship And Markets, 56 Geo.Wash.L.Rev. 172 at 181 (1987). Professor Powe is extremely critical of Fiss's view that the public discourse value served by the First Amendment justifies state intervention to facilitate that value: "What Fiss leaves unexplained—because it is unexplainable—is how the First Amendment ceased being a bar to government action and instead became the vehicle to justify government regulation. Quite simply, Fiss is asking for an amendment to the Constitution rather than the interpretation of the Constitution. Implicitly Fiss's position is a testament to the premise of much modern constitutional discourse: everything is up for grabs." Id. at 184.

Interpreting the First Amendment

The Supreme Court like most of the American bar, as the subsequent cases in this chapter will illustrate, has engaged in a long-standing practice of making interchangeable use of free speech cases in freedom of the press cases and vice versa.

Although the interchangeable use of the freedom of speech and freedom of the press clauses may have characterized constitutional adjudication in the past, new attention has now been directed to the question of whether the free speech and free press clauses have distinct missions. In 1975, Justice Potter Stewart declared that alone among constitutional guarantees "the Free Press Clause extends protection to an institution." Justice Stewart observed: "The publishing business is, in short, the only organized private business that is given explicit constitutional protection." See Stewart, "Or of the Press," 26 Hastings L.J. 631, 633–34 (1975).

In the Stewart thesis, the freedom of the press clause is designed to protect the press qua press. In a sense, it is the antithesis of Justice Felix Frankfurter's conception of freedom of the press as reflected in his concurring opinion in Pennekamp v. Florida, 328 U.S. 331 (1946): "Freedom of the press, however, is not an end in itself but a means to the end of a free society." In the Stewart thesis, direct protection of the press is the function of the press clause. Justice Stewart interpreted the freedom of the press clause as follows: "[The] primary purpose of the constitutional guarantee of a free press was * * * to create a fourth institution outside the Government as an additional check on the three official branches."

Reactions to the ramifications of the Stewart conception of the press clause permeate recent First Amendment litigation. In Herbert v. Lando, 441 U.S. 153 (1979), text, p. 219. Stewart's contention that the free press clause extends special First Amendment protection to editorial decision making to the point that journalists and editors may be deemed excused from some of the customary demands of civil discovery was rejected in the decision by six of the nine justices who passed on the issue.

The issue of whether the free press clause gave a special status to the press arose again to some extent in the so-called corporate speech case, First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765 (1978). In what was possibly an oblique slap at the thesis that the press clause accords the press a special First Amendment status, Justice Lewis Powell observed for the Court that the inherent value of speech is not affected by the status of the speaker. Chief Justice Warren Burger, in a concurring opinion, appeared to enter the lists against a view of the press clause of First Amendment protection which would accord the press a uniquely privileged status: "In short, the First Amendment does not 'belong' to any definable category of persons or entities: it belongs to all who exercise its freedoms." See text, p. 158.

What the student of the law of mass communications must recognize at the outset, however, is that the constitutional protection given to freedom of speech and press covers the whole spectrum of the means of communication. The First Amendment has been extended from its specific eighteenth-century addressees mentioned in the constitution itself—free speech and free press—to new media of communication undreamed of in the eighteenth century, such as the sound truck, radio, television, cable television, and the movies. Occasionally, the Supreme Court has tried to deal with each medium in terms of its own problems. For example, Justice Tom Clark in Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495 (1952), observed that "To hold that liberty of expression by means of motion pictures is guaranteed by the First and Fourteenth Amendments, however, is not the end of our problem. * * * Each method [of expression] tends to present its own peculiar problems." 343 U.S. 495 at 502–503 (1952). Justice Robert Jackson in Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77 (1949), urged that each medium be considered a law unto itself. Justice Hugo Black rejected this kind of "favoritism." Justice Brennan has urged an approach which would recognize that there are two distinct First Amendment models—the "structural" model and the "speech" model—which do not and need not receive the same degree of protection.

In October 1979, Brennan gave a provocative speech in which he identified two First Amendment models conveying differing degrees of constitutional protection. In this view, the "structural" model grants less constitutional protection to the press than does the "speech" model:

> Under one model—which I call the "speech" model—the press requires and is accorded the absolute protection of the First Amendment. In the other model—I call it the "structural" model—the press' interests may conflict with other societal interests and adjustment of the conflict on occasion favors the competing claim.
>
> The "speech" model is familiar. It is as comfortable as a pair of old shoes, and the press, in its present conflict with the Court, most often slips into the language and rhetorical stance with which this model is associated even when only the "structural" model is at issue. According to this traditional "speech" model, the primary purpose of the First Amendment is more or less absolutely to prohibit any interference with freedom of expression. The "speech" model thus readily lends itself to the heady rhetoric of absolutism.
>
> The "speech" model, however, has its limitations. It is a mistake to suppose that the First Amendment protects only self-expression, only the right to speak out. I believe that the First Amendment in addition fosters the values of democratic self-government.
> Another way of saying this is that the First Amendment protects the structure of communications necessary for the existence of our democracy. This insight suggests the second model to describe the role of the press in our society. This second model is structural in nature. It focuses on the relationship of the press to the communicative functions required by our democratic beliefs. To the extent the press makes these functions possible, this model requires that it receive the protection of the First Amendment. A good example is the press' role in providing and circulating the information necessary for informed public discussion. To the extent the press, or, for that matter, to the extent that any institution uniquely performs this role, it should receive unique First Amendment protection.

This "structural" model of the press has several important implications. It significantly extends the umbrella of the press' constitutional protections. The press is not only shielded when it speaks out, but when it performs all the myriad tasks necessary for it to gather and disseminate the news. As you can easily see, the stretch of this protection is theoretically endless. Any imposition of any kind on the press will in some measure affect its ability to perform protected functions. Therefore this model requires a Court to weigh the effects of the imposition against the social interests which are served by the imposition. This inquiry is impersonal, almost sociological in nature. But it does not fit comfortably with the absolutist rhetoric associated with the first model of the press I have discussed. For here, I repeat, the Court must weigh the effects of the imposition inhibiting press access against the social interests served by the imposition.

On the whole, the Supreme Court and lesser courts in the American judicial system have approached problems of free speech and press rather broadly in terms of the conflicting social values working for and against a governmental restraint on a means of communication in a particular case.

In this First Amendment chapter, as well as in other chapters, one confronts a continuous philosophical debate on the meaning of freedom of speech and press. Through concepts like "clear and present danger," "balancing," "strict scrutiny," "symbolic speech," and "freedom from prior restraint," one begins to learn the constitutional law vocabulary of freedom of speech and press. Sometimes these doctrines disguise the sources of decision rather than illuminate them. It is also true that sometimes a Supreme Court decision owes more to the death or retirement of an old justice and the appointment of a new one than it does to the demands of any particular doctrine.

Nevertheless, the free speech and press doctrines collected in this chapter, in all their variety and contradiction, do reflect the considerable travail of Supreme Court justices in trying to discern the meaning of the First Amendment.

FIRST AMENDMENT DOCTRINE IN THE SUPREME COURT; A RATIONALE FOR LIMITING THE REGULATION OF SPEECH CONTENT

The Rise of the Clear and Present Danger Doctrine

The First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution must be the necessary starting point for any discussion of the extent and content of legal control of the press. The language of the amendment which has spawned innumerable cases, laws, books, and articles is remarkably stark, direct, and concise. See text, p. 1.

The words which attract our attention are the phrases "freedom of speech, or of the press." Because of the dynamic way in which this constitutional language has been interpreted by the courts, particularly the United States Supreme Court, the press has been held to mean all media of mass communication and not just newspapers. Whether this means that the First Amendment must be applied to all the media in exactly the same way is a question which will particularly concern us in the materials on legal control of broadcasting. But the basic point is that in American law the means of communication enjoy a protected status. A study of the assumptions on which such protection is based and a critical examination of their functional validity is our dual task. We must understand the fundamental role played in the American communications process by the political, legal, and communications theories that have been spun around the First Amendment.

The American law of freedom of speech and press, as enunciated by the opinions of the United States Supreme Court, is in the main a post-World War I phenomenon. The introduction of conscription in the United States in World War I for the first time since the Civil War, the opposition of radical groups to participation in that struggle, and the anti-radical "red scare" of the early 1920s combined to produce a collision between authority and libertarian values. That collision provoked the first significant efforts to develop some guidelines for the problem of reconciling majoritarian impatience, as expressed in an assortment of repressive laws, with constitutional guarantees. The purpose, of course, of a constitution is in a sense to confound a legislative majority. What a constitution does is to remove certain matters from the reach of legislation.

The following case arose out of socialist hostility to the draft and to American participation in World War I. The clash of a federal anti-espionage statute with the political protest of the socialists provided a vehicle for an opinion by Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes.

Holmes became one of the early architects of American free speech and free press theory. In Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919). Holmes launched a famous doctrine, the clear and present danger doctrine. As you read the opinion, ask yourself: what function did Holmes expect his clear and present danger doctrine to serve?

SCHENCK v. UNITED STATES

249 U.S. 47, 39 S.CT. 247, 63 L.ED. 470 (1919).

Justice HOLMES delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is an indictment in three counts. The first charges a conspiracy to violate the espionage act of June 15, 1917, by causing and attempting to cause insubordination, &c., in the military and naval forces of the United States, and to obstruct the recruiting and enlistment service of the United States, when the United States was at war with the German Empire, to-wit, that the defendant wilfully conspired to have printed and circulated to men who had been called and accepted for military service under the Act of May 18, 1917, a document set forth and alleged to be calculated to cause such insubordination and obstruction. The count alleges overt acts in pursuance of the conspiracy, ending in the distribution of the document set forth. The second count alleges a conspiracy to commit an offense against the United States, to-wit, to use the mails for the transmission of matter declared to be nonmailable by title 12, § 2, of the act of June 15, 1917, to-wit the above mentioned document, with an averment of the same overt acts. The third count charges an unlawful use of the mails for the transmission of the same matter and otherwise as above. The defendants were found guilty on all the counts. They set up the First Amendment to the Constitution forbidding Congress to make any law abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, and bringing the case here on that ground have argued some other points also of which we must dispose.

It is argued that the evidence, if admissible, was not sufficient to prove that the defendant Schenck was concerned in sending the documents. According to the testimony Schenck said he was general secretary of the Socialist party and had charge of the Socialist headquarters from which the documents were sent. He identified a book found there as the minutes of the Executive committee of the party. The book showed a resolution of August 13, 1917, that 15,000 leaflets should be printed on the other side of one of them in use, to be mailed to men who had passed exemption boards, and for distribution. Schenck personally attended to the printing. On August 20 the general secretary's report said "Obtained new leaflets from printer and started work addressing envelopes" &c.; and there was a resolve that Comrade Schenck be allowed $125 for sending leaflets through the mail. He said that he had about fifteen or sixteen thousand printed. There were files of the circular in question in the inner office which he said were printed on the other side of the one sided circular and were there for distribution. Other copies were proved to have been sent through the mails to drafted men. Without going into confirmatory details that were proved, no reasonable man could doubt that the defendant Schenck was largely instrumental in sending the circulars about. * * *

The document in question upon its first printed side recited the first section of the Thirteenth Amendment, said that the idea embodied in it was violated by the conscription act and that a conscript is little better than a convict. In impassioned language it intimated that conscription was despotism in its worst form and a monstrous wrong against humanity in the interest of Wall Street's chosen few. It said, "Do not submit to intimidation," but in form at least confined itself to peaceful measures such as a petition for the repeal of the act. The other and later printed side of the sheet was headed "Assert Your Rights." It stated reasons for alleging that any one violated the Constitution when he refused to recognize "your right to assert your opposition to the draft," and went on, "If you do not assert and support your rights, you are helping to deny or disparage rights which it is the solemn duty of all citizens and residents of the United States to retain." It described the arguments on the other side as coming from cunning politicians and a mercenary capitalist press, and even silent consent to the conscription law as helping to support an infamous conspiracy. It denied the power to send our citizens away to foreign shores to shoot up the people of other lands, and added that words could not express the condemnation such cold-blooded ruthlessness deserves, &c., &c., winding up, "You must do your share to maintain, support and uphold the rights of the people of this country." Of course the document would not have been sent unless it had been intended to have some effect, and we do not see what effect it could be expected to have upon persons subject to the draft except to influence them to obstruct the carrying of it out. The defendants do not deny that the jury might find against them on this point.

But it is said, suppose that that was the tendency of this circular, it is protected by the First Amendment to the Constitution. Two of the strongest expressions are said to be quoted respectively from well-known public men. It well may be that the prohibition of laws abridging the freedom of speech is not confined to previous restraints, although to prevent them may have been the main purpose, as intimated in Patterson v. Colorado, 205 U.S. 454, 462. We admit that in many places and in ordinary times the defendants in saying all that was said in the circular would have been within their constitutional rights. But the character of every act depends upon the circumstances in which it is done. The most stringent protection of free speech would not protect a man in falsely shouting fire in a theatre and causing a panic. It does not even protect a man from an injunction against uttering words that may have all the effect of force. The question in every case is whether the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent. [Emphasis added.] It is a question of proximity and degree. When a nation is at war many things that might be said in time of peace are such a hindrance to its effort that their utterance will not be endured so long as men fight and that no Court could regard them as protected by any constitutional right. It seems to be admitted that if an actual obstruction of the recruiting service were proved, liability for words that produced that effect might be enforced. The statute of 1917 * * * punishes conspiracies to obstruct as well as actual obstruction. If the act, (speaking, or circulating a paper,) its tendency and the intent with which it is done are the same, we perceive no ground for saying that success alone warrants making the act a crime. * * *

Judgments affirmed.

COMMENT

The most striking observation about the American law of freedom of speech and press is that the abridgment of these freedoms by Congress is not quite as unrestricted as a literal reading of the First Amendment might lead one to suppose. The Schenck case is an illustration of congressional power over political freedom. After all, Schenck was convicted for disseminating a pamphlet urging resistance to the draft, and the Supreme Court, in an opinion by one of its most libertarian judges, affirmed. In a companion case to Schenck, Justice Holmes remarked that "the First Amendment while prohibiting legislation against free speech as such cannot have been, and obviously was not, intended to give immunity for every possible use of language." Frohwerk v. United States, 249 U.S. 204 at 206 (1919). Holmes made a similar observation in Schenck when he said that "free speech would not protect a man in falsely shouting fire in a theatre and causing a panic." In other words, there is no absolute freedom of expression, but rather the scope of protection for such freedom is a question of degree. Holmes authored the clear and present danger doctrine as a guide to indicate the boundaries of protection and nonprotection. Under the rubric of the clear and present danger doctrine, political expression can be punished if circumstances exist to "create a clear and present danger" that the communication in controversy would "bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent."

Does Holmes indicate in Schenck whether the determination of circumstances which would present a "clear and present" danger is a legislative or a judicial responsibility?

Since the pamphlet issued by a minor group of socialists was found sufficiently objectionable to place its distributors in jail, should we conclude that the clear and present danger doctrine operates to give relatively little protection to unpopular communications? Or is there a special feature of the Schenck case which makes its holding of somewhat limited application?

ABRAMS v. UNITED STATES

250 U.S. 616, 40 S.CT. 17, 63 L.ED. 1173 (1919).

[EDITORIAL NOTE Abrams and others were accused of publishing and disseminating pamphlets attacking the American expeditionary force sent to Russia by President Woodrow Wilson to defeat the Bolsheviks. The pamphlets also called for a general strike of munitions workers. The majority of the Supreme Court, per Justice John Clarke, held that the publishing and distribution of the pamphlets during the war were not protected expression within the meaning of the First Amendment. Justice Clarke's opinion for the majority failed to make much impact on the law. But the dissent of Justice Holmes, in which he was joined by Justice Louis Brandeis, became one of the significant documents in the literature of the law of free expression.]

Justice HOLMES, dissenting.

This indictment is founded wholly upon the publication of two leaflets. * * * The first count charges a conspiracy pending the war with Germany to publish abusive language about the form of government of the United States, laying the preparation and publishing of the first leaflet as overt acts. The second count charges a conspiracy pending the war to publish language intended to bring the form of government into contempt, laying the preparation and publishing of the two leaflets as overt acts. The third count alleges a conspiracy to encourage resistance to the United States in the same war and to attempt to effectuate the purpose by publishing the same leaflets. The fourth count lays a conspiracy to incite curtailment of production of things necessary to the prosecution of the war and to attempt to accomplish it by publishing the second leaflet to which I have referred.

The first of these leaflets says that the President's cowardly silence about the intervention in Russia reveals the hypocrisy of the plutocratic gang in Washington. * * *

The other leaflet, headed "Workers—Wake Up," with abusive language says that America together with the Allies will march for Russia to help the Czecko-Slovaks [sic] in their struggle against the Bolsheviki, and that this time the hypocrites shall not fool the Russian emigrants and friends of Russia in America. It tells the Russian emigrants that they now must spit in the face of the false military propaganda by which their sympathy and help to the prosecution of the war have been called forth and says that with the money they have lent or are going to lend "they will make bullets not only for the Germans but also for the Workers Soviets of Russia," and further, "Workers in the ammunition factories, you are producing bullets, bayonets, cannon to murder not only the Germans, but also your dearest, best, who are in Russia fighting for freedom." It then appeals to the same Russian emigrants at some length not to consent to the "inquisitionary expedition in Russia," and says that the destruction of the Russian revolution is "the politics of the march on Russia," The leaflet winds up by saying "Workers, our reply to this barbaric intervention has to be a general strike!" and after a few words on the spirit of revolution, exhortations not to be afraid, and some usual tall talk ends "Woe unto those who will be in the way of progress. Let solidarity live! The Rebels."

No argument seems to be necessary to show that these pronunciamentos in no way attack the form of government of the United States, or that they do not support either of the first two counts. What little I have to say about the third count may be postponed until I have considered the fourth. With regard to that it seems too plain to be denied that the suggestion to workers in the ammunition factories that they are producing bullets to murder their dearest, and the further advocacy of a general strike, both in the second leaflet, do urge curtailment of production of things necessary to the prosecution of the war within the meaning of the act of May 16, 1918, amending section 3 of the earlier act of 1917. But to make the conduct criminal that statute requires that it should be "within intent by such curtailment to cripple or hinder the United States in the prosecution of the war." It seems to me that no such intent is proved.

I never have seen any reason to doubt that the questions of law that alone were before this Court in the cases of Schenck, Frohwerk and Debs were rightly decided. I do not doubt for a moment that by the same reasoning that would justify punishing persuasion to murder, the United States constitutionally may punish speech that produces or is intended to produce a clear and imminent danger that it will bring about forthwith certain substantive evils that the United States constitutionally may seek to prevent. The power undoubtedly is greater in time of war than in time of peace because war opens dangers that do not exist at other times.

But as against dangers peculiar to war, as against others, the principle of the right to free speech is always the same. It is only the present danger of immediate evil or an intent to bring it about that warrants Congress in setting a limit to the expression of opinion where private rights are not concerned.

[Emphasis added.] Congress certainly cannot forbid all effort to change the mind of the country. Now nobody can suppose that the surreptitious publishing of a silly leaflet by an unknown man, without more, would present any immediate danger that its opinions would hinder the success of the government arms or have any appreciable tendency to do so.

In this case sentences of twenty years imprisonment have been imposed for the publishing of two leaflets that I believe the defendants had as much right to publish as the Government has to publish the Constitution of the United States now vainly invoked by them. Even if I am technically wrong and enough can be squeezed from these poor and puny anonymities to turn the color of legal litmus paper; I will add, even if what I think the necessary intent were shown; the most nominal punishment seems to me all that possibly could be inflicted, unless the defendants are to be made to suffer not for what the indictment alleges but for the creed that they avow—a creed that I believe to be the creed of ignorance and immaturity when honestly held, as I see no reason to doubt that it was held here but which, although made the subject of examination at that trial, no one has a right even to consider in dealing with the charges before the Court.

Persecution for the expression of opinions seems to me perfectly logical. If you have no doubt of your premises or your power and want a certain result with all your heart you naturally express your wishes in law and sweep away all opposition. To allow opposition by speech seems to indicate that you think the speech impotent, as when a man says that he has squared the circle, or that you do not care whole heartedly for the result, or that you doubt either your power or your premises. But when men have realized that time has upset many fighting faiths, they may come to believe even more than they believe the very foundations of their own conduct that the ultimate good desired is better reached by free trade in ideas—that the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market, and that truth is the only ground upon which their wishes safely can be carried out. That at any rate is the theory of our Constitution. It is an experiment, as all life is an experiment. Every year if not every day we have to wager our salvation upon some prophecy based upon imperfect knowledge. While that experiment is part of our system I think that we should be eternally vigilant against attempts to check the expression of opinions that we loathe and believe to be fraught with death, unless they so imminently threaten immediate interference with the lawful and pressing purposes of the law that an immediate check is required to save the country. I wholly disagree with the argument of the Government that the First Amendment left the common law as to seditious libel in force. History seems to me against the notion. I had conceived that the United States through many years had shown its repentance for the Sedition Act of 1798 (act July 14, 1798, c. 73, 1 Stat. 596), by repaying fines that it imposed. Only the emergency that makes it immediately dangerous to leave the correction of evil counsels to time warrants making any exception to the sweeping command, "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech." Of course I am speaking only of expressions of opinion and exhortations, which were all that were uttered here, but I regret that I cannot put into more impressive words my belief that in their conviction upon this indictment the defendants were deprived of their rights under the Constitution of the United States. Justice Brandeis concurs with the foregoing opinion.

COMMENT

The reader should note that Holmes's theory of freedom of expression is basically a laissez-faire idea. The clash of political ideas is in this view a self-correcting and self-sustaining process. Under the marketplace of ideas theory the responsibility of government is neither to suppress nor to influence the process. This approach is reconciled with the clear and present danger test on the assumption that in a less than ideal world the application of the clear and present danger test permits only a minimum of governmental intervention into the opinion-making process. Holmes's Abrams dissent is a classic statement of the "marketplace of ideas" approach to First Amendment theory. In view of the rise of the electronic media, the information explosion, and the concentration of ownership in the mass media, what difficulties are presented in trying to make contemporary applications of statements such as "the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market"? The "market" Holmes is talking about is basically what we call today the mass media and their mass audiences. Is "free trade in ideas" the distinguishing characteristic of these media? If it is not, what deficiencies do you see in the "marketplace of ideas" theory?

Professor Thomas M. Scanlon, Jr., advocates a positive role for government in the effort to achieve freedom of expression. Professor Scanlon says there may be reasonable disagreement on how best to "refine the right" of freedom of expression. See Scanlon, Freedom of Expression and Categories of Expression, 40 U. of Pittsburgh L.Rev. 519 (1979). What is this disagreement about?

> But as new threats arise—from, for example, changes in the form of ownership of dominant means of communication—it may be unclear and a matter subject to reasonable disagreement, how best to refine the right in order to provide the relevant kinds of protection at a tolerable cost. This disagreement is partly empirical—a disagreement about what is likely to happen if certain powers are or are not granted to governments. It is also in part a disagreement at the foundational level over the nature and importance of audience and participant interests and, especially, over what constitutes a sufficiently equal distribution of the means to their satisfaction. The main role of a philosophical theory of freedom of expression, in addition to clarifying what it is we are arguing about, is to attempt to resolve these foundational issues.

GITLOW v. PEOPLE OF STATE OF NEW YORK

268 U.S. 652, 45 S.CT. 625, 69 L.ED. 1138 (1925).

[EDITORIAL NOTE Benjamin Gitlow, a member of the left-wing section of the Socialist Party, the revolutionary segment of the party, was indicted for the publication of a radical "manifesto" under the criminal anarchy statute of New York. Sixteen thousand copies of THE REVOLUTIONARY AGE, the house organ of the revolutionary section of the party which published the Manifesto, were printed. Some were sold; some were mailed. The New York Criminal Anarchy statute forbade the publication or distribution of material advocating, advising, or "teaching the duty, necessity or propriety of overthrowing or overturning organized government by force or violence." The Manifesto had urged mass strikes by the proletariat and repudiated the policy of the proletariat and repudiated the policy of the moderate Socialists of "introducing Socialism by means of legislative measures on the basis of the bourgeois state." The New York trial court convicted Gitlow under the Criminal Anarchy statute, and the state appellate courts affirmed. The United States Supreme Court also affirmed. The Court utilized as the measure of constitutionality the question of whether there was a reasonable basis for the legislature to have enacted the statute.]

The Court said, per Justice SANFORD:

For present purposes we may and do assume that freedom of speech and of the press—which are protected by the First Amendment from abridgment by Congress—are among the fundamental personal rights and "liberties" protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment from impairment by the States. [Emphasis added.] We do not regard the incidental statement in Prudential Ins. Co. v. Cheek, 259 U.S. 530, 543, that the Fourteenth Amendment imposes no restrictions on the State concerning freedom of speech, as determinative of this question.

We cannot hold that the present statute is an arbitrary or unreasonable exercise of the police power of the State unwarrantably infringing the freedom of speech or press; and we must and do sustain its constitutionality.

This being so it may be applied to every utterance—not too trivial to be beneath the notice of the law—which is of such a character and used with such intent and purpose as to bring it within the prohibition of the statute. * * * In other words, when the legislative body has determined generally, in the constitutional exercise of its discretion, that utterances of a certain kind involve such danger of substantive evil that they may be punished, the question whether any specific utterance coming within the prohibited class is likely, in and of itself, to bring about the substantive evil, is not open to consideration. It is sufficient that the statute itself be constitutional and that the use of the language comes within its prohibition.

It is clear that the question in such cases is entirely different from that involved in those cases where the statute merely prohibits certain acts involving the danger of substantive evil, without any reference to language itself, and it is sought to apply its provisions to language used by the defendant for the purpose of bringing about the prohibited results. There, if it be contended that the statute cannot be applied to the language used by the defendant because of its protection by the freedom of speech or press, it must necessarily be found, as an original question, without any previous determination by the legislative body, whether the specific language used involved such likelihood of bringing about the substantive evil as to deprive it of the constitutional protection. In such case it has been held that the general provisions of the statute may be constitutionally applied to the specific utterance of the defendant if its natural tendency and probable effect was to bring about the substantive evil which the legislative body might prevent. Schenck v. United States 249 U.S. 47; Debs v. United States 249 U.S. 211. And the general statement in the Schenck case, 249 U.S. 47 that the "question in every case is whether the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils,"—upon which great reliance is placed in the defendant's argument—was manifestly intended, as shown by the context, to apply only in cases of this class, and has no application to those like the present, where the legislative body itself has previously determined the danger of substantive evil arising from utterances of a specified character.

* * *

And finding, for the reasons stated that the statute is not in itself unconstitutional, and that it has not been applied in the present case in derogation of any constitutional right, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is affirmed.

Justice HOLMES (dissenting).

Justice Brandeis and I are of opinion that this judgment should be reversed. The general principle of free speech, it seems to me, must be taken to be included in the Fourteenth Amendment, in view of the scope that has been given to the word "liberty" as there used, although perhaps it may be accepted with a somewhat larger latitude of interpretation than is allowed to Congress by the sweeping language that governs or ought to govern the laws of the United States. If I am right then I think that the criterion sanctioned by the full Court in Schenck v. United States, applies:

"The question in every case is whether the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that [the State] has a right to prevent."

It is true that in my opinion that criterion was departed from in Abrams v. United States, but the convictions that I expressed in that case are too deep for it to be possible for me as yet to believe that it * * * has settled the law. If what I think the correct test is applied it is manifest that there was no present danger of an attempt to overthrow the government by force on the part of the admittedly small minority who shared the defendant's views. It is said that this manifesto was more than a theory, that it was an incitement. Every idea is an incitement. It offers itself for belief and if believed it is acted on unless some other belief outweighs it or some failure of energy stifles the movement at its birth. The only difference between the expression of an opinion and an incitement in the narrower sense is the speaker's enthusiasm for the result. Eloquence may set fire to reason. But whatever may be thought of the redundant discourse before us it had no chance of starting a present conflagration. If in the long run the beliefs expressed in a proletarian dictatorship are destined to be accepted by the dominant forces of the community, the only meaning of free speech is that they should be given their chance and have their way.

If the publication of this document had been laid as an attempt to induce an uprising against government at once and not at some indefinite time in the future it would have presented a different question. The object would have been one with which the law might deal, subject to the doubt whether there was any danger that the publication could produce any result, or in other words, whether it was not futile and too remote from possible consequences. But the indictment alleges the publication and nothing more. * * *

COMMENT

The Court, it should be observed, refused to apply the clear and present danger doctrine to the facts of the Gitlow case. The opinion apparently distinguishes the use of the clear and present danger doctrine in cases like Schenck and Abrams as espionage act cases. The Court asserts that a test of "reasonableness" of the legislative judgment will be used when the legislature itself has determined that certain utterances create a danger of a substantive evil. Such a circumstance, the Court says, differs from the situation in which the legislature has not specified certain utterances as forbidden. In the absence of such legislative specificity, the clear and present danger doctrine may be applied. Justice Brandeis's subsequent definition of the clear and present danger doctrine in his famous concurrence in Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927), text, p. 18, stated a formulation of the clear and present danger doctrine which yields a far greater protection for freedom of expression than that afforded by Sanford's narrower view of the doctrine in Gitlow.

Under Justice Sanford's interpretation of clear and present danger, how could a legislature, determined to suppress a particular political heresy, effectively avoid application of the clear and present danger doctrine?

If the best measure of the constitutional tests of statutes alleged to offend freedom of expression is the latitude a test yields for freedom of expression, how does the "reasonableness" test compare to (1) the clear and present danger doctrine as understood by Sanford, and (2) as understood by Holmes in his dissent in Gitlow?

As Holmes discusses the clear and present danger doctrine in Gitlow, what would you say appears to be the heart of the doctrine as far as he is concerned?

The portions of the Gitlow opinion concerning appropriate tests for legislation affecting freedom of expression are at this point no longer authoritative. It is Brandeis's subsequent formulation of the clear and present danger doctrine rather than Sanford's which has prevailed. What has proved durable in the opinion were some dicta, or statements not actually necessary to the result reached by the Court, where Justice Sanford offhandedly extended the limitations on legislation curtailing freedom of expression binding on the federal government by reason of the First Amendment to the states by reason of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Previous dicta had indicated that the states were not bound by a federal constitutional guarantee of freedom of speech and press. Justice Sanford's statement to the contrary in Gitlow was, therefore, of great importance. As a constitutional matter it is not an exaggeration to say that freedom of speech and press in regard to the states is a judicial creation just sixty-five years old.

Were it not for his Gitlow dictum, Justice Sanford would be largely unremembered. However, the substance of his Gitlow opinion has found a champion. Robert Bork argues that the opinion which should be praised in Gitlow is not the one authored by Justice Holmes, but the one authored by Justice Sanford. Why?

Bork responds:

> Speech advocating violent overthrow is * * * not "political speech." It is not political speech because it violates constitutional truths about processes and because it is not aimed at a new definition of political truth by a legislative majority. Violent overthrow of government breaks the premises of our system concerning the ways in which truth is defined, and yet those premises are the only reasons for protecting political speech. It follows that there is no constitutional reason to protect speech advocating forcible overthrow. See Bork, Neutral Principles and Some First Amendment Problems, 47 Ind. L.J. 1, 20 (1971).

For many, there will be concern whenever political freedom is limited to those who believe in "constitutional truth." The fear is that those not in control of government may make too narrow a definition of what constitutes "constitutional truth." Compare the views of Herbert Marcuse, text, p. 6, with those of Robert Bork. Are there any points of similarity? Any differences?

The Meiklejohn Theory of The First Amendment

The political philosopher, Alexander Meiklejohn, was a severe critic of the views articulated by Justice Holmes. Holmes's clear and present danger test sometimes permitted that which, in Meiklejohn's judgment, the First Amendment prohibited: congressional legislation abridging freedom of expression. See A. Meiklejohn, Free Speech and Its Relation to Self-Government, 29 (1948). For Meiklejohn, the clear and present danger test was merely a verbal dodge for permitting restriction of free speech and press whenever the Congress was disposed to do so.

Did Professor Meiklejohn believe then that no manner of expression could be restricted by government—even "counselling to murder" or falsely shouting fire in a crowded theatre? Meiklejohn did not go this far either. What he urged was that it is necessary to distinguish between two kinds of expression, one of which has absolute protection and one of which does not. Expression with regard to issues which concern political self-government was in Meiklejohn's judgment absolutely protected by the language of the First Amendment, i.e., "Congress shall make no law abridging * * * freedom of speech, or of the press." But private discussion, discussion which is nonpolitical in character, i.e., falsely shouting fire in a crowded theatre, was not within the ambit of the First Amendment at all but rather within the ambit of the more flexible, and less restrictive, due process clause of the Fifth Amendment, i.e., " * * * nor shall any person * * * be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law."

The rationale of the absolute protection for freedom of speech in Meiklejohn's judgment was to assure that the general citizenry would have the necessary information to make the informed judgments on which a self-governing society is dependent. Speech unrelated to that end was therefore not public speech, and not within the scope of the First Amendment, and so within the regulatory power of legislatures.

Did Meiklejohn underestimate the influence of nonpolitical forms of speech on the process of self-government?

Meiklejohn and the Blasi Critique: The "Checking Value"

The heart of the Meiklejohn thesis was that the First Amendment should be interpreted to safeguard and protect individual self-governance in a free and democratic society. It is precisely this thesis which has recently been exposed to a comprehensive critique. See Blasi, The Checking Value in First Amendment Theory, American Bar Foundation Research Journal 523 at 561 (1977). Professor Vincent Blasi believes that the view that the First Amendment is designed essentially to protect individual democratic decision making is outmoded.

"[T]he Meiklejohn thesis vision of active, continued involvement by citizens fails to describe not only the reality but also the shared ideal of American politics."

Blasi instead suggests that the First Amendment should be viewed as a kind of counterpoise to government. The function of the press is to serve as the watchdog of government, and the purpose of the First Amendment is to provide the press with protection in its role of keeping government responsive and accountable. This checking function value in the First Amendment is described by Professor Blasi as follows:

> The central premise of the checking value is that abuse of government is an especially serious evil—more serious than the abuse of private power, even by institutions such as large corporations which can affect the lives of millions of people.

The shift in emphasis on the ultimate purpose of First Amendment protection reflected between Meiklejohn's analysis as compared with that of Blasi is very clear. Protection of the media, rather than protection of the citizenry for purposes of self-expression and democratic decision making, becomes the fundamental First Amendment objective. The press becomes the focal point of First Amendment theory because the press and not the citizenry is seen as the essential "check" on government excess. The Blasi theory makes enduring constitutional interpretation out of the press role in Watergate.

The "checking value" sees the function of citizens in a regime ordered by the First Amendment in a very different light than Professor Meiklejohn perceived it. Professor Blasi acknowledges this difference in perspective and defends it:

> The checking value is premised upon a different vision—one in which the government is structured in such a way that built-in counterforces make it possible for citizens in most, but not all, periods to have the luxury to concern themselves almost exclusively with private pursuits.

In the Meiklejohn theory, the individual is at the heart of First Amendment theory. In the Blasi theory, the media occupy that role. But is this a required substitution? First Amendment theory should be rich enough to give the media adequate protection and yet to continue to grant the citizen the pivotal role which Meiklejohn assigned him. The "checking value" theory quite properly recognizes the almost quasi-constitutional checking role the press plays vis-à-vis government. Yet the theory is perhaps somewhat defeatist since it posits the individual citizen as remote and helpless, at least when compared to the two major protagonists, government and the media.

Meiklejohn and Holmes: The Chafee View

Meiklejohn's theory had the advantage of attempting to deal textually with the perplexing latitude of the First Amendment. The dilemma of First Amendment interpretation is that the more generously its language is interpreted, oddly enough, the less protection it renders. This is due to the fact that as a practical and a political matter, legislative majorities are too often unwilling to tolerate unlimited expression. Both Meiklejohn and Holmes, then, were attempting to provide a guide for indicating that which is protected expression and that which is not. Meiklejohn criticized Holmes because Holmes did not segregate the most important aspect of expression from a political view and immunize it from legislative assault.

Professor Zechariah Chafee subsequently criticized Meiklejohn on the ground that his attempt to immunize political speech—quite beyond the fact that separating that which is public and that which is private speech is no easy matter—was hopelessly unrealistic from a pragmatic point of view, and historically invalid as well.

Professor Chafee's basic point was that the question is not, ideally, how much speech ought to be protected but rather, politically and practically, how much expression can be protected by a court which is asked to defy "legislators and prosecutors." For Chafee, the merit of the clear and present danger doctrine was that it allowed the Congress some room to legislate in the area of public discussion but in such a way that the scope for such legislation was very restricted. For Chafee, the alternative to the Holmesian interpretation of the First Amendment was not Meiklejohn's absolute immunity for public discussion but rather no "immunity at all in the face of legislation." See Chafee, Book Review, 62 Harv.L.Rev. 891 at 898 (1949). It was obvious to Chafee that some concessions must be made to popular intolerance in periods of stress in the form of legislation. It was apparently very clear to him that, if some concessions were not made, the consequences for free expression in any time of turmoil and anxiety would necessarily be worse than if some relaxation of the absolute language of the First Amendment was not permitted.

For Professor Meiklejohn it was a matter of great significance that the First Amendment prohibited the abridgment of "freedom of speech" rather than "speech itself." This for him was the clue that the Framers intended to give absolute protection to public or political speech. That the historical background of the First Amendment by no means implies that the Framers contemplated that absolute freedom of expression championed by Professor Meiklejohn is suggested in Levy, Legacy of Suppression (1960). For a different opinion by Levy, see Emergence of a Free Press (1985). Should we be bound by the Framers' understanding of the document which they authored? A response was voiced by the distinguished political scientist Professor Harold Lasswell:

> Suppose that historical research does succeed in disclosing the perspectives that prevailed in the eighteenth century, and which have been greatly modified since. What of it? * * * In the perspective of a comprehensive value oriented jurisprudence * * * the historical facts about the perspectives of the founding fathers, so briefly adhered to, are not binding on us.

See Lasswell's review of Crosskey, Politics and The Constitution in the History of The United States, 22 Geo.Wash.L.Rev. 383 (1953).

What are the comparative advantages and disadvantages for society and for those who work in the mass media of (1) the historical approach to the First Amendment, (2) the Meiklejohn approach, and (3) the Lasswellian approach?

The Clear and Present Danger Test Refined: The Authorized Brandeis Version

WHITNEY v. CALIFORNIA

274 U.S. 357, 47 S.CT. 641, 71 L.ED. 1095 (1927).

*[EDITORIAL NOTE Ms. Anita Whitney participated in the convention which set up the Communist Labor Party of California and was elected an alternate member of its state executive committee. Ms. Whitney was convicted under the California Criminal Syndicalism Act on the ground that the Communist Labor Party was formed to teach criminal syndicalism and, as a member of the party, she participated in the crime. The state Criminal Syndicalism Act defined criminal syndicalism "as any doctrine or precept advocating, teaching or aiding and abetting the commission of crime, sabotage * * * or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change."*

Ms. Whitney insisted, on review to the U.S. Supreme Court, that she had not intended to have the Communist Labor Party of California serve as an instrument of terrorism or violence. Ms. Whitney argued that, as the convention progressed, it developed that the majority of the delegates entertained opinions about violence which she did not share. She asserted she should not be required to have foreseen that development and that her mere presence at the convention should not be considered to constitute a crime under the statute. The court, per Justice Sanford, said that what Ms. Whitney was really doing was asking the Supreme Court to review questions of fact that had already been determined against her in the courts below and that questions of fact were not open to review in the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court upheld Whitney's conviction on the ground that concerted action involved a greater threat to the public order than isolated utterances and acts of individuals.

But it was the concurrence of Justice Brandeis, joined by Justice Holmes, rather than Justice Sanford's opinion for the majority, which shaped the future development of the constitutional law of freedom of expression. Brandeis attempted to do two things in his concurrence in Whitney. First, he sought to clarify the clear and present danger doctrine in a sufficiently meaningful way so that the responsibilities of the judiciary and the legislature would be clearly outlined at the same time that the greatest possible protection was provided for freedom of expression. Second, Brandeis sought to analyze the rationale of constitutional protection for freedom of expression.

The student should read the Brandeis opinion in Whitney in an effort to state and analyze the conclusions Brandeis reached in trying to serve these two goals.]

Justice BRANDEIS (concurring).

Ms. Whitney was convicted of the felony of assisting in organizing, in the year 1919, the Communist Labor Party of California, of being a member of it, and of assembling with it. These acts are held to constitute a crime, because the party was formed to teach criminal syndicalism. The statute which made these acts a crime restricted the right of free speech and of assembly theretofore existing. The claim is that the statute, as applied, denied to Ms. Whitney the liberty guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment.

The felony which the statute created is a crime very unlike the old felony of conspiracy or the old misdemeanor of unlawful assembly. The mere act of assisting in forming a society for teaching syndicalism, of becoming a member of it, or assembling with others for that purpose is given the dynamic quality of crime. There is guilt although the society may not contemplate immediate promulgation of the doctrine. Thus the accused is to be punished, not for attempt, incitement or conspiracy, but for a step in preparation, which, if it threatens the public order at all, does so only remotely. The novelty in the prohibition introduced is that the statute aims, not at the practice of criminal syndicalism, nor even directly at the preaching of it, but at association with those who propose to preach it.

Despite arguments to the contrary which had seemed to me persuasive, it is settled that the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment applies to matters of substantive law as well as to matters of procedure. Thus all fundamental rights comprised within the term liberty are protected by the federal Constitution from invasion by the states. The right of free speech, the right to teach and the right of assembly are, of course, fundamental rights. These may not be denied or abridged. But, although the rights of free speech and assembly are fundamental, they are not in their nature absolute. Their exercise is subject to restriction, if the particular restriction proposed is required in order to protect the state from destruction or from serious injury, political, economic or moral. That the necessity which is essential to a valid restriction does not exist unless speech would produce, or is intended to produce, a clear and imminent danger of some substantive evil which the state constitutionally may seek to prevent has been settled. See Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47, 52.

It is said to be the function of the Legislature to determine whether at a particular time and under the particular circumstances the formation of, or assembly with, a society organized to advocate criminal syndicalism constitutes a clear and present danger of substantive evil; and that by enacting the law here in question the Legislature of California determined that question in the affirmative. Compare Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652, 668, 671. The Legislature must obviously decide, in the first instance, whether a danger exists which calls for a particular protective measure. But where a statute is valid only in case certain conditions exist, the enactment of the statute cannot alone establish the facts which are essential to its validity. Prohibitory legislation has repeatedly been held invalid, because unnecessary, where the denial of liberty involved was that of engaging in a particular business. The powers of the courts to strike down an offending law are no less when the interests involved are not property rights, but the fundamental personal rights of free speech and assembly.

This court has not yet fixed the standard by which to determine when a danger shall be deemed clear; how remote the danger may be and yet be deemed present; and what degree of evil shall be deemed sufficiently substantial to justify resort to abridgment of free speech and assembly as the means of protection. To reach sound conclusions on these matters, we must bear in mind why a state is, ordinarily, denied the power to prohibit dissemination of social, economic and political doctrine which a vast majority of its citizens believes to be false and fraught with evil consequence.

Those who won our independence believed that the final end of the state was to make men free to develop their faculties, and that in its government the deliberative forces should prevail over the arbitrary. They valued liberty both as an end and as a means. They believed liberty to be the secret of happiness and courage to be the secret of liberty. They believed that freedom to think as you will and to speak as you think are means indispensable to the discovery and spread of political truth; that without free speech and assembly discussion would be futile; that with them, discussion affords ordinarily adequate protection against the dissemination of noxious doctrine; that the greatest menace to freedom is an inert people; that public discussion is a political duty; and that this should be a fundamental principle of the American government. They recognized the risks to which all human institutions are subject. But they knew that order cannot be secured merely through fear of punishment for its infraction; that it is hazardous to discourage thought, hope and imagination; that fear breeds repression; that repression breeds hate; that hate menaces stable government; that the path of safety lies in the opportunity to discuss freely supposed grievances and proposed remedies; and that the fitting remedy for evil counsels is good ones. Believing in the power of reason as applied through public discussion, they eschewed silence coerced by law—the argument of force in its worst form. Recognizing the occasional tyrannies of governing majorities, they amended the Constitution so that free speech and assembly should be guaranteed.

Fear of serious injury cannot alone justify suppression of free speech and assembly. Men feared witches and burnt women. It is the function of speech to free men from the bondage of irrational fears. To justify suppression of free speech there must be reasonable ground to fear that serious evil will result if free speech is practiced. There must be reasonable ground to believe that the danger apprehended is imminent. There must be reasonable ground to believe that the evil to be prevented is a serious one. Every denunciation of existing law tends in some measure to increase the probability that there will be violation of it. Condonation of a breach enhances the probability. Expressions of approval add to the probability. Propagation of the criminal state of mind by teaching syndicalism increases it. Advocacy of lawbreaking heightens it still further. But even advocacy of violation, however reprehensible morally, is not a justification for denying free speech where the advocacy falls short of incitement and there is nothing to indicate that the advocacy would be immediately acted on. The wide difference between advocacy and incitement, between preparation and attempt, between assembling and conspiracy, must be borne in mind. In order to support a finding of clear and present danger it must be shown either that immediate serious violence was to be expected or was advocated, or that the past conduct furnished reason to believe that such advocacy was then contemplated.

Those who won our independence by revolution were not cowards. They did not fear political change. They did not exalt order at the cost of liberty. To courageous, self-reliant men, with confidence in the power of free and fearless reasoning applied through the processes of popular government, no danger flowing from speech can be deemed clear and present, unless the incidence of the evil apprehended is so imminent that it may befall before there is opportunity for full discussion. If there be time to expose through discussion the falsehood and fallacies, to avert the evil by the processes of education, the remedy to be applied is more speech, not enforced silence. [Emphasis added.] Only an emergency can justify repression. Such must be the rule if authority is to be reconciled with freedom. Such, in my opinion, is the command of the Constitution. It is therefore always open to Americans to challenge a law abridging free speech and assembly by showing that there was no emergency justifying it.

Moreover, even imminent danger cannot justify resort to prohibition of these functions essential to effective democracy, unless the evil apprehended is relatively serious. Prohibition of free speech and assembly is a measure so stringent that it would be inappropriate as the means for averting a relatively trivial harm to society. A police measure may be unconstitutional merely because the remedy, although effective as means of protection, is unduly harsh or oppressive. Thus, a state might, in the exercise of its police power, make any trespass upon the land of another a crime regardless of the results or of the intent or purpose of the trespasser. It might, also, punish an attempt, a conspiracy, or an incitement to commit the trespass. But it is hardly conceivable that this court would hold constitutional a statute which punished as a felony the mere voluntary assembly with a society formed to teach that pedestrians had the moral right to cross uninclosed, unposted, waste lands and to advocate their doing so, even if there was imminent danger that advocacy would lead to a trespass. The fact that speech is likely to result in some violence or in destruction of property is not enough to justify its suppression. There must be the probability of serious injury to the State. Among free men, the deterrents ordinarily to be applied to prevent crime are education and punishment for violations of the law, not abridgment of the rights of free speech and assembly.

* * * Whenever the fundamental rights of free speech and assembly are alleged to have been invaded, it must remain open to a defendant to present the issue whether there actually did exist at the time a clear danger, whether the danger, if any, was imminent, and whether the evil apprehended was one so substantial as to justify the stringent restriction interposed by the Legislature. The legislative declaration, like the fact that the statute was passed and was sustained by the highest court of the State, creates merely a rebuttable presumption that these conditions have been satisfied.

Whether in 1919, when Ms. Whitney did the things complained of, there was in California such clear and present danger of serious evil, might have been made the important issue in the case. She might have required that the issue be determined either by the court or the jury. She claimed below that the statute as applied to her violated the federal Constitution; but she did not claim that it was void because there was no clear and present danger of serious evil, nor did she request that the existence of these conditions of a valid measure thus restricting the rights of free speech and assembly be passed upon by the court or a jury. On the other hand, there was evidence on which the court or jury might have found that such danger existed. I am unable to assent to the suggestion in the opinion of the court that assembling with a political party, formed to advocate the desirability of a proletarian revolution by mass action at some date necessarily far in the future, is not a right within the protection of the Fourteenth Amendment. In the present case, however, there was other testimony which tended to establish the existence of a conspiracy, on the part of members of the International Workers of the World, to commit present serious crimes, and likewise to show that such a conspiracy would be furthered by the activity of the society of which Ms. Whitney was a member. Under these circumstances the judgment of the State court cannot be disturbed.

Justice Holmes joins in this opinion.

COMMENT

It should be noted that Justice Brandeis only reluctantly agreed that the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment applied to matters of substantive law, i.e., imposed a freedom of speech and press limitation on state power. Law and journalism students should observe how the modern American law of speech and press rests on judicial interpretation and creativity and how relatively small a role is played by the formal text, the actual language of the constitutional document.

In his discussion of the clear and present danger doctrine, Brandeis stressed that the crucial factor is the immediacy of the danger legislated against. As he puts it, "Only an emergency can justify repression." The corrective for communications objectionable to the state is expression to the contrary. It is only when the "evil apprehended is so imminent that it may befall before there is opportunity for full discussion" that the legislature may act. Brandeis makes it very clear, however, that a legislative judgment that the danger is too immediate and too grave to justify reliance on corrective discussion is not conclusive. As he says, the "enactment of the statute alone cannot alone establish the facts which are essential to its validity." There must be a reasonable basis for the legislative conclusion or for the state's conclusion that a particular repressive statute should be applied because of the imminent danger of the occurrence of a prohibited substantive evil.

This insistence that the courts have the last word in analyzing whether the clear and present danger doctrine should be applied is of the utmost importance. Otherwise, all the legislature would have to do to comply formally with the clear and present danger doctrine would be to merely recite, as the California legislature did in its Criminal Syndicalism Act, that it is concerned with the "immediate preservation of the public peace and safety." By such a formalism, the supposed protection of a constitutional guarantee of freedom of speech and press would be effectively destroyed.

The Brandeis opinion in Whitney, as we have seen, was the charter for a revised clear and present danger doctrine. Yet, in the end, and despite the eloquence of Brandeis, the conviction of Anita Whitney was affirmed, a result which, it should be noted, was joined in by Justice Holmes.[1]

Functionally, how useful has the clear and present danger doctrine actually proven to be? Dean Robert McKay, in a study of the First Amendment, answered the question very pragmatically. Counting cases from 1919 to 1937, Professor McKay concluded: "In its first eighteen years the clear and present danger test amounted only to this: one majority opinion (upholding the conviction claimed to abridge the freedom of speech), one concurrence, and five dissents." See McKay, The Preference for Freedom, 34 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1182 at 1207 (1959).

The Preferred Position Theory

Courts have often declared that they grant a presumption of constitutionality to challenged legislation. In United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144 (1938), in which the issue was a federal statute concerning economic regulation, Chief Justice Harlan Stone, writing for the Court, voiced the familiar view that the legislative judgment should be accorded a presumption of constitutionality. But in a famous footnote Stone stated that he would exempt a certain class of legislation from the scope of such a presumption. 304 U.S. 144 at 152–153, fn. 4:

> There may be narrower scope for operation of the presumption of constitutionality when legislation appears on its face to be within a specific prohibition of the Constitution, such as those of the first ten amendments, which are deemed equally specific when held to be embraced within the Fourteenth.
>
> It is unnecessary to consider now whether legislation which restricts those political processes which can ordinarily be expected to bring about repeal of undesirable legislation, is to be subjected to more exacting judicial scrutiny under the general prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment than are most other types of legislation. On restrictions upon the right to vote, see Nixon v. Condon, 286 U.S. 73; on restraints upon the dissemination of information, see Near v. Minnesota ex rel. Olson, 283 U.S. 697, 713–714, 718–720, 722; Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233; on interferences with political organizations, see Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357, 373–378; and see Holmes, J., in Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652, 673; as to prohibition of peaceable assembly, see De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353, 365.
> Nor need we inquire whether similar considerations enter into the review of statutes directed at particular religious, Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 368 U.S. 510, or national, Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, or racial minorities; Nixon v. Condon, supra: whether prejudice against discrete and insular minorities may be a special condition, which tends seriously to curtail the operation of those political processes ordinarily to be relied upon to protect minorities, and which may call for a correspondingly more searching judicial inquiry.

The essence of the preferred position theory stated in Carolene Products is that legislation restricting the political freedoms should be exposed to a more searching and exacting judicial review than other legislative challenges. Stone said there is a judicial responsibility to protect political freedom particularly. Restriction of political freedom, unlike other legislative restrictions, endangers the health of the political process. One of the reasons for affording considerable latitude to legislation in constitutional questions is because broad participation in decision making is a value of high dimension in a democratic society. Generally, the legislative process rather than the judicial process is considered more capable of demonstrating and providing such participation. But, if the legislature disenfranchises a segment of the electorate, or restrains freedom of expression so that the electorate is not sufficiently informed to be able to engage rationally in decision making, then the reason for extending the benefit of the doubt to contested legislation is removed. This theory, the "preferred position" or "preferred freedoms" theory of the First Amendment, declares that legislation concerning the political freedoms protected by the First Amendment shall not be able to claim the normal

1. A very similar criminal syndicalism Ohio statute was invalidated by the Supreme Court in Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969). Brandenburg also reversed the decision of the Court in Whitney: "The contrary teaching of Whitney v. California, cannot be supported, and that decision is therefore overruled." See Brandenburg v. Ohio, this text, p. 29.

In appraising the preferred position along with the other First Amendment doctrines explored in this chapter, it should be noted that the clear and present danger doctrine and the preferred position theory have been thought to be "clearly related." Both theories, it has been said, give judges an active role in First Amendment interpretation and, though they do not provide the certainty of the absolutist approach, they do "in contrast to the pseudo-standards of the reasonableness and balancing doctrines" offer "positive and workable standards to guide judicial judgment." See Pritchett, The American Constitution, 429 (2d ed. 1968).

Professor C. H. Pritchett's preference for the clear and present danger and preferred position over balancing and reasonableness is that the latter tests offer no definition or presumption to make them applicable or meaningful. If competing interests are to be balanced, how do we know which interest is to be given what weight?

Professor Thomas Emerson accurately referred to what he called the Burger Court's "neglect of the preferred position doctrine." However, his criticism is directed to the fact that the Court has not yet applied the preferred position theory in a principled across-the-board fashion: "[W]here it feels inclined to defer to legislative judgment, or when it prefers another social interest, it does not feel bound by the preferred position doctrine." See Emerson, First Amendment Doctrine and the Burger Court, 68 Calif.L.Rev. 422 at 443 (1980). Although the preferred position doctrine was not to be found by name in the opinions of the Burger court, its legacy was occasionally visible when the Court applied a more searching standard of review in a First Amendment case than it would otherwise. See discussion of balancing and standards of review, text, p. 74.

Preservation of the State: Decline, Death, and Revival of the Clear and Present Danger Doctrine

DENNIS v. UNITED STATES

341 U.S. 494, 71 S.CT. 857, 95 L.ED. 1137 (1951).

Chief Justice Fred VINSON announced the judgment of the Court and an opinion in which Justice Reed, Justice Burton and Justice Minton join.

Petitioners were indicted in July, 1948, for violation of the conspiracy provisions of the Smith Act, 54 Stat. 671, 18 U.S.C.A. § 11, during the period of April, 1945, to July, 1948. * * * A verdict of guilty as to all the petitioners was returned by the jury on October 14, 1949. The Court of Appeals affirmed the convictions. 183 F.2d 201. We granted certiorari, 340 U.S. 863, limited to the following two questions: (1) Whether either § 2 or § 3 of the Smith Act, inherently or as construed and applied in the instant case, violates the First Amendment and other provisions of the Bill of Rights; (2) whether either § 2 or § 3 of the act, inherently or as construed and applied in the instant case, violates the First and Fifth Amendments because of indefiniteness.

Sections 2 and 3 of the Smith Act, 54 Stat. 671, 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 10, 11 (see present 18 U.S.C.A. § 2385), provide as follows:

"(a) It shall be unlawful for any person—

"(1) to knowingly or willfully advocate, abet, advise, or teach the duty, necessity, desirability, or propriety of overthrowing or destroying any government in the United States by force or violence, or by the assassination of any officer of any such government; * * *

"(3) to organize or help to organize any society, group, or assembly of persons who teach, advocate, or encourage the overthrow or destruction of any government in the United States by force or violence; or to be or become a member of, or affiliate with, any such society, group, or assembly of persons, knowing the purposes thereof.

"Sec. 3. It shall be unlawful for any person to attempt to commit, or to conspire to commit, any of the acts prohibited by the provisions of * * * this title."

The indictment charged the petitioners with wilfully and knowingly conspiring (1) to organize as the Communist Party of the United States of America a society, group and assembly of persons who teach and advocate the overthrow and destruction of the Government of the United States by force and violence, and (2) knowingly and wilfully to advocate and teach the duty and necessity of overthrowing and destroying the Government of the United States by force and violence. The indictment further alleged that § 2 of the Smith Act proscribes these acts and that any conspiracy to take such action is a violation of § 3 of the act.

* * *

Our limited grant of the writ of certiorari has removed from our consideration any question as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the jury's determination that petitioners are guilty of the offense charged. Whether on this record petitioners did in fact advocate the overthrow of the Government by force and violence is not before us, and we must base any discussion of this point upon the conclusions stated in the opinion of the Court of Appeals, which treated the issue in great detail. That court held that the record amply supports the necessary finding of the jury that petitioners, the leaders of the Communist Party in this country, * * * intended to initiate a violent revolution whenever the propitious occasion appeared.

The obvious purpose of the statute is to protect existing government, not from change by peaceable, lawful and constitutional means, but from change by violence, revolution and terrorism. That it is within the power of the Congress to protect the government of the United States from armed rebellion is a proposition which requires little discussion. Whatever theoretical merit there may be to the argument that there is a "right" to rebellion against dictatorial governments is without force where the existing structure of the government provides for peaceful and orderly change. We reject any principle of governmental helplessness in the face of preparation for revolution, which principle, carried to its logical conclusion, must lead to anarchy. No one could conceive that it is not within the power of Congress to prohibit acts intended to overthrow the government by force and violence. The question with which we are concerned here is not whether Congress has such power, but whether the means which it has employed conflict with the First and Fifth Amendments to the Constitution.

One of the bases for the contention that the means which Congress has employed are invalid takes the form of an attack on the face of the statute on the grounds that by its terms it prohibits academic discussion of the merits of Marxism-Leninism, that it stifles ideas and is contrary to all concepts of a free speech and a free press. * * *

The very language of the Smith Act negates the interpretation which petitioners would have us impose on that act. It is directed at advocacy, not discussion. Thus, the trial judge properly charged the jury that they could not convict if they found that petitioners did "no more than pursue peaceful studies and discussions or teaching and advocacy in the realm of ideas." He further charged that it was not unlawful "to conduct in an American college and university a course explaining the philosophical theories set forth in the books which have been placed in evidence." Such a charge is in strict accord with the statutory language, and illustrates the meaning to be placed on those words. Congress did not intend to eradicate the free discussion of political theories, to destroy the traditional rights of Americans to discuss and evaluate ideas without fear of governmental sanction. Rather Congress was concerned with the very kind of activity in which the evidence showed these petitioners engaged.

But although the statute is not directed at the hypothetical cases which petitioners have conjured, its application in this case has resulted in convictions for the teaching and advocacy of the overthrow of the government by force and violence, which, even though coupled with the intent to accomplish that overthrow, contains an element of speech. For this reason, we must pay special heed to the demands of the First Amendment marking out the boundaries of speech. * * *

[T]his Court has recognized the inherent value of free discourse. An analysis of the leading cases in this Court which have involved direct limitations on speech, however, will demonstrate that both the majority of the Court and the dissenters in particular cases have recognized that this is not an unlimited, unqualified right, but that the societal value of speech must, on occasion, be subordinated to other values and considerations.

* * *

The rule we deduce from these cases [following Schenck] is that where an offense is specified by a statute in nonspeech or nonpress terms, a conviction relying upon speech or press as evidence of violation may be sustained only when the speech or publication created a "clear and present danger" of attempting or accomplishing the prohibited crime, e.g., interference with enlistment. The dissents, * * * in emphasizing the value of speech, were addressed to the argument of the sufficiency of the evidence. Speech is not an absolute, above and beyond control by the legislature when its judgment, subject to review here, is that certain kinds of speech are so undesirable as to warrant criminal sanction. * * *

In this case we are squarely presented with the application of the "clear and present danger" test, and must decide what that phrase imports. We first note that many of the cases in which this Court has reversed convictions by use of this or similar tests have been based on the fact that the interest which the State was attempting to protect was itself too insubstantial to warrant restriction of speech. * * * Overthrow of the Government by force and violence is certainly a substantial enough interest for the Government to limit speech. Indeed this is the ultimate value of any society, for if a society cannot protect its very structure from armed internal attack, it must follow that no subordinate value can be protected. If, then, this interest may be protected, the literal problem which is presented is what has been meant by the use of the phrase "clear and present danger" of the utterances bringing about the evil within the power of Congress to punish.

Obviously, the words cannot mean that before the Government may act, it must wait until the putsch is about to be executed, the plans have been laid and the signal is awaited. If Government is aware that a group aiming at its overthrow is attempting to indoctrinate its members and to commit them to a course whereby they will strike when the leaders feel the circumstances permit, action by the Government is required. * * * Certainly an attempt to overthrow the Government by force, even though doomed from the outset because of inadequate numbers or power of the revolutionists, is a sufficient evil for Congress to prevent. The damage which such attempts create both physically and politically to a nation makes it impossible to measure the validity in terms of the probability of success, or the immediacy of a successful attempt. In the instant case the trial judge charged the jury that they could not convict unless they found that petitioners intended to overthrow the Government "as speedily as circumstances would permit." This does not mean, and could not properly mean, that they would not strike until there was certainty of success. What was meant was that the revolutionists would strike when they thought the time was ripe. We must therefore reject the contention that success or probability of success is the criterion.

The situation with which Justices Holmes and Brandeis were concerned in Gitlow was a comparatively isolated event, bearing little relation in their minds to any substantial threat to the safety of the community. * * * They were not confronted with any situation comparable to the instant one—the development of an apparatus designed and dedicated to the overthrow of the Government, in the context of world crisis after crisis.

Chief Judge Learned Hand, writing for the majority below, interpreted the phrase as follows: "In each case [courts] must ask whether the gravity of the 'evil,' discounted by its improbability, justifies such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger." 183 F.2d at 212. We adopt this statement of the rule. [Emphasis added.] As articulated by Chief Judge Hand, it is as succinct and inclusive as any other we might devise at this time. It takes into consideration those factors which we deem relevant, and relates their significances. More we cannot expect from words.

We hold that §§ 2(a)(1), 2(a)(3) and 3 of the Smith Act, do not inherently, or as construed or applied in the instant case, violate the First Amendment and other provisions of the Bill of Rights, or the First and Fifth Amendments because of indefiniteness. Petitioners intended to overthrow the Government of the United States as speedily as the circumstances would permit. Their conspiracy to organize the Communist Party and to teach and advocate the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force and violence created a "clear and present danger" of an attempt to overthrow the Government by force and violence. They were properly and constitutionally convicted for violation of the Smith Act. The judgments of conviction are affirmed.

Affirmed.

Justice Clark took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

Justice FRANKFURTER, concurring:

But even the all-embracing power and duty of self-preservation are not absolute. Like the war power, which is indeed an aspect of the power of self-preservation, it is subject to applicable constitutional limitations. See Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries Co., 251 U.S. 146, 156. Our Constitution has no provision lifting restrictions upon governmental authority during periods of emergency, although the scope of a restriction may depend on the circumstances in which it is invoked.

The First Amendment is such a restriction. It exacts obedience even during periods of war; it is applicable when war clouds are not figments of the imagination no less than when they are. * * * The right of a man to think what he pleases, to write what he thinks, and to have his thoughts made available for others to hear or read has an engaging ring of universality. The Smith Act and this conviction under it no doubt restrict the exercise of free speech and assembly. Does that, without more, dispose of the matter?

Absolute rules would inevitably lead to absolute exceptions, and such exceptions would eventually corrode the rules. The demands of free speech in a democratic society as well as the interest in national security are better served by candid and informed weighing of the competing interests, within the confines of the judicial process, than by announcing dogmas too inflexible for the non-Euclidian problems to be solved.

But how are competing interests to be assessed? Since they are not subject to quantitative ascertainment, the issue necessarily resolves itself into asking, who is to make the adjustment?—who is to balance the relevant factors and ascertain which interest is in the circumstances to prevail? Full responsibility for the choice cannot be given to the courts. Courts are not representative bodies. They are not designed to be a good reflex of a democratic society. Their judgment is best informed, and therefore most dependable, within narrow limits. Their essential quality is detachment, founded on independence. History teaches that the independence of the judiciary is jeopardized when courts become embroiled in the passions of the day and assume primary responsibility in choosing between competing political, economic and social pressures.

Primary responsibility for adjusting the interests which compete in the situation before us of necessity belongs to the Congress. The nature of the power to be exercised by this Court has been delineated in decisions not charged with the emotional appeal of situations such as that now before us. We are to set aside the judgment of those whose duty it is to legislate only if there is no reasonable basis for it. We are to determine whether a statute is sufficiently definite to meet the constitutional requirements of due process, and whether it respects the safeguards against undue concentration of authority secured by separation of power. We must assure fairness of procedure, allowing full scope to governmental discretion but mindful of its impact on individuals in the context of the problem involved. And, of course, the proceedings in a particular case before us must have the warrant of substantial proof. Beyond these powers we must not go; we must scrupulously observe the narrow limits of judicial authority even though self-restraint is alone set over us. Above all we must remember that this Court's power of judicial review is not "an exercise of the powers of a super-Legislature."

In all fairness, the argument cannot be met by reinterpreting the Court's frequent use of "clear" and "present" to mean an entertainable "probability." In giving this meaning to the phrase "clear and present danger," the Court of Appeals was fastidiously confining the rhetoric of opinions to the exact scope of what was decided by them. We have greater responsibility for having given constitutional support, over repeated protests, to uncritical libertarian generalities. * * *

Justice DOUGLAS, dissenting.

The vice of treating speech as the equivalent of overt acts of a treasonable or seditious character is emphasized by a concurring opinion, [Justice Jackson], which by invoking the law of conspiracy makes speech do service for deeds which are dangerous to society. The doctrine of conspiracy has served diverse and oppressive purposes and in its broad reach can be made to do great evil. But never until today has anyone seriously thought that the ancient law of conspiracy could constitutionally be used to turn speech into seditious conduct. Yet that is precisely what is suggested. I repeat that we deal here with speech alone, not with speech plus acts of sabotage or unlawful conduct. Not a single seditious act is charged in the indictment. To make a lawful speech unlawful because two men conceive it is to raise the law of conspiracy to appalling proportions. That course is to make a radical break with the past and to violate one of the cardinal principles of our constitutional scheme.

Free speech has occupied an exalted position because of the high service it has given our society.

Its protection is essential to the very existence of a democracy. The airing of ideas releases pressures which otherwise might become destructive. When ideas compete in the market for acceptance, full and free discussion exposes the false and they gain few adherents. Full and free discussion even of ideas we hate encourages the testing of our own prejudices and preconceptions. Full and free discussion keeps a society from becoming stagnant and unprepared for the stresses and strains that work to tear all civilizations apart.

Full and free discussion has indeed been the first article of our faith. We have founded our political system on it. It has been the safeguard of every religious, political, philosophical, economic, and racial group amongst us. We have counted on it to keep us from embracing what is cheap and false; we have trusted the common sense of our people to choose the doctrine true to our genius and to reject the rest. This has been the one single outstanding tenet that has made our institutions the symbol of freedom and equality. We have deemed it more costly to liberty to suppress a despised minority than to let them vent their spleen. We have above all else feared the political censor. We have wanted a land where our people can be exposed to all the diverse creeds and cultures of the world.

There comes a time when even speech loses its constitutional immunity. Speech innocuous one year may at another time fan such destructive flames that it must be halted in the interests of the safety of the Republic. That is the meaning of the clear and present danger test. When conditions are so critical that there will be no time to avoid the evil that the speech threatens, it is time to call a halt. Otherwise, free speech which is the strength of the Nation will be the cause of its destruction.

COMMENT

Functionally speaking, Vinson really follows the old "reasonableness" test of Justice Sanford in Gitlow. Vinson's formulation of the clear and present danger doctrine is hardly the same as that articulated by Brandeis in his concurrence in Whitney. Vinson said he endorsed the test employed by Judge Learned Hand which was "whether the gravity of the 'evil,' discounted by its improbability, justifies such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger." Vinson said that the clear and present danger test, thus understood, could not mean that the government action is prohibited "until the putsch is about to be executed." Reasoning that "success or probability of success is not the criterion," Vinson disregarded the factor of time in applying the clear and present danger test.

For Brandeis, time was the key factor in determining whether legislation designed to protect the security of the state was constitutional. See Pritchett, The American Constitution (2d ed. 1968). In the Brandeis view, the integrity of the public order was strengthened by free discussion. As Brandeis put it in Whitney: "the path of safety lies in the opportunity to discuss freely supposed grievances and proposed remedies."

The crucial inquiry, according to Brandeis, was whether the "evil apprehended is so imminent that it may befall before there is opportunity for discussion." But inquiry into the imminence of the danger—the factor of time—is precisely what Vinson excluded from his reformulation of clear and present danger. In Dennis, Chief Justice Vinson professedly used the clear and present danger doctrine to assess the constitutionality of the Smith Act, but, in truth, he completely revised it so that it provided far less protection to freedom of expression than the Brandeis conception of clear and present danger. If the imminence of a danger is quite remote, then in the weighing process which constitutional adjudication involves, the value of freedom of expression should not be subordinated to the value of national security. Arguably, under such an approach the Smith Act should be held unconstitutional since the Smith Act had been interpreted by the Justice Department to proscribe "advocacy." But surely advocacy should be protected from federal legislative restriction under the First Amendment in the absence of an imminent danger under the clear and present danger formulation. Vinson changed the clear and present danger doctrine to the "clear danger" or "clear and probable danger" doctrine. Vinson's "clear danger" rationale, however, merely asked whether a grave threat was posed to the state in the future if not now. Obviously, under such a weighing process the likelihood of a statute's being held violative of the First Amendment was far less likely.

Frankfurter's long concurrence in Dennis argued for a balancing approach for cases where the values of freedom of expression and national security are in conflict. But Frankfurter intended the balancing to be done by the Congress rather than by the Court. What difference does it make? It is Congress which has passed the law which is under attack as violative of the First Amendment. If the congressional determination is to be upheld on the theory that the congressional balancing decision should be respected, there is no place for judicial review.

Did Frankfurter's opinion in Dennis overlook the point that majoritarianism and constitutionalism are not necessarily synonymous? The idea of constitutional limitation, after all, is to protect certain values from legislative repression, to limit the majority. Therefore, it is somewhat anomalous to make majoritarianism the dominant value in a consideration of the meaning of a constitutional limitation.

Contrast Chief Justice Stone's differing view on the impermissibility of democratic repression (limitation on basic freedoms enacted by freely elected legislatures) in the famous footnote in United States v. Carolene Products, 304 U.S. 144 at 152, n. 4 (1938). In that opinion, Stone raised but deferred consideration of the question "whether legislation which restricts those political processes which can ordinarily be expected to bring about repeal of undesirable legislation, is to be subjected to more exacting judicial scrutiny under the general prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment than are most other types of legislation." According special judicial scrutiny to legislation restricting freedom of expression has been called the "preferred position" theory of freedom of expression. How does this theory differ from Frankfurter's balancing approach in Dennis? Frankfurter appeared to be saying that a presumption of validity should be given to the preference of the majority as reflected in an enacted statute, while Stone appeared to be saying that in freedom of expression cases the presumption should be against the legislative judgment.

Of the law of conspiracy Justice Jackson, in a concurring opinion, said that "Congress may make it a crime to conspire with others to do what an individual may lawfully do on his own."

What does this statement mean for the law of freedom of expression? Assume that an editor of a radical newspaper had published an editorial stating that the war in Vietnam was unconstitutional and illegal and that draft resisters merited the approval of the people. Such a statement is presumably not unlawful but rather reflects that criticism of government which it is the purpose of the First Amendment to protect. Suppose, however, that the editor had published the editorial as a member of a group united to frustrate the efforts of the government to conduct the war in Vietnam. Arguably it now becomes a conspiracy and what on an individual basis was lawful becomes transformed into unlawful activity.

"The law of conspiracy," Jackson concluded, "has been the chief means at the Government's disposal to deal with the growing problems created by such organizations. I happen to think it is an awkward and inept remedy, but I find no constitutional authority for taking this weapon from the Government. There is no constitutional right to 'gang up' on the Government."

Chief Justice Vinson reformulated the clear and present danger doctrine in such a way as to make it an entirely new test. He said that the government can act before the putsch is executed, and the Court rejected the "contention that success or probability of success is the criterion." What this approach does is to remove the factor of time from the clear and present danger formula. The danger must be grave (serious), but apparently, under the Dennis case, it is no longer necessary that it be immediate (present). However, the function of time or imminence in the clear and present danger doctrine was to justify legislation restricting freedom of expression where there is reason to believe that there was not enough time for normal debate to counteract the dangers feared by the legislature. By removing time from the clear and present danger equation, Vinson removed the most significant protection the doctrine provided for freedom of expression.

Vinson adopted Learned Hand's formulation in the Court of Appeals: "whether the gravity of the evil discounted by its improbability justifies such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger." 183 F.2d at 212. Substituting a test of probability for a test of imminence greatly broadened the scope of governmental power over freedom of expression. Such an approach focuses attention on the gravity of the problem (the "evil") with which the legislature is concerned. The Court said the Smith Act, under which the Communist party leaders were prosecuted, was concerned with the "ultimate value of our society." The nature of this ultimate value? The governmental interest in self-preservation.

The Vinson view as to what is the ultimate societal value contrasted sharply with that of Justice Black, who in his dissent argued that free speech and press are the preferred values, the ultimate values, in the American constitutional system.

As a result of the Dennis decision, the government brought many prosecutions under the Smith Act against minor Communist party leaders. The Supreme Court refused to review any of these cases until 1955 when it finally granted certiorari in Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1957). The Court's decision, per Justice Harlan, two years later ostensibly clarified the Dennis holding. Actually, it contracted the scope of the Dennis case, revived the constitutional law of freedom of expression from its low point in Dennis six years before, and made it far more difficult for the government to obtain convictions under the Smith Act. Of the fourteen defendants whose convictions were before the Supreme Court in Yates, five convictions were reversed, and new trials were ordered for the rest.

The most authoritative portion of the Yates case is certainly Justice Harlan's statement that the "essence of the Dennis holding" only sanctioned the restriction of "advocacy found to be directed to 'action for the accomplishment of forcible overthrow.' " In his dissent, Justice Tom Clark said, as he read Chief Justice Vinson's opinion in Dennis, that he saw no basis for the distinction between advocacy of unlawful action and advocacy of abstract doctrine which Harlan said was the heart of the Dennis case. For Justice Clark's point of view at least this much can be said: the two lower federal courts in Yates also joined him in "misconceiving" the Dennis case. Justice Harlan's "reading" of Dennis in Yates may have been merely an indirect way of reversing Dennis.

How does the distinction between advocacy of abstract doctrine and advocacy of unlawful action expand the area of expression the government may not restrict?

The Dennis case was decided in 1951 during the beginning of the red-baiting years that have since been called the "McCarthy" era after Senator Joseph McCarthy of Wisconsin. By 1957, the reaction against "McCarthyism" had set in. What explanation could be used to place Dennis and Yates in a political perspective? What does such a perspective contribute to the discussion in Dennis about whether it is more appropriate for the judiciary or the legislature to make ultimate political choices?

In his dissent Justice Black said that the "First Amendment provides the only kind of security system which can preserve a free government." This remark was designed to rebut Vinson's contention in Dennis that self-preservation is the ultimate value of a society and Frankfurter's contention that self-preservation is an independent constitutional value which competes with freedom of expression. What is the nature of Justice Black's argument here?

What was the status of the "clear and present" danger doctrine after Dennis and Yates? No clear answer to this question was provided by the Supreme Court until 1969 when the Court quietly resurrected the "clear and present danger" doctrine in Brandenburg v. Ohio.

BRANDENBURG v. OHIO

395 U.S. 444, 89 S.CT. 1827, 23 L.ED.2D 430 (1969).

PER CURIAM.

The appellant, a leader of a Ku Klux Klan group, was convicted under the Ohio Criminal Syndicalism statute for "advocat[ing] * * * the duty, necessity, or propriety of crime, sabotage, violence, or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing industrial or political reform" and for "voluntarily assembl[ing] with any society, group, or assemblage of persons formed to teach or advocate the doctrines of criminal syndicalism." Ohio Rev.Code Ann. § 2923.13. He was fined $1,000 and sentenced to one to 10 years' imprisonment. The appellant challenged the constitutionality of the criminal syndicalism statute under the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution, but the intermediate appellate court of Ohio affirmed his conviction without opinion. The Supreme Court of Ohio dismissed his appeal, sua sponte, "for the reason that no substantial constitutional question exists herein." It did not file an opinion or explain its conclusions. Appeal was taken to this Court, and we noted probable jurisdiction. 393 U.S. 948 (1968). We reverse.

The record shows that a man, identified at trial as the appellant, telephoned an announcer-reporter on the staff of a Cincinnati television station and invited him to come to a Ku Klux Klan "rally" to be held at a farm in Hamilton County. With the cooperation of the organizers, the reporter and a cameraman attended the meeting and filmed the events. Portions of the films were later broadcast on the local station and on a national network.

The prosecution's case rested on the films and on testimony identifying the appellant as the person who communicated with the reporter and who spoke at the rally. The state also introduced into evidence several articles appearing in the film, including a pistol, a rifle, a shotgun, ammunition, a Bible, and a red hood worn by the speaker in the films.

One film showed 12 hooded figures, some of whom carried firearms. They were gathered around a large wooden cross, which they burned. No one was present other than the participants and the newsmen who made the film. Most of the words uttered during the scene were incomprehensible when the film was projected, but scattered phrases could be understood that were derogatory of Negroes and, in one instance, of Jews.[1] Another scene on the same film showed the appellant, in Klan regalia, making a speech. The speech, in full, was as follows:

"This is an organizers' meeting. We have had quite a few members here today which are—we have hundreds, hundreds of members throughout the State of Ohio. I can quote from a newspaper clipping from the Columbus, Ohio Dispatch, five weeks ago Sunday morning. The Klan has more members in the State of Ohio than does any other organization. We're not a revengent organization, but if our President, our Congress, our Supreme Court, continues to suppress the white, Caucasian race, it's possible that there might have to be some revengeance taken.

"We are marching on Congress July the Fourth, four hundred thousand strong. From there we are dividing into two groups, one group to march on St. Augustine, Florida, the other group to march into Mississippi. Thank you."

The second film showed six hooded figures one of whom, later identified as the appellant, repeated a speech very similar to that recorded on the first film. The reference to the possibility of "revengeance" was omitted, and one sentence was added: "Personally, I believe the nigger should be returned to Africa, the Jew returned to Israel." Though some of the figures in the films carried weapons, the speaker did not.

The Ohio Criminal Syndicalism Statute was enacted in 1919. From 1917 to 1920, identical or quite similar laws were adopted by 20 States and two territories. E. Dowell, A History of Criminal Syndi- calism Legislation in the United States 21 (1939).

* * * [L]ater decisions have fashioned the principle

that the constitutional guarantees of free speech and free press do not permit a State to forbid or proscribe advocacy of the use of force or of law violation except where such advocacy is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such actions. * * * A statute which fails to draw this distinction impermissibly intrudes upon the freedoms guaranteed by the First and Fourteenth Amendments. It sweeps within its condemnation speech which our Constitution has immunized from governmental control. * * *

Measured by this test, Ohio's Criminal Syndicalism Act cannot be sustained. The act punishes persons who "advocate or teach the duty, necessity, or propriety" of violence "as a means of accomplishing industrial or political reform"; or who publish or circulate or display any book or paper containing such advocacy; or who "justify" the commission of violent acts "with intent to exemplify, spread or advocate the propriety of the doctrines of criminal syndicalism"; or who "voluntarily assemble" with a group formed "to teach or advocate the doctrines of criminal syndicalism." Neither the indictment nor the trial judge's instructions to the jury in any way refined the statute's bald definition of the crime in terms of mere advocacy not distinguished from incitement to imminent lawless action.

Accordingly, we are here confronted with a statute which, by its own words and as applied, purports to punish mere advocacy and to forbid, on pain of criminal punishment, assembly with others merely to advocate the described type of action. Such a statute falls within the condemnation of the First and Fourteenth Amendments. * * *

Reversed.

BRANDENBURG AND THE REVIVAL OF THE DANGER DOCTRINE

In Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969), the Supreme Court held the Ohio criminal syndicalism statute void on its face for failing to distinguish between mere advocacy of ideas and incitement to unlawful conduct. Nearly half a century earlier, a California criminal anarchy statute suffering an identical weakness had been upheld by the Court

1. The significant portions that could be understood were:

"How far is the nigger going to—yeah."; "This is what we are going to do to the niggers."; "A dirty nigger."; "Send the Jews back to Israel."; "Let's give them back to the dark garden."; "Save America."; "Let's go back to constitutional betterment."; "Bury the niggers."; "We intend to do our part."; "Give us our state rights."; "Freedom for the whites."; "Nigger will have to fight for every inch he gets from now on."

in the case of Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927). In Brandenburg, the Supreme Court turned a corner in its approach to the legislative suppression of politically unpopular speech. Brandenburg expressly overruled Whitney.

Yet the Court's approach to the Brandenburg decision was perfunctory. The Supreme Court issued its Brandenburg decision as an anonymous per curiam opinion. Further, in purporting to summarize and clarify fifty years of free speech doctrine, the Court in Brandenburg issued a relatively short opinion.

Consider the following summary of the holding in Brandenburg:

> The per curiam opinion summarized past decisions by saying that legislative proscription of advocacy is not constitutional except: where such advocacy (1) is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action, and (2) is likely to incite or produce such action. The Court thus established a two-part test: one, the subjection of the speaker; the other, the objective likelihood that the speaker will succeed in carrying out that intent before time for further dialogue, i.e., imminently.

See Barron and Dienes, Constitutional Law: Principles and Policy, 734–35 (2d Ed. 1982).

Is the Brandenburg per curiam decision an attempt to abandon or revise the clear and present danger doctrine? Does the Brandenburg decision even mention the clear and present danger doctrine by name?

Professor Be Vier appears to argue that the Brandenburg test is a different test than the clear and present danger test.

> [The Brandenburg] rule avoids the institutional limitations of the clear and present danger test by both limiting the range of external circumstances and providing some criteria for judging those circumstances. Subversive speech is protected unless it is likely to produce imminent lawless action. Implicitly irrelevant, now, is the question of the gravity of the threatened evil; implicitly inappropriate is any effort to discount the gravity of the evil by its improbability; implicitly settled is the issue of whether a "remote" danger can every be "clear"; implicitly dictated is a relatively confined factual finding of the likelihood that the speech would incite imminent lawless action.

See Be Vier, The First Amendment and Political Speech: An Inquiry Into the Substance and Limits of Principle, 30 Stan.L.Rev. 299 at 341 (1978).

Oregon Supreme Court Justice Hans Linde perceives in the Brandenburg test several new and disturbing elements. Linde, "Clear and Present Danger" Re-examined: Dissonance in the Brandenburg Concerto, 22 Stan.L.Rev. 1163 (1970). If proscription of free speech is to be judged, as Brandenburg suggests, by the actual danger posed by the advocacy, does this not render useless an examination of the statute on its face? Under such a standard of review, Professor Linde is concerned that a criminal anarchy statute "might well be unconstitutional now but might be constitutional in the light of diverse events in 1945, in 1951, in 1957, and in 1961, perhaps not in 1966, but again in 1968." But is such a result necessarily objectionable? If the American system of judicial review amounts to a continuous constitutional convention, isn't the situation Linde describes inevitable?

Note that Brandenburg, a Ku Klux Klan organizer, was tried and convicted under a criminal syndicalism statute which was enacted in the early 1900s to guard against nihilists, anarchists, and wobblies. Ohio was one of many states which passed such laws to meet a particular threat perceived at the time but long since lost in oblivion. Yet the Ohio statute remained on the books, to be resurrected in Brandenburg to meet a situation far afield from the subject of its origins. Would a standard of review which required constitutional judgment of a statute on its face improve this situation?

Justices Black and Douglas concurred in Brandenburg, joining in the decision to overrule Whitney and strike down the Ohio criminal syndicalism statute. But they added separate opinions urging abandonment of the "clear and present danger" test for review of laws proscribing speech (as opposed to conduct). They also stressed their long-held belief that Dennis was not good law.

Justice Douglas objected to the "clear and present danger" test because he felt the test had, in the crunch, failed to provide sufficient protection to First Amendment interests.

Professor Blasi has advanced the thesis that courts should bring a pathological perspective to the resolution of First Amendment issues. The objective of First Amendment theory in this view "should be to equip the first amendment to do maximum service in those historical periods when intolerance of unorthodox ideas is most prevalent and when governments are most able and most likely to stifle dissent systematically. The First Amendment, in other words, should be targeted for the worst of times." See Blasi, The Pathological Perspective And The First Amendment, 85 Col.L.Rev. 449 (1985).

Blasi's goal is to target the First Amendment to protect expression in the "worst of times." This is identical to Chafee's goal in his critique of Meiklejohn. But unlike Chafee, Blasi doesn't think the clear and present danger doctrine is up to the task. He thinks it is too responsive to what he calls the legitimation phenomenon:

> When other social dynamics generate demands for repression, a judicial green light can intensify those demands. Even abstract ideas or concessions that add balance to a libertarian tradition in normal times—the idea for instance, that speech can be regulated when the danger is great enough, (Brandenburg v. Ohio), or that reckless falsehoods are not within the ambit of protected expression—may have adverse consequences by virtue of their legitimizing function in pathological times. Blasi at 483.

For Blasi, the particular vice of the clear and present danger doctrine, from the point of view of the pathological perspective, is that it "directs courts to focus on the quality or quantity of danger generated by dissenting speech." This focus tends to promote "the view that the nature of the danger generated by certain forms of speech constitutes the dominant, indeed sole, determinant of first amendment protection. Such a legitimation of risk aversion can only lend support to the forces of repression in times of widespread worry about internal or external threats to the society." Blasi at 483. What defense can be made for the clear and present danger doctrine against this attack? Doesn't it overlook the speech that is saved? Brandenburg v. Ohio is not exclusively focused on the "quantity or quality of danger." Does that redeem Brandenburg's approach from Blasi's attack?

Professor Martin Redish has challenged Blasi's pathological perspective: "An emphasis in first amendment analysis on the concrete danger of the advocacy sought to be suppressed is quite probably the best possible form of judicial self-defense against the excesses of pathology." See Redish, the Role of Pathology In First Amendment Theory: A Skeptical Examination, 38 Case Western L.Rev. 618 at 629 (1988).

Redish argues that a "judicial focus on the danger of speech" has two important benefits: "the protection of basic speech values in judicial decision making" and aiding in "the public acceptance of speech-protective judicial decisions, during pathological times." Id. at 631. Redish particularly takes issue with Blasi's idea "that the stress placed on so-called First Amendment 'core' values during pathological periods will be ameliorated by adoption of a narrow reach of First Amendment protection during less pressured times." Id. at 622. He denies that there is any such linkage and furthermore contends that the pathological perspective "may even result in a form of reverse dilution: refusal to extend the first amendment's scope may logically imply reduced protection in more traditional areas of coverage." Id. at 626. Do you agree? How does the debate here between Redish and Blasi differ from the debate in an earlier generation between Chafee and Meiklejohn?

Present Uses of the Clear and Present Danger Doctrine

The clear and present danger doctrine has been relied on in the Supreme Court to resolve a variety of First Amendment issues which arise out of press reporting of judicial proceedings.

In Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539 (1976), the Supreme Court, per Chief Justice Burger, invalidated a "gag order" prohibiting reporting or commentary on judicial proceedings held in public. See text, p. 413. The Court held that although there was not an absolute prohibition against "gag orders" under the First Amendment, the general presumption against prior restraints, which would include "gag orders," remained intact. An interesting feature of the case is that the Court indicated that the clear and present danger doctrine should be applied to determine whether "gag orders" are warranted in particular situations. Barrett Prettyman, press counsel in the Nebraska Press Association case, expressed some misgivings about the use of the clear and present danger doctrine in the case. He argued that although the Court used the danger doctrine to enforce the freedom of the press, lower courts may use the clear and present danger doctrine, particularly in its Dennis formulation, to validate "gag orders." It may also be argued that if the clear and present danger doctrine is applied to the dramatic facts of the Nebraska Press Association case, the "gag order" should have been upheld—rather than invalidated—a consequence which may merely illustrate the unsuitability of the clear and present danger doctrine as a means to resolve free press-fair trial problems.

The "Fighting Words" Doctrine

Despite the popularity of the phrase "clear and present danger," it has never served as the exclusive judicial method by which to adjudicate First Amendment problems. First Amendment doctrine is rich and various. The abundance of First Amendment approaches is due primarily to the different contexts in which First Amendment problems arise. Thus, the "fighting words" doctrine is really a common sense response to one of the most fundamental of free speech problems: the situation where the exercise of free speech so endangers the public order as to transform protected speech into the illegal action of a riot.

CHAPLINSKY v. NEW HAMPSHIRE

315 U.S. 568, 62 S.CT. 766, 86 L.ED. 1031 (1942).

[EDITORIAL NOTE The "fighting words" doctrine was born in that frequent spawning ground of First Amendment litigation, the activities of the Jehovah's Witnesses.]

Justice Frank MURPHY stated the facts of the case for a unanimous court as follows: "Chaplinsky was distributing the literature of his sect on the streets of Rochester [New Hampshire] on a busy afternoon. Members of the local citizenry complained to the City Marshal * * * that Chaplinsky was denouncing all religion as a 'racket'. The Marshal told them that Chaplinsky was lawfully engaged, and then warned Chaplinsky that the crowd was getting restless."

The complaint charged that Chaplinsky made the following remarks to the Marshal outside City Hall: "You are a Goddamned racketeer and a damned Fascist and the whole government of Rochester are Fascists or agents of Fascists."

Chaplinsky for his part said that he asked the Marshal to arrest those responsible for the disturbance. But the Marshal, according to Chaplinsky, instead cursed him and told Chaplinsky to come along with him. Chaplinsky was prosecuted under a New Hampshire statute, part of which forbade "addressing any offensive, derisive or annoying word to any other person who is lawfully in any street or other public place." The statute also forbade calling such a person "by any offensive or derisive name. * * * "

The state supreme court put a gloss on the statute saying no words were forbidden except such as had a "direct tendency to cause acts of violence by the persons to whom, individually, the remark is addressed," and that launched the "fighting words" concept as a First Amendment doctrine. The United States Supreme Court quoted the New Hampshire Supreme Court with approval: "The word 'offensive' is not to be defined in terms of what a particular addressee thinks. * * * The test is what men of common intelligence would understand to be words likely to cause an average addressee to fight. * * * The English language has a number of words and expressions which by general consent are 'fighting words' when said without a disarming smile. * * * Such words, as ordinary men know, are likely to cause a fight. * * *

"The statute, as construed, does no more than prohibit the face-to-face words plainly likely to cause a breach of the peace by the speaker—including 'classical fighting words', words in current use less 'classical' but equally likely to cause violence, and other disorderly words, including profanity, obscenity and threats." [Emphasis added.]

The Supreme Court said that as limited the New Hampshire statute did not violate the constitutional right of free expression. The Court said "[a] statute punishing verbal acts, carefully drawn so as not unlikely to impair liberty of expression is not too vague for a criminal law." And it added: "Argument is unnecessary to demonstrate that the appellations 'damned racketeer' and 'damned Fascist' are epithets likely to provoke the average person to retaliation, and thereby cause a breach of the peace." [Emphasis added.]

COMMENT

The "fighting words" doctrine is very close to the "speech plus" doctrine. Speech plus is the phrase used in First Amendment law to describe the situation where speech or expression is intertwined with action as in the case of picketing, demonstrating, and parading. The admixture of action with expression renders reasonable state regulation permissible; where pure speech alone is involved, the First Amendment intervenes. Of course, the language Chaplinsky spoke to the Marshal was "pure" speech. But it was speech, in the Court's analysis, that was bound to provoke a physical reaction. In other words, "fighting words" are words which are on the verge of action. Speech plus is expression combined with action.

On the other hand, it is not clear that Chaplinsky himself was at a cross-over point to action when he made the controversial utterance to the Marshal. The anticipated reaction to so-called "fighting words" is that of the listener and the audience. Why should the audience be exempted from obeying the law, i.e., refraining from violence, when pure speech is engaged in by someone like Chaplinsky? By punishing Chaplinsky, doesn't the law sanction civil disobedience by arresting Chaplinsky rather than those whom the law assumes, because of their short tempers, will resort to violence? The Chaplinsky case is an unusual context for the birth of the "fighting words" doctrine. After all, the law should not presume that a police officer like the Marshal could ever be provoked to violence by mere words.

Overbreadth problems can arise in "fighting words" cases. Some prosecutions for "fighting words" have been struck down when the ordinance or statute is overbroad and punishes both "fighting words" as well as words which do not by their very utterance inflict damage or tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace. Thus a Georgia statute and a New Orleans ordinance punishing the use of "opprobrious language" were respectively invalidated by the Supreme Court on the ground that such language is, unless limited, unconstitutionally overbroad. Gooding v. Wilson, 405 U.S. 518 (1972); Lewis v. City of New Orleans, 408 U.S. 913 (1972) (Lewis I); Lewis v. City of New Orleans, 415 U.S. 130 (1974), (Lewis II).

In summary, although the "fighting words" exception to First Amendment protection is still paid formal homage in the Supreme Court, rigorous use of the overbreadth doctrine has diminished the importance of this exception. Indeed, in Lewis II, Justice Harry Blackmun, joined by Chief Justice Burger and Justice William Rehnquist, dissented and objected to the use of the overbreadth doctrine as a means of limiting the application of the "fighting words" doctrine:

> Overbreadth and vagueness in the field of speech, as the present case and Gooding indicate, have become result-oriented rubber stamps attuned to the easy and imagined self-assurance that "one man's vulgarity is another's lyric." * * * The speech uttered by Mrs. Lewis to the arresting officer "plainly" was profane, "plainly" it was insulting, and "plainly" it was fighting. It therefore is within the reach of the ordinance, as narrowed by Louisiana's highest court. * * * The suggestion that the ordinance is open to selective enforcement is no reason to strike it down. Courts are capable of stemming abusive application of statutes.

Houston v. Hill: Fighting Words and the Overbreadth Doctrine

The vital role that the overbreadth doctrine plays in fighting words cases was highlighted in Houston v. Hill, 107 S.Ct. 2502 (1987). For a discussion of the related doctrine of vagueness, see text, p. 67. Raymond Hill, a gay rights activist, observed a friend intentionally stopping traffic in order to enable a vehicle to enter traffic. Two police officers approached the friend and started talking to him. Hill shouted to one of the officers: "Why don't you pick on somebody your own size?" The police officer responded: "Are you interrupting me in my official capacity as a Houston police officer?" Hill then shouted: "Yes, why don't you pick on somebody my size?" Hill was arrested under Houston municipal ordinance section 34-11(a) for "willfully or intentionally interrupting a city policeman * * * by verbal challenge during an investigation." Hill was then acquitted after a nonjury trial in municipal court.

Houston Municipal Code section 34-11(a) reads:

> Sec. 34-11 assaulting or interfering with policemen. (a) it shall be unlawful for any person to assault, strike or in any manner oppose, molest, abuse or interrupt any policeman in the execution of his duty, or any person summoned to in making an arrest.

After his acquittal, Hill brought suit in federal district court seeking a declaratory judgment that section 34-11(a) was unconstitutional both on its face and as it had been applied to him. The federal district court upheld the ordinance. The Court of Appeals held the ordinance was unconstitutionally overbroad. The Supreme Court, per Justice Brennan, held that a municipal ordinance making it unlawful to interrupt a police officer in performance of his duties was unconstitutionally overbroad under the First Amendment. The Court also held that it was not necessary for federal courts to abstain from decision until state courts could give a narrowing interpretation to the ordinance in question—possibly limiting it to "fighting words" or dangerous situations. This was because the ordinance in question was "not susceptible to a limiting construction because its language is plain and its meaning unambiguous."

On the overbreadth point, Justice Brennan said:

> Since the ordinance is "content-neutral," and since there is no evidence that the City has applied the ordinance to chill particular speakers or ideas, the City concludes that the ordinance is not substantially overbroad.

We disagree with the City's characterization for several reasons. First, the enforceable portion of the ordinance deals not with core criminal conduct, but with speech. As the City has conceded, the language in the ordinance making it unlawful for any person to "assault" or "strike" a police officer is pre-empted by the Texas Penal Code. Accordingly, the enforceable portion of the ordinance makes it "unlawful for any person to * * * in any manner oppose, molest, abuse or interrupt any policeman in the execution of his duty," and thereby prohibits verbal interruptions of police officers.

Second, contrary to the City's contention, the First Amendment protects a significant amount of verbal criticism and challenge directed at police officers. "Speech is often provocative and challenging. * * * [But it] is nevertheless protected against censorship or punishment, unless shown likely to produce a clear and present danger of a serious substantive evil that rises far above public inconvenience, annoyance, or unrest." Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U.S. 1, (1949).

The Houston ordinance * * * is not limited to fighting words nor even to obscene or opprobrious language, but prohibits speech that "in any manner * * * interrupt[s]" an officer. The Constitution does not allow such speech to be made a crime. The freedom of individuals verbally to oppose or challenge police action without thereby risking arrest is one of the principal characteristics by which we distinguish a free nation from a police state.

The City argues, however, that even if the ordinance encompasses some protected speech, its sweeping nature is both inevitable and essential to maintain public order. Although we appreciate the difficulties of drafting precise laws, we have repeatedly invalidated laws that provide the police with unfettered discretion to arrest individuals for words or conduct that annoy or offend them. * * *

Houston's ordinance criminalizes a substantial amount of constitutionally protected speech, and accords the police unconstitutional discretion in enforcement. The ordinance's plain language is admittedly violated scores of times daily, yet only some individuals—those chosen by the police in their unguided discretion—are arrested. Far from providing the "breathing space" that "First Amendment freedoms need * * * to survive," NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415 (1963), the ordinance is susceptible of regular application to protected expression. We conclude that the ordinance is substantially overbroad, and that the Court of Appeals did not err in holding it facially invalid.

Justice Powell, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices Scalia and O'Connor, concurred in the judgment: * * *

[T]his may include verbal criticism, but I question the implication of the Court's opinion that the First Amendment generally protects verbal "challenge[s] directed at police officers." A "challenge" often takes the form of opposition or interruption of performance of duty. In many situations, speech of this type directed at police officers will be functionally indistinguishable from conduct that the First Amendment clearly does not protect. For example, I have no doubt that a municipality constitutionally may punish an individual who chooses to stand near a police officer and persistently attempt to engage the officer in conversation while the officer is directing traffic at a busy intersection. Similarly, an individual, by contentious and abusive speech, could interrupt an officer's investigation of possible criminal conduct. A person observing an officer pursuing a person suspected of a felony could run beside him in a public street shouting at the officer. Similar tactics could interrupt a policeman lawfully attempting to interrogate persons believed to be witnesses to a crime. * * * But the Court unfortunately seems to ignore this fine line and to extend First Amendment protection to any type of verbal molestation or interruption of an officer in the performance of this duty.

The Swastika in Skokie: "Fighting Words"?

In the considerable litigation which was spawned from a planned march of the American Nazi party through Skokie, Illinois, a suburb of Chicago with a substantial Jewish population, opponents of the march in one case attempted to take refuge in the "fighting words" doctrine. The Illinois Supreme Court held that the planned display of the swastika in a community containing thousands of concentration camp survivors did not constitute "fighting words." The Illinois Supreme Court overturned a lower court injunction against the display of the swastika on the ground that the display was protected symbolic political speech. Village of Skokie v. National Socialist Party, 373 N.E.2d 21 (Ill.1978). Enjoining such a display was deemed to be an unconstitutional prior restraint on the right to free speech of the American Nazi party:

> Plaintiff urges, and the appellate court has held, that the exhibition of the Nazi symbol, the swastika, addresses to ordinary citizens a message which is tantamount to fighting words. Plaintiff further asks this court to extend Chaplinsky, which upheld a statute punishing the use of such words, and hold that the fighting-words doctrine permits a prior restraint on defendants' symbolic speech. In our judgment we are precluded from doing so.

> The display of the swastika, as offensive to the principles of a free nation as the memories it recalls may be, is symbolic political speech intended to convey to the public the beliefs of those who display it. It does not, in our opinion, fall within the definition of "fighting words," and that doctrine cannot be used here to overcome the heavy presumption against the constitutional validity of a prior restraint.
>
> Nor can we find that the swastika, while not representing fighting words, is nevertheless so offensive and peace threatening to the public that its display can be enjoined. We do not doubt that the sight of this symbol is abhorrent to the Jewish citizens of Skokie, and that the survivors of the Nazi persecutions, tormented by their recollections, may have strong feelings regarding its display. Yet it is entirely clear that this factor does not justify enjoining defendants' speech.

> In summary, as we read the controlling Supreme Court opinions, use of the swastika is a symbolic form of free speech entitled to first amendment protections. Its display on uniforms or banners by those engaged in peaceful demonstrations cannot be totally precluded solely because that display may provoke a violent reaction by those who view it. Particularly is this true where, as here, there has been advance notice by the demonstrators of their plans so that they have become, as the complaint alleges, "common knowledge" and those to whom sight of the swastika banner or uniforms would be offensive are forewarned and need not view them. A speaker who gives prior notice of his message has not compelled a confrontation with those who voluntarily listen.

The whole "fighting words" approach has been attacked in a stimulating new book which takes the position that a goal for First Amendment theory should be the furtherance of tolerance within the society. See Bollinger, The Tolerant Society: Freedom of Speech and Extremist Speech in America (1986). Professor Bollinger argues that the process of considering categories of speech such as "fighting words" as exceptions to First Amendment protection is misguided. The theory of cases like Chaplinsky is that such "speech possesses such small benefit for truth seeking" that withholding First Amendment protection theory is justified. But, Bollinger argues, it is not "the absence of social value that determines whether the principle of free speech is applicable; indeed, the perceived absence of value is, if anything, a major reason for protection, or more accurately, for toleration." This is so, Bollinger says, not because it grants more protection to speech we do value "but rather for the insights and lessons we obtain about ourselves and for the increase in our capacity for toleration generally." In Bollinger's view, the development of our capacity for toleration is a social interest that must be furthered. Why should this value be furthered? Does the First Amendment require it? Even if developing a capability for tolerance is used as a yardstick for First Amendment protection, isn't it too imprecise a yardstick to provide any real guidance to distinguish speech that is protected from speech that is unprotected? Finally, the emphasis on tolerance has to be weighed against the assault on human dignity and on individual autonomy in Skokie. Tormenting the concentration camp survivors in Skokie with the sight of hateful and unwanted Nazi demonstrators and swastika symbols surely presented such an assault. See Bollinger at 181–82.

The Hostile Audience Problem

In Feiner v. New York, 340 U.S. 315 (1951), a controversial speaker was interrupted in mid-sentence by a policeman who demanded that he step down from his soap box because the street corner audience appeared to be getting restless. When Feiner refused to step down, he was arrested for disturbing the peace. The Supreme Court per Chief Justice Fred Vinson upheld his conviction against a contention by Feiner that his arrest violated his First Amendment rights of free speech. Justice Felix Frankfurter, concurring in Feiner, thought that interruption of speech by the police was not unconstitutional when in the best judgment of the police the speech threatened to precipitate disorder:

> It is true that breach-of-peace statutes, like most tools of government, may be misused. Enforcement of these statutes calls for public tolerance and intelligent police administration. These, in the long run, must give substance to whatever this Court may say about free speech.

Feiner raises the so-called "hostile audience" problem. If the audience menaces the speaker to the point where the physical safety of the speaker is at stake or a general melee is threatened, are the police ever justified in arresting the speaker even though the speaker is not intentionally inciting to violence? One way of resolving the problem would be to compare the size of the audience with the number of police. Presumably, if the latter were far outnumbered by potentially dangerous audience members and there was a possibility some of them were armed, simple logistics would dictate carting away the speaker rather than the audience. Would such an analysis be a permissible use of the balancing test?

Whom should the police protect? The speaker or the hostile audience.[2] In dissent in Feiner, Justice Black's answer was clear: the speaker should be protected.

The case for arresting the speaker in a situation where the speaker is using "fighting words," i.e., words which can be expected to enrage the audience and lead it to physical violence, is stronger than the situation where the speaker's words, on a reasonable analysis, ought not to engender hostility leading to physical violence.

Justice Frankfurter's approach in Feiner was not unlike the logistics approach to the hostile audience problem discussed above. If speech threatens to precipitate disorder, then the police, acting on a nondiscriminatory basis, might be justified in stopping the speech.

Justice Frankfurter's views were directly challenged by Justice Jackson in a dissenting opinion in a companion case, Kunz v. New York, 340 U.S. 290 (1951). Kunz had obtained a street-speaking permit in New York City, but it was later revoked after many of his speeches aroused complaints and threats of violence from passers-by. His subsequent attempts to obtain a new permit were denied on the basis of the earlier revocation. The Supreme Court held that the denial of a new permit violated Kunz's First Amendment rights. In dissent, Justice Jackson pointed out the irony of the Court's position and especially that of Justice Frankfurter. Of what value, he said, is a rule against prior restraint if the Court is willing, as in Feiner, to sanction on-the-street arrests of volatile speakers while they are exercising their First Amendment rights? A fairly administered permit system, said Justice Jackson, "better protects freedom of speech than to let everyone speak without leave, but subject to surveillance and to being ordered to stop in the discretion of the police."

At least a permit system enables a potential speaker to present evidence on his own behalf and to appeal an administrative decision to a higher official. But in Feiner, the speaker's right to speak his mind was violated ex parte by a police officer who unilaterally decided that enough was enough. Which system, asked Justice Jackson, is more protective of First Amendment liberty?

Justice Frankfurter's analysis of free speech interests, prior restraint, and punishment after-the-fact was disputed by Justices Black, Douglas, and Sherman Minton, who dissented in Feiner. Even if Feiner's speech was arousing potential violence among the listening crowd, said Justice Black, the duty of the police was to protect Feiner's right to speak by arresting menacing hecklers, if necessary. In this view, silencing Feiner at the behest of the audience or because of the policeman's own personal prejudice against the speaker's views was not an appropriate alternative. Justice Black agreed with Justice Jackson's analysis of the effect of on-the-spot arrest upon the "freedom" guaranteed by rules against prior restraint. Feiner had criticized President Harry S. Truman.

The overbreadth doctrine has loomed large in hostile audience cases, as it has in "fighting words" cases. Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U.S. 1 (1949), involved a speaker who by using racially discriminatory language angered a largely black crowd standing outside the hall where the speech took place. The speaker was convicted under a law prohibiting speech that "stirs the public to anger, invites dispute or brings about a condition of unrest." The Supreme Court overturned the conviction and declared that the statute was overbroad in that it punished expression which had not been shown to present a clear and present danger. In a famous sentence in his opinion for the Court, Justice Douglas observed: "[A] function of free speech under our system of government is to invite dispute." At least inferentially, Terminiello suggests that a hostile audience is no justification for taking away the agitator who arouses the audience—at least unless the exacting standards of the clear and present danger test can be met. Which speech situation seemed the more volatile, Feiner or Terminiello?

Cases of this kind raise the vexing question of the hecklers' veto, a dimension of the hostile audience problem. Heckling may indeed be a medium of desperation. Which is not to say that hecklers don't have First Amendment rights. But there are other First Amendment rights: the right of the speaker and the derivative First Amendment right of audience members to hear. At what point may the state constitutionally intervene to assure that all of these First Amendment interests are served? You have a right to speak. I have a right to talk back. The audience has a right to hear. Is it when the speaker can no longer be heard and is completely lost to the audience? Or are the hecklers exercising the only opportunity they will ever have to talk back to a powerful government official who has access to mass media and with whom they earnestly disagree?

Suppose a prior restraint is based on the probability of a hostile and dangerous crowd reaction? When American Nazis proposed a professedly peaceful march through Skokie, the Village of Skokie enacted ordinances designed to block parades such as that contemplated by the Nazis. In the federal case which dramatically divided the membership of the American Civil Liberties Union, the ACLU provided legal counsel to the Nazis who brought suit to challenge the ordinances. Counsel for Skokie argued that the prospect of swastikas carried by marching Nazis were the equivalent of "fighting words" to a community many of whose members were former inmates of Nazi concentration camps. Furthermore, it was again argued that the specter of Nazi insignia being displayed in public in such a community was bound to provoke a hostile reaction. The federal district court declared the ordinances to be unconstitutional, and the federal court of appeals affirmed. Collin v. Smith, 578 F.2d 1197 (7th Cir. 1978).

Speaking for the court of appeals, Judge Pell said:

> It would be grossly insensitive to deny, as we do not, that the proposed demonstration would seriously disturb, emotionally and mentally, at least some, and probably many of the Village's residents. The problem with engrafting an exception on the First Amendment for such situations is that they are indistinguishable in principle from speech that invite[s] dispute * * * induces a condition of unrest, creates dissatisfaction with conditions as they are, or even stirs people to anger." Terminiello v. Chicago, * * * Yet these are among the "high" purposes of the First Amendment.
>
> This case does not involve intrusion into people's homes. There need be no captive audience, as Village residents may, if they wish, simply avoid the Village Hall for thirty minutes on a Sunday afternoon, which no doubt would be their normal course of conduct on a day when the Village Hall was not open in the regular course of business. Absent such intrusion or captivity, there is no justifiable substantial privacy interest to save [the ordinance under consideration] from constitutional infirmity, when it attempts, by fiat, to declare the entire Village, at all times, a privacy zone that may be sanitized from the offensiveness of Nazi ideology and symbols.

In short, the federal court of appeals held that protected First Amendment activity could not be proscribed because of an anticipated hostile audience reaction, particularly in circumstances where the audience involved could easily avoid the viewing of unwanted activity and where the audience was in no sense captive.[3] In such circumstances, the fact that a hostile audience reaction could be predicted as a result of the exercise of particular protected First Amendment activity could not authorize a prior restraint in the form of an ordinance prohibiting the parade in controversy: "Our decision that [the ordinance under consideration] cannot constitutionally be applied to the proposed march means that a permit for the march may not be denied on the basis of anticipated violations thereof." The decision of the federal court of appeals in the Collin case indicates that a heavy burden will have to be met by the state before a prior restraint on protected First Amendment expression is authorized out of fear that a hostile crowd will engage in disruptive activity as a result of permitting the expression in controversy.

The First Amendment and State Regulation of Pamphleteering, Solicitation, Parades, and Demonstrations

Alma Lovell, a Jehovah's Witness, was arrested in the town of Griffin, Georgia, for violation of a city ordinance which banned any pamphleteering or leafletting without prior written permission from the

3. Similarly, the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, in reversing the denial of defendant Collin's application for a permit to speak in Chicago's Marquette Park, noted that courts have consistently refused to ban speech because of the possibility of unlawful conduct by those opposed to the speaker's philosophy.

Starting with Terminiello v. City of Chicago, 337 U.S. 1 (1949), and continuing to Gregory v. City of Chicago, 394 U.S. 111 (1969), it has become patent that a hostile audience is not a basis for restraining otherwise legal First Amendment activity. As with many of the cases cited herein, if the actual behavior is not sufficient to sustain a conviction under a statute, then certainly the anticipation of such events cannot sustain the burden necessary to justify a prior restraint. Collin v. Chicago Park District, 460 F.2d 746, 754 (7th Cir. 1972).

Griffin city manager. She never sought permission from the Griffin city manager. She appealed her conviction under this ordinance and urged that it violated the First Amendment.

In a unanimous decision in Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U.S. 444 (1938), delivered by Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes, the United States Supreme Court found the Griffin ordinance invalid on its face as a violation of freedom of speech and freedom of the press.

The Chief Justice pointed out that the ordinance "prohibits the distribution of literature of any kind, at any time, at any place, and in any manner without a permit from the city manager." The Griffin ordinance made up no distinctions but covered all "literature" in all circumstances. Again this First Amendment infirmity is called overbreadth.

If the town was concerned about a particular problem, such as litter, or scurrilous libels, it ought to have drafted the ordinance to meet that problem rather than embracing all forms of pamphleteering. Secondly, the ordinance as drafted created a one-man censorship board in the person of the city manager with no guidelines to direct decisions prohibiting or permitting circulation of a particular leaflet. The city manager of Griffin had total unquestioned discretion to regulate the flow of printed communication in the town. Under the doctrine of Lovell v. Griffin, the officials who administer a permit system must have their authority specified and articulated in the legislation creating the system.

In dictum in Lovell v. Griffin, Chief Justice Hughes noted that the First Amendment is not confined to protection of newspapers and magazines, but includes pamphlets and leaflets as well. "The press," he wrote, "in its historic connotation comprehends every sort of publication which affords a vehicle of information and opinion." Furthermore, freedom to distribute and circulate press materials is as protected under the First Amendment as freedom to publish in the first place.

In Lovell, the Court spoke in strong terms of the threat to a free press posed by a licensing scheme. If a statute or regulation is narrowly drawn and contains procedural safeguards (unlike the pamphleteering ordinance in Lovell), would it be upheld despite overtones of "licensing"? Would noncompliance with the statute then be justified if someone had doubts about the validity of the statute?

Since the ordinance in Lovell was found "void on its face," the Court held that it was not necessary for Alma Lovell "to seek a permit under it." The Court held that she was "entitled to contest its validity in answer to the charge against her."

Isn't the usual view that a court rather than an individual should decide the constitutionality of legislation? Why then didn't the Court insist that Alma Lovell first apply for a permit and show that she had been denied it before determining that the ordinance was invalid? See Walker v. Birmingham, text, p. 62.

Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940), was yet another case involving the imposition of state criminal penalties on Jehovah's Witnesses. The Cantwells, a father and two sons, were arrested in New Haven, Connecticut, for conducting door-to-door religious solicitation in a predominantly Catholic neighborhood of the city. They were charged with violating a Connecticut statute which provided in part that: "No person shall solicit money * * * for any alleged religious * * * cause * * * unless * * * approved by the [county] secretary of * * * public welfare." Any person seeking to solicit for a religious cause was required under the statute to file an application with the welfare secretary, who was empowered to decide whether the cause was "a bona fide object of charity" and whether it conformed to "reasonable standards of efficiency and integrity." The penalty for violating the statute was a $100 fine or thirty days' imprisonment or both.

The Cantwells' convictions were affirmed by the state courts of Connecticut. But the United States Supreme Court unanimously, per Justice Owen Roberts, declared the statute unconstitutional as applied to the Cantwells and other Jehovah's Witnesses.

The Cantwells argued that the Connecticut state statute was not regulatory but prohibitory, since it allowed a state official to ban religious solicitation from the streets of Connecticut entirely. Once a certificate of approval was issued by the state welfare secretary, solicitation could proceed without any restriction at all under the Connecticut statute. And once a certificate was denied, solicitation was banned.

The Supreme Court ruled that the Connecticut statute in effect established a prior restraint on First Amendment freedoms which was not alleviated by the availability of judicial review after the fact.

The Supreme Court also pointed out that if the state wished to protect its citizens against door-to-door solicitation for fraudulent "religious" or "charity" causes, it had the constitutional power to enact a regulation aimed at that problem. The present law, however, was not such a statute. The Court also noted that it is within the police power of the state to set regulatory limits on religious solicitation (as on other sorts of solicitation), such as the time of day or the right of a householder to terminate the solicitation by demanding that the visitor remove himself from the premises. The state may not, however, force people to submit to licensing of religious speech.

On the breach of the peace conviction, the Supreme Court held that the broad sweep of the common law offense was an infringement of First Amendment rights.

The state had argued that because the Cantwells' solicitation technique had been provocative, it tended to produce violence on the part of their listeners and, therefore, was an appropriate matter for sanction under the common law offense of disturbing the peace.

In the Court's view in Cantwell, if the state had defined what is considered to be a clear and present danger to the state in a precisely drawn breach of the peace statute, this might have presented a sufficiently substantial interest to make it appropriate to convict Cantwell under such a statute. But since the breach of the peace offense was an imprecise common law offense rather than an offense set forth in a tightly drawn statute, the Court set aside the breach of the peace conviction. Justice Roberts made the following observations in Cantwell:

> When clear and present danger of riot, disorder, interference with traffic upon the public streets, or other immediate threat to public safety, peace, or order, appears, the power of the State to prevent or punish is obvious. Equally obvious is it that a State may not unduly suppress free communication of views, religious or other, under the guise of conserving desirable conditions.

CITY OF LAKEWOOD v. PLAIN DEALER PUBLISHING CO.

108 S.CT. 2138, 100 L.ED.2D 771 (1988).

[EDITORIAL NOTE City of Lakewood v. Plain Dealer Publishing Co., 108 S.Ct. 2138 (1988), considered an ordinance which authorized the mayor to grant or deny applications for annual newsrack permits. If the application for a permit is denied, the mayor is required to state the reasons for such denial. Prior to the enactment of this ordinance, Lakewood absolutely prohibited the "private placement of any structure on public property." The Cleveland Plain Dealer accordingly had been denied permission to place its coin-operated newspaper vending machines on city sidewalks. The Plain Dealer challenged the constitutionality of the new ordinance.

Although the district court upheld the ordinance, the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit reversed and found the ordinance unconstitutional for three reasons: (1) The ordinance gives the mayor "unbounded discretion to grant or deny a permit application and to place unlimited additional terms and conditions on any permit that issues." (2) The ordinance conditioned approval of a newsrack permit on approval of the newsrack design by the city's Architectural Board of Review. Since no express standards governed newsrack design, the design approval requirement effectively gave the board unbridled discretion to deny applications." (3) Approval of a newsrack permit was also conditioned on an agreement by the newsrack owner to idemnify the city against any liability arising from the newsrack, "guaranteed by a $100,000 insurance policy to that effect." The court of appeals felt these indemnity and insurance requirements violated the First Amendment "because no similar burdens are placed on owners of the structures or public properties."

In a 4–3 decision, the Supreme Court, per Justice Brennan, affirmed the court of appeals decision in part and remanded. The Court held that the portions of the City of Lakewood ordinance giving the mayor discretion to deny a permit application and authorizing him to grant a permit on any terms he considers "necessary and reasonable" are unconstitutional.]

Justice BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

At the outset, we confront the issue whether the Newspaper may bring a facial challenge to the City's ordinance. We conclude that it may.

Recognizing the explicit protection accorded speech and the press in the text of the First Amendment, our cases have long held that when a licensing statute allegedly vests unbridled discretion in a government official over whether to permit or deny expressive activity, one who is subject to the law may challenge it facially without the necessity of first applying for, and being denied, a license. E.g., Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51, 56 (1965).

At the root of this long line of precedent is the time-tested knowledge that in the area of free expression a licensing statute placing unbridled discretion in the hands of a government official or agency constitutes a prior restraint and may result in censorship. E.g., Shuttlesworth, supra,; Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536 (1965); Staub v. City of Baxley, 355 U.S. 313, 321 322 (1958); Kunz v. New York, 340 U.S. 290, 294 (1951); Niemotko v. Maryland, 340 U.S. 268 (1951), Saia v. New York, 344 U.S. 558 (1948). And these evils engender identifiable risks to free expression that can be effectively alleviated only through a facial challenge. First, the mere existence of the licensor's unfettered discretion, coupled with the power of prior restraint, intimidates parties into censoring their own speech, even if the discretion and power are never actually abused. * * *

Self-censorship is immune to an "as applied" challenge, for it derives from the individual's own actions, not an abuse of government power. It is not difficult to visualize a newspaper that relies to a substantial degree on single issue sales feeling significant pressure to endorse the incumbent Mayor in an upcoming election, or to refrain from criticizing him, in order to receive a favorable and speedy disposition on its permit application. Only standards limiting the licensor's discretion will eliminate this danger by adding an element of certainty fatal to self-censorship. And only a facial challenge can effectively test the statute for these standards.

Second, the absence of express standards makes it difficult to distinguish, "as applied," between a licensor's legitimate denial of a permit and its illegitimate abuse of censorial power. Standards provide the guideposts that check the licensor and allow courts quickly and easily to determine whether the licensor is discriminating against disfavored speech. Without these guideposts, post hoc rationalizations by the licensing official and the use of shifting or illegitimate criteria are far too easy, making it difficult for courts to determine in any particular case whether the licensor is permitting favorable, and suppressing unfavorable, expression. Further, the difficulty and delay inherent in the "as applied" challenge can itself discourage litigation. A newspaper espousing an unpopular viewpoint on a shoestring budget may be the likely target for a retaliatory permit denial, but may not have the time or financial means to challenge the licensor's action. That paper might instead find it easier to capitulate to what it perceives to be the Mayor's preferred viewpoint, or simply to close up shop. Even if that struggling paper were willing and able to litigate the case successfully, the eventual relief may be "too little and too late." Until a judicial decree to the contrary, the licensor's prohibition stands. In the interim, opportunities for speech are irretrievably lost. In sum, without standards to fetter the licensor's discretion, the difficulties of proof and the case-by-case nature of "as applied" challenges render the licensor's action in large measure effectively unreviewable.

The foregoing concepts form the heart of our test to distinguish laws that are vulnerable to facial challenge from those that are not. As discussed above, we have previously identified two major First Amendment risks associated with unbridled licensing schemes: self-censorship by speakers in order to avoid being denied a license to speak; and the difficulty of effectively detecting, reviewing, and correcting content-based censorship "as applied" without standards by which to measure the licensor's action. It is when statutes threaten these risks to a significant degree that courts must entertain an immediate facial attack on the law. Therefore, a facial challenge lies whenever a licensing law gives a government official or agency substantial power to discriminate based on the content or viewpoint of speech by suppressing disfavored speech or disliked speakers. This is not to say that the press or a speaker may challenge as censorship any law involving discretion to which it is subject. The law must have a close enough nexus to expression, or to conduct commonly associated with expression, to pose a real and substantial threat of the identified censorship risks.

The regulatory scheme in the present case contains two features which, at least in combination, justify the allowance of a facial challenge. First, Lakewood's ordinance requires that the Newspaper apply annually for newsrack licenses. Thus, it is the sort of system in which an individual must apply for multiple licenses over time, or periodically renew a license. When such a system is applied to speech, or to conduct commonly associated with speech, the licensor does not necessarily view the text of the words about to be spoken, but can measure their probable content or viewpoint by speech already uttered. A speaker in this position is under no illusion regarding the effect of the "licensed" speech on the ability to continue speaking in the future. Yet demonstrating the link between "licensed" expression and the denial of a later license might well prove impossible. While perhaps not as direct a threat to speech as a regulation allowing a licensor to view the actual content of the speech to be licensed or permitted, a multiple or periodic licensing requirement is sufficiently threatening to invite judicial concern.

A second feature of the licensing system at issue here is that it is directed narrowly and specifically at expression or conduct commonly associated with expression: the circulation of newspapers. Such a framework creates an agency or establishes an official charged particularly with reviewing speech, or conduct commonly associated with it, breeding an "expertise" tending to favor censorship over speech. Indeed, a law requiring the licensing of printers has historically been declared the archetypal censorship statute. Here again, without standards to bound the licensor, speakers denied a license will have no way of proving that the decision was unconstitutionally motivated, and, faced with that prospect, they will be pressured to conform their speech to the licensor's unreviewable preference.

Because of these features in the regulatory system at issue here, we think that a facial challenge is appropriate, and that standards controlling the Mayor's discretion must be required. Of course, the City may require periodic licensing, and may even have special licensing procedures for conduct commonly associated with expression; but the Constitution requires that the City establish neutral criteria to insure that the licensing decision is not based on the content or viewpoint of the speech being considered.

In contrast to the type of law at issue in this case, laws of general application that are not aimed at conduct commonly associated with expression and do not permit licensing determinations to be made on the basis of ongoing expression or the words about to be spoken, carry with them little danger of censorship. For example, a law requiring building permits is rarely effective as a means of censorship. To be sure, on rare occasion an opportunity for censorship will exist, such as when an unpopular newspaper seeks to build a new plant. But such laws provide too blunt a censorship instrument to warrant judicial intervention prior to an allegation of actual misuse. And if such charges are made, the general application of the statute to areas unrelated to expression will provide the courts a yardstick with which to measure the licensor's occasional speech-related decision.

The foregoing discussion explains why the dissent's analogy between newspapers and soda vendors is inapposite. Newspapers are in the business of expression, while soda vendors are in the business of selling soft drinks. Even if the soda vendor engages in speech, that speech is not related to the soda; therefore preventing it from installing its machines may penalize unrelated speech, but will not directly prevent that speech from occurring. In sum, a law giving the Mayor unbridled discretion to decide which soda vendors may place their machines on public property does not vest him with frequent opportunities to exercise substantial power over the content or viewpoint of the vendor's speech by suppressing the speech or directly controlling the vendor's ability to speak.

The proper analogy is between newspapers and leaflets. It is settled that leafletters may facially challenge licensing laws. See e. g., Talley v. California, Lovell v. Griffin. This settled law is based on the accurate premise that peaceful pamphleteering "is not fundamentally different from the function of a newspaper." Organization for a Better Austin v. Keefe, [402 U.S. 415 (1971)]. The dissent's theory therefore would turn the law on its head. That result cannot be justified by relying on the meaningless distinction that here the newspapers are ultimately distributed by a machine rather than by hand. First, the ordinance held invalid in Lovell applied to distribution "by hand or otherwise." The Court did not even consider holding the law invalid only as to distribution by hand. Second, such a distinction makes no sense in logic or theory. The effectiveness of the newsrack as a means of distribution, especially for low-budget, controversial neighborhood newspapers, means that the twin threats of self-censorship and undetectable censorship are, if anything, greater for newsracks than for pamphleteers.

In an analysis divorced from a careful examination of the unique risks associated with censorship just discussed and their relation to the law before us, the dissent reasons that if a particular manner of speech may be prohibited entirely, then no "activity protected by the First Amendment" can be implicated by a law imposing less than a total prohibition. It then finds that a total ban on newsracks would be constitutional. Therefore, the dissent concludes, the actual ordinance at issue involves no "activity protected by the First Amendment," and thus is not subject to facial challenge. However, that reasoning is little more than a legal sleight-of-hand, misdirecting the focus of the inquiry from a law allegedly vesting unbridled censorship discretion in a government official toward one imposing a blanket prohibition.[7]

The key to the dissent's analysis is its "greater-includes-the-lesser" syllogism. But that syllogism is blind to the radically different constitutional harms inherent in the "greater" and "lesser" restrictions.[8] Presumably in the case of an ordinance that completely prohibits a particular manner of expression, the law on its face is both content and viewpoint neutral. In analyzing such a hypothetical ordinance, the Court would apply the well-settled time, place, and manner test. Chicago v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 98 (1972). The danger giving rise to the First Amendment inquiry is that the government is silencing or restraining a channel of speech; we ask whether some interest unrelated to speech justifies this silence. To put it another way, the question is whether "the manner of expression is basically incompatible with the normal activity of a particular place at a particular time." Grayned v. Rockford, 408 U.S. 104 (1972).

In contrast, a law or policy permitting communication in a certain manner for some but not for others raises the specter of content and viewpoint censorship. This danger is at its zenith when the determination of who may speak and who may not is left to the unbridled discretion of a government official. As demonstrated above, we have often and uniformly held that such statutes or policies impose censorship on the public or the press, and hence are unconstitutional, because without standards governing the exercise of discretion, a government official may decide who may speak and who may not based upon the content of the speech or viewpoint of the speaker. Therefore, even if the government may constitutionally impose content-neutral prohibitions on a particular manner of speech, it may not condition that speech on obtaining a license or permit from a government official in that official's boundless discretion. It bears repeating that "In the area of freedom of expression it is well established that one has standing to challenge a statute on the ground that it delegates overly broad licensing discretion to an administrative office, whether or not his conduct could be proscribed by a properly drawn statute, and whether or not he applied for a license." Freedman, 380 U.S., at 56. Fundamentally, then, the dissent's proposal ignores the different concerns animating our test to determine whether an expressive activity may be banned entirely, and our test to determine whether it may be licensed in an official's unbridled discretion.

However, in a host of other First Amendment cases we have expressly or implicitly rejected that logic, and have considered on the merits facial challenges to statutes or policies that embodied discrimination based on the content or viewpoint of expression, or vested officials with open-ended discretion that threatened the same, even where it was assumed that a properly drawn law could have greatly restricted or prohibited the manner of expression or circulation at issue.

For instance, in Mosley, supra, we considered an ordinance banning all picketing near a school except labor picketing. The Court declared a law unconstitutional because the ordinance was sensitive to the content of the message. Whether or not the picket could have been prohibited entirely was not dispositive of the Court's inquiry. 408 U.S., at 96–99. * * * To counter this * * * line of authority, the dissent does not refer to a single case supporting its view that we cannot consider a facial challenge to an ordinance alleged to constitute censorship over constitutionally protected speech merely because the manner used to circulate that speech might be otherwise regulated or prohibited entirely.

Ultimately, then, the dissent's reasoning must fall of its own weight. As the preceding discussion demonstrates, this Court has long been sensitive to the special dangers inherent in a law placing unbridled discretion directly to license speech, or conduct commonly associated with speech, in the hands of a government official. In contrast, when the government is willing to prohibit a particular manner of speech entirely—the speech it favors along with the speech it disfavors—the risk of governmental censorship is simply not implicated. The "greater" power of outright prohibition raises other concerns, and we have developed tests to consider them. But we see no reason, and the dissent does not advance one, to ignore censorship dangers merely because other, unrelated concerns are satisfied.

The dissent compounds its error by defining an "activity protected by the First Amendment" by the time, place, or (in this case) manner by which the activity is exercised. The actual "activity" at issue here is the circulation of newspapers, which is constitutionally protected. After all, "Liberty of circulating is as essential to [freedom of expression] as liberty of publishing; indeed, without the circulation, the publication would be of little value." Ex Parte Jackson, 96 U.S. 727, 733 (1878); Lovell, 303 U.S., at 452.

8. The dissent informs us that it abjures any reliance on a "greater-includes-the-lesser" theory. Yet in the very next sentence we are told that "where an activity * * * could be forbidden altogether (without running afoul of the First Amendment)," then for that reason alone, "the Lovell-Freedman doctrine does not apply, and our usual rules concerning the permissibility of discretionary local licensing laws (and facial challenges to those laws) must prevail." In other words, the greater power to prohibit a manner of speech entirely includes the lesser power to license it in an official's unbridled discretion. A clearer example of the discredited doctrine could not be imagined.

The dissent's recharacterization of the issue is not merely semantic; substituting the time, place, or manner for the activity itself allows the dissent to define away a host of activities commonly considered to be protected. The right to demonstrate becomes the right to demonstrate at noise levels proscribed by law; the right to parade becomes the right to parade anywhere in the city 24 hours a day; and the right to circulate newspapers becomes the right to circulate newspapers by way of newsracks placed on public property. Under the dissent's analysis, ordinances giving the Mayor unbridled discretion over whether to permit loud demonstrations or evening parades would not be vulnerable to a facial challenge, since they would not "requir[e] a license to engage in activity protected by the First Amendment." * * *

Moreover, we have never countenanced such linguistic prestidigitation, even where a regulation or total prohibition of the "manner" of speech has been upheld. In determining whether expressive conduct is at issue in a censorship case, we do not look solely to the time, place, or manner of expression, but rather to whether the activity in question is commonly associated with expression. For example, in Kovacs, it was never doubted that the First Amendment's protection of expression was implicated by the ordinance prohibiting sound trucks. The Court simply concluded that the First Amendment was not abridged. So, here, the First Amendment is certainly implicated by the City's circulation restriction; the question we must resolve is whether the First Amendment is abridged.

Having concluded that the Newspaper may facially challenge the Lakewood ordinance, we turn to the merits. Section 901.181, Codified Ordinances, City of Lakewood, provides: "The Mayor shall either deny the application [for a permit], stating the reasons for such denial or grant said permit subject to the following terms * * * ." Section 901.181(c) sets out some of those terms, including: "(7) such other terms and conditions deemed necessary and reasonable by the Mayor." It is apparant that the face of the ordinance itself contains no explicit limits on the Mayor's discretion. Indeed, nothing in the law as written requires the Mayor to do more than make the statement "it is not in the public interest" when denying a permit application. Similarly, the Mayor could grant the application, but require the newsrack to be placed in an inaccessible location without providing any explanation whatever. To allow these illusory "constraints" to constitute the standards necessary to bound a licensor's discretion renders the guaranty against censorship little more than a high-sounding ideal.

The City asks us to presume that the Mayor will deny a permit application only for reasons related to the health, safety, or welfare of Lakewood citizens, and that additional terms and conditions will be imposed only for similar reasons. This presumes the Mayor will act in good faith and adhere to standards absent from the statute's face. But this is the very presumption that the doctrine forbidding unbridled discretion disallows. The doctrine requires that the limits the City claims are implicit in its law be made explicit by textual incorporation, binding judicial or administrative construction, or well-established practice. Poulos v. New Hampshire, 345 U.S. 395 (1953); Kunz v. New York, 340 U.S. 290 (1951). This Court will not write nonbinding limits into a silent state statute.

Although the dissent disclaims a desire to pass upon the actual ordinance at issue, it apparently cannot resist making a few comments in this regard. First, it asserts that the ordinance's requirement that the Mayor state his reasons for denying a permit distinguishes this case from other licensing cases. However, the Mayor's statement need not be made with any degree of specificity, nor are there any limits as to what reasons he may give. Such a minimal requirement cannot provide the standards necessary to ensure constitutional decision-making, nor will it, of necessity, provide a solid foundation for eventual judicial review.

The dissent is also comforted by the availability of judicial review. However, that review comes only after the mayor and the City Council have denied the permit. Nowhere in the ordinance is either body required to act with reasonable dispatch. Rather, an application could languish indefinitely before the Council, with the Newspaper's only judicial remedy being a petition for mandamus. Even if judicial review were relatively speedy, such review cannot substitute for concrete standards to guide the decision-maker's discretion.

Finally, the dissent attempts to distinguish newsrack permits from parade permits in that the latter are often given for a particular event or time, whereas the former supposedly have no urgency. This overstates the proposition. We agree that in some cases there is exceptional force to the argument that a permit delayed is a permit denied. However, we cannot agree that newspaper publishers can wait indefinitely for a permit only because there will always be news to report. News is not fungible. Some stories may be particularly well covered by certain publications, providing that newspaper with a unique opportunity to develop readership. In order to benefit from that event, a paper needs public access at a particular time; eventual access would come "too little and too late." Freedman, supra, at 57. The Plain Dealer has been willing to forgo this benefit for four years in order to bring and litigate this lawsuit. However, smaller publications may not be willing or able to make the same sacrifice.

We hold those portions of the Lakewood ordinance giving the Mayor unfettered discretion to deny a permit application and unbounded authority to condition the permit on any additional terms he deems "necessary and reasonable," to be unconstitutional. We need not resolve the remaining questions presented for review, as our conclusion regarding mayoral discretion will alone sustain the Court of Appeals' judgement if these portions of the ordinance are not severable from the remainder. Severability of a local ordinance is a question of state law, and is therefore best resolved below. Accordingly, we remand this cause to the Court of Appeals to decide whether the provisions of the ordinance we have declared unconstitutional are severable, and to take further action consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

The Chief Justice and Justice Kennedy took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

Justice WHITE, with whom Justice Stevens and Justice O'Connor join, dissenting.

Today the majority takes an extraordinary doctrine, developed cautiously by this Court over the past fifty years, and applies it to a circumstance, and in a manner, that is without precedent. Because of this unwarranted expansion of our previous cases, I dissent.

At the outset, it is important to set forth the general nature of the dispute.

The Court quite properly does not establish any constitutional right of newspaper publishers to place newsracks on municipal property. The Court expressly declines to "pass" on the question of the constitutionality [of] an outright municipal ban on newsracks. My approach to the specific question before us, which differs from that of the majority, requires me to consider this question; and, as discussed below, our precedents suggest that an outright ban on newsracks on city sidewalks would be constitutional, particularly where (as is true here) ample alternate means of 24-hour distribution of newspapers exist. In any event, the Court's ruling today cannot be read as any indication to the contrary: cities remain free after today's decision to enact such bans.

Moreover, the Court expressly rejects the view, heretofore adopted by some lower courts, that any local scheme that seeks to license the placement of newsracks on public property is per se unconstitutional. Cities "may require periodic licensing, and may even have special licensing procedures for conduct commonly associated with expression." It is only common sense that cities be allowed to exert some control over those who would permanently appropriate city property for the purpose of erecting a newspaper dispensing device.

My disagreement with the Court is not over the constitutional status of newsracks, or the more specific question of the propriety of the licensing of such newspaper vending devices. The dispute in this case is over a more "technical" question: What is the scope of the peculiar doctrine that governs facial challenges to local laws in the First Amendment area? The majority reads our cases as holding that local licensing laws which have "a close enough nexus to expression, or to conduct commonly associated with expression, to pose a real and substantial threat of [an] identified censorship ris[k]," will be considered invalid "whenever [such a law] gives a government official * * * substantial power to discriminate based on the content or viewpoint of speech." This is true, the majority believes, whether or not the speaker can prove that the official's power has been or will be used against him; indeed, it is true even if the government official indicates a willingness to abjure the use of such power (as is the case here).

It is true that certain licensing laws that "giv[e] a government official * * * substantial power to discriminate based on the content or viewpoint of speech" are unconstitutional on their face—without any showing of actual censorship or discrimination, or even without the potential licensee even making an application for a license. But the sweep of this potent doctrine must be limited in a way that is principled; one that is rooted in our precedents and our history. The Court's statement that this doctrine applies whenever the license law has "a close * * * nexus to expression, or to conduct commonly associated with expression," is unduly broad. The doctrine, as I see it, applies only when the specific conduct which the locality seeks to license is protected by the First Amendment. Because the placement of newsracks on city property is not so protected (as opposed to the circulation of newspapers as a general matter), the exception to our usual facial challenge doctrine does not apply here.

Our prior cases, and an examination of the case before us, indicates that the Lakewood ordinance is not invalid because it vests "excessive discretion" in Lakewood's Mayor to grant or deny a newsrack permit.

The Court has historically been reluctant to entertain facial attacks on statutes, i. e., claims that a statute is invalid in all of its applications. Our normal approach has been to determine whether a law is unconstitutional as applied in the particular case before the Court. This rule is also the usual approach we follow when reviewing laws that require licenses or permits to engage in business or other activities. * * * Thus, the usual rule is that a law requiring permits for specified activities is not unconstitutional because it vests discretion in administrative officials to grant or deny the permit. The Constitution does not require the Court to assume that such discretion will be illegally exercised.

There are, however, a few well-established contexts in which the Court has departed from its insistence on as-applied approach to constitutional adjudication. One of them is where a permit or license is required to engage in expressive activities protected by the First Amendment, and official discretion to grant or deny is not suitably confined. "In the area of freedom of expression it is well established that one has standing to challenge a statute on the ground that it delegates overly broad licensing discretion to an administrative office, whether or not his conduct could be proscribed by a properly drawn statute, and whether or not he applied for a license." Freedman v. Maryland. It is this line of cases on which the majority draws to support its conclusion that the Lakewood ordinance is unconstitutional on its face.

The prevailing feature of these exceptional cases, however, is that each of them involved a law that required a license to engage in activity protected by the First Amendment. In each of the cases, the expressive conduct which a city sought to license was an activity which the locality could not prohibit altogether. Streets, sidewalks, and parks are traditional public fora; leafletting, pamphletting, and speaking in such places may be regulated, Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U.S. 569, 574–575 (1941); Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 306–307 (1940); but they may not be entirely forbidden, Jamison v. Texas, 318 U.S. 413 (1943); Lovell v. Griffin. Likewise, in Freedman, at issue was a license requirement that was a prerequisite for any exhibition of a film in the State of Maryland. In all of these cases, the scope of the local license requirement included expressive activity protected by the First Amendment.

This is how the cases themselves have defined the scope of Lovell-Freedman doctrine. Such license requirements are struck down only when they effect the "enjoyment of freedoms which the Constitution guarantees." It is laws "subjecting the exercise of First Amendment freedoms to" license requirements that we have found suspect, see Shuttlesworth v. Birmingham, 394 U.S. 147, 150–151 (1969), not merely laws with some amorphous "nexus" to expression.

For example, the Lovell-Freedman line of cases would be applicable here if the City of Lakewood sought to license the distribution of all newspapers in the City, or if it required licenses for all stores which sold newspapers. These are obviously newspaper circulation activities which a municipality cannot prohibit and therefore, any licensing scheme of this scope would have to pass muster under the Lovell-Freedman doctrine. But—and this is critical—Lakewood has not cast so wide a net. Instead, it has sought to license only the placement of newsracks (and other like devices) on City property. As I read our precedents, the Lovell-Freedman line of cases is applicable here only if the Plain Dealer has a constitutional right to distribute its papers by means of dispensing devices or newsboxes, affixed to the public sidewalks. I am not convinced that this is the case.

Appellee has a right to distribute its newspapers on the City's streets, as others have a right to leaflet, solicit, speak, or proselytize in this same public forum area. But this "does not mean that [appellee] can * * * distribute [its newspapers] where, when and how [it] chooses." See Breard v. Alexandria, 341 U.S. 622, 642 (1951). More specifically, the Plain

Dealer's right to distribute its papers does not encompass the right to take city property—a part of the public forum, as appellee so vigorously argues—and appropriate it for its own exclusive use, on a semi-permanent basis, by means of the erection of a newsbox. [T]hese protected "rights of others" have always included the public-at-large's right to use the public forum for its chosen activities, including free passage of the streets. See Schneider v. State, 308 U.S. 147, 160 (1939).

From the outset of its contemporary public forum cases, this Court has recognized that city streets and sidewalks "have immemorially been held in trust for use of the public." Hague v. CIO, 307 U.S. 496, 515 (1939). This means all of the public, and does not create a First Amendment right in newspaper publishers to "cordon" off a portion of the sidewalk in an effort to increase the circulation of their papers. Cf. Schneider, supra, at 160. * * *

While there is a First Amendment right to publish newspapers, publishers have no right to force municipalities to turn over public property for the construction of a printing facility. There is a First Amendment right to sell books, but we would not accept an argument that a city must allow a book seller to construct a book shop—even a small one—on a city sidewalk. The right to leaflet does not create a right to build a booth on city streets from which leafletting can be conducted. Preventing the "taking" of public property for these purposes does not abridge First Amendment freedoms. Just as there is no First Amendment right to operate a bookstore or locate a movie theater however or wherever one chooses notwithstanding local laws to the contrary, see Arcara v. Cloud Books, Inc., 478 U.S. 697 (1986); Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc., 475 U.S. 41 (1986), the First Amendment does not create a right of newspaper publishers to take city streets to erect structures to sell their papers.

It may be that newspaper distributors can sell more papers by placing their newsracks on city sidewalks. But those seeking to distribute materials protected by the First Amendment do not have a right to appropriate public property merely because it best facilitates their efforts. "We again reject the 'notion that First Amendment rights are somehow not fully realized unless they are subsidized by the State.' " Regan v. Taxation with Representation of Wash., 461 U.S. 540, 546 (1983) (quoting Cammarano v. United States, 358 U.S. 498, 515 (1959) (Douglas, J., concurring). Consequently, a city need not subsidize news distribution activities by giving, selling, or leasing a portion of city property for the erection of newsracks. "The State, no less than a private owner of property, has power to preserve the property under its control for the use to which it is lawfully dedicated." Adderley v. Florida, 385 U.S. 39, 47 (1966). Preserving public forum space for use by the public generally, as opposed to the exclusive use of one individual or corporation, is obviously one such "lawfully dedicated" use. * * *

To hold otherwise, and create a First Amendment right of publishers to take city property to erect newsboxes, would ignore the significant governmental interests of cities—like Lakewood—that are threatened by newsrack placements. One of these interests, discussed supra, is keeping the streets and sidewalks free for the use of all members of the public, and not just the exclusive use of any one entity. But this is not the only concern at issue here.

The Court has consistently recognized the important interest that localities have in insuring the safety of persons using city streets and public forums. In this case, testimony at trial detailed a variety of potential safety risks posed by newsboxes, running the gamut from the obvious to the unimaginable. * * *

A third concern is the protection of cities' recognized aesthetic interests. Lakewood and countless other American cities have invested substantial sums of money to renovate their urban centers and commercial districts. Increasingly, they find newsracks to be discordant with the surrounding area. A majority of this Court found that similar aesthetic considerations would be sufficient to justify a content-neutral ban on all outdoor advertising signs, notwithstanding the extent to which such signs convey First Amendment protected messages. See Metromedia, Inc. v. San Diego. * * *

We should be especially hesitant to recognize the right appellee claims where, as is the case here, there are "ample alternate channels" available for distributing newspapers. The District Court found that no person in Lakewood lives more than a quarter-mile from a 24-hour newspaper outlet: either a store open all-night or a newsbox located on private property. Home delivery, the means by which appellant distributes the vast majority of its newspapers, is an option as well. The First Amendment does not require Lakewood to make its property available to the Plain Dealer so that it may undertake the most effective possible means of selling newspapers.

In sum, I believe that the First Amendment does not create a right of newspaper publishers to take a portion of city property to erect a structure to distribute their papers. There is no constitutional right to place newsracks on city sidewalks over the objections of the city.

Because there is no such constitutional right, the predicate for applying the Freedman v. Maryland line of cases is not present in this case. Because the Lakewood Ordinance does not directly regulate an activity protected by the First Amendment, we should instead take the traditional, as-applied approach to adjudication. * * * Appellee's facial challenge to the Mayor's discretion under § 901.181(c)(7) should therefore be rejected.

[T]he Court incorrectly suggests that I rely on the now-discredited "greater-includes-the-lesser" formulation of Justice Holmes, as adopted by this Court in Davis v. Massachusetts, 167 U.S. 43 (1897). The majority then engages in a detailed analysis of cases having no applicability here whatsoever, to slay this straw man of its own creation.

As defined at its inception, "greater-includes-the-lesser" reasoning holds that where a State or municipality may ban an activity altogether, it is consequently free "to determine under what circumstances such [activity] may be availed of, as the greater power contains the lesser." But if, for example, a Lakewood ordinance provided for the issuance of newsrack licenses to only those newspapers owned by persons of a particular race, or only to members of a select political party, such a law would be clearly violative of the First Amendment (or some other provision of the Constitution), and would be facially invalid. And if the Mayor of Lakewood granted or refused license applications for similar improper reasons, his exercise of the power provided him under § 901.181(c)(7) would be susceptible to constitutional attack. Thus, I do not embrace the "greater-includes-the-lesser" syllogism—one that this Court abandoned long ago. Cf. Hague v. CIO, 307 U.S. 496, 515 (1939).

Instead, my view is simply this: where an activity that could be forbidden altogether (without running afoul of the First Amendment) is subjected to a local license requirement, the mere presence of administrative discretion in the licensing scheme will not render it invalid per se. In such a case—which does not involve the exercise of First Amendment protected freedoms—the Lovell-Freedman doctrine does not apply, and our usual rules concerning the permissibility of discretionary local licensing laws (and facial challenges to those laws) must prevail.

Finally, the Court asserts that I do not understand the nature of the conduct at issue here. It is asserted that "[t]he actual 'activity' at issue here is the circulation of newspapers, which is constitutionally protected." But of course, this is wrong. Lakewood does not, by its ordinance, seek to license the circulation of newspapers within the city. In fact, the Lakewood ordinance does not even require licenses of all newsracks within the jurisdiction—the many newsracks located within Lakewood on private property are not included within the scope of the city's ordinance. Thus, it is the majority—and not I—that is guilty of "recharacterizing" the activity that Lakewood licenses. The Lakewood ordinance must be considered for what it is: a license requirement for newsracks on city property.

This is why, notwithstanding the Court's intimations to the contrary, my approach would not change the outcome of our previous cases in this area. In those cases the local law at issue required licenses—not for a narrow category of expressive conduct that could be prohibited—but for a sweeping range of First Amendment protected activity. Thus, the law at issue in Shuttlesworth v. Birmingham, 394 U.S., at 149, required a license for "any parade"; the license scheme under attack in Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S., at 52–53, and n. 1, applied to all films shown in the State of Maryland; the law at issue in Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U.S., at 451, applied to any distribution of leaflets or pamphlets within the city limits. Surely, even at the extreme level of abstraction at which the Court operates in its opinion, the majority can recognize a difference between the scope and dangers of these laws, and Lakewood's more focused regulation.

I now address the rule of decision the majority offers.

Instead of the relatively clear rule that the Court's prior cases support, the majority today adopts a more amorphous measure of when the Lovell-Freedman doctrine should apply. As I see it, the Court's new "nexus to expression, or to conduct commonly associated with expression" test is peculiarly troublesome, because it is of uncertain scope and vague expanse.

The Court appears to stop short of saying that any statute that delegates discretionary administrative authority that has the potential to be used to suppress speech is unconstitutional. A great variety of discretionary power may be abused to limit freedom of expression; yet that does not mean that such delegations of power are facially invalid.

The new Lakewood ordinance enacted in tandem with § 901.181 illustrates this principle well. As discussed, when the District Court invalidated Lakewood's complete ban on all structures on city property, the City enacted two new ordinances. One provides for licensing newsracks on city property—the subject of this appeal. The second gives the City Council unlimited discretion to grant or deny applications for all other exclusive uses of city property. Someone who wishes to apply for permission to erect a soft-drink vending machine on city property may fear that his application will be denied because he has engaged in some First-Amendment protected activities which are not to the City Council's liking. These fears may even be substantial, and they may be based on facts eminently provable in a courtroom; e. g., that the applicant opposed a city councilwoman in her last election campaign. Yet surely § 901.18 is not invalid on its face merely because it creates the possibility that the discretion accorded therein to the City Council could be abused in the way that the soft drink vending machine applicant fears.

Seeking a way to limit its own expansive ruling, the Court provides two concrete examples of instances in which its newly crafted "nexus to expression" rule will not strike down local ordinances that permit discretionary licensing decisions. First, we are told that a law granting unbridled discretion to a Mayor to grant licenses for soda machine placements passes constitutional muster because it does not give that official "frequent opportunities to exercise substantial power over the content or viewpoint of the vendor's speech." How the Court makes this empirical assessment, I do not know. It seems to me that the nature of a vendor's product—be it newspapers or soda pop—is not the measure of how potent a license law can be in the hands of local officials seeking to control or alter the vendor's speech. Of course, the newspaper vendor's speech is likely to be more public, more significant, and more widely known than the soda vendor's speech—and therefore more likely to incur the wrath of public officials. But in terms of the "usefulness" of the license power to exert control over a licensee's speech, there is no difference whatsoever between the situation of the soda vendor and the newspaper vendor.[11]

If the Court's treatment of the soda machine problem is not curious enough, it also "assures" us that its ruling does not invalidate local laws requiring, for example, building permits—even as they apply to the construction of newspaper printing facilities. These laws, we are told, provide "too blunt a censorship instrument to warrant judicial intervention." Thus, local "laws of general application that are not aimed at conduct commonly associated with expression" appear to survive the Court's decision today.

But what if Lakewood, following this decision, repeals local ordinance § 901.181 (the detailed newsrack permit law) and simply left § 901.18 (the general ordinance concerning "any * * * structure or device" on city property) on the books? That section vests absolute discretion (without any of the guidelines found in § 901.181) in the City Council to give or withhold permission for the erection of devices on city streets. Because this law is of "general application," it should survive scrutiny under the Court's opinion—even as applied to newsracks. If so, the Court's opinion takes on an odd "the-greater-but-not-the-lesser" quality: the more activities that are subjected to a discretionary licensing law, the more likely that law is to pass constitutional muster.

As noted above, our tradition has been to discourage facial challenges, and rather, to entertain constitutional attacks on local laws only as they are applied to the litigants. The facts of this case indicate why that policy is a prudent one.

Most importantly, there could be no allegation in this case that the Mayor's discretion to deny permits actually has been abused to the detriment of the newspaper, for the Plain Dealer has not applied for a permit for its newsracks * * *.

Indicative of the true nature of this litigation is the fact that the City of Lakewood has had on the books, since January of 1987, an interim ordinance that licenses the placement of newsracks on city property—an ordinance that is free of the constitutional defects challenged here. Eighteen months have passed since the interim ordinance was enacted, and the Plain Dealer apparently still has not applied for a license to place its newsracks on city property. Thus, the Court, with a strange rhetorical flourish, belittles the usefulness of judicial review as a tool to control the Mayor's discretion in granting newsrack licenses, because newspaper publishers and their reading public cannot afford to await the results of the judicial process. "[N]ewspaper publishers cannot wait indefinitely for a permit" and "a paper needs public access at a particular time," we are remonstrated. Yet the Plain Dealer has the availability of a wholly constitutional permit for its newsracks for a year and a half.

11. Indeed, in practical terms, if two businesses contemplated the prospect of standing before Lakewood's officials to seek vending machine permits—a sole proprietorship seeking a license for a soda machine that is the only source of the owner's income, and the Plain Dealer Publishing Co., seeking licenses for newsracks—I have little doubt about which applicant would be more likely to feel constrained to alter its expressive conduct in anticipation of the encounter.

The Court mentions the risk of censorship, the ever-present danger of self-censorship, and the power of prior restraint to justify the result. Yet these fears and concerns have little to do with this case, which involves the efforts of Ohio's largest newspaper to place a handful of newsboxes in a few locations in a small suburban community. Even if one accepts the testimony of appellee's own expert, it seems unlikely that the newsboxes at issue here would increase the Plain Dealer's circulation within Lakewood by more than a percent or two; the paper's overall circulation would be affected only by about one one-hundredth of one percent (0.01%).

It is hard to see how the Court's concerns have any applicability here. And it is harder still to see how the Court's image of the unbridled local censor, seeking to control and direct the content of speech, fits this case. In the case before us, the City of Lakewood declined to appeal an adverse ruling against its ban on newsracks, and instead amended its local laws to permit appellee to place its newsboxes on city property. When the nature of this Ordinance was not to the Plain Dealer's liking, Lakewood again amended its local laws to meet the newspaper's concerns. Finally, when the newspaper, still disgruntled, won a judgment against Lakewood from the Court of Appeals, the city once again amended its ordinance to address the constitutional issues. The Court's David and Goliath imagery concerning the balance of power between the regulated and the regulator in this case is wholly inept—except, possibly, in reverse.

For the foregoing reasons, I dissent from the Court's opinion and its judgment in this case. I would reverse the Court of Appeals' decision invalidating the Lakewood Ordinance.

COMMENT

For Justice White, cases such as Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U.S. 444 (1938) and Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940), see text, p. 39, did not support the invalidation of the City of Lakewood ordinance. Those cases dealt with First Amendment activities which the locality could not prohibit altogether. The line of cases represented by Lovell v. Griffin would be applicable if a newspaper, like the Cleveland Plain Dealer, had a constitutional right to distribute its papers on newsracks on public property. But in Justice White's view—and in the Court's?—there was no such right. Since the activity in question, placing newspaper vending machines on public sidewalks, could be prohibited altogether, lesser regulations such as local licensing conditioned on administrative discretion, was a fortiori permissible.

Justice Brennan says that the concept that "the greater power to prohibit a manner of speech entirely included the lesser power to license it in an official's unbridled discretion" is a "discredited doctrine." However, in Posadas De Puerto Rico Associates v. Tourism Company of Puerto Rico, 106 S.Ct. 2968 (1986), Justice Rehnquist used exactly such a "greater-includes-the-lesser" theory. Since casino gambling could be prohibited altogether by Puerto Rico, Puerto Rico could clearly undertake a lesser regulation of casino gambling, i.e., prohibit advertising of casino gambling to residents of Puerto Rico. Interestingly, Justice Rehnquist took no part in the decision in Lakewood.

City of Lakewood sets forth new doctrine. While facial invalidity of ordinances striking at First Amendment expression had been upheld in the past, this doctrine was now extended to reach situations where the law being challenged had a close enough nexus to expression, or to conduct usually associated with expression, to pose a real and substantial risk of censorship. Since placing newsracks on publicly owned sidewalks, unlike parades and demonstrations on public property, had never been deemed First Amendment activity, Justice White and other dissenters thought Lovell and its progeny should not apply. Justice White, in short, repudiated the idea that laws having a close enough nexus to expression could be attacked without more, just on the basis of their facial invalidity.

Solicitation and the Overbreadth Doctrine

BOARD OF AIRPORT COMMISSIONERS OF LOS ANGELES v. JEWS FOR JESUS

482 U.S. 569, 107 S.CT. 2568, 96 L.ED.2D 500 (1987).

Justice O'CONNOR delivered the opinion of the Court.

The issue presented in this case is whether a resolution banning all "First Amendment activities" at Los Angeles International Airport (LAX) violates the First Amendment.

On July 13, 1983, the Board of Airport Commissioners (Board) adopted Resolution No. 13787, which provides in pertinent part:

"NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED by the Board of Airport Commissioners that the Central Terminal Area at Los Angeles International Airport is not open for First Amendment activities by any individual and/or entity; * * *

"BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED that if any individual or entity engages in First Amendment activities within the Central Terminal Area at Los Angeles International Airport, the City Attorney is directed to institute appropriate litigation against such individual and/or entity to ensure compliance with this Policy statement of the Board of Airport Commissioners. * * * "

Respondent Jews for Jesus, Inc., is a nonprofit religious corporation. On July 6, 1984, Alan Howard Snyder, a minister of the Gospel for Jews for Jesus, was stopped by a Department of Airports peace officer while distributing free religious literature on a pedestrian walkway in the Central Terminal Area at LAX. The officer showed Snyder a copy of the resolution, explained that Snyder's activities violated the resolution, and requested that Snyder leave LAX. The officer warned Snyder that the City would take legal action against him if he refused to leave as requested. Snyder stopped distributing the leaflets and left the airport terminal. * * *

Jews for Jesus and Snyder then filed this action in the District Court for the Central District of California, challenging the constitutionality of the resolution under both the California and Federal Constitutions.

The District Court held that the Central Terminal Area was a traditional public forum under federal law, and held that the resolution was facially unconstitutional under the United States Constitution. * * * The requirement that the overbreadth be substantial arose from our recognition that application of the overbreadth doctrine is, "manifestly, strong medicine," Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 93 S.Ct., at 2916, and that "there must be a realistic danger that the statute itself will significantly compromise recognized First Amendment protections of parties not before the Court for it to be facially challenged on overbreadth grounds."

On its face, the resolution at issue in this case reaches the universe of expressive activity, and, by prohibiting all protected expression, purports to create a virtual "First Amendment Free Zone" at LAX. The resolution does not merely regulate expressive activity in the Central Terminal Area that might create problems such as congestion or the disruption of the activities of those who use LAX. Instead, the resolution expansively states that LAX "is not open for First Amendment activities by any individual and/or entity," and that "any individual and/or entity [who] seeks to engage in First Amendment activities within the Central Terminal Area * * * shall be deemed to be acting in contravention of the stated policy of the Board of Airport Commissioners." The resolution therefore does not merely reach the activity of respondents at LAX; it prohibits even talking and reading, or the wearing of campaign buttons or symbolic clothing. Under such a sweeping ban, virtually every individual who enters LAX may be found to violate the resolution by engaging in some "First Amendment activit[y]." We think it obvious that such a ban cannot be justified even if LAX were a nonpublic forum because no conceivable governmental interest would justify such an absolute prohibition of speech.

Additionally, we find no apparent saving construction of the resolution. The resolution expressly applies to all "First Amendment activities," and the words of the resolution simply leave no room for a narrowing construction. In the past the Court sometimes has used either abstention or certification when, as here, the state courts have not had the opportunity to give the statute under challenge a definite construction. Neither option, however, is appropriate in this case because California has no certification procedure, and the resolution is not "fairly subject to an interpretation which will render unnecessary or substantially modify the federal constitutional question." * * *

The petitioners suggest that the resolution is not substantially overbroad because it is intended to reach only expressive activity unrelated to airport-related purposes. * * *

In balancing the government's interest in limiting the use of its property against the interests of those who wish to use the property for expressive activity, the Court has identified three types of fora: the traditional public forum, the public forum created by government designation, and the nonpublic forum. Perry Ed. Assn. v. Perry Local Educators' Assn., 460 U.S. 37, 45–46 (1983). The proper First Amendment analysis differs depending on whether the area in question falls in one category rather than another. In a traditional public forum or a public forum by government designation, we have held that First Amendment protections are subject to heightened scrutiny:

> "In these quintessential public forums, the government may not prohibit all communicative activity. For the State to enforce a content-based exclusion it must show that its regulation is necessary to serve a compelling state interest and that it is narrowly drawn to achieve that end. * * * The State may also enforce regulations of the time, place, and manner of expression which are content-neutral, are narrowly tailored to serve a significant government interest, and leave open ample alternative channels of communication." Id., at 45.

We have further held, however, that access to a nonpublic forum may be restricted by government regulation as long as the regulation "is reasonable and not an effort to suppress expression merely because officials oppose the speaker's view."

The petitioners contend that LAX is neither a traditional public forum nor a public forum by government designation, and accordingly argue that the latter standard governing access to a nonpublic forum is appropriate. The respondents, in turn, argue that LAX is a public forum subject only to reasonable time, place or manner restrictions. * * * Because we conclude that the resolution is facially unconstitutional under the First Amendment overbreadth doctrine regardless of the proper standard, we need not decide whether LAX is indeed a public forum, or whether the Perry standard is applicable when access to a nonpublic forum is not restricted.

Under the First Amendment overbreadth doctrine, an individual whose own speech or conduct may be prohibited is permitted to challenge a statute on its face "because it also threatens others not before the court—those who desire to engage in legally protected expression but who may refrain from doing so rather than risk prosecution or undertake to have the law declared partially invalid." Brockett v. Spokane Arcades, Inc., 472 U.S. 491.(1985). A statute may be invalidated on its face, however, only if the overbreadth is "substantial." Houston v. Hill, 482 U.S. 451, 459, (1987). Such a limiting construction, however, is of little assistance in substantially reducing the overbreadth of the resolution. Much nondisruptive speech—such as the wearing of a T-Shirt or button that contains a political message—may not be "airport related," but is still protected speech even in a nonpublic forum. See Cohen v. California (1971). Moreover, the vagueness of this suggested construction itself presents serious constitutional difficulty. The line between airport-related speech and nonairport-related speech is, at best, murky. The petitioners, for example, suggest that an individual who reads a newspaper or converses with a neighbor at LAX is engaged in permitted "airport-related" activity because reading or conversing permits the traveling public to "pass the time." We presume, however, that petitioners would not so categorize the activities of a member of a religious or political organization who decides to "pass the time" by distributing leaflets to fellow travelers. In essence, the result of this vague limiting construction would be to give LAX officials alone the power to decide in the first instance whether a given activity is airport related. Such a law that "confers on police a virtually unrestrained power to arrest and charge persons with a violation" of the resolution is unconstitutional because "[t]he opportunity for abuse, especially where a statute has received a virtually open-ended interpretation, is self-evident." Lewis v. City of New Orleans (1974) (POWELL, J., concurring).

We conclude that the resolution is substantially overbroad, and is not fairly subject to a limiting construction. Accordingly, we hold that the resolution violates the First Amendment. The judgment of the Court of Appeals is

Affirmed.

Justice WHITE, with whom the Chief Justice joins, concurring.

I join the Court's opinion but suggest that it should not be taken as indicating that a majority of the Court considers the Los Angeles International Airport to be a traditional public forum. That issue was one of the questions on which we granted certiorari, and we should not have postponed it for another day.

COMMENT

Rather than make nice discriminations among various groups about types of solicitation which will be permitted, the Commissioners of the Los Angeles Airport Authority, a public facility, announced a plague on all speakers and simply banished First Amendment activity from the airport terminal altogether. In the next section, the student is exposed to the considerable case law which deals with the question of whether a public facility should be considered a public forum. As Justice O'Connor pointed out in Airport Commissioners, this is an inquiry that makes a difference. If the facility is deemed a public forum, then content-based regulation must meet a heightened scrutiny standard. Even content-neutral regulation of the traditional public forum must be "narrowly tailored to serve a significant governmental interest" and must leave open alternative modes of communication. Regulation of the nonpublic forum has much less formidable obstacles to overcome.

Is the use of the overbreadth doctrine here based on an unwillingness to hold that the airport terminal is a traditional public forum? Why should the Court be reluctant to make such a determination? Notice that the overbreadth doctrine applied in Airport Commissioners is fatal to the regulation banning First Amendment activity in the terminal. How should a valid regulation in this context have been drafted?

Usually in First Amendment litigation, what is being challenged is the validity of a law as applied to a particular plaintiff. If the plaintiff is successful, then the challenged application of the law is rendered invalid, but the law may still be valid. Sometimes, however, the plaintiff may launch an attack on the law itself by contending that the law is facially unconstitutional. This means that the constitutional invalidity is apparent on its face. If, however, a court rules that a law on its face violates the First Amendment because of overbreadth, the law itself is rendered invalid.

The doctrine of overbreadth has been described as follows: "The doctrine of overbreadth is concerned with the precision of a law. A law may be facially clear but may sweep too broadly if it indiscriminately reaches both protected and unprotected expression. Protected expression can be chilled or suppressed by such a law. Herein lies the vice of overbreadth. Even though the litigant might be engaged in unprotected expression, the statute could be applied to protected speech." Barron and Dienes, Constitutional Law in a Nutshell, 227 (1986).

Public Facilities and the Public Forum

What about the exercise of First Amendment rights on public property? To what extent may a public facility be used as a public forum? In a decision which appeared to suggest an unwillingness by the Supreme Court to recognize a general right of nondiscriminatory access to publicly owned media facilities, the Court, 5–4, upheld a lower court decision, Lehman v. City of Shaker Heights, 296 N.E.2d 683 (Ohio 1973), approving a city's right to prohibit political advertising on city buses. Lehman v. City of Shaker Heights, 418 U.S. 298 (1974). In the Lehman case, the Court denied access to publicly owned media to a political candidate who wished to display his political messages along with commercial ads on city-owned buses in Shaker Heights, Ohio. Justice Blackmun wrote the Court's opinion in Lehman, joined by Justices Burger, White, and Rehnquist. These justices declared that a city had a right as the owner of a commercial venture like a public transportation system to accept ads only for "innocuous" commercial advertising and to prohibit political messages on buses.

The Court denied that the car cards in controversy constituted a "public forum" protected by the First Amendment. Similarly, the Court rejected the contention "that there is a guarantee of nondiscriminatory access to such publicly owned and controlled areas of communication regardless of the primary purpose for which the area is dedicated." Although the Court conceded that American constitutional law had been "jealous to preserve access to public places for purposes of free speech," what is dispositive in such cases is "the nature of the forum and the conflicting interests involved. * * *" Under the circumstances, the claim for the exercise of First Amendment expression in Lehman would be rejected:

> Here we have no open spaces, no meeting hall, park, street corner, or other public thoroughfare. Indeed, the city is engaged in commerce. * * * [C]ar card space, although incidental to the provision of public transportation, is a part of the commercial venture. In much the same way that a newspaper or periodical, or even a radio or television station, need not accept every proffer of advertising from the general public, a city transit system had discretion to develop and make reasonable choices concerning the type of advertising that may be displayed in its vehicles.

No First Amendment forum is here to be found. The city consciously has limited access to its transit system advertising space in order to minimize chances of abuse, the appearance of "favoritism" and the risk of imposing upon a captive audience. These are reasonable legislative objectives advanced by the city in a proprietary capacity.

By means of a separate concurring opinion, Justice Douglas supplied the critical fifth vote. He thought that a bus, from a public forum point of view, was more like a newspaper than a park. On the very day the Court decided Lehman, it had decided the Miami Herald case, text, p. 497. Relying on Miami Herald, Douglas appeared to suggest that the owner of a bus (even though it was a public owner) was equivalent to the owner of a private newspaper: "[The] newspaper owner cannot be forced to include in his offerings news or other items which outsiders may desire but which the owner abhors." If the bus or newspaper was turned into a park for purposes of the public forum concept, then public facilities such as publicly owned buses would be "transformed into forums for the dissemination of ideas upon [a] captive audience."

Four justices, Brennan, Stewart, Marshall, and Powell, dissented on the ground that the city's actions denying access violated equal protection in that the city had improperly preferred commercial advertising on its buses to the exclusion of political advertising. The dissenters said that Shaker Heights had opened up its advertising space on its buses as a "public forum." Having done so, the dissenters said the city could not exclude the category of political advertising:

Having opened a forum of communication, the city is barred by the First and Fourteenth Amendments from discriminating among forum users solely on the basis of message content.

Once a public forum for communication has been established, both free speech and equal protection principles prohibit discrimination based solely upon subject matter or content. * * * [D]iscrimination among entire classes of ideas, rather than among points of view within a particular class, does not render it any less odious. Subject matter or content censorship in any form is forbidden.

Is the Lehman case a severe defeat for the whole idea of public property as a public forum? Or is the case merely a holding that the car cards were not a public forum? Note that there is a major difference in the force of a claim for the exercise of free expression rights in public property as compared with such a claim with respect to private property. In the private property area, there is no state action problem. In such a public context, the mandate of First Amendment theory that the state act in an ideologically neutral manner combines with equal protection concepts to ensure that a public facility cannot favor one political viewpoint and banish another.

In Lehman, all political viewpoints in the form of political ads were banned. Therefore, arguably, there was no equal protection violation; Justice Brennan was of a contrary opinion, however, wasn't he? Why?

The necessity that the public facility which is sought to be used for public forum purposes be consistent with the primary purposes of the facility was emphasized once again by the Supreme Court in Greer v. Spock, 424 U.S. 828 (1976). The Court, per Justice Stewart, in Greer rejected an attack on military post regulations which prohibited partisan political activity as well as the dissemination of pamphlets without the prior approval of military authorities. The Court denied that "whenever members of the public are permitted freely to visit a place owned or operated by the Government then that place becomes a public forum for the purposes of the First Amendment." Adderley v. Florida, 385 U.S. 39 (1966), a 5–4 Supreme Court decision denying public forum treatment to jailhouse grounds, was relied on by the Greer Court for the idea that the First Amendment did not mean that "people who want to propagandize protests or views have a constitutional right to do so whenever and however and wherever they please." The purpose of military reservations was to "train soldiers, not to provide a public forum." Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Marshall, dissented in Greer and expressed grave concern that a narrow approach to whether "the form of expression is compatible with the activities occurring at the locale" might lead to a "rigid characterization" that "a given locale is not a public forum." The result would be that "certain forms of public speech at the locale" would be suppressed even though the expression involved was entirely compatible with the principal purposes of the public facility in question.

In United States Postal Service v. Council of Greenburgh Civic Associations, 453 U.S. 114 (1981), the Court, per Justice Rehnquist, upheld a federal statute which prohibited mailboxes belonging to the government and used in the postal system from being used by civic associations without paying postage. Rehnquist rejected the idea "of a letter box as a public forum" and observed "that the First Amendment does not guarantee access to property simply because it is owned or controlled by the government." Rehnquist appeared to suggest, said Professor Emerson, that no new public forums "would be recognized beyond those that had been considered traditionally to be such."

Despite the result in Greenburgh Civic Associations, Emerson believes that "the constitutional right to use public facilities [as a public forum] on a compatible basis seems well-established." What merit is there in generally viewing public facilities as broadly hospitable to public forum purposes? Professor Emerson offers this rationale: "It forces the relevant community to listen to the expression of grievances rather than allowing them to be swept under the rug." See Emerson, The Affirmative Side of the First Amendment, 15 Georgia L.Rev. 809 (1981).

Justice Rehnquist objected that applying the test for valid time, place, and manner controls to the question of whether a letter box was a public forum would impose a difficult and impractical task on the Postal Service: "[The] authority to impose regulations cannot be made to depend on all of the variations of climate, population, density, and other factors that may vary significantly within a distance of less than 100 miles."

The public forum concept received its classic expression in Kalven, The Concept of the Public Forum, 1965 Supreme Ct.Rev. 1. The public forum concept became a vehicle for providing First Amendment-based legitimacy to the civil rights protests of the sixties.

Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104 (1972) provides a helpful guide to permissible time, place, and manner regulation:

> The nature of the place, "the pattern of its normal activities, dictates the kinds of regulations of time, place and manner that are reasonable." Although a silent vigil may not unduly interfere with a public library, making a speech in the reading room almost certainly would. That same speech should be perfectly appropriate in a park. The crucial question is whether the manner of expression is basically compatible with the normal activity of a particular place at a particular time. Our cases make clear that in assessing the reasonableness of regulation, we must weigh heavily the fact that communication is involved; the regulation must be narrowly tailored to further the State's legitimate interest. "Access to [public places] for the purpose of exercising [First Amendment rights] cannot constitutionally be denied broadly." Free expression must not, in the guise of regulation, be abridged or denied.

The Heffron case which follows is an illustrative example of permissible time, place, or manner regulation.

HEFFRON v. INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS

452 U.S. 640, 101 S.CT. 2559, 69 L.ED.2D 298 (1981).

[EDITORIAL NOTE The Minnesota Agricultural Society conducts an annual state fair on a 125-acre tract of state land which attracts about 115,000 persons on weekdays and 160,000 on weekends. Pursuant to state law, the Society issued rules, including Rule 6.05 which requires that all persons or groups seeking to sell, exhibit, or distribute materials at the fair must do so only from fixed locations on the fairgrounds. While the rules do not bar walking around and communicating, all sales, distributions, and fund solicitations must be conducted from a booth rented from the fair authorities on a first-come, first-served basis.

The International Society for Krishna Consciousness, Inc. (ISKCON) brought suit seeking to enjoin application of Rule 6.05 against the religion and its members. It was alleged that the Rule violated the First Amendment by suppressing ISKCON's religious practice of Sankirtan, a ritual requiring members to go into public places to distribute material and solicit donations for the Krishna religion.

The trial court upheld the constitutionality of Rule 6.05. The Minnesota Supreme Court reversed, holding Rule 6.05 unconstitutionally restricted the Krishnas' religious practice of Sankirtan.]

Justice WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

The State does not dispute that the oral and written dissemination of the Krishnas' religious views and doctrines is protected by the First Amendment. Nor does it claim that this protection is lost because the written materials sought to be distributed are sold rather than given away or because contributions or gifts are solicited in the course of propagating the faith.

It is also common ground, however, that the First Amendment does not guarantee the right to communicate one's views at all times and places or in any manner that may be desired. Adderley v. Florida. As the Minnesota Supreme Court recognized, the activities of ISKCON, like those of others protected by the First Amendment, are subject to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions. "We have often approved restrictions of that kind provided that they are justified without reference to the content of the regulated speech, that they serve a significant governmental interest, and that in doing so they leave open ample alternative channels for communication of the information." Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council. The issue here, as it was below, is whether Rule 6.05 is a permissible restriction on the place and manner of communicating the views of the Krishna religion, more specifically, whether the Society may require the members of ISKCON who desire to practice Sankirtan at the State Fair to confine their distribution, sales, and solicitation activities to a fixed location.

A major criterion for a valid time, place, and manner restriction is that the restriction "may not be based upon either the content or subject matter of the speech." Consolidated Edison Co. v. Public Service Commission [p. 156]. Rule 6.05 qualifies in this respect, since, as the Supreme Court of Minnesota observed, the rule applies even-handedly to all who wish to distribute and sell written materials or to solicit funds. No person or organization, whether commercial or charitable, is permitted to engage in such activities except from a booth rented for those purposes.

Nor does Rule 6.05 suffer from the more covert forms of discrimination that may result when arbitrary discretion is vested in some governmental authority. The method of allocating space is a straightforward first-come, first-served system. The rule is not open to the kind of arbitrary application that this Court has condemned as inherently inconsistent with a valid time, place, and manner regulation because such discretion has the potential for becoming a means of suppressing a particular point of view. See Shuttlesworth v. Birmingham.

A valid time, place, and manner regulation must also "serve a significant governmental interest." Here, the principal justification asserted by the state in support of Rule 6.05 is the need to maintain the orderly movement of the crowd given the large number of exhibitors and persons attending the fair.

As a general matter, it is clear that a state's interest in protecting the "safety and convenience" of persons using a public forum is a valid governmental objective. Furthermore, consideration of a forum's special attributes is relevant to the constitutionality of a regulation since the significance of the governmental interest must be assessed in light of the characteristic nature and function of the particular forum involved. This observation bears particular import in the present case since respondents make a number of analogies between the fairgrounds and city streets, which have "immemorially been held in trust for the use of the public and have been used for purposes of assembly, communicating thoughts between citizens, and discussing public questions." But it is clear that there are significant differences between a street and the fairgrounds. A street is continually open, often uncongested, and constitutes not only a necessary conduit in the daily affairs of a locality's citizens, but also a place where people may enjoy the open air of the company of friends and neighbors in a relaxed environment. The Minnesota Fair is a temporary event attracting great numbers of visitors who come to the event for a short period to see and experience the host of exhibits and attractions at the fair. The flow of the crowd and demands of safety are more pressing in the context of the fair. As such, any comparisons to public streets are necessarily inexact.

The justification for the Rule should not be measured by the disorder that would result from granting an exemption solely to ISKCON. That organization and its ritual of Sankirtan have no special claim to First Amendment protection as compared to that of other religions who also distribute literature and solicit funds. None of our cases suggest that the inclusion of peripatetic solicitation as part of a church ritual entitles church members to solicitation rights in a public forum superior to those of members of other religious groups that raise money but do not purport to ritualize the process. Nor for present purposes do religious organizations enjoy rights to communicate, distribute, and solicit on the fairgrounds superior to those of other organizations having social, political, or other ideological messages to proselytize. The nonreligious organizations seeking support for their activities are entitled to rights equal to those of religious groups to enter a public forum and spread their views, whether by soliciting funds or by distributing literature.

ISKCON desires to proselytize at the fair because it believes it can successfully communicate and raise funds. In its view, this can be done only by intercepting fair patrons as they move about, and if success is achieved, stopping them momentarily or for longer periods as money is given or exchanged for literature. This consequence would be multiplied many times over if Rule 6.05 could not be applied to confine such transactions by ISKCON and others to fixed locations. Indeed, the court below agreed that without Rule 6.05 there would be widespread disorder at the fairgrounds. The court also recognized that some disorder would inevitably result from exempting the Krishnas from the rule. Obviously, there would be a much larger threat to the State's interest in crowd control if all other religious, nonreligious, and noncommercial organizations could likewise move freely about the fairgrounds distributing and selling literature and soliciting funds at will.

Given these considerations, we hold that the State's interest in confining distribution, selling, and fund solicitation activities to fixed locations is sufficient to satisfy the requirement that a place or manner restriction must serve a substantial state interest.

For similar reasons, we cannot agree with the Minnesota Supreme Court that Rule 6.05 is an unnecessary regulation because the State could avoid the threat to its interest posed by ISKCON by less restrictive means, such as penalizing disorder or disruption, limiting the number of solicitors, or putting more narrowly drawn restrictions on the location and movement of ISKCON's representatives. As we have indicated, the inquiry must involve not only ISKCON, but also all other organizations that would be entitled to distribute, sell or solicit if the booth rule may not be enforced with respect to ISKCON. Looked at in this way, it is quite improbable that the alternative means suggested by the Minnesota Supreme Court would deal adequately with the problems posed by the much larger number of distributors and solicitors that would be present on the fairgrounds if the judgment below were affirmed.

For Rule 6.05 to be valid as a place and manner restriction, it must also be sufficiently clear that alternative forums for the expression of respondents' protected speech exist despite the effects of the rule. Rule 6.05 is not vulnerable on this ground. First, the Rule does not prevent ISKCON from practicing Sankirtan anywhere outside the fairgrounds. More importantly, the rule has not been shown to deny access within the forum in question. Here, the rule does not exclude ISKCON from the fairgrounds, nor does it deny that organization the right to conduct any desired activity at some point within the forum. Its members may mingle with the crowd and orally propagate their views. The organization may also arrange for a booth and distribute and sell literature and solicit funds from that location on the fairgrounds itself. The Minnesota State Fair is a limited public forum in that it exists to provide a means for a great number of exhibitors temporarily to present their products or views, be they commercial, religious, or political, to a large number of people in an efficient fashion. Considering the limited functions of the fair and the combined area within which it operates, we are unwilling to say that Rule 6.05 does not provide ISKCON and other organizations with an adequate means to sell and solicit on the fairgrounds.

[Reversed.]

Justice BRENNAN, with whom Justice Marshall and Justice Stevens join, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

As the Court recognizes, the issue in this case is whether Minnesota State Fair Rule 6.05 constitutes a reasonable times, place, and manner restriction on respondents' exercise of protected First Amendment rights. In deciding this issue, the Court considers, inter alia, whether the regulation serves a significant governmental interest and whether that interest can be served by a less intrusive restriction. The Court errs, however, in failing to apply its analysis separately to each of the protected First Amendment activities restricted by Rule 6.05. Thus, the Court fails to recognize that some of the state's restrictions may be reasonable while others may not.

Rule 6.05 restricts three types of protected First Amendment activity: distribution of literature, sale of literature, and solicitation of funds.

I quite agree with the Court that the state has a significant interest in maintaining crowd control on its fairgrounds. I also have no doubt that the State has a significant interest in protecting its fairgoers from fraudulent or deceptive solicitation practices. Indeed, because I believe on this record that this latter interest is substantially furthered by a rule that restricts sales and solicitation activities to fixed booth locations, where the State will have the greatest opportunity to police and prevent possible deceptive practices, I would hold that Rule 6.05's restriction on those particular forms of First Amendment expression is justified as an antifraud measure. Accordingly, I join the judgment of the Court as far as it upholds rule 6.05's restriction on sales and solicitations. However, because I believe that the booth rule is an overly intrusive means of achieving the state's interest in crowd control, and because I cannot accept the validity of the state's third asserted justification [i.e., protection of fairgoers from annoyance and harassment], I dissent from the Court's approval of Rule 6.05's restriction on the distribution of literature.

As our cases have long noted, once a governmental regulation is shown to impinge upon basic First Amendment rights, the burden falls on the government to show the validity of its asserted interest and the absence of less intrusive alternatives. The challenged "regulation must be narrowly tailored to further the State's legitimate interest." Minnesota's Rule 6.05 does not meet this test.

[E]ach and every fairgoer, whether political candidate, concerned citizen, or member of a religious group, is free to give speeches, engage in face-to-face advocacy, campaign, or proselytize. No restrictions are placed on any fairgoer's right to speak at any time, at any place, or to any person. Thus, if on a given day 5,000 members of ISKCON came to the fair and paid their admission fees, all 5,000 would be permitted to wander throughout the fairgrounds, delivering speeches to whomever they wanted, about whatever they wanted. Moreover, because this right does not rest on Sankirtan or any other religious principle, it can be exercised by every political candidate, partisan advocate, and common citizen who has paid the price of admission. All share the identical right to move peripatetically and speak freely throughout the fairgrounds.

Because of Rule 6.05, however, as soon as a proselytizing member of ISKCON hands out a free copy of the Bhagavad-Gita to an interested listener, or a political candidate distributes his campaign brochure to a potential voter, he becomes subject to arrest and removal from the fairgrounds. This constitutes a significant restriction on First Amendment rights. By prohibiting distribution of literature outside the booths, the fair officials sharply limit the number of fairgoers to whom the proselytizers and candidates can communicate their messages. Only if a fairgoer affirmatively seeks out such information by approaching a booth does Rule 6.05 fully permit potential communicators to exercise their First Amendment rights.

In support of its crowd control justification, the state contends that if fairgoers are permitted to distribute literature, large crowds will gather, blocking traffic lanes and causing safety problems. But the state has failed to provide any support for these assertions. It has made no showing that relaxation of its booth rule would create additional disorder in a fair that is already characterized by the robust and unrestrained participation of hundreds of thousands of wandering fairgoers. If fairgoers can make speeches, engage in face-to-face proselytizing, and buttonhole prospective supporters, they can surely distribute literature to members of their audience without significantly adding to the state's asserted crowd control problem. The record is devoid of any evidence that the 125-acre fairgrounds could not accommodate peripatetic distributors of literature just as easily as it now accommodates peripatetic speechmakers and proselytizers.

Relying on a general, speculative fear of disorder, the State of Minnesota has placed a significant restriction on respondents' ability to exercise core First Amendment rights. This restriction is not narrowly drawn to advance the state's interests, and for that reason is unconstitutional.

Justice Blackmun, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

COMMENT

Heffron held that the restriction by a state entity on distribution, sales, and solicitation activities to a fixed site was a permissible time, place, and manner regulation. What are the characteristics of a valid time, place, and manner regulation?

Justice White identifies four such characteristics: (1) the restriction cannot be based on either the content or subject matter of the speech. (2) A valid time, place, and manner regulation must serve a significant governmental interest. (What significant governmental interest was served by the regulation in Heffron?) (3) A time, place, and manner regulation is not valid if the state could accomplish its purpose by less drastic means. (Were less drastic means open to the Minnesota State Fair?) (4) A time, place, and manner regulation is valid if alternative forums exist for the purpose of communicating the expression which is limited by the regulation in controversy. (Were such alternative forums present in the Heffron context?)

Might the Minnesota Supreme Court have prevailed had it depended on the rule of Pruneyard, see text, p. 152, rather than on the First Amendment? Why or why not?

CLARK v. COMMUNITY FOR CREATIVE NON-VIOLENCE

468 U.S. 288, 104 S.CT. 3065, 82 L.ED.2D 221 (1984).

[EDITORIAL NOTE The National Park Service sought to prohibit demonstrators from sleeping in Lafayette Park and the Mall in Washington, D.C. The demonstrators built a tent city and then, by sleeping in these places, sought to publicize the plight of the homeless. The National Park Service justified this decision by relying on its regulation prohibiting camping in certain parks. The regulation was upheld as a valid time-place-manner regulation.]

Justice WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

Expression, whether oral or written or symbolized by conduct, is subject to reasonable time, place and manner restrictions. We have often noted that restrictions of this kind are valid provided that they are justified without reference to the content of the regulated speech, that they are narrowly tailored to serve a significant governmental interest, and that they leave open ample alternative channels for communication of information. City Council v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 104 S.Ct. 2132 (1984); Heffron v. International Society for Krishna Consciousness.

It is also true that a message may be delivered by conduct that is intended to be communicative and that, in context, would reasonably be understood by the viewer to be communicative. Spence v. Washington, 418 U.S. 405 (1974) Tinker v. Des Moines School District [text, p. 81]. Symbolic expression of this kind may be forbidden or regulated if the conduct itself may constitutionally be regulated, if the regulation is narrowly drawn to further a substantial governmental interest, and if the interest is unrelated to the suppression of free speech. United States v. O'Brien [text, p. 79].

The United States submits, as it did in the Court of Appeals, that the regulation forbidding sleeping is defensible either as a time, place, or manner restriction or as a regulation of symbolic conduct. We agree with that assessment.

That sleeping, like the symbolic tents themselves, may be expressive and part of the message delivered by the demonstration does not make the ban any less a limitation on the manner of demonstrating, for reasonable time, place, and manner regulations normally have the purpose and direct effect of limiting expression but are nevertheless valid. City Council v. Taxpayers for Vincent, supra; Heffron v. International Society for Krishna Consciousness, supra; Kovacs v. Cooper. Neither does the fact that sleeping, arguendo, may be expressive conduct, rather than oral or written expression, render the sleeping prohibition any less a time, place, or manner regulation. * * * Considered as such, we have very little trouble concluding that the Park Service may prohibit overnight sleeping in the parks involved here.

The requirement that the regulation be content neutral is clearly satisfied. The courts below accepted that view, and it is not disputed here that the prohibition on camping, and on sleeping specifically, is content neutral and is not being applied because of disagreement with the message presented. Neither was the regulation faulted, nor could it be, on the ground that without overnight sleeping the plight of the homeless could not be communicated in other ways. The regulation otherwise left the demonstration intact, with its symbolic city, signs, and the presence of those who were willing to take their turns in a day-and-night vigil. Respondents do not suggest that there was, or is, any barrier to delivering to the media, or to the public by other means, the intended message concerning the plight of the homeless.

It is also apparent to us that the regulation narrowly focuses on the Government's substantial interest in maintaining the parks in the heart of our capital in an attractive and intact condition, readily available to the millions of people who wish to see and enjoy them by their presence. It is urged by respondents that if the symbolic city of tents was to be permitted and if the demonstrators did not intend to cook, dig, or engage in aspects of camping other than sleeping, the incremental benefit to the parks could not justify the ban on sleeping, which was here an expressive activity said to enhance the message concerning the plight of the poor and homeless. We cannot agree. In the first place, we seriously doubt that the First Amendment requires the Park Service to permit a demonstration in Lafayette Park and the Mall involving a 24-hour vigil and the erection of tents to accommodate 150 people. Furthermore, although we have assumed for present purposes that the sleeping banned in this case would have an expressive element, it is evident that its major value to this demonstration would be facilitative. Without a permit to sleep, it would be difficult to get the poor and homeless to participate or to be present at all. * * * The sleeping ban, if enforced, would thus effectively limit the nature, extent, and duration of the demonstration and to that extent ease the pressure on the Parks.

If the Government has a legitimate interest in ensuring that the National Parks are adequately protected, which we think it has, and if the parks would be more exposed to harm without the sleeping prohibition than with it, the ban is safe from invalidation under the First Amendment as a reasonable regulation on the manner in which a demonstration may be carried out. As in City Council v. Taxpayers for Vincent, the regulation "responds precisely to the substantive problems which legitimately concern the [Government]." 466 U.S., at 789, 104 S.Ct., at 2132.

We have difficulty, therefore, in understanding why the prohibition against camping, with its ban on sleeping overnight, is not a reasonable time, place, and manner regulation that withstands constitutional scrutiny. Surely the regulation is not unconstitutional on its face. None of its provisions appears unrelated to the ends that it was designed to serve. Nor is it any less valid when applied to prevent camping in Memorial-core parks by those who wish to demonstrate and deliver a message to the public and the central government. Damage to the parks as well as their partial inaccessibility to other members of the public can as easily result from camping by demonstrators as by non-demonstrators. In neither case must the Government tolerate it. * * * This is no more than a reaffirmation that reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions on expression are constitutionally acceptable.

Contrary to the conclusion of the Court of Appeals, the foregoing analysis demonstrates that the Park Service regulation is sustainable under the four-factor standard of United States v. O'Brien, supra, for validating a regulation of expressive conduct, which, in the last analysis is little, if any, different from the standard applied to time, place, and manner restrictions. No one contends that aside from its impact on speech a rule against camping or overnight sleeping in public parks is beyond the constitutional power of the Government to enforce. And for the reasons we have discussed above, there is a substantial government interest in conserving park property, an interest that is plainly served by, and requires for its implementation, measures such as the proscription of sleeping that are designed to limit the wear and tear on park properties. That interest is unrelated to suppression of expression.

We are unmoved by the Court of Appeals' view that the challenged regulation is unnecessary, and hence invalid, because there are less speech-restrictive alternatives that could have satisfied the government interest in preserving park lands. * * * We do not believe, however, that either United States v. O'Brien or the time, place, and manner decisions assign to the judiciary the authority to replace the Park Service as the manager of the Nation's parks or endow the judiciary with the competence to judge how much protection of park lands is wise and how that level of conservation is to be attained.

Accordingly, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is Reversed.

COMMENT

The application of a National Park no-camping regulation to prohibit demonstrators from sleeping in Lafayette Park and the Mall was deemed valid. Justice White concluded in Clark that the prohibition was valid under either the O'Brien standards, see text, p. 79, or under the standards appropriate for judging the reasonableness of time-place-manner regulation in the public forum. Justice White concluded that the O'Brien standards and the Heffron standards, see text, p. 55, were the same. Is there any problem with his conclusion?

Professor Keith Werhan believes that both O'Brien and Clark are "disturbingly insensitive to the facilitation of robust public debate." See Werhan, The O'Briening of Free Speech Methodology, 19 Ariz. State L.J. 635 at 649 (1987). Although he thinks the regulation upheld in both cases had "little impact on the degree of public debate," he sees dangers in the use of the O'Brien balancing test:

> [O'Brien] compromises the hard problems of free speech methodology by largely ignoring them. Using an operational focus on the ends and means of government regulation, the Court decides cases without assessing the speech side of the controversy. Thus, in [O'Brien] the Court ruled for the government without deciding whether symbolic conduct was protected by the first amendment; in [Clark], the Court ruled for the government without deciding whether sleep could constitute symbolic conduct. Werhan at 673.

By implication, the Heffron standards appear more sensitive to First Amendment values. Is this because O'Brien is too easily satisfied "by a legitimate governmental interest of whatever weight"? See Werhan at 651.

Boos v. Barry: Regulation of the Traditional Public Forum

Boos v. Barry, 108 S.Ct. 1157 (1988), illustrates the continuing attachment of the Court to a heightened scrutiny standard of review in the case of content-based regulation of a public forum when significantly less restrictive regulatory alternatives were available. The facts which gave rise to the case follow.

A District of Columbia law prohibited display of signs bringing foreign governments into "public odium" or "public disrepute" within 500 feet of foreign embassies. The statute also prohibited persons from congregating within 500 feet of an embassy and not dispersing when ordered to do so. Some individuals wished to carry signs critical of the governments of the Soviet Union and Nicaragua and also wished to congregate within 500 feet of those embassies. They brought a facial First Amendment challenge to these provisions. In Boos, the Court, per Justice O'Connor, held that the provision forbidding display of signs criticizing foreign governments violated the First Amendment. Justice O'Connor said the speech involved was political speech, was exercised in a traditional public forum, i.e., a public street, and, finally, that the display provision was content-based.

To the argument that the statute was not content-based because the government did not itself select between viewpoints, Justice O'Connor responded that she agreed that the provision was not viewpoint-based:

"The display clause determines which viewpoint is acceptable in a neutral fashion by looking to the policies of foreign governments." This would prevent the display clause from being "directly viewpoint-based," but it did not render the statute content-neutral. The government was enforcing a prohibition based on content against "an entire category of speech—signs and displays critical of foreign governments."

Justice O'Connor relied in this regard on Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc., 475 U.S. 41 (1986). See text, p. 677. Renton upheld a city ordinance which prohibited adult motion picture theaters from locating within 1,000 feet of any residential zone, single or multiple family dwelling, church, park, or school. The zoning ordinance in Renton was deemed to be a valid form of the place and manner regulation. Renton said the ordinance was not geared at the "content" of "adult" films but rather to the "secondary effects of such theaters on the surrounding community. Since the ordinance was not content-based, the standard appropriate for "content-neutral" time, place, and manner regulation was applicable. This standard inquired whether the ordinance served a substantial governmental interest and allowed for reasonable alternative avenues of communication. What were the secondary effects referred to in Renton? Justice O'Connor described then in Boos v. Barry. The content of the films in Renton was declared to be irrelevant to the result. The ordinance was aimed at the secondary effects of such theaters on the community: "effects that are almost unique to theaters featuring sexually explicit films, i.e., prevention of crime, maintenance of property values, and protection of residential neighborhoods."

The city of Washington, D.C. tried to defend its display of signs law prohibiting criticism of foreign governments as also aimed at a "secondary effect": the "international law obligation to shield diplomats from speech that offends their dignity." Justice O'Connor disagreed that Renton was applicable:

> Regulation that focuses on the direct impact of speech on its audience presents a different situation. Listeners' reactions to speech are not the type of "secondary effects" we referred to in Renton. The hypothetical regulation targets the direct impact of a particular category of speech, not a secondary feature that happens to be associated with that type of speech.

Justice O'Connor concluded that the "display clause is content-based." She pointed out that the city did not point to the secondary effects of picket signs in front of embassies such as congestion, interference with ingress or egress, visual clutter, or embassy security. Instead, reliance was in protecting the dignity of foreign diplomatic personnel "by sheltering them from speech that is critical of their governments." Such a justification for the display provision was focused "only on the content of the speech and the direct impact that speech has on its listeners."

Justice O'Connor concluded that as a content-based restriction on political speech in a public forum, the display provision of the District of Columbia law "must be subjected to the most exacting scrutiny":

> Thus, we have requested the State to show that the "regulation is necessary to serve a compelling state interest and that it is normally drawn to achieve that end."

Even assuming that "international law recognized a dignity interest" to the point it should be considered "sufficiently 'compelling' to support a content-based restriction on speech," the display provision was still not narrowly tailored to serve that interest. A federal statute prohibiting intimidating or harassing foreign officials or obstructing them in the course of their duties illustrated the ready availability of a significantly less restrictive alternative. This demonstrated that the display clause was not sufficiently narrowly tailored to withstand the rigors of the strict scrutiny standard.

The congregation clause of the District of Columbia statute was upheld by the Court. The clause survived an overbreadth attack. Although the text of the clause might have presented overbreadth problems because it applied "to any congregation within 500 feet of an embassy for any reason" and because it appeared "to place no limits at all on the dispersal authority of the police," the court of appeals had provided a narrowing construction which alleviated these difficulties. The court of appeals read the statute to "permit dispersal only of congregations that are directed at an embassy." It did not give the police a right to disperse for reasons having nothing to do with the embassy. Also, police discretion was narrowed by the court of appeals' reading that the statute only permitted dispersal when a threat to the security of the embassy was presented.

The Court, per Justice O'Connor, concluded that the congregation clause was not overbroad:

> So narrowed, the congregation clause withstands First Amendment overbreadth scrutiny. It does not reach a substantial amount of constitutionally protected conduct; it merely regulates the place and manner of certain demonstrations.

What about vagueness? Petitioners focused on the word "place" in the statute which was not further defined or limited. The Court found that the court of appeals had given a narrowing interpretation sufficient to withstand a vagueness attack. The statute was intended to be enforced when "normal embassy activities have been or are about to be disrupted."

Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Marshall, concurred in part and concurred in the judgment but dissented from the proposition set forth in Renton that "an otherwise content-based restriction on speech can be recast as 'content-neutral' if the restriction 'aims' at 'secondary effects' of the speech." However, Justice Brennan did agree that the display clause constituted a "content-based restriction on speech that merits strict scrutiny." Justice Brennan was particularly disturbed that the reasoning of Renton, which had arisen out of a context dealing with businesses purveying sexually explicit materials, was now, at least in dictum, being applied to political speech.

Parades and Demonstrations and the Duty to Obey the Void Judicial Order

Walker v. City of Birmingham, 388 U.S. 307 (1967), an important First Amendment case, arose out of the black civil rights protest movement of the 1960s. Eight black ministers, including the late Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., were arrested and held in contempt for leading civil rights marches in Birmingham on Easter 1963 in defiance of an ex parte injunction banning all marches, parades, sit-ins, or other demonstrations in violation of the Birmingham parade ordinance. The petitioners contended that the ordinance required a grant of permission from city administrators who had made it clear no permission would be granted. The state courts held that petitioners could not violate the injunction and later challenge its validity. The Supreme Court, per Justice Potter Stewart, affirmed the conviction, 5–4. Justices Warren, Douglas, Brennan, and Abe Fortas dissented. All but Fortas wrote a separate dissent.

The heart of the holding in Walker is that even if both the ordinance and the injunction raised substantial constitutional issues, petitioners could only successfully raise those issues by moving to modify or dissolve the injunction, not by disobeying it and then defending against contempt charges on constitutional grounds.

Justice Stewart pointed out that "this is not a case where the injunction was transparently invalid or had only a frivolous pretense to validity." While the language of the Birmingham ordinance might present substantial First Amendment questions, it could not be held invalid on its face. If petitioners, instead of proceeding without a permit, had sought a judicial decree from the state courts interpreting the parade ordinance, the Court might have offered a narrow, "saving" construction, as had the state courts in Poulos v. New Hampshire, 345 U.S. 395 (1953).

A fundamental reason for the decision in Walker appears to be that initial obedience is required of even unconstitutional court decrees, like the injunction in Walker, even though the same is not required of an unconstitutional ordinance or statute. Chief Justice Warren observed in caustic dissent in Walker that petitioners are "convicted and sent to jail because the patently unconstitutional ordinance was copied into an injunction." Further, the injunction was ex parte and unlimited as to time.

We have seen cases where the Court has held that an unconstitutional statute need not be obeyed. This is so, even where an ordinance explicitly requires a permit to engage in some form of communication. See Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U.S. 444 (1938), text, p. 39.

Justice Douglas, in his dissenting opinion, directly confronted the civil disobedience issue in Walker. An unconstitutional court decree, he said, is no less invalid than an unconstitutional statute. "It can and should be flouted in the manner of the ordinance itself." The facts of the Walker case, most of which were excluded from evidence during the hearing on contempt charges, indicated that the city officials had no intention of ever granting a permit to petitioners, said Justice Douglas. Not only was the parade ordinance probably invalid on its face, but it was enforced in a discriminatory manner to prevent civil rights advocates from exercising their right, guaranteed by the First Amendment, to assemble peacefully and petition for redress of grievances. Affirmance of contempt convictions in such a case, he concluded, could only undermine respect for law, since "[t]he 'constitutional freedom' of which the Court speaks can be won only if judges honor the Constitution."

Justice Brennan filed the third dissenting opinion in Walker. In Justice Brennan's view, the Court was faced with the collision between Alabama's interest in enforcing judicial decrees and the petitioners' First Amendment rights of speech and peaceful assembly. In such a conflict, Brennan said, the Supremacy Clause of the United States Constitution demands that the First Amendment interests be given greater weight. Furthermore, in safeguarding First Amendment rights from invalid prior restraints, the Court ought to be even more suspicious of prior restraints contained in ex parte injunctions than in "presumably carefully considered, even if hopelessly invalid," statutes. Instead, he said, the Court in Walker abandoned its protective function in the First Amendment area and threw its support to the Alabama court decree, a "devastatingly destructive weapon for suppression of cherished freedoms. * * *"

Justice Brennan also pointed to several weaknesses in the Court's argument. The Alabama decree contained no time limitation whatsoever. It was not really "temporary" at all. Secondly, the Court's insistence that petitioners challenge the injunction in court first and march later was in head-on conflict with the Court's own First Amendment doctrine that where an invalid prior restraint is imposed, freedom of speech can not be served if exercise of that freedom is forcibly deferred pending the outcome of lengthy judicial review. Brennan emphasized the factual context of the Walker case: a civil rights campaign was planned which was intended to have its climax in a series of marches on Easter weekend. To require petitioners to drop their organizing efforts and spend weeks, months, or years in state and federal courts was to blink at the realities of their situation.

Notice that despite the strong protests by the dissenting justices, the Walker majority refused to consider the parade ordinance invalid on its face. The Court's reliance on Howat v. Kansas, 258 U.S. 181 (1922), seems to indicate that even an injunction invalid on its face must be obeyed pending judicial review. If this is so, how does (or might) the Court answer the claim by the dissenting justices that such a ruling opens the door for local officials to impose prior restraint simply by incorporating unconstitutional ordinances into binding judicial decrees?

The Walker decision was 5–4. Justice Black cast a deciding vote in Walker to sustain contempt convictions in the face of the vague, overbroad, limitless injunction. Black may have considered the integrity of the judicial process, even when, as in Walker, it may have been greatly abused, to be of such a high importance that it outweighed even First Amendment interests. This point of view is in contrast with Justice Douglas's statement that judges, no less than legislators or administrators, must honor the Constitution.

Walker v. Birmingham raises, in a First Amendment context, the issue of whether an order of a lower court which almost certainly will be reversed on appeal must be obeyed by the parties subject to it until the order is set aside by a higher court. This is an issue of great significance to the journalist. In United States v. Dickinson, 465 F.2d 496 (5th Cir. 1972), cert. den. 414 U.S. 979 (1973), a federal court of appeals upheld a criminal contempt citation for violation of a "gag" rule imposed by a federal district judge despite the appeals court's view that the "gag" was a violation of the First Amendment. The court of appeals relied on Walker for its decision that even an unconstitutional court order must be obeyed until it is reversed. See discussion of the Dickinson case in this text, p. 409.

Some question now exists as to whether all the federal courts of appeal share the view espoused by the Fifth Circuit in Dickinson. The United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit has taken a more reasonable view vis-à-vis press publication of invalid "gag" orders. In re Providence Journal Co., 820 F.2d 1354 (1st Cir. 1987). In Providence Journal, the court suggested a publisher would not be punished for criminal contempt if he violated a lower court gag order, as long as he made a good faith effort to obtain emergency relief from the appellate court:

> If timely access to the appellate court is not available or if timely decision is not forthcoming, the publisher may then proceed to publish and challenge the constitutionality of the order in the contempt proceedings.

The Supreme Court granted certiorari in the case but dismissed the writ. U.S. v. Providence Journal Co., 108 S.Ct. 1502 (1988).

Two years after it decided Walker v. City of Birmingham, the Supreme Court considered a different case arising out of the identical facts. The case was Shuttlesworth v. City of Birmingham, 394 U.S. 147 (1969). This time, the question was whether Rev. Walker and Rev. Shuttlesworth, et al., could be convicted of violating Birmingham's parade ordinance, a part of the city's general code. Petitioners had knowingly violated the ordinance, but they claimed, as they had in Walker, that their action was not punishable because the ordinance itself was invalid on its face and discriminatorily applied to deny First Amendment rights. Nevertheless, they were found guilty of violating the parade ordinance and received stiff jail sentences (Rev. Shuttlesworth, for instance, was sentenced to 138 days at hard labor.)

A state appeals court reversed, holding that the parade ordinance was an unconstitutional prior restraint upon First Amendment rights since it granted city officials unlimited discretion to grant or deny parade permits. However, the Alabama Supreme Court reinstated the convictions by providing a curative gloss to the parade ordinance. The parade ordinance, said the state supreme court, did not confer discretionary powers upon local officials to withhold parade permits on a discriminatory basis. Rather, it directed them merely to regulate use of the public streets consistent with the goal of insuring public access to public throughways.

This, despite the fact that the parade ordinance provided that the city commission could deny a permit whenever it determined that "the public welfare, peace, safety, health, decency, good order, morals or convenience require." The process by which this language was narrowed by the Supreme Court of Alabama to make the parade ordinance a traffic measure received a backhanded compliment from Justice Stewart in his opinion for the Court: "It is true that in affirming the petitioner's conviction in the present case, the Supreme Court of Alabama performed a remarkable job of plastic surgery upon the face of the ordinance."

By transforming the parade ordinance into a traffic-management ordinance, the Alabama court attempted to avert constitutional problems in much the same way that the New Hampshire court had done in Poulos v. New Hampshire, 345 U.S. 395 (1953). The Alabama court also acted on the suggestion of the Court in Walker v. City of Birmingham that a narrow interpretation of the parade ordinance might save it from First Amendment attack. However, even the strenuous effort of the Alabama court to rescue the Birmingham ordinance from constitutional infirmity failed to persuade the Supreme Court to uphold the convictions when Shuttlesworth came up for review.

Justice Stewart speaking for the Court, in an interesting twist from his opinion in Walker, first pointed out that the parade ordinance was, as written, invalid on its face. This was precisely the contention which he had rejected in Walker. Now, however, Justice Stewart held:

> There can be no doubt that the Birmingham ordinance, as it was written, conferred upon the city commission virtually unbridled and absolute power [to control the issuance of permits for marches or demonstrations in the city]. * * * This ordinance * * * fell squarely within the ambit of the many decisions of this Court over the last 30 years, holding that a law subjecting the exercise of First Amendment freedoms > to the prior restraint of a license, without narrow, objective, and definite standards to guide the licensing authority, is unconstitutional.

Justice Stewart next dealt with the state's argument that that standard is not applicable where the regulation under challenge deals with speech plus, i.e., the use of public streets. Although recognizing the state interest in regulating the use of its public ways, the Court ruled that a licensing system implementing that interest must adhere to constitutional standards. An overbroad, vague licensing scheme, vesting local officials with limitless discretion over the use of city streets, does not square with those standards even though speech plus is involved.

The real question, said Stewart, was whether the parade ordinance was to be obeyed in 1963, notwithstanding the gloss which was put upon the ordinance by the state court four years later.

The Court concluded that Birmingham's parade ordinance, as it was implemented and enforced by Birmingham officials in 1963, was invalid and a denial of First Amendment rights. Petitioners were, therefore, entitled to ignore the parade ordinance and could not be criminally prosecuted for that decision. Justice Stewart described the ministers' unsuccessful efforts to obtain a parade permit from adamant city officials.

> The petitioner was clearly given to understand that under no circumstance would he and his group be permitted to demonstrate in Birmingham, not that a demonstration would be approved if a time and place were selected that would minimize traffic problems. * * * [I]t is evident that the ordinance was administered so as * * * "to deny or unwarrantedly abridge the right of assembly and the opportunities for the communication of thought * * * immemorially associated with resort to public places."

Because Birmingham city officials interpreted and implemented the parade ordinance in a fashion consistent with its broad discretionary language, Rev. Shuttlesworth was justified in taking them at their word and acting accordingly. Notwithstanding the state supreme court's effort to save the parade ordinance, it was unconstitutional in 1963, and petitioners could not be punished for violating it under those circumstances.

Justice John Marshall Harlan's concurring opinion took issue with what he called the "seeds of mischief" contained in the opinion of the Court.

The important point, said Harlan, was whether the petitioners could have had a prompt judicial remedy under the special circumstances of their civil rights protest. Hearkening back to Justice Frankfurter's concurring opinion in Poulos, Justice Harlan noted that here, as contrasted with Poulos, a timely remedy to force issuance of the parade permit was probably out of the question. Had petitioners sought a writ of mandamus to require the Birmingham City Commission to issue a parade permit, they could not have succeeded in time for the Easter demonstrations, and under Alabama law there is no provision for expeditious review of such a petition.

It was not enough, Justice Harlan argued, that petitioner should rely merely upon the attitude of a local official and his interpretation of the parade ordinance. If a speedy and effective remedy had been available, petitioners would have been obligated to pursue that remedy before breaking the law, Harlan said. But in this case, on these facts, such a course would have blocked the exercise of First Amendment rights with no promise of effective relief. It was therefore excused, and the convictions could not stand.

Unlike Justice Stewart and the rest of the Court, Justice Harlan was not prepared to concede that the principle of cases such as Lovell v. Griffin, text, p. 39, involving licensing of pure speech, should be extended to cover ordinances such as the Birmingham parade statute, which regulated speech plus conduct. Regulation of the use of city streets was "a particularly important state interest." Even if such a regulation were deemed invalid on its face or as applied, perhaps citizens should be less free to ignore that regulation entirely than they would be to ignore an ordinance regulating pure speech.

In Shuttlesworth, the Supreme Court vindicated at least some of the points advanced by the four dissenters in Walker. The Birmingham parade ordinance was unconstitutional on its face and as applied—a decision the Court had refused to make in Walker just two years earlier. In reversing the petitioners' convictions for violating the parade ordinance, the Court did precisely what Chief Justice Warren had envisioned: it ruled that punishment for violating the ordinance could not stand, but (because of Walker) disobedience to the command of an identical prohibition, in a court decree, could be punished as contempt. In Shuttlesworth, Justice Stewart contended in a brief footnote that "[t]he legal and constitutional issues involved in the Walker case were quite different from those involved here." How would you support or take issue with that assertion?

In Walker, Chief Justice Warren dissented, pointing out that the Birmingham ordinance on its face directed local officials to refuse parade permits on any number of broad, discretionary, vague grounds. Thus, a state court could "save" the Birmingham ordinance only "by repealing some of its language." Is this in fact what the Alabama Supreme Court did in Shuttlesworth?

Picketing, Handbilling, and State Action: The Collision Points Between Freedom of Expression and Property Rights

THORNHILL v. ALABAMA

310 U.S. 88, 60 S.CT. 736, 84 L.ED. 1093 (1940).

[EDITORIAL NOTE Thornhill was a First Amendment case which arose out of a local labor dispute at an Alabama factory. Thornhill, a union organizer, was arrested and convicted of a misdemeanor for violating a state antipicketing law which made it a crime for:

>  * * any person or persons * * * without a just cause or legal excuse therefore, [to] go near to or loiter about the * * * place of business of any other person, firm, corporation, [etc.] * * * for the purpose, or with the intent of influencing, or inducing other persons not to trade with, buy from, sell to, have business dealings with or be employed by [that business] * * * State Code of 1923, § 3448.*

The same section also prohibited picketing under the same circumstances.

Thornhill's conviction was upheld by the Alabama courts. The United States Supreme Court reversed his conviction and held the right to picket protected by the First Amendment. Justice James McReynolds was the lone dissenter.

Thornhill was arrested when, as part of a small picket line, he peacefully advised would-be strikebreakers to go home and not to cross the picket line. The plant where this took place was part of a company town in which most plant employees lived. The picket line was on private property, as was most of the town.]

Justice MURPHY delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * *

* * * The existence of such a statute, which readily lends itself to harsh and discriminatory enforcement by local prosecuting officials, against particular groups deemed to merit their displeasure, results in a continuous and pervasive restraint on all freedom of discussion that might reasonably be regarded as within its purview. It is not any less effective or, if the restraint is not permissible, less pernicious than the restraint on freedom of discussion imposed by the threat of censorship. An accused, after arrest and conviction under such a statute, does not have to sustain the burden of demonstrating that the State could not constitutionally have written a different and specific statute covering his activities as disclosed by the charge and the evidence introduced against him.

* * *

The vague contours of the term "picket" are nowhere delineated. Employees or others, accordingly, may be found to be within the purview of the term and convicted for engaging in activities identical with those proscribed by the first offense. In sum, whatever the means used to publicize the facts of a labor dispute, whether by printed sign, by pamphlet, by word of mouth or otherwise, all such activity without exception is within the inclusive prohibition of the statute so long as it occurs in the vicinity of the scene of the dispute.

* * * We think that Section 3448 is invalid on its face.

In the circumstances of our times the dissemination of information concerning the facts of a labor dispute must be regarded as within that area of free discussion that is guaranteed by the Constitution. * * * Free discussion concerning the conditions in industry and the causes of labor disputes appears to us indispensable to the effective and intelligent use of the processes of popular government to shape the destiny of modern industrial society. * * *

The range of activities proscribed by Section 3448, whether characterized as picketing or loitering or otherwise, embraces nearly every practicable, effective means whereby those interested—including the employees directly affected—may enlighten the public on the nature and causes of a labor dispute. The safeguarding of these means is essential to the securing of an informed and educated public opinion with respect to a matter which is of public concern. It may be that effective exercise of the means of advancing public knowledge may persuade some of those reached to refrain from entering into advantageous relations with the business establishment which is the scene of the dispute. Every expression of opinion on matters that are important has the potentiality of inducing action in the interests of one rather than another group in society. But the group in power at any moment may not impose penal sanctions on peaceful and truthful discussion of matters of public interest merely on a showing that others may thereby be persuaded to take action inconsistent with its interests. Abridgment of the liberty of such discussion can be justified only where the clear danger of substantive evils arises under circumstances affording no opportunity to test the merits of ideas by competition for acceptance in the market of public opinion. We hold that the danger of injury to an industrial concern is neither so serious nor so imminent as to justify the sweeping proscription of freedom of discussion embodied in Section 3448.

COMMENT

If Alabama desired to guard against violent picketing or harassment of potential customers by union threats, the state could under the First Amendment draft a statute designed to meet such situations. The Alabama antipicketing law made no attempt to consider factors which would distinguish the Thornhill picket line from other, more dangerous situations, nor did it consider the number of people gathered at the picket line, the potentiality of violence and harm to passersby, the accuracy of the information which the union was imparting to the public, and the nature of the union dispute.

The statute covered all situations indiscriminately. Since some activities covered by the statute were unquestionably examples of peaceful expression, the statute in its broad sweep could not stand. Enforcement of the statute only in special cases could not repair the fatal defect which the statute bore on its face. And selective enforcement with its potential for discrimination poses a special threat to First Amendment freedom.

It is a principle of due process adjudication that criminal statutes should be drawn so that the class affected by them is sufficiently apprised of the conduct expected of it in order that it may comply with the statute and avoid its sanction. This principle is sometimes called the "vagueness" doctrine. See generally, Amsterdam, The Void for Vagueness Doctrine, 109 U.Pa.L.Rev. 67 (1960).

Thornhill demonstrates the use of a related constitutional principle: the doctrine of overbreadth. A statute is defectively overbroad when it reaches and proscribes activities which are constitutionally protected as well as activities which are not. See text, p. 51. The statute in Thornhill is also defectively vague. Note that the Court observed that the term "picket" was inadequately defined. Vagueness is a major First Amendment doctrine, but it has its roots in the notice requirements of procedural due process. If people do not know what is expected of them, it is not fair to punish them. Furthermore, if they do not know what is expected of them, they may fear to engage in the vigorous exercise of First Amendment rights. In a sense, the First Amendment concern to prevent restraints which inhibit freedom of expression and the concern for fairness which is implemented by the constitutional doctrine of procedural due process coalesce in the vagueness doctrine. A Roman law maxim was "Nulla poena sine lege" (no penalty without a law). Does this ancient legal concept help explain the vagueness doctrine? Is it possible for a statute to be defectively overbroad but not overly vague?

The thrust of Thornhill was that the antipicketing section of the Alabama Code was overly broad but that a more narrowly drawn statute might pass constitutional muster under the First Amendment:

> We are not now concerned with picketing en masse or otherwise conducted which might occasion such imminent and aggravated danger to state interests in preventing breaches of the peace * * * as to justify a statute narrowly drawn to cover the precise situation giving rise to the danger.

But the Alabama antipicketing law made no attempt to balance the First Amendment against any state interest. The valuable contribution of Thornhill to First Amendment law was that it made clear, by extending First Amendment protection to picketing, that nonverbal communication merited First Amendment protection, albeit in a nonabsolute form.

Picketing, Private Property, and the Public Forum: The State Action Problem

In Amalgamated Food Employees Local 590 v. Logan Valley Plaza, Inc., 391 U.S. 308 (1968), the Supreme Court refused, per Justice Thurgood Marshall, to enjoin informational picketing in a private shopping center. Logan Valley, therefore, subjected privately owned property to First Amendment obligation as the Supreme Court had done only once before in Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501 (1946). In Marsh, the exercise of First Amendment rights had been recognized in a company-owned town where alternative means of communication for the matter to be communicated were not available. Speaking for the Court in Logan Valley, Justice Marshall said:

> All we decide here is that because the shopping center serves as the community business block "and is freely accessible and open to the people in the area and those passing through," Marsh v. State of Alabama, 326 U.S., at 508, the state may not delegate the power through the use of its trespass laws, wholly to exclude those members of the public wishing to exercise their First Amendment rights on the premises in a manner and for a purpose generally consonant with the use to which the property is actually put.

The classic idea of American constitutionalism is the view that the constitution runs against government. If one relies on the Bill of Rights directly, one encounters the language, for example, of the First Amendment ("Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press * * * "). If, on the other hand, one relies on the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, one meets the following language: " * * * nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." This introduces the need for "State action" if a Fourteenth Amendment violation is to be found. This also explains the effort of the Supreme Court in both Marsh and Amalgamated to view the company-town street and the shopping center parking lot as "quasi-public." (Why is the Court reluctant to come right out and say that First Amendment considerations apply to private property?)

Private concentrations of power, such as the nationwide chains of daily newspapers (most papers are located in one newspaper towns), and the networks which supply the programming for much of radio and television broadcasting throughout the country are, therefore, in the classic view, immune from constitutional obligation altogether. This idea, as applied to the privately owned media, was given renewed life in CBS v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. 94 (1973). See text, p. 511.

But decisions like Marsh and Amalgamated suggest that the capacity of "private governments" to elude constitutional obligation to provide freedom of expression is not infinite after all. The Marsh case in 1946 was a surprising breakthrough, but, in a sense, it was ahead of its time. It never blossomed forth into an important or pioneering constitutional doctrine in any meaningful way until the decision of the Amalgamated Food Employees case in 1968.

For Justice Black, the First Amendment is meant to state what government cannot do, not what a private individual or corporation must do. As a matter of history this view is probably accurate. As a matter of making the goals of freedom of expression and community enlightenment a reality, the question is: does such an approach any longer have contemporary relevance? See Justice Douglas's concurring opinion in CBS v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. 94 (1973). See this text, p. 511.

In Justice Marshall's opinion for the Court in Amalgamated, the following observations appear:

> The picketing carried on by petitioners was directed specifically at patrons of the Weis Market located within the shopping center and the message sought to be conveyed to the public concerned the manner in which that particular market was being operated. We are, therefore, not called upon to consider whether respondents' property rights could, consistently with the First Amendment, justify a bar on picketing which was not thus directly related in its purpose to the use to which the shopping center property was being put.

Did the distinction Justice Marshall attempted to draw between protest picketing where the site of the protest is related to the object of the protest and where the site is unrelated to the object of the protest make sense? Note that the Supreme Court in Amalgamated Food Employees did not rule on the constitutional significance of this distinction.

Lloyd Corp., Limited v. Tanner, 407 U.S. 551 (1972), answered the question which Justice Marshall raised but did not answer in Amalgamated Food Employees: Could the owner of a private shopping center prohibit protest in the form of distribution of handbills on his premises when the object of the protest (hostility to the Vietnam War) did not have a direct relationship to the shopping center? The Supreme Court in Lloyd Corp. held that there must be a relationship between the object of the protest and the site of the protest before there can be any right to use private property for purposes of free expression.

In Lloyd Corp., the four Nixon appointees to the Supreme Court, Powell, Blackmun, Rehnquist, and Burger, joined with Kennedy appointee, White, to hold that there must be a relationship between object and site of the protest. The Lloyd Corp. case marks a retreat from what had previously been a steady extension by the courts of the state action concept to the exercise of First Amendment rights on private property.

In Amalgamated Food Employees, Justice Marshall, speaking for the Court, had made a fairly radical statement: "[P]roperty that is privately owned may at least, for First Amendment purposes, be treated as though it were publicly held." The Lloyd Corp. case took much of the force out of this statement. It is true that Logan Valley was not reversed in Lloyd Corp., and that the Court professed allegiance to the doctrine of Amalgamated Food Employees insofar as, under its facts, it authorized the exercise of First Amendment rights on private property, so long as the exercise of those rights related to the site of the protest. Nevertheless, the concept that First Amendment obligations only run to governmental institutions received new vigor as a result of the Lloyd Corp. case. Consider the following analysis of the Lloyd Corp. case:

> * * * [F]ree expression is now likely to be considered less important than whether the site chosen (for its exercise) is private or public property. The majority of the Court denied that the property of a large shopping center is "open to the public" in the same way as is the "business district" of a city, and that a member of the public could exercise the same rights of free expression in a shopping mall that he could in "similar public facilities in the streets of a city or town." Barron, Freedom Of The Press For Whom? 106 (1973).

The Lloyd case left the Logan Valley case just barely alive. However, in Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507 (1976), the Supreme Court overruled Logan Valley.

The Hudgens Court buried Justice Marshall's attempted distinction in Logan Valley between situations where the object of the protest was related to the site and situations where the object of the protest was unrelated to the site. The key to understanding the decision of the Court in Hudgens appears to be that First Amendment obligation does not run to private property. As the Hudgens Court conceived it, if the fact that a particular protest was related to the site of protest imposed First Amendment obligations on the owner of the site, then First Amendment determinations were being made on the basis of analyzing the content of the protest. The Court proclaimed that First Amendment adjudication had to be content-neutral.

In Hudgens, the Court, in order to maintain a content-neutral approach to the First Amendment, approved a prohibition by the owner of a shopping center against labor union picketing on its premises Professor Redish has observed that "the equality principle and the values of free expression conflict." Why? Consider the following:

> Those with greater resources and more power will invariably possess greater access to the media, and therefore to the public, than will those less well situated. These factors may be cited as reasons why a seemingly neutral restriction on picketing should in reality be found to discriminate (and, therefore, constitute a violation of the equality principle). Those with greater resources and power do not need to picket to express their views; those lacking such advantages do. But it would be absurd to think that allowing individuals to picket produces anything approaching equality.

See Redish, The Content Distinction in First Amendment Analysis, 34 Harv.L.Rev. 113 at 138 (1981).

Do you think Marsh v. Alabama, text, p. 68, survives Hudgens? Probably Marsh does survive Hudgens since the Hudgens Court relied on Justice Black's dissent in Logan Valley. In Logan Valley, Justice Black distinguished Marsh, a decision which he had authored, on the ground that in Marsh, unlike the shopping center situations, the private property involved was truly quasi-public in that there the company town had "taken all the attributes of a town."

In a conflict between property rights and the exercise of First Amendment rights, shouldn't the edge be given to the exercise of First Amendment rights? Does the Hudgens decision reflect the new deference shown to property values as against free expression values on the part of the Burger Court—at least as compared to the Warren Court?

A Logan Valley-type response to whether private property can be used as a public response still endures in California on the basis of the state constitutional guarantee of freedom of expression. See PruneYard Shopping Center v. Robins, text, p. 152.

CAREY v. BROWN

447 U.S. 455, 100 S.CT. 2286, 65 L.ED.2D 263 (1980).

Justice BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

At issue in this case is the constitutionality under the First and Fourteenth Amendments of a state statute that bars all picketing of residences or dwellings, but exempts from its prohibition "the peaceful picketing of a place of employment involved in a labor dispute."

On September 7, 1977, several of the appellees, all of whom are members of a civil rights organization entitled the Committee Against Racism, participated in a peaceful demonstration on the public sidewalk in front of the home of Michael Bilandic, then Mayor of Chicago, protesting his alleged failure to support the busing of school children to achieve racial integration. They were arrested and charged with Unlawful Residential Picketing in violation of Ill.Rev.Stat., ch. 38, § 21.1–2, which provides:

> It is unlawful to picket before or about the residence or dwelling of any person, except when the residence or dwelling is used as a place of business. However, this article does not apply to a person peacefully picketing his own residence or dwelling and does not prohibit the peaceful picketing of a place of employment involved in a labor dispute or the place of holding a meeting or assembly on premises commonly used to discuss subjects of general public interest.

Appellees pleaded guilty to the charge and were sentenced to periods of supervision ranging from 6 months to a year.

In April 1978, appellees commenced this lawsuit in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, seeking a declaratory judgment that the Illinois Residential Picketing Statute is unconstitutional on its face and as applied, and an injunction prohibiting appellants—various state, county, and city officials—from enforcing the statute.

* * * [T]his Court has had occasion to consider the constitutionality of an enactment selectively proscribing peaceful picketing on the basis of the placard's message. Police Department of Chicago v. Mosley [408 U.S. 92 (1972)], arose out of a challenge to a Chicago ordinance that prohibited picketing in front of any school other than one "involved in a labor dispute." We held that the ordinance violated the Equal Protection Clause because it impermissibly distinguished between labor picketing and all other peaceful picketing without any showing that the latter was "clearly more disruptive" than the former. [W]e find the Illinois Residential Picketing Statute at issue in the present case constitutionally indistinguishable from the ordinance invalidated in Mosley.

There can be no doubt that in prohibiting peaceful picketing on the public streets and sidewalks in residential neighborhoods, the Illinois statute regulates expressive conduct that falls within the First Amendment's preserve.

Nor can it be seriously disputed that in exempting from its general prohibition only the "peaceful picketing of a place of employment involved in a labor dispute," the Illinois statute discriminates between lawful and unlawful conduct based upon the content of the demonstrator's communications. On its face, the act accords preferential treatment to the expression of views on one particular subject; information about labor disputes may be freely disseminated, but discussion of all other issues is restricted. The permissibility of residential picketing under the Illinois statute is thus dependent solely on the nature of the message being conveyed.

In these critical respects, then, the Illinois statute is identical to the ordinance in Mosley, and it suffers from the same constitutional infirmities. When government regulation discriminates among speech-related activities in a public forum, the Equal Protection Clause mandates that the legislation be finely tailored to serve substantial state interests, and the justifications offered for any distinctions it draws must be carefully scrutinized. Yet here, under the guise of preserving residential privacy, Illinois has flatly prohibited all nonlabor picketing even though it permits labor picketing that is equally likely to intrude on the tranquility of the home.

Moreover, it is the content of the speech that determines whether it is within or without the statute's blunt prohibition. What we said in Mosley has equal force in the present case:

> Necessarily, then, under the Equal Protection Clause, not to mention the First Amendment itself, government may not grant the use of a forum to people whose views it finds acceptable, but deny use to those wishing to express less favored or more controversial views. And it may not select which issues are worth discussing or debating in public facilities. There is an "equality of status in the field of ideas," and government must afford all points of view an equal opportunity to be heard. Once a forum is opened up to assembly or speaking by some groups, government may not prohibit others from assembling or speaking on the basis of what they intend to say. Selective exclusions from a public forum may not be based on content alone, and may not be justified by reference to content alone.

Appellants nonetheless contend that this case is distinguishable from Mosley. They argue that the state interests here are especially compelling and particularly well-served by a statute that accords differential treatment to labor and nonlabor picketing.

We explore in turn each of these interests, and the manner in which they are said to be furthered by this statute.

Appellants explain that whereas the Chicago ordinance sought to prevent disruption of the schools, concededly a "substantial" and "legitimate" governmental concern, the Illinois statute was enacted to ensure privacy in the home, a right which appellants view as paramount in our constitutional scheme. For this reason, they contend that the same content-based distinctions held invalid in the Mosley context may be upheld in the present case.

We find it unnecessary, however, to consider whether the state's interest in residential privacy outranks its interest in quiet schools in the hierarchy of societal values. For even the most legitimate goal may not be advanced in a constitutionally impermissible manner. And though we might agree that certain state interests may be so compelling that where no adequate alternatives exist a content-based distinction—if narrowly drawn—would be a permissible way of furthering those objectives, this is not such a case.

First, the generalized classification which the statute draws suggests that Illinois itself has determined that residential privacy is not a transcendent objective: While broadly permitting all peaceful labor picketing notwithstanding the disturbances it would undoubtedly engender, the statute makes no attempt to distinguish among various sorts of nonlabor picketing on the basis of the harms they would inflict on the privacy interest. The apparent over- and under-inclusiveness of the statute's restriction would seem largely to undermine appellants' claim that the prohibition of all nonlabor picketing can be justified by reference to the state's interest in maintaining domestic tranquility.

More fundamentally, the exclusion for labor picketing cannot be upheld as a means of protecting residential privacy for the simple reason that nothing in the content-based labor-nonlabor distinction has any bearing whatsoever on privacy. Appellants can point to nothing inherent in the nature of peaceful labor picketing that would make it any less disruptive of residential privacy than peaceful picketing on issues of broader social concern. Standing alone, then, the state's asserted interest in promoting the privacy of the home is not sufficient to save the statute.

The second important objective advanced by appellants in support of the statute is the state's interest in providing special protection for labor protests. The central difficulty with this argument is that it forthrightly presupposes that labor picketing is more deserving of First Amendment protection than are public protests over other issues, particularly the important economic, social, and political subjects which these appellees wish to demonstrate. We reject that proposition.

Appellants' final contention is that the statute can be justified by some combination of the preceding objectives. This argument is fashioned on two different levels. In its elemental formulation, it posits simply that a distinction between labor and nonlabor picketing is uniquely suited to furthering the legislative judgment that residential privacy should be preserved to the greatest extent possible without also compromising the special protection owing to labor picketing. In short, the statute is viewed as a reasonable attempt to accommodate the competing rights of the homeowner to enjoy his privacy and the employee to demonstrate over labor disputes. But this attempt to justify the statute hinges on the validity of both of these goals, and we have already concluded that the latter—the desire to favor one form of speech over all others—is illegitimate.

The second and more complex formulation of appellants' position characterizes the statute as a carefully drafted attempt to prohibit that picketing which would impinge on residential privacy while permitting that picketing which would not. In essence, appellants assert that the exception for labor picketing does not contravene the State's interest in preserving residential tranquility because of the unique character of a residence that is a "place of employment." By "inviting" a worker into his home and converting that dwelling into a place of employment, the argument goes, the resident has diluted his entitlement to total privacy.

The flaw in this argument is that it proves too little. Numerous types of peaceful picketing other than labor picketing would have but a negligible impact on privacy interests, and numerous other actions of a homeowner might constitute "nonresidential" uses of his property and would thus serve to vitiate the right to residential privacy.

We therefore conclude the appellants have not successfully distinguished Mosley. We are not to be understood to imply, however, that residential picketing is beyond the reach of uniform and nondiscriminatory regulation. For the right to communicate is not limitless.

Preserving the sanctity of the home, the one retreat to which men and women can repair to escape from the tribulations of their daily pursuits, is surely an important value. Our decisions reflect no lack of solicitude for the right of an individual "to be let alone" in the privacy of the home, "sometimes the last citadel of the tired, the weary, and the sick." The State's interest in protecting the well-being, tranquility, and privacy of the home is certainly of the highest order in a free and civilized society.

" 'The crucial question, however, is whether [Illinois' statute] advances that objective in a manner consistent with the command of the Equal Protection Clause.' Reed v. Reed, 404 U.S. [71], 76 (1971)." And because the statute discriminates among pickets based on the subject matter of their expression, the answer must be "No."

Justice REHNQUIST, with whom the Chief Justice and Justice Blackmun join, dissenting.

The complete language of the statute, set out accurately in the text of the Court's opinion, reveals a legislative scheme quite different from that described by the Court in its narrative paraphrasing of the enactment.

The statute provides that residential picketing is prohibited, but goes on to exempt four categories of residences from this general ban. First, if the residence is used as a "place of business" all peaceful picketing is allowed. Second, if the residence is being used to "hold[] a meeting or assembly on premises commonly used to discuss subjects of general public interest" all peaceful picketing is allowed. Third, if the residence is also used as a "place of employment" which is involved in a labor dispute, labor-related picketing is allowed. Finally, the statute provides that a resident is entitled to picket his own home. Thus it is clear that information about labor disputes may not be "freely disseminated" since labor picketing is restricted to a narrow category of residences. And Illinois has not "flatly prohibited all nonlabor picketing" since it allows nonlabor picketing at residences used as a place of business, residences used as public meeting places, and at an individual's own residence.

Only through this mischaracterization of the Illinois statute may the Court attempt to fit this case into the Mosley rule prohibiting regulation on the basis of "content alone." In contrast, the principal determinant of a person's right to picket a residence in Illinois is not content, as the Court suggests, but rather the character of the residence sought to be picketed. Content is relevant only in one of the categories established by the legislature.

The cases appropriate to the analysis therefore are those establishing the limits on a state's authority to impose time, place, and manner restrictions on speech activities. Under this rubric, even taking into account the limited content distinction made by the statute, Illinois has readily satisfied its constitutional obligation to draft statutes in conformity with First Amendment and equal protection principles. In fact, the very statute which the Court today cavalierly invalidates has been hailed by commentators as "an excellent model" of legislation achieving a delicate balance among rights to privacy, free expression, and equal protection. See Kamin, Residential Picketing and the First Amendment, 61 Nw.U.L.Rev. 177, 207 (1966); Comment, 34 U.Chi.L.Rev. 106, 139 (1966). The state legislators of the nation will undoubtedly greet today's decision with nothing less than exasperation and befuddlement. Time after time, the states have been assured that they may properly promote residential privacy even though free expression must be reduced. To be sure, our decisions have adopted a virtual laundry list of "Don'ts" that must be adhered to in the process. Heading up that list of course is the rule that legislatures must curtail free expression through the "least restrictive means" consistent with the the accomplishment of their purpose, and they must avoid standards which are either vague or capable of discretionary application. But somewhere, the Court says in these cases (with a reassuring pat on the head of the legislature) there is the constitutional pot of gold at the end of the rainbow of litigation.

Here, whether Illinois has drafted such a statute, avoiding an outright ban on all residential picketing, avoiding reliance on any vague or discretionary standards, and permitting categories of permissible picketing activity at residences where the state has determined the resident's own action have substantially reduced his interest in privacy, the Court in response confronts the state with the Catch-22 that the less-restrictive categories are constitutionally infirm under principles of equal protection. Under the Court's approach today, the state would fare better by adopting more restrictive means, a judicial incentive I had thought this Court would hesitate to afford. Either that, or uniform restrictions will be found invalid under the First Amendment and categorical exceptions found invalid under the Equal Protection Clause, with the result that speech and only speech will be entitled to protection. This can only mean that the hymns of praise in prior opinions celebrating carefully drawn statutes are no more than sympathetic clucking, and in fact the state is damned if it does and damned if it doesn't.

COMMENT

Is the statute in Carey invalid because residential picketing infringes on constitutionally protected privacy values? The statute is invalid, according to the Court, because it exempts from its general ban the peaceful picketing of a place of employment involved in a labor dispute. The Court criticized the preferential treatment by the legislature of a particular subject. Justice Rehnquist in dissent says this is not a content regulation. Why? Is it a subject category regulation?

Should a private residence ever be viewed as a public forum when picketing is the mode of expression chosen by the "speakers"?

In Frisby v. Schultz, 108 S.Ct. 2495 (1988), the Court upheld an ordinance which, as construed, completely prohibited picketing in front of a particular residence. Because of persistent picketing of a physician who performed abortions by citizens who opposed abortions, the town of Brookfield, Wisconsin enacted an ordinance that "completely bans picketing 'before or about' any residence." A facial First Amendment challenge was brought against the ordinance. The court, per Justice O'Connor, quickly held that under Carey v. Brown public streets in a residential neighborhood, even though narrow and not regularly used for public communication, constituted a traditional public forum. The antipicketing ordinance would, therefore, have to be evaluated "against the stringent standards we have established for restrictions on speech in traditional public fora."

The Supreme Court accepted the conclusion of the lower federal courts that the Brookfield ordinance was content-neutral. The relevant question then became whether the ordinance was narrowly tailored to serve a significant governmental interest and whether it left open ample alternative avenues of communication. The Court said the ordinance was capable of a narrow reading:

> General marching through residential neighborhoods, or even walking a route in front of an entire block of houses, is not prohibited by this ordinance. Accordingly, we construe the ban to be a limited one; only focused picketing taking place solely in front of a particular residence is prohibited.

Justice O'Connor reasoned that, so construed, the ordinance permitted the "more general dissemination of a message." Alternative avenues of communication remained: groups or individuals still enter neighborhoods. Proselytization on a door-to-door basis was still possible. The next question was: Did the ordinance serve a significant governmental interest? The answer to this question was clearly in the affirmative: "We find that such an ordinance is identified within the text of the ordinance itself: the protection of residential privacy." Unwilling listeners were entitled to protection within their own homes. "There simply is no right to force speech into the home of an unwilling listener."

Was the Brookfield ordinance narrowly tailored "to protect only unwilling recipients of the communications"? It was concluded that the type of focused picketing banned by the ordinance was different than a ban on handbilling. "Here, in contrast, the picketing is narrowly directed at the household not the public." Justice O'Connor explained:

> [T]he "evil" of targeted residential picketing, "the very presence of an unwelcome visitor at the home," is "created by the medium of expression itself." Accordingly, the Brookfield ordinance's complete ban of that particular medium of expression is narrowly tailored.

Justice O'Connor concluded that since the ordinance prohibited picketing, or speech, "directed primarily at those who are presumptively unwilling to receive it, the State has a substantial and justifiable interest in banning it."

Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Marshall, dissented. Although agreeing that the Court had applied the "appropriate legal tests and standards governing the question presented," Justice Brennan complained that the Court had approved an ordinance "banning significantly more speech than is necessary to achieve the government's substantial and legitimate goal." Justice Brennan explained:

> But to say that picketing may be substantially regulated is not to say that it may be prohibited in its entirety. Once size, time, volume, and the like have been controlled to ensure that the picket is no longer intrusive or coercive only speech itself remains, conveyed perhaps by a lone, silent individual, walking back and forth with a sign. Such speech, which no longer implicates the heightened governmental interest in residential privacy, is nevertheless banned by the Brookfield law. Therefore, the ordinance is not narrowly tailored.

Justice Stevens began his dissent by observing that under the ordinance, as construed, a fifth grader carrying a sign outside a Brookfield house saying "Get Well Charlie—Our Team Needs You" would be violating the ordinance. Justice Stevens contended that the ordinance was unquestionably overbroad because it banned some communication that was protected under the First Amendment. How could the overbreadth be cured? Justice Stevens responded as follows: "[I]t is a simple matter for the town to amend its ordinance and to limit the ban to conduct that unreasonably interferes with the privacy of the home and does not serve a reasonable communicative purpose."

Standards of Review and the Eclipse of "Balancing"

A year after the decision in Yates, Justice Harlan wrote the decision for the Court in Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109 (1959). The United States House of Representatives Committee on Un-American Activities was investigating Communist infiltration in education. Lloyd Barenblatt, who had been a graduate student at the University of Michigan, refused to answer questions as to whether he was or ever had been a member of the Communist party. He refused to answer any inquiry into his political beliefs on the ground of reliance on the First Amendment. For such refusal he was convicted of violation of a federal statute which makes it a misdemeanor for a witness before a congressional committee to refuse to answer any questions pertinent to the matter under inquiry. See 2 U.S.C.A. § 192. On review to the Supreme Court of the United States, Justice Harlan sustained the conviction using the "balancing" test:

> Where First Amendment rights are asserted to bar governmental interrogation, resolution of the issue always involves a balancing by the courts of the competing private and public interests at stake in the particular circumstances shown. 360 U.S. 109 at 126.

Relying on the need of Congress to inform itself in order to enact legislation and on the point that for purposes of national security, the Communist party could not be viewed as an ordinary political party, Harlan concluded for the Court that "the balance must be struck in favor of the latter, and that therefore the provisions of the First Amendment have not been offended." 360 U.S. 109 at 134 (1959). See Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178 (1957).

Justice Black dissented in Barenblatt on the ground he had asserted before that speech is absolutely protected by the express words of the First Amendment. But, in the course of his dissent, Justice Black, 360 U.S. 109 at 144–145, made a critique of the "balancing" test:

* * *

> But even assuming what I cannot assume, that some balancing is proper in this case, I feel that the Court after stating the test ignores it completely. At most it balances the right of the government to preserve itself, against Barenblatt's right to refrain from revealing Communist affiliations. Such a balance, however, mistakes the factors to be weighed. In the first place, it completely leaves out the real interest in Barenblatt's silence, the interest of the people as a whole in being able to join organizations, advocate causes and make political "mistakes" without later being subjected to governmental penalties for having dared to think for themselves. * * * It is these interests of society, rather than Barenblatt's own right to silence, which I think the Court should put on the balance against the demands of the government, if any balancing process is to be tolerated. Instead they are not mentioned, while on the other side the demands of the Government are vastly overstated and called "self preservation." * * *

* * *

Justice Black criticized Harlan's use of the "balancing" test on the ground that the wrong things were balanced. This is another way of saying that the result one gets from the "balancing" test will be determined by how one weights the scale. How useful and how objective is such a test? Assuming that Barenblatt follows any of the First Amendment approaches outlined in the various opinions in Dennis, one would suppose that Harlan's rationale bears the closest possible relationship to Justice Frankfurter's concurrence in Dennis. But Frankfurter's "balancing" test and Harlan's were really not quite the same. Harlan said the courts must balance "the competing private and public interests at stake." But Frankfurter insisted that the legislature carried the primary responsibility for such "balancing."

Is balancing still a significant doctrine in First Amendment law? Increasingly, the Supreme Court appears to be saying that legislation implicating First Amendment interests must meet a more exacting standard of review than legislation does generally. There are three standards of review now being applied by the Supreme Court today in constitutional litigation. (1) First is the traditional standard of review where legislation under constitutional attack is examined for the purpose of determining whether there is any rational basis to justify the legislation. If there is such a basis, the legislation stands. (2) Second is the intermediate standard of review whereby legislation will survive constitutional attack only if the legislation serves important governmental objectives and is substantially related to the achievement of these objectives. (3) Third is the strict scrutiny standard of review whereby legislation will survive constitutional attack only if the state can show a compelling state interest for the legislation under review. The highest type of judicial scrutiny is the strict standard of review.

For recent First Amendment cases using a heightened standard of review, see Boos v. Barry, text, p. 61 and Arkansas Writers' Project v. Ragland, text, p. 128.

The Speech-Action Dichotomy and the Problem of "Symbolic" Speech

A distinction which has been advocated as essential to an understanding of the scope of First Amendment protection is the distinction between speech and action. Out of this speech-action dichotomy has arisen the so-called "absolutist" interpretation of the First Amendment. Justice Black was the foremost judicial exponent of the "absolutist" test, although his definitions of protected speech and press were sometimes narrow, and Professor Thomas I. Emerson has been its foremost academic exponent. Professor Emerson has described the test as follows:

> The so-called "absolute" test is somewhat more unsettled in meaning than the other tests proposed, in part because its opponents have seemingly misunderstood it and in part because its supporters are not in full agreement among themselves. * * * The Test is not that all words, writing and other communications are, at all times and under all circumstances, protected from all forms of government restraint.
>
> * * *
>
> Actually, the absolute test involves two components:
>
> 1. The command of the first amendment is "absolute" in the sense that "no law" which "abridges" "the freedom of speech" is constitutionally valid. * * * [T]he point being stressed is by no means inconsequential. For it insists on focusing the inquiry upon the definition of "abridge," "the freedom of speech," and if necessary "law," rather than on a general de novo balancing of interests in each case. * * *
> 2. The absolute test includes another component. It is intended to bring a broader area of expression within the First Amendment than the other tests do.

See Emerson, Toward A General Theory of the First Amendment, 72 Yale L.J. 877 at 914–915 (1963). See generally, Emerson, The System of Freedom of Expression (1970).

Some scholars have attacked the usefulness of the speech-action dichotomy. Professor Baker has written: "Unfortunately, neither identifying protected 'expression' by determining the conduct's contribution to the purposes of the system nor by using common sense to distinguish between expression and action works." See Baker, Scope of the First Amendment Freedom of Speech, 25 U.C.L.A. L.Rev. 964 at 1010 (1978). Professor Emerson has responded in defense as follows:

> The principal objection to the expression-action dichotomy has been that, since the conduct to be protected almost always consists of both speech and action—the category to be protected cannot be defined in terms of one or the other. * * * The criticism might be justified if the attempt being made were to frame a definition in strictly literal terms of "verbal" as opposed to "nonverbal" conduct, or simply in a loose sense of "expressing" rather than "doing." The expression-action dichotomy is, of course, not that simple. It attempts to formulate a definition of the kind of conduct that merits special protection under the first amendment.

See Emerson, First Amendment Doctrine and the Burger Court, 68 Calif. L.Rev. 422 at 478 (1980).

Judicial Reaction to the Speech-Action Distinction

COHEN v. CALIFORNIA

403 U.S. 15, 91 S.CT. 1780, 29 L.ED.2D 284 (1971).

Justice HARLAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case may seem at first blush too inconsequential to find its way into our books, but the issue it presents is of no small constitutional significance.

Appellant Paul Robert Cohen was convicted in Los Angeles Municipal Court of violating that part of California Penal Code § 415 which prohibits "maliciously and willfully disturb[ing] the peace or quiet of any neighborhood or person, * * * by * * * offensive conduct. * * * " He was given 30 days' imprisonment. The facts upon which his conviction rests are detailed in the opinion of the Court of Appeal of California, Second Appellate District, as follows:

"On April 26, 1968 the defendant was observed in the Los Angeles County Courthouse in the corridor outside of Division 20 of the Municipal Court wearing a jacket bearing the words "Fuck the Draft" which were plainly visible. There were women and children present in the corridor. The defendant was arrested. The defendant testified that he wore the jacket as a means of informing the public of the depth of his feelings against the Vietnam War and the draft.

"The defendant did not engage in, nor threaten to engage in, nor did anyone as the result of his conduct in fact commit or threaten to commit any act of violence. The defendant did not make any loud or unusual noise, nor was there any evidence that he uttered any sound prior to his arrest."

In affirming the conviction the Court of Appeal held that "offensive conduct" means "behavior which has a tendency to provoke others to acts of violence or to in turn disturb the peace," and that the State had proved this element because, on the facts of this case, "[i]t was certainly reasonably foreseeable that such conduct might cause others to rise up to commit a violent act against the person of the defendant or attempt to forceably remove his jacket." 1 Cal.App.3d, at 99–100, 81 Cal.Reptr., at 506. The California Supreme Court declined review by a divided vote. * * * We now reverse.

In order to lay hands on the precise issue which this case involves, it is useful first to canvass various matters which this record does not present.

The conviction quite clearly rests upon the asserted offensiveness of the words Cohen used to convey his message to the public. The only "conduct" which the state sought to punish is the fact of communication. Thus, we deal here with a conviction resting solely upon "speech." * * *

Further, the state certainly lacks power to punish Cohen for the underlying content of the message the inscription conveyed. At least so long as there is no showing of an intent to incite disobedience to or disruption of the draft, Cohen could not, consistently with the First and Fourteenth Amendments, be punished for asserting the evident position on the inutility or immorality of the draft his jacket reflected.

Appellant's conviction, then, rests squarely upon his exercise of the "freedom of speech" protected from arbitrary governmental interference by the Constitution and can be justified, if at all, only as a valid regulation of the manner in which he exercised that freedom, not as a permissible prohibition on the substantive message it conveys. * * *

In this vein, too, however, we think it important to note that several issues typically associated with such problems are not presented here.

In the first place, Cohen was tried under a statute applicable throughout the entire state. Any attempt to support this conviction on the ground that the statute seeks to preserve an appropriately decorous atmosphere in the courthouse where Cohen was arrested must fail in the absence of any language in the statute that would have put appellant on notice that certain kinds of otherwise permissible speech or conduct would nevertheless, under California law, not be tolerated in certain places. * * *

In the second place, as it comes to us, this case cannot be said to fall within those relatively few categories of instances where prior decisions have established the power of government to deal more comprehensively with certain forms of individual expression simply upon a showing that such a form was employed. This is not, for example, an obscenity case. Whatever else may be necessary to give rise to the States' broader power to prohibit obscene expression, such expression must be, in some significant way, erotic. Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957). It cannot plausibly be maintained that this vulgar allusion to the Selective Service System would conjure up such psychic stimulation in anyone likely to be confronted with Cohen's crudely defaced jacket.

This Court has also held that the States are free to ban the simple use, without a demonstration of additional justifying circumstances, of so-called "fighting words," those personally abusive epithets which, when addressed to the ordinary citizen, are, as a matter of common knowledge, inherently likely to provoke violent reaction. Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568 (1942). While the four-letter word displayed by Cohen in relation to the draft is not uncommonly employed in a personally provocative fashion, in this instance it was clearly not "directed to the person of the hearer." Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 309 (1940). No individual actually or likely to be present could reasonably have regarded the words on appellant's jacket as a direct personal insult. Nor do we have here an instance of the exercise of the State's police power to prevent a speaker from intentionally provoking a given group to hostile reaction. Cf. Feiner v. New York, 340 U.S. 315 (1951); Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U.S. 1 (1949). There is, as noted above, no showing that anyone who saw Cohen was in fact violently aroused or that appellant intended such a result.

Finally, in arguments before this Court much has been made of the claim that Cohen's distasteful mode of expression was thrust upon unwilling or unsuspecting viewers, and that the State might therefore legitimately act as it did in order to protect the sensitive from otherwise unavoidable exposure to appellant's crude form of protest. Of course, the mere presumed presence of unwitting listeners or viewers does not serve automatically to justify curtailing all speech capable of giving offense. While this Court has recognized that government may properly act in many situations to prohibit intrusion into the privacy of the home of unwelcome views and ideas which cannot be totally banned from the public dialogue, e.g., Rowan v. United States Post Office Dept., 397 U.S. 728 (1970), we have at the same time consistently stressed that "we are often 'captives' outside the sanctuary of the home and subject to objectionable speech." The ability of government, consonant with the Constitution, to shut off discourse solely to protect others from hearing it is, in other words, dependent upon a showing that substantial privacy interests are being invaded in an essentially intolerable manner. Any broader view of this authority would effectively empower a majority to silence dissidents simply as a matter of personal predilections.

In this regard, persons confronted with Cohen's jacket were in a quite different posture than, say, those subjected to the raucous emissions of sound trucks blaring outside their residences. Those in the Los Angeles courthouse could effectively avoid further bombardment of their sensibilities simply by averting their eyes. And, while it may be that one has more substantial claim to a recognizable privacy interest when walking through a courthouse corridor than, for example, strolling through Central Park, surely it is nothing like the interest in being free from unwanted expression in the confines of one's own home. Given the subtlety and complexity of the factors involved, if Cohen's "speech" was otherwise entitled to constitutional protection, we do not think the fact that some unwilling "listeners" in a public building may have been briefly exposed to it can serve to justify this breach of the peace conviction where, as here, there was no evidence that persons powerless to avoid appellant's conduct did in fact object to it, and where that portion of the statute upon which Cohen's conviction rests evinces no concern, either on its face or as construed by the California courts, with the special plight of the captive auditor, but, instead, indiscriminately sweeps within its prohibitions all "offensive conduct" that disturbs "any neighborhood or person."

Against this background, the issue flushed by this case stands out in bold relief. It is whether California can excise, as "offensive conduct," one particular scurrilous epithet from the public discourse, either upon the theory of the court below that its use is inherently likely to cause violent reaction or upon a more general assertion that the states, acting as guardians of public morality, may properly remove this offensive word from the public vocabulary.

The rationale of the California court is plainly untenable. At most it reflects an "undifferentiated fear or apprehension of disturbance [which] is not enough to overcome the right to freedom of expression." Tinker v. Des Moines Indep. Community School Dist., 393 U.S. 503, 508 (1969). We have been shown no evidence that substantial numbers of citizens are standing ready to strike out physically at whoever may assault their sensibilities with execrations like that uttered by Cohen. There may be some persons about with such lawless and violent proclivities, but that is an insufficient base upon which to erect, consistently with constitutional values, a governmental power to force persons who wish to ventilate their dissident views into avoiding particular forms of expression. The argument amounts to little more than the self-defeating proposition that to avoid physical censorship of one who has not sought to provoke such a response by a hypothetical coterie of the violent and lawless, the states may more appropriately effectuate that censorship themselves.

Admittedly, it is not so obvious that the First and Fourteenth Amendments must be taken to disable the states from punishing public utterance of this unseemly expletive in order to maintain what they regard as a suitable level of discourse within the body politic. We think, however, that examination and reflection will reveal the shortcomings of a contrary viewpoint.

At the outset, we cannot overemphasize that, in our judgment, most situations where the state has a justifiable interest in regulating speech will fall within one or more of the various established exceptions, discussed above but not applicable here, to the usual rule that governmental bodies may not prescribe the form or content of individual expression. Equally important to our conclusion is the constitutional backdrop against which our decision must be made. The constitutional right of free expression is powerful medicine in a society as diverse and populous as ours. It is designed and intended to remove governmental restraints from the arena of public discussion, putting the decision as to what views shall be voiced largely into the hands of each of us, in the hope that use of such freedom will ultimately produce more capable citizenry and more perfect polity and in the belief that no other approach would comport with the premise of individual dignity and choice upon which our political system rests.

Against this perception of the constitutional policies involved, we discern certain more particularized considerations that peculiarly call for reversal of this conviction. First, the principle contended for by the state seems inherently boundless. How is one to distinguish this from any other offensive word? Surely the state has no right to cleanse public debate to the point where it is grammatically palatable to the most squeamish among us. Yet no readily ascertainable general principle exists for stopping short of that result were we to affirm the judgment below. For, while the particular four-letter word being litigated here is perhaps more distasteful than most others of its genre, it is nevertheless often true that one man's vulgarity is another's lyric. Indeed, we think it is largely because governmental officials cannot make principled distinctions in this area that the Constitution leaves matters of taste and style so largely to the individual.

Additionally, we cannot overlook the fact, because it is well illustrated by the episode involved here, that much linguistic expression serves a dual communicative function: it conveys not only ideas capable of relatively precise, detached explication, but otherwise inexpressible emotions as well. In fact, words are often chosen as much for their emotive as their cognitive force. We cannot sanction the view that the Constitution, while solicitous of the cognitive content of individual speech has little or no regard for that emotive function which practically speaking, may often be the more important element of the overall message sought to be communicated. * * *

Finally, and in the same vein, we cannot indulge the facile assumption that one can forbid particular words without also running a substantial risk of suppressing ideas in the process. Indeed, governments might soon seize upon the censorship of particular words as a convenient guise for banning the expression of unpopular views. We have been able, as noted above, to discern little social benefit that might result from running the risk of opening the door to such grave results.

It is, in sum, our judgment that, absent a more particularized and compelling reason for its actions, the state may not, consistently with the First and Fourteenth Amendments, make the simple public display here involved of this single four-letter expletive a criminal offense. Because that is the only arguably sustainable rationale for the conviction here at issue, the judgment below must be reversed.

Reversed.

Justice BLACKMUN, with whom the Chief Justice and Justice Black join.

I dissent, and I do so for two reasons:

Cohen's absurd and immature antic, in my view, was mainly conduct and little speech. * * * Further, the case appears to me to be well within the sphere of Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568 (1942), where Justice Murphy, a known champion of First Amendment freedoms, wrote for a unanimous bench. As a consequence, this Court's agonizing over First Amendment values seem misplaced and unnecessary.

COMMENT

For the civil libertarian, an annoying feature of Cohen v. California is that its result is entirely consistent with the view that there should be absolute First Amendment protection for pure speech. Yet the Court deliberately eschewed taking such a view. The slogan Cohen wore on his jacket was treated by the Court as pure speech. The basis of Cohen's conviction was that the wearing of the jacket bearing the slogan in controversy constituted "offensive conduct" prohibited by the California Penal Code. Although the conviction was reversed, it was not reversed on the view endorsed by Justice Black and Professor Emerson that pure speech must receive absolute protection under the First Amendment. Justice Harlan for the Court very carefully rejected any such approach by pointing out that "the First and Fourteenth Amendments have never been thought to give absolute protection."

Symbolic Speech

The speech-action test proceeds on the assumption that speech or communication is entitled to full First Amendment protection. But sometimes action has a communicative or expressive element. In such circumstances, should function or form control? If a particular kind of activity is essentially communicative in character, then perhaps it should be viewed for what it is—symbolic speech. As symbolic speech, such activity is entitled to full First Amendment protection fully as much as if it were as communicative in substance as it is in form.

Embryonic recognition by the Supreme Court that some modes of activity should be treated as symbolic expression is found as early as Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359 (1931), where the Supreme Court struck down on First Amendment grounds a state statute that prohibited "the display of a red flag as a symbol of opposition by peaceful and legal means to organized government." A fuller and more famous statement which contained the roots of the symbolic speech idea may be found in West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943), where Justice Jackson said:

> There is no doubt that * * * the [compulsory] flag salute is a form of utterance. Symbolism is a primitive but effective way of communicating ideas. The use of an emblem or flag to symbolize some system, idea, institution, or personality is a short cut from mind to mind.

If action is "symbolic," shouldn't it really be treated as "speech" for First Amendment purposes?

Is a speech-action dichotomy too mechanical an approach, or is it a useful way of thinking about and resolving First Amendment problems?

The following case, which arose out of the "draft card" burnings which occurred in different parts of the country during the controversy about the Vietnam war, shows how the symbolic speech doctrine fared before the Supreme Court when its advocates tried to use it literally under fire.

UNITED STATES v. O'BRIEN

391 U.S. 367, 88 S.CT. 1673, 20 L.ED.2D 672 (1968).

Chief Justice WARREN delivered the opinion of the Court.

On the morning of March 31, 1966, David Paul O'Brien and three companions burned their Selective Service registration certificates on the steps of the South Boston Courthouse. * * *

For this act, O'Brien was indicted, tried, convicted, and sentenced in the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts. He did not contest the fact that he had burned the certificate. He stated in argument to the jury that he burned the certificate publicly to influence others to adopt his antiwar beliefs, as he put it, "so that other people would reevaluate their positions with Selective Service, with the armed forces, and reevaluate their place in the culture of today, to hopefully consider my position."

The indictment upon which he was tried charged that he "wilfully and knowingly did mutilate, destroy, and change by burning * * * [his] Registration Certificate (Selective Service System Form No. 2); in violation of Title 50, App., United States Code, Section 462(b)." Section 462(b) is part of the Universal Military Training and Service Act of 1948. Section 462(b)(3), one of six numbered subdivisions of § 462(b), was amended by Congress in 1965, 79 Stat. 586 (adding the words italicized below), so that at the time O'Brien burned his certificate an offense was committed by any person, "who forges, alters, knowingly destroys, knowingly mutilates, or in any manner changes any such certificate. * * *" [Italics supplied.]

By the 1965 Amendment, Congress added to § 12(b)(3) of the 1948 act the provision here at issue, subjecting to criminal liability not only one who "forges, alters, or in any manner changes" but also one who "knowingly destroys [or] knowingly mutilates" a certificate. We note at the outset that the 1965 Amendment plainly does not abridge free speech on its face, and we do not understand O'Brien to argue otherwise. Amended § 12(b)(3) on its face deals with conduct having no connection with speech. It prohibits the knowing destruction of certificates issued by the Selective Service System, and there is nothing necessarily expressive about such conduct. The Amendment does not distinguish between public and private destruction, and it does not punish only destruction engaged in for the purpose of expressing views. A law prohibiting destruction of Selective Service certificates no more abridges free speech on its face than a motor vehicle law prohibiting the destruction of drivers' licenses, or a tax law prohibiting the destruction of books and records.

O'Brien nonetheless argues that the 1965 Amendment is unconstitutional in its application to him, and is unconstitutional as enacted because what he calls the "purpose" of Congress was "to suppress freedom of speech." We consider these arguments separately.

O'Brien first argues that the 1965 Amendment is unconstitutional as applied to him because his act of burning his registration certificate was protected "symbolic speech" within the First Amendment. His argument is that the freedom of expression which the First Amendment guarantees includes all modes of "communication of ideas by conduct," and that his conduct is within this definition because he did it in "demonstration against the war and against the draft."

We cannot accept the view that an apparently limitless variety of conduct can be labelled "speech" whenever the person engaging in the conduct intends thereby to express an idea. However, even on the assumption that the alleged communicative element in O'Brien's conduct is sufficient to bring into play the First Amendment, it does not necessarily follow that the destruction of a registration certificate is constitutionally protected activity. This Court has held that when "speech" and "nonspeech" elements are combined in the same course of conduct, a sufficiently important governmental interest in regulating the nonspeech element can justify incidental limitations on First Amendment freedoms. To characterize the quality of the governmental interest which must appear, the Court has employed a variety of descriptive terms: compelling; substantial; subordinating; paramount; cogent; strong. Whatever imprecision inheres in these terms, we think it clear that a government regulation is sufficiently justified if it is within the constitutional power of the government; if it furthers an important or substantial governmental interest; if the governmental interest is unrelated to the suppression of free expression; and if the incidental restriction on alleged First Amendment freedom is no greater than is essential to the furtherance of that interest. We find that the 1965 Amendment to § 462(b)(3) of the Universal Military Training and Service Act meets all of these requirements, and consequently that O'Brien can be constitutionally convicted for violating it. [Emphasis added.]

* * *

The many functions performed by Selective Service certificates establish beyond doubt that Congress has a legitimate and substantial interest in preventing their wanton and unrestrained destruction and assuring their continuing availability by punishing people who knowingly and wilfully destroy or mutilate them.

We think it apparent that the continuing availability to each registrant of his Selective Service certificates substantially furthers the smooth and proper functioning of the system that Congress has established to raise armies. We think it also apparent that the Nation has a vital interest in having a system for raising armies that functions with maximum efficiency and is capable of easily and quickly responding to continually changing circumstances. For these reasons, the Government has a substantial interest in assuring the continuing availability of issued Selective Service certificates.

It is equally clear that the 1965 Amendment specifically protects this substantial governmental interest. We perceive no alternative means that would more precisely and narrowly assure the continuing availability of issued Selective Service certificates than a law which prohibits their wilful mutilation or destruction. * * * The 1965 Amendment prohibits such conduct and does nothing more. In other words, both the governmental interest and the operation of the 1965 Amendment are limited to the noncommunicative aspect of O'Brien's conduct. The governmental interest and the scope of the 1965 Amendment are limited to preventing a harm to the smooth and efficient functioning of the Selective Service System. When O'Brien deliberately rendered unavailable his registration certificate, he wilfully frustrated this governmental interest. For this noncommunicative impact of his conduct, and for nothing else, he was convicted.

* * *

O'Brien finally argues that the 1965 Amendment is unconstitutional as enacted because what he calls the "purpose" of Congress was "to suppress freedom of speech." We reject this argument because under settled principles the purpose of Congress, as O'Brien uses that term, is not a basis for declaring this legislation unconstitutional.

* * *

Since the 1965 Amendment to § 12(b)(3) of the Universal Military Training and Service Act is constitutional as enacted and as applied, the Court of Appeals should have affirmed the judgment of conviction entered by the District Court. Accordingly, we vacate the judgment of the Court of Appeals, and reinstate the judgment and sentence of the District Court. This disposition makes unnecessary consideration of O'Brien's claim that the Court of Appeals erred in affirming his conviction on the basis of the nonpossession regulation.

It is so ordered.

Justice Marshall took no part in the consideration or decision of these cases.

Justice Harlan, concurred.

[Justice Douglas dissented on the ground that the basic but undecided constitutional issue in the case was whether conscription was unconstitutional in the absence of a declaration of war.]

COMMENT

Perhaps O'Brien can be viewed as a failure for the speech-action approach to First Amendment problems—a failure because the definition of "speech" employed is too rigid and formalistic.

Did Chief Justice Earl Warren reject the whole symbolic speech concept in O'Brien? It appears that Warren's test in O'Brien was just another form of the balancing test frequently used in speech plus cases. Warren pointed out that "when 'speech' and 'non-speech' elements are combined in the same course of conduct, a sufficiently important governmental interest in regulating the nonspeech element can justify incidental limitation on First Amendment freedoms." This test, of course, implicitly rejects the symbolic speech defense because the whole point of that defense is to have conduct for purposes of constitutional litigation conceived as speech and, therefore, immune from governmental restriction under the First Amendment.

Note Warren's formulation of the balancing test he used in O'Brien:

> We think it clear that a government regulation is sufficiently justified if it is within the constitutional power of the government; if it furthers an important or substantial governmental interest; if the governmental interest is unrelated to the suppression of free expression; and if the incidental restriction on alleged First Amendment freedom is no greater than is the furtherance of that interest.

Is this "balancing" test particularly weighted in favor of the government? Professor Emerson would say that it is.

Wearing Armbands: Pure Speech?

In Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969), the Supreme Court reviewed the controversy which ensued when public school children wore black armbands to school to protest the Vietnam war. The Des Moines school system had prohibited the wearing of armbands in advance. The Court held that wearing the armband was a "symbolic act" protected under the free speech provision of the First Amendment. Since only seven out of 18,000 students actually wore armbands to school, Justice Fortas held that a more positive showing of interference with normal school operations would have to be shown before the prohibition on wearing armbands could be sustained.

TINKER v. DES MOINES INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DISTRICT

393 U.S. 503, 89 S.CT. 733,
21 L.ED.2D 731 (1969).

Justice FORTAS delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * *

The District Court recognized that the wearing of an armband for the purpose of expressing certain views is the type of symbolic act that is within the Free Speech Clause of the First Amendment. * * *

As we shall discuss, the wearing of armbands in the circumstances of this case was entirely divorced from actually or potentially disruptive conduct by those participating in it. It was closely akin to "pure speech" which, we have repeatedly held, is entitled to comprehensive protection under the First Amendment.

* * *

First Amendment rights, applied in light of the special characteristics of the school environment, are available to teachers and students. It can hardly be argued that either students or teachers shed their constitutional rights to freedom of speech or expression at the schoolhouse gate. This has been the unmistakable holding of this Court for almost 50 years.

* * *

In West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, this Court held that under the First Amendment, the student in public school may not be compelled to salute the flag.

* * *

On the other hand, the Court has repeatedly emphasized the need for affirming the comprehensive authority of the states and of school officials, consistent with fundamental constitutional safeguards, to prescribe and control conduct in the schools. Our problem lies in the area where students in the exercise of First Amendment rights collide with the rules of the school authorities.

The problem posed by the present case does not relate to regulation of the length of skirts or the type of clothing, to hair style, or deportment. It does not concern aggressive, disruptive action or even group demonstrations. Our problem involves direct, primary First Amendment rights akin to "pure speech."

The school officials banned and sought to punish petitioners for a silent, passive expression of opinion, unaccompanied by any disorder or disturbance on the part of petitioners. There is here no evidence whatever of petitioners' interference, actual or nascent, with the school's work or of collision with the rights of other students to be secure and to be let alone. Accordingly, this case does not concern speech or action that intrudes upon the work of the schools or the rights of other students.

Only a few of the 18,000 students in the school system wore the black armbands. Only five students were suspended for wearing them. There is no indication that the work of the schools or any class was disrupted. Outside the classrooms, a few students made hostile remarks to the children wearing armbands, but there were no threats or acts of violence on school premises.

The District Court concluded that the action of the school authorities was reasonable because it was based upon their fear of a disturbance from the wearing of the armbands. But, in our system, undifferentiated fear or apprehension of disturbance is not enough to overcome the right to freedom of expression. Any departure from absolute regimentation may cause trouble. Any variation from the majority's opinion may inspire fear. Any word spoken, in class, in the lunchroom, or on the campus, that deviates from the views of another person may start an argument or cause a disturbance.

In order for the state in the person of school officials to justify prohibition of a particular expression of opinion, it must be able to show that its action was caused by something more than a mere desire to avoid the discomfort and unpleasantness that always accompany an unpopular viewpoint. Certainly where there is no finding and no showing that engaging in the forbidden conduct would "materially and substantially interfere with the requirements of appropriate discipline in the operation of the school," the prohibition cannot be sustained.

In the present case, the District Court made no such finding, and our independent examination of the record fails to yield evidence that the school authorities had reason to anticipate that the wearing of the armbands would substantially interfere with the work of the school or impinge upon the rights of other students. Even an official memorandum prepared after the suspension that listed the reasons for the ban on wearing the armbands made no reference to the anticipation of such disruption.

On the contrary, the action of the school authorities appears to have been based upon an urgent wish to avoid the controversy which might result from the expression, even by the silent symbol of armbands, of opposition to this Nation's part in the conflagration in Vietnam. It is revealing, in this respect, that the meeting at which the school principals decided to issue the contested regulation was called in response to a student's statement to the journalism teacher in one of the schools that he wanted to write an article on Vietnam and have it published in the school paper. (The student was dissuaded.)

It is also relevant that the school authorities did not purport to prohibit the wearing of all symbols of political or controversial significance. The record shows that students in some of the schools wore buttons relating to national political campaigns, and some even wore the Iron Cross, traditionally a symbol of Nazism. The order prohibiting the wearing of armbands did not extend to these. Instead, a particular symbol—black armbands worn to exhibit opposition to this Nation's involvement in Vietnam—was singled out for prohibition. Clearly, the prohibition of expression of one particular opinion, at least without evidence that it is necessary to avoid material and substantial interference with schoolwork or discipline, is not constitutionally permissible.

In our system, state-operated schools may not be enclaves of totalitarianism. School officials do not possess absolute authority over their students. Students in school as well as out of school are "persons" under our Constitution. They are possessed of fundamental rights which the state must respect, just as they themselves must respect their obligations to the State. In our system, students may not be regarded as closed-circuit recipients of only that which the state chooses to communicate. They may not be confined to the expression of those sentiments that are officially approved. In the absence of a specific showing of constitutionally valid reasons to regulate their speech, students are entitled to freedom of expression of their views. * * *

Under our Constitution, free speech is not a right that is given only to be so circumscribed that it exists in principle but not in fact. Freedom of expression would not truly exist if the right could be exercised only in an area that a benevolent government has provided as a safe haven for crackpots. The Constitution says that Congress (and the states) may not abridge the right to free speech. This provision means what it says. We properly read it to permit reasonable regulation of speech-connected activities in carefully restricted circumstances. But we do not confine the permissible exercise of First Amendment rights to a telephone booth or the four corners of a pamphlet, or to supervised and ordained discussion in a school classroom.

If a regulation were adopted by school officials forbidding discussion of the Vietnam conflict, or the expression by any student of opposition to it anywhere on school property except as part of a prescribed classroom exercise, it would be obvious that the regulation would violate the constitutional rights of students, at least if it could not be justified by a showing that the students' activities would materially and substantially disrupt the work and discipline of the school. * * * In the circumstances of the present case, the prohibition of the silent, passive "witness of the armbands," as one of the children called it, is no less offensive to the constitution's guarantees.

As we have discussed, the record does not demonstrate any facts which might reasonably have led school authorities to forecast substantial disruption of or material interference with school activities, and no disturbances or disorders on the school premises in fact occurred. These petitioners merely went about their ordained rounds in school. Their deviation constituted only in wearing on their sleeve, a band of black cloth, not more than two inches wide. They wore it to exhibit their disapproval of the Vietnam hostilities and their advocacy of a truce, to make their views known, and, by their example, to influence others to adopt them. They neither interrupted school activities nor sought to intrude in the school affairs or the lives of others. They caused discussion outside of the classrooms, but no interference with work and no disorder. In the circumstances, our Constitution does not permit officials of the state to deny their form of expression.

We express no opinion as to the form of relief which should be granted, this being a matter for the lower courts to determine. We reverse and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

Justice White, concurring.

* * * The truth is that a teacher of kindergarten, grammar school, or high school pupils no more carries into a school with him a complete right to freedom of speech and expression than an anti-Catholic or anti-Semite carries with him a complete freedom of speech and religion into a Catholic church or Jewish synagogue. Nor does a person carry with him into the United States Senate or House, or into the Supreme Court, or any other court, a complete constitutional right to go into those places contrary to their rules and speak his mind on any subject he pleases. It is a myth to say that any person has a constitutional right to say what he pleases, where he pleases, and when he pleases. Our Court has decided precisely the opposite. * * *

COMMENT

Is Tinker a symbolic speech case because its facts reveal no disruptive conduct? In Street v. New York, 394 U.S. 576 (1969), a case involving the burning of an American flag on a street corner, there appeared to be no disruptive conduct in the sense that no one in Street's immediate audience was offended by his action. If anyone was offended, it was presumably the police officer who arrested him.

In O'Brien, on the other hand, members of the crowd at the South Boston courthouse attacked O'Brien and his cohorts after O'Brien burned the flag. Under this approach all the cases are in line. Street is consistent with Tinker at least in result. Tinker is consistent with O'Brien in that the draft card burning provoked disruptive conduct, making the symbolic act less pure speech than was the case in Tinker.

Whether conduct will be adjudicated a punishable criminal act or protected symbolic speech depends in Tinker on whether the conduct involved will materially interfere with the operation of the school.

How material is it that flag and draft card burning were both illegal under preexisting statutes, but armband wearing was not illegal until school officials became aware of the plan to protest the war? Only then did school officials issue a regulation prohibiting armband wearing.

The Court in the Tinker case did not cite or discuss O'Brien. Is this defensible? Explicable?

The majority went to great lengths in Street to avoid confronting the question whether flag burning is speech. Harlan found Street to have been punished for engaging in speech, i.e., he was punished for his words. Yet Harlan applied a balancing test even to pure speech.

Justice Black believed that flag burning was not constitutionally protected. Does this show the limitation of the speech-action distinction at least as mechanically applied? Flag burning is an act. Therefore, the state may regulate it. But the flag was burned to express and communicate disrespect for the state. Isn't punishing flag burning in these circumstances a form of seditious libel?

Professor Emerson believes that expression was the basic element in Street's flag burning and O'Brien's draft card burning. Moreover, it was precisely the element of expression which the law sought to punish. Therefore, as expression (utilizing the speech-action distinction), Emerson argues that the flag burning in Street should not be punished but should be defined as expression under the First Amendment. The System of Freedom of Expression, 88 (1970).

The rationale of the Court in Cohen v. California appears to be very close to that taken in Tinker, i.e., "absent a more particularized and compelling reason for its actions," the state may not proscribe the wearing of the jacket bearing a "single four-letter expletive."

Why is Cohen close to Tinker? Tinker makes the key to whether symbolic protest is constitutionally protected depend on whether the protest unduly interferes with other legitimate activity. The wearing of the jacket bearing the crude slogan was even less of an obstacle to the activities of the courthouse, the forum of the protest in Cohen, than was the wearing of the black armbands to the activities of the school, the forum of the protest in Tinker. If the Court concludes that symbolic protest is no obstacle to the normal activities of school or courthouse, is this equivalent in a balancing approach to a conclusion that the state has provided no "particularized and compelling reason" for proscribing the particular symbolic protest in controversy? See the last paragraph of Justice Harlan's opinion for the Court in Cohen.

Taking Street and Cohen together, don't the deficiencies of the speech-action theory become vividly clear? Street, which seemed to involve the act of flag burning, was viewed by the majority of the Supreme Court as a prosecution for the utterance of words, i.e., speech. Cohen, on the other hand, which appeared to the majority to involve pure speech, was seen by Justice Blackmun, Chief Justice Burger, and, of all people, Justice Black as "mainly conduct and little speech."

Is the abiding difficulty with the speech-action distinction that in the crunch there is too little agreement on what constitutes "speech" and what constitutes "action"? Or is it the most sensible First Amendment "theory" so far proposed?

In Spence v. Washington, 418 U.S. 405 (1974), the Court, per curiam, overturned a conviction under a flag misuse statute. In Spence, the accused had affixed a peace symbol to an American flag and then displayed the flag upside down from his window.

On the basis of the factual context of this protest activity, the Court concluded that the accused had "engaged in a form of protected expression." In Spence, the Court evidenced a willingness to consider action in certain circumstances the equivalent of communication. For the Court to treat action or conduct in such a fashion, however, it is necessary that there be intent on the part of the speaker to make a particular communication. It is likewise necessary that the context of the protest makes it likely that it would be received and comprehended as a message by those to whom it was addressed. Context may be a key point in distinguishing speech and action.

Is there an operational symbolic speech doctrine which is operative in contemporary First Amendment law? If one analyzes O'Brien, Tinker, and Spence on an overall basis, the outlines of a functional symbolic speech doctrine are discernible. Once the Court has determined that a particular mode of activity is in fact communicative, i.e., constitutes symbolic speech, full First Amendment protection should be extended to the activity.[4] If the state regulation in controversy is directed at the message being communicated, then the state interest, absent a clear and present danger, should not be sufficient to withstand the First Amendment interest favoring protection of the communicative activity. If the regulation is designed to effectuate a substantial governmental interest, is not directed toward repressing of the content of the communicative activity involved, and if the governmental interest would be significantly thwarted by the continuance of the activity at issue, then the regulation should be upheld despite the incidental burden on First Amendment interests.

In Texas v. Johnson, 109 S.Ct. ___ (1989), a flag desecration conviction was held, 5–4, to be inconsistent with the First Amendment. See Appendix A.

BETHEL SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 403 v. FRASER

478 U.S 675, 106 S.CT. 3159, 92 L.ED.2D 549 (1986).

Chief Justice BURGER delivered the opinion of the Court.

We granted certiorari to decide whether the First Amendment prevents a school district from disciplining a high school student for giving a lewd speech at a school assembly.

On April 26, 1983, respondent Matthew N. Fraser, a student at Bethel High School in Bethel, Washington, delivered a speech nominating a fellow student for student elective office. Approximately 600 high school students, many of whom were 14-year-olds, attended the assembly. Students were required to attend the assembly or to report to the study hall. The assembly was part of a school-sponsored educational program in self-government. Students who elected not to attend the assembly were required to report to study hall. During the entire speech, Fraser referred to his candidate in terms of an elaborate, graphic, and explicit sexual metaphor.

Two of Fraser's teachers, with whom he discussed the contents of his speech in advance, informed him that the speech was "inappropriate and that he probably should not deliver it," and that his delivery of the speech might have "severe consequences." During Fraser's delivery of the speech, a school counselor observed the reaction of students to the speech. Some students hooted and yelled; some by gestures graphically simulated the sexual activities pointedly alluded to in respondent's speech. Other students appeared to be bewildered and embarrassed by the speech. One teacher reported that on the day following the speech, she found it necessary to forgo a portion of the scheduled class lesson in order to discuss the speech with the class.

A Bethel High School disciplinary rule prohibiting the use of obscene language in the school provides:

> Conduct which materially and substantially interferes with the educational process is prohibited, including the use of obscene, profane language or gestures.

The morning after the assembly, the Assistant Principal called Fraser into her office and notified him that the school considered his speech to have been a violation of this rule. Fraser was presented with copies of five letters submitted by teachers, describing his conduct at the assembly; he was given a chance to explain his conduct, and he admitted to having given the speech described and that he deliberately used sexual innuendo in the speech. Fraser was then informed that he would be suspended for three days, and that his name would be removed from the list of candidates for graduation speaker at the school's commencement exercises.

4. For an example of a case recognizing the symbolic speech concept, see Village of Skokie v. National Socialist Party, 373 N.E.2d 21 (Ill.1978), text, p. 35, where the planned display of the swastika by a group of American Nazis was upheld as protected symbolic speech.

Fraser sought review of this disciplinary action through the School District's grievance procedures. The hearing officer determined that the speech given by respondent was "indecent, lewd, and offensive to the modesty and decency of many of the students and faculty in attendance at the assembly." The examiner determined that the speech fell within the ordinary meaning of "obscene," as used in the disruptive-conduct rule, and affirmed the discipline in its entirety. Fraser served two days of his suspension, and was allowed to return to school on the third day.

Respondent, by his father as guardian ad litem, then brought this action in the [district court]. Respondent alleged a violation of his First Amendment right to freedom of speech and sought both injunctive relief and monetary damages under 42 U. S. C. § 1983. The District Court held that the school's sanctions violated respondent's right to freedom of speech under the First Amendment to the United States Constitution. * * *

The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed the judgment of the District Court, holding that respondent's speech was indistinguishable from the protest armband in Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School Dist. We reverse.

This Court acknowledged in Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School Dist., that students do not "shed their constitutional rights to freedom of speech or expression at the schoolhouse gate." The Court of Appeals read that case as precluding any discipline of Fraser for indecent speech and lewd conduct in the school assembly. The marked distinction between the political "message" of the armbands in Tinker and the sexual content of respondent's speech in this case seems to have been given little weight by the Court of Appeals. In upholding the students' right to engage in a nondisruptive, passive expression of a political viewpoint in Tinker, this Court was careful to note that the case did "not concern speech or action that intrudes upon the work of the schools or the rights of other students." It is against this background that we turn to consider the level of First Amendment protection accorded to Fraser's utterances and actions before an official high school assembly attended by 600 students.

The undoubted freedom to advocate unpopular and controversial views in schools and classrooms must be balanced against the society's countervailing interest in teaching students the boundaries of socially appropriate behaviour. Even the most heated political discourse in a democratic society requires consideration for the personal sensibilities of the other participants and audiences. In our Nation's legislative halls, where some of the most vigorous political debates in our society are carried on, there are rules prohibiting the use of expressions offensive to other participants in the debate. Can it be that what is proscribed in the halls of Congress is beyond the reach of school officials to regulate?

The First Amendment guarantees wide freedom in matters of adult public discourse. A sharply divided Court upheld the right to express an antidraft viewpoint in a public place, albeit in terms highly offensive to most citizens. See Cohen v. California. It does not follow, however, that simply because the use of an offensive form of expression may not be prohibited to adults making what the speaker considers a political point, that the same latitude must be permitted to children in a public school. In New Jersey v. T. L. O., 469 U. S. 325 (1985), we reaffirmed that the constitutional rights of students in public school are not automatically coextensive with the rights of adults in other settings. As cogently expressed by Judge Newman, "the First Amendment gives a high school student the classroom right to wear Tinker's armband, but not Cohen's jacket." Thomas v. Board of Education, Grandville Central School Dist., 607 F.2d 1043, 1057 (CA2 1979) (opinion, concurring in result).

Surely it is a highly appropriate function of public school education to prohibit the use of vulgar and offensive terms in public discourse. Indeed, the "fundamental values necessary to the maintenance of a democratic political system" disfavor the use of terms of debate highly offensive or highly threatening to others. Nothing in the Constitution prohibits the states from insisting that certain modes of expression are inappropriate and subject to sanctions. The inculcation of these values is truly the "work of the schools." Tinker. The determination of what manner of speech in the classroom or in school assembly is inappropriate properly rests with the school board.

The process of educating our youth for citizenship in public schools is not confined to books, the curriculum, and the civics class; schools must teach by example the shared values of a civilized social order. Consciously or otherwise, teachers—and indeed the older students—demonstrate the appropriate form of civil discourse and political expression by their conduct and deportment in and out of class. Inescapably, like parents, they are role models. The schools, as instruments of the state, may determine that the essential lessons of civil, mature conduct cannot be conveyed in a school that tolerates lewd, indecent, or offensive speech and conduct such as that indulged in by this confused boy.

The pervasive sexual innuendo in Fraser's speech was plainly offensive to both teachers and students—indeed to any mature person. By glorifying male sexuality, and in its verbal content, the speech was acutely insulting to teenage girl students. The speech could well be seriously damaging to its less mature audience, many of whom were only 14 years old and on the threshold of awareness of human sexuality. Some students were reported as bewildered by the speech and the reaction of mimicry it provoked. This Court's First Amendment jurisprudence has acknowledged limitations on the otherwise absolute interest of the speaker in reaching an unlimited audience where the speech is sexually explicit and the audience may include children.

We hold that petitioner School District acted entirely within its permissible authority in imposing sanctions upon Fraser in response to his offensively lewd and indecent speech. Unlike the sanctions imposed on the students wearing armbands in Tinker, the penalties imposed in this case were unrelated to any political viewpoint. The First Amendment does not prevent the school officials from determining that to permit a vulgar and lewd speech such as respondent's would undermine the school's basic educational mission. A high school assembly or classroom is no place for a sexually explicit monologue directed towards an unsuspecting audience of teenage students. Accordingly, it was perfectly appropriate for the school to disassociate itself to make the point to the pupils that vulgar speech and lewd conduct is wholly inconsistent with the "fundamental values" of public school education. * * *

Respondent contends that the circumstances of his suspension violated due process because he had no way of knowing that the delivery of the speech in question would subject him to disciplinary sanctions. This argument is wholly without merit. We have recognized that "maintaining security and order in the schools requires a certain degree of flexibility in school disciplinary procedures, and we have respected the value of preserving the informality of the student-teacher relationship." Given the school's need to be able to impose disciplinary sanctions for a wide range of unanticipated conduct disruptive of the educational process, the school disciplinary rules need not be as detailed as a criminal code which imposes criminal sanctions. Two days' suspension from school does not rise to the level of a penal sanction calling for the full panoply of procedural due process protections applicable to a criminal prosecution. The school disciplinary rule proscribing "obscene" language and the prespeech admonitions of teachers gave adequate warning to Fraser that his lewd speech could subject him to sanctions.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit is Reversed.

Justice BRENNAN, concurring in the judgment.

Respondent gave the following speech at a high school assembly in support of a candidate for student government office:

> "I know a man who is firm—he's firm in his pants, he's firm in his shirt, his character is firm—but most * * * of all, his believe in you, the students of Bethel, is firm.
>
> "Jeff Kuhlman is a man who takes his point and pounds it in. If necessary, he'll take an issue and nail it to the wall. He doesn't attack things in spurts—he drives hard, pushing and pushing until finally—he succeeds.
>
> "Jeff is a man who will go to the very end—even the climax, for each and every one of you.
>
> "So vote for Jeff for A. S. B. vice-president—he'll never come between you and the best our high school can be."

The Court, referring to these remarks as "obscene," "vulgar," "lewd," and "offensively lewd," concludes that school officials properly punished respondent for uttering the speech. Having read the full text of respondent's remarks, I find it difficult to believe that it is the same speech the Court describes. To my mind, the most that can be said about respondent's speech—and all that need be said—is that in light of the discretion school officials have to teach high school students how to conduct civil and effective public discourse, and to prevent disruption of school educational activities, it was not unconstitutional for school officials to conclude, under the circumstances of this case, that respondent's remarks exceeded permissible limits. Thus, while I concur in the Court's judgment, I write separately to express my understanding of the breadth of the Court's holding.

If respondent had given the same speech outside of the school environment, he could not have been penalized simply because government officials considered his language to be inappropriate, see Cohen v. California; the Court's opinion does not suggest otherwise. Moreover, despite the Court's characterizations, the language respondent used is far removed from the very narrow class of "obscene" speech which the Court has held is not protected by the First Amendment. It is true, however, that the State has interests in teaching high school students how to conduct civil and effective public discourse and in avoiding disruption of educational school activities. Thus, the Court holds that under certain circumstances, high school students may properly be reprimanded for giving a speech at a high school assembly which school officials conclude disrupted the school's educational mission. Respondent's speech may well have been protected had he given it in school but under different circumstances, where the school's legitimate interests in teaching and maintaining civil public discourse were less weighty.

In the present case, school officials sought only to ensure that a high school assembly proceed in an orderly manner. There is no suggestion that school officials attempted to regulate respondent's speech because they disagree with the views he sought to express. Cf. Tinker. Nor does this case involve an attempt by school officials to ban written materials they consider "inappropriate" for high school students, cf. Board of Education v. Pico, or to limit what students should hear, read, or learn about. Thus, the Court's holding concerns only the authority that school officials have to restrict a high school student's use of disruptive language in a speech given to a high school assembly.

Justice MARSHALL dissenting.

I agree with the principles that Justice Brennan set out in his opinion concurring in the judgment. I dissent from the Court's decision, however, because in my view the school district failed to demonstrate that respondent's remarks were indeed disruptive.

Justice STEVENS, dissenting.

"Frankly, my dear, I don't give a damn."

When I was a high school student, the use of those words in a public forum shocked the Nation. Today Clark Gable's four-letter expletive is less offensive than it was then. Nevertheless, I assume that high school administrators may prohibit the use of that word in classroom discussion and even in extracurricular activities that are sponsored by the school and held on school premises. For I believe a school faculty must regulate the content as well as the style of student speech in carrying out its educational mission. It does seem to me, however, that if a student is to be punished for using offensive speech, he is entitled to fair notice of the scope of the prohibition and the consequences of its violation. The interest in free speech protected by the First Amendment and the interest in fair procedure protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment combine to require this conclusion.

This respondent was an outstanding young man with a fine academic record. The fact that he was chosen by the student body to speak at the school's commencement exercises demonstrates that he was respected by his peers. This fact is relevant for two reasons. It confirms the conclusion that the discipline imposed on him—a three-day suspension and ineligibility to speak at the school's graduation exercises—was sufficiently serious to justify invocation of the School District's grievance procedures. See Goss v. Lopez, 419 U.S. 565 (1975). More importantly, it indicates that he was probably in a better position to determine whether an audience composed of 600 of his contemporaries would be offended by the use of a four-letter word—or a sexual metaphor—than is a group of judges who are at least two generations and 3,000 miles away from the scene of the crime.

It seems fairly obvious that respondent's speech would be inappropriate in certain classroom and formal social settings. On the other hand, in a locker room or perhaps in a school corridor the metaphor in the speech might be regarded as rather routine comment. If this be true, and if respondent's audience consisted almost entirely of young people with whom he conversed on a daily basis, can we—at this distance—confidently assert that he must have known that the school administration would punish him for delivering it?

For three reasons, I think not. First, it seems highly unlikely that he would have decided to deliver the speech if he had known that it would result in his suspension and disqualification from delivering the school commencement address. Second, I believe a strong presumption in favor of free expression should apply whenever an issue of this kind is arguable. Third, because the Court has adopted the policy of applying contemporary community standards in evaluating expression with sexual connotations, this Court should defer to the views of the district and circuit judges who are in a much better position to evaluate this speech than we are.

COMMENT

Chief Justice Burger's opinion for the Court in Bethel School District narrows the scope of Tinker and appears to limit its reach to political messages. Sexually oriented messages apparently cannot claim protection under the Tinker rule. Is the regulation of speech at issue in Bethel School District upheld because the sexually oriented speech used by the speaker was so offensive as not to merit First Amendment protection? See FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978), text, p. 828. This would mean that content-based regulation would only be permissible under the Tinker test if political discourse were involved. Content-based restriction limited to sexual innuendo would be permissible.

Or is the thrust of the majority opinion in Bethel School District that speech by students who are minors in a public school setting is subject to greater regulation than usual? The rationale for this is the state interest in "educating our youth for citizenship in public schools."

Bethel School District is based on three factors: (1) the state interest in educating its youth, (2) the attenuated First Amendment rights of minors, and (3) the nonpolitical and offensively sex-oriented nature of the message in controversy. Is the reason for Justice Brennan's separate concurrence his objection to the third factor? How would Justice Brennan apply Tinker to the Bethel School District facts?

A case that continued the erosion of the Tinker principle is Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier, 108 S.Ct. 562 (1988). See text, p. 839.

THE LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL MEANING OF FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

The Doctrine of Prior Restraint

NEAR v. MINNESOTA

283 U.S. 697, 51 S.CT. 625, 75 L.ED. 1357 (1931).

[EDITORIAL NOTE The previous cases we have examined in studying the constitutional development of freedom of expression as a concept have dealt with what might be called subsequent punishment, i.e., punishing the speaker or the publisher after the act of communication because of state objection to the contents of the communication. This kind of legal sanction over communication obviously performs a certain censorship function. But press censorship, in the sense of being required by law to submit copy to a state official before publication is allowed, is another very significant and even more direct method by which freedom of expression can be restricted. At common law this kind of censorship was known as prior restraint. In Near v. Minnesota, the Supreme Court of the United States produced a very valuable precedent for the law of the press because the Court dealt with the constitutionality of press censorship and specifically with prior restraint.

As you read the opinion of the Court in Near, be careful to note that the Court did not say prior restraints were absolutely forbidden by the constitutional guarantee of freedom of the press, but rather that they were prohibited except in certain areas. According to Chief Justice Hughes, what are the areas of exception where apparently prior restraints are permitted? Do these exceptions merely repeat the law of the "subsequent punishment" cases previously considered in earlier cases in this chapter.

The factual setting of the Near case was as follows. A Minnesota statute provided for the abating as a public nuisance of "malicious, scandalous, and defamatory" newspapers or periodicals. The statute provided that all persons guilty of such a nuisance could be enjoined. Mason's Minnesota Statutes, 1927, §§ 10123–1 to 10123–3.

The county attorney of Hennepin County (Minneapolis), later Populist Governor Floyd Olson, brought an action under the statute to enjoin the publication of a "malicious, scandalous, and defamatory newspaper, magazine, or other periodical" known as The Saturday Press. The complaint filed by the county attorney asserted that The Saturday Press had accused the law enforcement agencies and officials of Minneapolis with failing to expose and punish gambling, bootlegging, and racketeering, which activities, The Saturday Press alleged, were in control of a "Jewish gangster."

The state trial court found that the editors of The Saturday Press had violated the statute, and the court "perpetually enjoined" the defendants from conducting "said nuisance under the title of The Saturday Press or any other name or title." The state supreme court affirmed, and the defendant Near appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States. For an interesting and lively account of the background of the case, See Friendly, Minnesota Rag (1981)].

Chief Justice HUGHES delivered the opinion of the Court: * * *

This statute, for the suppression as a public nuisance of a newspaper or periodical, is unusual, if not unique, and raises questions of grave importance transcending the local interests involved in the particular action. It is no longer open to doubt that the liberty of the press and of speech is within the liberty safeguarded by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment from invasion by state action. It was found impossible to conclude that this essential personal liberty of the citizen was left unprotected by the general guaranty of fundamental rights of person and property. * * * In maintaining this guaranty, the authority of the state to enact laws to promote the health, safety, morals, and general welfare of its people is necessarily admitted. The limits of this sovereign power must always be determined with appropriate regard to the particular subject of its exercise. * * * Liberty of speech and of the press is also not an absolute right, and the state may punish its abuse. Liberty, in each of its phases, has its history and connotation, and, in the present instance, the inquiry is as to the historic conception of the liberty of the press and whether the statute under review violates the essential attributes of that liberty.

* * *

First. The statute is not aimed at the redress of individual or private wrongs. Remedies for libel remain available and unaffected. The statute, said the state court (174 Minn. 457, 219 N.W. 770, 772, 58 A.L.R. 607), "is not directed at threatened libel but at an existing business which, generally speaking, involves more than libel." It is aimed at the distribution of scandalous matter as "detrimental to public morals and to the general welfare," tending "to disturb the peace of the community" and "to provoke assaults and the commission of crime." In order to obtain an injunction to suppress the future publication of the newspaper or periodical, it is not necessary to prove the falsity of the charges that have been made in the publication condemned. In the present action there was no allegation that the matter published was not true. It is alleged, and the statute requires the allegation that the publication was "malicious." But, as in prosecutions for libel, there is no requirement of proof by the state of malice in fact as distinguished from malice inferred from the mere publication of the defamatory matter. The judgment in this case proceeded upon the mere proof of publication. The statute permits the defense, not of the truth alone, but only that the truth was published with good motives and for justifiable ends. * * *

Second. The statute is directed not simply at the circulation of scandalous and defamatory statements with regard to private citizens, but at the continued publication by newspapers and periodicals of charges against public officers of corruption, malfeasance in office, or serious neglect of duty. Such charges by their very nature create a public scandal. They are scandalous and defamatory within the meaning of the statute, which has its normal operation in relation to publications dealing prominently and chiefly with the alleged derelictions of public officers.

Third. The object of the statute is not punishment, in the ordinary sense, but suppression of the offending newspaper or periodical. The reason for the enactment, as the state court has said, is that prosecutions to enforce penal statutes for libel do not result in "efficient repression or suppression of the evils of scandal." Describing the business of publication as a public nuisance does not obscure the substance of the proceeding which the statute authorizes. It is the continued publication of scandalous and defamatory matter that constitutes the business and the declared nuisance. In the case of public officers, it is the reiteration of charges of official misconduct, and the fact that the newspaper or periodical is principally devoted to that purpose, that exposes it to suppression. * * *

This suppression is accomplished by enjoining publication, and that restraint is the object and effect of the statute.

Fourth. The statute not only operates to suppress the offending newspaper or periodical, but to put the publisher under an effective censorship. When a newspaper or periodical is found to be "malicious, scandalous and defamatory," and is suppressed as such, resumption of publication is punishable as a contempt of court by fine or imprisonment. Thus, where a newspaper or periodical has been suppressed because of the circulation of charges against public officers of official misconduct, it would seem to be clear that the renewal of the publication of such charges would constitute a contempt, and that the judgment would lay a permanent restraint upon the publisher, to escape which he must satisfy the court as to the character of a new publication. Whether he would be permitted again to publish matter deemed to be derogatory to the same or other public officers would depend upon the court's ruling. In the present instance the judgment restrained the defendants from "publishing, circulating, having in their possession, selling or giving away any publication whatsoever which is a malicious, scandalous or defamatory newspaper, as defined by law." The law gives no definition except that covered by the words "scandalous and defamatory," and publications charging official misconduct are of that class. While the court, answering the objection that the judgment was too broad, saw no reason for construing it as restraining the defendants "from operating a newspaper in harmony with the public welfare to which all must yield," and said that the defendants had not indicated "any desire to conduct their business in the usual and legitimate manner," the manifest inference is that, at least with respect to a new publication directed against official misconduct, the defendant would be held, under penalty of punishment for contempt as provided in the statute, to a manner of publication which the court considered to be "usual and legitimate" and consistent with the public welfare.

If we cut through mere details of procedure, the operation and effect of the statute in substance is that public authorities may bring the owner or publisher of a newspaper or periodical before a judge upon a charge of conducting a business of publishing scandalous and defamatory matter—in particular that the matter consists of charges against public officers of official dereliction—and, unless the owner or publisher is able and disposed to bring competent evidence to satisfy the judge that the charges are true and are published with good motives and for justifiable ends, his newspaper or periodical is suppressed and further publication is made punishable as a contempt. This is of the essence of censorship.

The question is whether a statute authorizing such proceedings in restraint of publication is consistent with the conception of the liberty of the press as historically conceived and guaranteed. In determining the extent of the constitutional protection, it has been generally, if not universally, considered that it is the chief purpose of the guaranty to prevent previous restraints upon publication. The struggle in England, directed against the legislative power of the licenser, resulted in renunciation of the censorship of the press. The liberty deemed to be established was thus described by Blackstone: "The liberty of the press is indeed essential to the nature of a free state; but this consists in laying no previous restraints upon publications, and not in freedom from censure for criminal matter when published. Every freeman has an undoubted right to lay what sentiments he pleases before the public; to forbid this, is to destroy the freedom of the press; but if he publishes what is improper, mischievous or illegal, he must take the consequence of his own temerity." 4 Bl.Com. 151, 152. See Story on the Constitution, §§ 1884, 1889. The distinction was early pointed out between the extent of the freedom with respect to censorship under our constitutional system and that enjoyed in England. Here, as Madison said, "the great and essential rights of the people are secured against legislative as well as against executive ambition. They are secured, not by laws paramount to prerogative, but by constitutions paramount to laws. This security of the freedom of the press requires that it should be exempt not only from previous restraint by the Executive, as in Great Britain, but from legislative restraint also." Report on the Virginia Resolutions, Madison's Works, vol. IV, p. 543. This Court said, in Patterson v. Colorado, 205 U.S. 454, 462: "In the first place, the main purpose of such constitutional provisions is 'to prevent all such previous restraints upon publications as had been practiced by other governments,' and they do not prevent the subsequent punishment of such as may be deemed contrary to the public welfare. Commonwealth v. Blanding, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 304, 313, 314 (15 Am.Dec. 214); Respublica v. Oswald, 1 Dall. 319, 325. The preliminary freedom extends as well to the false as to the true; the subsequent punishment may extend as well to the true as to the false. This was the law of criminal libel apart from statute in most cases, if not in all. Commonwealth v. Blanding, ubi supra; 4 Bl.Com. 150."

The criticism upon Blackstone's statement has not been because immunity from previous restraint upon publication has not been regarded as deserving of special emphasis, but chiefly because that immunity cannot be deemed to exhaust the conception of the liberty guaranteed by state and federal Constitutions. The point of criticism has been "that the mere exemption from previous restraints cannot be all that is secured by the constitutional provisions," and that "the liberty of the press might be rendered a mockery and a delusion, and the phrase itself a byword, if, while every man was at liberty to publish what he pleased, the public authorities might nevertheless punish him for harmless publications." 2 Cooley, Const. Lim. (8th Ed.) p. 885. But it is recognized that punishment for the abuse of the liberty accorded to the press is essential to the protection of the public, and that the common-law rules that subject the libeler to responsibility for the public offense, as well as for the private injury, are not abolished by the protection extended in our Constitutions. Id. pp. 883, 884. The law of criminal libel rests upon that secure foundation. There is also the conceded authority of courts to punish for contempt when publications directly tend to prevent the proper discharge of judicial functions. * * * We have no occasion to inquire as to the permissible scope of subsequent punishment. For whatever wrong the appellant has committed or may commit, by his publications, the state appropriately affords both public and private redress by its libel laws. As has been noted, the statute in question does not deal with punishments; it provides for no punishment, except in case of contempt for violation of the court's order, but for suppression and injunction—that is, for restraint upon publication.

The objection has also been made that the principle as to immunity from previous restraint is stated too broadly, if every such restraint is deemed to be prohibited. That is undoubtedly true; the protection even as to previous restraint is not absolutely unlimited. But the limitation has been recognized only in exceptional cases. * * * No one would question but that a government might prevent actual obstruction to its recruiting service or the publication of the sailing dates of transports or the number and location of troops. On similar grounds, the primary requirements of decency may be enforced against obscene publications. The security of the community life may be protected against incitements to acts of violence and the overthrow by force of orderly government. * * * These limitations are not applicable here. Nor are we now concerned with questions as to the extent of authority to prevent publications in order to protect private rights according to the principles governing the exercise of the jurisdiction of courts of equity. [Emphasis added.]

The exceptional nature of its limitations places in a strong light the general conception that liberty of the press, historically considered and taken up by the federal Constitution, has meant, principally although not exclusively, immunity from previous restraints or censorship. The conception of the liberty of the press in this country had broadened with the exigencies of the colonial period and with the efforts to secure freedom from oppressive administration. That liberty was especially cherished for the immunity it afforded from previous restraint of the publication of censure of public officers and charges of official misconduct.

The fact that for approximately one hundred and fifty years there has been almost an entire absence of attempts to impose previous restraints upon publications relating to the malfeasance of public officers is significant of the deep-seated conviction that such restraints would violate constitutional right. Public officers, whose character and conduct remain open to debate and free discussion in the press, find their remedies for false accusations in actions under libel laws not in proceedings to restrain the publication of newspapers and periodicals. The general principle that the constitutional guaranty of the liberty of the press gives immunity from previous restraints has been approved in many decisions under * * * state constitutions.

The importance of this immunity has not lessened. While reckless assaults upon public men, and efforts to bring obloquy upon those who are endeavoring faithfully to discharge official duties, exert a baleful influence and deserve the severest condemnation in public opinion, it cannot be said that this abuse is greater, and it is believed to be less, than that which characterized the period in which our institutions took shape. Meanwhile, the administration of government has become more complex, the opportunities for malfeasance and corruption have multiplied, crime has grown to most serious proportions, and the danger of its protection by unfaithful officials and of the impairment of the fundamental security of life and property by criminal alliances and official neglect, emphasizes the primary need of a vigilant and courageous press, especially in great cities. The fact that the liberty of the press may be abused by miscreant purveyors of scandal does not make any the less necessary the immunity of the press from previous restraint in dealing with official misconduct. Subsequent punishment for such abuses as may exist is the appropriate remedy, consistent with constitutional privilege.

In attempted justification of the statute, it is said that it deals not with publication per se, but with the "business" of publishing defamation. If, however, the publisher has a constitutional right to publish, without previous restraint, an edition of his newspaper charging official derelictions, it cannot be denied that he may publish subsequent editions for the same purpose. He does not lose his right by exercising it. If his right exists, it may be exercised in publishing nine editions, as in this case, as well as in one edition. If previous restraint is permissible, it may be imposed at once; indeed, the wrong may be as serious in one publication as in several. Characterizing the publication as a business, and the business as a nuisance, does not permit an invasion of the constitutional immunity against restraint. Similarly, it does not matter that the newspaper or periodical is found to be "largely" or "chiefly" devoted to the publication of such derelictions. If the publisher has a right, without previous restraint, to publish them, his right cannot be deemed to be dependent upon his publishing something else, more or less, with the matter to which objection is made.

Nor can it be said that the constitutional freedom from previous restraint is lost because charges are made of derelictions which constitute crimes. With the multiplying provisions of penal codes, and of municipal charters and ordinances carrying penal sanctions, the conduct of public officers is very largely within the purview of criminal statutes. The freedom of the press from previous restraint has never been regarded as limited to such animadversions as lay outside the range of penal enactments. Historically, there is no such limitation; it is inconsistent with the reason which underlies the privilege, as the privilege so limited would be of slight value for the purposes for which it came to be established.

The statute in question cannot be justified by reason of the fact that the publisher is permitted to show, before injunction issues, that the matter published is true and is published with good motives and for justifiable ends. If such a statute, authorizing suppression and injunction on such a basis, is constitutionally valid, it would be equally permissible for the Legislature to provide that at any time the publisher of any newspaper could be brought before a court, or even an administrative officer (as the constitutional protection may not be regarded as resting on mere procedural details), and required to produce proof of the truth of his publication, or of what he intended to publish and of his motives, or stand enjoined. If this can be done, the Legislature may provide machinery for determining in the complete exercise of its discretion what are justifiable ends and restrain publication accordingly. And it would be but a step to a complete system of censorship. The recognition of authority to impose previous restraint upon publication in order to protect the community against the circulation of charges of misconduct, and especially of official misconduct, necessarily would carry with it the admission of the authority of the censor against which the constitutional barrier was erected. The preliminary freedom, by virtue of the very reason for its existence, does not depend, as this court has said, on proof of truth.

Equally unavailing is the insistence that the statute is designed to prevent the circulation of scandal which tends to disturb the public peace and to provoke assaults and the commission of crime. Charges of reprehensible conduct, and in particular of official malfeasance, unquestionably create a public scandal, but the theory of the constitutional guaranty is that even a more serious public evil would be caused by authority to prevent publication. "To prohibit the intent to excite those unfavorable sentiments against those who administer the Government, is equivalent to a prohibition of the actual excitement of them; and to prohibit the actual excitement of them is equivalent to a prohibition of discussions having that tendency and effect; which again, is equivalent to a protection of those who administer the Government, if they should at any time deserve the contempt or hatred of the people, against being exposed to it by free animadversions on their characters and conduct." There is nothing new in the fact that charges of reprehensible conduct may create resentment and the disposition to resort to violent means of redress, but this well-understood tendency did not alter the determination to protect the press against censorship and restraint upon publication. * * *

For these reasons we hold the statute, so far as it authorized the proceedings in this action * * * to be an infringement of the liberty of the press guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. We should add that this decision rests upon the operation and effect of the statute, without regard to the question of the truth of the charges contained in the particular periodical. The fact that the public officers named in this case, and those associated with the charges of official dereliction, may be deemed to be impeccable, cannot affect the conclusion that the statute imposes an unconstitutional restraint upon publication.

Judgment reversed.

Justice BUTLER (dissenting).

* * *

The Minnesota statute does not operate as a previous restraint on publication within the proper meaning of that phrase. It does not authorize administrative control in advance such as was formerly exercised by the licensers and censors, but prescribes a remedy to be enforced by a suit in equity. In this case there was previous publication made in the course of the business of regularly producing malicious, scandalous, and defamatory periodicals. The business and publications unquestionably constitute an abuse of the right of free press. The statute denounces the things done as a nuisance on the ground, as stated by the State Supreme Court, that they threaten morals, peace, and good order. There is no question of the power of the state to denounce such transgressions. The restraint authorized is only in respect of continuing to do what has been duly adjudged to constitute a nuisance. * * * There is nothing in the statute purporting to prohibit publications that have not been adjudged to constitute a nuisance. It is fanciful to suggest similarity between the granting or enforcement of the decree authorized by this statute to prevent further publication of malicious, scandalous, and defamatory articles and the previous restraint upon the press by licensers as referred to by Blackstone and described in the history of the times to which he alludes.

* * *

It is well known, as found by the state Supreme Court, that existing libel laws are inadequate effectively to suppress evils resulting from the kind of business and publications that are shown in this case. The doctrine that measures such as the one before us are invalid because they operate as previous restraints to infringe freedom of press exposes the peace and good order of every community and the business and private affairs of every individual to the constant and protracted false and malicious assaults of any insolvent publisher who may have purpose and sufficient capacity to contrive and put into effect a scheme or program for oppression, blackmail or extortion.

The judgment should be affirmed.

Justice Van Devanter, Justice McReynolds, and Justice Sutherland concur in this opinion.

COMMENT

Chief Justice Hughes said in Near that freedom from prior restraint was the general principle. But he also made it clear that it was not an absolute principle. The areas of exception were apparently three: (1) cases where national security was involved in time of war; (2) cases where the "primary requirements of decency" were involved, i.e., the problem of obscene publications; (3) cases where the public order was endangered by the incitement to violence and overthrow by force of orderly government.

The Near case produced a sharp 5–4 division in the Court. The narrow majority supporting the opinion of Chief Justice Hughes was accused by Justice Pierce Butler, a Minnesotan, of reaching out to decide the constitutional status of prior restraints which were not involved in the case at bar. Technically, Justice Butler was right. The prior restraint known at common law empowered administrative officials rather than judges to review in the first instance the material to be published. In Near, The Saturday Press had been able to publish what it chose in the first instance. Moreover, no requirement of submitting future copy to a court as a prerequisite to publication was asked of the editors. Yet, more broadly viewed, the court order probably did create a prior restraint.

Prior restraint had not entirely vanished from the American legal scene. However, prior restraints today appear to be more common in the obscenity field than they are in the area of political freedom. An example is Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan, 372 U.S. 58 (1963). In that case the Rhode Island legislature established a state-supported commission to "advise" magazine and book distributors when a publication was obscene. The advisory letter informed the distributor that if a publication was designated by the commission as obscene and was not removed from circulation, the matter would be turned over to law enforcement authorities for criminal prosecution. The commission itself had no law enforcement powers, and it could not require the regular law enforcement authorities to take action. In what ways did this procedure conform to and differ from the prior restraint known to English common law and described in the opinions in the Near case? Could it be fairly said of the Rhode Island procedure litigated in Bantam Books that its effect might be even more restrictive of press freedom than the classic form of prior restraint? Why?

With regard to this question, it should be noted that the Supreme Court described the Rhode Island procedure as a "form of regulation that creates hazards to press freedom markedly greater than those that attend reliance upon the criminal law." Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan, 372 U.S. 58, 70 (1963).

In the landmark case of New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), the Supreme Court sharply limited the ability of public officials to successfully sue newspapers for libel. For an extended discussion of the impact of the Times case on the law of libel, see Chapter 2, text, p. 195. In the Times case, the Court cited the statements in Near and other cases that the "Constitution does not protect libelous utterances." But the Court pointed out that neither Near nor any other case cited for this proposition actually involved use of the libel laws to restrain expression "critical of the official conduct of public officials." 376 U.S. 254 at 268. In a decision of far-reaching scope, the Court proclaimed the latter kind of expression to be protected by the First Amendment. Justice Brennan said for the Court in New York Times that the case of a public official suing a newspaper for libel must be considered "against the background of a profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust and wide-open, and that it may well include vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials." 376 U.S. 254 at 270.

If The Saturday Press were to publish in Minneapolis today an attack on the members of the municipal govemment of that city—an attack, which, let us assume, until the New York Times case would have been actionably libelous—would an injunction now be available to restrain further publications of the attack?

Has the New York Times case further restricted the already limited range of prior restraints?

From the point of view of freedom of the press, the legal concept of prior restraint is of the greatest importance. If, as a constitutional matter, freedom of the press included nothing else than prior restraint, considerable protection would still have been afforded the printed word. This is because freedom from prior restraint allows the material to be disseminated in the first place. Ideas, no matter how disturbing to established authority, are thus given legal protection in their emergent state. This freedom from prior restraint against the printed word contrasts with the legal concept of subsequent punishment which refers to the imposition of legal sanctions on those who authored the offending words. Punishing Gitlow after the publication of his revolutionary newspaper is an example of subsequent punishment. Under what set of facts would Gitlow have been a prior restraint case?

It is the contribution of Chief Justice Hughes's opinion in Near v. Minnesota that it enriched in a formative case the constitutional interpretation of freedom of the press to include both freedom from prior restraint and freedom from subsequent punishment. However, as between the two forms of repression of the press, prior restraint and subsequent punishment, which is the more dangerous in damaging the values for which freedom of press exists as a constitutional guarantee? Why?

For an excellent discussion of prior restraint, see generally Emerson, The Doctrine of Prior Restraint, 20 Law & Contemp.Prob. 648 (1955); Symposium, Near v. Minnesota, 50th Anniversary, 66 Minn.L.Rev. 1–208 (November 1981). See generally, Redish, The Proper Role of the Prior Restraint Doctrine in First Amendment Theory, 70 Va.L.Rev. 53 (1984).

The Pentagon Papers Case

The Pentagon Papers or the New York Times case of the summer of 1971 brought forth suddenly and with no particular warning one of the great First Amendment and one of the most dramatic prior restraint cases in American constitutional history. For students of the law of mass communication the case can be approached under at least three familiar categories: (1) prior restraint, (2) journalists' privilege to protect their sources, and (3) the public's right to know. All the judges who considered the case had to weigh claims of freedom from prior restraint and freedom of information against claims of government interest and security advanced by the Justice Department lawyers. Was Dr. Daniel Ellsberg, one of the thirty-six authors of the Papers, justified, legally or ethically, in taking classified papers to which he had access and turning them over to the New York Times?

The sequence of events which created the Pentagon Papers case came about as follows: In June 1971, the New York Times, after much soul-searching, decided to publish a secret, classified Pentagon Report outlining the process by which America went to war in Vietnam. At the request of the United States government, a temporary restraining order was issued against the New York Times by a newly appointed federal judge, Murray Gurfein, of the Federal District Court for the Southern District of New York. A few days later Judge Gurfein in a stirring decision refused to grant the United States government a permanent injunction to restrain the New York Times from publishing the Pentagon Papers:

"A cantankerous press, an obstinate press, a ubiquitous press," said the judge, "must be suffered by those in authority in order to preserve the even greater values of freedom of expression and the right of the people to know."

But the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reversed this decision, holding that the issue of whether the materials should be published should be decided in further hearings where the government could develop and support its position that the publication of the papers presented a threat to the security of the United States. In the interim, the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit ruled that the restraints on publication be continued. Meanwhile, the Washington Post entered the fray. The government requested an injunction against the Post in the United States District Court in the District of Columbia, but Judge Gerhard Gesell denied the government's attempt to restrain publication of the Pentagon papers by the Post. The government appealed, and the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia came down on the side of the press.

The Washington Post and New York Times were not the only papers to publish the Pentagon Papers. The Boston Globe and the St. Louis Post Dispatch had each published one article on the Papers. The government sought and obtained a restraining order against the papers in Boston and St. Louis. The Chicago Sun Times and the Los Angeles Times published stories based on the Pentagon Papers, but these papers were never the subject of lawsuits by the government. Because of the inconsistent actions with regard to the Pentagon Papers in the federal courts of appeals in New York and Washington, the Washington Post was free to publish papers, but the New York Times was not.

The federal courts of appeals had given judgment on the matter on June 23, 1971. The New York Times filed a petition for a writ of certiorari along with a motion for accelerated consideration of the petition on June 24. On June 30, 1971, the great case, a historic confrontation between government and the press, was decided by the Supreme Court. The result was clear—every newspaper in the land was free to publish the Pentagon Papers. The excitement of victory for the press, however, clouded appreciation by the press of the fact that the bitter struggle between freedom of information and national security had hardly been given a clear resolution by the Supreme Court. The Court's actual order merely held that the government had not met the heavy burden which must be met to justify any government prior restraint on the press. As for the myriad issues raised by the momentous case, nine separate opinions (it would have been impossible to have more) reflected the ambiguities, contradictions, and fundamental disagreements among the justices on basic issues concerning the role of the press in American society.

For a detailed account of the events leading to the Supreme Court's action, see Ungar, The Papers & The Papers (1973).

NEW YORK TIMES v. UNITED STATES

403 U.S. 713, 91 S.CT. 2140, 29 L.ED.2D 822 (1971).

Per Curiam.

We granted certiorari in these cases in which the United States seeks to enjoin the New York Times and the Washington Post from publishing the contents of a classified study entitled "History of U.S. Decision-Making Process on Viet Nam Policy." * * *

"Any system of prior restraints of expression comes to this Court bearing a heavy presumption against its constitutional validity." Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan, 372 U.S. 58, 70 (1963); see also Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931). The government "thus carries a heavy burden of showing justification for the enforcement of such a restraint." Organization for a Better Austin v. Keefe, 402 U.S. 415 (1971). The District Court for the Southern District of New York in the New York Times case and the District Court for the District of Columbia and the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit in the Washington Post case held that the government had not met that burden. We agree. [Emphasis added.]

Justice BLACK, with whom Justice Douglas joins, concurring.

* * * I believe that every moment's continuance of the injunctions against these newspapers amounts to a flagrant, indefensible, and continuing violation of the First Amendment. * * * In my view it is unfortunate that some of my Brethren are apparently willing to hold that the publication of news may sometimes be enjoined. Such a holding would make a shambles of the First Amendment.

Our government was launched in 1789 with the adoption of the Constitution. The Bill of Rights, including the First Amendment, followed in 1791. Now, for the first time in the 182 years since the founding of the Republic, the federal courts are asked to hold that the First Amendment does not mean what it says, but rather means that the government can halt the publication of current news of vital importance to the people of this country.

In seeking injunctions against these newspapers and in its presentation to the Court, the executive branch seems to have forgotten the essential purpose and history of the First Amendment. When the Constitution was adopted, many people strongly opposed it because the document contained no Bill of Rights to safeguard certain basic freedoms. They especially feared that the new powers granted to a central government might be interpreted to permit the government to curtail freedom of religion, press, assembly, and speech. In response to an overwhelming public clamor, James Madison offered a series of amendments to satisfy citizens that these great liberties would remain safe and beyond the power of government to abridge. Madison proposed what later became the First Amendment in three parts, two of which are set out below, and one of which proclaimed: "The people shall not be deprived or abridged of their right to speak, to write, or to publish their sentiments; and the freedom of the press, as one of the great bulwarks of liberty, shall be inviolable." The amendments were offered to curtail and restrict the general powers granted to the executive, legislative, and judicial Branches two years before in the original Constitution. The Bill of Rights changed the original Constitution into a new charter under which no branch of government could abridge the people's freedoms of press, speech, religion, and assembly. Yet the solicitor general argues and some members of the Court appear to agree that the general powers of the government adopted in the original Constitution should be interpreted to limit and restrict the specific and emphatic guarantees of the Bill of Rights adopted later. I can imagine no greater perversion of history. Madison and the other Framers of the First Amendment, able men that they were, wrote in language they earnestly believed could never be misunderstood: "Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom of the press. * * * *" Both the history and language of the First Amendment support the view that the press must be left free to publish news, whatever the source, without censorship, injunctions, or prior restraints.

In the First Amendment the Founding Fathers gave the free press the protection it must have to fulfill its essential role in our democracy. The press was to serve the governed, not the governors. The government's power to censor the press was abolished so that the press would remain forever free to censure the government. The press was protected so that it could bare the secrets of government and inform the people. Only a free and unrestrained press can effectively expose deception in government. And paramount among the responsibilities of a free press is the duty to prevent any part of the government from deceiving the people and sending them off to distant lands to die of foreign fevers and foreign shot and shell. In my view, far from deserving condemnation for their courageous reporting, the New York Times, the Washington Post, and other newspapers should be commended for serving the purpose that the Founding Fathers saw so clearly. In revealing the workings of government that led to the Viet Nam war, the newspapers nobly did precisely that which the Founders hoped and trusted they would do.

The government's case here is based on premises entirely different from those that guided the Framers of the First Amendment. The solicitor general has carefully and emphatically stated:

"Now, Mr. Justice [Black], your construction of * * * [the First Amendment] is well known, and I certainly respect it. You say that no law means no law, and that should be obvious. I can only say, Mr. Justice that to me it is equally obvious that 'no law' does not mean 'no law', and I would seek to persuade the Court that that is true. * * * [T]here are other parts of the Constitution that grant power and responsibilities to the Executive and * * * the First Amendment was not intended to make it impossible for the Executive to function or to protect the security of the United States."

And the government argues in its brief that in spite of the First Amendment, "[t]he authority of the Executive Department to protect the nation against publication of information whose disclosure would endanger the national security stems from two interrelated sources: the constitutional power of the president over the conduct of foreign affairs and his authority as Commander-in-Chief."

In other words, we are asked to hold that despite the First Amendment's emphatic command, the executive branch, the Congress, and the Judiciary can make laws enjoining publication of current news and abridging freedom of the press in the name of "national security." The government does not even attempt to rely on any act of Congress. Instead it makes the bold and dangerously far-reaching contention that the courts should take it upon themselves to "make" a law abridging freedom of the press in the name of equity, presidential power and national security, even when the representatives of the people in Congress have adhered to the command of the First Amendment and refused to make such a law. See concurring opinion of Justice Douglas. * * * To find that the president has "inherent power" to halt the publication of news by resort to the courts would wipe out the First Amendment and destroy the fundamental liberty and security of the very people the government hopes to make "secure." No one can read the history of the adoption of the First Amendment without being convinced beyond any doubt that it was injunctions like those sought here that Madison and his collaborators intended to outlaw in this Nation for all time.

The word "security" is a broad, vague generality whose contours should not be invoked to abrogate the fundamental law embodied in the First Amendment. The guarding of military and diplomatic secrets at the expense of informed representative government provides no real security for our Republic. The Framers of the First Amendment, fully aware of both the need to defend a new nation and the abuses of the English and Colonial governments, sought to give this new society strength and security by providing that freedom of speech, press, religion, and assembly should not be abridged.

Justice DOUGLAS, with whom Justice Black joins, concurring.

While I join the opinion of the Court I believe it necessary to express my views more fully.

It should be noted at the outset that the First Amendment provides that "Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." That leaves, in my view, no room for governmental restraint on the press.

There is, moreover, no statute barring the publication by the press of the material which the Times and Post seek to use. 18 U.S.C.A. § 793(e) provides that "whoever having unauthorized possession of, access to, or control over any document, writing, * * * or information relating to the national defense which information the possessor has reason to believe could be used to the injury of the United States or to the advantage of any foreign nation, wilfully communicates * * * the same to any person not entitled to receive it * * * shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than ten years or both."

The government suggests that the word "communicates" is broad enough to encompass publication.

There are eight sections in the chapter on espionage and censorship, §§ 792–799. In three of those eight "publish" is specifically mentioned: § 794(b) provides "Whoever in time of war, with the intent that the same shall be communicated to the enemy, collects records, publishes, or communicates * * * [the disposition of armed forces]."

Section 797 prohibits "reproduces, publishes, sells, or gives away" photos of defense installations.

Section 798 relating to cryptography prohibits: "communicates, furnishes, transmits, or otherwise makes available * * * or publishes."

Thus it is apparent that Congress was capable of and did distinguish between publishing and communication in the various sections of the Espionage Act.

The other evidence that § 793 does not apply to the press is a rejected version of § 793. That version read: "During any national emergency resulting from a war to which the U.S. is a party or from threat of such a war, the president may, by proclamation, prohibit the publishing or communicating of, or the attempting to publish or communicate any information relating to the national defense, which in his judgment is of such character that it is or might be useful to the enemy." During the debates in the Senate the First Amendment was specifically cited and that provision was defeated. 55 Cong.Rec. 2166.

Judge Gurfein's holding in the Times case that this act does not apply to this case was therefore preeminently sound. Moreover, the Act of September 23, 1950, in amending 18 U.S.C.A. § 793 states in § 1(b) that:

"Nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize, require, or establish military or civilian censorship or in any way to limit or infringe upon freedom of the press or of speech as guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States and no regulation shall be promulgated hereunder having that effect."

64 Stat. 987. Thus Congress has been faithful to the command of the First Amendment in this area.

So any power that the government possesses must come from its "inherent power."

The power to wage war is "the power to wage war successfully." See Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81, 93. But the war power stems from a declaration of war. The Constitution of Article I, § 8, gives Congress, not the president, power "to declare war." Nowhere are presidential wars authorized. We need not decide therefore what leveling effect the war power of Congress might have.

These disclosures may have a serious impact. But that is no basis for sanctioning a previous restraint on the press.

As we stated only the other day in Organization for a Better Austin v. Keefe, 402 U.S. 415, "any prior restraint on expression comes to this Court with a 'heavy presumption' against its constitutional validity."

The government says that it has inherent powers to go into court and obtain an injunction to protect that national interest, which in this case is alleged to be national security.

Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697, repudiated that expansive doctrine in no uncertain terms.

The dominant purpose of the First Amendment was to prohibit the widespread practice of governmental suppression of embarrassing information. It is common knowledge that the First Amendment was adopted against the widespread use of the common law of seditious libel to punish the dissemination of material that is embarrassing to the powers-that-be. See Emerson, The System of Freedom of Expression, c. V (1970); Chafee, Free Speech in the United States, c. XIII (1941). The present cases will, I think, go down in history as the most dramatic illustration of that principle. A debate of large proportions goes on in the Nation over our posture in Vietnam. That debate antedated the disclosure of the contents of the present documents. The latter are highly relevant to the debate in progress.

Secrecy in government is fundamentally antidemocratic, perpetuating bureaucratic errors. Open debate and discussion of public issues are vital to our national health. On public questions there should be "open and robust debate." New York Times, Inc. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 269–270.

I would affirm the judgment of the court of appeals in the Post case, vacate the stay of the court of appeals in the Times case and direct that it affirm the district court.

The stays in these cases that have been in effect for more than a week constitute a flouting of the principles of the First Amendment as interpreted in Near v. Minnesota.

Justice BRENNAN, concurring.

I write separately in these cases only to emphasize what should be apparent: that our judgment in the present cases may not be taken to indicate the propriety in the future, of issuing temporary stays and restraining orders to block the publication of material sought to be suppressed by the government. So far as I can determine, never before has the United States sought to enjoin a newspaper from publishing information in its possession. The relative novelty of the questions presented, the necessary haste with which decisions were reached, the magnitude of the interests asserted, and the fact that all the parties have concentrated their arguments upon the question whether permanent restraints were proper may have justified at least some of the restraints heretofore imposed in these cases. Certainly it is difficult to fault the several courts below for seeking to assure that the issues here involved were preserved for ultimate review by this Court. But even if it be assumed that some of the interim restraints were proper in the two cases before us, that assumption has no bearing upon the propriety of similar judicial action in the future. To begin with, there has now been ample time for reflection and judgment; whatever values there may be in the preservation of novel questions for appellate review may not support any restraints in the future. More important, the First Amendment stands as an absolute bar to the imposition of judicial restraints in circumstances of the kind presented by these cases.

The error which has pervaded these cases from the outset was the granting of any injunctive relief whatsoever, interim or otherwise. The entire thrust of the government's claim throughout these cases has been that publication of the material sought to be enjoined "could," or "might," or "may" prejudice the national interest in various ways. But the First Amendment tolerates absolutely no prior judicial restraints of the press predicated upon surmise or conjecture that untoward consequences may result. Our cases, it is true, have indicated that there is a single, extremely narrow class of cases in which the First Amendment's ban on prior judicial restraint may be overridden. Our cases have thus far indicated that such cases may arise only when the Nation "is at war," Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47, 52 (1919), during which times "no one would question but that a government might prevent actual obstruction to its recruiting service or the publication of the sailing dates of transports or the number and location of troops." Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697, 716 (1931). Even if the present world situation were assumed to be tantamount to a time of war, or if the power of presently available armaments would justify even in peacetime the suppression of information that would set in motion a nuclear holocaust, in neither of these actions has the government presented or even alleged that publication of items from or based upon the material at issue would cause the happening of an event of that nature. "The chief purpose of [the First Amendment's] guarantee [is] to prevent previous restraints upon publication." Near v. Minnesota, supra, at 713. Thus, only governmental allegation and proof that publication must inevitably, directly and immediately cause the occurrence of an event kindred to imperiling the safety of a transport already at sea can support even the issuance of an interim restraining order. In no event may mere conclusions be sufficient: for if the executive branch seeks judicial aid in preventing publication, it must inevitably submit the basis upon which that aid is sought to scrutiny by the judiciary. And therefore, every restraint issued in this case, whatever its form, has violated the First Amendment—and none the less so because that restraint was justified as necessary to afford the court an opportunity to examine the claim more thoroughly. Unless and until the government has clearly made out its case, the First Amendment commands that no injunction may issue.

Justice STEWART, with whom Justice White joins, concurring.

In the governmental structure created by our Constitution, the executive is endowed with enormous power in the two related areas of national defense and international relations. This power, largely unchecked by the legislative and judicial branches, has been pressed to the very hilt since the advent of the nuclear missile age. For better or for worse, the simple fact is that a president of the United States possesses vastly greater constitutional independence in these two vital areas of power than does, say a prime minister of a country with a parliamentary form of government.

In the absence of the governmental checks and balances present in other areas of our national life, the only effective restraint upon executive policy and power in the areas of national defense and international affairs may lie in an enlightened citizenry—in an informed and critical public opinion which alone can here protect the values of democratic government. For this reason, it is perhaps here that a press that is alert, aware, and free most vitally serves the basic purpose of the First Amendment. For without an informed and free press there cannot be an enlightened people.

Yet it is elementary that the successful conduct of international diplomacy and the maintenance of an effective national defense require both confidentiality and secrecy. * * *

I think there can be but one answer to this dilemma, if dilemma it be. The responsibility must be where the power is. If the Constitution gives the executive a large degree of unshared power in the conduct of foreign affairs and the maintenance of our national defense, then under the Constitution the executive must have the largely unshared duty to determine and preserve the degree of internal security necessary to exercise that power successfully. It is an awesome responsibility, requiring judgment and wisdom of a high order. I should suppose that moral, political, and practical considerations would dictate that a very first principle of that wisdom would be an insistence upon avoiding secrecy for its own sake. For when everything is classified, then nothing is classified, and the system becomes one to be disregarded by the cynical or the careless, and to be manipulated by those intent on self-protection or self-promotion. I should suppose, in short, that the hallmark of a truly effective internal security system would be the maximum possible disclosure, recognizing that secrecy can best be preserved only when credibility is truly maintained. But be that as it may, it is clear to me that it is the constitutional duty of the executive—as a matter of sovereign prerogative and not as a matter of law as the courts know law—through the promulgation and enforcement of executive regulations, to protect the confidentiality necessary to carry out its responsibilities in the fields of international relations and national defense. [Emphasis added.]

This is not to say that Congress and the courts have no role to play. Undoubtedly Congress has the power to enact specific and appropriate criminal laws to protect government property and preserve government secrets. Congress has passed such laws, and several of them are of very colorable relevance to the apparent circumstances of these cases. And if a criminal prosecution is instituted, it will be the responsibility of the courts to decide the applicability of the criminal law under which the charge is brought. Moreover, if Congress should pass a specific law authorizing civil proceedings in this field, the courts would likewise have the duty to decide the constitutionality of such a law as well as its applicability to the facts proved.

But in the cases before us we are asked neither to construe specific regulations nor to apply specific laws. We are asked, instead, to perform a function that the Constitution gave to the executive, not the judiciary. We are asked, quite simply, to prevent the publication by two newspapers of material that the executive branch insists should not, in the national interest, be published. I am convinced that the executive is correct with respect to some of the documents involved. But I cannot say that disclosure of any of them will surely result in direct, immediate, and irreparable damage to our Nation or its people. That being so, there can under the First Amendment be but one judicial resolution of the issues before us. I join the judgments of the Court.

Justice WHITE, with whom Justice Stewart joins, concurring.

I concur in today's judgments, but only because of the concededly extraordinary protection against prior restraints enjoyed by the press under our constitutional system. I do not say that in no circumstances would the First Amendment permit an injunction against publishing information about government plans or operations. Nor, after examining the materials the government characterizes as the most sensitive and destructive, can I deny that revelation of these documents will do substantial damage to public interests. Indeed, I am confident that their disclosure will have that result. But I nevertheless agree that the United States has not satisfied the very heavy burden which it must meet to warrant an injunction against publication in these cases, at least in the absence of express and appropriately limited congressional authorization for prior restraints in circumstances such as these.

The government's position is simply stated: The responsibility of the executive for the conduct of the foreign affairs and for the security of the Nation is so basic that the president is entitled to an injunction against publication of a newspaper story whenever he can convince a court that the information to be revealed threatens "grave and irreparable" injury to the public interest; and the injunction should issue whether or not the material to be published is classified, whether or not publication would be lawful under relevant criminal statutes enacted by Congress and regardless of the circumstances by which the newspaper came into possession of the information.

At least in the absence of legislation by Congress, based on its own investigations and findings, I am quite unable to agree that the inherent powers of the executive and the courts reach so far as to authorize remedies having such sweeping potential for inhibiting publications by the press. Much of the difficulty inheres in the "grave and irreparable danger" standard suggested by the United States. If the United States were to have judgment under such a standard in these cases, our decision would be of little guidance to other courts in other cases, for the material at issue here would not be available from the Court's opinion or from public records, nor would it be published by the press. Indeed, even today where we hold that the United States has not met its burden, the material remains sealed in court records and it is properly not discussed in today's opinions. Moreover, because the material poses substantial dangers to national interests and because of the hazards of criminal sanctions, a responsible press may choose never to publish the more sensitive materials. To sustain the government in these cases would start the courts down a long and hazardous road that I am not willing to travel at least without congressional guidance and direction.

It is not easy to reject the proposition urged by the United States and to deny relief on its good-faith claims in these cases that publication will work serious damage to the country. But that discomfiture is considerably dispelled by the infrequency of prior restraint cases. Normally, publication will occur and the damage be done before the government has either opportunity or grounds for suppression. So here, publication has already begun and a substantial part of the threatened damage has already occurred. The fact of a massive breakdown in security is known, access to the documents by many unauthorized people is undeniable and the efficacy of equitable relief against these or other newspapers to avert anticipated damage is doubtful at best.

What is more, terminating the ban on publication of the relatively few sensitive documents the government now seeks to suppress does not mean that the law either requires or invites newspapers or others to publish them or that they will be immune from criminal action if they do. Prior restraints require an unusually heavy justification under the First Amendment; but failure by the government to justify prior restraints does not measure its constitutional entitlement to a conviction for criminal publication. That the government mistakenly chose to proceed by injunction does not mean that it could not successfully proceed in another way.

When the Espionage Act was under consideration in 1917, Congress eliminated from the bill a provision that would have given the president broad powers in time of war to proscribe, under threat of criminal penalty, the publication of various categories of information related to the national defense. Congress at that time was unwilling to clothe the president with such far-reaching powers to monitor the press, and those opposed to this part of the legislation assumed that a necessary concomitant of such power was the power to "filter out the news to the people through some man." 55 Cong.Rec. 2008 (1917) [remarks of Senator Ashurst]. However, these same members of Congress appeared to have little doubt that newspapers would be subject to criminal prosecution if they insisted on publishing information of the type Congress had itself determined should not be revealed. Senator Ashurst, for example, was quite sure that the editor of such a newspaper "should be punished if he did publish information as to the movements of the fleet, the troops, the aircraft, the location of powder factories, the location of defense works, and all that sort of thing." 55 Cong.Rec. 1009 (1917).

The criminal code contains numerous provisions potentially relevant to these cases. Section 797 makes it a crime to publish certain photographs or drawings of military installations. Section 798, also in precise language, proscribes knowing and willful publications of any classified information concerning the cryptographic systems or communication intelligence activities of the United States as well as any information obtained from communication intelligence operations. If any of the material here at issue is of this nature, the newspapers are presumably now on full notice of the position of the United States and must face the consequences if they publish. I would have no difficulty in sustaining convictions under these sections on facts that would not justify the intervention of equity and the imposition of a prior restraint.

The same would be true under those sections of the criminal code casting a wider net to protect the national defense. Section 793(e) makes it a criminal act for any unauthorized possessor of a document "relating to national defense" either (1) willfully to communicate or cause to be communicated that document to any person not entitled to receive it or (2) willfully to retain the document and fail to deliver it to an officer of the United States entitled to receive it. The subsection was added in 1950 because pre-existing law provided no penalty for the unauthorized possessor unless demand for the documents was made. "The dangers surrounding the unauthorized possession of such items are self-evident, and it is deemed advisable to require their surrender in such a case, regardless of demand, especially since their unauthorized possession may be unknown to the authorities who would otherwise make the demand." S.Rep.No.2369, 81st Cong., 2d Sess., 9 (1950). Of course, in the cases before us, the unpublished documents have been demanded by the United States and their import has been made known at least to counsel for the newspapers involved. In Gorin v. United States, 312 U.S. 19, 28 (1941), the words "national defense" as used in a predecessor of § 793 were held by a unanimous court to have "a well understood connotation"—a "generic concept of broad connotations, referring to the military and naval establishments and the related activities of national preparedness"—and to be "sufficiently definite to apprise the public of prohibited activities" and to be consonant with due process. 312 U.S., at 28. Also, as construed by the Court in Gorin, information "connected with the national defense" is obviously not limited to that threatening "grave and irreparable" injury to the United States.

It is thus clear that Congress has addressed itself to the problems of protecting the security of the country and the national defense from unauthorized disclosure of potentially damaging information. Cf. Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 585–586 (1952); see also id., at 593–628 (Frankfurter, J., concurring). It has not, however, authorized the injunctive remedy against threatened publication. It has apparently been satisfied to rely on criminal sanctions and their deterrent effect on the responsible as well as the irresponsible press. I am not, of course, saying that either of these newspapers has yet committed a crime or that either would commit a crime if they published all the material now in their possession. That matter must await resolution in the context of a criminal proceeding if one is instituted by the United States. In that event, the issue of guilt or innocence would be determined by procedures and standards quite different from those that have purported to govern these injunctive proceedings.

Justice MARSHALL, concurring.

The government contends that the only issue in this case is whether in a suit by the United States, "the First Amendment bars a court from prohibiting a newspaper from publishing material whose disclosure would pose a grave and immediate danger to the security of the United States." Brief of the government, at 6. With all due respect, I believe the ultimate issue in this case is even more basic than the one posed by the solicitor general. The issue is whether this Court or the Congress has the power to make law.

In this case there is no problem concerning the president's power to classify information as "secret" or "top secret." Congress has specifically recognized presidential authority, which has been formally exercised in Executive Order 10501, to classify documents and information. See, eg., 18 U.S.C.A. § 798; 50 U.S.C.A. § 783. Nor is there any issue here regarding the president's power as chief executive and commander in chief to protect national security by disciplining employees who disclose information and by taking precautions to prevent leaks.

The problem here is whether in this particular case the Executive Branch has authority to invoke the equity jurisdiction of the courts to protect what it believes to be the national interest. See In re Debs, 158 U.S. 564, 584 (1895). The government argues that in addition to the inherent power of any government to protect itself, the president's power to conduct foreign affairs and his position as commander in chief give him authority to impose censorship on the press to protect his ability to deal effectively with foreign nations and to conduct the military affairs of the country. Of course, it is beyond cavil that the president has broad powers by virtue of his primary responsibility for the conduct of our foreign affairs and his position as commander in chief. * * * And in some situations it may be that under whatever inherent powers the government may have, as well as the implicit authority derived from the president's mandate to conduct foreign affairs and to act as commander in chief, there is a basis for the invocation of the equity jurisdiction of this Court as an aid to prevent the publication of material damaging to "national security," however that term may be defined.

It would, however, be utterly inconsistent with the concept of separation of power for this Court to use its power of contempt to prevent behavior that Congress has specifically declined to prohibit. There would be a similar damage to the basic concept of these coequal branches of government if when the executive has adequate authority granted by Congress to protect "national security" it can choose instead to invoke the contempt power of a court to enjoin the threatened conduct. The Constitution provides that Congress shall make laws, the president execute laws, and courts interpret law. Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579 (1952). It did not provide for government by injunction in which the courts and the Executive can "make law" without regard to the action of Congress. It may be more convenient for the executive if it need only convince a judge to prohibit conduct rather than to ask the Congress to pass a law and it may be more convenient to enforce a contempt order than seek a criminal conviction in a jury trial. Moreover, it may be considered politically wise to get a court to share the responsibility for arresting those who the executive has probable cause to believe are violating the law. But convenience and political considerations of the moment do not justify a basic departure from the principles of our system of government.

In this case we are not faced with a situation where Congress has failed to provide the executive with broad power to protect the Nation from disclosure of damaging state secrets. Congress has on several occasions given extensive consideration to the problem of protecting the military and strategic secrets of the United States. This consideration has resulted in the enactment of statutes making it a crime to receive, disclose, communicate, withhold, and publish certain documents, photographs, instruments, appliances, and information. The bulk of these statutes are found in chapter 37 of U.S.C.A. Title 18, entitled Espionage and Censorship. In that chapter, Congress has provided penalties ranging from a $10,000 fine to death for violating the various statutes.

Thus it would seem that in order for this Court to issue an injunction it would require a showing that such an injunction would enhance the already existing power of the government tract. See Bennett v. Laman, 277 N.Y. 368, 14 N.E.2d 439 (1938). It is a traditional axiom of equity that a court of equity will not do a useless thing just as it is a traditional axiom that equity will not enjoin the commission of a crime. Here there has been no attempt to make such a showing. The solicitor general does not even mention in his brief whether the government considers there to be probable cause to believe a crime has been committed or whether there is a conspiracy to commit future crimes.

If the government had attempted to show that there was no effective remedy under traditional criminal law, it would have had to show that there is no arguably applicable statute. Of course, at this stage this Court could not and cannot determine whether there has been a violation of a particular statute nor decide the constitutionality of any statute. Whether a good-faith prosecution could have been instituted under any statute could, however, be determined. * * *

It is true that Judge Gurfein found that Congress had not made it a crime to publish the items and material specified in § 793(e): He found that the words "communicates, delivers, transmits * * * " did not refer to publication of newspaper stories. And that view has some support in the legislative history and conforms with the past practice of using the statute only to prosecute those charged with ordinary espionage. But see 103 Cong.Rec. 10449 [remarks of Sen. Humphrey]. Judge Gurfein's view of the statute is not, however, the only plausible construction that could be given. See my Brother White's concurring opinion.

Even if it is determined that the government could not in good faith bring criminal prosecutions against the New York Times and the Washington Post, it is clear that Congress has specifically rejected passing legislation that would have clearly given the president the power he seeks here and made the current activity of the newspapers unlawful. When Congress specifically declines to make conduct unlawful it is not for this Court to redecide those issues—to overrule Congress. See Youngstown Sheet & Tube v. Sawyer, 345 U.S. 579 (1952).

On at least two occasions Congress has refused to enact legislation that would have made the conduct engaged in here unlawful and given the president the power that he seeks in this case. In 1917 during the debate over the original Espionage Act, still the basic provisions of § 793, Congress rejected a proposal to give the president in time of war or threat of war authority to directly prohibit by proclamation the publication of information relating to national defense that might be useful to the enemy. * * *

Congress rejected this proposal after war against Germany had been declared even though many believed that there was a grave national emergency and that the threat of security leaks and espionage were serious. The Executive has not gone to Congress and requested that the decision to provide such power be reconsidered. Instead, the executive comes to this Court and asks that it be granted the power Congress refused to give.

* * * Senator Cotton, proposed that "Congress enact legislation making it a crime for any person willfully to disclose without proper authorization, for any purpose whatever, information classified 'secret' or 'top secret,' knowing, or having reasonable grounds to believe, such information to have been so classified." Report of Commission on Governmental Security 619–620 (1957). After substantial floor discussion on the proposal, it was rejected. See 103 Cong.Rec. 10447–10450. If the proposal that Senator Cotton championed on the floor had been enacted, the publication of the documents involved here would certainly have been a crime. Congress refused, however, to make it a crime. * * *

Either the government has the power under statutory grant to use traditional criminal law to protect the country or, if there is no basis for arguing that Congress has made the activity a crime, it is plain that Congress has specifically refused to grant the authority the government seeks from this Court. In either case this Court does not have authority to grant the requested relief. It is not for this Court to fling itself into every breach perceived by some government official nor is it for this Court to take on itself the burden of enacting law, especially law that Congress has refused to pass.

I believe that the judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia should be affirmed and the judgment of the United States court of Appeals for the Second Circuit should be reversed insofar as it remands the case for further hearings.

Chief Justice BURGER, dissenting.

So clear are the constitutional limitations on prior restraint against expression, that from the time of Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931), until recently in Organization for a Better Austin v. Keefe, 402 U.S. 415 (1971), we have had little occasion to be concerned with cases involving prior restraints against news reporting on matters of public interest. There is, therefore, little variation among the members of the Court in terms of resistance to prior restraints against publication. Adherence to this basic constitutional principle, however, does not make this case a simple one. In this case, the imperative of a free and unfettered press comes into collision with another imperative, the effective functioning of a complex modern government and specifically the effective exercise of certain constitutional powers of the executive. Only those who view the First Amendment as an absolute in all circumstances—a view I respect, but reject—can find such a case as this to be simple or easy.

This case is not simple for another and more immediate reason. We do not know the facts of the case. No district judge knew all the facts. No court of appeals judge knew all the facts. No member of this Court knows all the facts.

Why are we in this posture, in which only those judges to whom the First Amendment is absolute and permits of no restraint in any circumstances or for any reason, are really in a position to act?

I suggest we are in this posture because these cases have been conducted in unseemly haste. Justice Harlan covers the chronology of events demonstrating the hectic pressures under which these cases have been processed and I need not restate them. The prompt setting of these cases reflects our universal abhorrence of prior restraint. But prompt judicial action does not mean unjudicial haste.

Here, moreover, the frenetic haste is due in large part to the manner in which the Times proceeded from the date it obtained the purloined documents. It seems reasonably clear now that the haste precluded reasonable and deliberate judicial treatment of these cases and was not warranted. The precipitous action of this Court aborting a trial not yet completed is not the kind of judicial conduct which ought to attend the disposition of a great issue.

The newspapers make a derivative claim under the First Amendment; they denominate this right as the public right-to-know; by implication, the Times asserts a sole trusteeship of that right by virtue of its journalist "scoop." The right is asserted as an absolute. Of course, the First Amendment right itself is not an absolute, as Justice Holmes so long ago pointed out in his aphorism concerning the right to shout of fire in a crowded theater. There are other exceptions, some of which Chief Justice Hughes mentioned by way of example in Near v. Minnesota. There are no doubt other exceptions no one has had occasion to describe or discuss. Conceivably such exceptions may be lurking in these cases and would have been flushed had they been properly considered in the trial courts, free from unwarranted deadlines and frenetic pressures. A great issue of this kind should be tried in a judicial atmosphere conducive to thoughtful, reflective deliberation, especially when haste, in terms of hours, is unwarranted in light of the long period the Times, by its own choice, deferred publication.

It is not disputed that the Times has had unauthorized possession of the documents for three to four months, during which it has had its expert analysts studying them, presumably digesting them and preparing the material for publication. During all of this time, the Times, presumably in its capacity as trustee of the public's "right to know," has held up publication for purposes it considered proper and thus public knowledge was delayed. No doubt this was for a good reason; the analysis of 7,000 pages of complex material drawn from a vastly greater volume of material would inevitably take time and the writing of good news stories takes time. But why should the United States Government, from whom this information was illegally acquired by someone, along with all the counsel, trial judges, and appellate judges be placed under needless pressure? After these months of deferral, the alleged right-to-know has somehow and suddenly become a right that must be vindicated instanter.

Would it have been unreasonable, since the newspaper could anticipate the government's objections to release of secret material, to give the government an opportunity to review the entire collection and determine whether agreement could be reached on publication? Stolen or not, if security was not in fact jeopardized, much of the material could no doubt have been declassified, since it spans a period ending in 1968. With such an approach—one that great newspapers have in the past practiced and stated editorially to be the duty of an honorable press—the newspapers and government might well have narrowed the area of disagreement as to what was and was not publishable, leaving the remainder to be resolved in orderly litigation if necessary. To me it is hardly believable that a newspaper long regarded as a great institution in American life would fail to perform one of the basic and simple duties of every citizen with respect to the discovery or possession of stolen property or secret government documents. That duty, I had thought—perhaps naively—was to report forthwith, to responsible public officers. This duty rests on taxi drivers, Justices and the New York Times. The course followed by the Times whether so calculated or not, removed any possibility of orderly litigation of the issues. If the action of the judges up to now has been correct, that result is sheer happenstance.

Our grant of the writ before final judgment in the Times case aborted the trial in the District Court before it had made a complete record pursuant to the mandate of the Court of Appeals, Second Circuit.

The consequence of all this melancholy series of events is that we literally do not know what we are acting on. As I see it we have been forced to deal with litigation concerning rights of great magnitude without an adequate record, and surely without time for adequate treatment either in the prior proceedings or in this Court. It is interesting to note that counsel in oral argument before this Court were frequently unable to respond to questions on factual points. Not surprisingly they pointed out that they had been working literally "around the clock" and simply were unable to review the documents that give rise to these cases and were not familiar with them. This Court is in no better posture. I agree with Justice Harlan and Justice Blackmun but I am not prepared to reach the merits.[3]

I would affirm the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit and allow the district court to complete the trial aborted by our grant of certiorari meanwhile preserving the status quo in the Post case. I would direct that the district court on remand give priority to the Times case to the exclusion of all other business of that court but I would not set arbitrary deadlines.

I should add that I am in general agreement with much of what Justice White has expressed with respect to penal sanctions concerning communication or retention of documents or information relating to the national defense.

We all crave speedier judicial processes but when judges are pressured as in these cases the result is a parody of the judicial process.

Justice HARLAN, with whom the Chief Justice and Justice Blackmun join, dissenting.

With all respect, I consider that the Court has been almost irresponsibly feverish in dealing with these cases.

Both the Circuit of Appeals for the Second Circuit and the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit rendered judgment on June 23. The New York Times' petition for certiorari, its motion for accelerated consideration thereof, and its application for interim relief were filed in this Court on June 24 at about 11 a.m. The application of the United States for interim relief in the Post case was also filed here on June 24, at about 7:15 p.m. This Court's order setting a hearing before us on June 26 at 11 a.m., a course which I joined only to avoid the possibility of even more peremptory action by the Court, was issued less than 24 hours before. The record in the Post case was filed with the Clerk shortly before 1 p.m. on June 25; the record in the Times case did not arrive until 7 or 8 o'clock that same night. The briefs of the parties were received less than two hours before argument on June 23.

This frenzied train of events took place in the name of the presumption against prior restraints created by the First Amendment. Due regard for the extraordinarily important and difficult questions involved in these litigations should have led the Court to shun such a precipitate timetable. In order to decide the merits of these cases properly, some or all of the following questions should have been faced:

1. Whether the attorney general is authorized to bring these suits in the name of the United States. Compare In re Debs, 158 U.S. 564 (1895), with Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579 (1952). This question involves as well the construction and validity of a singularly opaque statute—the Espionage Act, 18 U.S.C.A. § 793(e).
2. Whether the First Amendment permits the federal courts to enjoin publication of stories which would present a serious threat to national security. See Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697, 716 (1931) (dictum).
3. Whether the threat to publish highly secret documents is of itself a sufficient implication of national security to justify an injunction on the theory that

3. With respect to the question of inherent power of the executive to classify papers, records and documents as secret, or otherwise unavailable for public exposure, and to secure aid of the courts for enforcement, there may be an analogy with respect to this Court. No statute gives this Court express power to establish and enforce the utmost security measures for the secrecy of our deliberations and records. Yet I have little doubt as to the inherent power of the Court to protect the confidentiality of its internal operations by whatever judicial measures may be required.

regardless of the contents of the documents harm enough results simply from the demonstration of such a breach of secrecy.

4. Whether the unauthorized disclosure of any of these particular documents would seriously impair the national security.

5. What weight should be given to the opinion of high officers in the executive branch of the government with respect to questions 3 and 4.

6. Whether the newspapers are entitled to retain and use the documents notwithstanding the seemingly uncontested facts that the documents, or the originals of which they are duplicates, were purloined from the government's possession and that the newspapers received them with knowledge that they had been feloniously acquired. Cf. Liberty Lobby, Inc. v. Pearson, 390 F.2d 489 (C.A.D.C. 1968).

7. Whether the threatened harm to the national security or the government's possessory interest in the documents justifies the issuance of an injunction against publication in light of—

a. The strong First Amendment policy against prior restraints on publication;

b. The doctrine against enjoining conduct in violation of criminal statutes; and

c. The extent to which the materials at issue have apparently already been otherwise disseminated.

These are difficult questions of fact, of law, and of judgment; the potential consequences of erroneous decision are enormous. The time which has been available to us, to the lower courts, and to the parties has been wholly inadequate for giving these cases the kind of consideration they deserve. It is a reflection on the stability of the judicial process that these great issues—as important as any that have arisen during my time on the Court—should have been decided under the pressures engendered by the torrent of publicity that has attended these litigations from their inception.

Forced as I am to reach the merits of these cases, I dissent from the opinion and judgments of the Court. Within the severe limitations imposed by the time constraints under which I have been required to operate, I can only state my reasons in telescoped form, even though in different circumstances I would have felt constrained to deal with the cases in the fuller sweep indicated above.

It is a sufficient basis for affirming the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in the Times litigation to observe that its order must rest on the conclusion that because of the time elements the government had not been given an adequate opportunity to present its case to the district court. At the least this conclusion was not an abuse of discretion.

In the Post litigation the government had more time to prepare; this was apparently the basis for the refusal of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit on rehearing to conform its judgment to that of the second circuit. But I think there is another and more fundamental reason why this judgment cannot stand—a reason which also furnishes an additional ground for not reinstating the judgment of the district court in the Times litigation, set aside by the court of appeals. It is plain to me that the scope of the judicial function in passing upon the activities of the executive branch of the government in the field of foreign affairs is very narrowly restricted. This view is, I think, dictated by the concept of separation of powers upon which our constitutional system rests.

In a speech on the floor of the House of Representatives, Chief Justice John Marshall, then a member of that body, stated:

> The president is the sole organ of the nation in its external relations, and its sole representative with foreign nations. Annals, 6th Cong., col. 613 (1800).

* * * From that time, shortly after the founding of the Nation, to this, there has been no substantial challenge to this description of the scope of executive power. * * *

* * *

The power to evaluate the "pernicious influence" of premature disclosure is not, however, lodged in the executive alone. I agree that, in performance of its duty to protect the values of the First Amendment against political pressures, the judiciary must review the initial executive determination to the point of satisfying itself that the subject matter of the dispute does lie within the proper compass of the president's foreign relations power. Constitutional considerations forbid "a complete abandonment of judicial control." Cf. United States v. Reynolds, 345 U.S. 1, 8 (1953). Moreover, the judiciary may properly insist that the determination that disclosure of the subject matter would irreparably impair the national security be made by the head of the executive department concerned—here the secretary of state or the secretary of defense—after actual personal consideration by that officer. This safeguard is required in the analogous area of executive claims of privilege for secrets of state. See United States v. Reynolds, at 8 and n. 20; Duncan v. Cammell, Laird & Co., (1942) A.C. 624, 638 (House of Lords).

But in my judgment the judiciary may not properly go beyond these two inquiries and redetermine for itself the probable impact of disclosure on the national security.

Even if there is some room for the judiciary to override the executive determination, it is plain that the scope of review must be exceedingly narrow. I can see no indication in the opinions of either the district court or the court of appeals in the Post litigation that the conclusions of the executive were given even the deference owing to an administrative agency, much less that owing to a coequal branch of the government operating within the field of its constitutional prerogative.

Accordingly, I would vacate the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit on this ground and remand the case for further proceedings in the district court. Before the commencement of such further proceedings, due opportunity should be afforded the government for procuring from the secretary of state or the secretary of defense or both an expression of their views on the issue of national security. The ensuing review by the district court should be in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion. And for the reasons stated above I would affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

Pending further hearings in each case conducted under the appropriate ground rules, I would continue the restraints on publication. I cannot believe that the doctrine prohibiting prior restraints reaches to the point of preventing courts from maintaining the status quo long enough to act responsibly in matters of such national importance as those involved here.

Justice BLACKMUN, dissenting.

I join Justice Harlan in his dissent. I also am in substantial accord with much that Justice White says, by way of admonition, in the latter part of his opinion.

At this point the focus is on only the comparatively few documents specified by the government as critical. So far as the other material—vast in amount—is concerned, let it be published and published forthwith if the newspapers, once the strain is gone and the sensationalism is eased, still feel the urge so to do.

But we are concerned here with the few documents specified from the 47 volumes. * * *

The New York Times clandestinely devoted a period of three months examining the 47 volumes that came into its unauthorized possession. Once it had begun publication of material from those volumes, the New York case now before us emerged. It immediately assumed, and ever since has maintained, a frenetic pace and character. Seemingly, once publication started, the material could not be made public fast enough. Seemingly, from then on, every deferral or delay, by restraint or otherwise, was abhorrent and was to be deemed violative of the First Amendment and of the public's "right immediately to know." Yet that newspaper stood before us at oral argument and professed criticism of the government for not lodging its protest earlier than by a Monday telegram following the initial Sunday publication.

The District of Columbia case is much the same.

Two federal district courts, two United States courts of appeals, and this Court—within a period of less than three weeks from inception until today—have been pressed into hurried decision of profound constitutional issues on inadequately developed and largely assumed facts without the careful deliberation that hopefully, should characterize the American judicial process. There has been much writing about the law and little knowledge and less digestion of the facts. In the New York case the judges, both trial and appellate, had not yet examined the basic material when the case was brought here. In the District of Columbia case, little more was done, and what was accomplished in this respect was only on required remand, with the Washington Post, on the excuse that it was trying to protect its source of information, initially refusing to reveal what material it actually possessed, and with the district court forced to make assumptions as to that possession.

With such respect as may be due to the contrary view, this, in my opinion, is not the way to try a lawsuit of this magnitude and asserted importance. It is not the way for federal courts to adjudicate, and to be required to adjudicate, issues that allegedly concern the Nation's vital welfare. The country would be none the worse off were the cases tried quickly, to be sure, but in the customary and properly deliberative manner. The most recent of the material, it is said, dates no later than 1968, already about three years ago, and the Times itself took three months to formulate its plan of procedure and, thus, deprived its public for that period.

The First Amendment, after all, is only one part of an entire Constitution. Article II of the great document vests in the executive branch primary power over the conduct of foreign affairs and places in that branch the responsibility for the Nation's safety. Each provision of the Constitution is important, and I cannot subscribe to a doctrine of unlimited absolutism for the First Amendment at the cost of downgrading other provisions. First Amendment absolutism has never commanded a majority of this Court. See, for example, Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697, 708 (1931), and Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47, 52 (1919). What is needed here is a weighing, upon properly developed standards, of the broad right of the press to print and of the very narrow right of the Government to prevent,. Such standards are not yet developed. The parties here are in disagreement as to what those standards should be. But even the newspapers conceded that there are situations where restraint is in order and is constitutional. Justice Holmes gave us a suggestion when he said in Schenck,

"It is a question of proximity and degree. When a nation is at war many things that might be said in time of peace are such a hindrance to its effort that their utterance will not be endured so long as men fight and that no Court could regard them as protected by any constitutional right." 249 U.S., at 52.

I therefore would remand these cases to be developed expeditiously, of course, but on a schedule permitting the orderly presentation of evidence from both sides, with the use of discovery, if necessary, as authorized by the rules, and with the preparation of briefs, oral argument and court opinions of a quality better than has been seen to this point. In making this last statement, I criticize no lawyer or judge. I know from past personal experience the agony of time pressure in the preparation of litigation. But these cases and the issues involved and the courts, including this one, deserve better than has been produced thus far.

It may well be that if these cases were allowed to develop as they should be developed, and to be tried as lawyers should try them and as courts should hear them, free of pressure and panic and sensationalism, other light would be shed on the situation and contrary considerations, for me, might prevail. But that is not the present posture of the litigation.

The Court, however, decides the cases today the other way. I therefore add one final comment.

I strongly urge, and sincerely hope, that these two newspapers will be fully aware of their ultimate responsibilities to the United States of America. Judge Wilkey, dissenting in the District of Columbia case, after a review of only the affidavits before his court (the basic papers had not then been made available by either party), concluded that there were a number of examples of documents that if in the possession of the Post, and if published, "could clearly result in great harm to the nation," and he defined "harm" to mean "the death of soldiers, the destruction of alliances, the greatly increased difficulty of negotiations with our enemies, the inability of our diplomats to negotiate * * *." I, for one, have now been able to give at least some cursory study not only to the affidavits, but to the material itself. I regret to say that from this examination I fear that Judge Wilkey's statements have possible foundation. I therefore share his concern. I hope that damage already has not been done. If, however, damage has been done, and if, with the Court's action today, these newspapers proceed to publish the critical documents and there results therefrom "the death of soldiers, the destruction of alliances, the greatly increased difficulty of negotiation with our enemies, the inability of our diplomats to negotiate," to which list I might add the factors of prolongation of the war and of further delay in the freeing of United States prisoners, then the Nation's people will know where the responsibility for these sad consequences rests.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit is therefore affirmed. The order of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit is reversed and the case is remanded with directions to enter a judgment affirming the judgment of the District Court for the Southern District of New York. The stays entered June 25, 1971, by the Court are vacated. The judgments shall issue forthwith.

So ordered.

COMMENT

The doctrine urged by the government was that the president has the right to enjoin publication of a news story when the context of the story threatens "grave and irreparable" injury to the public interest. Justice White denied both the existence and the validity of this doctrine at least in the absence of legislation authorizing the courts to grant injunctions in such circumstances.

Freedom of the press can be viewed as providing two modes of protection. One is freedom from prior restraint. The second is freedom from subsequent punishment. Criminal prosecution of Sulzberger or Graham, publishers respectively of the New York Times and the Washington Post, after publication of the Pentagon papers would be an example of subsequent punishment. Apparently Justice White was of the opinion that the "extraordinary protection" granted the press by the First Amendment against prior restraints is to be distinguished from the protection afforded the press by the First Amendment in the case of subsequent punishments. The greater protection from prior restraint presumably is based on the premise that a restraint on publication prior to publication deprives society of the benefit of the idea. The punishment of the writer or publisher subsequent to publication still has not hindered the dissemination of the idea. Is this a persuasive distinction?

If the publishers of newspapers are free from prior restraint prior to publication but know that after publication they may go to jail, doesn't this effectively restrain publication in the first place? The lesser protection against subsequent punishment itself may act as a prior restraint. In effect, the lesser freedom from subsequent punishment forces publishers and journalists to become martyrs when they want to publish information the government desires to suppress.

For Justice White, as for Justice Stewart, the case for criminal convictions against those publishing the Pentagon Papers was much stronger than the case for preventing by injunction the publication of the papers: "I would have no difficulty in sustaining convictions under these sections on facts that would not justify the intervention of equity and the imposition of a prior restraint." Why? Apparently because, in White's view, Congress had authorized criminal prosecutions, but it had not authorized the "injunctive remedy against threatened publication." The journalist and the civil libertarian at this point might wonder whether the 1971 New York Times case is a victory or a trap for freedom of information and freedom from prior restraint. Newspersons are being told that they may publish but will have to put their bodies on the line if they do. Four of the nine justices would seem to condone criminal penalties if indeed United States interests have been gravely injured.

Congress had not by statute authorized the injunctions against the press to prevent publication of material posing a danger to the security interests of the nation, even though it had been asked to do so in two world wars. This single fact was determinative for Justice Marshall, as it had been for Justices White and Stewart. The issue, said Justice Marshall, was whether the Court or the Congress should make law. But the Supreme Court has not hesitated to make law before.

Perhaps more squarely than any of the other opinions, Burger's dissent raises the issue of accountability: who should make the ultimate decisions about how far the reach of a free press can extend and to what extent should the demands of government for confidentiality in its dealings be honored? Chief Justice Burger was greatly disturbed by the fact that in the haste of decision the Court had neither time to study the documents themselves nor to consider soberly the great issues presented.

Describing the public right to know as a derivative First Amendment claim, Burger protested the Times' apparent position that it was the absolute trustee of the public right to know. He argued that the First Amendment itself was not an absolute, much less were any radiations the Amendment might throw off such as the public's right to know.

Burger's reactions to the issues of the Times case are at once protective of the information process and sympathetic to the need of government for confidentiality. The Chief Justice says that the government should have been given an opportunity to review the papers in possession of the Times in the hope that agreement about publication could have been reached. On the other hand, the fact that the papers were stolen was in Burger's view no bar to declassification of some of them.

Burger thought it was anomalous that the Times would not allow the government to examine the Pentagon Papers in the Times' possession for fear this might jeopardize the paper's sources. Yet, said Burger, the Times denies the government the right to keep the papers secret. But is the government really interested in protecting sources in the same way the New York Times was interested in protecting its sources? Certainly, there was a respectable body of opinion in the country which believed that the government was anxious to protect the identities of participants in decisions on the Vietnam involvement as well as the nature of some of the decisions themselves. The Times, however, was anxious to protect the sources which made it possible to learn the identities of participants in vital national decisions. In other words, the interest of the Times in protecting its sources was procedural in nature. From whom the newspapers receive information is, informationally speaking, much less significant than the information obtained. Secrecy over such sources is designed to protect the future of the information flow. The government, on the other hand, was interested in protecting confidentiality to shield prior decisions of the highest substantive character. As a First Amendment matter, doesn't this distinction support the Times and not the government?

Chief Justice Burger is truly astonished that the Times did not report to the government that papers stolen from the government were in its possession. But the responsibilities to government in this regard were surely overshadowed in the Times' judgment by its obligations to the information process, a duty which it believed had First Amendment significance. In the last analysis, the question presented was a choice between a newspaper's determination of the legitimate demands of the public's right to know and the executive's conception of what must remain secret. Which determination should prevail?

Is a consequence of Justice Black's absolute view of the First Amendment that there is no recourse if the newspapers are not aware of their responsibilities? It is argued that at least the executive is subject to popular election and may be turned out of office if it is faithless to its responsibilities, but the press is not similarly accountable to the people.

A majority of the Court appeared to agree with Justice Brennan's observation that the basic error in the entire proceeding was Judge Gurfein's issuance of the temporary restraining order against the New York Times. Why then were there so many opinions in the case? In an interview, Chief Justice Burger answered this question by saying that it was decided that if each justice wrote his own opinion, that would make it easier to get an expedited decision of the case.

Justice Black emphasized the unprecedented character of the judicial restraint on the press. The Pentagon Papers case was the first time an American newspaper had been restrained by a court order from publishing articles and documents the content of which could only be surmised by the government and whose damaging properties therefore could only be assumed. Viewed from that perspective, the 6–3 Supreme Court determination that the issuance of a restraining order in such circumstances was unconstitutional was a victory for freedom of information and freedom of the press. In this regard, the victory was more than an abstract vindication of constitutional theory. The decision unquestionably would deprive the whole government classification program of its legitimacy and its mystery, developments which are in the long-term interest of opening up the information process.

See the material on the Freedom of Information Act set forth in the text at p. 457. How could the Freedom of Information Act have been used to declassify the Pentagon Papers?

The Times agonized for three months over whether to publish the Pentagon Papers. They chose to publish and thereby invited a bitter conflict with government. Why? Perhaps the Times was still feeling the burn it got when it "cooperated" with the Administration prior to the Bay of Pigs fiasco and, therefore, decided never to get caught in that situation again. Five years after the abortive invasion it was disclosed that the New York Times had prior knowledge of the project but had declined to publish it, at the request of President John F. Kennedy, because of national security considerations. Clifton Daniel, then managing editor of the paper, combined this disclosure with his conclusion that the Bay of Pigs operation "might well have been canceled, and the country would have been saved enormous embarrassment, if the New York Times and other newspapers had been more diligent in the performance of their duty."

Finally, there is a minor but important theme in the whole Pentagon Papers case—the issue of whether government ought to be able to imprison history.

In the bizarre Progressive case, the federal government sought to prevent The Progressive magazine from publishing an article on how to make a hydrogen bomb. The article was based on material that was publicly available. At first, the federal district court granted the government's request for a temporary injunction, restraining publication of the article by The Progressive on the ground that the article fell "within the narrow area recognized by the court in Near v. Minnesota in which a prior restraint on publication is appropriate." Which Near exception was the court relying on? The federal district court also cited Justice Stewart's opinion in the Pentagon Papers case as support for its view that a temporary injunction should be issued. The Atomic Energy Act contained a provision authorizing the issuance of injunctive relief to prevent disclosure of particular types of information. Assuming that that provision applied to The Progressive article, would the existence of such a statutory provision distinguish The Progressive case from the Pentagon Papers case? Arguably, it would, because the fact that there was no statutory basis for the granting of injunctive relief in the Pentagon Papers case was relied on by a number of justices as ground for not granting relief for the government.

Assuming that the statutory provision did apply to the article in The Progressive case, would the statutory provision be valid under the First Amendment? This is a matter of speculation since other newspapers began to publish material similar to that contained in The Progressive article, and the government decided not to go forward in its effort to secure permanent injunctive relief concerning The Progressive article. See United States v. Progressive, Inc., 467 F.Supp. 990 (W.D.Wis.1979), appeal dismissed 610 F.2d 819 (7th Cir.).

Progressive editor Erwin Knoll is on record as saying that the greatest moral error of his life was not to have published the original article. Disobey a court injunction, Columbia University law professor Vincent Blasi argued in rebuttal, and you escalate the totalitarian dynamic. The government, as has been noted, based its arguments primarily on provisions of the Atomic Energy Act prohibiting communication, transmission, and disclosure of certain categories of information which, the government contended, were either "classified at birth" or of a technical nature not protected by the First Amendment.

Judge Warren in his opinion for the federal district court saw the issue as one between freedom of speech and press and the freedom to live. If our right to live is extinguished, he said, the right to publish becomes moot. His test would have been that of Justices White and Stewart in their Pentagon Papers opinions—"immediate, direct, irreparable harm to the interests of the United States * * * to our nation and its people."

Abandonment of the case by the government was another lost opportunity for appellate courts to face the ultimate and still unresolved question of what is to be the constitutional relationship between prior restraints and national security. In answering that question, the courts will eventually have to define both prior restraints and national security, two complex concepts in precarious balance.

Nebraska Press and the Future of Prior Restraint

A major case involving the issue of the constitutional validity of prior restraints against the press is the so-called "gag order" case, Nebraska Press Ass'n v. Stuart, text, p. 113. Although the case is discussed primarily in the free press–fair trial materials, text, Chapter 5, it has authoritative significance on the present status of prior restraints against the press.

The decision of the Court in Nebraska Press Ass'n stretched the thesis advanced in earlier cases that there is a presumption against prior restraints and that the state must meet a heavy burden before such a restraint can issue. In result, the Nebraska Press case reached the same conclusion as had its predecessors—Near and the Pentagon Papers case. In each case, the Supreme Court refused to issue a prior restraint against the press.

And yet, although the press was victorious on each occasion, the Court appeared determined to keep alive the possibility that in some undescribed circumstances a prior restraint against the press might be permissible. In short, although the Court has erected the strongest possible obstacles to the issuance of a prior restraint in the context of a "gag order" case, it still appeared resolved to reject "the proposition that a prior restraint can never be employed." Justice White, in a concurring opinion, suggested that if the consequence of the Court's Nebraska Press decision is to refuse to issue "gag orders" against the press in case after case on the ground that they are invalid prior restraints, then "we should at some point announce a more general rule and avoid the interminable litigation that our failure to do so would necessarily entail."

Justice Brennan's passionate distaste for prior restraints against the press is made vividly clear in his concurring opinion in Nebraska Press. He comments proudly on "the rarity of prior restraint cases of any type in this Court's jurisprudence." Analyzing the prior case law, he finds only one occasion where the exception to the presumption against prior restraints against the press might be deemed sufficient to authorize suppression before publication, i.e., the so-called military security exception in Near. This would be the situation where a newspaper plans to publish the sailing date of a troop ship in war, or its modern counterpart. The "overriding countervailing" interests that justify such suppression in wartime were, in his view, hardly comparable to the case for a prior restraint against the press in the interests of a fair trial.

Does the following state the essence of the Brennan concurrence? Although prior restraints are not always invalid, prior restraints in the form of "gag orders" against the press in the free press–fair trial context are always invalid. Perhaps the difference between Chief Justice Burger and Justice Brennan on this point is that the Burger opinion kept open the possibility, no matter how remote, that some "gag orders" against the press were yet conceivable while the Brennan view would remove that possibility. Brennan would adhere to the military security exception, despite the general freedom he would accord the press from prior restraint, but would not grant a new exception in the interest of fair trial. Yet the latter is a constitutional value, enshrined in the Sixth Amendment, while secrecy in wartime, although it may be a societal value of great importance, is not mentioned in the constitution.

On balance, if one compares Near and New York Times with the decision in Nebraska Press, the conclusion appears clear that never in American constitutional history has the barrier posed by the First Amendment to the issuance of prior restraints against the press been higher and more difficult to surmount. Freedom of Circulation and Distribution

UNITED STATES, ex rel., MILWAUKEE SOCIAL DEMOCRATIC PUBLISHING CO. v. BURLESON

255 U.S. 407, 41 S.CT. 352, 65 L.ED. 704 (1921).

Justice CLARKE delivered the opinion of the Court.

[A]n order was entered, revoking the second-class mail privilege granted to the Milwaukee Leader. * * *

[The Milwaukee Social Democratic Publishing Company then instituted suit asking for mandamus to command the postmaster general to restore the newspaper's second-class mailing privilege.]

* * *

The grounds upon which the relator relies are, in substance, that to the extent that the Espionage Act confers power upon the postmaster general to make the order entered against it, that act is unconstitutional, because it does not afford relator a trial in a court of competent jurisdiction; that the order deprives relator of the right of free speech, is destructive of the rights of a free press, and deprives it of its property without due process of law.

* * *

One entire title of this act (title 12) is devoted to "Use of the Mails," and in the exercise of its practically plenary power over the mails, Congress therein provided that any newspaper published in violation of any of the provisions of the act should be "nonmailable" and should not be "conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier."

* * *

Without further discussion of the articles, we cannot doubt that they conveyed to readers of them false reports and false statements, with intent to promote the success of the enemies of the United States, and that they constituted a willful attempt to cause disloyalty and refusal of duty in the military and naval forces, and to obstruct the recruiting and enlistment service of the United States, in violation of the Espionage Law (Schenck v. United States), and that therefore their publication brought the paper containing them within the express terms of title 12 of that law, declaring that such a publication shall be "nonmailable" and "shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier."

* * * The order of the postmaster general not only finds reasonable support in this record, but is amply justified by it.

Government is a practical institution, adapted to the practical conduct of public affairs. It would not be possible for the United States to maintain a reader in every newspaper office of the country, to approve in advance each issue before it should be allowed to enter the mails, and when, for more than five months, a paper had contained, almost daily, articles which, under the express terms of the statute, rendered it "nonmailable," it was reasonable to conclude that it would continue its disloyal publications, and it was therefore clearly within the power given to the postmaster general by R.S. § 396, "to execute all laws relating to the postal service," to enter, as was done in this case, an order suspending the privilege until a proper application and showing should be made for its renewal. The order simply withdrew from the relator the second-class privilege, but did not exclude its paper from other classes, as it might have done, and there was nothing in it to prevent reinstatement at any time. It was open to the relator to mend its ways, to publish a paper conforming to the law, and then to apply anew for the second-class mailing privilege. This it did not do, but for reasons not difficult to imagine, it preferred this futile litigation, undertaken upon the theory that a government competent to wage war against its foreign enemies was powerless against its insidious foes at home. Whatever injury the relator suffered was the result of its own choice and the judgment of the court of appeals is affirmed.

Justice BRANDEIS, dissenting. This case arose during the World War; but it presents no legal question peculiar to war. It is important, because what we decide may determine in large measure whether in times of peace our press shall be free.

It thus appears that the Postmaster General, in the exercise of a supposed discretion, refused to carry at second-class mail rates all future issues of the Milwaukee Leader, solely because he believed it had systematically violated the Espionage Act in the past. It further appears that this belief rested partly upon the contents of past issues of the paper filed with the return and partly upon "representations and complaints from sundry good and loyal citizens", whose statements are not incorporated in this record and which do not appear to have been called to the attention of the publisher of the Milwaukee Leader at the hearing or otherwise. It is this general refusal thereafter to accept the paper for transmission at the second-class mail rates which is challenged as being without warrant in law.

In discussing whether Congress conferred upon the postmaster general the authority which he undertook to exercise in this case, I shall consider, first, whether he would have had the power to exclude the paper altogether from all future mail service on the ground alleged; and, second, whether he had power to deny the publisher the second-class rate.

Power to exclude from the mails has never been conferred in terms upon the postmaster general. * * *

Until recently, at least, this appears never to have been questioned and the Post Office Department has been authoritatively advised that the power of excluding matter from the mail was limited to such specific matter as upon examination was found to be unmailable and that the postmaster general could not make an exclusion order operative upon future issues of a newspaper.

* * *

If such power were possessed by the postmaster general he would, in view of the practical finality of his decisions, become the universal censor of publications. For a denial of the use of the mail would be for most of them, tantamount to a denial of the right of circulation. * * *

The postmaster general does not claim here the power to issue an order directly denying a newspaper all mail service for the future. Indeed, he asserts that the mail is still open to the Milwaukee Leader upon payment of first, third, or fourth class rates. He contends, however, that in regard to second-class rates special provisions of law apply under which he may deny that particular rate at his discretion. This contention will now be considered. * * *

* * *

It is insisted that a citizen uses the mail at second-class rates, not as of right, but by virtue of a privilege or permission, the granting of which rests in the discretion of the postmaster general. * * * The certificate evidencing such freedom is spoken of as a permit. But, in fact, the right to the lawful postal rates is a right independent of the discretion of the postmaster general. The right and conditions of its existence are defined and rest wholly upon mandatory legislation of Congress. It is the duty of the postmaster general to determine whether the conditions prescribed for any rate exist. * * * And it is not a function which either involves or permits the exercise of discretionary power.

* * *

It clearly appears that there was no express grant of power to the postmaster general to deny second-class mail rates to future issues of a newspaper because in his opinion it had systematically violated the Espionage Act in the past, and it seems equally clear that there is no basis for the contention that such power is to be implied. * * *

HANNEGAN v. ESQUIRE, INC.

327 U.S. 146, 66 S.CT. 456, 90 L.ED. 586 (1946).

Justice DOUGLAS delivered the opinion of the Court.

Congress has made obscene material nonmailable, 35 Stat. 1129, 18 U.S.C.A. § 334, and has applied criminal sanctions for the enforcement of that policy. It has divided mailable matter into four classes, periodical publications constituting the second-class. And it has specified four conditions upon which a publication shall be admitted to the second-class. The Fourth condition, which is the only one relevant here,[2] provides:

"Except as otherwise provided by law, the conditions upon which a publication shall be admitted to the second class are as follows * * * Fourth. It must be originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character, or devoted to literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry, and having a legitimate list of subscribers. Nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to admit to the second class rate regular publications designed primarily for advertising purposes, or for free circulation, or for circulation at nominal rates."

Respondent is the publisher of Esquire Magazine, a monthly periodical which was granted a second-class permit in 1933. In 1943, * * * a citation was issued to respondent by the then Postmaster General (for whom the present Postmaster General has now been substituted as petitioner) to show cause why that permit should not be suspended or revoked. * * * The gist of [this] holding is contained in the following excerpt from his opinion:

"The plain language of this statute does not assume that a publication must in fact be 'obscene' within the intendment of the postal obscenity statutes before it can be found not to be 'originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character, or devoted to literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry.'

* * *

"A publication to enjoy these unique mail privileges and special preferences is bound to do more than refrain from disseminating material which is obscene or bordering on the obscene. It is under a positive duty to contribute to the public good and the public welfare."

The issues of Esquire Magazine under attack are those for January to November inclusive of 1943. The material complained of embraces in bulk only a small percentage of those issues. But the objectionable items, though a small percentage of the total bulk, were regular recurrent features which gave the magazine its dominant tone or characteristic. These include jokes, cartoons, pictures, articles, and poems. They were said to reflect the smoking-room type of humor, featuring, in the main, sex. * * *

An examination of the items makes plain, we think, that the controversy is not whether the magazine publishes "information of a public character" or is devoted to "literature" or to the "arts." It is whether the contents are "good" or "bad." To uphold the order of revocation would, therefore, grant the postmaster general a power of censorship. Such a power is so abhorrent to our traditions that a purpose to grant it should not be easily inferred.

The second-class privilege is a form of subsidy. From the beginning Congress has allowed special rates to certain classes of publications. * * *

* * *

The policy of Congress has been clear. It has been to encourage the distribution of periodicals which disseminated "information of a public character" or which were devoted to "literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry," because it was thought that those publications as a class contributed to the public good. The standards prescribed in the Fourth condition have been criticized, but not on the ground that they provide for censorship. * * *

* * *

2. The first three conditions are:

"First. It must regularly be issued at stated intervals as frequently as four times a year, and bear a date of issue, and be numbered consecutively. Second. It must be issued from a known office of publication. Third. It must be formed of printed paper sheets, without board, cloth, leather, or other substantial binding, such as distinguish printed books for preservation from periodical publications: Provided, That publications produced by the stencil, mimeograph, or hectograph process or in imitation of typewriting shall not be regarded as printed within the meaning of this clause."

We may assume that Congress has a broad power of classification and need not open second-class mail to publications of all types. The categories of publications entitled to that classification have indeed varied through the years. And the Court held in Ex parte Jackson, 96 U.S. 727, that Congress could constitutionally make it a crime to send fraudulent or obscene material through the mails. But grave constitutional questions are immediately raised once it is said that the use of the mails is a privilege which may be extended or withheld on any grounds whatsoever. See the dissents of Justice Brandeis and Justice Holmes in United States ex rel. Milwaukee Social Democratic Publishing Co. v. Burleson. Under that view the second-class rate could be granted on condition that certain economic or political ideas not be disseminated. The provisions of the fourth condition would have to be far more explicit for us to assume that Congress made such a radical departure from our traditions and undertook to clothe the Postmaster General with the power to supervise the tastes of the reading public of the country. * * *

Affirmed.

COMMENT

The Court in Hannegan does not reverse the majority opinion in the Milwaukee Social Democratic Publishing Co. case, although the cases are profoundly inconsistent.

In a dissenting opinion in the famous obscenity case, Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957), Justice Harlan made the following observation on conditioning the use of the mails:

> The hoary dogma of Ex Parte Jackson, 96 U.S. 726, and Public Clearing House of Coyne, 194 U.S. 497, that the use of the mails is a privilege on which the government may impose such conditions as it chooses, has long since evaporated. See Brandeis, J., dissenting in Milwaukee Social Democratic Publishing Co. v. Burleson.

On the other hand, Milwaukee Pub. Co. arose in the context of war and First Amendment rights. During wartime, First Amendment liberties, like other constitutionally protected civil liberties, have sometimes been subordinated to other governmental interests. It should be remembered that in Schenck Justice Holmes, writing the opinion for the Court, used the clear and present danger doctrine and still affirmed a conviction under the Espionage Act for the distribution of a pamphlet, during wartime, which advocated to drafted soldiers opposition to the war and the draft.

A more recent example of an attempt to use the mails for censorship purposes was the Lamont case which follows. In Lamont, the Supreme Court invalidated a federal statute which permitted the mail delivery of "communist political propaganda" which originated in a foreign country only if the addressee specifically requested such delivery. The Court unanimously invalidated the statute. But the Court was not unanimous in the rationalization offered for this conclusion.

LAMONT v. POSTMASTER GENERAL

381 U.S. 301, 85 S.CT. 1493, 14 L.ED.2D 398 (1965).

Justice DOUGLAS delivered the opinion of the Court.

These appeals present the same question: is § 305(a) of the Postal Service and Federal Employees Salary Act of 1962, 76 Stat. 840, constitutional as construed and applied? The statute provides in part:

"Mail matter, except sealed letters, which originates or which is printed or otherwise prepared in a foreign country and which is determined by the secretary of the treasury pursuant to rules and regulations to be promulgated by him to be 'communist political propaganda,' shall be detained by the postmaster general upon its arrival for delivery in the United States, or upon its subsequent deposit in the United States domestic mails, and the addressee shall be notified that such matter has been received and will be delivered only upon the addressee's request, except that such detention shall not be required in the case of any matter which is furnished pursuant to subscription or which is otherwise ascertained by the postmaster general to be desired by the addressee."

The statute defines "communist political propaganda" as political propaganda (as that term is defined in § 1(j) of the Foreign Agents Registration Act of 1938) which is issued by or on behalf of any country with respect to which there is in effect a suspension or withdrawal of tariff concessions or from which foreign assistance is withheld pursuant to certain specified statutes. The statute contains an exemption from its provisions for mail addressed to government agencies and educational institutions, or officials thereof, and for mail sent pursuant to a reciprocal cultural international agreement.

To implement the statute the Post Office maintains 10 or 11 screening points through which is routed all unsealed mail from the designated foreign countries. At these points the nonexempt mail is examined by customs authorities. When it is determined that a piece of mail is "communist political propaganda," the addressee is mailed a notice identifying the mail being detained and advising that it will be destroyed unless the addressee requests delivery by returning an attached reply card within 20 days.

Prior to March 1, 1965, the reply card contained a space in which the addressee could request delivery of any "similar publication" in the future. A list of the persons thus manifesting a desire to receive "communist political propaganda" was maintained by the Post Office. The government in its brief informs us that the keeping of this list was terminated, effective March 15, 1965. Thus, under the new practice, a notice is sent and must be returned for each individual piece of mail desired. The only standing instruction which it is now possible to leave with the Post Office is not to deliver any "communist political propaganda." And the solicitor general advises us that the Post Office Department "intends to retain its assumption that those who do not return the card want neither the identified publication nor any similar one arriving subsequently."

[This case] arose out of the Post Office's detention in 1963 of a copy of the Peking Review #12 addressed to appellant, Dr. Corliss Lamont, who is engaged in the publishing and distributing of pamphlets. Lamont did not respond to the notice of detention which was sent to him but instead instituted this suit to enjoin enforcement of the statute, alleging that it infringed his rights under the First and Fifth Amendments. The Post Office thereupon notified Lamont that it considered his institution of the suit to be an expression of his desire to receive "communist political propaganda" and therefore none of his mail would be detained. Lamont amended his complaint to challenge on constitutional grounds the placement of his name on the list of those desiring to receive "communist political propaganda." * * *

Under the new system, we are told, there can be no list of persons who have manifested a desire to receive "communist political propaganda" and whose mail will therefore go through relatively unimpeded. The government concedes that the changed procedure entirely precludes any claim of mootness and leaves for our consideration the sole question of the constitutionality of the statute.

We conclude that the act as construed and applied is unconstitutional because it requires an official act (viz., returning the reply card) as a limitation on the unfettered exercise of the addressee's First Amendment rights. * * *

We struck down in Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, a flat license tax on the exercise of First Amendment rights. A registration requirement imposed on a labor union organizer before making a speech met the same fate in Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516. A municipal licensing system for those distributing literature was held invalid in Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U S. 444. * * *

* * *

Here the congress—expressly restrained by the First Amendment from "abridging" freedom of speech and of press—is the actor. The act sets administrative officials astride the flow of mail to inspect it, appraise it, write the addressee about it, and await a response before dispatching the mail. Just as the licensing or taxing authorities in the Lovell, Thomas, and Murdock cases sought to control the flow of ideas to the public, so here federal agencies regulate the flow of mail. We do not have here, any more than we had in Hannegan v. Esquire, Inc., 327 U.S. 146, any question concerning the extent to which Congress may classify the mail and fix the charges for its carriage. Nor do we reach the question whether the standard here applied could pass constitutional muster. Nor do we deal with the right of Customs to inspect material from abroad for contraband. We rest on the narrow ground that the addressee in order to receive his mail must request in writing that it be delivered. This amounts in our judgment to an unconstitutional abridgment of the addressee's First Amendment rights. The addressee carries an affirmative obligation which we do not think the Government may impose on him. This requirement is almost certain to have a deterrent effect, especially as respects those who have sensitive positions. Their livelihood may be dependent on a security clearance. Public officials, like schoolteachers who have no tenure, might think they would invite disaster if they read what the federal government says contains the seeds of treason. Apart from them, any addressee is likely to feel some inhibition in sending for literature which federal officials have condemned as "communist political propaganda." The regime of this act is at war with the "uninhibited, robust, and wideopen" debate and discussion that are contemplated by the First Amendment. New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 270. * * *

COMMENT

Justice Douglas used the so-called absolutist or plain meaning approach to First Amendment interpretation: The statute is a direct restraint by official act of the government on freedom of expression; the First Amendment protects freedom of expression, ergo, the statute is invalid.

The absolutist First Amendment rationale employed by the Court in Lamont demonstrates the lively existence of alternative theories of First Amendment protection. Often, as in Lamont, the Court uses competing First Amendment theories concurrently, using one First Amendment theory to resolve one set of problems and another for a different set of problems. The student will also note that the Court ignored the clear and present danger doctrine as a rationalization in Lamont. If Lamont were decided today, do you think the Court would have used the strict scrutiny theory?

Insofar as there are two lines of cases with regard to the power of Congress to censor the mails, the later liberal Hannegan approach was expressly endorsed in Lamont in 1965. Perhaps it can be argued that Milwaukee Pub. Co. v. Burleson has, at least implicitly, been overruled.

MEESE v. KEENE

481 U.S. 465, 107 S.CT. 1862, 95 L.ED.2D 415 (1987).

Justice STEVENS delivered the opinion of the Court.

The Foreign Agents Registration Act of 1938 uses the term "political propaganda," as defined in the Act, to identify those expressive materials that must comply with the Act's registration, filing, and disclosure requirements. Appellee, an attorney and a member of the California State Senate, does not want the Department of Justice and the public to regard him as the disseminator of foreign political propaganda, but wishes to exhibit three Canadian motion picture films that have been so identified. The films, distributed by the National Film Board of Canada, deal with the subjects of nuclear war and acid rain.

The Act requires all agents of foreign principals to file detailed registration statements, describing the nature of their business and their political activities. The registration requirement is comprehensive, applying equally to agents of friendly, neutral, and unfriendly governments. Thus, the New York office of the NFBC has been registered as a foreign agent since 1947 because it is an agency of the Canadian Government. The statute classifies the three films produced by the Film Board as "political propaganda" because they contain political material intended to influence the foreign policies of the United States, or may reasonably be adapted to be so used.

The statutory definition of that term reads as follows:

> "(j) The term 'political propaganda' includes any oral, visual, graphic, written, pictorial, or other communication or expression by any person (1) which is reasonably adapted to, or which the person disseminating the same believes will, or which he intends to, prevail upon, indoctrinate, convert, induce, or in any other way influence a recipient or any section of the public within the United States with reference to the political or public interests, policies, or relations of a government or a foreign country or a foreign political party or with reference to the foreign policies of the United States or promote in the United States racial, religious, or social dissensions, or (2) which advocates, advises, instigates, or promotes any racial, social, political, or religious disorder, civil riot, or other conflict involving the use of force or violence in any other American republic or the overthrow of any government or political subdivision of any other American republic by any means involving the use of force or violence."

We begin our examination of the District Court's ruling on the First Amendment issue by noting that the term "political propaganda" has two meanings. In popular parlance many people assume that propaganda is a form of slanted, misleading speech that does not merit serious attention and that proceeds from a concern for advancing the narrow interests of the speaker rather than from a devotion to the truth. Casualty reports of enemy belligerents, for example, are often dismissed as nothing more than "propaganda." As defined in the Act, the term political propaganda includes misleading advocacy of that kind. But it also includes advocacy materials that are completely accurate and merit the closest attention and the highest respect. Standard reference works include both broad, neutral definitions of the word "propaganda" that are consistent with the way the word is defined in this statute, and also the narrower, pejorative definition.

Appellee argues that the statute would be unconstitutional even if the broad neutral definition of propaganda were the only recognized meaning of the term because the Act is "a Classic Example of Content-Based Government Regulation of Core-Value Protected Speech." As appellee notes, the Act's reporting and disclosure requirements are expressly conditioned upon a finding that speech on behalf of a foreign principal has political or public-policy content.

The District Court did not accept this broad argument. It found that the basic purpose of the statute as a whole was "to inform recipients of advocacy materials produced by or under the aegis of a foreign government of the source of such materials," and that it could not be gainsaid that this kind of disclosure serves rather than disserves the First Amendment. The statute itself neither prohibits nor censors the dissemination of advocacy materials by agents of foreign principals.

The argument that the District Court accepted rests not on what the statute actually says, requires, or prohibits, but rather upon a potential misunderstanding of its effect. Simply because the term "political propaganda" is used in the text of the statute to define the regulated materials, the Court assumed that the public will attach an "unsavory connotation" to the term and thus believe that the materials have been "officially censured by the Government." The Court further assumed that this denigration makes this material unavailable to people like appellee, who would otherwise distribute such material, because of the risk of being seen in an unfavorable light by the members of the public who misunderstand the statutory scheme. According to the District Court, the denigration of speech to which the label "political propaganda" has been attached constitutes "a conscious attempt to place a whole category of materials beyond the pale of legitimate discourse," and is therefore an unconstitutional abridgement of that speech. We find this argument unpersuasive, indeed, untenable, for three reasons.

First, the term "political propaganda" does nothing to place regulated expressive materials "beyond the pale of legitimate discourse." Unlike the scheme in Lamont v. Postmaster General, the Act places no burden on protected expression. We invalidated the statute in Lamont as interfering with the addressee's First Amendment rights because it required "an official act (viz., returning the reply card) as a limitation on the unfettered exercise of the addressee's First Amendment rights." The physical detention of the materials, not their mere designation as "communist political propaganda," was the offending element of the statutory scheme. The Act "se[t] administrative officials astride the flow of mail to inspect it, appraise it, write the addressee about it, and await a response before dispatching the mail." The Act in this case, on the other hand, does not pose any obstacle to appellee's access to the materials he wishes to exhibit. Congress did not prohibit, edit, or restrain the distribution of advocacy materials in an ostensible effort to protect the public from conversion, confusion, or deceit.

To the contrary, Congress simply required the disseminators of such material to make additional disclosures that would better enable the public to evaluate the import of the propaganda. The statute does not prohibit appellee from advising his audience that the films have not been officially censured in any way. Disseminators of propaganda may go beyond the disclosures required by statute and add any further information they think germane to the public's viewing of the materials. By compelling some disclosure of information and permitting more, the Act's approach recognizes that the best remedy for misleading or inaccurate speech contained within materials subject to the Act is fair, truthful, and accurate speech. See generally Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357, 377 (1927) (concurring opinion of Brandeis, J.) * * * The prospective viewers of the three films at issue may harbor an unreasoning prejudice against arguments that have been identified as the "political propaganda" of foreign principals and their agents, but the Act allows appellee to combat any such bias simply by explaining—before, during, or after the film, or in a wholly separate context—that Canada's interest in the consequences of nuclear war and acid rain does not necessarily undermine the integrity or the persuasiveness of its advocacy.

Ironically, it is the injunction entered by the District Court that withholds information from the public. The suppressed information is the fact that the films fall within the category of materials that Congress has judged to be "political propaganda".

Second, the reasoning of the District Court is contradicted by history. The statutory definition of "political propaganda" has been on the books for over four decades. We should presume that the people who have a sufficient understanding of the law to know that the term "political propaganda" is used to describe the regulated category also know that the definition is a broad, neutral one rather than a pejorative one. Given this long history, it seems obvious that if the fear of misunderstanding had actually interfered with the exhibition of a significant number of foreign-made films, that effect would be disclosed in the record. There is a risk that a partially informed audience might believe that a film that must be registered with the Department of Justice is suspect, but there is no evidence that this suspicion—to the degree it exists—has had the effect of Government censorship.

Third, Congress' use of the term "political propaganda" does not lead us to suspend the respect we normally owe to the Legislature's power to define the terms that it uses in legislation. We have no occasion here to decide the permissible scope of Congress' "right to speak"; we simply view this particular choice of language, statutorily defined in a neutral and evenhanded manner, as one that no constitutional provision prohibits the Congress from making. Nor do we agree with the District Court's assertion that Congress' use of the term "political propaganda" was "a wholly gratuitous step designed to express the suspicion with which Congress regarded the materials." It is axiomatic that the statutory definition of the term excludes unstated meanings of that term. Congress' use of the term "propaganda" in this statute, as indeed in other legislation, has no pejorative connotation. As judges it is our duty to construe legislation as it is written, not as it might be read by a layman, or as it might be understood by someone who has not even read it. If the term "political propaganda" is construed consistently with the neutral definition contained in the text of the statute itself, the constitutional concerns voiced by the District Court completely disappear.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Justice Scalia took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

Justice BLACKMUN, with whom Justice Brennan and Justice Marshall join, dissenting in part.

* * * The Court's decision rests upon its conclusion that the term "political propaganda" is neutral and without negative connotation. It reaches this conclusion by limiting its examination to the statutory definition of the term and by ignoring the realities of public reaction to the designation. But even given that confined view of its inquiry, it is difficult to understand how a statutory categorization which includes communication that "instigates * * * civil riot * * * or the overthrow of * * * government * * * by any means involving the use of force or violence" can be regarded as wholly neutral. Indeed, the legislative history of the Act indicates that Congress fully intended to discourage communications by foreign agents.

The Act grew out of the investigations of the House Un-American Activities Committee, formed in 1934 to investigate Nazi propaganda activities in the United States and the dissemination of subversive propaganda controlled by foreign countries attacking the American form of government. The Act mandated disclosure, not direct censorship, but the underlying goal was to control the spread of propaganda by foreign agents. This goal was stated unambiguously by the House Committee on the Judiciary: "We believe that the spotlight of pitiless publicity will serve as a deterrent to the spread of pernicious propaganda."

In 1942, Congress revised the Act at the request of the Department of Justice in order to strengthen the Government's "chief instrument * * * for controlling foreign agent activity in the theater of political propaganda." The amendments included the definition of propaganda in addition to labeling and reporting requirements virtually identical to those imposed under the current version of the Act. The Department of Justice explained that it sought to counter secret propaganda efforts "[i]n view of the increased attempts by foreign agents at the systematic manipulation of mass attitudes on national and international questions, by adding requirements to keep our Government and people informed of the nature, source, and extent of political propaganda distributed in the United States." And, as in the original Act, the amended version furthered Congress' desire to disable certain types of speech by the use of disclosure requirements designed to bring about that result.

The meaning of "political propaganda" has not changed in the 45 years since Congress selected those two words. While the Act is currently applied primarily to foreign policy advocacy, the designation it employs continues to reflect the original purposes of the Act and continues to carry its original connotations. For example, a Department of Justice representative recently recognized:

> "[I]t is fair to say that the original act reflected a perceived close connection between political propaganda and subversion. It is this original focus * * * and therefore the pejorative connotations of the phrases 'foreign agent' and 'political propaganda' which has caused such misunderstanding over the years."

In Lamont v. Postmaster General, 381 U.S. 301 (1965), the "communist political propaganda" that was detained by the Postmaster and delivered only upon the addressee's request was defined by reference to the same "neutral" definition of "political propaganda" in the Act that is at issue here. Yet the Court examined the effects of the statutory requirements and had no trouble concluding that the need to request delivery of mail classified as "communist political propaganda" was "almost certain to have a deterrent effect" upon debate. The reason was certainly the disapprobation conveyed by the classification:

> Public officials, like schoolteachers who have no tenure, might think they would invite disaster if they read what the Federal Government says contains the seeds of treason. Apart from them, any addressee is likely to feel some inhibition in sending for literature which federal officials have condemned as "communist political propaganda."

Because the Court believes that the term "political propaganda" is neutral, it concludes that "the Act places no burden on protected expression." The Court's error on neutrality leads it to ignore the practical effects of the classification, which create an indirect burden on expression. As a result, the Court takes an unjustifiably narrow view of the sort of government action that can violate First Amendment protections. Because Congress did "not pose any obstacle to appellee's access to the materials he wishes to exhibit" in that it "did not prohibit, edit, or restrain the distribution of advocacy material," the Court thinks that the propaganda classification does not burden speech. But there need not be a direct restriction of speech in order to have a First Amendment violation. The Court has recognized that indirect discouragements are fully capable of a coercive effect on speech, and that the First Amendment protections extend beyond the blatant censorship the Court finds lacking here.

COMMENT

Lamont may be a lesser restraint on the distribution of expressive materials than the situation in Meese v. Keene. In Lamont, the public at large is unaware that the material received has been characterized as propaganda. In Keene, the entire audience is informed of this governmental characterization of the films at issue. In Keene, the majority declares that the term "political propaganda" is a neutral term. However, those wishing to exhibit films marked "political propaganda" may be deterred from showing the films at all.

Does government have a right to speak—mark films with the label propaganda—if the consequence of the exercise of such a right is the deterrence of expression in the society?

City of Lakewood v. Plain Dealer Publishing Co., 108 S.Ct. 2138 (1988) invalidated a municipal ordinance which granted the mayor unfettered discretion to grant or deny an application for an annual permit for placement of newsracks on public property, city sidewalks. The ordinance authorized the mayor to make such grants or denials on any terms he considered to be "necessary and reasonable." City of Lakewood held that in such circumstances a facial challenge to the constitutionality of the city ordinance was permissible. The opinion is set forth in the text, p. 40.

Justice White, joined by Justices Stevens and O'Connor, wrote a strong dissent in City of Lakewood. Justice White first noted that the Court did "not establish any constitutional right of newspaper publishers to place newsracks on municipal property." Further, the Court declined to pass on the question of the constitutionality of an outright municipal ban on newsracks. (Could a city absolutely prohibit cable systems from using its public ways on which to lay cable? See Los Angeles v. Preferred Communications, Inc. 106 S.Ct. 2034 (1986).)

Justice White said that "our precedents suggest that an outright ban on newsracks on city sidewalks would be constitutional, particularly where (as is true here) ample alternate means of 24-hour distribution of newspapers exists." Justice White concluded that "cities remain free after today's decision to enact" bans on newsracks on public property. Justice White dissented from the doctrine set forth by the majority in Lakewood that licensing laws which give municipal officials "substantial power to discriminate based on the content or viewpoint of speech" are unconstitutional on their face without any showing of actual censorship and without the need even to apply for a license.

Taxation of the Press and Censorship

GROSJEAN v. AMERICAN PRESS CO.

297 U.S. 233, 56 S.CT. 444, 80 L.ED. 660 (1936).

[EDITORIAL NOTE On July 12, 1934, the Louisiana legislature enacted a law which provided in essence that any newspaper selling advertisements, which had a circulation of more than 20,000 copies, would be required to pay a license tax of 2 percent on its gross receipts. The law was passed at the behest of Governor Huey Long and was aimed at the New Orleans Times-Picayune, a New Orleans daily which had been critical of the Long regime. Nine newspaper publishers, publishing thirteen newspapers, brought suit to enjoin the enforcement of the statute.]

Justice SUTHERLAND delivered the opinion of the Court.

The validity of the act is assailed as violating the * * * freedom of the press in contravention of the due process clause contained in section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment. * * *

For more than a century prior to the adoption of the amendment—and, indeed, for many years thereafter—history discloses a persistent effort on the part of the British government to prevent or abridge the free expression of any opinion which seemed to criticize or exhibit in an unfavorable light, however truly, the agencies and operations of the government. The struggle between the proponents of measures to that end and those who asserted the right of free expression was continuous and unceasing. As early as 1644, John Milton, in an "Appeal for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing," assailed an act of Parliament which had just been passed providing for censorship of the press previous to publication. He vigorously defended the right of every man to make public his honest views "without previous censure"; and declared the impossibility of finding any man base enough to accept the office of censor and at the same time good enough to be allowed to perform its duties. Collett, History of the Taxes on Knowledge, vol. I, pp. 4–6. The act expired by its own terms in 1695. It was never renewed; and the liberty of the press thus became, as pointed out by Wickwar (The Struggle for the Freedom of the Press, p. 15), merely "a right or liberty to publish without a license what formerly could be published only with one." But mere exemption from previous censorship was soon recognized as too narrow a view of the liberty of the press.

In 1712, in response to a message from Queen Anne (Hansard's Parliamentary History of England, vol. 6, p. 1063), Parliament imposed a tax upon all newspapers and upon advertisements. Collett, vol. I, pp. 8–10. That the main purpose of these taxes was to suppress the publication of comments and criticisms objectionable to the Crown does not admit of doubt. Stewart, Lennox and the Taxes on Knowledge, 15 Scottish Historical Review, 322–327. There followed more than a century of resistance to, and evasion of, the taxes, and of agitation for their repeal. * * *

Citations of similar import might be multiplied many times; but the foregoing is enough to demonstrate beyond peradventure that in the adoption of the English newspaper stamp tax and the tax on advertisements, revenue was of subordinate concern; and that the dominant and controlling aim was to prevent, or curtain the opportunity for, the acquisition of knowledge by the people in respect of their governmental affairs. It is idle to suppose that so many of the best men of England would for a century of time have waged, as they did, stubborn and often precarious warfare against these taxes if a mere matter of taxation had been involved. The aim of the struggle was not to relieve taxpayers from a burden, but to establish and preserve the right of the English people to full information in respect of the doings or misdoings of their government. Upon the correctness of this conclusion the very characterization of the exactions as "taxes on knowledge" sheds a flood of corroborative light. In the ultimate, an informed and enlightened public opinion was the thing at stake; for, as Erskine, in his great speech in defense of Paine, has said, "The liberty of opinion keeps governments themselves in due subjection to their duties." Erskine's Speeches, High's Ed., vol. I, p. 525. See May's Constitutional History of England (7th Ed.) vol. 2, pp. 238–245.

In 1785, only four years before Congress had proposed the First Amendment, the Massachusetts Legislature, following the English example, imposed a stamp tax on all newspapers and magazines. The following year an advertisement tax was imposed.

Both taxes met with such violent opposition that the former was repealed in 1786, and the latter in 1788. Duniway, Freedom of the Press in Massachusetts, pp. 136, 137.

The framers of the First Amendment were familiar with the English struggle, which then had continued for nearly eighty years and was destined to go on for another sixty-five years, at the end of which time it culminated in a lasting abandonment of the obnoxious taxes. The framers were likewise familiar with the then recent Massachusetts episode; and while that occurrence did much to bring about the adoption of the amendment (see Pennsylvania and the Federal Constitution, 1888, p. 181), the predominant influence must have come from the English experience. It is impossible to concede that by the words "freedom of the press" the framers of the amendment intended to adopt merely the narrow view then reflected by the law of England that such freedom consisted only in immunity from previous censorship; for this abuse had then permanently disappeared from English practice. It is equally impossible to believe that it was not intended to bring within the reach of these words such modes of restraint as were embodied in the two forms of taxation already described. Such belief must be rejected in the face of the then well-known purpose of the exactions and the general adverse sentiment of the colonies in respect of them. Undoubtedly, the range of a constitutional provision phrased in terms of the common law sometimes may be fixed by recourse to the applicable rules of that law.

* * *

In the light of all that has now been said, it is evident that the restricted rules of the English law in respect of the freedom of the press in force when the Constitution was adopted were never accepted by the American colonists, and that by the First Amendment it was meant to preclude the national government, and by the Fourteenth Amendment to preclude the states, from adopting any form of previous restraint upon printed publications, or their circulation, including that which had theretofore been effected by these two well-known and odious methods.

It is not intended by anything we have said to suggest that the owners of newspapers are immune from any of the ordinary forms of taxation for support of the government. But this is not an ordinary form of tax, but one single in kind, with a long history of hostile misuse against the freedom of the press.

The predominant purpose of the grant of immunity here invoked was to preserve an untrammeled press as a vital source of public information. The newspapers, magazines, and other journals of the country, it is safe to say, have shed and continue to shed, more light on the public and business affairs of the nation than any other instrumentality of publicity; and since informed public opinion is the most potent of all restraints upon misgovernment, the suppression or abridgment of the publicity afforded by a free press cannot be regarded otherwise than with grave concern. The tax here involved is bad not because it takes money from the pockets of the appellees. If that were all, a wholly different question would be presented. It is bad because, in the light of its history and of its present setting, it is seen to be a deliberate and calculated device in the guise of a tax to limit the circulation of information to which the public is entitled in virtue of the constitutional guaranties. A free press stands as one of the great interpreters between the government and the people. To allow it to be fettered is to fetter ourselves.

In view of the persistent search for new subjects of taxation, it is not without significance that, with the single exception of the Louisiana statute, so far as we can discover, no state during the one hundred fifty years of our national existence has undertaken to impose a tax like that now in question.

The form in which the tax is imposed is in itself suspicious. It is not measured or limited by the volume of advertisements. It is measured alone by the extent of the circulation of the publication in which the advertisements are carried, with the plain purpose of penalizing the publishers and curtailing the circulation of a selected group of newspapers. [Emphasis added.]

Having reached the conclusion that the act imposing the tax in question is unconstitutional under the due process of law clause because it abridges the freedom of the press, we deem it unnecessary to consider the further ground assigned, that it also constitutes a denial of the equal protection of the laws.

Decree affirmed.

COMMENT

Grosjean makes clear that stamp taxes on newspapers and taxes on advertisements were similar practices and as such abhorrent to the eighteenth-century American. Grosjean illustrates why a larger definition of freedom of the press than one limited merely to freedom from prior restraint was necessary if the objectives of freedom of the press, as outlined by Justice George Sutherland, were to be secured, i.e., "In the ultimate, an informed and enlightened public opinion was the thing at stake.". Discriminatory taxes, like licensing on the basis of content and prior restraints, were all forbidden by the constitutional guarantee of freedom of the press. But see United States ex rel. Milwaukee Social Democratic Publishing Co. v. Burleson, 255 U.S. 407 (1921).

Which is more destructive of the purposes of freedom of the press: a prior restraint on printed matter itself or a tax on circulation of daily newspapers? How does Sutherland deal with the state defense that newspapers are a business and, as a business, the press, like other businesses, has no constitutional immunity from taxation?

Because of the constitutional guarantees of freedom of the press and freedom of speech, does engagement in such pursuits make governmental regulation unconstitutional? When freedom of expression is really at stake and when some other governmental interest, which is a matter of valid governmental concern, is at stake is a particularly perplexing problem in First Amendment cases.

MINNEAPOLIS STAR AND TRIBUNE CO. v. MINNESOTA COMMISSIONER OF REVENUE

460 U.S. 575, 103 S.CT. 1365, 75 L.ED.2D 295 (1983).

Justice O'CONNOR delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case presents the question of a state's power to impose a special tax on the press and, by enacting exemptions, to limit its effect to only a few newspapers.

Since 1967, Minnesota has imposed a sales tax on most sales of goods for a price in excess of a nominal sum. * * * In general, the tax applies only to retail sales. * * * This use tax applies to any nonexempt tangible personal property unless the sales tax was paid on the sales price. * * * Like the classic use tax, this use tax protects the State's sales tax by eliminating the residents' incentive to travel to States with lower sales taxes to buy goods rather than buying them in Minnesota. * * *

The appellant, Minneapolis Star and Tribune Company "Star Tribune", is the publisher of a morning newspaper and an evening newspaper in Minneapolis. From 1967 until 1971, it enjoyed an exemption from the sales and use tax provided by Minnesota for periodic publications. * * * In 1971, however, while leaving the exemption from the sales tax in place, the legislature amended the scheme to impose a "use tax" on the cost of paper and ink products consumed in the production of a publication. * * * Ink and paper used in publications became the only items subject to the use tax that were components of goods to be sold at retail. In 1974, the legislature again amended the statute, this time to exempt the first $100,000 worth of ink and paper consumed by a publication in any calendar year, in effect giving each publication an annual tax credit of $4,000. * * * Publications remained exempt from the sales tax. * * *

After the enactment of the $100,000 exemption, 11 publishers, producing 14 of the 388 paid circulation newspapers in the state, incurred a tax liability in 1974. Star Tribune was one of the 11, and, of the $893,355 collected, it paid $608,634, or roughly two-thirds of the total revenue raised by the tax. See 314 N.W.2d 201, 203 and n. 4 (1981). In 1974, 13 publishers, producing 16 out of 374 paid circulation papers, paid a tax. That year, Star Tribune again bore roughly two-thirds of the total receipts from the use tax on ink and paper.

Star Tribune instituted this action to seek a refund of the use taxes it paid from January 1, 1974 to May 31, 1975. It challenged the imposition of the use tax on ink and paper used in publications as a violation of the guarantees of freedom of the press and equal protection in the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The Minnesota Supreme Court upheld the tax against the federal constitutional challenge. * * *

Star Tribune argues that we must strike this tax on the authority of Grosjean v. American Press Co., Inc. * * * Although there are similarities between the two cases, we agree with the State that Grosjean is not controlling. * * *

Commentators have generally viewed Grosjean as dependent on the improper censorial goals of the legislature. See T. Emerson, The System of Freedom of Expression 419 (1970); L. Tribe, American Constitutional Law 592 n. 8, 724 n. 10 (1978). We think that the result in Grosjean may have been attributable in part to the perception on the part of the Court that the state imposed the tax with an intent to penalize a selected group of newspapers. In the case currently before us, however, there is no legislative history and no indication, apart from the structure of the tax itself, of any impermissible or censorial motive on the part of the legislature. We cannot resolve the case by simple citation to Grosjean. Instead, we must analyze the problem anew under the general principles of the First Amendment.

Clearly, the First Amendment does not prohibit all regulation of the press. It is beyond dispute that the states and the federal government can subject newspapers to generally applicable economic regulations without creating constitutional problems. [Citations omitted.] Minnesota, however, has not chosen to apply its general sales and use tax to newspapers. Instead, it has created a special tax that applies only to certain publications protected by the First Amendment. Although the state argues now that the tax on paper and ink is part of the general scheme of taxation, the use tax provision, * * * is facially discriminatory, singling out publications for treatment that is, to our knowledge, unique in Minnesota tax law.

By creating this special use tax, which, to our knowledge, is without parallel in the State's tax scheme, Minnesota has singled out the press for special treatment. We then must determine whether the First Amendment permits such special taxation. A tax that burdens rights protected by the First Amendment cannot stand unless the burden is necessary to achieve an overriding governmental interest. Any tax that the press must pay, of course, imposes some "burden." But, as we have observed, this Court has long upheld economic regulation of the press. The cases approving such economic regulation, however, emphasized the general applicability of the challenged regulation to all businesses, * * * suggesting that a regulation that singled out the press might place a heavier burden of justification on the state, and we now conclude that the special problems created by differential treatment do indeed impose such a burden. [Emphasis added.]

There is substantial evidence that differential taxation of the press would have troubled the Framers of the First Amendment. The role of the press in mobilizing sentiment in favor of independence was critical to the Revolution. When the Constitution was proposed without an explicit guarantee of freedom of the press, the Antifederalists objected. Proponents of the Constitution, relying on the principle granted Congress no power to control the press. The remarks of Richard Henry Lee are typical of the rejoinders of the Antifederalists:

> "I confess I do not see in what cases the congress can, with any pretense of right, make a law to suppress the freedom of the press; though I am not clear, that congress is restrained from laying any duties whatever on printing, and from laying duties particularly heavy on certain pieces printed." R. Lee, Observation Leading to a Fair Examination of the System of Government, Letter IV, reprinted in 1 B. Schwartz, The Bill of Rights: A Documentary History 466, 474 (1971).

The fears of the Antifederalists were well-founded. A power to tax differentially, as opposed to a power to tax generally, gives a government a powerful weapon against the taxpayer selected. When the state imposes a generally applicable tax, there is little cause for concern. We need not fear that a government will destroy a selected group of taxpayers by burdensome taxation if it must impose the same burden on the rest of its constituency. * * * When the state singles out the press, though, the political constraints that prevent a legislature from passing crippling taxes of general applicability are weakened, and the threat of burdensome taxes becomes acute. That threat can operate as effectively as a censor to check critical comment by the press, undercutting the basic assumption of our political system that the press will often serve as an important restraint on government. * * *

Further, differential treatment, unless justified by some special characteristic of the press, suggests that the goal of the regulation is not unrelated to suppression of expression, and such a goal is presumptively unconstitutional. * * * Differential taxation of the press, then, places such a burden on the interests protected by the First Amendment that we cannot countenance such treatment unless the state asserts a counterbalancing interest of compelling importance that it cannot achieve without differential taxation. * * *

Addressing the concern with differential treatment, Minnesota invites us to look beyond the form of the tax to its substance. The tax is, according to the state, merely a substitute for the sales tax, which, as a generally applicable tax, would be constitutional as applied to the press. There are two fatal flaws in this reasoning. First, the state has offered no explanation of why it chose to use a substitute for the sales tax rather than the sales tax itself. * * *

Further, even assuming that the legislature did have valid reasons for substituting another tax for the sales tax, we are not persuaded that this tax does serve as a substitute. The state asserts that this scheme actually favors the press over other businesses, because the same rate of tax is applied, but, for the press, the rate applies to the cost of components rather than to the sales price. We would be hesitant to fashion a rule that automatically allowed the state to single out the press for a different method of taxation as long as the effective burden was not different from that on other taxpayers or the burden on the press was lighter than that on other businesses. One reason for this reluctance is that the very selection of the press for special treatment threatens the press not only with the current differential treatment, but with the possibility of subsequent differentially more burdensome treatment. * * *

A second reason to avoid the proposed rule is that courts as institutions are poorly equipped to evaluate with precision the relative burdens of various methods of taxation. The complexities of factual economic proof always present a certain potential for error, and courts have little familiarity with the process of evaluating the relative economic burden of taxes. In sum, the possibility of error inherent in the proposed rule poses too great a threat to concerns at the heart of the First Amendment, and we cannot tolerate that possibility.[13] Minnesota, therefore, has offered no adequate justification for the special treatment of newspapers.

Minnesota's ink and paper tax violates the First Amendment not only because it singles out the press, but also because it targets a small group of newspapers. The effect of the $100,000 exemption enacted in 1974 is that only a handful of publishers pay any tax at all, and even fewer pay any significant amount of tax.[15] The state explains this exemption as part of a policy favoring an "equitable" tax system, although there are no comparable exemptions for small enterprises outside the press. * * * Whatever the motive of the legislature in this case, we think that recognizing a power in the state not only to single out the press but also to tailor the tax so that it singles out a few members of the press presents such a potential for abuse that no interest suggested by Minnesota can justify the scheme. * * *

A tax that singles out the press, or that targets individual publications within the press, places a heavy burden on the State to justify its action. Since Minnesota has offered no satisfactory justification for its tax on the use of ink and paper, the tax violates the First Amendment, and the judgment below is Reversed.

Justice White, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

Justice REHNQUIST, dissenting:

Today we learn from the Court that a state runs afoul of the First Amendment proscription of laws "abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press" where the state structures its taxing system to the advantage of newspapers. This seems very much akin to protecting something so overzealously that in the end it is smothered. While the Court purports to rely on the intent of the "Framers of the First Amendment," I believe it safe to assume that in 1791 "abridge" meant the same thing it means today: to diminish or curtail. Not until the Court's decision in this case, nearly two centuries after adoption of the First Amendment has it been read to prohibit activities which in no way diminish or curtail the freedoms it protects. * * *

The Court recognizes in several parts of its opinion that the State of Minnesota could avoid constitutional problems by imposing on newspapers the 4% sales tax that it imposes on other retailers. Rather than impose such a tax however, the Minnesota legislature decided to provide newspapers with an exemption from the sales tax and impose a 4% use tax on ink and paper; thus, while both taxes are part of one "system of sales and use taxes," 314 N.W.2d 201, 203 (1981), newspapers are classified differently

13. If a state employed the same method of taxation but applied a lower rate to the press, so that there could be no doubt that the legislature was not singling out the press to bear a more burdensome tax, we would, of course, be in a position to evaluate the relative burdens. And, given the clarity of the relative burdens, as well as the rule that differential methods of taxation are not automatically permissible if less burdensome, a lower tax rate for the press would not raise the threat that the legislature might later impose an extra burden that would escape detection by the courts, * * *. Thus, our decision does not, as the dissent suggests, require Minnesota to impose a greater tax burden on publications.

15. In 1974, 11 publishers paid the tax. Three paid less than $1,000, and another three paid less than $8,000. Star Tribune, one of only two publishers paying more than $100,000 paid $608,634. In 1975, 13 publishers paid the tax. Again, three paid less than $1,000, and four more paid less than $3,000. For that year, Star Tribune paid $636,113 and was again one of only two publishers incurring a liability greater than $100,000. See 314 N.W.2d, at 203–204 and nn. 4, 5.

within that system. The problem the Court finds too difficult to deal with is whether this difference in treatment results in a significant burden on newspapers. * * *

Today the Court [refuses] to look at the record and determine whether the classifications in the Minnesota use and sales tax statutes significantly burden the First Amendment rights of petitioner and its fellow newspapers. * * *

Wisely not relying solely on inability to weigh the burdens of the Minnesota tax scheme, the Court also says that even if the resultant burden on the press is lighter than on others:

> "[T]he very selection of the press for special treatment threatens the press not only with the current differential treatment, but with the possibility of subsequent differentially more burdensome treatment. Thus, even without actually imposing an extra burden on the press, the government might be able to achieve censorial effects, for '[t]he threat of sanctions may deter [the] exercise of [First Amendment] rights almost as potently as the actual application of sanctions.' "

Surely the Court does not mean what it seems to say. The Court should be well aware from its discussion of Grosjean v. American Press Co., Inc., 297 U.S. 233 (1936), that this Court is quite capable of dealing with changes in state taxing laws which are intended to penalize newspapers. * * *

* * * In summary, so long as the state can find another way to collect revenue from the newspapers, imposing a sales tax on newspapers would be to no one's advantage; not the newspaper and its distributors who would have to collect the tax, not the state who would have to enforce collection, and not the consumer who would have to pay for the paper in odd amounts. The reasonable alternative Minnesota chose was to impose the use tax on ink and paper. * * *

The court finds in very summary fashion that the exemption newspapers receive for the first $100,000 of ink and paper used also violates the First Amendment because the result is that only a few of the newspapers actually pay a use tax. I cannot agree. As explained by the Minnesota Supreme Court, the exemption is in effect a $4,000 credit which benefits all newspapers. 314 N.W.2d, at 203. Minneapolis Star & Tribune was benefited to the amount of $16,000 in the two years in question; $4,000 each year for its morning paper and $4,000 each year for its evening paper. Ibid. Absent any improper motive on the part of the Minnesota legislature in drawing the limits of this exemption, it cannot be construed as violating the First Amendment. * * * There is no reason to conclude that the State, in drafting the $4,000 credit, acted other than reasonably and rationally to fit its sales and use tax scheme to its own local needs and usages.

To collect from newspapers their fair share of taxes under the sales and use tax scheme and at the same time avoid abridging the freedoms of speech and press, the Court holds today that Minnesota must subject newspapers to millions of additional dollars in sales tax liability. Certainly this is a hollow victory for the newspapers and I seriously doubt the Court's conclusion that this result would have been intended by the "Framers of the First Amendment."

For the reasons set forth above, I would affirm the judgment of the Minnesota Supreme Court.

COMMENT

Does the rejection of special tax legislation for the press in Minneapolis Star constitute a rejection of the Stewart thesis that the freedom of the press clause warrants a special constitutional status for the press? See Stewart, text, p. 7. Perhaps the majority should have faced up to the implications of the Grosjean rationale—a rationale which they profess to accept: Legislation is unconstitutional if the motive of the legislation is to penalize the press. The Court in Minneapolis Star professes not to follow Grosjean even though its result led to the invalidation of the challenged legislation, as was the case in Grosjean.

It may be argued that in a sense the majority in Minneapolis Star does in fact follow Grosjean but just expands its approach. Thus, reading Grosjean and Minneapolis Star together, if the motive of legislation is either to hinder or to help the press, then the motive is impermissible. With respect to the press, the motive of the legislature must be neutral or indifferent. In response to this it may be argued that that was not what was held in Minneapolis Star. The test the Court referred to a number of times is that a legislative tax that treats the press differently cannot stand, unless the purpose of the legislation is designed to accomplish an overriding governmental interest. In other words, the strict scrutiny approach to legislation involving the press was used. In short, since Minnesota could not advance any overriding governmental reason for the tax in question, its differential aspect as far as the press was concerned required its invalidation under the strict standard of judicial review now accorded to legislation challenged on First Amendment grounds.

Justice Rehnquist, in dissent, criticized a particular sentence in Justice O'Connor's opinion in Minneapolis Star: "The very selection of the press for special treatment threatens the press not only with the current differential treatment, but with the possibility of subsequent differentially more burdensome treatment." Does this approach have unwelcome ramifications for the First Amendment? The Newspaper Preservation Act exempts newspapers from the antitrust laws in significant respects. See text, p. 554. Newspapers and magazines are allowed to use the mails on a special and economically advantageous basis, at least compared to the mailing rates charged to ordinary individuals. Is the constitutionality of this kind of special favorable legislative treatment for the press now thrown into doubt as a result of Minneapolis Star?

ARKANSAS WRITERS' PROJECT, INC. v. RAGLAND

481 U.S. 221, 107 S.CT. 1722, 95 L.ED.2D 209 (1987).

Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question presented in this case is whether a state sales tax scheme that taxes general interest magazines, but exempts newspapers and religious, professional, trade, and sports journals violates the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of the press.

Since 1935, Arkansas has imposed a tax on receipts from sales of tangible personal property. * * * Numerous items are exempt from the state sales tax, however. These include "[g]ross receipts or gross proceeds derived from the sale of newspapers," (newspaper exemption), and "religious, professional, trade and sports journals and/or publications printed and published within this State * * * when sold through regular subscriptions." (magazine exemption).

Appellant Arkansas Writers' Project, Inc. publishes Arkansas Times, a general interest monthly magazine with a circulation of approximately 228,000. The magazine includes articles on a variety of subjects, including religion and sports. It is printed and published in Arkansas, and is sold through mail subscriptions, coin-operated stands, and over-the-counter sales. Minneapolis Star & Tribune Co. v. Minnesota Comm'r of Revenue, held unconstitutional a Minnesota tax on paper and ink used in the production of newspapers. In January 1984, relying on this authority, appellant sought a refund of sales tax paid since October 1982, asserting that the magazine exemption must be construed to include Arkansas Times. It maintained that subjecting Arkansas Times to the sales tax, while sales of newspapers and other magazines were exempt, violated the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The Commissioner denied appellant's claim for refund.

We now reverse. In contrast to Minneapolis Star, and Grosjean, the Arkansas Supreme Court concluded that the Arkansas sales tax was a permissible "ordinary form of taxation." * * *

Our cases clearly establish that a discriminatory tax on the press burdens rights protected by the First Amendment. See Minneapolis Star [and] Grosjean.

In Minneapolis Star, the discrimination took two distinct forms. First, in contrast to generally applicable economic regulations to which the press can legitimately be subject, the Minnesota use tax treated the press differently from other enterprises. Second, the tax targeted a small group of newspapers. This was due to the fact that the first $100,000 of paper and ink were exempt from the tax; thus "only a handful of publishers pay any tax at all, and even fewer pay any significant amount of tax."

Both types of discrimination can be established even where, as here, there is no evidence of an improper censorial motive. * * * This is because selective taxation of the press—either singling out the press as a whole or targeting individual members of the press—poses a particular danger of abuse by the State. * * *

Addressing only the first type of discrimination, the Commissioner defends the Arkansas sales tax as a generally applicable economic regulation. He acknowledges the numerous statutory exemptions to the sales tax, including those exempting newspapers and religious, trade, professional, and sports magazines. Nonetheless, apparently because the tax is nominally imposed on receipts from sales of all tangible personal property, he insists that the tax should be upheld.

On the facts of this case, the fundamental question is not whether the tax singles out the press as a whole, but whether it targets a small group within the press. While we indicated in Minneapolis Star that a genuinely nondiscriminatory tax on the receipts of newspapers would be constitutionally permissible, the Arkansas sales tax cannot be characterized as nondiscriminatory, because it is not evenly applied to all magazines. To the contrary, the magazine exemption means that only a few Arkansas magazines pay any sales tax; in that respect, it operates in much the same way as did the $100,000 exemption to the Minnesota use tax. Because the Arkansas sales tax scheme treats some magazines less favorably than others, it suffers from the second type of discrimination identified in Minneapolis Star.

Indeed, this case involves a more disturbing use of selective taxation than Minneapolis Star, because the basis on which Arkansas differentiates between magazines is particularly repugnant to First Amendment principles: a magazine's tax status depends entirely on its content. "[A]bove all else, the First Amendment means that government has no power to restrict expression because of its message, its ideas, its subject matter, or its content." Police Dept. of Chicago v. Mosley, 408 U.S., at 95. See also Carey v. Brown at 462–463, 100 S.Ct., at 2291. "Regulations which permit the Government to discriminate on the basis of the content of the message cannot be tolerated under the First Amendment." Regan v. Time, Inc., 468 U.S. 641, 648–649 (1984).

If articles in Arkansas Times were uniformly devoted to religion or sports, the magazine would be exempt from the sales tax. However, because the articles deal with a variety of subjects (sometimes including religion and sports), the Commissioner has determined that the magazine's sales may be taxed. In order to determine whether a magazine is subject to sales tax, Arkansas' "enforcement authorities must necessarily examine the content of the message that is conveyed. * * * " FCC v. League of Women Voters of California, 468 U.S. 364, 383 (1984). Such official scrutiny of the content of publications as the basis for imposing a tax is entirely incompatible with the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of the press.

Arkansas' system of selective taxation does not evade the strictures of the First Amendment merely because it does not burden the expression of particular views by specific magazines. We rejected a similar distinction between content and viewpoint restrictions in Consolidated Edison Co. v. Public Service Comm'n of New York, 447 U.S. 530, 100 S.Ct. 2326, 65 L.Ed.2d 319 (1980). As we stated in that case, "[t]he First Amendment's hostility to content-based regulation extends not only to restrictions on particular viewpoints, but also to prohibition of public discussion of an entire topic." Id., at 537, 100 S.Ct., at 2333. See FCC v. League of Women Voters of California, supra; Metromedia, Inc. v. San Diego; Carey v. Brown, 447 U.S., at 462, n. 6.

Nor are the requirements of the First Amendment avoided by the fact that Arkansas grants an exemption to other members of the media that might publish discussions of the various subjects contained in Arkansas Times. For example, exempting newspapers from the tax does not change the fact that the State discriminates in determining the tax status of magazines published in Arkansas. * * *

Arkansas faces a heavy burden in attempting to defend its content-based approach to taxation of magazines. In order to justify such differential taxation, the State must show that its regulation is necessary to serve a compelling state interest and is narrowly drawn to achieve that end. See Minneapolis Star.

The Commissioner has advanced several state interests.

The Commissioner suggests that the exemption of religious, professional, trade and sports journals was intended to encourage "fledgling" publishers, who have only limited audiences and therefore do not have access to the same volume of advertising revenues as general interest magazines such as Arkansas Times. Even assuming that an interest in encouraging fledgling publications might be a compelling one, we do not find the exemption of religious, professional, trade and sports journals narrowly tailored to achieve that end. To the contrary, the exemption is both overinclusive and underinclusive. The types of magazines enumerated are exempt, regardless of whether they are "fledgling;" even the most lucrative and well-established religious, professional, trade and sports journals do not pay sales tax. By contrast, struggling general interest magazines and struggling specialty magazines on subjects other than those specified are ineligible for favorable tax treatment.

Finally, the Commissioner asserted for the first time at oral argument a need to "foster communication" in the State. While this state interest might support a blanket exemption of the press from the sales tax, it cannot justify selective taxation of certain publishers. The Arkansas tax scheme only fosters communication on religion, sports, and professional and trade matters. It therefore does not serve its alleged purpose in any significant way.

Appellant argues that the Arkansas tax scheme violates the First Amendment because it exempts all newspapers from the tax, but only some magazines. Appellant contends that, under applicable state regulations, the critical distinction between newspapers and magazines is not format, but rather content: newspapers are distinguished from magazines because they contain reports of current events and articles of general interest. Just as content-based distinctions between magazines are impermissible under prior decisions of this Court, appellant claims that content-based distinctions between different members of the media are also impermissible, absent a compelling justification.

Because we hold today that the State's selective application of its sales tax to magazines is unconstitutional and therefore invalid, our ruling eliminates the differential treatment of newspapers and magazines. Accordingly, we need not decide whether a distinction between different types of periodicals presents an additional basis for invalidating the sales tax, as applied to the press.

We stated in Minneapolis Star that "[a] tax that singles out the press, or that targets individual publications within the press, places a heavy burden on the State to justify its action." In this case, Arkansas has failed to meet this heavy burden. It has advanced no compelling justification for selective, content-based taxation of certain magazines, and the tax is therefore invalid under the First Amendment. Accordingly, we reverse the judgment of the Arkansas Supreme Court and remand for proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

Justice STEVENS, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.

To the extent that the Court's opinion relies on the proposition " 'that government has no power to restrict expression because of its message, its ideas, its subject matter, or its content,' " I am unable to join it. * * * I do, however, agree that the State has the burden of justifying its content-based discrimination and has plainly failed to do so.

Justice SCALIA, with whom the Chief Justice joins, dissenting.

* * * I dissent from today's decision because it provides no rational basis for distinguishing the subsidy scheme here under challenge from many others that are common and unquestionably lawful.

Here, as in the Court's earlier decision in Minneapolis Star, application of the "strict scrutiny" test rests upon the premise that for First Amendment purposes denial of exemption from taxation is equivalent to regulation. That premise is demonstrably erroneous and cannot be consistently applied. Our opinions have long recognized—in First Amendment contexts as elsewhere—the reality that tax exemptions, credits, and deductions are "a form of subsidy that is administered through the tax system," and the general rule that "a legislature's decision not to subsidize the exercise of a fundamental right does not infringe the right, and thus is not subject to strict scrutiny." Regan v. Taxation With Representation of Washington, 461 U.S. 540, 544, 549, 103 S.Ct. 1997, 2000, 2002, 76 L.Ed.2d 129 (1983) (upholding denial of tax exemption for organization engaged in lobbying even though veterans' organizations received exemption regardless of lobbying activities).

The reason that denial of participation in a tax exemption or other subsidy scheme does not necessarily "infringe" a fundamental right is that—unlike direct restriction or prohibition—such a denial does not, as a general rule, have any significant coercive effect. It may, of course, be manipulated so as to do so, in which case the courts will be available to provide relief. But that is not remotely the case here. It is implausible that the 4% sales tax, generally applicable to all sales in the State with the few enumerated exceptions, was meant to inhibit, or had the effect of inhibiting, this appellant's publication.

Perhaps a more stringent, prophylactic rule is appropriate, and can consistently be applied, when the subsidy pertains to the expression of a particular viewpoint on a matter of political concern—a tax exemption, for example, that is expressly available only to publications that take a particular point of view on a controversial issue of foreign policy. Political speech has been accorded special protection elsewhere.

There is no need, however, and it is realistically quite impossible, to extend to all speech the same degree of protection against exclusion from a subsidy that one might think appropriate for opposing shades of political expression.

By seeking to do so, the majority casts doubt upon a wide variety of tax preferences and subsidies that draw distinctions based upon subject-matter. The U.S. Postal Service, for example, grants a special bulk rate to written material disseminated by certain nonprofit organizations—religious, educational, scientific, philanthropic, agricultural, labor, veterans', and fraternal organizations. Must this preference be justified by a "compelling governmental need" because a nonprofit organization devoted to some other purpose—dissemination of information about boxing, for example—does not receive the special rate? The Kennedy Center, which is subsidized by the Federal Government in the amount of up to $23 million per year, is authorized by statute to "present classical and contemporary music, opera, drama, dance, and poetry." Is this subsidy subject to strict scrutiny because other kinds of expressive activity, such as learned lectures and political speeches, are excluded? Are government research grant programs or the funding activities of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting subject to strict scrutiny because they provide money for the study or exposition of some subjects but not others?

Because there is no principled basis to distinguish the subsidization of speech in these areas—which we would surely uphold—from the subsidization that we strike down here, our decision today places the granting or denial of protection within our own idiosyncratic discretion. In my view, that threatens First Amendment rights infinitely more than the tax exemption at issue. I dissent.

COMMENT

The infirmity of the Arkansas sales tax scheme was that it treated "some magazines less favorably than others." Was the selective discrimination worse than in Minneapolis Star? Justice Marshall said it was. Why? Arkansas differentiated between the tax status of magazines on the basis of the content of the magazine.

In evaluating the First Amendment validity of the Arkansas sales tax as applied to newspapers and magazines, the Court applied the strictest standard of review, i.e., the so-called strict scrutiny standard: "[T]he state must show that its regulation is necessary to serve a compelling state interest and is narrowly drawn to achieve that end."

Arkansas Writers' Project illustrates that the strict scrutiny standard is increasingly being used in First Amendment cases. Usually, the standard is strict in theory but fatal in fact. In other words, the announcement of the use of the strict scrutiny standard transmits a message that the legislation under review is going to be invalidated. The choice of standard of review, therefore, becomes critical.

Justice Scalia in dissent in Arkansas Writers' Project believed that the "strict scrutiny" test should not have been used because such a test is designed to evaluate government regulation. In Scalia's review, denial of exemption from taxation is not "equivalent to regulation." In Grosjean, however, small circulation newspapers were exempt from the challenged tax which applied to large circulation newspapers who were also critics of Governor Huey Long. In Grosjean, this differentiation (which was, in a sense, a refusal to extend an exemption) was determined to have coercive effect.

Scalia says that if the state decision to tax or not to tax is manipulated for coercive purposes, "the courts will be available to provide relief." Like Rehnquist in Minneapolis Star, Scalia believes the legislation under review does not raise First Amendment problems because there is no evidence of improper censorial motive behind the legislation. A difficulty with this analysis is that it puts a premium on being able to identify the legislative motive.

It was suspected by the press that the Minneapolis Star tax was intended to be punitive, although it didn't turn out to be since the newspapers actually paid less in paper and ink taxes than they would have in sales taxes. It would have been difficult to demonstrate this legislative intent were it true, and no effort was ever made to do so.

Justice Stevens disagrees that content-based regulation of expression is always impermissible. In taking this view, he is consistent with the views he expressed in FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978), where he approved FCC regulation, in narrow circumstances, of a category of "indecent" speech. But is the decision of Arkansas to exempt general interest magazines really content-based? Justice Scalia argues in dissent that the federal government subsidizes opera and drama in the Kennedy Center; the federal statute providing for such subsidy does not mention "learned lectures." Is the omission of scholarly lectures content-based and, therefore, invalid?

CATEGORIES OF SPEECH

Anonymous Speech

TALLEY v. CALIFORNIA

362 U.S. 60, 80 S.CT. 536, 4 L.ED.2D 559 (1960).

Justice BLACK delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question presented here is whether the provisions of a Los Angeles City ordinance restricting the distribution of handbills "abridge the freedom of speech and of the press secured against state invasion by the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution." The ordinance * * * provides:

"No person shall distribute any handbill in any place under any circumstances, which does not have printed on the cover, or the face thereof, the name and address of the following:

"a. The person who printed, wrote, compiled or manufactured the same.
"b. The person who caused the same to be distributed; provided, however, that in the case of a fictitious person or club, in addition to such fictitious name, the true names and addresses of the owners, managers or agents of the person sponsoring said hand-bill shall also appear thereon."

The petitioner was arrested and tried in a Los Angeles Municipal Court for violating this ordinance. It was stipulated that the petitioner had distributed handbills in Los Angeles, and two of them were presented in evidence. Each had printed on it the following:

National Consumers Mobilization
Box 6533
Los Angeles 55, Calif.
Pleasant 9–1576.

The handbills urged readers to help the organization carry on a boycott against certain merchants and businessmen, whose names were given, on the ground that, as one set of handbills said, they carried products of "manufacturers who will not offer equal employment opportunities to Negroes, Mexicans, and Orientals." There also appeared a blank, which, if signed, would request enrollment of the signer as a "member of National Consumers Mobilization," and which was preceded by a statement that "I believe that every man should have an equal opportunity for employment no matter what his race, religion, or place of birth."

The Municipal Court held that the information printed on the handbills did not meet the requirements of the ordinance, found the petitioner guilty as charged, and fined him $10. The Appellate Department of the Superior Court of the County of Los Angeles affirmed the conviction, rejecting petitioner's contention, timely made in both state courts, that the ordinance invaded his freedom of speech and press in violation of the Fourteenth and First Amendments to the Federal Constitution. 172 Cal.App.2d Supp. 797, 332 P.2d 447. Since this was the highest state court available to petitioner, we granted certiorari to consider this constitutional contention. 360 U.S. 928.

The broad ordinance now before us, barring distribution of "any hand-bill in any place under any circumstances," falls precisely under the ban of our prior cases unless this ordinance is saved by the qualification that handbills can be distributed if they have printed on them the names and addresses of the persons who prepared, distributed or sponsored them. * * * [T]he ordinance here is not limited to handbills whose content is "obscene or offensive to public morals or that advocates unlawful conduct." Counsel has urged that this ordinance is aimed at providing a way to identify those responsible for fraud, false advertising and libel. Yet the ordinance is in no manner so limited, nor have we been referred to any legislative history indicating such a purpose. Therefore we do not pass on the validity of an ordinance limited to prevent these or any other supposed evils. This ordinance simply bars all handbills under all circumstances anywhere that do not have the names and addresses printed on them in the place the ordinance requires.

There can be no doubt that such an identification requirement would tend to restrict freedom to distribute information and thereby freedom of expression. "Liberty of circulating is as essential to that freedom as liberty of publishing; indeed, without the circulation, the publication would be of little value." Lovell v. City of Griffin, 303 U.S. at page 452.

Anonymous pamphlets, leaflets, brochures and even books have played an important role in the progress of mankind. Persecuted groups and sects from time to time throughout history have been able to criticize oppressive practices and laws either anonymously or not at all.

Even the Federalist Papers, written in favor of the adoption of our Constitution, were published under fictitious names. It is plain that anonymity has sometimes been assumed for the most constructive purposes.

We have recently had occasion to hold in two cases that there are times and circumstances when states may not compel members of groups engaged in the dissemination of ideas to be publicly identified. The reason for those holdings was that identification and fear of reprisal might deter perfectly peaceful discussions of public matters of importance. This broad Los Angeles ordinance is subject to the same infirmity. We hold that it, like the Griffin, Georgia, ordinance, is void on its face.

The judgment of the Appellate Department of the Superior Court of the State of California is reversed and the cause is remanded to it for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

Justice Clark, whom Justice Frankfurter and Justice Whittaker join, dissenting.

COMMENT

The Talley case reveals the dilemma of reconciling freedom of information (interpreting that term to mean that all information on an issue ought to be put before the public) with a right of privacy (interpreting that term to mean, among many other things, the right to enter the opinion process anonymously). Phrasing the dilemma in this way, does the decision in Talley appear less satisfactory to you?

Justice Clark in dissent discerned the problems presented by blanket constitutional protection for anonymous speech in view of the requirement of the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act that lobbyists divulge their identities and in view of the many states which have enacted corrupt practices legislation prohibiting, among other matters, the distribution of anonymous printed matter concerning political candidates. How can some regulation of anonymous speech be permitted, and, at the same time, how can the political rights of those whom identification would endanger be protected? Justice Clark suggested a means to accomplish these two objectives. He referred to N.A.A.C.P. v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449 (1958). That was a case where the Court held that the N.A.A.C.P. could not constitutionally be required to divulge its membership lists to the state of Alabama because of the economic reprisal and physical jeopardy that such disclosure might mean for N.A.A.C.P. members. Clark argued that Talley made no showing that similar restraints would befall him. Did Justice Black respond to Clark's argument that anonymity can claim constitutional protection only when it is indispensable to the exercise of political rights? What counterarguments might be made to Clark's position?

Would a less broad statute than the one in Talley be constitutional? For a case which held that a New York statute making it a crime to distribute anonymous literature in connection with a political election campaign violated the First Amendment, see Zwickler v. Koota, 290 F.Supp. 244 (E.D.N.Y.1968), reversed on other grounds, Golden v. Zwickler, 394 U.S. 103 (1969).

Commercial Speech

VALENTINE v. CHRESTENSEN

316 U.S. 52, 62 S.CT. 920, 86 L.ED. 1262 (1942).

Justice ROBERTS delivered the opinion of the Court.

The respondent, a citizen of Florida, owns a former United States Navy submarine which he exhibits for profit. In 1940 he brought it to New York City and moored it at a state pier in the East River. He prepared and printed a handbill advertising the boat and soliciting visitors for a stated admission fee. On his attempting to distribute the bill in the city streets, he was advised by the petitioner, as police commissioner, that this activity would violate § 318 of the Sanitary Code which forbids distribution in the streets of commercial and business advertising matter, but was told that he might freely distribute handbills solely devoted to "information or a public protest."

Respondent thereupon prepared and showed to the petitioner, in proof form, a double-faced handbill. On one side was a revision of the original, altered by the removal of the statement as to admission fee but consisting only of commercial advertising. On the other side was a protest against the action of the City Dock Department in refusing the respondent wharfage facilities at a city pier for the exhibition of his submarine, but no commercial advertising. The Police Department advised that distribution of a bill containing only the protest would not violate § 318, and would not be restrained, but that distribution of the double-faced bill was prohibited. The respondent, nevertheless, proceeded with printing of his proposed bill and started to distribute it. He was restrained by the police.

* * *

The question is whether the application of the ordinance to the respondent's activity, was, in the circumstances, an unconstitutional abridgement of the freedom of the press and of speech.

1. This Court has unequivocally held that the streets are proper places for the exercise of the freedom of communicating information and disseminating opinion and that, though the states and municipalities may appropriately regulate the privilege in the public interest, they may not unduly burden or proscribe its employment in these public thoroughfares. We are equally clear that the Constitution imposes no such restraint on government as respects purely commercial advertising. [Emphasis added.] Whether, and to what extent, one may promote or pursue a gainful occupation in the streets, to what extent such activity shall be adjudged a derogation of the public right of user, are matters for legislative judgment. The question is not whether the legislative body may interfere with the harmless pursuit of a lawful business, but whether it must permit such pursuit by what it deems an undesirable invasion of, or interference with, the full and free use of the highways by the people in fulfillment of the public use to which streets are dedicated. If the respondent was attempting to use the streets of New York by distributing commercial advertising, the prohibition of the code provision was lawfully invoked against his conduct.

2. The respondent contends that, in truth, he was engaged in the dissemination of matter proper for public information, none the less so because there was inextricably attached to the medium of such dissemination commercial advertising matter. The court below appears to have taken this view since it adverts to the difficulty of apportioning, in a given case, the contents of the communication as between what is of public interest and what is for private profit. We need not indulge nice appraisal based upon subtle distinctions in the present instance nor assume possible cases not now presented. It is enough for the present purpose that the stipulated facts justify the conclusion that the affixing of the protest against official conduct to the advertising circular was with the intent, and for the purpose, of evading the prohibition of the ordinance. If that evasion were successful, every merchant who desires to broadcast advertising leaflets in the streets need only append a civic appeal, or a moral platitude, to achieve immunity from the law's command.

The decree is reversed.

Reversed.

COMMENT

In Valentine v. Chrestensen, the Supreme Court held that commercial speech was outside the ambit of First Amendment protection and therefore subject to regulation by government. The Court believed that Chrestensen printed his noncommercial message solely to evade the regulatory provision. Chrestensen's subjective intent, in other words, belied his claim for First Amendment protection because it was merely a ploy to escape a lawful regulation of the City of New York. If Chrestensen were permitted to distribute his flyers, so could every merchant, simply by affixing to his advertising copy some expression of opinion or protest. The streets of New York would be filled with litter, the sanitary code provision to the contrary notwithstanding.

There may be a Keystone Kops air about Valentine v. Chrestensen, but the case for a time sowed the seeds of a constitutional doctrine of significance: the theory that the First Amendment does not embrace what Justice Roberts referred to as "purely" commercial speech. This would come to be called the commercial speech doctrine.

Note that Valentine v. Chrestensen was a unanimous decision. Why do you think Justice Black, for instance, agreed with the decision?

Did the Chrestensen doctrine establish a hierarchy for expression, i.e., some communications merit a greater claim to constitutional protection than others? Was the core of the Chrestensen doctrine that, if there is a "preference" for speech, the speech "preferred" is political rather than commercial speech?

THE DECLINE OF THE COMMERCIAL SPEECH DOCTRINE. The first in a series of cases which dealt a body blow to the idea that commercial speech is beyond the pale of First Amendment protection occurred in 1975. In Bigelow v. Virginia, 421 U.S. 809 (1975), the Court set aside the conviction of an editor of a weekly newspaper who had violated a Virginia state law by accepting an advertisement which announced placements in hospitals and clinics for low-cost abortions could be obtained in New York. The Virginia state law which forbade the circulation of publications encouraging the procuring of abortions was held unconstitutional.

Bigelow set forth a ground-breaking doctrine. The Court repudiated the idea that a category of commercial speech such as commercial advertising was "stripped of First Amendment protection merely because it appears in that form." The significance of Bigelow has been analyzed as follows:

> [I]t was no longer adequate, in dealing with commercial speech, merely to say that any reasonable state regulation would be permissible. With the advent of a new First Amendment status for commercial speech, the interests of the publisher, the reader, and the consumer would be weighed against any arguments advanced in favor of the statute by the state. The statute proscribed activity [abortion] which was now clearly legal, and the state was held to have failed to justify the ban on publication in view of the overriding interests urged by the editor on behalf of the readers. Therefore, in upholding the right of the editor to publish the advertisement in controversy in Bigelow, the Court's approach to commercial speech followed a traditional First Amendment balancing test technique.

See Barron and Dienes, Handbook of Free Speech and Free Press, 168 (1979).

Bigelow was merely the first development in the waning of the commercial speech doctrine set forth in Valentine v. Chrestensen. The coup de grace to the traditional doctrine was dealt by the case reported below.

VIRGINIA STATE BOARD OF PHARMACY v. VIRGINIA CITIZENS CONSUMER COUNCIL, INC.

425 U.S. 748, 96 S.CT. 1817, 48 L.ED.2D 346 (1976).

Justice BLACKMUN delivered the opinion of the Court.

The plaintiff-appellees in this case attack, as violative of the First and Fourteenth Amendments, that portion of § 54–524.35 of Va. Code Ann. (1974), which provides that a pharmacist licensed in Virginia is guilty of unprofessional conduct if he "(3) publishes, advertises or promotes, directly or indirectly, in any manner whatsoever, any amount, price, fee, premium, discount, rebate or credit terms for any drugs which may be dispensed only by prescription." The three-judge district court declared the quoted portion of the statute "void and of no effect," and enjoined the defendant-appellants, the Virginia State Board of Pharmacy and the individual members of that Board, from enforcing it.

The plaintiffs are an individual Virginia resident who suffers from diseases that require her to take prescription drugs on a daily basis, and two nonprofit organizations. Their claim is that the First Amendment entitles the user of prescription drugs to receive information, that pharmacists wish to communicate to them through advertising and other promotional means, concerning the prices of such drugs.

Certainly that information may be of value. Drug prices in Virginia, for both prescription and nonprescription items, strikingly vary from outlet to outlet even within the same locality. It is stipulated, for example, that in Richmond "the cost of 40 Achromycin tablets ranges from $2.59 to $6.00, a difference of 140% [sic]," and that in the Newport News–Hampton area the cost of tetracycline ranges from $1.20 to $9.00, a difference of 650%.

The question first arises whether, even assuming that First Amendment protection attaches to the flow of drug price information, it is a protection enjoyed by the appellees as recipients of the information, and not solely, if at all, by the advertisers themselves who seek to disseminate that information.

Freedom of speech presupposes a willing speaker. But where a speaker exists, as is the case here, the protection afforded is to the communication, to its source and to its recipients both. This is clear from the decided cases. If there is a right to advertise, there is a reciprocal right to receive the advertising, and it may be asserted by these appellees.

The appellants contend that the advertisement of prescription drug prices is outside the protection of the First Amendment because it is "commercial speech." There can be no question that in past decisions the Court has given some indication that commercial speech is unprotected.

Our question is whether speech which does "no more than propose a commercial transaction," Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Pittsburgh Comm'n on Human Relations, 413 U.S. 376 (1973), is so removed from any "exposition of ideas," Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, and from " 'truth, science, morality, and arts in general, in its diffusion of liberal sentiments on the administration of Govemment.' " Roth v. United States, that it lacks all protection. Our answer is that it is not.

Focusing first on the individual parties to the transaction that is proposed in the commercial advertisement, we may assume that the advertiser's interest is a purely economic one. That hardly disqualifies him for protection under the First Amendment.

As to the particular consumer's interest in the free flow of commercial information, that interest may be as keen, if not keener by far, than his interest in the day's most urgent political debate. Appellees' case in this respect is a convincing one. Those whom the suppression of prescription drug price information hits the hardest are the poor, the sick, and particularly the aged. A disproportionate amount of their income tends to be spent on prescription drugs; yet they are the least able to learn, by shopping from pharmacist to pharmacist, where their scarce dollars are best spent.

Advertising, however tasteless and excessive it sometimes may seem, is nonetheless dissemination of information as to who is producing and selling what product, for what reason, and at what price. So long as we preserve a predominantly free enterprise economy, the allocation of our resources in large measure will be made through numerous private economic decisions. It is a matter of public interest that those decisions, in the aggregate, be intelligent and well informed. To this end, the free flow of commercial information is indispensable. And if it is indispensable to the proper allocation of resources in a free enterprise system, it is also indispensable to the formation of intelligent opinions as to how that system ought to be regulated or altered. Therefore, even if the First Amendment were thought to be primarily an instrument to enlighten public decisionmaking in a democracy, we could not say that the free flow of information does not serve that goal.

Arrayed against these substantial individual and societal interests are a number of justifications for the advertising ban. These have to do principally with maintaining a high degree of professionalism on the part of licensed pharmacists. Indisputably, the state has a strong interest in maintaining that professionalism.

It appears to be feared that if the pharmacist who wishes to provide the low cost, and assertedly low quality, services is permitted to advertise, he will be taken up on his offer by too many unwitting customers. They will choose the low-cost, low-quality service and drive the "professional" pharmacist out of business. They will respond only to costly and excessive advertising, and end up paying the price. They will go from one pharmacist to another, following the discount, and destroy the pharmacist–customer relationship. They will lose respect for the profession because it advertises. All this is not in their best interests, and all this can be avoided if they are not permitted to know who is charging what.

There is, of course, an alternative to this highly paternalistic approach. That alternative is to assume that this information is not in itself harmful, that people will perceive their own best interests if only they are well enough informed, and that the best means to that end is to open the channels of communication rather than to close them. If they are truly open, nothing prevents the "professional" pharmacist from marketing his own assertedly superior product, and contrasting it with that of the low-cost, high-volume prescription drug retailer. But the choice among these alternative approaches is not ours to make or the Virginia General Assembly's. It is precisely this kind of choice, between the dangers of suppressing information, and the dangers of its misuse if it is freely available, that the First Amendment makes for us. Virginia is free to require whatever professional standards it wishes of its pharmacists; it may subsidize them or protect them from competition in other ways. But it may not do so by keeping the public in ignorance of the entirely lawful terms that competing pharmacists are offering. In this sense, the justifications Virginia has offered for suppressing the flow of prescription drug price information, far from persuading us that the flow is not protected by the First Amendment, have reenforced our view that it is. We so hold.

In concluding that commercial speech, like other varieties, is protected, we of course do not hold that it can never be regulated in any way. Some forms of commercial speech regulation are surely permissible. We mention a few only to make clear that they are not before us and therefore are not foreclosed by this case.

There is no claim, for example, that the prohibition on prescription drug price advertising is a mere time, place, and manner restriction. We have often approved restrictions of that kind provided that they are justified without reference to the content of the regulated speech, that they serve a significant governmental interest, and that in so doing they leave open ample alternative channels for communication of the information. Whatever may be the proper bounds of time, place, and manner restrictions on commercial speech, they are plainly exceeded by this Virginia statute, which singles out speech of a particular content and seeks to prevent its dissemination completely.

Nor is there any claim that prescription drug price advertisements are forbidden because they are false or misleading in any way. Untruthful speech, commercial or otherwise, has never been protected for its own sake. Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc. Obviously, much commercial speech is not provably false, or even wholly false, but only deceptive or misleading.

We foresee no obstacle to a State's dealing effectively with this problem.[24] The First Amendment, as we construe it today, does not prohibit the state from insuring that the stream of commercial information flows cleanly as well as freely.

Also, there is no claim that the transactions proposed in the forbidden advertisements are themselves illegal in any way. Cf. Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Pittsburgh Comm'n on Human Relations. Finally the special problems of the electronic broadcast media are likewise not in this case.

What is at issue is whether a state may completely suppress the dissemination of concededly truthful information about entirely lawful activity, fearful of that information's effect upon its disseminators and its recipients. Reserving other questions, we conclude that the answer to this one is in the negative.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

Justice Stevens took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

Justice Stewart, concurring.

Justice REHNQUIST, dissenting.

In this case * * * the Court has unfortunately substituted for the wavering line previously thought to exist between commercial speech and protected speech a no more satisfactory line of its own—that between "truthful" commercial speech, on the one hand, and that which is "false and misleading" on the other. The difficulty with this line is not that it waivers, but on the contrary that it is simply too Procrustean to take into account the congeries of factors which I believe could, quite consistently with the First and Fourteenth Amendments, properly influence a legislative decision with respect to commercial advertising.

COMMENT

Professor Edwin Baker has argued, based on his individual liberty model of the First Amendment, that "a complete denial of First Amendment protection for commercial speech is not only consistent with, but is required by, First Amendment theory." See Baker, Commercial Speech: A Problem In The Theory of Freedom, 62 Iowa L.Rev. 1 at 3 (1976). Baker provides the following argument against a protected status for commercial speech:

> [I]n our present historical setting, commercial speech is not a manifestation of individual freedom or choice. * * * [P]rofit-motivated or commercial speech lacks the crucial connections with individual liberty and self-realization which exist for speech generally, and which are central to justifications for the constitutional protection of speech, justifications which in turn define the proper scope of protection under the first amendment.

What values emphasized in Virginia Pharmacy does this analysis omit? It could be argued, certainly, that an individual with little in the way of economic resources and dependent for life on an expensive prescription drug might well find information as to the price of these drugs central to "self-realization."

Although Virginia Pharmacy gave new constitutional protection to commercial speech, it was still, to steal a phrase from George Orwell, a little less equal than other kinds of speech. (See fn. 24.) Part of the Court's problem was presented by the perceived need to regulate false and misleading advertising. Professor Redish has challenged some of the Court's reasoning for continuing to validate some regulation of commercial advertising. See Redish, The Value of Free Speech, 130 U.Pa.L.Rev. 591 at 633 (1982). Professor Redish questioned whether commercial claims are more easily verified than political ones.

The distinction between commercial and political speech, according to Professor Redish, has another rationale:

> We presumably find such regulation in the political process so abhorrent not because we wish to condone misleading political claims, but rather because of the dangers inherent in allowing the government to reg-

---

24. In concluding that commercial speech enjoys First Amendment protection, we have not held that it is wholly undifferentiable from other forms. There are commonsense differences between speech that does "no more than purpose a commercial transaction," and other varieties. Even if the differences do not justify the conclusion that commercial speech is valueless, and thus subject to complete suppression by the state, they nonetheless suggest that a different degree of protection is necessary to insure that the flow of truthful and legitimate commercial information in unimpaired. The truth of commercial speech, for example, may be more easily verifiable by its disseminator than, let us say, news reporting or political commentary, in that ordinarily the advertiser seeks to disseminate information about a specific product or service that he himself provides and presumably knows more about than anyone else. Also, commercial speech may be more durable than other kinds. Since advertising is the sine qua non of commercial profits, there is little likelihood of its being chilled by proper regulation and foregone entirely.

Attributes such as these, the greater objectivity and hardiness of commercial speech, may make it less necessary to tolerate inaccurate statements for fear in silencing the speaker. They may also make it appropriate to require that a commercial message appear in such a form, or include such additional information, warnings and disclaimers, as are necessary to prevent it being deceptive.

> ulate on the basis of the misleading nature of assertions made in the political process. The fear is that those in power will use such authority as a weapon with which to intimidate or defeat the political opposition, a result that has been all too common in our political history. * * * In contrast, there is no reason to believe that much regulation of misleading advertising is similarly motivated.

Do you agree?

Another significant development in the line of cases according a higher degree of First Amendment protection to commercial speech is Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350 (1977).

The case arose out of the following facts. Two members of the Arizona bar were charged with violating a state supreme court disciplinary rule which prohibited lawyers from advertising in newspapers as well as other media. The two lawyers, John Bates and Van O'Steen, opened up a "legal clinic" to serve people of moderate means. The clinic limited itself to "routine" legal services. In order to obtain a sufficient volume of business to make low-cost legal services possible, the two lawyers decided to advertise. They took out an ad in the Phoenix daily newspaper, Arizona Republic, where they listed the types of services which they could provide and the fees which they would charge, e.g., uncontested divorces—$100, uncontested adoptions—$225 plus a $10 publications fee. The state bar concluded that the two lawyers had violated the disciplinary rule against lawyer advertising, and the Arizona Supreme Court upheld that determination. The United States Supreme Court affirmed in part and reversed in part.

In Bates, the Supreme Court, per Justice Blackmun, ruled that the state bar association prohibition on all lawyer advertising was unconstitutional: "Like the Virginia statutes, [involved in Virginia Pharmacy] the disciplinary role serves to inhibit the free flow of commercial information and to keep the public in ignorance." The issue presented was a narrow one. Problems associated with regulation of advertising claims relating to the quality of legal services were not addressed. Also left for later resolution were "the problems associated with in-person solicitation of clients—at the hospital room or the accident site, or in any other situation that breeds undue influence" by lawyers or their agents. Justice Blackmun described the issue before the Court as follows:

> The heart of the dispute before us today is whether lawyers also may constitutionally advertise the prices at which certain routine services will be performed. Numerous justifications are proffered for the restrictions of such price advertising.

The Court rejected the various justifications offered for restricting price advertising for routine services. Next the Court discussed the application of the overbreadth doctrine to the prohibition at issue. Justice Blackmun observed that under First Amendment law, attack on overly broad statutes had been permitted even though "the person making the attack" could not "demonstrate that in fact his specific conduct was protected." If it could be shown that the disciplinary rule interferes with protected expression, the person attacking the prohibition "ordinarily could expect to benefit regardless of the nature of [her] acts." The reason for this approach to overbreadth analysis in a First Amendment setting was powerful:

> The use of overbreadth analysis reflects the conclusion that the possible harm to society from allowing unprotected speech to go unpunished is outweighed by the possibility that protected speech will be muted.

However, Justice Blackmun reasoned that overbreadth doctrine was strong medicine in the context of commercial speech:

> But the justification for the application of overbreadth analysis applies weakly, if at all, in the ordinary commercial context. As was acknowledged in Virginia Pharmacy Board v. Virginia Consumer Council, there are "commonsense differences" between commercial speech and other varieties. Since advertising is linked to commercial well-being it seems unlikely that such speech is particularly susceptible to being crushed by overbroad regulation. Moreover, concerns for uncertainty in determining the scope of protection are reduced; the advertiser seeks to disseminate information about a product or service that he provides, and presumably he can determine more readily than others whether his speech is truthful and protected.

The Court held that the advertising at issue was not misleading:

> In holding that advertising by attorneys may not be subjected to blanket suppression, and that the advertisement at issue is protected, we, of course, do not hold that advertising by attorneys may not be regulated in any way.

Some regulation on lawyer advertising was, of course, not precluded by the decision. False, deceptive, or misleading advertising was subject to restraint: "Since the advertiser knows his product and has a commercial interest in its dissemination, we have little worry that regulation to assure truthfulness will discourage protected speech." Advertising relating to the quality of services also might, in some circumstances, be subject to regulation since quality claims were "not susceptible to measurement or verification."

Suppression of advertising concerning illegal transactions was still permissible. Possibilities left open by the Court in Bates included "reasonable restrictions on the time, place, and manner of advertising." Resolution of the "special problems of advertising on the electronic broadcast media" were left for another day. The holding of the Bates case was a simple one: the state could not, consistent with the First Amendment, prohibit the truthful advertisement of the terms of routine legal services in a newspaper.

Justice Rehnquist dissented in Bates, arguing that the First Amendment was a "sanctuary for expressions of public importance or intellectual interest." Justice Rehnquist said that the First Amendment was "demeaned by invocation to protect advertisements of goods and services." Reflect on Professor Meiklejohn's view of the type of expression the First Amendment was designed to protect. See text, p. 16. Is it likely that Professor Meiklejohn would agree with Justice Blackmun or with Justice Rehnquist with respect to the issues raised in Bates?

Bates made a distinction between "routine" legal advertising which could not be validly prohibited and bans on "quality of service" advertising, the validity of which the Court postponed for resolution for another day. Bates left room for the state to regulate some kinds of professional advertising. Moreover, the Court limited its ruling to the type of advertising involved in Bates, e.g., print media advertising. Bates suggested that the case for regulation of professional advertising on the electronic media would be stronger than in the case of the print media. Why?

Another development in the general overhaul of the commercial speech doctrine which began with the Bigelow case was found in Linmark Associates, Inc. v. Township of Willingboro, 431 U.S. 85 (1977). The town of Willingboro, New Jersey had issued an ordinance forbidding the posting of "For Sale" or "Sold" signs. The point of the ordinance was to prevent a so-called "white flight" from a community whose black population was rapidly increasing. The Supreme Court, per Justice Marshall, ruled that the ordinance was unconstitutional.

The Linmark case showed that the First Amendment interest in providing both the buyer and society with an unrestricted flow of commercial information was of high dimension. State concern that use of the "For Sale" sign might cause the community to act irrationally would not justify restricting the most effective option for communication of a particular kind of commercial information—the use of the "For Sale" sign in front of the house to communicate a homeowner's desire to sell his house.

Linmark suggests that the status of commercial speech is high. Although commercial speech may not yet have attained the status of noncommercial speech, a case like Linmark demonstrates that the voices of the marketplace are worthy of inclusion in a constitutionally protected marketplace of ideas.

As a First Amendment matter, even when expression is protected, time, place, and manner regulations are, in appropriate circumstances, nevertheless permissible. Was the restriction on "For Sale" signs merely a restriction on the manner of expression? After all, other opportunities for advertising the sale of houses were available such as the classified columns of the newspapers. The Court refused to view the ordinance prohibiting "For Sale" signs as manner restrictions. The ordinance in the Court's opinion was concerned with restricting the content of a particular mode of communication. Since the Willingboro ordinance was not content-neutral and was designed to restrict a class of expression, even though the expression involved was commercial in character, the ordinance violated the First Amendment.

The student should also consult the advertising section of this text where some of these cases are discussed from a regulation, instead of a First Amendment, point of view. See text, p. 523.

CENTRAL HUDSON GAS & ELECTRIC CORP. v. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION

447 U.S. 557, 100 S.CT. 2343, 65 L.ED.2D 341 (1980).

Justice POWELL delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case presents the question whether a regulation of the Public Service Commission of the State of New York violates the First and Fourteenth Amendments because it completely bans promotional advertising by an electrical utility.

In December 1973, the commission, appellee here, ordered electric utilities in New York State to cease all advertising that "promot[es] the use of electricity." The order was based on the commission's finding that "the interconnected utility system in New York State does not have sufficient fuel stocks or sources of supply to continue furnishing all customer demands for the 1973–1974 winter."

Three years later, when the fuel shortage had eased, the commission requested comments from the public on its proposal to continue the ban on promotional advertising. Central Hudson Gas & Electric Corporation, the appellant in this case, opposed the ban on First Amendment grounds. After reviewing the public comments, the commission extended the prohibition in a policy statement issued on February 25, 1977.

The policy statement divided advertising expenses "into two broad categories: promotional—advertising intended to stimulate the purchase of utility services—and institutional and informational, a broad category inclusive of all advertising not clearly intended to promote sales." The commission declared all promotional advertising contrary to the national policy of conserving energy. It acknowledged that the ban is not a perfect vehicle for conserving energy. Still, the commission adopted the restriction because it was deemed likely to "result in some dampening of unnecessary growth" in energy consumption.

The commission's order explicitly permitted "informational" advertising designed to encourage "shifts of consumption" from peak demand times to periods of low electricity demand. [Emphasis in original.] Informational advertising would not seek to increase aggregate consumption, but would invite a leveling of demand throughout any given 24-hour period. The agency offered to review "specific proposals by the companies for specifically described [advertising] programs that meet these criteria."

Appellant challenged the order in state court, arguing that the commission had restrained commercial speech in violation of the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The commission's order was upheld by the trial court and at the intermediate appellate level. The New York Court of Appeals affirmed.

The commission's order restricts only commercial speech, that is, expression related solely to the economic interests of the speaker and its audience. In applying the First Amendment to this area, we have rejected the "highly paternalistic" view that government has complete power to suppress or regulate commercial speech. Even when advertising communicates only an incomplete version of the relevant facts, the First Amendment presumes that some accurate information is better than no information at all.

Nevertheless, our decisions have recognized "the 'common-sense' distinction between speech proposing a commercial transaction, which occurs in an era traditionally subject to government regulation, and other varieties of speech." The Constitution therefore accords a lesser protection to commercial speech than to other constitutionally guaranteed expression. The protection available for particular commercial expression turns on the nature both of the expression and of the governmental interests served by its regulation.

The First Amendment's concern for commercial speech is based on the informational function of advertising. Consequently, there can be no constitutional objection to the suppression of commercial messages that do not accurately inform the public about lawful activity. The government may ban forms of communications more likely to deceive the public than to inform it.

If the communication is neither misleading nor related to unlawful activity, the government's power is more circumscribed. The state must assert a substantial interest to be achieved by restrictions on commercial speech. Moreover, the regulatory technique must be in proportion to that interest. The limitation on expression must be designed carefully to achieve the state's goal. Compliance with this requirement may be measured by two criteria. First, the restriction must directly advance the state interest involved: the regulation may not be sustained if it provides only ineffective or remote support for the government's purpose. Second, if the governmental interest could be served as well by a more limited restriction on commercial speech, the excessive restrictions cannot survive.

Under the first criterion, the court has declined to uphold regulations that only indirectly advance the state interest involved.

The second criterion recognizes that the First Amendment mandates that speech restrictions be "narrowly drawn." The regulatory technique may extend only as far as the interest it serves. The state cannot regulate speech that poses no danger to the asserted state interest, nor can it completely suppress information when narrower restrictions on expression would serve its interest as well.

In commercial speech cases, then, a four-part analysis has developed. At the outset, we must determine whether the expression is protected by the First Amendment. For commercial speech to come within that provision, it at least must concern lawful activity and not be misleading. Next, we ask whether the asserted governmental interest is substantial. If both inquiries yield positive answers, we must determine whether the regulation directly advances the governmental interest asserted, and whether it is not more extensive than is necessary to serve that interest. [Emphasis added.]

We now apply this four-step analysis for commercial speech to the commission's arguments in support of its ban on promotional advertising.

The commission does not claim that the expression at issue either is inaccurate or relates to unlawful activity. Yet the New York Court of Appeals questioned whether Central Hudson's advertising is protected commercial speech. Because appellant holds a monopoly over the sale of electricity in its service area, the state court suggested that the commission's order restricts no commercial speech of any worth. The court stated that advertising in a "noncompetitive market" could not improve the decision making of consumers. The court saw no constitutional problem with barring commercial speech that it viewed as conveying little useful information.

We come finally to the critical inquiry in this case: whether the commission's complete suppression of speech ordinarily protected by the First Amendment is no more extensive than necessary to further the state's interest in energy conservation. The commission's order reaches all promotional advertising, regardless of the impact of the touted service on overall energy use. But the energy conservation rationale, as important as it is, cannot justify suppressing information about electric devices or services that would cause no net increase in total energy use. In addition, no showing has been made that a more limited restriction on the content of promotional advertising would not serve adequately the state's interests.

The commission also had not demonstrated that its interest in conservation cannot be protected adequately by more limited regulation of appellant's commercial expression. To further its policy of conservation, the commission could attempt to restrict the format and content of Central Hudson's advertising. It might, for example, require that the advertisements include information about the relative efficiency and expense of the offered service, both under current conditions and for the foreseeable future. In the absence of a showing that more limited speech regulations would be ineffective, we cannot approve the complete suppression of Central Hudson's advertising.

Justice REHNQUIST, dissenting.

The Court's analysis in my view is wrong in several respects. Initially, I disagree with the Court's conclusion that the speech of a state-created monopoly, which is the subject of a comprehensive regulatory scheme, is entitled to protection under the First Amendment. I also think that the Court errs here in failing to recognize that the state law is most accurately viewed as an economic regulation and that the speech involved (if it falls within the scope of the First Amendment at all) occupies a significantly more subordinate position in the hierarchy of First Amendment values than the Court gives it today. Finally, the Court in reaching its decision improperly substitutes its own judgment for that of the state in deciding how a proper ban on promotional advertising should be drafted. With regard to this latter point, the Court adopts as its final part of a four-part test a "no more extensive than necessary" analysis that will unduly impair a state legislature's ability to adopt legislation reasonably designed to promote interests that have always been rightly thought to be of great importance to the state.

I think New York's ban on such advertising falls within the scope of permissible state regulation of an economic activity by an entity that could not exist in corporate form, say nothing of enjoy monopoly status, were it not for the laws of New York.

This Court has previously recognized that although commercial speech may be entitled to First Amendment protection, that protection is not as extensive as that accorded to the advocacy of ideas.

The test adopted by the Court elevates the protection accorded commercial speech that falls within the scope of the First Amendment to a level that is virtually indistinguishable from that of noncommercial speech. I think the Court in so doing has effectively accomplished the "devitalization" of the First Amendment that it counseled against in Ohralik, 436 U.S. 447 (1978). I think it has also by labeling economic regulation of business conduct as a restraint on "free speech" gone far to resurrect the discredited doctrine of cases such as Lochner. New York's order here is in my view more akin to an economic regulation to which virtually complete deference should be accorded by this Court.

[I]n a number of instances government may constitutionally decide that societal interests justify the imposition of restrictions on the free flow of information. When the question is whether a given commercial message is protected, I do not think this Court's determination that the information will "assist" consumers justifies judicial invalidation of a reasonably drafted state restriction on such speech when the restriction is designed to promote a concededly substantial state interest. I consequently disagree with the Court's conclusion that the societal interest in the dissemination of commercial information is sufficient to justify a restriction on the State's authority to regulate promotional advertising by utilities; indeed, in the case of a regulated monopoly, it is difficult for me to distinguish "society" from the state legislature and the Public Service Commission. Nor do I think there is any basis for concluding that individual citizens of the state will recognize the need for and act to promote energy conservation to the extent the government deems appropriate, if only the channels of communication are left open. Thus, even if I were to agree that commercial speech is entitled to some First Amendment protection, I would hold here that the state's decision to ban promotional advertising, in light of the substantial state interest at stake, is a constitutionally permissible exercise of its power to adopt regulations designed to promote the interests of its citizens.

The notion that more speech is the remedy to expose falsehood and fallacies is wholly out of place in the commercial bazaar, where if applied logically the remedy of one who was defrauded would be merely a statement, available upon request, reciting the Latin maxim "caveat emptor." But since "fraudulent speech" in this area is to be remediable under Virginia Board, the remedy of one defrauded is a lawsuit or an agency proceeding based on common law notions of fraud that are separated by a world of difference from the realm of politics and government. What time, legal decisions, and common sense have so widely severed, I declined to join in Virginia Board, and regret now to see the Court reaping the seeds that it there sowed. For in a democracy, the economic is subordinate to the political, a lesson that our ancestors learned long ago, and that our descendants will undoubtedly have to relearn many years hence.

It is [in] my view inappropriate for the Court to invalidate the state's ban on commercial advertising here based on its speculation that in some cases the advertising may result in a net savings in electrical energy use, and in the cases in which it is clear a net energy savings would result from utility advertising the Public Service Commission would apply its ban so as to proscribe such advertising. Even assuming that the Court's speculation is correct, I do not think it follows that facial invalidation of the ban is the appropriate course.

COMMENT

Does Central Hudson take the commercial speech doctrine back to the Valentine v. Chrestensen era? This probably would be an unjustified conclusion. Valentine suggested that a rational basis asserted by the state to support regulation of commercial speech would be valid. The four-part test of Central Hudson, after all, does make it possible to regulate some commercial speech. On the other hand, the four-part test of Central Hudson limits the state's incursion into commercial speech.

Is Central Hudson a departure from the broad protection for commercial speech promised by Virginia Pharmacy? Isn't the teaching of Central Hudson that a "narrowly drawn" statute regulating commercial speech is valid against First Amendment attack? In short, if the criteria of the four-part test are met, the state may regulate.

In Metromedia, Inc. v. San Diego, 453 U.S. 490 (1981), a San Diego ordinance barring most types of billboard advertising was invalidated, but no common rationale attracted a majority of the Court. A plurality opinion for the court, written by Justice White and joined by three others, found the constitutional infirmity of the ordinance to be that while on-site commercial billboard advertising was permitted, other commercial billboard advertising, as well as noncommercial advertising (with some exceptions), was not permitted. The ban on noncommercial advertising was deemed impermissible by Justice White:

> With respect to noncommercial speech, the city may not choose the appropriate subjects for public discourse. Because some noncommercial messages may be conveyed on billboards throughout the commercial and industrial zones, San Diego must similarly allow billboards conveying other noncommercial messages throughout those zones.

What of the distinction San Diego made between on-site commercial billboards which were permitted and off-site commercial advertising which was not? Was the distinction valid? Justice White said that it was:

> As we see it, the city could reasonably conclude that a commercial enterprise—as well as the interested public—has a stronger interest in identifying its place of business and advertising the products or services available there than it has in using or leasing its available space for the purpose of advertising commercial enterprises located elsewhere. It does not follow from the fact that the city has concluded that some commercial interests outweigh its municipal interests in this context that it must give similar weight to all other commercial advertising. Thus, off-site commercial billboards may be prohibited while on-site commercial billboards are permitted.
> The constitutional problem in this area requires resolution of the conflict between the city's land-use interests and the commercial interests of those seeking to purvey goods and services within the city. In light of the above analysis, we cannot conclude that the city has drawn an ordinance broader than is necessary to meet its interests, or that it fails directly to advance substantial government interests. In sum, insofar as it regulates commercial speech the San Diego ordinance meets the constitutional requirements of Central Hudson.

A majority of the justices did agree, however, that an ordinance which was drawn with sufficient precision to prohibit only commercial billboard advertising could be valid. In a concurring opinion, Justice Brennan disagreed with that conclusion:

> More importantly, I cannot agree with the plurality's view that an ordinance totally banning commercial billboards but allowing noncommercial billboards would be constitutional. For me, such an ordinance raises First Amendment problems at least as serious as those raised by a total ban, for it gives city officials the right—before approving a billboard—to determine whether the proposed message is "commercial" or "noncommercial." Of course the plurality is correct when it observes that "our cases have consistently distinguished between the constitutional protection afforded commercial as opposed to noncommercial speech," but it errs in assuming that a governmental unit may be put in the position in the first instance of deciding whether the proposed speech is commercial or noncommercial. In individual cases, this distinction is anything but clear. Because making such determinations would entail a substantial exercise of discretion by city's officials, it presents a real danger of curtailing noncommercial speech in the guise of regulating commercial speech.

In a recent article, Professor Martin Redish has characterized Metromedia as an example of a case where the Court confused subject matter categorizations with content regulation. See Redish, The Content Distinction in First Amendment Analysis, 34 Stan.L.Rev. 1 at 128 (1981):

> [I]t is significant that, in response to the Chief Justice's argument (in dissent) that the Court's function should be limited to assuring governmental neutrality in regulating speech (Burger, C.J., dissenting), the Court did not argue that even such content-neutral regulations could significantly impair first amendment interests. Rather, Justice White's plurality opinion merely noted that the traditional concern for neutrality "is applicable to the facts of this case" because "San Diego has chosen to favor certain kinds of messages—such as on-site commercial advertising and temporary political campaign advertisements—over others." The dissent failed to explain, Justice White said, "why San Diego should not be held to have violated this concept of First Amendment neutrality." The decision, then, appears to be nothing more than another instance—like Mosley [Police Department v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92 (1972)]—in which the Court aberrationally decides to view subject matter categorization as a form of content regulation and therefore subject to a stricter form of scrutiny.

Why is subject matter categorization less dangerous from a First Amendment point of view than content regulation?

Zauderer and Illustrations in Advertising

Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel of Supreme Court of Ohio, 471 U.S. 626 (1985), invalidated an Ohio Supreme Court disciplinary office reprimand against a lawyer from advertising in a newspaper to solicit legal business from those who suffered injuries as a result of using Dalkon Shields. Justice White explained this determination as follows:

> Because appellant's statements regarding the Dalkon Shield were not false or deceptive, our decisions im> pose on the State the burden of establishing that prohibiting the use of such statements to solicit or obtain legal business directly advances a substantial governmental interest. Although some sensitive souls may have found appellant's advertisement in poor taste, it can hardly be said to have invaded the privacy of those who read it. More significantly, appellant's advertisement—and print advertising generally—poses much less risk of over-reaching or undue influence. Print advertising may convey information and ideas more or less effectively, but in most cases, it will lack the coercive force of the personal presence of a trained advocate.

Zauderer also invalidated a disciplinary restriction on the use of illustrations in lawyer advertising:

> The use of illustrations or pictures in advertisements serves important communicative functions: it attracts the attention of the audience to the advertiser's message, and it may also serve to impart information directly. Accordingly, commercial illustrations are entitled to the First Amendment protections afforded verbal commercial speech: restrictions on the use of visual media of expression in advertising must survive scrutiny under the Central Hudson test. Although the State undoubtedly has a substantial interest in ensuring that its attorneys behave with dignity and decorum in the courtroom, we are unsure that the State's desire that attorneys maintain their dignity in their communications with the public is an interest substantial enough to justify the abridgment of their First Amendment rights.
>
> We are not persuaded that identifying deceptive or manipulative uses of visual media in advertising is so intrinsically burdensome that the State is entitled to forego that task in favor of the more convenient but far more restrictive alternative of a blanket ban on the use of illustrations. Given the possibility of policing the use of illustrations in advertisements on a case-by-case basis, the prophylactic approach taken by Ohio cannot stand; hence, appellant may not be disciplined for his use of an accurate and nondeceptive illustration.

Shapero v. Kentucky Bar Association and Bans on Targeted Direct-mail Advertising

In Shapero v. Kentucky Bar Association, 108 S.Ct. 1916 (1988), the Court, per Justice Brennan, ruled that targeted direct-mail advertising by a lawyer to potential clients could not be prohibited by the state of Kentucky. Zauderer had held that newspaper advertisements by lawyers containing truthful and nondeceptive information or advice regarding specific legal problems could not be categorically banned under the First Amendment. Was Shapero distinguishable? Was the newspaper advertising by lawyers on specific legal problems different from targeted direct-mail advertising on specific legal problems? The Court declined to make such a distinction: "Our lawyer advertising cases have never distinguished among various modes of written advertising to the general public."

A case which both Shapero and Zauderer were at pains to distinguish was Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Association, 436 U.S. 447 (1978), which invalidated an Ohio rule prohibiting in-person solicitation by lawyers for pecuniary gain.

Was the lawyer letter targeted to a particular potential client with a particular legal problem just "Ohralik in writing"? Justice Brennan in Shapero answered this question in the negative:

> Like print advertising, petitioner's letter and targeted, direct-mail solicitation generally—"poses much less risk of overreaching or undue influence" than does in-person solicitation. Neither mode of written communication involves "the coercive force of the personal presence of a trained advocate" or the "pressure on the potential client for an immediate yes-or-no answer to the offer of representation." Unlike the potential client with a badgering advocate breathing down his neck, the recipient of a letter and the "reader of an advertisement * * * can 'effectively avoid further bombardment of [his] sensibilities simply by averting [his] eyes.' " A letter, like a printed advertisement (but unlike a lawyer), can readily be put in a drawer to be considered later, ignored, or discarded. In short, both types of written solicitation "conve[y] information about legal services [by means] that [are] more conducive to reflection and the exercise of choice on the part of the consumer than is personal solicitation by an attorney."

Justice Brennan concluded that some targeted, direct-mail solicitation did present opportunities for "isolated abuse," but this did not justify "a total ban on that mode of protected commercial speech." The state had far less restrictive means available to deal with such problems: the state could require lawyers to file solicitation letters with a state agency. This would provide the state with "ample opportunity to supervise mailings and penalize actual abuses."

Justice Brennan concluded this portion of his opinion for the majority of the Court by relying on the statement from Zauderer that the "free flow of commercial information is valuable enough to justify imposing on would-be regulators the costs of distinguishing the truthful from the false, the helpful from the misleading, and the harmless from the harmful."

One portion of Justice Brennan's opinion for the Court was supported only by a plurality of the Court (Marshall, Blackmun, and Kennedy). This dealt with the contention of the state bar association that attorney Shapero's use in his letter of underscored uppercase letters and his inclusion of subjective predictions of client satisfaction constituted overreaching. Attorney Shapero's letter contained statements such as "Call NOW, don't wait" and "it is FREE, there is NO charge for calling." Justice Brennan addressed this contention since the First Amendment overbreadth doctrine does not apply to professional advertising. He quickly dismissed it: "[S]o long as the First Amendment protects the right to solicit legal business, the State may claim no substantial interest in restricting truthful and nondeceptive lawyer solicitations to those least likely to be read by the recipient."

Justice O'Connor, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice Scalia, dissented. Although Justice O'Connor agreed that Zauderer supported the result in Shapero, Justice O'Connor felt that Zauderer was "itself the culmination of a line of cases built on defective premises and flawed reasoning." For Justice O'Connor, the reasoning of Bates was ill-considered. Central Hudson and its doctrine should have been applied to the advertising restriction in Shapero:

> Applying the Central Hudson test to the regulation at issue today, * * * I think it clear that Kentucky has a substantial interest in preventing the potentially misleading effects of targeted, direct-mail advertising as well as the corrosive effects that such advertising can have on appropriate professional standards. Soliciting business from strangers who appear to need particular legal services, when a significant motive for the offer is the lawyer's pecuniary gain, always has a tendency to corrupt the solicitor's professional judgment.
> The roots of the error in our attorney advertising cases are a defective analogy between professional services and standardized consumer products and a correspondingly inappropriate skepticism about the States' justification for their regulations.
>
> Bates was an early experiment with the doctrine of commercial speech, and it has proved to be problematic in its application. Rather than continuing to work out all the consequences of its approach, we should now return to the States the legislative function that has so inappropriately been taken from them in the context of attorney advertising. The Central Hudson test for commercial speech provides an adequate doctrinal basis for doing so, and today's decision confirms the need to reconsider Bates in the light of that doctrine.

POSADAS DE PUERTO RICO ASSOCIATES v. TOURISM COMPANY OF PUERTO RICO

478 U.S. 328, 106 S.CT. 2968, 92 L.ED.2D 266 (1986).

[EDITORIAL NOTE In order to encourage tourism Puerto Rico legalized casino gambling. Advertising of these casino and gambling parlors to the Puerto Rican public was prohibited under the Games of Chance Act but "restricted advertising" outside of Puerto Rico was permitted. Posadas de Puerto Rico Associates was fined twice for violating the advertising restrictions. Posadas protested, and the Tourism Company of Puerto Rico which had fined Posadas interpreted the advertising restrictions. The prohibition against advertising in Puerto Rico included "the use of the word 'casino' in matchbooks, lighters, envelopes" as well as napkins, brochures, menus, and on many other items from pencils to telephone directories.

More fines were assessed against Posadas. Posadas paid the fines since otherwise its gambling franchise would not be renewed. News of the fines reached the New Jersey Gambling Commission which considered denying a franchise to the parent company of Posadas to operate a casino in New Jersey.

Posadas sought a declaratory judgment against the Tourism Company in the Superior Court of Puerto Rico alleging that the Game of Chance Act and the regulations issued under it violated protected commercial speech. The Puerto Rico Government concluded that the legislature was concerned with preventing advertising of casino gambling directed at residents of Puerto Rico but not at such advertising when it was directed to tourists. The Court gave the statute a narrowing interpretation and concluded that it only prohibited advertising "which is contracted with an advertising agency, for consideration, to attract the resident to bet at the dice, card, roulette and bingo tables." The Superior Court of Puerto Rico also set forth a narrowing construction of the advertising restriction regulation:

> We hereby allow, within the jurisdiction of Puerto Rico, advertising by the casinos addressed to tourists, provided they do not invite the residents of Puerto Rico to visit the casino, even though said announcements may incidentally reach the hands of a resident. We hereby authorize advertising in the mass communication media of the country, where the trade name of the hotel is used even though it may contain a reference to the casino provided that the word casino is never used alone nor specified. Since a clausus enumeration of this regulation is unforeseeable, any other situation or incident relating to the legal restriction must be measured in light of the public policy of promoting tourism. If the object of the advertisement is the tourist, it passes legal scrutiny.

The Superior Court of Puerto Rico declared that the constitutional rights of Posadas had been violated by the Tourism Company's past application of the advertising restrictions. The court ruled, however, that the restrictions were not facially unconstitutional and could be "sustained as modified by the guidelines issued by this court on this date." Posadas then sought review in the Puerto Rico Supreme Court which dismissed his appeal on the ground that it did "not present a substantial constitutional question." Appeal was then obtained before the United States Supreme Court.]

Justice REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

Because this case involves the restriction of pure commercial speech which does "no more than propose a commercial transaction," Virginia Pharmacy Board v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., our First Amendment analysis is guided by the general principles identified in Central Hudson Gas & Electric Corp. v. Public Service Comm'n. Under Central Hudson, commercial speech receives a limited form of First Amendment protection so long as it concerns a lawful activity and is not misleading or fraudulent. Once it is determined that the First Amendment applies to the particular kind of commercial speech at issue, then the speech may be restricted only if the government's interest in doing so is substantial, the restrictions directly advance the government's asserted interest, and the restrictions are no more extensive than necessary to serve that interest.

The particular kind of commercial speech at issue here, namely, advertising of casino gambling aimed at the residents of Puerto Rico, concerns a lawful activity and is not misleading or fraudulent, at least at the abstract. We must therefore proceed to the three remaining steps of the Central Hudson analysis in order to determine whether Puerto Rico's advertising restrictions run afoul of the First Amendment. The first of these three steps involves an assessment of the strength of the government's interest in restricting the speech. The interest at stake in this case, as determined by the Superior Court, is the reduction of demand for casino gambling by the residents of Puerto Rico. These are some of the very same concerns, of course, that have motivated the vast majority of the 50 States to prohibit casino gambling. We have no difficulty in concluding that the Puerto Rico Legislature's interest in the health, safety, and welfare of its citizens constitutes a "substantial" governmental interest. Cf. Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc. (city has substantial interest in "preserving the quality of life in the community at large").

The last two steps of the Central Hudson analysis basically involve a consideration of the "fit" between the legislature's ends and the means chosen to accomplish those ends. Step three asks the question whether the challenged restrictions on commercial speech "directly advance" the government's asserted interest. In the instant case, the answer to this question is clearly "yes. The Puerto Rico Legislature obviously believed, when it enacted the advertising restrictions at issue here, that advertising of casino gambling aimed at the residents of Puerto Rico would serve to increase the demand for the product advertised. We think the legislature's belief is a reasonable one, and the fact that appellant has chosen to litigate this case all the way to this Court indicates that appellant shares the legislature's view. See Central Hudson.

Appellant argues, however, that the challenged advertising restrictions are underinclusive because other kinds of gambling such as horse racing, cockfighting, and the lottery may be advertised to the residents of Puerto Rico. Appellant's argument is misplaced for two reasons. First, whether other kinds of gambling are advertised in Puerto Rico or not, the restrictions on advertising of casino gambling "directly advance" the legislature's interest in reducing demand for games of chance. Second, the legislature's interest, as previously identified, is not necessarily to reduce demand for all games of chance but to reduce demand for casino gambling. According to the Superior Court, horse racing, cockfighting, "picas," or small games of chance at fiestas, and the lottery "have been traditionally part of the Puerto Rican's roots," so that "the legislator could have been more flexible in authorizing more sophisticated games which are not so widely sponsored by the people. In other words, the legislature felt that for Puerto Ricans the risks associated with casino gambling were significantly greater than those associated with the more traditional kinds of gambling in Puerto Rico. In our view, the legislature's separate classification of casino gambling, for purposes of the advertising ban, satisfies the third step of the Central Hudson analysis.

We also think it clear beyond peradventure that the challenged statute and regulations satisfy the fourth and last step of the Central Hudson analysis, namely, whether the restrictions on commercial speech are no more extensive than necessary to serve the government's interest. The narrowing constructions of the advertising restrictions announced by the Superior Court ensure that the restrictions will not affect advertising of casino gambling aimed at tourists, but will apply only to such advertising when aimed at the residents of Puerto Rico. Appellant contends, however, that the First Amendment requires the Puerto Rico Legislature to reduce demand for casino gambling among the residents of Puerto Rico not by suppressing commercial speech that might encourage such gambling, but by promulgating additional speech designed to discourage it. We reject this contention. We think it is up to the legislature to decide whether or not such a "counterspeech" policy would be as effective in reducing the demand for casino gambling as a restriction on advertising. The legislature could conclude, as it apparently did here, that residents of Puerto Rico are already aware of the risks of casino gambling, yet would nevertheless be induced by widespread advertising to engage in such potentially harmful conduct.

In short, we conclude that the statute and regulations at issue in this case, as construed by the Superior Court, pass muster under each prong of the Central Hudson test. We therefore hold that the Supreme Court of Puerto Rico properly rejected appellant's First Amendment claim.

Appellant argues, however, that the challenged advertising restrictions are constitutionally defective under our decisions in Carey v. Population Services Int'l, and Bigelow v. Virginia. In Carey, this Court struck down a ban on any "advertisement or display" of contraceptives and in Bigelow, we reversed a criminal conviction based on the advertisement of an abortion clinic. We think appellant's argument ignores a crucial distinction between the Carey and Bigelow decisions and the instant case. In Carey and Bigelow, the underlying conduct that was the subject of the advertising restrictions was constitutionally protected and could not have been prohibited by the State. Here, on the other hand, the Puerto Rico Legislature surely could have prohibited casino gambling by the residents of Puerto Rico altogether. In our view, the greater power to completely ban casino gambling necessarily includes the lesser power to ban advertising of casino gambling, and Carey and Bigelow are hence inapposite.

Appellant also makes the related argument that, having chosen to legalize casino gambling for residents of Puerto Rico, the First Amendment prohibits the legislature from using restrictions on advertising to accomplish its goal of reducing demand for such gambling. We disagree. In our view, appellant has the argument backwards. As we noted in the preceding paragraph, it is precisely because the government could have enacted a wholesale prohibition of the underlying conduct that it is permissible for the government to take the less intrusive step of allowing the conduct, but reducing the demand through restrictions on advertising. It would surely be a Pyrrhic victory for casino owners such as appellant to gain recognition of a First Amendment right to advertise their casinos to the residents of Puerto Rico, only to thereby force the legislature into banning casino gambling by residents altogether. It would just as surely be a strange constitutional doctrine which would concede to the legislature the authority to totally ban a product or activity, but deny to the legislature the authority to forbid the stimulation of demand for the product or activity through advertising on behalf of those who would profit from such increased demand. Legislative regulation of products or activities deemed harmful, such as cigarettes, alcoholic beverages, and prostitution, has varied from outright prohibition on the one hand, to legalization of the product or activity with restrictions on stimulation of its demand on the other hand. To rule out the latter, intermediate kind of response would require more than we find in the First Amendment.

Appellant's final argument in opposition to the advertising restrictions is that they are unconstitutionally vague. In particular, appellant argues that the statutory language, "to advertise or otherwise offer their facilities," and "the public of Puerto Rico," are not sufficiently defined to satisfy the requirements of due process. Appellant also claims that the term "anunciarse," which appears in the controlling Spanish version of the statute, is actually broader than the English term "to advertise," and could be construed to mean simply "to make known." Even assuming that appellant's argument has merit with respect to the bare statutory language, however, we have already noted that we are bound by the Superior Court's narrowing construction of the statute. Viewed in light of that construction, and particularly with the interpretive assistance of the implementing regulations as modified by the Superior Court, we do not find the statute unconstitutionally vague.

For the foregoing reasons, the decision of the Supreme Court of Puerto Rico that, as construed by the Superior Court, § 8 of the Games of Chance Act of 1948 and the implementing regulations do not facially violate the First Amendment or the due process or equal protection guarantees of the Constitution, is affirmed.[11]

Justice BRENNAN, with whom Justice Marshall and Justice Blackmun join, dissenting.

I see no reason why commercial speech should be afforded less protection than other types of speech where, as here, the government seeks to suppress commercial speech in order to deprive consumers of accurate information concerning lawful activity. * * * However, no differences between commercial and other kinds of speech justify protecting commercial speech less extensively where, as here, the government seeks to manipulate private behavior by depriving citizens of truthful information concerning lawful activities. Accordingly, I believe that where the government seeks to suppress the dissemination of nonmisleading commercial speech relating to legal activities, for fear that recipients will act on the information provided, such regulation should be subject to strict judicial scrutiny.

The Court, rather than applying strict scrutiny, evaluates Puerto Rico's advertising ban under the relaxed standards normally used to test government regulation of commercial speech. Even under these standards, however, I do not believe that Puerto Rico constitutionally may suppress all casino advertising directed to its residents. * * *

The Court asserts that the Commonwealth has a legitimate and substantial interest in discouraging its residents from engaging in casino gambling. Neither the statute on its face nor the legislative history indicates that the Puerto Rico Legislature thought that serious harm would result if residents were allowed to engage in casino gambling; indeed, the available evidence suggests exactly the opposite. Puerto Rico has legalized gambling casinos, and permits its residents to patronize them. Thus, the Puerto Rico legislature has determined that permitting residents to engage in casino gambling will not produce the "serious harmful effects" that have led a majority of States to ban such activity.

The Court nevertheless sustains Puerto Rico's advertising ban because the legislature could have determined that casino gambling would seriously harm the health, safety, and welfare of the Puerto Rican citizens.[4] This reasoning is contrary to this Court's long established First Amendment jurisprudence. When the government seeks to place restrictions upon commercial speech, a court may not, as the Court implies today, simply speculate about valid reasons that the government might have for enacting such restrictions. Rather, the government ultimately bears the burden of justifying the challenged regulation, and it is incumbent upon the government to prove that the interests it seeks to further are real and substantial. In this case, appellee has not shown that "serious harmful effects" will result if Puerto Rico residents gamble in casinos, and the legislature's decision to legalize such activity suggests that it believed the opposite to be true. In short, appellees have failed to show that a substantial government interest supports Puerto Rico's ban on protected expression.

Even assuming that appellee could show that the challenged restrictions are supported by a substantial governmental interest, this would not end the inquiry into their constitutionality. Appellee must still demonstrate that the challenged advertising ban directly advances Puerto Rico's interest in controlling the harmful effects allegedly associated with casino gambling. However, even assuming that an advertising ban would effectively reduce residents' patronage of gambling casinos, it is not clear how it would directly advance Puerto Rico's interest in controlling the "serious harmful effects" the Court associates with casino gambling. In particular, it is unclear whether banning casino advertising aimed at residents would affect local crime, prostitution, the development of corruption, or the infiltration of organized crime. Because Puerto Rico actively promotes its casinos to tourists, these problems are likely to persist whether or not residents are also encouraged to gamble. Absent some showing that a ban on advertising aimed only at residents will directly advance Puerto Rico's interest in controlling the harmful effects allegedly associated with casino gambling, Puerto Rico may not constitutionally restrict protected expression in that way.

11. Justice Stevens claims that the Superior Court's narrowing construction creates an impermissible "prior restraint" on protected speech, because that court required the submission of certain casino advertising to appellee for its prior approval. This argument was not raised by appellant either below or in this Court, and we therefore express no view on the constitutionality of the particular portion of the Superior Court's narrowing construction cited by Justice Stevens.

4. I do not agree that a ban on casino advertising is "less intrusive" than an outright prohibition of such activity. A majority of States have chosen not to legalize casino gambling, and we have never suggested that this might be unconstitutional. However, having decided to legalize casino gambling, Puerto Rico's decision to ban truthful speech concerning entirely lawful activity raises serious First Amendment problems. Thus, the "constitutional doctrine" which bans Puerto Rico from banning advertisements concerning lawful casino gambling is not so strange a restraint—it is called the First Amendment.

Finally, appellee has failed to show that Puerto Rico's interest in controlling the harmful effects allegedly associated with casino gambling "cannot be protected adequately by more limited regulation of appellant's commercial expression." Central Hudson. Rather than suppressing constitutionally protected expression, Puerto Rico could seek directly to address the specific harms thought to be associated with casino gambling. Thus, Puerto Rico could continue carefully to monitor casino operations to guard against "the development of corruption, and the infiltration of organized crime." It could vigorously enforce its criminal statutes to combat "the increase in local crime [and] the fostering of prostitution." It could establish limits on the level of permissible betting, or promulgate additional speech designed to discourage casino gambling among residents, in order to avoid the "disruption of moral and cultural patterns," that might result if residents were to engage in excessive casino gambling. Such measures would directly address the problems appellee associates with casino gambling, while avoiding the First Amendment problems raised where the government seeks to ban constitutionally protected speech. In this case, nothing suggests that the Puerto Rico Legislature ever considered the efficacy of measures other than suppressing protected expression. More importantly, there has been no showing that alternative measures would inadequately safeguard the Commonwealth's interest in controlling the harmful effects allegedly associated with casino gambling. Under these circumstances, Puerto Rico's ban on advertising clearly violates the First Amendment.

I would hold that Puerto Rico may not suppress the dissemination of truthful information about entirely lawful activity merely to keep its residents ignorant. The Court, however, would allow Puerto Rico to do just that, thus dramatically shrinking the scope of First Amendment protection available to commercial speech, and giving government officials unprecedented authority to eviscerate constitutionally protected expression. I respectfully dissent.

Justice STEVENS, with whom Justice Marshall and Justice Blackmun join, dissenting.

Puerto Rico does not simply "ban advertising of casino gambling." Rather, Puerto Rico blatantly discriminates in its punishment of speech depending on the publication, audience, and words employed. Moreover, the prohibitions, as now construed by the Puerto Rico courts, establish a regime of prior restraint and articulate a standard that is hopelessly vague and unpredictable.

With respect to the publisher, in stark, unabashed language, the Superior Court's construction favors certain identifiable publications and disfavors others. If the publication (or medium) is from outside Puerto Rico, it is very favored indeed. If the publication is native to Puerto Rico, however—the San Juan Star, for instance—it is subject to a far more rigid system of restraints and controls regarding the manner in which a certain form of speech (casino ads) may be carried in its pages. Unless the Court is prepared to uphold an Illinois regulation of speech that subjects The New York Times to one standard and The Chicago Tribune to another, I do not understand why it is willing to uphold a Puerto Rico regulation that applies one standard to The New York Times and another to the San Juan Star.

With respect to the audience, the newly construed regulations plainly discriminate in terms of the intended listener or reader. Casino advertising must be "addressed to tourists." It must not "invite the residents of Puerto Rico to visit the casino." The regulation thus poses what might be viewed as a reverse Privileges and Immunities problem: Puerto Rico's residents are singled out for disfavored treatment in comparison to all other Americans. But nothing so fancy is required to recognize the obvious First Amendment problem in this kind of audience discrimination. I cannot imagine that this Court would uphold an Illinois regulation that forbade advertising "addressed" to Illinois residents while allowing the same advertiser to communicate his message to visitors and commuters; we should be no more willing to uphold a Puerto Rico regulation that forbids advertising "addressed" to Puerto Rico residents.

With respect to the message, the regulations now take one word of the English language—"casino"—and give it a special opprobrium.

COMMENT

Justice Rehnquist reasoned that since a product could be totally banned, legislative prohibition of advertising of that product—being "a lesser power"—is necessarily permissible. Justice Brennan was not alone in his rejection of this reasoning. Professor Laurence Tribe observed that government has much less latitude to regulate the "marketplace of ideas—even ideas parlayed for profit" than it does to regulate "the marketplace of commerce." Professor Tribe concluded:

> [I]n the wake of the Central Hudson dictum that government may seek to discourage even truthful promotion for profit of a lawful product or service and the Posada holding that it may do so on an audience-specific basis, the Court's commercial speech doctrine seems poised on a makeshift—and unsteady foundation for the future. See Tribe, American Constitutional Law (2d Ed. 1988), 903–904.

Is the idea in Posadas that government may regulate speech on an audience-specific basis consistent with the Court's post-Posadas decision in Shapero v. Kentucky Bar Association? In Shapero, Justice O'Connor dissented on the ground that the Court had departed from Central Hudson and instead, incorrectly, used the approach set forth in Bates. Perhaps, however, Bates is the approach that should be adopted and Central Hudson the approach that should be abandoned.

As you consider the Court's commercial speech decisions from Valentine through Virginia Pharmacy to Central Hudson and Posadas, try to describe the present First Amendment status of commercial speech. Perhaps the difference is that after Virginia Pharmacy a whole category of commercial advertising—the prices of prescription drugs—may not be banned. Does Posadas change this? Arguably, it is distinguishable since Posadas involves a selective rather than a total ban.

Does Posadas authorize bans on commercial advertising? Arguably, Posadas might authorize a state ban on cigarette advertising. But it would not be authority for a congressionally imposed nationwide ban. However, even such a distinction may be vulnerable since the ban on casino gambling advertising in Puerto Rico was audience-specific: it applied to the local citizens; it was not total, i.e., tourists were exempted.

Compelled Speech

In Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, 431 U.S. 209 (1977), in an opinion by Justice Stewart, the Court cautioned that the state in a regime ordered by the First Amendment could not require an individual to express or support an ideology he did not share. The Court was not altogether consistent in its holding in Abood. The Court first held that a law imposing service charges, equivalent to union dues, assessed against nonmembers of the union "to finance expenditures by the union for the purposes of collective bargaining, contract administration, and grievance adjustment" was valid. The Court summarized its position on this point as follows:

> To be required to help finance the union as a collective-bargaining agent may well be thought, therefore, to interfere in some way with an employee's freedom to associate for the advancement of ideas, or to refrain from doing so, as he sees fit. But the judgment * * * is that such interference as exists is constitutionally justified by the legislative assessment of the important contribution of the union shop to the system of labor relations established by Congress. * * *

In a separate concurrence, Justice Powell, joined by Chief Justice Burger and Justice Blackmun, disagreed with the Court on the foregoing point. See Buckley v. AFTRA, 496 F.2d 305 (2d Cir. 1974), cert. den. 419 U.S. 1093 (1975), text, p. 574.

However, the Court took a different view in the case of compulsory service charges which were to be used for political or ideological purposes not related to the union's role as a collective bargaining representative.

ABOOD v. DETROIT BOARD OF EDUCATION

431 U.S. 209, 97 S.CT. 1782, 52 L.ED.2D 261 (1977).

Justice STEWART delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * Our decisions establish with unmistakable clarity that the freedom of an individual to associate for the purpose of advancing beliefs and ideas is protected by the First and Fourteenth Amendments. Equally clear is the proposition that a government may not require an individual to relinquish rights guaranteed him by the First Amendment as a condition of public employment. The appellants argue that they fall within the protection of these cases because they have been prohibited not from actively associating, but rather from refusing to associate. They specifically argue that they may constitutionally prevent the Union's spending a part of their required service fees to contribute to the political candidates and to express political views unrelated to its duties as exclusive bargaining representative. We have concluded that this argument is a meritorious one.

One of the principles underlying the Court's decision in Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, was that contributing to an organization for the purpose of spreading a political message is protected by the First Amendment. Because "[m]aking a contribution * * * enables like-minded persons to pool their resources in furtherance of common political goals," the Court reasoned that limitations upon the freedom to contribute "implicate fundamental First Amendment interests."

The fact that the appellants are compelled to make, rather than prohibited from making, contributions for political purposes works no less an infringement of their constitutional rights. For at the heart of the First Amendment is the notion that an individual should be free to believe as he will, and that in a free society one's beliefs should be shaped by his mind and his conscience rather than coerced by the State. And the freedom of belief is no incidental or secondary aspect of the First Amendment's protections:

> If there is any fixed star in our constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty, can prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein." West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624.

These principles prohibit a State from compelling any individual to affirm his belief in God, Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488, or to associate with a political party, Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S. 1 at 363–364, n. 17, 95 S.Ct. at 2685, as a condition of retaining public employment. They are no less applicable to the case at bar, and they thus prohibit the appellees from requiring any of the appellants to contribute to the support of an ideological cause he may oppose as a condition of holding a job as a public school teacher.

We do not hold that a union cannot constitutionally spend funds for the expression of political views, on behalf of political candidates, or towards the advancement of other ideological causes not germane to its duties as collective bargaining representative. Rather, the Constitution requires only that such expenditures be financed from charges, dues, or assessments paid by employees who do not object to advancing those ideas and who are not coerced into doing so against their will by the threat of loss of governmental employment.

There will, of course, be difficult problems in drawing lines between collective bargaining activities, for which contributions may be compelled, and ideological activities unrelated to collective bargaining, for which such compulsion is prohibited.

WOOLEY v. MAYNARD

430 U.S. 705, 97 S.CT. 1428, 51 L.ED.2D 752 (1977).

[EDITORIAL NOTE In Wooley, the Court encountered the following fact pattern. A married couple, Jehovah's Witnesses, had covered up the state motto "Live Free or Die" on their New Hampshire automobile license plate. The couple had covered up the motto because it was contrary to their religious and moral beliefs. Could New Hampshire constitutionally enforce criminal sanctions against the couple for so doing? The Court held that New Hampshire could not.]

Chief Justice BURGER delivered the opinion of the Court.

We are thus faced with the question of whether the state may constitutionally require an individual to participate in the dessemination of an ideological message by displaying it on his private property in a manner and for the express purpose that it be observed and read by the public. We hold that the state may not do so.

We begin with the proposition that the right of freedom of thought protected by the First Amendment against state action includes both the right to speak freely and the right to refrain from speaking at all. See West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, (1943). A system which secures the right to proselytize religious, political, and ideological causes must also guarantee the concomitant right to decline to foster such concepts. The right to speak and the right to refrain from speaking are complementary components of the broader concept of "individual freedom of mind."

This is illustrated by the recent case of Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo. * * *

Here, as in Barnette, we are faced with a state measure which forces an individual, as part of his daily life—indeed constantly while his automobile is in public view—to be an instrument for fostering public adherence to an ideological point of view he finds unacceptable. In doing so, the state "invades the sphere of intellect and spirit which it is the purpose of the First Amendment to our Constitution to reserve from all official control."

New Hampshire's statute in effect requires that appellees use their private property as a "mobile billboard" for the state's ideological message—or suffer a penalty, as Maynard already has. As a condition to driving an automobile—a virtual necessity for most Americans—the Maynards must display "Live Free or Die" to hundreds of people each day. The fact that most individuals agree with the thrust of New Hampshire's motto is not the test; most Americans also find the flag salute acceptable. The First Amendment protects the right of individuals to hold a point of view different from the majority and to refuse to foster, in the way New Hampshire commands, an idea they find morally objectionable.

Identifying the Maynards' interests as implicating First Amendment protections does not end our inquiry however. We must also determine whether the state's countervailing interest is sufficiently compelling to justify requiring appellees to display the state motto on their license plates. The two interests advanced by the state are that display of the motto (1) facilitates the identification of passenger vehicles, and (2) promotes appreciation of history, individualism and state pride.

The state first points out that only passenger vehicles, but not commercial, trailer, or other vehicles are required to display the state motto. Thus, the argument proceeds, officers of the law are more easily able to determine whether passenger vehicles are carrying the proper plates. However the record here reveals that New Hampshire passenger license plates normally consist of a specific configuration of letters and numbers, which makes them readily distinguishable from other types of plates, even without reference to state motto. Even were we to credit the state's reasons and "even though the governmental purpose be legitimate and substantial, that purpose cannot be pursued by means that broadly stifle fundamental personal liberties when the end can be more narrowly achieved. The breadth of legislative abridgment must be viewed in the light of less drastic means for achieving the same basic purpose." Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479 (1960).

The state's second claimed interest is not ideologically neutral. The state is seeking to communicate to others an official view as to proper "appreciation of history, state price, [and] individualism." Of course, the state may legitimately pursue such interests in any number of ways. However, where the state's interest is to disseminate an ideology, no matter how acceptable to some, such interest cannot outweigh an individual's First Amendment right to avoid becoming the courier for such message.

We conclude that the State of New Hampshire may not require appellees to display the state motto upon their vehicle license plates, and accordingly, we affirm the judgment of the district court.

Affirmed.

COMMENT

Wooley sets forth an important principle—the right to refrain from speaking or the right not to be compelled to speak. This freedom from compelled speech derives from an assumption the Court makes about the impact of the First Amendment on government. An aspect of that impact is that the state cannot require its citizens to advertise against their will an official view of things. Where ideology is concerned, must the state be neutral?

Does the fact that government may not restrict freedom of belief mean that government cannot add its views to that of others? The view expressed in Wooley v. Maynard appeared to suggest that the state must be ideologically neutral.

In Wooley v. Maynard, the Court found in the First Amendment a source of protection for individuals compelled to speak by the state. In Abood, the Court found in the First Amendment a source of protection for individuals compelled unwillingly to make political contributions. The two cases may be seen as aspects of an important objective of First Amendment protection—freedom of belief.

PRUNEYARD SHOPPING CENTER v. ROBINS

447 U.S. 74, 100 S.CT. 2035, 64 L.ED.2D 741 (1980).

Justice REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

We postponed jurisdiction of this appeal from the Supreme Court of California to decide the important federal constitutional questions it presented. Those are whether state constitutional provisions, which permit individuals to exercise free speech and petition rights on the property of a privately owned shopping center to which the public is invited, violate the shopping center owner's property rights under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments or his free speech rights under the First and Fourteenth Amendments.

Appellant PruneYard is a privately owned shopping center in the city of Campbell, Cal. It covers approximately 21 acres—five devoted to parking and 16 occupied by walkways, plazas, sidewalks, and buildings that contain more than 65 specialty shops, 10 restaurants, and a movie theater. The PruneYard is open to the public for the purpose of encouraging the patronizing of its commercial establishments. It has a policy not to permit any visitor or tenant to engage in any publicly expressive activity, including the circulation of petitions, that is not directly related to its commercial purposes. This policy has been strictly enforced in a nondiscriminatory fashion. The PruneYard is owned by appellant Fred Sahadi.

Appellees are high school students who sought to solicit support for their opposition to a United Nations resolution against "Zionism." On a Saturday afternoon they set up a card table in a corner of PruneYard's central courtyard. They distributed pamphlets and asked passersby to sign petitions, which were to be sent to the president and members of Congress. Their activity was peaceful and orderly and so far as the record indicates was not objected to by PruneYard's patrons.

Soon after appellees had begun soliciting signatures, a security guard informed them that they would have to leave because their activity violated PruneYard regulations. The guard suggested that they move to the public sidewalk at the PruneYard's perimeter. Appellees immediately left the premises and later filed this lawsuit in the California Superior Court of Santa Clara County. They sought to enjoin appellants from denying them access to the PruneYard for the purpose of circulating their petitions.

The Superior Court held that appellees were not entitled under either the Federal or California Constitution to exercise their asserted rights on the shopping center property. [See Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507 (1976).] * * * The California Court of Appeal affirmed.

The California Supreme Court reversed, holding that the California Constitution protects "speech and petitioning, reasonably exercised, in shopping centers even when the centers are privately owned." 23 Cal.3d 899, 910 (1979). It concluded that appellees are entitled to conduct their activity on PruneYard property. Before this Court, appellants contend that their "constitutionally established rights under the Fourteenth Amendment to exclude appellees from adverse use of appellants' property cannot be denied by invocation of a state constitutional provision or by judicial reconstruction of a state's law of private property."

Appellants first contend that Lloyd v. Tanner [407 U.S. 551 (1972)] prevents the state from requiring a private shopping center owner to provide access to persons exercising their state constitutional rights of free speech and petition when adequate alternative avenues of communication are available.

Our reasoning in Lloyd, however, does not ex proprio vigore limit the authority of the state to exercise its police power or its sovereign right to adopt in its own Constitution individual liberties more expansive than those conferred by the Federal Constitution. [Emphasis added.] In Lloyd, there was no state constitutional or statutory provision that had been construed to create rights to the use of private property by strangers, comparable to those found to exist by the California Supreme Court here. It is, of course, well-established that a state in the exercise of its police power may adopt reasonable restrictions on private property so long as the restrictions do not amount to a taking without just compensation or contravene any other federal constitutional provision.

Appellants next contend that a right to exclude others underlies the Fifth Amendment guarantee against the taking of property without just compensation and the Fourteenth Amendment guarantee against the deprivation of property without due process of law.

Here the requirement that appellants permit appellees to exercise state-protected rights of free expression and petition on shopping center property clearly does not amount to an unconstitutional infringement of appellants' property rights under the taking clause. There is nothing to suggest that preventing appellants from prohibiting this sort of activity will unreasonably impair the value or use of their property as a shopping center.

There is also little merit to appellants' argument that they have been denied their property without due process of law. Nebbia v. New York.

Appellants finally contend that a private property owner has a First Amendment right not to be forced by the state to use his property as a forum for the speech of others. They state that in Wooley v. Maynard this Court concluded that a state may not constitutionally require an individual to participate in the dissemination of an ideological message by displaying it on his private property in a manner and for the express purpose that it be observed and read by the public. This rationale applies here, they argue, because the message of Wooley is that the state may not force an individual to display any message at all.

Wooley, however, was a case in which the government itself prescribed the message, required it to be displayed openly on appellee's personal property that was used "as part of his daily life," and refused to permit him to take any measures to cover up the motto even though the Court found that the display of the motto served no important state interest. Here, by contrast, there are a number of distinguishing factors. More important, the shopping center by choice of its owner is not limited to the personal use of appellants. It is instead a business establishment that is open to the public to come and go as they please. The views expressed by members of the public in passing out pamphlets or seeking signatures for a petition thus will not likely be identified with those of the owner. Second, no specific message is dictated by the state to be displayed on appellants' property. There consequently is no danger of governmental discrimination for or against a particular message. Finally, as far as appears here appellants can expressly disavow any connection with the message by simply posting signs in the area where the speakers or handbillers stand. Such signs, for example, could disclaim any sponsorship of the message and could explain that the persons are communicating their own messages by virtue of state law.

Appellants also argue that their First Amendment rights have been infringed in light of West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943) and Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo [this text, p. 497]. Barnette is inapposite because it involved the compelled recitation of a message containing an affirmation of belief. * * * Appellants are not similarly being compelled to affirm their belief in any governmentally prescribed position or view, and they are free to publicly dissociate themselves from the views of the speakers or handbillers.

Tornillo * * * rests on the principle that the state cannot tell a newspaper what it must print. * * * There also was a danger in Tornillo that the statute would "dampen the vigor and limit the variety of public debate" by deterring editors from publishing controversial political statements that might trigger the application of the statute. Thus, the statute was found to be an "intrusion into the function of editors." These concerns obviously are not present here.

We conclude that neither appellants' federally recognized property rights nor their First Amendment rights have been infringed by the California Supreme Court's decision recognizing a right of appellees to exercise state protected rights of expression and petition on appellants' property. The judgment of the Supreme Court of California is therefore

The shopping center owner in PruneYard sought refuge in the principle of Wooley. The state could not require the Jehovah's Witnesses to use their private property to publicize the ideas of the state. In the Wooley case, New Hampshire had mandated that motorists carry the state motto on their license plates. In PruneYard, the message in question was not being ordered by the state. Moreover, unlike the private automobile in Wooley, the shopping center in PruneYard was not used by the owners alone.

By definition, the shopping center's very existence constituted an invitation to the public to come and do business. Messages that are publicized by a shopping center are not necessarily to be identified with the owners of the shopping center. First Amendment law as now interpreted by the Supreme Court does not require a shopping center owner to permit the dissemination of news to which he is opposed on his property. See Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507 (1976). Justice Marshall, joined by Justice Brennan, dissented in Hudgens. The emphasis on property rights by the majority in Hudgens arose "from an overly formalistic view of the relationship between the institution of private ownership of property and the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of expression."

In Wooley, protection of a right to be free from compelled speech protected the individual against the state. In PruneYard, was the First Amendment analysis equally consistent with maximizing individual self-expression? Protection of the individual property owner's right to be free from compelled speech in that context works to exclude other individuals seeking an audience for their ideas on premises which may be uniquely suitable for the exchange of ideas.

The rights of free speech and petition, if reasonably exercised, of the public who use privately owned shopping centers were also protected under the California state constitutional guarantee of freedom of expression. The California courts, therefore, did not grant absolute priority to the property owner's claim of self-expression as the Supreme Court has done in interpreting the First Amendment in similar circumstances. The PruneYard case illustrates that state and federal constitutional law may occasionally yield divergent results on free expression problems. PruneYard also illustrates that transposition of the principle of freedom from compelled speech to a corporate context involving modern patterns of land use may yield quite different results than flow from the less complex but classic conflict in Wooley between the state and the individual. It has also been suggested that PruneYard, consistent with the decentralist tendencies of the Burger Court, is rooted in federalism: a state court may, if it chooses, read its state constitution more expansively than the United States Supreme Court has read the federal Constitution.

Free Expression and Regulation of Corporate Speech: Can Government Equalize the Opinion Process?

In First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765 (1978), the Supreme Court invalidated a Massachusetts statute prohibiting corporations from attempting to influence the vote on referendum proposals on issues of public importance which materially affect the property, business, or assets of the corporation. The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court upheld the statute and accorded corporations seeking to influence elections on matters not directly concerning such corporations less than full First Amendment protection by validating the statute. The Supreme Court, however, reversed the Massachusetts court. See text, p. 8.

The case did not directly answer the question of whether the free speech rights of corporations are protected, but it did hold that speech should be protected without reference to the identity of the speaker. Since Bellotti involved the free expression rights of business corporations, the question of whether media corporations, i.e., the institutional press, could make a greater claim to First Amendment protection than ordinary business corporations also arose. Justice Stewart, it will be recalled, had advanced the idea in a 1974 lecture that the press clause of the First Amendment had accorded a special status to the institutional press. See text, p. 7.

Under this theory, it would be possible to argue that media corporations could make a claim for fuller First Amendment protection than could ordinary business corporations. Indeed, in Stewart's 1974 lecture he had observed: "If the free speech clause guarantee meant no more than freedom of expression, it would be a constitutional redundancy." Justice Powell, who wrote the opinion for the Court, agreed that the press had a special and constitutionally recognized role: "The press cases emphasize the special and constitutionally recognized role of that institution in informing and educating the public, offering criticism, and providing a forum for discussion and debate." But Powell was, nonetheless, not disposed to take a hierarchical view of the First Amendment:

> If the speakers here were not corporations, no one would suggest that the state could validate silence of their proposed speech. It is the type of speech indispensable to decision-making in a democracy, and this is no less true because the speech comes from a corporation rather than an individual. The inherent worth of the speech in terms of its capacity for informing the public does not depend upon the identity of its source, whether corporation, association, union or individual.

Although Chief Justice Burger agreed with both the opinion and the result reached by the Court in Bellotti, he wrote a separate concurring opinion in order to pose some questions which he thought likely to arise in the future. The issue he particularly wished to discuss was "whether the press clause confers upon the 'institutional press' any freedom from governmental restraint not enjoyed by others."

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF BOSTON v. BELLOTTI

* * *

A disquieting aspect of Massachusetts' position is that it may carry the risk of impinging on the First Amendment rights of those who employ the corporate form—as most do—to carry on the business of mass communications, particularly the large media conglomerates. This is so because of the difficulty, and perhaps impossibility, of distinguishing, either as a matter of fact or constitutional law, media corporations from corporations such as the appellants in this case.

Making traditional use of the corporate form, some media enterprises have amassed vast wealth and power and conduct many activities, some directly related—and some not—to their publishing and broadcasting activities. See Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo. Today, a corporation might own the dominant newspaper in one or more large metropolitan centers, television and radio stations in those same centers and others, a newspaper chain, news magazines with nationwide circulation, national or worldwide wire news services, and substantial interests in book publishing and distribution enterprises. Corporate ownership may extend, vertically, to pulp mills and pulp timber lands to insure an adequate, continuing supply of newsprint and to trucking and steamship lines for the purposes of transporting the newsprint to the presses. Such activities would be logical economic auxiliaries to a publishing conglomerate. Ownership also may extend beyond to business activities unrelated to the task of publishing newspapers and magazines or broadcasting radio and television programs. Obviously, such far-reaching ownership would not be possible without the state-provided corporate form and its "special rules relating to such matters as limited liability, perpetual life, and the accumulation, distribution, and taxation of assets. * * * "

In terms of "unfair advantage in the political process" and "corporate domination of the electoral process," it could be argued that such media conglomerates as I describe pose a much more realistic threat to valid interests than do appellants and similar entities not regularly concerned with shaping popular opinion on public issues. See Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo. In Tornillo, for example, we noted the serious contentions advanced that a result of the growth of modern media empires "has been to place in a few hands the power to inform the American people and shape public opinion."

In terms of Massachusetts' other concern, the interests of minority shareholders, I perceive no basis for saying that the managers and directors of the media conglomerates are more or less sensitive to the views and desires of minority shareholders than are corporate officers generally.[1] Nor can it be said, even if relevant to First Amendment analysis—which it is not—that the former are more virtuous, wise or restrained in the exercise of corporate power than are the latter. Cf. Columbia Broadcasting System v. Democratic National Committee, 14 The Writings of Thomas Jefferson 46 (A. Libscomb ed. 1904) (letter to Walter Jones, Jan. 2, 1814). Thus, no factual distinction has been identified as yet that would justify government restraints on the right of appellants to express their views without, at the same time, opening the door to similar restraints on media conglomerates with their vastly greater influence.

Despite these factual similarities between media and nonmedia corporations, those who view the press clause as somehow conferring special and extraordinary privileges or status on the "institutional press"—which are not extended to those who wish to express ideas other than by publishing a newspaper—might perceive no danger to institutional media corporations flowing from the position asserted by Massachusetts. Under this narrow reading of the press clause, government could perhaps impose on nonmedia corporations restrictions not permissible with respect to "media" enterprises. Cf. Bezanson, The New Free Press Guarantee, 63 Va.L.Rev. 731, 767–770 (1977).[2] The Court has not yet squarely resolved

1. It may be that a nonmedia corporation, because of its nature, is subject to more limitations on political expression than a media corporation whose very existence is aimed at political expression. For example, the charter of a nonmedia corporation may be so framed as to tender such activity or expression ultra vires; or its shareholders may be much less inclined to permit expenditure for corporate speech. Moreover, a nonmedia corporation may find it more difficult to characterize its expenditures as ordinary and necessary business expenses for tax purposes.

2. It is open to question whether limitations can be placed on the free expression rights of some without undermining the guarantees of all. Experience with statutory limitations on campaign expenditures on behalf of candidates or parties may shed some light on this issue. Cf. Buckley v. Valeo.

whether the press clause confers upon the "institutional press" any freedom from government restraint not enjoyed by all others.[3]

I perceive two fundamental difficulties with a narrow reading of the press clause. First, although certainty on this point is not possible, the history of the clause does not suggest that the authors contemplated a "special" or "institutional" privilege. See Lange, the Speech and Press Clauses, 23 U.C.L.A. L. Rev. 77, 88–99 (1975). The common 18th century understanding of freedom of the press is suggested by Andrew Bradford, a colonial American newspaperman. In defining the nature of the liberty he did not limit it to a particular group:

> "But, by the Freedom of the Press, I mean a Liberty, within the Bounds of Law, for any Man to communicate to the Public, his sentiments on the Important Points of Religion and Government; of proposing any Laws, which he apprehends may be for the Good of his Country, and of applying for the Repeal of such, as he Judges pernicious. * * *
> "This is the Liberty of the Press, the great Palladium of all our other Liberties, which I hope the good People of this Province, will forever enjoy. * * * " A. Bradford, Sentiments on the Liberty of the Press, in L. Levy, Freedom of the Press from Zenger to Jefferson 41–42 (1966) [emphasis deleted] [first published in Bradford's The American Weekly Mercury, a Philadelphia newspaper, April 25, 1734].

Indeed most pre-First Amendment commentators "who employed the term 'freedom of speech' with great frequency, used it synonymously with freedom of the press." L. Levy, Legacy of Suppression: Freedom of Speech and Press in Early American History 174 (1963).

Those interpreting the press clause as extending protection only to, or creating a special role for, the "institutional press" must either (a) assert such an intention on the part of the Framers for which no supporting evidence is available, cf. Lange, supra, at 89–91; (b) argue that events after 1791 somehow operated to "constitutionalize" this interpretation, see Benzanson, The New Free Press Guarantee, 63 Va.L.Rev. 731, 788 (1977); or (c) candidly acknowledging the absence of historical support, suggest that the intent of the Framers is not important today. See Nimmer, Is Freedom of the Press a Redundancy: What Does It Add To Freedom of Speech?, 26 Hastings L.J. 639, 640–641 (1975).

To conclude that the Framers did not intend to limit the freedom of the press to one select group is not necessarily to suggest that the Press Clause is redundant. The speech clause standing alone may be viewed as a protection of the liberty to express ideas and beliefs,[4] while the press clause focuses specifically on the liberty to disseminate expression broadly and "comprehends every sort of publication which affords a vehicle of information and opinion." Lovell v. Griffin.[5] Yet there is no fundamental distinction between expression and dissemination. The liberty encompassed by the press clause, although complementary to and a natural extension of Speech Clause liberty, merited special mention simply because it had been more often the object of official restraints. Soon after the invention of the printing press, English and continental monarchs, fearful of the power implicit in its use and the threat to establishment thought and order—political and religious—devised restraints, such as licensing, censors, indices of prohibited books, and prosecutions

3. Language in some cases perhaps may be read as assuming or suggesting no independent scope to the Press Clause, see Pell v. Procunier, or the contrary, see Bigelow v. Virginia. The Court, however, has not yet focused on the issue. See Lange, The Speech and Press Clauses, 23 U.C.L.A.L.Rev. 77 (1975); Nimmer, Is Freedom of the Press a Redundancy: What Does It Add to Freedom of Speech?, 26 Hastings L.J. 639 (1975); cf. Bezanson, The New Free Press Guarantee, 63 Va.L.Rev. 731 (1977).

4. The simplest explanation of the speech and press clauses might be that the former protects oral communications; the latter, written. But the historical evidence does not strongly support this explanation. The first draft of what became the free expression provisions of the First Amendment, one proposed by Madison on May 5, 1789, as an addition to Art. 1, § 9, read:

> The people shall not be deprived or abridged of their right to speak, to write, or to publish their sentiments; and the freedom of the press, as one of the great bulwarks of liberty, shall be inviolable." 1 Annals of Cong. 451 (1789) (published as 1 Debates of Congress).

The language was changed to its current form, "freedom of speech, or of the press," by the Committee of Eleven to which Madison's amendments were referred. [There is no explanation for the change and the language was not altered thereafter.] It seems likely that the Committee shortened Madison's language preceding the semi-colon in his draft to "freedom of speech" without intending to diminish the scope of protection contemplated by Madison's phrase; in short, it was a stylistic change.

Cf. Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U.S. 168, 26 L.Ed. 377 (1881); Doe v. McMillan, 412 U.S. 306, 93 S.Ct. 2018, 36 L.Ed.2d 912 (1973) [Speech or Debate Clause extends to both spoken and written expressions within the legislative function].

5. It is not strange that "press," the word for what was then the sole means of broad dissemination of ideas and news, would be used to describe the freedom to communicate with a large, unseen audience.

Changes wrought by 20th century technology, of course, have rendered the printing press as it existed in 1791 as obsolete as Watt's copying or letter press. It is the core meaning of "press" as used in the constitutional text which must govern.

for seditious libel, which generally were unknown in the pre-printing press era. Official restrictions were the official response to the new, disquieting idea that this invention would provide a means for mass communication.

The second fundamental difficulty with interpreting the press clause as conferring special status on a limited group is one of definition. See Lange, supra. The very task of including some entities within the "institutional press" while excluding others, whether undertaken by legislature, court or administrative agency, is reminiscent of the abhorred licensing system of Tudor and Stuart England—a system the First Amendment was intended to ban from this country. Lovell v. Griffin. Further, the officials undertaking that task would be required to distinguish the protected from the unprotected on the basis of such variables as content of expression, frequency or fervor of expression, or ownership of the technological means of dissemination. Yet nothing in this Court's opinions supports such a confining approach to the scope of press clause protection.[6] Indeed, the Court has plainly intimated the contrary view:

> "Freedom of the press is a 'fundamental personal right' which 'is not confined to newspapers and periodicals. It necessarily embraces pamphlets and leaflets. * * * The press in its historic connotation comprehends every sort of publication which affords a vehicle of information and opinion.' * * * The information function asserted by representatives of the organized press * * * is also performed by lecturers, political pollsters, novelists, academic researchers, and dramatists. Almost any author may quite accurately assert that he is contributing to the flow of information to the public. * * *" Branzburg v. Hayes, quoting Lovell v. Griffin.

The meaning of the press clause, as a provision separate and apart from the speech clause, is implicated only indirectly by this case. Yet Massachusetts' position poses serious questions. The evolution of traditional newspapers into modern corporate conglomerates in which the daily dissemination of news by print is no longer the major part of the whole enterprise suggests the need for caution in limiting the First Amendment rights of corporations as such. Thus, the tentative probings of this brief inquiry are wholly consistent, I think, with the Court's refusal to sustain § 8's serious and potentially dangerous restriction on the freedom of political speech.

Because the First Amendment was meant to guarantee freedom to express and communicate ideas, I can see no difference between the right of those who seek to disseminate ideas by way of a newspaper and those who give lectures or speeches and seek to enlarge the audience by publication and wide dissemination. "[T]he purpose of the Constitution was not to erect the press into a privileged institution but to protect all persons in their right to print what they will as well as to utter it. '* * * [T]he liberty of the press is no greater and no less * * *' than the liberty of every citizen of the Republic." Pennekamp v. Florida (Frankfurter, J., concurring).

In short, the First Amendment does not "belong" to any definable category of persons or entities: it belongs to all who exercise its freedoms.

COMMENT

Did Bellotti really deal with whether corporate speech merits full First Amendment protection? That issue really was not considered. Powell, instead, said the issue was whether the corporate identity of the speech should affect its status under the First Amendment. What is Powell's attitude toward inequality in communicating power? From a First Amendment perspective, in Powell's view, all speakers have an equal claim to liberty of expression. In 1975, Professor Karst wrote: " 'Equality of status in the field of ideas' is not merely a first amendment value; it is the heart of the amendment." See Karst, Equality as a Central Principle in the First Amendment, 43 U.Chi.L.Rev. 20 at 43 (1975).

A Special Status For the Press?

In footnote 4 of his concurring opinion, Chief Justice Burger provides the historical background for his argument that the Framers, by making specific references to freedom of speech and press, did not intend to give a uniquely privileged constitutional status to the press. On the other hand, the Chief Justice agreed that the explicit mention of freedom of speech followed by the explicit mention of freedom of the press has some significance. The press clause is not redundant. Burger described the matter as follows:

"To conclude that the Framers did not intend to limit the freedom of the press to one select group is not necessarily to suggest that the Press Clause is redundant." The fact that the press clause does not create a special First Amendment caste does not mean that the press clause, like the speech clause, cannot have separate purposes. The speech clause protects the freedom to express ideas, and the press clause protects the freedom to disseminate those ideas.

Burger wanted general business corporations to have First Amendment protection equivalent to that which would be accorded to media corporations alone under a "special status" theory. Was his purpose to provide a countervailing force to media power in the opinion process by arming business corporations with equivalent First Amendment protection?

CONSOLIDATED EDISON CO. v. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION

447 U.S. 530, 100 S.CT. 2326, 65 L.ED.2D 319 (1980).

Justice POWELL delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question in this case is whether the First Amendment, as incorporated by the Fourteenth Amendment, is violated by an order of the Public Service Commission of the State of New York that prohibits the inclusion in monthly electric bills of inserts discussing controversial issues of public policy.

The Consolidated Edison Company of New York, appellant in this case, placed written material entitled "Independence Is Still a Goal, and Nuclear Power Is Needed To Win The Battle" in its January 1976 billing envelope. The bill insert stated Consolidated Edison's views on "the benefits of nuclear power," saying that they "far outweigh any potential risk" and that nuclear power plants are safe, economical, and clean. The utility also contended that increased use of nuclear energy would further this country's independence from foreign energy sources.

In March 1976, the Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc. (NRDC) requested Consolidated Edison to enclose a rebuttal prepared by NRDC in its next billing envelope. When Consolidated Edison refused, NRDC asked the Public Service Commission of the State of New York to open Consolidated Edison's billing envelopes to contrasting views on controversial issues of public importance.

On February 17, 1977, the commission, appellee here, denied NRDC's request but prohibited "utilities from using bill inserts to discuss political matters, including the desirability of future development of nuclear power." The commission explained its decision in a Statement of Policy on Advertising and Promotion Practices of Public Utilities issued on February 25, 1977. The commission concluded that Consolidated Edison customers who receive bills containing inserts are a captive audience of diverse views who should not be subjected to the utility's beliefs. Accordingly, the commission barred utility companies from including bill inserts that express "their opinions or viewpoints on controversial issues of public policy." The commission did not, however, bar utilities from sending bill inserts discussing topics that are not "controversial issues of public policy." The commission later denied petitions for rehearing filed by Consolidated Edison and other utilities.

The [New York] Court of Appeals held that the order did not violate the Constitution because it was a valid time, place, and manner regulation designed to protect the privacy of Consolidated Edison's customers. We noted probable jurisdiction. We reverse. The restriction on bill inserts cannot be upheld on the ground that Consolidated Edison is not entitled to freedom of speech. In First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti we rejected the contention that a state may confine corporate speech to specified issues.

In the mailing that triggered the regulation at issue, Consolidated Edison advocated the use of nuclear power. The commission has limited the means by which Consolidated Edison may participate in the public debate on this question and other controversial issues of national interest and importance. Thus, the commission's prohibition of discussion of controversial issues strikes at the heart of the freedom to speak.

The commission's ban on bill inserts is not, of course, invalid merely because it imposes a limitation upon speech. We must consider whether the state can demonstrate that its regulation is constitutionally permissible. The commission's arguments require us to consider three theories that might justify the state action. We must determine whether the prohibition is (i) a reasonable time, place, or manner restriction, (ii) a permissible subject-matter regulation, or (iii) a narrowly tailored means of serving a compelling state interest.

A restriction that regulates only the time, place or manner of speech may impose so long as it's reasonable. But when regulation is based on the content of speech, governmental action must be scrutinized more carefully to ensure that communication has not been prohibited "merely because public officials disapprove the speaker's views." As a consequence, we have emphasized that time, place, and manner regulations must be "applicable to all speech regardless of content."

The commission does not pretend that its action is unrelated to the content or subject matter of bill inserts. Indeed, it has undertaken to suppress certain bill inserts precisely because they address issues of public policy. The commission allows inserts that present information to consumers on certain subjects, such as energy conservation measures, but it forbids the use of inserts that discuss public controversies. The commission, with commendable candor, justifies its ban on the ground that consumers will benefit from receiving "useful" information, but not from the prohibited information. The commission's own rationale demonstrates that its action cannot be upheld as a content-neutral time, place, or manner regulation.

The commission next argues that its order is acceptable because it applies to all discussion of nuclear power, whether pro or con, in bill inserts. The prohibition, the commission contends, is related to subject matter rather than to the views of a particular speaker. Because the regulation does not favor either side of a political controversy, the commission asserts that it does not unconstitutionally suppress freedom of speech.

The First Amendment's hostility to content-based regulation extends not only to restrictions on particular viewpoints, but also to prohibition of public discussion of an entire topic. To allow a government the choice of permissible subjects for public debate would be to allow that government control over the search for political truth.

Nevertheless, governmental regulation based on subject matter has been approved in narrow circumstances. The court below relied upon two cases in which this Court has recognized that the government may bar from its facilities certain speech that would disrupt the legitimate governmental purpose for which the property has been dedicated. In Greer v. Spock [p. 54], we held that the Federal Government could prohibit partisan political speech on a military base even though civilian speakers had been allowed to lecture on other subjects. In Lehman v. Shaker Heights [p. 53], a plurality of the Court similarly concluded that a city transit system that rented space in its vehicle for commercial advertising did not have to accept partisan political advertising.

Greer and Lehman properly are viewed as narrow exceptions to the general prohibition against subject-matter distinctions. In both cases, the Court was asked to decide whether a public facility was open to all speakers. The plurality in Lehman and the Court in Greer concluded that partisan political speech would disrupt the operation of governmental facilities even though other forms of speech posed no such danger.

The analysis of Greer and Lehman is not applicable to the Commission's regulation of bill inserts. In both cases, a private party asserted a right of access to public facilities. Consolidated Edison has not asked to use the offices of the commission as a forum from which to promulgate its views. Rather, it seeks merely to utilize its own billing envelopes to promulgate its views on controversial issues of public policy. The commission asserts that the billing envelope, as a necessary adjunct to the operations of a public utility, is subject to the state's plenary control. To be sure, the state has a legitimate regulatory interest in controlling Consolidated Edison's activities, just as local governments always have been able to use their police powers in the public interest to regulate private behavior. But the commission's attempt to restrict the free expression of a private party cannot be upheld by reliance upon precedent that rests on the special interests of a government in overseeing the use of its property.

Where a government restricts the speech of a private person, the state action may be sustained only if the government can show that the regulation is a precisely drawn means of serving a compelling state interest. The commission argues finally that its prohibition is necessary (1) to avoid forcing Consolidated Edison's views on a captive audience, (2) to allocate limited resources in the public interest, and (3) to ensure that rate-payers do not subsidize the cost of the bill inserts.

Even if a short exposure to Consolidated Edison's views may offend the sensibilities of some consumers, the ability of government "to shut off discourse solely to protect others from hearing it [is] dependent upon a showing that substantial privacy interests are being invaded in an essentially intolerable manner. Where a single speaker communicates to many listeners, the First Amendment does not permit the government to prohibit speech as intrusive unless the "captive" audience cannot avoid objectionable speech.

But customers who encounter an objectionable billing insert may "effectively avoid further bombardment of their sensibilities simply by averting their eyes." The customer of Consolidated Edison may escape exposure to objectionable material simply by transferring the bill insert from envelope to wastebasket.

The commission contends that because a billing envelope can accommodate only a limited amount of information, political messages should not be allowed to take the place of inserts that promote energy conservation or safety, or that remind customers of their legal rights. The commission relies upon Red Lion Broadcasting v. Federal Communications Commission [p. 795], in which the Court held that the regulation of radio and television broadcast frequencies permit the Federal Government to exercise unusual authority over speech. But billing envelopes differ from broadcast frequencies in two ways. First, a broadcaster communicates through use of a scarce, publicly owned resource. No person can broadcast without a license, whereas all persons are free to send correspondence to private homes through the mails. Thus, it cannot be said that billing envelopes are a limited resource comparable to the broadcast spectrum. Second, the commission has not shown on the record before us that the presence of the bill inserts at issue would preclude the inclusion of other inserts that Consolidated Edison might be ordered lawfully to include in the billing envelope. Unlike radio or television stations broadcasting on a single frequency, multiple bill inserts will not result in a "cacophony of competing voices."

Finally, the commission urges that its prohibition would prevent ratepayers from subsidizing the costs of policy-oriented bill inserts. But the commission did not base its order on an inability to allocate costs between the shareholders of Consolidated Edison and the ratepayers. Rather, the commission stated "that using bill inserts to proclaim a utility's viewpoint on controversial issues (even when the stockholder pays for it in full) is tantamount to taking advantage of a captive audience." Accordingly, there is no basis on this record to assume that the commission could not exclude the cost of these bill inserts from the utility's rate base. Mere speculation of harm does not constitute a compelling state interest.

Justice STEVENS, concurring in the judgment.

Any student of history who has been reprimanded for talking about the World Series during a class discussion of the First Amendment knows that it is incorrect to state that a "time, place, or manner restriction may not be based upon either the content or subject matter of speech." And every lawyer who has read our rules, or our cases upholding various restrictions on speech with specific reference to subject matter must recognize the hyperbole in the dictum, "But, above all else, the First Amendment means that government has no power to restrict expression because of its message, its ideas, its subject matter or its content." Indeed, if that were the law, there would be no need for the Court's detailed rejection of the justifications put forward by the state for the restriction involved in this case.

There are, in fact, many situations in which the subject matter, or, indeed, even the point of view of the speaker, may provide a justification for a time, place and manner regulation. Perhaps the most obvious example is the regulation of oral argument in this Court; the appellant's lawyer precedes his adversary solely because he seeks reversal of a judgment. As is true of many other aspects of liberty, some forms of orderly regulation actually promote freedom more than would a state of total anarchy.

The only justification for the regulation relied on by the New York Court of Appeals is that the utilities' bill inserts may be "offensive" to some of their customers. But a communication may be offensive in two different ways. Independently of the message the speaker intends to convey, the form of his communication may be offensive—perhaps because it is too loud or too ugly in a particular setting. Other speeches, even though elegantly phrased in dulcet tones, are offensive simply because the listener disagrees with the speaker's message. The fact that the offensive form of some communication may subject it to appropriate regulation surely does not support the conclusion that the offensive character of an idea can justify an attempt to censor its expression. Since the Public Service Commission has candidly put forward this impermissible justification for its censorial regulation, it plainly violates the First Amendment.

Accordingly, I concur in the judgment of the Court.

Justice BLACKMUN, with whom Justice Rehnquist [in part] joins, dissenting.

I cannot agree with the Court that the New York Public Service Commission's ban on the utility bill insert somehow deprives the utility of its First and Fourteenth Amendment rights. Because of Consolidated Edison's monopoly status and its rate structure, the use of the insert amounts to an exaction from the utility's customers by way of forced aid for the utility's speech. And, contrary to the Court's suggestion, an allocation of the insert's cost between the utility's shareholders and the ratepayers would not eliminate this coerced subsidy.

[Justice Rehnquist did not join in the following portion of the dissent.]

I might observe, additionally, that I am hopeful that the Court's decision in this case has not completely tied a state's hands in preventing this type of abuse of monopoly power. The Court's opinion appears to turn on the particular facts of this case, and slight differences in approach might permit a state to achieve its proper goals.

First, it appears that New York and other States might use their power to define property rights so that the billing envelope is the property of the ratepayers and not of the utility's shareholders. If, under state law, the envelope belongs to the customers, I do not see how restricting the utility from using it could possibly be held to deprive the utility of its rights.

Second, the opinion leaves open the issue of cost allocation. The commission could charge the utility's shareholders all the costs of the envelopes and postage and of creating and maintaining the mailing list, and charge the consumers only the cost of printing and inserting the bill and the consumer service insert. Such an allocation would eliminate the most offensive aspects of the forced subsidization of the utility's speech.

Because I agree with the Appellate Division of the New York Supreme Court, that "[i]n the battle of ideas, the utilities are not entitled to require the consumers to help defray their expenses," I respectfully dissent.

COMMENT

Suppose the Public Utilities Commission had ordered Consolidated Edison to include a rebuttal prepared by an antinuclear energy group in its future billing envelopes. Suppose Consolidated Edison had challenged such an order on First Amendment grounds. Would the order be valid?

Professor Emerson has argued in favor of the validity, in the context of Consolidated Edison, of such an order. See Emerson, The Affirmative Side of the First Amendment, 15 Georgia L.Rev. 795 at 827–828 (1981):

> The Court did not have before it, and hence did not decide, the latent affirmative promotion issue involved in the case. * * *
> There is much to be said for the proposition that the first amendment rights of the third parties should be given recognition here. As a result of the monopoly granted by the government, the utility possessed a unique facility for communication, namely, a ready-made audience that was forced to open the billing envelope when it arrived in the home or office. Access to that facility, in a manner compatible with the primary function served by the billing apparatus, plainly would advance the discussion of important issues. Granting access to all comers might not be compatible with effective operation of the billing process. But imposition of a fairness doctrine, under which the utility was required to make adequate provision for the presentation of opposing views, surely would be feasible. The use of the first amendment in such a manner would promote significantly the system of freedom of expression.

Should the inclusion of inserts in its bills by Consolidated Edison be viewed as a form of impermissible compelled speech on the part of Con Ed's customers? See Wooley v. Maynard, text, p. 151. Justices Blackmun and Rehnquist make a similar argument: "Because of Consolidated Edison's monopoly status and its rate structure, the use of the insert amounts to an exaction from the utility's customers by way of forced aid for the utility's speech." Justice Powell makes it clear in Consolidated Edison that Bellotti protects Consolidated Edison's right to speak: "* * * [A] state may confine corporate speech to specified issues." On the other hand, if Consolidated Edison is not allowed to speak, i.e., include inserts on policy issues in its billing envelope, this, too, would be a form of impermissible compulsion, i.e., enforced silence. In the Consolidated Edison situation, therefore, free speech rights are in conflict. To assure the free speech of the corporate speaker, Consolidated Edison, is to compel the speech of some of its thousands of customers who have a desire to communicate a different message in the same forum. Suppose the billing envelope is made, as Blackmun suggests, the property of the rate payers and not of the utilities shareholders, how would that affect the compelled speech problem? Would such a device make the inclusion of policy issue inserts in the billing envelope dependent on the consent of the utility's rate payers?

Suppose the activities of Con Ed had been deemed so involved with governmental sponsorship as to be deemed the equivalent of government action? Would the case for rebuttal inserts by antinuclear energy citizen groups have been stronger if the action of Con Ed were seen as governmental or state action?

PACIFIC GAS & ELECTRIC CO. v. PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA

475 U.S. 1, 106 S.CT. 903, 89 L.ED.2D 1 (1986).

Justice POWELL announced the opinion of the Court in which the Chief Justice, Justice Brennan, and Justice O'Connor joined.

The question in this case is whether the California Public Utilities Commission may require a privately owned utility company to include in its billing envelopes speech of a third party with which the utility disagrees.

* * * Pacific Gas and Electric Company has distributed a newsletter in its monthly billing envelope. Appellant's newsletter [is] called Progress. It has included political editorials, feature stories on matters of public interest, tips on energy conservation, and straightforward information about utility services and bills.

In 1980, appellee Toward Utility Rate Normalization (TURN), an intervenor in a ratemaking proceeding before California's Public Utilities Commission, urged the Commission to forbid appellant to use the billing envelopes to distribute political editorials, on the ground that the appellant's customers should not bear the expense of appellant's own political speech. The Commission decided that the envelope space that appellant had used to disseminate Progress is the property of the ratepayers. This "extra space" was defined as "the space remaining in the billing envelope, after inclusion of the monthly bill and any required legal notices, for inclusion of other materials up to such total envelope weight as would not result in any additional postage cost."

In an effort to apportion this "extra space" between appellant and its customers, the Commission permitted TURN to use the "extra space" four times a year for the next two years. During these months, appellant may use any space not used by TURN and it may include additional materials if it pays any extra postage. The Commission found that TURN has represented the interests of "a significant group" of appellant's residential customers, and has aided the Commission in performing its regulatory function. Consequently, the Commission determined that ratepayers would benefit from permitting TURN to use the extra space in the billing envelopes to raise funds and to communicate with ratepayers: "Our goal * * * is to change the present system to one which uses the extra space more efficiently for the ratepayers' benefit. It is reasonable to assume that the ratepayers will benefit more from exposure to a variety of views than they will from only that of PG & E." The Commission concluded that appellant could have no interest in excluding TURN's message from the billing envelope since appellant does not own the space that message would fill. The Commission placed no limitations on what TURN or appellant could say in the envelope, except that TURN is required to state that its messages are not those of appellant. The Commission reserved the right to grant other groups access to the envelopes in the future.

Appellant appealed the Commission's order to the California Supreme Court, arguing that it has a First Amendment right not to help spread a message with which it disagrees, see Wooley v. Maynard, and that the Commission's order infringes that right. The California Supreme Court denied discretionary review. We noted probable jurisdiction and now reverse.

The constitutional guarantee of free speech "serves significant societal interests" wholly apart from the speaker's interest in self-expression. First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti. The identity of the speaker is not decisive in determining whether speech is protected. Corporations and other associations, like individuals, contribute to the "discussion, debate, and the dissemination of information and ideas" that the First Amendment seeks to foster. [Ibid.] Thus, in Bellotti, we invalidated a state prohibition aimed at speech by corporations that sought to influence the outcome of a state referendum. Similarly, in Consolidated Edison Co. v. Public Service Comm'n of N.Y., we invalidated a state order prohibiting a privately owned utility company from discussing controversial political issues in its billing envelopes. In both cases, the critical considerations were that the State sought to abridge speech that the First Amendment is designed to protect, and that such prohibitions limited the range of information and ideas to which the public is exposed.

There is no doubt that under these principles appellant's newsletter Progress receives the full protection of the First Amendment. In appearance no different from a small newspaper, Progress' contents range from energy-saving tips to stories about wildlife conservation, and from billing information to recipes. Progress thus extends well beyond speech that proposes a business transaction, see Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel, and includes the kind of discussion of "matters of public concern" that the First Amendment both fully protects and implicitly encourages. Thornhill v. Alabama.

The Commission recognized as much, but concluded that requiring appellant to disseminate TURN's views did not infringe upon First Amendment rights. It reasoned that appellant remains free to mail its own newsletter except for the four months in which TURN is given access. The Commission's conclusion necessarily rests on one of two premises: (i) compelling appellant to grant TURN access to a hitherto private forum does not infringe appellant's right to speak; or (ii) appellant has no property interest in the relevant forum and therefore has no constitutionally protected right in restricting access to it. We now examine those propositions.

Compelled access like that ordered in this case both penalizes the expression of particular points of view and forces speakers to alter their speech to conform with an agenda they do not set. These impermissible effects are not remedied by the Commission's definition of the relevant property rights.

The Court's decision in PruneYard Shopping Center v. Robins, is not to the contrary. In PruneYard, * * * the owner did not even allege that he objected to the content of the pamphlets; nor was the access right content-based. PruneYard thus does not undercut the proposition that forced associations that burden protected speech are impermissible.

The Commission's order is inconsistent with these principles. The order does not simply award access to the public at large; rather, it discriminates on the basis of the viewpoints of the selected speakers. Two of the acknowledged purposes of the access order are to offer the public a greater variety of views in appellant's billing envelope, and to assist groups (such as TURN) that challenge appellant in the Commission's ratemaking proceedings in raising funds. Access to the envelopes thus is not content-neutral. The variety of views that the Commission seeks to foster cannot be obtained by including speakers whose speech agrees with appellant's. Similarly, the perceived need to raise funds to finance participation in ratemaking proceedings exists only where the relevant groups represent interests that diverge from appellant's interests. Access is limited to persons or groups—such as TURN—who disagree with appellant's view as expressed in Progress and who oppose appellant in Commission proceedings.

The Commission's order is not a "content-based penalty" in the first sense, because TURN's access to appellant's envelopes is not conditioned on any particular expression by appellant. But because access is awarded only to those who disagree with appellant's views and who are hostile to appellant's interests, appellant must contend with the fact that whenever it speaks out on a given issue, it may be forced—at TURN's discretion—to help disseminate hostile views. Appellant "might well conclude" that, under these circumstances, "the safe course is to avoid controversy," thereby reducing the free flow of information and ideas that the First Amendment seeks to promote.

Appellant does not, of course, have the right to be free from vigorous debate. But it does have the right to be free from government restrictions that abridge its own rights in order to "enhance the relative voice" of its opponents. Buckley v. Valeo. The Commission's order requires appellant to assist in disseminating TURN's views; it does not equally constrain both sides of the debate about utility regulation. * * *

The Commission's access order also impermissibly requires appellant to associate with speech with which appellant may disagree. The order on its face leaves TURN free to use the billing envelopes to discuss any issues it chooses.[11] Should TURN choose, for example, to urge appellant's customers to vote for a particular slate of legislative candidates, or to argue in favor of legislation that could seriously affect the utility business, appellant may be forced either to appear to agree with TURN's views or to respond. This pressure to respond "is particularly apparent when the owner has taken a position opposed to the view being expressed on his property." Especially since TURN has been given access in part to create a multiplicity of views in the envelopes, there can be little doubt that appellant will feel compelled to respond to arguments and allegations made by TURN in its messages to appellant's customers.

That kind of forced response is antithetical to the free discussion that the First Amendment seeks to foster. For corporations as for individuals, the choice to speak includes within it the choice of what not to say. And we have held that speech does not lose its protection because of the corporate identity of the speaker. Bellotti; Consolidated Edison. Were the government freely able to compel corporate speakers to propound political messages with which they disagree, this protection would be empty, for the government could require speakers to affirm in one breath that which they deny in the next. It is therefore incorrect to say, as do appellees, that our decisions do not limit the government's authority to compel speech by corporations. The danger that appellant will be required to alter its own message as a consequence of the government's coercive action is a proper object of First Amendment solicitude, because the message itself is protected under our decisions in Bellotti and Consolidated Edison. Where, as in this case, the danger is one that arises from a content-based grant of access to private property, it is a danger that the government may not impose absent a compelling interest.

The envelopes themselves, the bills, and Progress all remain appellant's property. The Commission's access order thus clearly requires appellant to use its property as a vehicle for spreading a message with which it disagrees.

A different conclusion would necessarily imply that our decision in Tornillo rested on the Miami Herald's ownership of the space that would have been used to print candidate replies. Nothing in Tornillo suggests that the result would have been different had the Florida Supreme Court decided that the newspaper space needed to print candidates' replies was the property of the newspaper's readers, or had the court ordered the Miami Herald to distribute inserts owned and prepared by the candidates together with its newspapers. The constitutional difficulty with the right-of-reply statute was that it required the newspaper to disseminate a message with which the newspaper disagreed. This difficulty did not depend on whether the particular paper on which the replies were printed belonged to the newspaper or to the candidate.

Appellee's argument suffers from the same constitutional defect. The Commission's order forces appellant to disseminate TURN's speech in envelopes that appellant owns and that bear appellant's return address. Such forced association with potentially hostile views burdens the expression of views different from TURN's and risks forcing appellant to speak where it would prefer to remain silent. Those effects do not depend on who "owns" the "extra space."

Notwithstanding that it burdens protected speech, the Commission's order could be valid if it were a narrowly tailored means of serving a compelling state interest.

Appellees identify two assertedly compelling state interests that the access order is said to advance. First, appellees argue that the order furthers the State's interest in effective ratemaking procedures. The State's interest in fair and effective utility regulation may be compelling. The difficulty with appellees' argument is that the State can serve that interest through means that would not violate appellant's First Amendment rights, such as awarding costs and fees. The State's interest may justify imposing on appellant the reasonable expenses of responsible groups that represent the public interest at ratemaking proceedings. But "we find 'no substantially relevant correlation between the governmental interest asserted and the State's effort' " to compel appellant to distribute TURN's speech in appellant's envelopes. Bellotti.

11. The presence of a disclaimer on TURN's messages, does not suffice to eliminate the impermissible pressure on appellant to respond to TURN's speech. The disclaimer serves only to avoid giving readers the mistaken impression that TURN's words are really those of appellant. PruneYard (opinion of Powell, J.). It does nothing to reduce the risk that appellant will be forced to respond when there is strong disagreement with the substance of TURN's message.

Second, appellees argue that the order furthers the State's interest in promoting speech by making a variety of views available to appellant's customers. We have noted above that this interest is not furthered by an order that is not content neutral. Moreover, the means chosen to advance variety tend to inhibit expression of appellant's views in order to promote TURN's. Our cases establish that the State cannot advance some points of view by burdening the expression of others. First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti; Buckley v. Valeo. It follows that the Commission's order is not a narrowly tailored means of furthering this interest.

We conclude that the Commission's order impermissibly burdens appellant's First Amendment rights because it forces appellant to associate with the views of other speakers, and because it selects the other speakers on the basis of their viewpoints. The order is not a narrowly tailored means of furthering a compelling state interest, and it is not a valid time, place, or manner regulation. For these reasons, the decision of the California Public Utilities Commission must be vacated.

Justice Blackmun took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

Chief Justice BURGER, concurring.

I join Justice Powell's opinion, but think we need not go beyond the authority of Wooley to decide this case. I would not go beyond the central question presented by this case, which is the infringement of Pacific's right to be free from forced association with views with which it disagrees.

Justice MARSHALL, concurring in the judgment.

Two significant differences between the State's grant of access in this case and the grant of access in PruneYard lead me to find a constitutional barrier here that I did not find in the earlier case.

The first difference is the degree of intrusiveness of the permitted access. In the present case, appellant has never opened up its billing envelope to the use of the public. Appellant has not abandoned its right to exclude others from its property to the degree that the shopping center owner had done in PruneYard. Were appellant to use its billing envelope as a sort of community billboard, regularly carrying the messages of third parties, its desire to exclude a particular speaker would be deserving of lesser solicitude. As matters stand, however, appellant has issued no invitation to the general public to use its billing envelope, for speech or for any other purpose. Moreover, the shopping center in PruneYard bore a strong resemblance to the streets and parks that are traditional public forums. People routinely gathered there, at the owner's invitation, and engaged in a wide variety of activities. Adding speech to the list of those activities did not in any great way change the complexion of the property. The same is not true in this case.

The second difference between this case and PruneYard is that the State has chosen to give TURN a right to speak at the expense of appellant's ability to use the property in question as a forum for the exercise of its own First Amendment rights. While the shopping center owner in PruneYard wished to be free of unwanted expression, he nowhere alleged that his own expression was hindered in the slightest. In contrast, the present case involves a forum of inherently limited scope. By appropriating, four times a year, the space in appellant's envelope that appellant would otherwise use for its own speech, the State has necessarily curtailed petitioner's use of its own forum. The regulation in this case, therefore, goes beyond a mere infringement of appellant's desire to remain silent.

While the interference with appellant's speech is, concededly, very slight, the State's justification—the subsidization of another speaker chosen by the State—is insufficient to sustain even that minor burden. We have held that the State may use its own resources for subsidization, Regan v. Taxation with Representation of Washington, but that interest, standing alone, cannot justify interference with the speech of others.

In the present case, the State has redefined a property right in the extra space in appellant's billing envelope in such a way as to achieve a result—burdening the speech of one party in order to enhance the speech of another—that the First Amendment disallows. In doing so, moreover, it has sanctioned an intrusion onto appellant's property that exceeds the slight incursion permitted in PruneYard. Under these circumstances, I believe that the State has crossed the boundary between constitutionally permissible and impermissible redefinitions of private property.

In reaching this conclusion, I do not mean to suggest that I would hold, contrary to our precedents, that the corporation's First Amendment rights are coextensive with those of individuals, or that commercial speech enjoys the same protections as individual speech. In essentially all instances, the use of business property to carry out transactions with the general public will permit the State to restrict or mandate speech in order to prevent deception or otherwise protect the public's health and welfare. In many instances, such as in PruneYard, business property will be open to the public to such an extent that the public's expressive activities will not interfere with the owner's use of property to a degree that offends the Constitution. The regulation at issue in this case, I believe, falls on the other side of the line. Accordingly, I join the Court's judgment.

Justice REHNQUIST, with whom Justice White and Justice Stevens join in part, dissenting.

I do not believe that the right of access here will have any noticeable deterrent effect. Nor do I believe that negative free speech rights, applicable to individuals and perhaps the print media, should be extended to corporations generally. I believe that the right of access here is constitutionally indistinguishable from the right of access approved in PruneYard Shopping Center v. Robins and therefore I dissent.

This Court established in Bellotti that the First Amendment prohibits the Government from directly suppressing the affirmative speech of corporations. A newspaper publishing corporation's right to express itself freely is also implicated by governmental action that penalizes speech because the deterrent effect of a penalty is very much like direct suppression. Our cases cannot be squared, however, with the view that the First Amendment prohibits governmental action that only indirectly and remotely affects a speaker's contribution to the overall mix of information available to society. The plurality does not adequately explain how the potential deterrent effect of the right of access here is sufficiently immediate and direct to warrant strict scrutiny. While a statutory penalty may sufficiently deter speech to trigger such heightened First Amendment scrutiny, the right of access here will not have such an effect on PG & E's incentives to speak.

The record does not support the inference that PUC issued its order to penalize PG & E because of the content of its inserts or because PG & E included the inserts in its billing envelopes in the first place. The order does not prevent PG & E from using the billing envelopes in the future to distribute inserts whenever it wishes. Nor does its vitality depend on whether PG & E includes inserts in any future billing envelopes. Moreover, the central reason for the access order—to provide for an effective ratepayer voice—would not vary in importance if PG & E had never distributed the inserts or ceased distributing them tomorrow. The most that can be said about the connection between the inserts and the order is that the existence of the inserts quite probably brought to TURN's attention the possibility of requesting access.

Nor does the access order create any cognizable risk of deterring PG & E from expressing its views in the most candid fashion. The right of access here bears no relationship to PG & E's future conduct. PG & E cannot prevent the access by remaining silent or avoiding discussion of controversial subjects. The plurality suggests, however, that the possibility of minimizing the undesirable content of TURN's speech may induce PG & E to adopt a strategy of avoiding certain topics in hopes that TURN will not think to address them on its own. But this is an extremely implausible prediction. The success of such a strategy would depend on any group given access being little more than a reactive organization. TURN or any other group eventually given access will likely address the controversial subjects in spite of PG & E's silence. I therefore believe that PG & E will have no incentive to adopt the conservative strategy. Accordingly, the right of access should not be held to trigger heightened First Amendment scrutiny on the ground that it somehow might deter PG & E's right to speak.

The plurality argues, however, that the right of access also implicates PG & E's right not to speak or to associate with the speech of others, thereby triggering heightened scrutiny. The thrust of the plurality's argument is that if TURN has access to the envelopes, its speech will have the effect of forcing PG & E to address topics about which it would prefer to remain silent. The plausibility of any such prediction depends upon the perceived ineffectiveness of a disclaimer or the absence of any effective alternative means for consumer groups like TURN to communicate to the ratepayers. In PruneYard Shopping Center, this Court held that the availability of an effective disclaimer was sufficient to eliminate any infringement upon negative free speech rights. If an alternative forum of communication exists, TURN or the other consumer groups will be able to induce PG & E to address the additional topics anyway. Finally, because PG & E retains complete editorial freedom over the content of its inserts, the effect of the right of access is likely to be qualitatively different from a direct prescription by the Government of "what shall be orthodox in * * * matters of opinion." West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette.

There is, however, a more fundamental flaw with the plurality's analysis. This Court has recognized that natural persons enjoy negative free speech rights because of their interest in self-expression; an individual's right not to speak or to associate with the speech of others is a component of the broader constitutional interest of natural persons in freedom of conscience. Extension of the individual freedom of conscience decisions to business corporations strains the rationale of those cases beyond the breaking point. To ascribe to such artificial entities an "intellect" or "mind" for freedom of conscience purposes is to confuse metaphor with reality. Corporations generally have not played the historic role of newspapers as conveyors of individual ideas and opinion. In extending positive free speech rights to corporations, this Court drew a distinction between the First Amendment rights of corporations and those of natural persons. [Bellotti] recognized that corporate free speech rights do not arise because corporations, like individuals, have any interest in self-expression. Consolidated Edison. It held instead that such rights are recognized as an instrumental means of furthering the First Amendment purpose of fostering a broad forum of information to facilitate self-government.

The interest in remaining isolated from the expressive activity of others, and in declining to communicate at all, is for the most part divorced from this "broad public forum" purpose of the First Amendment. The right of access here constitutes an effort to facilitate and enlarge public discussion; it therefore furthers rather than abridges First Amendment values. [B]ecause the interest on which the constitutional protection of corporate speech rests is the societal interest in receiving information and ideas, the constitutional interest of a corporation in not permitting the presentation of other distinct views clearly identified as those of the speaker is de minimis. This is especially true in the case of PG & E, which is after all a regulated public utility. Any claim it may have had to a sphere of corporate autonomy was largely surrendered to extensive regulatory authority when it was granted legal monopoly status.

This argument is bolstered by the fact that the two constitutional liberties most closely analogous to the right to refrain from speaking—the Fifth Amendment right to remain silent and the constitutional right of privacy—have been denied to corporations based on their corporate status. The Court in Bellotti recognized that some " 'purely personal' guarantees * * * are unavailable to corporations and other organizations," and therefore declined to hold that "corporations have the full measure of rights that individuals enjoy under the First Amendment."

PG & E is not an individual or a newspaper publisher; it is a regulated utility. The insistence on treating identically for constitutional purposes entities that are demonstrably different is as great a jurisprudential sin as treating differently those entities which are the same. Because I think this case is governed by PruneYard, I would affirm the judgment of the Supreme Court of California.

Justice STEVENS, dissenting.

The narrow question we must address is whether a state public utility commission may require the fund-raising solicitation of a consumer advocacy group to be carried in a utility billing envelope. Since the utility concedes that it has no right to use the extra space in the billing envelope for its own newsletter, the question is limited to whether the Commission's requirement that it be the courier for the message of a third party violates the First Amendment. In my view, this requirement differs little from regulations applied daily to a variety of commercial communications that have rarely been challenged—and to my knowledge never invalidated—on First Amendment grounds.

I assume that the plurality would not object to a utility commission rule dictating the format of the bill, even as to required warnings and the type size of various provisos and disclaimers. Such regulation is not too different from that applicable to credit card bills, loan forms, and media advertising. I assume also the plurality would permit the Commission to require the utility to disseminate legal notices of public hearings and ratemaking proceedings written by it. These compelled statements differ little from mandating disclosure of information in the bill itself, as the plurality recognizes.

Given that the Commission can require the utility to make certain statements and to carry the Commission's own messages to its customers, it seems but a small step to acknowledge that the Commission can also require the utility to act as the conduit for a public interest group's message that bears close relationship to the purpose of the billing envelope.

If the California Public Utility Commission had taken over company buildings and vehicles for propaganda purposes, or even engaged in viewpoint discrimination among speakers desirous of sending messages via the billing envelope, I would be concerned. But nothing in this case presents problems even remotely resembling or portending the ones just mentioned. Although the plurality's holding may wisely forestall serious constitutional problems that are likely to arise in the future, I am not convinced that the order under review today has crossed the threshold of unconstitutionality. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent.

COMMENT

In Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974), the Court held that the state mandated right of reply for political candidates to newspaper attacks was unconstitutional. See text, p. 497. In Pacific Gas & Electric, Justice Powell declared that the utility should not be required by the state to facilitate the expression of views it did not share. In Justice Rehnquist's view, this goes farther than the doctrine of Bellotti—from which, incidentally, he dissented. Bellotti forbade Massachusetts from interfering with an affirmative exercise of corporate expression, i.e., participation in the political process.

Pacific Gas & Electric says that a speaker who is required by the state to transmit "potentially hostile views" may, therefore, feel required to speak where it "would prefer to remain silent." In short, the utility might feel impelled to transmit views which it might otherwise ignore. State requirements in such circumstances, the Court concludes, burden expression.

How should such a burden on expression be evaluated? Here the student sees the critical significance of the strict scrutiny test in First Amendment adjudication. Since free expression rights of the speaker are at issue, heightened scrutiny is in order. The regulation at issue cannot stand unless it is a "narrowly tailored means of furthering a compelling state interest." The Bellotti doctrine protects a right not to speak; this right is then evaluated under a heightened scrutiny test. This is too potent a combination for the California PUC regulation to withstand.

Neither Bellotti nor Pacific Gas & Electric held that corporations had free expression rights. In each case, the corporation was referred to as a speaker whose identity was irrelevant. In Bellotti, the Court feared that the legislation at issue would subtract from the total of expression available to the citizenry. Was that the fear in Pacific Gas & Electric?

Justice Rehnquist in dissent said Wooley protected natural persons from being compelled to speak. Tornillo protected "newspapers." (Actually it protected newspaper corporations.) But he pointed out that business corporations were in a different category. Corporations did not have free speech rights; free speech rights were accorded to speakers (who happened to be corporations) for purposes of fostering information to facilitate self-government. But is this value served by extending freedom of conscience rights to those who wish not to speak? And, one might add, by enabling those who do not wish to speak themselves to silence others?

If government, as Justice Powell says, may not burden some expression to enhance other expression, how will expression which does not have a corporate source be able to compete in the high-priced marketplace of ideas?

TWO

Libel and the Journalist

Few areas of law are more complex than libel or more dependent upon verbal nuance that varies from one jurisdiction to another. Libel law assumes a theory of human response that has evolved without help from science. One might argue that libel's threshold elements of publication, identification, and defamation are necessary but not necessarily sufficient conditions to alter the opinions of reasonable people.

While the layperson is at sea as to the meaning and application of libel, most lawyers have yet to undo its semantic tangles. That leaves the journalist very much alone in deciding initially whether or not to publish. Editorial judgment is often suspended or delegated to a libel lawyer. An alternative is knowledge of libel, for libel is a serious business.

In 1979, the Point Reyes Light, a 3,100-circulation northern California weekly, won a Pulitzer Prize for a series on Synanon, then a drug rehabilitation program. It soon found itself threatened by four libel suits asking for $1 billion in damages.

The Alton (Illinois) Telegraph was reduced to bankruptcy for a memo it sent to the Justice Department. The newspaper settled for $1.2 million in lieu of an original damage claim of $9.2 million brought by a developer.[1]

Libel broke the $3 million barrier in 1988 when the United States Supreme Court let stand a $3.05 million libel judgment won by a tobacco company against CBS. Earlier the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, in a surprising move, had upped a trial court's award and permitted a judgment nearly four times larger than any prior libel award.[2] At about the same time, a United States District Court in Nevada allowed a $5 million award in punitive damages to entertainer Wayne Newton for a NBC broadcast that was said to create the impression that Newton received financial help from organized crime to purchase a hotel. NBC, said the court, had "serious subjective doubts" about the truth of its report. While the court reduced a jury megaverdict of $15 million in actual damages to $50,000, it thought the punitive award defensible under Nevada law, given the network's net worth of $2 billion and its insistence in repeating the defamatory statements after Newton had asked for a retraction.[3] The judgment was appealed.

And it's not just the money. Defending against a libel suit robs a newsroom of many hours better spent on newsgathering. Pretrial issues of constitutional privilege and discovery, and appeals on these and other issues, can take as long as four years.

1. Green v. Alton Telegraph Printing Co., 438 N.E.2d 203, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1345 (1982).
2. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp. v. Walter Jacobson and CBS, Inc., 14 Med.L.Rptr. 1497, 827 F.2d 1119 (7th Cir. 1987). This case is presented on p. 232.
3. Newton v. NBC, 14 Med.L.Rptr. 1914 (D.Nev. 1987).

The Boston Globe in 1988 marked its seventh year of defending a libel suit brought by former Massachusetts Governor Edward King. King claimed defamation in three cartoons, one editorial, an op-ed piece, and two political columns. Because statements of opinion are increasingly being granted constitutional protection—at least where the line can be drawn between fact and opinion—only one of the columns remained in litigation in 1987. A superior court judge, after six years of briefs, motions, and depositions, had granted the newspaper summary judgment on all of the pieces. The state's highest court, however, held that an article asserting that the governor had "called a judge and demanded that he change a decision he had rendered in a gang rape case" was a statement of fact susceptible of defamatory meaning and should be considered by a jury. That item was remanded for trial and later dismissed.[4]

Eighty per cent of cases are thus delayed, and defendants bear the costs. Once cases get to trial, plaintiffs win seven of ten. Of cases won, jurors on the average award plaintiffs actual damages of $1 million and punitive damages of $600,000, larger awards than in medical malpractice and product liability suits. Juries seldom understand abstract First Amendment interests. They see only a big corporation telling a lie about someone. Approximately five of these seven cases are reversed on appeal, or damage awards are sharply reduced. Awards surviving appeal average about $150,000.

The upside of this is that network investigative reporters are beginning to have serious reservations about ambush interviews, the rehearsing of witnesses, and the edited cutaways that give the viewers partial answers or reconstructed paragraphs that distort the original interviews. The downside is that some suits are brought mainly to harass. The small or unconventional publisher may not be able to afford the costs of defending. He may settle instead or go broke defending a principle that eventually would have been upheld in court.

Many libel suits result from carelessness, haste, or lack of knowledge. Reporters would do well to have more than one source for potentially libelous allegations. It should be standard procedure also to talk to the person against whom charges are made. Controversial statements should be documented. And the ethical consequences of one's publication ought to be pondered.

There is some evidence that plaintiffs win by suing; they don't sue to win.[5] They sue to put the world on notice that their reputations are worth fighting for. They will take as long as necessary to legitimize their claims of falsity. Public people, on occasion, are less interested in truth than in revenge. In either case, the newsroom is tied up, distracted, and sometimes intimidated. Intimidation is inversely proportional to the newsroom's knowledge of libel law. When Jack Newfield profiled "The Ten Worst Judges in New York," only one of them ever brought suit.[6]

And yet both plaintiffs and defendants lose in the long run. Defendants lose in the court of public opinion and in time and treasure. Plaintiffs lose in the courts of law and in psychological well-being (nearly eight out of ten libel suits never make it to trial). But what is libel? How do we define it? How do we prevent it? How do we defend against it?

DEFINITIONS

Libel is essentially a false and defamatory attack in written form on a person's reputation or character. Broadcast defamation is libel because there is usually a written script. Oral or spoken defamation is slander. "[A] communication is defamatory if it tends so to harm the reputation of another as to lower him in the estimation of the community or to deter third persons from associating or dealing with him."[7]

We might reasonably expect imputations of crime, gross immorality, criminal associations, financial unreliability, incompetence, or irresponsibility (in descending order of disapprobation) to have these effects. Each state will have its own peculiar definition of defamation: words which expose one to public hatred, shame, contempt, ridicule, ostracism, degradation, or disgrace or disparage one in her business, profession, or office.

Reputation—essentially what other people think of you—is a slippery concept when out of time, place, and context. Harm to reputation may also depend upon who makes the charge. To be an enemy of the intemperate may give one stature in the community. Who hears the charge? What would an average reader or viewer infer from the message? and what is the "temper of the times"?[8]

The true connotation of words should be cast in our own times, for the harmless word of yesterday may today be one of reproach and odium,[9] or, as Oliver Wendell Holmes put it, "A word is not a crystal, transparent and unchanged; it is the skin of a living thought and may vary greatly in color and content according to the circumstances and the time in which it is used." [10]

In a Vermont case, a plaintiff was characterized by a political opponent as a "horse's ass," a "jerk," an "idiot," and "paranoid." Words used in the context of a political skirmish between two candidates for mayor, said the court, could not reasonably have been believed in their literal sense or with a willful or malicious intent to denigrate or ridicule the plaintiff in his profession as an accountant. Such words, the state supreme court added, may be insulting, abusive, unpleasant, and objectionable, but they are not defamatory in and of themselves, and they reflect more on the character of the user than on the person for whom they are intended.[11]

It is fortunate and historically consistent that the courts tolerate political hyperbole. The Supreme Court held in 1970 that the term "blackmail," when used in characterizing the negotiating position of a real estate developer, was not slander when spoken in the heat and passion of a city council meeting and not actionable libel when subsequently reported accurately in newspaper articles. A trial court judgment against a newspaper was reversed.[12]

On occasion, media lawyers have prepared lists of "red flag" words for their clients. Such lists can never be complete. A more general guide might be to be very cautious with felonious allegations, unless they are made in a judicial context, and to empathize or identify with subjects of your news stories whenever they are cast in the vale of misfortune.

Single Instance Rule

A number of states subscribe to what New York and Florida call the single-instance rule. Under this rule, "language charging a professional person with ignorance or error on a single occasion only and not accusing that person of general ignorance or lack of skill is not actionable unless special damages are pleaded." [13]

The rule is premised on the notion that sooner or later everyone makes a mistake. The trick is to avoid an implication of general ignorance or lack of skill applicable to past, present, and future.

It is a dangerous rule. How can one be sure that a publication is the first time a reference has been made to a prospective plaintiff's mistakes?

Innocent Construction Rule

As has been noted, libel may hinge upon connotation and colloquialisms. But when a plaintiff attaches an unfamiliar or a special meaning to a word or expression, the burden rests on that person to prove its defamatory nature. If the plaintiff succeeds, the defendant then has an opportunity to rebut by showing that the words could not have been taken in a defamatory sense, were not intended to be taken that way, and had their meaning stretched beyond the obvious understanding of readers and listeners.

A minority of states has written the above proposition into a rule known as the "innocent construction rule." If language is capable of an innocent construction, it should be interpreted that way. Although a statement may lend itself to a neurotic interpretation, courts following the rule are more interested in ordinary, commonly accepted interpretations rather than convoluted, strained, or otherwise unusual meanings.

Illinois has such a rule. A newspaper editorial paraphrasing a village trustee's argument for higher trustee salaries chose to interpret the trustee's remarks as an expression of his belief that good government had to be paid for. The trustee, however, read the editorial as suggesting that he, the trustee, regarded the alternative to adequate salaries to be the illegal practice of taking money under the table. In a subsequent libel suit against a Niles newspaper, the trustee contended that the editorial constituted a published attack on his ability to perform his duties and on his integrity. An Illinois court preferred to attach an innocent construction to the editorial and denied relief to the trustee.[14]

11. Blouin v. Anton, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 17141, 431 A.2d 489 (Vt. 1981). Some states, Alabama, Mississippi, and Virginia, for example, have passed "insulting words" laws which are meant to punish insults before they reach the level of defamation. See Hanson, Libel and Related Torts, Vol. 1, Case and Comment, 1969, § 17.

Not capable of an innocent construction, however, was a city clerk's statement, concerning the city's award of a garbage collection contract, that "I think 240 pieces of silver changed hands—30 for each alderman." When an alderman brought suit, the Illinois Supreme Court held the words to be a defamatory statement of fact, not a constitutionally protected expression of opinion.[15]

It is sometimes a fine line. A New York court said, "It is not libelous to assert that a public official was appointed to a high paying but unnecessary public office as a political reward, without consideration of merit or competence. Such charges are commonplace in the political arena. Whether or not they are true, they are not actionable."[16]

Far more assured of punishment was the newspaper article that, by repeated use of words such as "fix, bribe, payoff," and "improper offers," led average readers to conclude that an attorney had solicited a high legal fee from a drug defendant in order to bribe the judge and "fix" the case. Such language was clearly defamatory, said the Kentucky Supreme Court.[17]

In most jurisdictions juries will decide whether a statement is to be given a defamatory or nondefamatory meaning. So there is no innocent construction rule as such.

Illustrations and Headlines

Libel occurs not only on the printed page but in photos, cartoons, film, tape, records, signs, bumper stickers, advertisements, and, yes, even in skywriting and on gravestones.

Illustrations and headlines may be libelous by innuendo even when nothing false or defamatory is stated. The Boston Herald-Traveler printed a picture of a witness before a congressional committee on its front page. Although the witness had testified as to how he had refused to take part in an alleged fraud, his picture appeared under the banner headline—"Settlement Upped $2,000: $400 Kickback Told." Though no reference was made to the witness in an accompanying article, the court said the innuendo was capable of being defamatory and that the plaintiff was entitled to a jury trial to prove that he was defamed.[18]

In a much discussed case a photograph of the plaintiff's home in a story about how a gang of thieves used the basement of one of their homes as a warehouse for stolen property was declared to state a claim for defamation. The case was Troman v. Wood.[19] Similarly an article about trucking companies going out of business was illustrated with an auction notice announcing public sale of trucking equipment owned by the plaintiff. Since the trucking company was not going out of business and nothing in the story said it was, use of the firm's name in the context of the illustration was held to state a claim for libel.[20]

Since reporters seldom write headlines for their stories, they don't feel responsible when headline and story are mismatched. Courts, however, sensitive to the fact that often only the headline is read, have upheld libel judgments on the basis of headlines alone. For example, in Sprouse v. Clay Communication, Inc., 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1695, 211 S.E.2d 674 (W.Va. 1975), a state supreme court upheld a $250,000 award in actual damages against a newspaper which had libeled an unsuccessful gubernatorial candidate by what the court called "misleading words in oversized headlines." Said the court:

> Where oversized headlines are published which reasonably lead the average reader to an entirely different > conclusion than the facts cited in the body of the story, and where the plaintiff can demonstrate that it was the intent of the publisher to use such misleading headlines to create a false impression on the normal reader, the headline may be considered separately with regard to whether a known falsehood was published.

The United States Supreme Court declined to review that holding, and the successful plaintiff went on to become a justice of the very court that had upheld his claim.

Similarly in McNair v. Hearst Corp., 494 F.2d 1309 (9th Cir. 1974), a federal appeals court said that if a newspaper publisher knew of the false impression which the headline and first two paragraphs of an article would make upon the reader, fifty subsequent paragraphs countering that impression would not keep the headline and first two paragraphs from constituting libel.

On the other hand, courts have held that a headline must be read in context with an entire article before a judgment can be made about libel.[21] Courts are divided, then, as to whether headlines should be read in the context of an entire article or in isolation. The Oklahoma Supreme Court decided that headlines "susceptible of 'innocent meanings' cannot constitute evidence of actual malice."[22]

Indirect Libel

It used to be that lawyers made a distinction between direct libels—referring to someone as a criminal—and indirect libels—libel by innuendo, implication, or omission. Lawyers called the two categories libel per se and libel per quod respectively, and only lawyers, and very few of them, understood the difference.[23]

Since some degree of fault on the part of the defendant must now be proved by the plaintiff, the per quod category may no longer be important. Since plaintiffs must also prove falsity, actual injury, and either actual malice or negligence, the libel per se concept may also be undermined. Since the great New York Times case of 1964[24] and its progeny, notably Gertz v. Robert Welch,[25] such concepts are no longer as significant as they once were.

False implications may not alone support a libel action. Actual malice may not be inferred from otherwise accurate statements that beg the question: Did the publisher have serious doubts as to the truth of the statement? Where private persons bring suit and need only prove negligence on the part of the publisher or her reporter, defamatory implications should have some connection to fact. A careless headline, for example, could imply an indefensible fact. But generally a publisher will not be liable for a seemingly harmless report he had no reason to suspect of having a libelous meaning. A libel may occur due to outside or extrinsic circumstances about or over which a reporter had no knowledge or control. For example, to help someone with her suitcase is not obviously libelous, but if that person turns out to be a fugitive from justice, a defamatory meaning could be drawn. The legal term for this is inducement.

These more elaborated forms of libel, as well as slander, have traditionally required a showing of special damages, heretofore defined as actual monetary loss. Their gradual departure from the vocabulary of libel will relieve news organizations of many nasty surprises.

Trade Libel

Special damages or actual money loss must also be shown in cases of trade libel or disparagement. A federal district court in Bose Corp. v. Consumers Union, 7 Med.L.Reptr. 2481, 529 F.Supp. 357 (D.Mass. 1981), defined trade libel:

> The tort of product disparagement, as distinguished from individual or corporate defamation, is a narrow cause of action. The interests protected are not those of the reputation of the corporation or the intangible concerns peculiar to individual reputation such as community standing, privacy and psychic well-being. * * * A cause of action for product disparagement is made out only when the plaintiff has satisfactorily proved that it suffered special damages flowing from a false statement concerning the nature or quality of plaintiff's product. * * * The tort exists to provide redress only for tangible and direct pecuniary loss, a purely economic injury to which society accords a lesser value > than reputational interests. * * * In a product disparagement case, the plaintiff must prove that special damages resulted from the publication and that the disparagement was a substantial factor in inducing others not to buy the plaintiff's product.

In National Dynamics Corp. v. Petersen Publishing Co., 185 F.Supp. 573 (S.D.N.Y. 1960), a federal district court said that where a publication states that the construction of a manufacturer's product is not as good as that of a competitor, there is a libel of the product only. No inference can be drawn that the manufacturer is practicing a deceit on the public simply because he is selling a product which is not the best in its field. The court added that, under New York law, disparagement of a product, even to the extent of saying it is completely worthless, is not sufficient to make out a case of libel per se of the manufacturer.

On the other hand, when Jerry Lewis said on a television program that a product called "Snooze," a sleep aid, was full of habit-forming drugs, that nothing short of a hospital cure could make one stop taking it, and that one would feel like "a run-down hound dog" and would lose weight under its effects, the New York Court of Appeals ruled that such an aspersion could readily be understood as charging the manufacturer, even though his name was not mentioned, with fraud and deceit in putting unwholesome and dangerous products on the market. The statement was libelous per se, and a showing of special damages was unnecessary. Harwood Pharmacal Co. v. National Broadcasting Co., Inc., 214 N.Y.S.2d 725, 174 N.E.2d 602 (1961).

The distinction between an attack on a product and an attack on its producer must be carefully drawn by the publisher who would avoid litigation.

Corporate Libel

The Bose court speaks of corporate reputation. Corporations are collective persons—directors, managers, employees. Their reputations depend upon their image-making abilities, their handling of conflict, and the quality of their products. Can this group character be libeled? Courts disagree.

In Transworld Accounts v. Associated Press, 425 F.Supp. 814 (N.D.Cal. 1977), the court declared that there is no meaningful distinction between the protectible interest in the reputation of corporations and that of individuals, given the fact that many of these enterprises are conducted as individual proprietorships or partnerships.

But a year earlier in Martin Marietta Corp. v. Evening Star Newspaper, 417 F.Supp. 947, 956 (D.D.C. 1976)—the newspaper had alleged that prostitutes were being provided to government officials by defense contractors—a federal district court said:

"[T]he values considered important enough to merit accommodation with interests protected by the first amendment are associated solely with natural persons, and that corporations, while legal persons for some purposes, possess none of the attributes the (Gertz) Court sought to protect." Martin Marietta, by providing an atmosphere in which, it was alleged, a naked woman could swing from a stuffed moose head, had become a public figure by thrusting itself into a matter of public controversy. So what would become a public issue or Rosenbloom test (see p. 203) was appropriate in trying the libel case.

A year later this approach was expressly rejected in Reliance Insurance Co. v. Barron's, 442 F.Supp. 1341 (S.D.N.Y. 1977). And in Bruno & Stillman v. Globe Newspaper, 633 F.2d 583 (1st Cir. 1980), a corporation not involved in a public controversy was held not to be a public figure.

The fact that a company advertises its goods and services does not make it a public figure or suggest a public controversy, said the California Supreme Court.[26] But, a federal appeals court held that where a meat company, after a media advertising blitz, was charged by a broadcast consumer reporter with selling an inferior product, the company had initiated disagreement. Its advertising and public relations campaign made it the focal point of a public controversy.[27]

Access to media and a voluntary decision to "go public" will likely make a corporation a public figure. Doing business with government or being closely regulated by government will have the same effect. Herbert Schmertz's issue advertising on behalf of the Mobil Oil Company is clearly controversial and makes the company a public figure in the context of the issues raised. A few states, Minnesota for example, make corporations public figures by definition.[28] In the key Minnesota case, however, the state supreme court required defendant to show that its publication was in the realm of legitimate public interest. In spite of disorder in this line of cases, courts will probably follow the rule that where a corporation voluntarily makes itself a public figure, it will have to prove actual malice to win a libel verdict.

Nonprofit organizations, foundations, special interest groups, and labor unions may attempt libel actions on behalf of their memberships, but successful suits in these categories are rare.

Governments, political parties, and political interest groups are barred from libel suits because the citizen's right to criticize power brokers, no matter how abusive the criticism, is said to be fundamental to a democratic society. In Johnson City v. Cowles Communications, Inc., 477 S.W.2d 750 (Tenn. 1972), the state supreme court said that Johnson City, a municipal corporation, was not a "person" within the meaning of the state's libel statute. Any citizen, individual, or corporate body, the court added, is absolutely privileged (excepting only treasonable utterances) to make statements about a city government.

The classic precedent was a much earlier case. In 1920 the City of Chicago sued the Chicago Tribune for libeling its credit in the bond market and impairing its functioning as a municipality. The Illinois Supreme Court ruled against the city noting that "no court of last resort in this country has ever held, or even suggested, that prosecutions for libel on government have any place in the American system of jurisprudence;" * * * and * * * "assuming that there was a temporary damage to the city and a resultant increase in taxes, it is better that an occasional individual or newspaper that is so perverted in judgment or so misguided in his or its civic duty should go free than that all of the citizens should be put in jeopardy of imprisonment or economic subjugation if they venture to criticize an inefficient or corrupt government." City of Chicago v. Tribune Co., 139 N.E. 86 (Ill. 1923). That sentiment was perhaps ahead of its time.

Where the plaintiff in a libel suit is an agent or agency of government, the action becomes a criminal proceeding known as criminal libel. As we shall see, this form of libel is rarely enforced in the United States, but some states still have criminal libel statutes on their books. In the United Kingdom, according to C. Duncan and B. Neill, Defamation, 151–52 (1978), a criminal libel case occurs on the average once a year.

Damages

At the risk of getting ahead of the core concepts of libel law, we will attempt a discussion of damages, a subject the courts have complicated almost beyond comprehension.

Compensatory or general damages are intended as monetary compensation paid by publishers for injury to reputation, injured feelings, shame, hurt, humiliation, disgrace, and mental anguish—the latter generally depending on first establishing damage to reputation. Before New York Times v. Sullivan, general damages were presumed in libel per se. Juries would fix the amount; courts would review and frequently reduce excessive awards. After New York Times, juries were required to consider the publisher's degree of fault (negligence or actual malice) in fixing damages.

Although it is unclear, general damages may not have survived Gertz v. Robert Welch in 1974, and, if they did, they became hopelessly tangled with actual damages (awarded when actual injury is shown, but the Court elected not to define actual injury) and special damages (compensation for actual money loss). Justice Powell wrote for the Court:

> The common law of defamation is an oddity of tort law, for it allows recovery of purportedly compensatory damages without evidence of actual loss. Under the traditional rules pertaining to actions for libel, the existence of injury is presumed from the fact of publication. Juries may award substantial sums as compensation for supposed damage to reputation without any proof that such harm actually occurred. The largely uncontrolled discretion of juries to award damages where there is no loss unnecessarily compounds the potential of any system of liability for defamatory falsehood to inhibit the vigorous exercise of First Amendment freedoms. Additionally, the doctrine of presumed damages invites juries to punish unpopular opinion rather than to compensate individuals for injury sustained by the publication of a false fact. More to the point, the States have no substantial interest in securing for plaintiffs such as this petitioner gratuitous awards of money damages far in excess of any actual injury.

We would not, of course, invalidate state law simply because we doubt its wisdom, but here we are attempting to reconcile state law with a competing interest grounded in the constitutional command of the First Amendment. It is therefore appropriate to require that state remedies for defamatory falsehood reach no farther than is necessary to protect the legitimate interest involved. It is necessary to restrict defamation plaintiffs who do not prove knowledge of falsity or reckless disregard for the truth to compensation for actual injury. We need not define "actual injury," as trial courts have wide experience in framing appropriate jury instructions in tort actions. Suffice it to say that actual injury is not limited to out-of-pocket loss. Indeed, the more customary types of actual harm inflicted by defamatory falsehood include impairment of reputation and standing in the community, personal humiliation, and mental anguish and suffering. Of course, juries must be limited by appropriate instructions, and all awards must be supported by competent evidence concerning the injury, although there need be no evidence which assigns an actual dollar value to the injury. [Emphasis added.]

Actual damages, it appears, are meant to redress injury to reputation as well as mental suffering where these can be demonstrated. They are not to be assessed simply to show disdain for a news organization. Where actual malice has been proven by a plaintiff, perhaps general or compensatory damages, without a showing of actual injury, are still in order.

Special damages and actual damages were once considered synonymous by some authorities. They were meant to repay one for actual money loss, e.g., loss of income or medical bills, due to a false and defamatory publication, if the connection could be proven. That meaning still attaches to special damages—provable monetary injury. It is the relationship between compensatory (general) damages and actual damages that the Gertz case has clouded. It is clear, however, that the Court expects a plaintiff to show that she has been injured in her reputation before collecting damages of any kind. That may require testimony as to a reputation before and after publication. Generally, after reputational injury has been demonstrated, damage claims begin to pile up: bills for emotional or physical treatment, loss of clients, customers, and associations, and attorneys' fees and court costs.

Punitive or exemplary damages, the bane of defendants because they are often awarded out of all proportion to the injury inflicted, are meant to punish and set an example for future would be libelers. Lawyers have called them "smart" money because they can sting.

Recognizing the inhibiting effect massive awards of punitive damages could have on First Amendment rights, the Court in Gertz sought to discourage them by tying them to a showing of actual malice (knowing falsehood or reckless disregard as to truth or falsity). The states have gone their own way. In some jurisdictions common law malice (ill will, spite, hostility, or a desire for revenge) may have to be shown as well as actual malice before punitive damages will be permitted.[29] Other states, among them Massachusetts,[30] Washington,[31] and Oregon,[32] prohibit punitive damages altogether because of their chilling effect on free discussion. Michigan has not been sympathetic to punitive damages.[33]

Where punitive damages are allowed, juries have wide discretion in deciding how much and when to levy them. Evidence of an intent to harm (common law malice) or an insensitive response to a request for retraction may be sufficient. Many states, incidentally, permit punitive damages only when a defendant ignores a request for a retraction.

Other states have tried to put a lid on punitive damages. Washington state may be unique in computing a figure over and above proven actual out-of-pocket losses on the bases of life expectancy (of the plaintiff) and the state's average annual wage. In Carol Burnett's successful libel case against the National Enquirer, the court took into consideration the assets and profits of the publication so as to punish and deter rather than destroy.[34] In Brown &

34. Burnett v. National Enquirer, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1321 (Cal.Super.Ct. 1981). A California appeals court considered an initial punitive damages award of $750,000 too high and ordered a new trial on the question unless Burnett would accept a reduced award of $150,000. See fn. 29.

Williamson v. Jacobson, damages were measured against CBS's net worth of $1 billion and the reporter's assets of $5 million. NBC's net worth was estimated at $2 billion by a federal district court in Nevada in the Wayne Newton case. From a defendant's perspective, these are disturbing developments, although appeals courts are expected to correct grossly excessive or unreasonable jury awards, actuated by prejudice and unrelated to the damage inflicted. The proper relationship between punitive and compensatory damages was addressed by Justice Harlan in a concurring opinion in Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, 403 U.S. 29, 75, n. 4 (1971):

> A carefully and properly instructed jury should ordinarily be able to arrive at damage awards that are self-validating. * * * [T]o the extent that supervision of jury verdicts would be required * * * defendant's resources, the actual harm suffered by the plaintiff, and the publication's potential for actual harm are all susceptible of more or less objective measurement. * * * I would hold unconstitutional, in a private libel case, jury authority to award punitive damages which is unconfined by the requirement that these awards bear a reasonable and purposeful relationship to the actual harm done.

Justices Marshall and Stewart in dissent thought no such objective measurement possible. In their view, punitive damages would remain a threat to the First Amendment.

In a case painful to the press, the Supreme Court in 1985 seemed to be returning to the old rule of presumed damages in libel per se when it held in Dun & Bradstreet v. Greenmoss Builders, 472 U.S. 749 (1985), that presumed and punitive damages, to use the Court's language, may be awarded "even absent a showing of actual malice" where no matters of public concern are involved. Proof of actual damages might be impossible, said the Court, but the circumstances could suggest that serious harm had been done. This language distinguishes Gertz by inferring that private plaintiffs in nonpublic situations might recover punitive damages without a showing of actual malice. Clearly the Court was not prepared to constitutionalize the entire common law of libel; some of the pre-New York Times rules would prevail. Justice White would retain all the common law rules where the plaintiff was neither a public official nor a public figure.

"[E]ven accepting the Gertz premise that the press also needed protection in suits by private parties," he wrote in a concurring opinion, "there was no need to modify the common-law requirements for establishing liability and to increase the burden of proof that must be satisfied to secure a judgment authorizing at least nominal damages and the recovery of additional sums within the limitations that the Court might have set."

Courts are divided on whether the burden of proof or standard of evidence for punitive damages ought to be clear and convincing (a higher standard) or preponderance of evidence.[35]

Nominal damages are referred to in the brief excerpt from Justice White's Dun & Bradstreet opinion. They are token damages (one dollar, for example) symbolizing a moral victory rather than compensation for any actual injury to reputation or financial standing. Since Gertz requires a showing of actual injury, nominal damages may not have survived that case. On the other hand, if Dun & Bradstreet does indeed revive some common law libel rules, nominal damages may still be available, especially where actual malice has been demonstrated.

THRESHOLD ELEMENTS OF ACTIONABLE LIBEL: DEFAMATION, IDENTIFICATION, PUBLICATION, FALSITY, AND ACTUAL INJURY

Before we are awash in seemingly disconnected definitions, it is advisable to explore libel in a historical and operational manner. To do this, we will pose a chronology of questions which the reporter or editor must consider in dealing with a libel threat or an actual lawsuit. So we will move from the initial question of defamation to a prayerful consideration of mitigation (a means of lowering damages).

Defamation

No libel action will succeed unless the plaintiff can prove that a publication is defamatory. Falsely attributing a felony to someone is the most dangerous form of defamation. Moral turpitude is not far behind. Other forms of defamation were reviewed briefly at the beginning of the chapter.

35. See Marcone v. Penthouse Int'l, Ltd., 577 F.Supp. 318 (E.D.Pa. 1983), rev'd on other grounds 754 F.2d 1072 (3d Cir. 1985).

Identification

The identification must refer to a specific person. A nickname, a pseudonym, or a connecting circumstance might suffice. One authority explains:

> It is sufficient if he is described by his initial letters, or by the first and last letter of his name, or even by asterisks, or blanks, or if he be referred to under the guise of an allegorical, historical, fictitious or fanciful name, or by means of a description of his physical peculiarities, or by the places which he has visited on his travels. Gatley, Libel and Slander (4th ed. 1953), 113.

Photographs also identify people. So do sketches and cartoons. Context, addresses, unique physical or emotional characteristics may also present an author with surprises. David Anderson gives good advice when he says never use the name of an acquaintance, or even a slight modification of that name, in a fiction piece. A set of behaviors which by their sheer uniqueness identify a particular person can be dangerous in the docudrama or "faction" piece that puts fictional characters into historical events and may tempt a reader or viewer to confuse fact and fantasy.[36] New York courts, however, do hold plaintiffs up to stringent standards of identification in order to protect works of imagination.[37]

A self-designated plaintiff must prove that the defamatory words were understood to be "of and concerning" him.[38] If a defamatory statement could apply to persons other than the plaintiff, a libel action will not be permitted.[39] And, of course, the Gertz case does hold that "innocent" defamations are defensible where public figures and matters of public concern are involved.

Identification can be lost in a crowd. The English common law did not recognize group libel. This tradition was continued in American law, partly because of First Amendment considerations. Recognition of group libel might inject the misplaced power of government into the social dialogue. Group libel bears at least a remote resemblance to seditious libel or punishment for criticism of government. Seditious libel was often rationalized as necessary in keeping the public peace and good order.

How large must a group be to make individual identification possible? The rule of thumb is twenty-five. A prominent person in a group of any size, of course, could stick out like a sore thumb. An instructive case is Neiman-Marcus Co. v. Lait, 13 F.R.D. 311 (D.N.Y. 1952). Two authors charged in a book that store models and saleswomen were call girls and salesmen were predominantly gay.

Nine models, the total number then employed, and 15 of 25 salesmen were allowed to bring suit. But 30 saleswomen, acting on behalf of 382, were not, the latter group being too large for individual identification. The case was settled without trial. None of the plaintiffs received compensation, but attorney fees were paid, and the danger signal had flashed. The court in Neiman-Marcus did lay down the following rules:

(1) Where the group or class libeled is large, none can sue even though the language used is inclusive; (2) when the group or class libeled is small and each and every member of the group is referred to, then any individual member can sue; and (3) where there is disagreement whether some or all of a group has been libeled, at least an action can be attempted.

No one specifically was identified in an article about Washington, D.C.'s "parking lot racket."[40] Or in Time magazine's charge that western officials of a union were conspiring with Seattle gamblers to control Portland's law enforcement agencies.[41] Red Channels' anticommunist blacklist of 151 persons was too many for a radio-television actor to claim identification.[42] An Associated Press story identifying a murder and robbery suspect as a member of the Socialist Workers party did not defame either the party or its chief executive officers, said a New York court.[43] One consequence of the controversial network film, "Death of a Princess," was a libel suit on behalf of "all Muslims." would not permit the suit to proceed in view of the size of the class.[44]

A Boston Globe editorial referred to the Manchester (N.H.) Union Leader as "probably the worst newspaper in America" and charged that its publisher "runs a newspaper by paranoids for paranoids." For lack of identification, a federal district court disallowed suit by 24 of the newspaper's 325 employees and three of the Union Leader's eight editors.[45] Care is recommended, however, when a group is as small as eight. In that case the public quality of the controversy and the fact that its rhetoric fell in the category of opinion undoubtedly influenced the court. Similarly a laetrile distributor failed to gain the sympathy of a federal district court because he was part of too large a group for identification. The court went on to say, "To hold that statements commenting generally on the laetrile controversy are of and concerning individuals prominent in the controversy would chill heated public debate into lukewarm pap. The First Amendment does not countenance such a deterrent of free speech."[46]

Someone other than the plaintiff must reasonably infer from the publication that the defamatory reference is to that person. A single individual may constitute that audience or third party. If a name is not used, the plaintiff must show, by what lawyers call colloquium, that the defamatory reference has hit him or her.

Until recently, most American courts followed the English rule that "To libel the dead is not an offense known to our law: the dead have no rights and can suffer no wrongs."[47] [Emphasis added.]

When the New York Daily Mirror confused the name of a recently deceased person with that of a notorious criminal, the deceased's wife and children, who had been listed in the article, brought an action against the newspaper. See Rose v. Daily Mirror, 31 N.E.2d 182 (N.Y. 1940). New York's highest court said:

> Defendant does not deny that the publication complained of was a libel on the memory of the deceased Jack Rose. Plaintiffs make no claim of any right to recover for that wrong. They stand upon the position that the publication—while it did not affect their reputations in respect of any matter of morals—tended to subject them in their own persons to contumely and indignity and was, therefore, a libel upon them. * * * In this state, however, it has long been accepted law that a libel or slander upon the memory of a deceased person which makes no direct reflection upon his relatives gives them no cause of action for defamation.

In 1957, Helen C. Frick, daughter and sole survivor of Pennsylvania industrialist Henry Clay Frick, brought a libel suit against Dr. Sylvester Stevens, chairman of the Pennsylvania Historical Society and author of a widely acclaimed book, Pennsylvania: Birthplace of a Nation. Ms. Frick complained that the book misrepresented her father as a stern and autocratic union buster who underpaid and overworked his employees, provided them with minimal safety conditions, pressured them to buy overpriced goods at the company store and to live in shoddy wooden shacks without sanitary facilities at inflated rents. Anything tending to blacken the memory of her father, Ms. Frick averred, would tend to lower her in the esteem of the community, for through her philanthropies she had become associated with the memory of her father.

A Pennsylvania county court, embarking upon an historical investigation of its own, found the charges either to be true or nondefamatory. The court implied that Steven's book was a first-rate historical study, and it added:

> First, no substantial right of the plaintiff will be impaired to a material degree. * * * [N]o rights of the plaintiff are involved here, only the rights of her deceased father, if any. Her name is not mentioned and her reputation is not involved, so that no right of reputation or privacy of hers is involved.
>
> Second, the remedy at law is not inadequate; there has been no wrong done by defendant and plaintiff has suffered no injury so there is nothing to redress in this case. There being no injury, there is no remedy at law or in equity.
>
>
> Next, the exercise of previous restraint in a case of this type would impose an impossible burden on the court. It is true the courts are open to redress wrongs, but it would be impossible to exercise previous restraint over the voluminous publications now on the market.

> If everyone read a book as plaintiff read this one, by looking into the index for an ancestor's name, and on cursory examination started action to enjoin or correct the book, our bookshelves would either be empty or contain books written only by relatives of the subject. Frick v. Stevens, 43 D. & C.2d 6 (Pa. 1964).

New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and a number of other states, either by statute or case law, now recognize libel of the dead. See Canino v. New York News, Inc., 475 A.2d 528 (N.J. 1984) and Moyer v. Phillips, 341 A.2d 441 (Pa. 1975). The situation in New York is unclear. Bills recognizing libel of the dead were introduced in both 1986 and 1987 sessions of the New York State Legislature. At the same time, New York's Estates Powers and Trust Laws (E.P.T.L. 11-3.2(a), McKinney 1967 & Cum. Supp. 1984–1985) stating "Action in libel and slander does not abate upon death of the plaintiff, except insofar as punitive damages are sought," was interpreted to extend the right of the deceased in Moore v. Washington, 311 N.Y.S.2d 310 (1970).

Statutes that can be interpreted as extending the right are Michigan (Comp. Laws Ann. § 6000.2921, West Cum. Supp. 1984–1985), Pennsylvania (20 Pa. Const. Stat. Ann. § 3371, Purdon Cum. Supp. 1984–1985), and Wisconsin (Wis. Stat. Ann. § 895.01, West 1983). See also statutes in Alaska, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Iowa, Maine, Mississippi, Montana, Oregon, South Dakota, Texas, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, and Washington.

Publication

Publication—throwing a defamation to the four winds—is where the real damage to a plaintiff occurs. Print media because of their permanence, radio and television because of their reach and impact can convey libels with devastating effect.

For there to be a libel, or a slander, there must be publication to a third person. The third person may be anyone, including a member of the plaintiff's family, although publication to one's spouse, attorney, physician, or priest is generally insufficient, since these are frequently privileged relationships.

In Avery Corp. v. Peterson, 178 F.Supp. 132 (D.C.Pa. 1959), dictation of a defamatory letter to a corporation secretary by an officer of the firm was ruled a publication.

Printing, posting, circulating, or disseminating is the first step in publication. Someone reading, viewing, or hearing a message is the second. Early cases speak of publication to a "considerable and respectable class in the community" who may think badly of an identifiable person after publication.[48]

Some states, including California, Illinois, and Pennsylvania, either by case law or by adoption of the Uniform Single Publication Act (13 U.L.A. 517), subscribe to what is called the single publication rule: an entire edition of a newspaper is treated as a single publication, rather than every single copy constituting a distinct publication and therefore a separate basis for a libel suit. In other words, the initial publication is one libel, one offense, one cause of action regardless of how many persons read it or how often they read it. The number of readers neither increases the magnitude of the libel nor allows for multiple causes of action, although a plaintiff is permitted to plead and prove extent of circulation as evidence bearing on damages.[49]

The Supreme Court of Georgia said in 1964: "To allow a suit for damages each time a different person sees the newspaper would unreasonably shackle the press and might quickly bankrupt it, thus doing great harm to both the publisher and the readers."[50]

In spite of California's Uniform Single Publication Act, a new libel action based on the paperback edition of a book was permitted, even though identical passages in the original hardcover edition had already been litigated.[51]

50. Ibid., p. 398. See also Waskow v. Associated Press, 462 F.2d 1173 (D.C.Cir. 1972). Waskow, a "public figure" under the New York Times v. Sullivan doctrine, had argued that "back issues" of the Washington Star were sold subsequent to the date of the appearance of the original item in the Star libeling him and that as a result the libel was "republished" under the New York Times malice test. In view of the deadline under which metropolitan newspapers operate and the predetermined distribution system that they use once an edition is printed, the court rejected the libel plaintiff's republication theory: "[F]or purposes of the Times rule, a daily newspaper is 'published' once only—when it is printed and placed in the distribution system—unless it is redistributed outside the normal channels with the specific intent to convey the libelous information."

51. Kanarek v. Bugliosi, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1864, 166 Cal.Rptr. 526 (1980).

In cases of multistate circulation of newspapers or magazines, the single publication rule dictates that a cause of action for libel be absolutely complete at the time of first publication. Later circulation is relevant only in computing damages.[52] The rule obviously protects a publisher from the perpetual harassment of multiple and never-ending libel actions.[53]

A suit may be brought in the place where the defendant resides or does business, and this is frequently the point of publication; or in the place of largest circulation of the offending publication; or where the greatest harm was done the plaintiff—generally the plaintiff's place of residence. What lawyers call long-arm statutes can be applied to publishers of national newspapers without violating due process. So the Los Angeles Times and other news media could be sued in Wyoming for a story on organized crime that was researched in Wyoming by three Times reporters and had its major impact there. Anselmi v. Denver Post, Inc., 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1530, 552 F.2d 316 (10th Cir. 1977).

Generally, however, a newspaper published in a distant place must have sufficient business and professional impact or activity where the alleged libel has occurred to trigger a long-arm statute.

"[T]o sustain jurisdiction over a nonresident newspaper," said a court of appeals in 1964, "plaintiff must show more than 'mere circulation of a periodical through the mail to subscribers * * * and sporadic news gathering by reporters.' " Buckley v. New York Times Co., 338 F.2d 470, 474 (5th Cir. 1964).

In dismissing a libel suit for want of jurisdiction, a United States district court in Texas concluded that twenty-eight daily copies of the Detroit Free Press (.0044 percent of the paper's total daily circulation) were insufficient to constitute the minimum contacts necessary to sustain jurisdiction under the due process clause. Kersh v. Angelosante, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1282 (N.D.Tex. 1982).

Where the single publication rule is in effect, the libel suit may have to be brought in the place where the libel was published or where publication first occurred. Several courts have refused to let the single publication rule cross state lines and have allowed a separate cause of action in each state where publication took place. A Pennsylvania rule recognized one aggregate cause of action for all single publication states plus additional causes of action for libels committed in multiple publication states. Hartmann v. Time, Inc., 166 F.2d 127 (3d Cir. 1948) cert. den., 334 U.S. 838 (1948).

As has been noted, the second step in publication is taken when the libel effectively reaches those readers, listeners, viewers for whom publication is intended. In Zuck v. Interstate Publishing Corp., 317 F.2d 727 (2d Cir. 1963), it was decided that mere delivery of bundles of a periodical designed as an insert for a newspaper to a carrier or distributor did not constitute publication. There was no publication until the newspaper went on sale or began to circulate to the great mass of its subscribers. In such cases, the third party to publication is defined as the bulk of readers rather than a small or atypical segment of them. Osmers v. Parade Publications, Inc., 234 F.Supp 924 (S.D.N.Y. 1964); Fleury v. Harper & Row, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1795 (D.Cal. 1981).

On the other hand, a number of courts have held that publication is effected when the libelous matter is delivered to common carriers for distribution. See Konigsberg v. Long Island Daily Press Publishing Co., 293 N.Y.S.2d 861 (1968); Novel v. Garrison, 294 F.Supp. 825 (D.Ill. 1969). Most states by statute protect retailers of newspapers against libel suits. The extent to which a cablecaster is a mere conduit and thereby not liable for defamation is not yet clear. Whatever the rule, there is no necessity to prove that any part of the content of a publication has been read. See Hornby v. Hunter, 385 S.W.2d 473 (Tex.Civ.App. 1964).

Publication may occur when a reporter says something defamatory about a third person while gathering news. This might happen when pushing a reluctant news source for information. Davis v. Schuchat, 510 F.2d 731, 732 (D.C.Cir. 1975). The disastrous Alton, Illinois case, you will recall, involved a memo sent by reporters to the Justice Department and containing information not quite solid enough for publication in the newspaper. The reporters thought they were acting as good citizens. As it turned out, no one at the Justice Department ever saw the memo. A summary, however, was sent to and read by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board. Since the plaintiff was a developer who would depend on bank loans and since there had been intimations in the memo of connections with organized crime, both agencies were salient to his interests. The result was a damage claim for $9.2 million. Green v. Alton Telegraph Printing Co., 438 N.E.2d 203 (1982).

Everyone who takes a conscious part in a publication is theoretically liable for damages. Usually the corporation—the party capable of paying hefty damages—is named defendant. A news source who generates a libel and authorizes its publication may also be liable.[54] Innocent coworkers such as carrier boys, vendors, broadcast engineers are generally not liable.[55] Reporters are often named as defendants by angry plaintiffs.

Plaintiffs in a minority of states—including New York and California where a high proportion of publishing takes place—must show actual malice on the part of executives higher up for punitive damages.[56] For example, in Dresbach v. Doubleday Co., 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2105, 518 F.Supp. 1285 (D.D.C. 1981), a United States district court held that a book publisher is not responsible for the independent verification of everything a reputable author writes. In most states, however, higher-ups are responsible for libel committed by permanent or free-lance employees. This proposition is known as the complicity rule.

Under the complicity rule, editors or publishers could deny knowing what their reporters were doing; but this is hardly the mark of a responsible newspaper and could redound to the disadvantage of defendant when a court or jury considers the question of fault. Conversely, in New York or California, a plaintiff might argue that a reporter is operating at a managerial level with a full mandate from a publisher. In the Alton, Illinois case, plaintiff could not show that the publisher knew of the defamatory memo sent by Telegraph reporters to a federal prosecutor, and, as it turned out, he didn't have to.

Every purposive or authorized repetition of a defamation—picking up a libel from another publication, a new edition of a book, a rebroadcast—is a new and separate publication. The rule appears to be that the original publisher will be held responsible for the republication if it could reasonably have been anticipated. There is no liability, however, if a libelous article or statement is reprinted or rebroadcast without the original author's consent.[57] The original author is not responsible for accidental or unintentional publication or publication in a distorted form.[58] Libraries, booksellers, and newspaper and magazine vendors, as has been noted, are protected against liability for republication. They can't read everything they handle, and, as we shall see, there can be "no liability without fault."

Identifying a source but leaving room for disbelief by an attribution such as "it is alleged" is no defense, although it might mitigate damages.[59]

A physician, a drugstore manager, and a restaurant owner won libel awards when a radio station, which invited the public to call in on an "open-mike" program and used no delay device to edit out defamatory statements, implied the illicit sale and distribution of narcotics. The station was liable, said the court, even though it had no actual knowledge of the falsity of the statements made by an unidentified caller. Liability, however, did not include the unsuspecting sponsor of the program.[60]

Similarly, in Demman v. Star Broadcasting Co., 497 P.2d 1378 (Utah 1972), a delay device did not immunize a broadcaster from fault.

Letters to the editor may be the print media equivalent of the open-mike program, although there will be much more time for editing. Nevertheless, letters should be handled with care.

"Libel law invokes the fiction," says Robert Sack, "that a republisher of defamatory charges adopts them for himself and is therefore legally responsible for their accuracy and the harm that they may cause."[61] He suggests that the partial defense of neutral reportage (see p. 267) may be a remedy, but that is by no means assured.

Remember that the offense is in the publication, in spreading the defamatory falsehood, whatever its form: the community press, the neighborhood press, the scholastic press, the alternative press, the religious press, the newsletter press, the leaflet press. Weakness does not immunize a publication from the libel laws. All are the equal of the New York Times in feeling the sting of the law.

On February 24, 1980, the Minneapolis Tribune carried a UPI story from Baltimore reporting that a superior court jury there had ordered Bernard Gladsky to pay his sister $2,000 in damages for an inscription he had carved on their father's tombstone:

"Stanley J. Gladsky, 1895–1977, abused, robbed and starved by his beloved daughter."

The sister, Gloria Kovatch, had asked for $500,000. Gladsky said the inscription was a joke. Some joke! And some publication: written in stone! Tombstone carver Kirby L. Smith also agreed to pay Kovatch $3,000 as part of the settlement. He was liable because he took part in the publication.

Falsity

To the singular advantage of the media, the New York Times construct requires the libel plaintiff to prove a negative: that the defamatory publication as it applies to a particular person is false. New York Times was extended to "speech of public concern" in the case of a "private-figure plaintiff" when a Pennsylvania law placed the burden of proof of falsity on the defendant. The Pennsylvania statute was struck down by the United States Supreme Court in Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps, 475 U.S. 767 (1986). Whether such a statute would be valid when the speech was not of public concern and there was a private figure plaintiff was not passed on by the Court in Hepps.

Where a newspaper publishes speech of public concern about either a private or public person, said the Court, that person cannot recover damages without showing that the statement at issue was false. Difficult though it may be to separate truth from falsehood in specific cases, the Constitution requires the scales to be tipped in favor of "true" speech. To ensure that true speech on matters of public concern is not deterred, the Court added, the common law presumption that defamatory speech is false would not stand. Hepps, a beer distributor, was alleged to have connections with organized crime.

The relevant language of the Court follows.

PHILADELPHIA NEWSPAPERS v. HEPPS

106 S.CT. 1558, 12 MED.L.RPTR. 1977 (1986).

Justice O'CONNOR delivered the Opinion of the Court.

Our opinions to date have chiefly treated the necessary showings of fault rather than of falsity. Nonetheless, as one might expect, given the language of the Court in New York Times, a public-figure plaintiff must show the falsity of the statements at issue in order to prevail on a suit for defamation. See Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64, 74 (1 Med.L.Rptr. 1548) (1964) (reading New York Times for the proposition that "a public official [is] allowed the civil [defamation] remedy only if he establishes that the utterance was false"). See also Herbert v. Lando, 441 U.S. 153, 176 (1979) ("the plaintiff must focus on the editorial process and prove a false publication attended by some degree of culpability").

Here, as in Gertz, the plaintiff is a private figure and the newspaper articles are of public concern. In Gertz, as in New York Times, the common-law rule was superseded by a constitutional rule. We believe that the common law's rule on falsity—that the defendant must bear the burden of proving truth—must similarly fall here to a constitutional requirement that the plaintiff bear the burden of showing falsity, as well as fault, before recovering damages.

There will always be instances when the factfinding process will be unable to resolve conclusively whether the speech is true or false; it is in those cases that the burden of proof is dispositive. Under a rule forcing the plaintiff to bear the burden of showing falsity, there will be some cases in which plaintiffs cannot meet their burden despite the fact that the speech is in fact false. The plaintiff's suit will fail despite the fact that, in some abstract sense, the suit is meritorious. Similarly, under an alternative rule placing the burden of showing truth on defendants, there would be some cases in which defendants could not bear their burden despite the fact that the speech is in fact true. Those suits would succeed despite the fact that, in some abstract sense, those suits are unmeritorious. Under either rule, then, the outcome of the suit will sometimes be at variance with the outcome that we would desire if all speech were either demonstrably true or demonstrably false.

61. Sack, Libel, Slander and Related Problems (1980), 146.

This dilemma stems from the fact that the allocation of the burden of proof will determine liability for some speech that is true and some that is false, but all of such speech is unknowably true or false. Because the burden of proof is the deciding factor only when the evidence is ambiguous, we cannot know how much of the speech affected by the allocation of the burden of proof is true and how much is false. In a case presenting a configuration of speech and plaintiff like the one we face here, and where the scales are in such an uncertain balance, we believe that the Constitution requires us to tip them in favor of protecting true speech. To ensure that true speech on matters of public concern is not deterred, we hold that the common-law presumption that defamatory speech is false cannot stand when a plaintiff seeks damages against a media defendant for speech of public concern.

In the context of governmental restriction of speech, it has long been established that the government cannot limit speech protected by the First Amendment without bearing the burden of showing that its restriction is justified. See Consolidated Edison Co. v. Public Service Comm'n of N.Y., 447 U.S. 530, 540, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1518 (1980) (content-based restriction); First National Bank v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 786, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 2105 (1978) (speaker-based restriction); Renton v. Playtime Theaters, Inc., 475 U.S. 41, 12 Med.L.Rptr. 1721 (1986) (secondary-effects restriction). See also Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513 (1958) (striking down the precondition that a taxpayer sign a loyalty oath before receiving certain tax benefits). It is not immediately apparent from the text of the First Amendment, which by its terms applies only to governmental action, that a similar result should obtain here: a suit by a private party is obviously quite different from the government's direct enforcement of its own laws. Nonetheless, the need to encourage debate on public issues that concerned the Court in the governmental-restriction cases is of concern in a similar manner in this case involving a private suit for damages: placement by state law of the burden of proving truth upon media defendants who publish speech because of the fear that liability will unjustifiably result. See New York Times, 376 U.S. 279; Garrison, supra, at 74 ("Truth may not be the subject of either civil or criminal sanctions where discussion of public affairs is concerned"). Because such a "chilling" effect would be antithetical to the First Amendment's protection of true speech on matters of public concern, we believe that a private-figure plaintiff must bear the burden of showing that the speech at issue is false before recovering damages for defamation from a media defendant. To do otherwise could "only result in a deterrence of speech which the Constitution makes free." Speiser, supra, at 526.

We recognize that requiring the plaintiff to show falsity will insulate from liability some speech that is false, but unprovably so. Nonetheless, the Court's previous decisions on the restrictions that the First Amendment places upon the common law of defamation firmly support our conclusion here with respect to the allocation of the burden of proof. In attempting to resolve related issues in the defamation context, the Court has affirmed that "[t]he First Amendment requires we protect some falsehood in order to protect speech that matters." Gertz, 418 U.S. 341. Here the speech concerns the legitimacy of the political process, and therefore clearly "matters." See Dun & Bradstreet, 472 U.S., at ___ (speech of public concern is at the core of the First Amendment's protections). To provide " 'breathing space,' " New York Times, supra, at 272 (quoting NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 433 (1963)), for true speech on matters of public concern, the Court has been willing to insulate even demonstrably false speech from liability, and has imposed additional requirements of fault upon the plaintiff in a suit for defamation. See, e.g., Garrison, 379 U.S. 75; Gertz, supra, at 347. We therefore do not break new ground here in insulating speech that is not even demonstrably false.

We note that our decision adds only marginally to the burdens that the plaintiff must already bear as a result of our earlier decisions in the law of defamation. The plaintiff must show fault. A jury is obviously more likely to accept a plaintiff's contention that the defendant was at fault in publishing the statements at issue if convinced that the relevant statements were false. As a practical matter, then, evidence offered by plaintiffs on the publisher's fault in adequately investigating the truth of the published statements will generally encompass evidence of the falsity of the matters asserted. See Keeton, Defamation and Freedom of the Press, 54 Texas.L.Rev. 1221, 1236 (1976). See also Franklin & Bussel, The Plaintiff's Burden in Defamation: Awareness and Falsity, 25 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 825, 856–857 (1984).

We recognize that the plaintiff's burden in this case is weightier because of Pennsylvania's "shield" law, which allows employees of the media to refuse to divulge their sources. But we do not have before us here the question of the permissible reach of such laws. Indeed, we do not even know the precise reach of Pennsylvania's statute. The trial judge refused to give any instructions to the jury as to whether it could, or should, draw an inference adverse to the defendant from the defendant's decision to use the shield law rather than to present affirmative evidence of the truthfulness of some of the sources. That decision of the trial judge was not addressed by Pennsylvania's highest court, nor was it appealed to this Court. In the situation before us, we are unconvinced that the State's shield law requires a different constitutional standard than would prevail in the absence of such a law.

For the reasons stated above, the judgment of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

COMMENT

Hepps requires falsity to be established by clear and convincing evidence where the plaintiff is a public person. The lesser standard of a fair preponderance of evidence may be sufficient for private plaintiffs.[62]

In the common law of libel, as will be seen, the burden of proof of truth (an absence of falsity) was squarely on the defendant, contrary to the rule of other negligence torts. That peculiar exception has been overcome.

Is it a desire to proclaim "truth" that really motivates libel plaintiffs? Should courts be in the business of divining truth? Perhaps they should where simple facts are concerned but not where opinion, belief, or ideology is entangled.

And can a plaintiff ever satisfactorily prove a negative—the judge, for example, who is accused of being "probably corrupt."[63] Some commentators believe that courts should assess fault only and leave questions of truth or falsity to the gods.

Actual Injury

As noted in the section on damages, the United States Supreme Court in the significant Gertz case elected not to define actual injury, leaving that task to the state courts. "Suffice it to say," said the Court, "that actual injury is not limited to out-of-pocket loss [so by inference it could mean money loss]. Indeed, the more customary types of actual harm inflicted by defamatory falsehood include impairment of reputation and standing in the community, personal humiliation, and mental anguish and suffering."

That statement by the Court has by no means foreclosed debate on what kinds of injury ought to be compensated. David Anderson argues that only actual harm to reputation ought to be compensated. There would be no presumption of harm. Compensation for mental anguish might follow proof of harm to reputation as, what lawyers call, a parasitical award. Gertz, he says, permitted mental anguish to support a claim of actual injury, and the Court in the Firestone case (see p. 215) certified it. If Anderson had his choice, Mrs. Firestone would have lost her case because she waived her claim to loss of reputation.[64]

Actual injury might also take the form of job loss or loss of the companionship of spouse, as would be the case in most of the rest of tort law. A showing of mental anguish might follow. But William Van Alstyne disagrees. He would not equate libel with other torts since the First Amendment provides special protection to the press: government involvement is not permitted in libel as it is in other forms of negligence.[65]

There is something circular about these arguments. Mental anguish or distress would seem to be integral to an attack on reputation and perhaps should benefit from all the rules of libel. Most plaintiffs claim emotional suffering rather than financial loss, concluded the Iowa Libel Research Project. Plaintiffs seek, not money damages, but restoration of their reputations, and they talk to offending editors before calling their lawyers.

Some courts have held that public figures cannot sue for punitive damages unless there is a showing of actual injury to reputation.[66] Clearly states will define actual injury for themselves.

Although we have examined the five prerequisites to an actionable libel suit—defamation, identification, publication, falsity, and actual injury—we are not yet close to the heart of libel law. A new age of libel began with the New York Times case in 1964. How did we get there, and where has it taken us?

COMMON LAW LIBEL AND THE ORIGINS OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL DEFENSE

Strict Liability

Under the common law rule of strict liability, libel per se was defined as defamatory words published in reference to a plaintiff with obvious and substantial damage to reputation. Falsity as to fact, lack of justification as to opinion, malice on the part of the publisher, and injury to the plaintiff were all presumed. Plaintiff having met the then three threshold elements of actionable libel, defamation, identification, and publication, the burden of proof shifted to the defendant to present an affirmative defense of truth, privilege, or fair comment and criticism. Since these three common law defenses are still available to defendants, they will be discussed in more detail in later sections.

The problem with the rule of strict liability was that it took no account of a publisher's intent, degree of negligence, or level of professionalism, nor did it consider the extent of injury suffered by plaintiff. Indeed a publisher could be liable even where there was no apparent fault on his or her part. The rule begged timidity and self-censorship, although there is little evidence that such occurred.

Constitutionalizing the Law of Libel

Influenced by Alexander Meiklejohn's thesis that speech in the public realm is crucial to self-government and therefore warrants near absolute protection, Justice William Brennan in his 1964 opinion for the Court in New York Times v. Sullivan made libel of public officials a constitutional matter. But for the qualification of actual malice, Brennan would have reached the Meiklejohnian summit of protection for public speech.[67]

The New York Times case rose out of the turmoil of the Black Revolution. On March 29, 1960, a full-page editorial advertisement appeared in the New York Times under the headline, "Heed Their Rising Voices." The ad copy began by stating that the nonviolent civil rights movement in the South was being met by a wave of terror. The ad concluded with an appeal for funds in support of the student movement, voting rights, and the legal defense of Martin Luther King, Jr. In addition to the signatures of sixty-four prominent Americans, sixteen southern clergymen were purported to have signed the ad. Segments of two paragraphs of the text became the focal points of subsequent litigation:

> In Montgomery, Alabama, after students sang "My Country 'Tis of Thee" on the State Capitol steps, their leaders were expelled from school, and truckloads of police armed with shotguns and tear-gas ringed the Alabama State College Campus. When the entire student body protested to state authorities by refusing to re-register, their dining hall was padlocked in an attempt to starve them into submission. * * *
> Again and again the Southern violators have answered Dr. King's peaceful protests with intimidation > and violence. They have bombed his home almost killing his wife and child. They have assaulted his person. They have arrested him seven times—for "speeding," "loitering" and similar "offenses." And now they have charged him with "perjury"—a felony under which they could imprison him for ten years. * * *

L. B. Sullivan, one of three elected commissioners of Montgomery, brought a civil libel action against four black Alabama clergymen, whose names had appeared in the ad, and the Times. In accordance with Alabama law, Sullivan, before bringing action, demanded in writing a public retraction from the clergymen and the newspaper. The clergymen did not respond on the grounds that use of their names was unauthorized. The Times did not publish a retraction but wrote Sullivan asking how the statements in the ad reflected on him. The commissioner filed suit without answering the query.

Although not mentioned by name, Sullivan contended that he represented the "police" referred to in the ad; therefore he was being accused of ringing the campus with police and starving the students into submission. He also claimed that the term "Southern violators" was meant to apply to him; therefore he was being accused of "intimidation and violence," bombing Dr. King's home, assaulting his person, and charging the civil rights leader with perjury. Witnesses testified that they identified the commissioner in the ad.

With the elements of libel thus established, Sullivan proceeded to show that most of the charges could not in fact have applied to him because they referred to incidents which had occurred before his election. Moreover, there were serious inaccuracies in the ad, creating a presumption of general damages under Alabama law.

In its defense, the Times pointed out that the ad had come to it from a New York advertising agency representing the signatory committee. A letter from A. Philip Randolph accompanied the ad and certified that the persons whose names appeared in it had given their permission. It was not considered necessary to confirm the accuracy of the ad by the manager of the Advertising Acceptability Department or anyone else at the Times. Nor were there any doubts about the authorization of the ad by the individual southern clergymen (they were later absolved of any responsibility because they were unaware of the ad).

The Times could not see how any of the language of the ad referred to Sullivan.

The trial judge submitted the case to the jury under instructions that the statements in the ad were libelous per se and without privilege. He also left the door open for punitive damages by an imprecise definition of what was required to support them.

The Circuit Court awarded $500,000 to Sullivan. The Supreme Court of Alabama affirmed, and the Times appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

At the heart of the brief submitted to the Court on behalf of Sullivan was the argument that "the Constitution has never required that states afford newspapers the privilege of leveling false and defamatory 'facts' at persons simply because they hold public office. The great weight of American authority has rejected such a plea by newspapers." See Brief for the Respondent, 376 United States Supreme Court Records and Briefs 254–314 (Vol. 12), p. 23.

The argument for the Times was more provocative and, as it turned out, more persuasive. In part it stated:

> Under the doctrine of libel per se applied below a public official is entitled to recover "presumed" and punitive damages for a publication found to be critical of the official conduct of a governmental agency under his general supervision if a jury thinks the publication "tends" to "injure" him "in his reputation" to "bring" him "into public contempt" as an official. The publisher has no defense unless he can persuade the jury that the publication is entirely true in all its factual, material particulars. The doctrine not only dispenses with proof of injury by the complaining official, but presumes malice and falsity as well. Such a rule of liability works an abridgement of the freedom of the press. Brief for the Petitioner, 376 United States Supreme Court Records and Briefs 254–314 (Vol. 12), pp. 28–29.

Attorneys for the Times had deftly raised the specter of seditious libel, and the Court responded.

NEW YORK TIMES CO. v. SULLIVAN

376 U.S. 254, 84 S.CT. 710, 11 L.ED.2D 686 (1964).

Justice BRENNAN delivered the Opinion of the Court: * * *

Because of the importance of the constitutional issues involved, we granted the separate petitions for certiorari of the individual petitioners and of the Times. * * * We reverse the judgment. We hold that the rule of law applied by the Alabama courts is constitutionally deficient for failure to provide the safeguards for freedom of speech and of the press that are required by the First and Fourteenth Amendments in a libel action brought by a public official against critics of his official conduct. We further hold that under the proper safeguards the evidence presented in this case is constitutionally insufficient to support the judgment for respondent.

We may dispose at the outset of two grounds asserted to insulate the judgment of the Alabama courts from constitutional scrutiny. The first is the proposition relied on by the State Supreme Court—that "The Fourteenth Amendment is directed against State action and not private action." That proposition has no application to this case. Although this is a civil lawsuit between private parties, the Alabama courts have applied a state rule of law which petitioners claim to impose invalid restrictions on their constitutional freedoms of speech and press. * * *

The second contention is that the constitutional guarantees of freedom of speech and of the press are inapplicable here, at least so far as the Times is concerned, because the allegedly libelous statements were published as part of a paid, "commercial" advertisement. The argument relies on Valentine v. Chrestensen, 316 U.S. 52 (1942), where the Court held that a city ordinance forbidding street distribution of commercial and business advertising matter did not abridge the First Amendment freedoms, even as applied to a handbill having a commercial message on one side but a protest against certain official action on the other. The reliance is wholly misplaced. The Court in Chrestensen reaffirmed the constitutional protection for "the freedom of communicating information and disseminating opinion"; its holding was based upon the factual conclusions that the handbill was "purely commercial advertising" and that the protest against official action had been added only to evade the ordinance.

The publication here was not a "commercial" advertisement in the sense in which the word was used in Chrestensen. It communicated information, expressed opinion, recited grievances, protested claimed abuses, and sought financial support on behalf of a movement whose existence and objectives are matters of the highest public interest and concern. That the Times was paid for publishing the advertisement is as immaterial in this connection as is the fact that newspapers and books are sold. Any other conclusion would discourage newspapers from carrying "editorial advertisements" of this type, and so might shut off an important outlet for the promulgation of information and ideas by persons who do not themselves have access to publishing facilities—who wish to exercise their freedom of speech even though they are not members of the press. The effect would be to shackle the First Amendment in its attempt to secure "the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources." To avoid placing such a handicap upon the freedoms of expression, we hold that if the allegedly libelous statements would otherwise be constitutionally protected from the present judgment, they do not forfeit that protection because they were published in the form of a paid advertisement.

Under Alabama law as applied in this case, a publication is "libelous per se" if the words "tend to injure a person * * * in his reputation" or to "bring [him] into public contempt"; the trial court stated that the standard was met if the words are such as to "injure him in his public office, or impute misconduct to him in his office, or want of official integrity, or want of fidelity to a public trust * * *." The jury must find that the words were published "of and concerning" the plaintiff, but where the plaintiff is a public official his place in the governmental hierarchy is sufficient evidence to support a finding that his reputation has been affected by statements that reflect upon the agency of which he is in charge. Once "libel per se" has been established, the defendant has no defense as to stated facts unless he can persuade the jury that they were true in all their particulars. * * * His privilege of "fair comment" for expressions of opinion depends on the truth of the facts upon which the comment is based. * * * Unless he can discharge the burden of proving truth, general damages are presumed, and may be awarded without proof of pecuniary injury. A showing of actual malice is apparently a prerequisite to recovery of punitive damages, and the defendant may in any event forestall a punitive award by a retraction meeting the statutory requirements. Good motives and belief in truth do not negate an inference of malice, but are relevant only in mitigation of punitive damages if the jury chooses to accord them weight. * * *

The general proposition that freedom of expression upon public questions is secured by the First Amendment has long been settled by our decisions.

The constitutional safeguard, we have said, "was fashioned to assure unfettered interchange of ideas for the bringing about of political and social changes desired by the people." "The maintenance of the opportunity for free political discussion to the end that government may be responsive to the will of the people and that changes may be obtained by lawful means, an opportunity essential to the security of the Republic, is a fundamental principle of our constitutional system." "[I]t is a prized American privilege to speak one's mind, although not always with perfect good taste, on all public institutions," and this opportunity is to be afforded for "vigorous advocacy" no less than "abstract discussion." * * * The First Amendment, said Judge Learned Hand, "presupposes that right conclusions are more likely to be gathered out of a multitude of tongues, than through any kind of authoritative selection. To many this is, and always will be, folly; but we have staked upon it our all." United States v. Associated Press, 52 F.Supp. 362, 372 (S.D.N.Y. 1943).

Thus we consider this case against the background of a profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open, and that it may well include vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials. [Emphasis added.] The present advertisement, as an expression of grievance and protest on one of the major public issues of our time, would seem clearly to qualify for the constitutional protection. The question is whether it forfeits that protection by the falsity of some of its factual statements and by its alleged defamation of respondent.

Authoritative interpretations of the First Amendment guarantees have consistently refused to recognize an exception for any test of truth—whether administered by judges, juries, or administrative officials—and especially one that puts the burden of proving truth on the speaker. * * *

[E]rroneous statement is inevitable in free debate, and * * * it must be protected if the freedoms of expression are to have the "breathing space" that they "need * * * to survive." * * *

Just as factual error affords no warrant for repressing speech that would otherwise be free, the same is true of injury to official reputation. Where judicial officers are involved, this Court has held that concern for the dignity and reputation of the courts does not justify the punishment as criminal contempt of criticism of the judge of his decision. This is true even though the utterance contains "half-truths" and "misinformation." Such repression can be justified, if at all, only by a clear and present danger of the obstruction of justice. If judges are to be treated as "men of fortitude, able to thrive in a hardy climate," surely the same must be true of other government officials, such as elected city commissioners. Criticism of their official conduct does not lose its constitutional protection merely because it is effective criticism and hence diminishes their official reputations.

If neither factual error nor defamatory content suffices to remove the constitutional shield from criticism of official conduct, the combination of the two elements is no less inadequate. This is the lesson to be drawn from the great controversy over the Sedition Act of 1798, 1 Stat. 596, which first crystallized in national awareness of the central meaning of the First Amendment. See Levy, Legacy of Suppression (1960), at 258 et seq. * * * That statute made it a crime, punishable by a $5,000 fine and five years in prison, "if any person shall write, print, utter or publish * * * any false, scandalous and malicious writing or writings against the government of the United States, or either house of the Congress * * * or the President * * * with intent to defame * * * or to bring them * * * into contempt or disrepute; or to excite against them, or either or any of them, the hatred of the good people of the United States." The Act allowed the defendant the defense of truth, and provided that the jury were to be judges both of the law and the facts. Despite these qualifications, the Act was vigorously condemned as unconstitutional in an attack joined in by Jefferson and Madison. * * * Although the Sedition Act was never tested in this Court, the attack upon its validity has carried the day in the court of history. Fines levied in its prosecution were repaid by Act of Congress on the ground that it was unconstitutional. * * *

What a State may not constitutionally bring about by means of a criminal statute is likewise beyond the reach of its civil law of libel. The fear of damage awards under a rule such as that invoked by the Alabama courts here may be markedly more inhibiting than the fear of prosecution under a criminal statute. * * * Alabama, for example, has a criminal libel law which subjects to prosecution "any person who speaks, writes, or prints of and concerning another any accusation falsely and maliciously importing the commission by such person of a felony, or any other indictable offense involving moral turpitude," and which allows as punishment upon conviction a fine not exceeding $500 and a prison sentence of six months. * * * Presumably a person charged with violation of this statute enjoys ordinary criminal-law safeguards such as the requirements of an indictment and of proof beyond a reasonable doubt. These safeguards are not available to the defendant in a civil action. The judgment awarded in this case—without the need for any proof of actual pecuniary loss—was one thousand times greater than the maximum fine provided by the Alabama criminal statute, and one hundred times greater than that provided by the Sedition Act. And since there is no double-jeopardy limitation applicable to civil lawsuits, this is not the only judgment that may be awarded against petitioners for the same publication.[18] Whether or not a newspaper can survive a succession of such judgments, the pall of fear and timidity imposed upon those who would give voice to public criticism is an atmosphere in which the First Amendment freedoms cannot survive. * * *

The state rule of law is not saved by its allowance of the defense of truth. A defense for erroneous statements honestly made is no less essential here than was the requirement of proof of guilty knowledge which, in Smith v. California, we held indispensable to a valid conviction of a bookseller for possessing obscene writings for sale. * * * A rule compelling the critic of official conduct to guarantee the truth of all his factual assertions—and to do so on pain of libel judgments virtually unlimited in amount—leads to a comparable "self-censorship." Allowance of the defense of truth, with the burden of proving it on the defendant, does not mean that only false speech will be deterred. Even courts accepting this defense as an adequate safeguard have recognized the difficulties of adducing legal proofs that the alleged libel was true in all its factual particulars. * * * Under such a rule, would-be critics of official conduct may be deterred from voicing their criticism, even though it is believed to be true and even though it is in fact true, because of doubt whether it can be proved in court or fear of the expense of having to do so. They tend to make only statements which "steer far wider of the unlawful zone." * * * The rule thus dampens the vigor and limits the variety of public debate. It is inconsistent with the First and Fourteenth Amendments.

The constitutional guarantees require, we think, a federal rule that prohibits a public official from recovering damages for a defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless he proves that the statement was made with "actual malice"—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not. [Emphasis added.]

Such a privilege for criticism of official conduct is appropriately analogous to the protection accorded a public official when he is sued for libel by a private citizen. In Barr v. Matteo, 360 U.S. 564, 575 (1959), this Court held the utterance of a federal official to be absolutely privileged if made "within the outer perimeter" of his duties. [Emphasis added.] The States accord the same immunity to statements of their highest officers, although some differentiate their lesser officials and qualify the privilege they enjoy. But all hold that all officials are protected unless actual malice can be proved. The reason for the official privilege is said to be that the threat of damage suits would otherwise "inhibit the fearless, vigorous, and effective administration of policies of government" and "dampen the ardor of all but the most resolute, or the most irresponsible, in the unflinching discharge of their duties." Barr v. Matteo. Analogous considerations support the privilege for citizen-critic of government. It is as much his duty to criticize as it is the official's duty to administer. As Madison said, "the censorial power is in the people over the Government, and not in the Government over the people." It would give public servants an unjustified preference over the public they serve, if critics of official conduct did not have a fair equivalent of the immunity granted to the officials themselves.

We conclude that such a privilege is required by the First and Fourteenth Amendments.

We hold today that the Constitution delimits a State's power to award damages for libel in actions brought by public officials against critics of their official conduct. Since this is such an action, the rule requiring proof of actual malice is applicable. While Alabama law apparently requires proof of actual malice for an award of punitive damages, where general damages are concerned malice is "presumed." Such a presumption is inconsistent with the federal rule. * * * Since the trial judge did not instruct the jury to differentiate between general and punitive damages, it may be that the verdict was wholly an award of one or the other. But it is impossible to know, in view of the general verdict returned. Because of this uncertainty, the judgment must be reversed and the case remanded. * * *

18. The Times states that four other libel suits based on the advertisement have been filed against it by others who have served as Montgomery City Commissioners and by the Governor of Alabama; that another $500,000 verdict has been awarded in the only one of these cases that has yet gone to trial; and that the damages sought in the other three total $2,000,000.

Since respondent may seek a new trial, we deem that considerations of effective judicial administration require us to review the evidence in the present record to determine whether it could constitutionally support a judgment for respondent. This Court's duty is not limited to the elaboration of constitutional principles; we must also in proper cases review the evidence to make certain that those principles have been constitutionally applied. This is such a case, particularly since the question is one of alleged trespass across "the line between speech unconditionally guaranteed and speech which may legitimately be regulated." In cases where that line must be drawn, the rule is that we "examine for ourselves the statements in issue and the circumstances under which they were made to see * * * whether they are of a character which the principles of the First Amendment, as adopted by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, protect." * * * We must "make an independent examination of the whole record," * * * so as to assure ourselves that the judgment does not constitute a forbidden intrusion on the field of free expression.

Applying these standards, we consider that the proof presented to show actual malice lacks the convincing clarity which the constitutional standard demands, and hence that it would not constitutionally sustain the judgment for respondent under the proper rule of law. The case of the individual petitioners requires little discussion. Even assuming that they could constitutionally be found to have authorized the use of their names on the advertisement, there was no evidence whatever that they were aware of any erroneous statements or were in any way reckless in that regard. The judgment against them is thus without constitutional support. [Emphasis added.]

As to the Times, we similarly conclude that the facts do not support a finding of actual malice. The statement by the Times' Secretary that, apart from the padlocking allegation, he thought the advertisement was "substantially correct," affords no constitutional warrant for the Alabama Supreme Court's conclusion that it was a "cavalier ignoring of the falsity of the advertisement [from which], the jury could not have but been impressed with the bad faith of the Times, and its maliciousness inferable therefrom." The statement does not indicate malice at the time of the publication; even if the advertisement was not "substantially correct"—although respondent's own proofs tend to show that it was—that opinion was at least a reasonable one, and there was no evidence to impeach the witness' good faith in holding it. The Times' failure to retract upon respondent's demand, although it later retracted upon the demand of Governor Patterson, is likewise not adequate evidence of malice for constitutional purposes. Whether or not a failure to retract may ever constitute such evidence, there are two reasons why it does not here. First, the letter written by the Times reflected a reasonable doubt on its part as to whether the advertisement could reasonably be taken to refer to respondent at all. Second, it was not a final refusal, since it asked for an explanation on this point—a request that respondent chose to ignore. * * *

Finally, there is evidence that the Times published the advertisement without checking its accuracy against the news stories in the Times' own files. The mere presence of the stories in the files does not, of course, establish that the Times "knew" the advertisement was false, since the state of mind required for actual malice would have to be brought home to the persons in the Times' organization having responsibility for the publication of the advertisement. With respect to the failure of those persons to make the check, the record shows that they relied upon their knowledge of the good reputation of many of those whose names were listed as sponsors of the advertisement, and upon the letter from A. Philip Randolph, known to them as a responsible individual, certifying that the use of the names was authorized. There was testimony that the persons handling the advertisement saw nothing in it that would render it unacceptable under the Times' policy of rejecting advertisements containing "attacks of a personal character"; their failure to reject it on this ground was not unreasonable. We think the evidence against the Times supports at most a finding of negligence in failing to discover the misstatements, and is constitutionally insufficient to show the recklessness that is required for a finding of actual malice.

We also think the evidence was constitutionally defective in another respect: it was incapable of supporting the jury's finding that the allegedly libelous statements were made "of and concerning" respondent. Respondent relies on the words of the advertisement and the testimony of six witnesses to establish a connection between it and himself. * * * There was no reference to respondent in the advertisement, either by name or official position. A number of the allegedly libelous statements—the charges that the dining hall was padlocked and that Dr. King's home was bombed, his person assaulted, and a perjury prosecution instituted against him—did not even concern the police; despite the ingenuity of the arguments which would attach this significance to the word "They," it is plain that these statements could not reasonably be read as accusing respondent of personal involvement in the acts in question. The statements upon which respondent principally relies as referring to him are the two allegations that did concern the police or police functions: that "truckloads of police * * * ringed the Alabama State College Campus" after the demonstration on the State Capitol steps, and that Dr. King had been "arrested * * * seven times." These statements were false only in that the police had been "deployed near" the campus but had not actually "ringed" it and had not gone there in connection with the State Capitol demonstration, and in that Dr. King had been arrested only four times. The ruling that these discrepancies between what was true and what was asserted were sufficient to injure respondent's reputation may itself raise constitutional problems, but we need not consider them here. Although the statements may be taken as referring to the police, they did not on their face make even an oblique reference to respondent as an individual. Support for the asserted reference must, therefore, be sought in the testimony of respondent's witnesses. But none of them suggested any basis for the belief that respondent himself was attacked in the advertisement beyond the bare fact that he was in overall charge of the Police Department and thus bore official responsibility for police conduct; to the extent that some of the witnesses thought respondent to have been charged with ordering or approving the conduct or otherwise being personally involved in it, they based this notion not on any statements in the advertisement, and not on any evidence that he had in fact been so involved, but solely on the unsupported assumption that, because of his official position, he must have been. This reliance on the bare fact of respondent's official position was made explicit by the Supreme Court of Alabama. That court, in holding that the trial court "did not err in overruling the demurrer [of the Times] in the aspect that the libelous matter was not of and concerning the [plaintiff,]" based its ruling on the proposition that:

"We think it common knowledge that the average person knows that municipal agents, such as police and firemen, and others, are under the control and direction of the city governing body, and more particularly under the direction and control of a single commissioner. In measuring the performance or deficiencies of such groups, praise or criticism is usually attached to the official in complete control of the body."

This proposition has disquieting implications for criticism of governmental conduct. For good reason, "no court of last resort in this country has ever held, or even suggested, that prosecutions for libel on government have any place in the American system of jurisprudence." * * * The present proposition would sidestep this obstacle by transmuting criticism of government, however impersonal it may seem on its face, into personal criticism, and hence potential libel, of the officials of whom the government is composed. There is no legal alchemy by which a State may thus create the cause of action that would otherwise be denied for a publication which, as respondent himself said of the advertisement, "reflects not only on me but on the other Commissioners and the community." Raising as it does the possibility that a good-faith critic of government will be penalized for his criticism, the proposition relied on by the Alabama courts strikes at the very center of the constitutionally protected area of free expression. We hold that such a proposition may not constitutionally be utilized to establish that an otherwise impersonal attack on governmental operations was a libel of an official responsible for those operations. Since it was relied on exclusively here, and there was no other evidence to connect the statements with respondent, the evidence was constitutionally insufficient to support a finding that the statements referred to respondent.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Alabama is reversed and the case is remanded to that court for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

Justice BLACK, with whom Justice Douglas joins (concurring).

* * * In reversing, the Court holds that "the Constitution delimits a State's power to award damages for libel in actions brought by public officials against critics of their official conduct." I base my vote to reverse on the belief that the First and Fourteenth Amendments not merely "delimit" a State's power to award damages to "public officials against critics of their official conduct" but completely prohibit a State from exercising such a power. The Court goes on to hold that a State can subject such critics to damages if "actual malice" can be proved against them. "Malice," even as defined by the Court, is an elusive, abstract concept, hard to prove and hard to disprove. The requirement that malice be proved provides at best an evanescent protection for the right critically to discuss public affairs and certainly does not measure up to the sturdy safeguard embodied in the First Amendment. Unlike the Court, therefore, I vote to reverse exclusively on the ground that the Times and the individual defendants had an absolute, unconditional constitutional right to publish in the Times advertisement their criticisms of the Montgomery agencies and officials.

Expanding the New York Times Doctrine

Later the same year, the Court expanded the New York Times doctrine to reach criminal libel prosecutions. Historically, criminal libel laws were intended to protect the public peace and good order. Mob violence or other breaches of the peace, it was asserted, would be created by defamations against social groups (religious, racial, family, etc.) or government officials. The distinction between criminal and seditious libels was less than clear.

So the state became plaintiff on behalf of the public. Truth, or truth published with good motives and for justifiable ends, was a defense. Privilege was a defense in some jurisdictions. As a result of Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64 (1964), actual malice had to be proven by the prosecution beyond a reasonable doubt in criminal libel cases.

Because of its closeness to sedition, criminal libel has not found favor in American courts. It reached its high-water mark in 1952 when the United States Supreme Court decided Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U.S. 250 (1952).

Beauharnais, a hatemonger who circulated pamphlets designed to pit white against black, was convicted under a 1949 Illinois criminal libel law, a law that would reappear in the Skokie cases twenty-five years later. The law made it a crime to exhibit in any public place any publication which "portrays depravity, criminality, unchastity, or lack of virtue of a class of citizens, or any race, color, creed or religion."

Its constitutionality was upheld in a 5–4 decision in which Justice Felix Frankfurter for the Court said no to the question, Is speech devoted to racial hatred so high on the scale of constitutional values that it cannot be abridged by lawmakers?

Frankfurter argued that the importance of protecting groups from harassment and vilification was so important that it justified some limitation on free speech. Furthermore, the Court had held in Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568 (1942) that "fighting words"—those which by their very utterance inspire violence or tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace—are not constitutionally protected; such expression forms no essential part of the exposition of ideas and has slight social value.

Black and Douglas in dissent contended that free speech is too important a part of the democratic commitment to be sacrificed to the comfort and protection of any single social group. And they advanced a shoe-on-the-other-foot argument: tomorrow, under a criminal libel law, advocacy of rejection of the Ku Klux Klan might be declared illegal.

This confrontation between free speech and social equality remains an interesting one. Which value do we risk? Do some of us need protection from the wrath of the bigot?[68]

Beauharnais has neither been followed nor reversed, but its minority opinions would seem to have carried the day. The fear that criminal libel laws would eventually suppress unpopular expression has prevailed.

For example, a labor organizer was sentenced to six months and fined $3,000 under Kentucky's common law of criminal libel for printing a pamphlet in support of striking miners and defamatory of law enforcement officials and a newspaper publisher.

On appeal, Justice Douglas, writing for the Court, said "that to make an offense of conduct which is 'calculated to create disturbances of the peace' leaves 68. David Riesman in Democracy and Defamation: Control of Group Libel, 42 Columbia L.Rev. 727 (1942) relates how the Nazis used group defamation to purge their opposition, set up Jewish scapegoats, and prepare the way for the Holocaust.

wide open the standard of responsibility. It involves calculations as to the boiling point of a particular person or a particular group, not an appraisal of the nature of the comments per se. This kind of criminal libel 'makes a man a criminal simply because his neighbors have no self-control and cannot refrain from violence.' "[69]

It has been suggested that bad motives should never be assumed where public speech is concerned, and rather than limit discussion about minority groups, we should facilitate discussion by minority groups.[70]

The coup de grace for criminal libel in the United States may have come when the once notorious District Attorney Jim Garrison took it upon himself to criticize eight New Orleans judges.

GARRISON v. STATE OF LOUISIANA

379 U.S. 64, 85 S.CT. 209, 3 L.ED.2D 125 (1964).

Justice BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

Appellant is the District Attorney of Orleans Parish, Louisiana. During a dispute with the eight judges of the Criminal District Court of the Parish, he held a press conference at which he issued a statement disparaging their judicial conduct. As a result, he was tried without a jury before a judge from another parish and convicted of criminal defamation under the Louisiana Criminal Defamation Statute. * * * The principal charges alleged to be defamatory were his attribution of a large backlog of pending criminal cases to the inefficiency, laziness, and excessive vacations of the judges, and his accusation that, by refusing to authorize disbursements to cover the expenses of undercover investigations of vice in New Orleans, the judges had hampered his efforts to enforce the vice laws. In impugning their motives, he said:

"The judges have now made it eloquently clear where their sympathies lie in regard to aggressive vice investigations by refusing to authorize use of the DA's funds to pay for the cost of closing down the Canal Street clip joints.

"* * * This raises interesting questions about the racketeer influences on our eight vacation-minded judges."

The Supreme Court of Louisiana affirmed the conviction. * * * The trial court and the State Supreme Court both rejected appellant's contention that the statute unconstitutionally abridged his freedom of expression. * * *

* * * At the outset, we must decide whether, in view of the differing history and purposes of criminal libel, the New York Times rule also limits state power to impose criminal sanctions for criticism of the official conduct of public officials. We hold that it does.

Where criticism of public officials is concerned, we see no merit in the argument that criminal libel statutes serve interests distinct from those secured by civil libel laws, and therefore, should not be subject to the same limitations. * * * At common law, truth was no defense to criminal libel. Although the victim of a true but defamatory publication might not have been unjustly damaged in reputation by the libel, the speaker was still punishable since the remedy was designed to avert the possibility that the utterance would provoke an enraged victim to a breach of peace. * * * [P]reference for the civil remedy, which enabled the frustrated victim to trade chivalrous satisfaction for damages, had substantially eroded the breach of the peace justification for criminal libel laws. In fact, in earlier, more violent, times, the civil remedy had virtually pre-empted the field of defamation; except as a weapon against seditious libel, the criminal prosecution fell into virtual desuetude. Changing mores and the virtual disappearance of criminal libel prosecutions lend support to the observation that "* * * under modern conditions, when the rule of law is generally accepted as a substitute for private physical measures, it can hardly be urged that the maintenance of peace requires a criminal prosecution for private defamation."

* * * In any event, where the criticism is of public officials and their conduct of public business, the interest in private reputation is overborne by the larger public interest, secured by the Constitution, in the dissemination of truth.

We held in New York Times that a public official might be allowed the civil remedy only if he establishes that the utterance was false and that it was made with knowledge of its falsity or in reckless disregard of whether it was false or true. The reasons which led us so to hold in New York Times apply with no less force merely because the remedy is criminal. The constitutional guarantees of freedom of expression compel application of the same standard to the criminal remedy. Truth may not be the subject of either civil or criminal sanctions where discussion of public affairs is concerned. And since "* * * erroneous statements is inevitable in free debate, and * * * it must be protected if the freedoms of expression are to have the 'breathing space' that they 'need * * * to survive' * * *," only those false statements made with the high degree of awareness of their probable falsity demanded by New York Times may be the subject of either civil or criminal sanctions. [Emphasis added.] For speech concerning public affairs is more than self-expression; it is the essence of self-government.

The use of calculated falsehood, however, would put a different cast on the constitutional question. Although honest utterance, even if inaccurate, may further the fruitful exercise of the right of free speech, it does not follow that the lie, knowingly and deliberately published about a public official, should enjoy a like immunity. At the time the First Amendment was adopted, as today, there were those unscrupulous enough and skillful enough to use the deliberate or reckless falsehood as an effective political tool to unseat the public servant or even topple an administration. * * * That speech is used as a tool for political ends does not automatically bring it under the protective mantle of the Constitution. For the use of the known lie as a tool is at once at odds with the premises of democratic government and with the orderly manner in which economic, social, or political change is to be effected. Calculated falsehood falls into that class of utterances which "are no essential part of any exposition of ideas, and are of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality. * * *" Hence the knowingly false statement and the false statement made with reckless disregard of the truth, do not enjoy constitutional protection.

We do not think, however, that appellant's statement may be considered as one constituting only a purely private defamation. The accusation concerned the judges' conduct of the business of the Criminal District Court. Of course, any criticism of the manner in which a public official performs his duties will tend to affect his private, as well as his public, reputation. The New York Times rule is not rendered inapplicable merely because an official's private reputation, as well as his public reputation, is harmed. The public-official rule protects the paramount public interest in a free flow of information to the people concerning public officials, their servants. To this end, anything which might touch on an official's fitness for office is relevant. [Emphasis added.] Few personal attributes are more germane to fitness for office than dishonesty, malfeasance, or improper motivation, even though these characteristics may also affect the official's private character. * * *

Applying the principles of the New York Times case, we hold that the Louisiana statute, as authoritatively interpreted by the Supreme Court of Louisiana, incorporates constitutionally invalid standards in the context of criticism of the official conduct of public officials. For contrary to the New York Times rule, which absolutely prohibits punishment of truthful criticism, the statute directs punishment for true statements made with "actual malice." * * * The statute is also unconstitutional as interpreted to cover false statements against public officials. The New York Times standard forbids the punishment of false statements, unless made with knowledge of their falsity or in reckless disregard of whether they are true or false. But the Louisiana statute punishes false statements without regard to that test if made with ill-will; even if ill-will is not established, a false statement concerning public officials can be punished if not made in the reasonable belief of its truth. * * * The reasonable-belief standard applied by the trial judge is not the same as the reckless-disregard-of-truth standard. According to the trial court's opinion, a reasonable belief is one which "an ordinarily prudent man might be able to assign a just and fair reason for"; the suggestion is that under this test the immunity from criminal responsibility in the absence of ill-will disappears on proof that the exercise of ordinary care would have revealed that the statement was false. The test which we laid down in New York Times is not keyed to ordinary care; defeasance of the privilege is conditioned, not on mere negligence, but on reckless disregard for the truth.

COMMENT

Justice Douglas in a concurring opinion rejected "actual malice" as a constitutional standard, and of criminal libel he said:

> Beauharnais v. Illinois, * * * a case decided by the narrowest of margins, should be overruled as a misfit in our constitutional system and as out of line with the dictates of the First Amendment. I think it is time to face the fact that the only line drawn by the Constitution is between "speech" on the one side and conduct or overt acts on the other. The two often do blend. I have expressed the idea before: "Freedom of expression can be suppressed if, and to the extent that, it is so closely brigaded with illegal action as to be an inseparable part of it * * *."

Is this essentially the theory of freedom of expression articulated by Thomas I. Emerson in Toward a General Theory of the First Amendment (1967) and in The System of Freedom of Expression (1970)?

It should be noted that state constitutions may in some cases provide greater protection to free press than the U.S. Constitution, and the U.S. Supreme Court will be reluctant to review state court rulings based on those constitutions.

Having extended the New York Times rule to criminal libel, the next step in the onward march of the doctrine for the Supreme Court was to define, and by defining to expand, the term "public official."

In Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75 (1966), Justice Brennan, speaking for the Court, held "that the 'public official' designation applies at the very least to those among the hierarchy of government employees who have, or appear to the public to have, substantial responsibility for government operations * * * lest criticism of government itself be penalized." No matter that plaintiff in the case was a former supervisor of a county recreation area whose policy-making responsibilities were modest.

Within a few years, scores of unsuccessful libel plaintiffs in both state and federal courts learned that a public official could be anyone, past or present, who belonged, or had belonged, to a bureaucracy. Officials and quasi officials on the periphery of power were included.[71]

There was a prophetic intimation in Justice Douglas's concurring opinion in Rosenblatt that the central question in such cases should not be who is a public official but whether a public issue is being discussed. The Court would come to that, but there was to be a prior step.

One of the fathers of the atomic bomb and a vocal pacifist, Dr. Linus Pauling, brought unsuccessful suits against the New York Daily News and William Buckley's National Review. Both had charged him with Communist and pro-Soviet sympathies. A federal court of appeals in the Daily News case upheld a district court's characterization of Pauling as a public figure, open to the same comment and criticism as a public official. Pauling v. News Syndicate Co., Inc., 335 F.2d 659 (2d Cir. 1964).

Two cases decided together, one involving a football coach and the other a retired army general, Edwin Walker, brought to its acme the public figure test and for a time provided a formula for measuring "reckless disregard for the truth."

The case of the coach began with an article entitled "The Story of a College Football Fix" in the March 23, 1963, issue of the Saturday Evening Post. The article reported a telephone conversation between Wally Butts, athletic director at the University of Georgia, and Paul Bryant, then head football coach at the University of Alabama, in which the two allegedly conspired to "fix" a football game between the two schools.

Notes had been taken on the conversation by an insurance salesman of questionable character, who, due to an electronic quirk, cut into the conversation when he picked up a telephone receiver at a pay station. Some of his notes appeared in the article, which compared this "fix" to the Chicago "Black Sox" scandal of 1919. The article went on to describe the game, the subsequent presentation of the salesman's notes to Georgia head coach, Johnny Griffith, and Butts's resignation. There was nothing subtle about the Post's charges against Butts.

Butts sued for $5 million compensatory and $5 million punitive damages. The Post tried to use truth as its defense, but the evidence contradicted its version of what had occurred. Expert witnesses supported Butts by analyzing the salesman's notes and films of the game. The jury returned a verdict of $60,000 in general damages and $3 million in punitive damages.

71. For example, Rose v. Koch, 154 N.W.2d 409 (Minn. 1967), a former legislator and university professor; News-Journal Co. v. Gallagher, 233 A.2d 166 (Del. 1967), a highway department employee; Medina v. Time, Inc., 319 F.Supp. 398 (D.Mass. 1970), an army officer; Priestley v. Hastings & Sons Publishing Co. of Lynn, 271 N.E.2d 628 (Mass. 1971), a city architect; and Klahr v. Winterble, 418 P.2d 404 (Ariz. 1966), a state college student senator.

Soon after the trial, the New York Times decision was handed down, and the Post sought a new trial under its rules. The motion was rejected by the trial judge. He held Times inapplicable because Butts was not a "public official," and he ruled there was ample evidence of "reckless disregard" of the truth in the researching of the article. His judgment was affirmed by the United States Court of Appeals. From there the case went to the Supreme Court.

Justice Harlan, who wrote the opinion for the Court, focused on the public interest in the circulation of the Post and in the activities of Butts. Did Butts, therefore, qualify as a "public figure"? The opinion was a study in the problems presented by the forward motion of New York Times, and it defined a separate test for public figures.

CURTIS PUBLISHING CO. v. BUTTS and ASSOCIATED PRESS v. WALKER

388 U.S. 130, 87 S.CT. 1975, 18 L.ED.2D 1094 (1967).

Justice HARLAN delivered the opinion of the Court:
* * *

These similarities and differences between libel actions involving persons who are public officials and libel actions involving those circumstanced as were Butts and Walker, viewed in light of the principles of liability which are of general applicability in our society, lead us to the conclusion that libel actions of the present kind cannot be left entirely to state libel laws, unlimited by any overriding constitutional safeguard, but that the rigorous federal requirements of New York Times are not the only appropriate accommodation of the conflicting interests at stake. We consider and would hold that a "public figure" who is not a public official may also recover damages for a defamatory falsehood whose substance makes substantial danger to reputation apparent, on a showing of highly unreasonable conduct constituting an extreme departure from the standards of investigation and reporting ordinarily adhered to by responsible publishers. [Emphasis added.]

Nothing in this opinion is meant to affect the holdings in New York Times and its progeny. * * *

Having set forth the standard by which we believe the constitutionality of the damage awards in these cases must be judged, we turn now, as the Court did in New York Times, to the question whether the evidence and findings below meet that standard. * * *

The Butts jury was instructed, in considering punitive damages, to assess "the reliability, the nature of the sources of the defendant's information, its acceptance or rejection of the sources, and its care in checking upon assertions." These considerations were said to be relevant to a determination whether defendant had proceeded with "wanton and reckless indifference." In this light we consider that the jury must have decided that the investigation undertaken by the Saturday Evening Post, upon which much evidence and argument was centered, was grossly inadequate in the circumstances. * * *

This jury finding was found to be supported by the evidence by the trial judge and the majority in the Fifth Circuit. * * *

The evidence showed that the Butts story was in no sense "hot news" and the editors of the magazine recognized the need for a thorough investigation of the serious charges. Elementary precautions were, nevertheless, ignored. The Saturday Evening Post knew that Burnett had been placed on probation in connection with bad check charges, but proceeded to publish the story on the basis of his affidavit without substantial independent support. Burnett's notes were not even viewed by any of the magazine's personnel prior to publication. John Carmichael, who was supposed to have been with Burnett when the phone call was overheard, was not interviewed. No attempt was made to screen the films of the game to see if Burnett's information was accurate, and no attempt was made to find out whether Alabama had adjusted its plans after the alleged divulgence of information.

The Post writer assigned to the story was not a football expert and no attempt was made to check the story with someone knowledgeable in the sport. At trial experts indicated that the information in the Burnett notes was either such that it would be evident to any opposing coach from game films regularly exchanged or valueless. Those assisting the Post writer in his investigation were already deeply involved in another libel action, based on a different article, brought against Curtis Publishing Co. by the Alabama coach and unlikely to be the source of a complete and objective investigation. The Saturday Evening Post was anxious to change its image by instituting a policy of "sophisticated muckraking," and the pressure to produce a successful exposé might have induced a stretching of standards. In short, the evidence is ample to support a finding of highly unreasonable conduct constituting an extreme departure from the standards of investigation and reporting ordinarily adhered to by responsible publishers.

COMMENT

Chief Justice Earl Warren concurred in the result but objected to the Court's making a distinction between "public official" and "public figure." Consistent with their absolutist rejection of libel actions against the press, Justices Black and Douglas dissented in Butts but concurred in the result in Walker.

But four members of the Court—Harlan, Clark, Fortas, and Stewart—adopted a new standard, albeit a shaky one, for public figures. It would come to be known as the prudent publisher test, and it would reappear in Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc. in modified form (this text, p. 208).

The Walker case did not divide the Court as did Butts. General Edwin Walker was clearly an actor in the tumultuous events surrounding the entry of James Meredith into the University of Mississippi. An Associated Press report stated that Walker, who was present on the campus, had taken command of the violent crowd and had personally led a charge against federal marshals. It also described Walker as encouraging rioters to use violence and providing them technical advice on combating the effects of tear gas.

Walker was a private citizen at the time of the riot but, since his resignation from the army, had become a political activist. There was little evidence relating to the preparation of the news dispatch. It was clear, however, that Van Savell, the reporter, was actually present during the events he described and had communicated them almost immediately to the Associated Press office in Atlanta.

Walker sought to collect millions in a chain suit against newspapers and broadcasting stations which had carried the AP reports. The present case began in Texas when a trial court awarded Walker $500,000 in general damages and $300,000 in exemplary or punitive damages. The trial judge, finding no actual malice to support the punitive damages, entered a final judgment of $500,000. The Texas Court of Civil Appeals, agreeing that the defense of fair comment did not apply because the press reports constituted "statements of fact," affirmed the judgment of the trial court. The Texas Supreme Court declined to review the case, and the case went up to the United States Supreme Court. Associated Press v. Walker, 388 U.S. 130 (1967).

Certainly Walker was a public figure, said the Court, for he had cast his personality into the whirlpool of an important public controversy. Moreover, "in contrast to the Butts article, the dispatch which concerns us in Walker was news which required immediate dissemination. The Associated Press received the information from a correspondent who was present at the scene of the events and gave every indication of being trustworthy and competent. His dispatches in this instance, with one minor exception, were internally consistent and would not have seemed unreasonable to one familiar with General Walker's prior publicized statements on the underlying controversy. Considering the necessity for rapid dissemination, nothing in this series of events gives the slightest hint of a severe departure from accepted publishing standards. We therefore conclude that General Walker should not be entitled to damages from the Associated Press." [Emphasis added.]

The public figure rule was subsequently applied to policemen and firemen seeking election to a public safety council,[72] to a head basketball coach, [73] to a well-known horse trainer,[74] to political party workers and precinct delegates,[75] to letter carriers who, upon refusing to join a union, were called "scabs, traitors, and men of low character and rotten principles," [76] to a suspect in a $1.5 million mail robbery who chose to expose himself publicly by granting interviews and calling press conferences,[77] to a retired professional basketball player,[78] and to an escapee from a federal jail.[79]

A further attempt to define "reckless disregard" generated language which has persisted in court opinions. The case is St. Amant v. Thompson, 390 U.S. 727 (1968), and it involved defamatory charges made during the heat of a political campaign.

There Justice Byron White for the Court pointed out that "the defendant in a defamation action brought by a public official cannot * * * automatically insure a favorable verdict by testifying that he published with a belief that the statements were true. The finder of fact must determine whether the publication was indeed made in good faith. Professions of good faith will be unlikely to prove persuasive, for example, where a story is fabricated by the defendant, is the product of his imagination, or is based wholly on an unverified anonymous telephone call. Nor will they be likely to prevail when the publisher's allegations are so inherently improbable that only a reckless man would have put them in circulation. Likewise, recklessness may be found where there are obvious reasons to doubt the veracity of the informant or the accuracy of his reports." Justice White went on to say that "reckless conduct is not measured by whether a reasonably prudent man would have published, or would have investigated before publishing. There must be sufficient evidence to permit the conclusion that the defendant in fact entertained serious doubts as to the truth of his publication." [Emphasis added.]

"The occupation of public officeholder," said Justice Abe Fortas in an acerbic dissent, "does not forfeit one's membership in the human race."

Public official–public figure designations were to do yeoman service for the press in this period.

The Ocala (Fla.) Star-Banner may have come close to the outer limits of permissible comment when it confused a mayor who was a candidate for the office of county tax assessor with his brother and charged falsely that he had been indicted for perjury in a civil rights suit.

A new editor, who had never heard of the mayor's brother, changed the first name when a reporter phoned in the story. A jury awarded the mayor $22,000, but a precise application of the New York Times rule of knowing falsehood or reckless disregard of the truth had not been made and the judgment was reversed. Ocala Star-Banner Co. v. Damron, 401 U.S. 295 (1971).

A deputy chief of detectives sued Time magazine when it implied in a story about a Civil Rights Commission report that the police officer was guilty of brutality. Although the news magazine had confused a complainant's testimony with the independent findings of the Commission itself, the Supreme Court ruled that in the circumstances of the case the magazine had not engaged in a "falsification" sufficient in itself to sustain a jury finding of "actual malice."

"The author of the Time article," said Justice Potter Stewart for the Court, "testified in substance, that the context of the report of the * * * incident indicated to him that the Commission believed that the incident had occurred as described. He therefore denied that he had falsified the report when he omitted the word 'alleged.' The Time researcher, who had read the newspaper stories about the incident and two reports from a Time reporter in Chicago, as well as the accounts of [the deputy chief's] earlier career, had even more reason to suppose that the Commission took the charges to be true. * * *

"These considerations apply with even greater force to the situation where the alleged libel consists in the claimed misinterpretation of the gist of a lengthy government document. Where the document reported on is so ambiguous as this one was, it is hard to imagine a test of 'truth' that would not put the publisher virtually at the mercy of the unguided discretion of a jury." [Emphasis added.] Time, Inc. v. Pape, 401 U.S. 279 (1971).

These examples are not meant to suggest that a libel case couldn't be won by a plaintiff in the period following New York Times v. Sullivan.

As far back as 1964, a Kentucky court had disallowed application of the New York Times rule where it appeared that the published attack was not on the "official" conduct of a policeman.[80] And an Illinois appeals court would not accept the contention that a society columnist's remarks about the marital affairs of a prominent industrial family were privileged because the plaintiffs were "public" people.[81] The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania would not permit application of the rule when a defendant admitted that he knew his defamatory comments were false.[82]

Senator Barry Goldwater, the most notable plaintiff of the period, won a $75,000 judgment against Ralph Ginzburg, publisher of Fact magazine. Ginzburg had attempted to put together a "psychobiography" on Goldwater so as to alert the American people to what he perceived to be the potential danger of his presidency. Facts and comments on Goldwater were carefully selected to support Ginzburg's assumptions, including responses from more than 2,000 psychiatrists who had received a manifestly "loaded" questionnaire. The simplistic conclusion from all of this was that Goldwater was mentally ill—his "infantile fantasies of revenge and dreams of total annihilation of his adversaries," his "paralyzing, deep-seated, irrational fear," his "fantasy of a final conflagration" which Ginzburg compared with the "death-fantasy of another paranoiac woven in Berchtesgaden and realized in a Berlin bunker."

At trial Ginzburg was unable to identify a single source for his statements. Nor could he document, in any medical sense, his reports that Goldwater had suffered two nervous breakdowns.

In upholding the judgment, a federal court of appeals relied on the "hot news" premise of the Butts and Walker cases and the less stringent actual malice definition of St. Amant. Goldwater v. Ginzburg, 414 F.2d 324 (2d Cir. 1969).

There were those, nevertheless, who wondered how a candidate for the nation's highest office could argue that any part of his private life, particularly his psyche, be immune from public comment, no matter how willfully distorted and inaccurate.

In dissenting vigorously to a denial of certiorari, Justice Black, joined by Justice Douglas, agreed.

"This suit," wrote Black, "was brought by a man who was then the nominee of his party for the [p]residency of the United States. In our times, the person who holds that high office has an almost unbounded power for good or evil. The public has an unqualified right to have the character and fitness of anyone who aspires to the [p]residency held up for the closest scrutiny. Extravagant, reckless statements and even claims which may not be true seem to me an inevitable and perhaps essential part of the process by which the voting public informs itself of the qualities of a man who would be [p]resident. The decisions of the [d]istrict [c]ourt and the [c]ourt of [a]ppeals in this case can only have the effect of dampening political debate by making fearful and timid those who should under our Constitution feel totally free openly to criticize Presidential candidates. * * *

"Another reason for the particular offensiveness of this case is that the damages awarded Senator Goldwater were, except for $1.00, wholly punitive. Goldwater neither pleaded nor proved any special damages and the jury's verdict of $1.00 nominal compensatory damages established that he suffered little if any actual harm. * * * It is bad enough when the First Amendment is violated to compensate a person who has actually suffered a provable injury as a result of libelous statements; it is incomprehensible that a person who has suffered no provable harm can recover libel damages imposed solely to punish a defendant who has exercised his First Amendment rights.

"I would grant certiorari and reverse the [c]ourt of [a]ppeals summarily." Ginzburg v. Goldwater, 396 U.S. 1049 (1970).

A Doctrine Stretched to Its Limits: The Public Issue Test

Justice Douglas's notion that any matter of legitimate public interest, that is, any public issue, should be the standard for application of the Times doctrine was reminiscent of philosopher Alexander Meiklejohn's premise that the people of the United States are both the governors and the governed, and therefore "those activities of thought and communication by which we 'govern' must be free from interference."[83] Speech having social importance, whether of a political nature or not, must be free, said Meiklejohn, not because persons "desire to speak," but because people "need to hear."

That constitutional doctrine was strengthened in 1968 when the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, noting the escalation from public official to public figure to public issue in applications of the Times doctrine, ruled against a medical laboratory which had brought a trade libel suit against CBS for a network program exposing faulty laboratory testing and the lack of federal supervision. In part the court said:

> If some analogy were to be looked for here, in caution against an uncertain extension of First Amendment immunity being made, this aspect would exist sufficiently in the elements of the field in which United Labs was engaged being, from the nature and extent of its capacity to affect health, as naturally entitled to public gaze and interest, and as inherently subject to right of public information and discussion. * * *
> It is, of course, not possible to say just how far the Court will continue to carry such extensions. But unless all other areas, not merely those of legitimate general interest but also those affecting personal concern to the public, are to be artificially ignored, we are not able to see how the path upon which the Court has been moving can be regarded as having reached an end. United Medical Laboratories, Inc. v. CBS, Inc., 404 F.2d 706, 710, 711 (9th Cir. 1968), cert. den. 394 U.S. 921 (1969).

There was still room for expansion. The Supreme Court held in 1970 that the term "blackmail," when used in characterizing the negotiating position of a real estate developer, was not slander when spoken in the heated public meetings of a city council and not actionable libel when subsequently reported accurately in newspaper articles.

The plaintiff in the case had entered into agreements with the city for zoning exemptions in the past and was again seeking such favors to expedite the construction of high density housing units. At the same time, the city was trying to obtain from the plaintiff land for the purpose of building a school.

In addition, the trial judge's instructions to the jury, reflecting confusion in his mind as to what the Supreme Court had meant by "actual malice" in earlier cases, was considered by Justice Stewart to be an "error of constitutional magnitude." A trial court judgment against the newspaper was reversed. Greenbelt Co-op Publishing Association v. Bresler, 398 U.S. 6 (1970).

Final extension of the New York Times doctrine—and it would prove the breaking point—came in 1971 when a badly divided Court upheld a court of appeals reversal of a $275,000 trial court judgment in favor of a magazine distributor. Rosenbloom had been called a "smut distributor" and "girlie-book peddler" in a radio news report, although he was subsequently acquitted of criminal obscenity charges.

ROSENBLOOM v. METROMEDIA

403 U.S. 29, 91 S.CT. 1811, 29 L.ED.2D 296 (1971).

Justice BRENNAN announced the judgment of the Court and an opinion in which The Chief Justice and Justice Blackmun join.

* * * The instant case presents the question whether the New York Times' knowing or reckless falsity standard applies in a state civil libel action brought not by a "public official" or a "public figure" but by a private individual for a defamatory falsehood uttered in a news broadcast by a radio station about the individual's involvement in an event of public or general interest. * * *

Petitioner concedes that the police campaign to enforce the obscenity laws was an issue of public interest, and, therefore, that the constitutional guarantees for freedom of speech and press imposed limits upon Pennsylvania's power to apply its libel laws to compel respondent to compensate him in damages for the alleged defamatory falsehoods broadcast about his involvement. As noted, the narrow question he raises is whether, because he is not a "public official" or a "public figure" but a private individual, those limits required that he prove that the falsehoods resulted from a failure of respondent to exercise reasonable care, or required that he prove that the falsehoods were broadcast with knowledge of their falsity or with reckless disregard of whether they were false or not. That question must be answered against the background of the functions of the constitutional guarantees for freedom of expression.

Self-governance in the United States presupposes far more than knowledge and debate about the strictly official activities of various levels of government. The commitment of the country to the institution of private property, protected by the Due Process and Just Compensation Clauses in the Constitution, places in private hands vast areas of economic and social power that vitally affect the nature and quality of life in the Nation. Our efforts to live and work together in a free society not completely dominated by governmental regulation necessarily encompass far more than politics in a narrow sense. * * *

Although the limitations upon civil libel actions, first held in New York Times to be required by the First Amendment, were applied in that case in the context of defamatory falsehoods about the official conduct of a public official, later decisions have disclosed the artificiality, in terms of the public's interest, of a simple distinction between "public" and "private" individuals or institutions. * * *

Moreover, the constitutional protection was not intended to be limited to matters bearing broadly on issues of responsible government. "[T]he Founders * * * felt that a free press would advance 'truth, science, morality, and arts in general' as well as responsible government." * * *

If a matter is a subject of public or general interest, it cannot suddenly become less so merely because a private individual is involved, or because in some sense the individual did not "voluntarily" choose to become involved. The public's primary interest is in the event; the public focus is on the conduct of the participant and the content, effect, and significance of the conduct, not the participant's prior anonymity or notoriety. [Emphasis added.] The present case illustrates the point. The community has a vital interest in the proper enforcement of its criminal laws, particularly in an area such as obscenity where a number of highly important values are potentially in conflict: the public has an interest both in seeing that the criminal law is adequately enforced and in assuring that the law is not used unconstitutionally to suppress free expression. Whether the person involved is a famous large scale magazine distributor or a "private" businessman running a corner newsstand has no relevance in ascertaining whether the public has an interest in the issue. We honor the commitment to robust debate on public issues, which is embodied in the First Amendment, by extending constitutional protection to all discussion and communication involving matters of public or general concern, without regard to whether the persons involved are famous or anonymous.

* * * Drawing a distinction between "public" and "private" figures makes no sense in terms of the First Amendment guarantees. The New York Times standard was applied to libel of a public official or public figure to give effect to the Amendment's function to encourage ventilation of public issues, not because the public official has any less interest in protecting his reputation than an individual in private life. While the argument that public figures need less protection because they can command media attention to counter criticism may be true for some very prominent people, even then it is the rare case where the denial overtakes the original charge. Denials, retractions, and corrections are not "hot" news, and rarely receive the prominence of the original story. When the public official or public figure is a minor functionary, or has left the position which put him in the public eye, see Rosenblatt v. Baer, the argument loses all of its force. In the vast majority of libels involving public officials or public figures, the ability to respond through the media will depend on the same complex factor on which the ability of a private individual depends: the unpredictable event of the media's continuing interest in the story. Thus the unproven, and highly improbable, generalization that an as yet undefined class of "public figures" involved in matters of public concern will be better able to respond through the media than private individuals also involved in such matters seems too insubstantial a reed on which to rest a constitutional distinction. Furthermore, in First Amendment terms, the cure seems far worse than the disease. If the States fear that private citizens will not be able to respond adequately to publicity involving them, the solution lies in the direction of ensuring their ability to respond, rather than in stifling public discussion of matters of public concern.[15]

Further reflection over the years since New York Times was decided persuades us that the view of the "public official" or "public figure" as assuming the risk of defamation by voluntarily thrusting himself into the public eye bears little relationship either to the values protected by the First Amendment or to the nature of our society. We have recognized that "[e]xposure of the self to others in varying degrees

15. Some States have adopted retraction statutes or right of reply statutes. See Donnelly, The Right of Reply: An Alternative to an Action for Libel, 34 Va.L.Rev. 367 (1948); Note, Vindication of the Reputation of a Public Official, 80 Harv.L.Rev. 1730 (1967). Cf. Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969).

One writer, in arguing that the First Amendment itself should be read to guarantee a right of access to the media not limited to a right to respond to defamatory falsehoods, has suggested several ways the law might encourage public discussion. Barron, Access to the Press—A New First Amendment Right, 80 Harv.L.Rev. 1641, 1666–1678 (1967). [See also, Barron, Freedom of the Press for Whom? 1973.] It is important to recognize that the private individual often desires press exposure either for himself, his ideas, or his causes. Constitutional adjudication must take into account the individual's interest in access to the press as well as the individual's interest in preserving his reputation, even though libel actions by their nature encourage a narrow view of the individual's interest since they focus only on situations where the individual has been harmed by undesired press attention. A constitutional rule that deters the press from covering the ideas or activities of the private individual thus conceives the individual's interest too narrowly.

is a concomitant of life in a civilized community." Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374, 388 (1967). Voluntarily or not, we are all "public" men to some degree. Conversely, some aspects of the lives of even the most public men fall outside the area of matters of public or general concern. * * * Thus, the idea that certain "public" figures have voluntarily exposed their entire lives to public inspection, while private individuals have kept theirs carefully shrouded from public view is, at best, a legal fiction. In any event, such a distinction could easily produce the paradoxical result of dampening discussion of issues of public or general concern because they happen to involve private citizens while extending constitutional encouragement to discussion of aspects of the lives of "public figures" which are not in the area of public or general concern.

We are aware that the press has, on occasion, grossly abused the freedom it is given by the Constitution. All must deplore such excesses. In an ideal world, the responsibility of the press would match the freedom and public trust given it. But from the earliest days of our history, this free society, dependent on it is for its survival upon a vigorous free press, has tolerated some abuse. * * * We thus hold that a libel action, as here, by a private individual against a licensed radio station for a defamatory falsehood in a newscast relating to his involvement in an event of public or general concern may be sustained only upon clear and convincing proof that the defamatory falsehood was published with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not. * * *

Petitioner argues finally that WIP's failure to communicate with him to learn his side of the case and to obtain a copy of the magazine for examination, sufficed to support a verdict under the Times standard. But our "cases are clear that reckless conduct is not measured by whether a reasonably prudent man would have published, or would have investigated before publishing. [Emphasis added.] There must be sufficient evidence to permit the conclusion that the defendant in fact entertained serious doubts as to the truth of his publication." St. Amant v. Thompson, 390 U.S., at 731. Respondent here relied on information supplied by police officials. Following petitioner's complaint about the accuracy of the broadcasts, WIP checked its last report with the judge who presided in the case. While we may assume that the District Court correctly held to be defamatory respondent's characterizations of petitioner's business as "the smut literature racket," and of those engaged in it as "girlie-book peddlers," there is no evidence in the record to support a conclusion that respondent "in fact entertained serious doubts as to the truth" of its reports.

COMMENT

In retrospect it was to be Justice Harlan's dissenting opinion in Rosenbloom v. Metromedia which would undo the public issue standard.

"It is * * * my judgment," said Harlan, "that the reasonable care standard adequately serves those First Amendment values that must inform the definition of actionable libel and that those special considerations that made even this standard an insufficiently precise technique when applied to plaintiffs who are 'public officials' or 'public figures' do not obtain where the litigant is a purely private individual."

Justice Thurgood Marshall, joined by Justice Stewart in dissent, framed propositions which were also to reappear in Gertz. Agreeing with Harlan, he said that the plurality's doctrine would threaten society's interest in protecting private individuals from being thrust into the public eye by the distorting light of defamation.

But beyond that he saw a formidable danger in punitive and presumed damages, and so a proposal:

> The threats to society's interest in freedom of the press that are involved in punitive and presumed damages can largely be eliminated by restricting the award of damages to proven, actual injuries. The jury's wide ranging discretion will largely be eliminated since the award will be based on essentially objective, discernible factors. * * * [S]elf-censorship resulting from the fear of large judgments themselves would be reduced. At the same time society's interest in protecting individuals from defamation will still be fostered.

The Court seemed ready for Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc.

THE PRESENT STATE OF LIBEL: GERTZ AND BEYOND

By removing libel from its ancestral home in tort law and putting it under the protection of the Constitution, New York Times v. Sullivan was truly a landmark case. Simply put, the Court had decided that in the interests of a vigorous social dialogue public officials would have to surrender their sensitivity to "vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp" verbal assaults. But the Court left an opening to remedy injury to reputation. If the public official could with convincing clarity[84] prove actual malice, that is, that the statement was published with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not, a libel suit could still be pursued and won. The major burden of proof, however, was now on the public-person plaintiff, and libel would be governed by a national, First Amendment-based standard of fault. Reviewing courts would make an independent examination of the record to assure that the plaintiff had satisfied the constitutional standard.

Much was made of New York Times I, as it would be called, to distinguish it from the Pentagon Papers case of 1971. Harry Kalven, Jr. saw it as laying to rest for all time sedition or libel of government—"an impossible notion for a democracy."[85] And Kalven reported Meiklejohn as exclaiming that the ruling was "an occasion for dancing in the streets."

Justices Black, Douglas, and Goldberg, however, had serious reservations, and Black, in a concurring opinion, said of New York Times: "The requirement that malice be proved provides at best an evanescent protection for the right critically to discuss public affairs and does not measure up to the sturdy safeguard embodied in the First Amendment."

First Amendment theorist Thomas Emerson rejected the ruling for failing to take into account the value of even intentional falsehood in forcing people to defend, justify, and rethink their positions. Emerson referred to Brennan's actual malice test as a "relapse to the two level theory [the idea that certain forms of speech are exempt from First Amendment protection]," and he added:

> [S]uper-refined attempts to separate statements of fact from opinions, to winnow truth out of a mass of conflicting evidence * * * to probe into intents, motives and purposes—all these do not fit into the dynamics of a system of freedom of expression. * * * The health and vitality of the system depend more upon untrammeled freedom of discussion, in which all citizens contend vigorously, than in judicial attempts to establish the motives of participants.[86]

Perennial concern is that because of New York Times fewer people will choose to participate in public affairs as officeholders. This is based partly on the assumption that public persons have no superior access to publicity,[87] an assumption of doubtful validity.

In the decade following New York Times, the Court stretched the application of its actual malice rule to public figures in Butts and Walker and finally, in the 1971 Rosenbloom case, to private persons caught up in matters of public interest, even though involuntarily.

"We honor the commitment to robust debate on public issues," said Justice Brennan in his plurality opinion for the Rosenbloom Court, "* * * by extending constitutional protection to all discussion and communication involving matters of public or general concern, without regard to whether the persons involved are famous or anonymous."

But the Court was bitterly fragmented on the question of how far the First Amendment ought to go in protecting libel. Dissenting Justice John Marshall Harlan, because he preferred a less severe proof than actual malice for private persons in pursuit of libel damages, was to have the last word. But for three years the press enjoyed a near immunity to libel laws. Whatever was published was, at least by an editor's definition, a matter of public interest and therefore subject to the actual malice test.

84. "Convincing clarity" is a standard of evidence which falls somewhere between "preponderance of evidence" and "beyond reasonable doubt," the latter the test in criminal cases. Under the standard, proof must be strong, positive, free from doubt, clear, precise, unmistakable, proof that persuades. State court applications of the Gertz standard of negligence to private plaintiffs suggest that the "preponderance of evidence" burden of proof will now be sufficient. This is also suggested in the Restatement (Second) of Torts § 580B, Comment i (Tent.Draft No. 21, April 5, 1975). The three standards are discussed by the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court in Callahan v. Westinghouse Broadcasting Co. Inc., 2 Med.L.Rptr. 2226, 363 N.E.2d 240 (1977).

Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc. swung the pendulum back, not all the way to the position of strict liability but to a point of recognizing the private person in libel law. The onward rush of New York Times had ended.

The family of a youth shot by a policeman had retained Elmer Gertz, a nationally known attorney and self-defined public person, to represent them in a civil suit for damages against the policeman. The policeman had already been convicted of second-degree murder. Meanwhile, the editor of the John Birch Society magazine, American Opinion, saw as his patriotic duty the publication of an article discrediting Gertz by identifying him with a "conspiracy" to undermine law enforcement in order to effect a Communist takeover of the United States.[88]

In order to heap opprobrium upon Gertz, the article stated falsely that he had a criminal record, that he had planned the 1968 Chicago demonstrations, and that he was a Leninist and Communist-fronter.

What he was, in fact, was one of Chicago's best-known lawyers, a legal expert on libel, censorship, civil rights, free speech, the death penalty, and housing. He was also the author of books, pamphlets, magazine articles, book reviews, and radio plays; a professor of law; a civil rights leader; and a founder and member of countless organizations ranging from the Civil War Roundtable to the Henry Miller Literary Society.

Hardly a private person, Gertz was instrumental in writing a new Illinois constitution, having been elected to the post. He was a dedicated theater buff and literary dilettante. He founded the George Bernard Shaw Society. In 1931 he wrote his first book, a work on Frank Harris, the renegade literary-libertine. He won a parole for Nathan Leopold and later a death sentence commutation for Jack Ruby.

Poet and historian Carl Sandburg once said that "Elmer Gertz fears no dragons." Probably true. More likely, though, he knew his libel law and had clearly discerned the divided nature of the Court in Rosenbloom and the significant changes in its membership since 1971.

Gertz sued American Opinion and a sympathetic jury awarded him $50,000. A federal district court disallowed the award, agreeing with the magazine that the public issue rule of Rosenbloom protected it against that kind of judgment. The court of appeals affirmed, and Gertz sought review in the Supreme Court.

In an imprecise but significant opinion by Justice Lewis Powell the Supreme Court reversed, declaring the very public Mr. Gertz to be a private person in the circumstances of the case. The Court pointed out that Gertz, unknown to the jury, was simply a lawyer serving a client. On the assumption that private persons don't have the same access to the media that public officials and public figures have—although it was doubtful that this was true of Elmer Gertz—the Court essentially rejected the public issue rule of Rosenbloom and held that henceforth purely private or nonpublic persons, to succeed as plaintiffs in a libel suit, need only show negligence on the part of the defendant, a much lighter burden than actual malice.

The Court said a lot more, however, and not all of it unfavorable to the press. No longer was it enough for a plaintiff to be falsely defamed (the traditional libel per se where falsity, malice, and damages are presumed). There now must be a showing of negligence for, said Powell, there can be "no liability without fault." And the separate states would be allowed "substantial latitude" in determining the standard of care required of publishers.

Moreover, to discourage damages which may be destructive of unpopular ideas and of the press itself, private-person plaintiffs, said Powell, would have to come all the way up to the actual malice standard to claim punitive damages, which too often in the past had been out of all proportion to the harm inflicted by publication. Awards, then, in private person suits would henceforth be restricted to actual damages for demonstrated injury, whether personal humiliation, mental anguish, or whatever. (Note how Powell's notion of actual damages appears to subsume what we referred to earlier as compensatory or general damages.) A jury would assess injury on the basis of relevant testimony. In addition, there would be no punishment for opinions, no matter how pernicious. Under the First Amendment, said the Court, there is no such thing as a false idea. Facts and opinion would be distinguished whenever possible. Gertz governs the present law of libel. The plaintiff in April 1981 was awarded $100,000 in compensatory and $300,000 in punitive damages, and that result was affirmed by the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals on June 16, 1982 (Gertz v. Welch, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1769, 680 F.2d 527 [7th Cir. 1982].) Gertz had proven actual malice to the satisfaction of the district court jury, although there was some disagreement between trial and appeals courts as to whether quotations from public documents of a time past required such proof. More than a decade of litigation finally ended in early 1983 when the Supreme Court declined to review the seventh circuit holding.

GERTZ v. ROBERT WELCH, INC.

Justice POWELL delivered the opinion of the Court:

The principal issue in this case is whether a newspaper or broadcaster that publishes defamatory falsehoods about an individual who is neither a public official nor a public figure may claim a constitutional privilege against liability for the injury inflicted by those statements. The Court considered this question on the rather different set of facts presented in Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, Inc., 403 U.S. 29 * * * (1971). Rosenbloom, a distributor of nudist magazines, was arrested for selling allegedly obscene material while making a delivery to a retail dealer. The police obtained a warrant and seized his entire inventory of 3,000 books and magazines. He sought and obtained an injunction prohibiting further police interference with his business. He then sued a local radio station for failing to note in two of its newscasts that the 3,000 items seized were only "reportedly" or "allegedly" obscene and for broadcasting references to "the smut literature racket" and to "girlie-book peddlers" in its coverage of the court proceeding for injunctive relief. He obtained a judgment against the radio station, but the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit held the New York Times privilege applicable to the broadcast and reversed. 415 F.2d 892 (1969).

This Court affirmed the decision below, but no majority could agree on a controlling rationale. The eight Justices who participated in Rosenbloom announced their views in five separate opinions, none of which commanded more than three votes. The several statements not only reveal disagreement about the appropriate result in that case, they also reflect divergent traditions of thought about the general problem of reconciling the law of defamation with the First Amendment. One approach has been to extend the New York Times test to an expanding variety of situations. Another has been to vary the level of constitutional privilege for defamatory falsehood with the status of the person defamed. And a third view would grant to the press and broadcast media absolute immunity from liability for defamation. To place our holding in the proper context, we preface our discussion of this case with a review of the several Rosenbloom opinions and their antecedents.

In affirming the trial court's judgment in the instant case, the Court of Appeals relied on Justice Brennan's conclusion for the Rosenbloom plurality that "all discussion and communication involving matters of public or general concern," warrant the protection from liability for defamation accorded by the rule originally enunciated in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 * * * (1964). There this Court defined a constitutional privilege intended to free criticism of public officials from the restraints imposed by the common law of defamation. The Times ran a political advertisement endorsing civil rights demonstrations by black students in Alabama and impliedly condemning the performance of local law-enforcement officials. A police commissioner established in state court that certain misstatements in the advertisement referred to him and that they constituted libel per se under Alabama law. This showing left the Times with the single defense of truth, for under Alabama law neither good faith nor reasonable care would protect the newspaper from liability. This Court concluded that a "rule compelling the critic of official conduct to guarantee the truth of all his factual assertions" would deter protected speech, and announced the constitutional privilege designed to counter that effect:

> "The constitutional guarantees require, we think, a federal rule that prohibits a public official from recovering damages for a defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless he proves that the statement was made with 'actual malice'—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not." [Fn. omitted.]

Three years after New York Times, a majority of the Court agreed to extend the constitutional privilege to defamatory criticism of "public figures." This extension was announced in Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts and its companion, Associated Press v. Walker, 388 U.S. 130 * * * (1967). The first case involved the Saturday Evening Post's charge that Coach Wally Butts of the University of Georgia had conspired with Coach "Bear" Bryant of the University of Alabama to fix a football game between their respective schools. Walker involved an erroneous Associated Press account of former Major General Edwin Walker's participation in a University of Mississippi campus riot. Because Butts was paid by a private alumni association and Walker had resigned from the Army, neither could be classified as a "public official" under New York Times. Although Justice Harlan announced the result in both cases, a majority of the Court agreed with Mr. Chief Justice Warren's conclusion that the New York Times test should apply to criticism of "public figures" as well as "public officials." [7] The Court extended the constitutional privilege announced in that case to protect defamatory criticism of nonpublic persons who "are nevertheless intimately involved in the resolution of important public questions or, by reason of their fame, shape events in areas of concern to society at large."

In his opinion for the plurality in Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, Inc., Justice Brennan took the New York Times privilege one step further. He concluded that its protection should extend to defamatory falsehoods relating to private persons if the statements concerned matters of general or public interest. He abjured the suggested distinction between public officials and public figures on the one hand and private individuals on the other. He focused instead on society's interest in learning about certain issues: "If a matter is a subject of public or general interest, it cannot suddenly become less so merely because a private individual is involved, or because in some sense the individual did not 'voluntarily' choose to become involved." Thus, under the plurality opinion, a private citizen involuntarily associated with a matter of general interest has no recourse for injury to his reputation unless he can satisfy the demanding requirements of the New York Times test.

Two Members of the Court concurred in the result in Rosenbloom but departed from the reasoning of the plurality. Justice Black restated his view, long shared by Justice Douglas, that the First Amendment cloaks the news media with an absolute and indefeasible immunity from liability for defamation. Justice White concurred on a narrower ground. He concluded that "the First Amendment gives the press and the broadcast media a privilege to report and comment upon the official actions of public servants in full detail, with no requirement that the reputation or the privacy of an individual involved in or affected by the official action be spared from public view." He therefore declined to reach the broader questions addressed by the other Justices.

Justice Harlan dissented. Although he had joined the opinion of the Court in New York Times, in Curtis Publishing Co. he had contested the extension of the privilege to public figures. There he had argued that a public figure who held no governmental office should be allowed to recover damages for defamation "on a showing of highly unreasonable conduct constituting an extreme departure from the standards of investigation and reporting ordinarily adhered to by responsible publishers." In his Curtis Publishing Co. opinion Justice Harlan had distinguished New York Times primarily on the ground that defamation actions by public officials "lay close to seditious libel. * * *" Recovery of damages by one who held no public office, however, could not "be viewed as a vindication of governmental policy." Additionally, he had intimated that, because most public officials enjoyed absolute immunity from liability for their own defamatory utterances under Barr v. Matteo, 360 U.S. 564 * * * (1959), they lacked a strong claim to the protection of the courts.

In Rosenbloom Justice Harlan modified these views. He acquiesced in the application of the privilege to defamation of public figures but argued that a different rule should obtain where defamatory falsehood harmed a private individual. He noted that a private person has less likelihood "of securing access to channels of communication sufficient to rebut falsehoods concerning him" than do public officials and public figures, and has not voluntarily placed himself in the public spotlight. Justice Harlan concluded that the States could constitutionally allow private individuals to recover damages for defamation on the basis of any standard of care except liability without fault.

7. Professor Kalven once introduced a discussion of these cases with the apt heading, "You Can't Tell the Players without a Score Card." Kalven, The Reasonable Man and the First Amendment: Hill, Butts, and Walker, 1967 Sup.Ct.Rev. 267, 275. Only three other Justices joined Justice Harlan's analysis of the issues involved. In his concurring opinion, Chief Justice Warren stated the principle for which these cases stand—that the New York Times test reaches both public figures and public officials. Justice Brennan and Justice White agreed with the Chief Justice on that question. Justice Black and Justice Douglas reiterated their view that publishers should have an absolute immunity from liability for defamation, but they acquiesced in the Chief Justice's reasoning in order to enable a majority of the Justices to agree on the question of the appropriate constitutional privilege for defamation of public figures.

Justice Marshall dissented in Rosenbloom in an opinion joined by Justice Stewart. He thought that the plurality's "public or general interest" test for determining the applicability of the New York Times privilege would involve the courts in the dangerous business of deciding "what information is relevant to self-government." He also contended that the plurality's position inadequately served "society's interest in protecting private individuals from being thrust into the public eye by the distorting light of defamation." Justice Marshall therefore reached the conclusion, also reached by Justice Harlan, that the States should be "essentially free to continue the evolution of the common law of defamation and to articulate whatever fault standard best suits the State's need," so long as the States did not impose liability without fault. The principal point of disagreement among the three dissenters concerned punitive damages. Whereas Justice Harlan thought that the States could allow punitive damages in amounts bearing "a reasonable and purposeful relationship to the actual harm done * * *," Justice Marshall concluded that the size and unpredictability of jury awards of exemplary damages unnecessarily exacerbated the problems of media self-censorship and that such damages should therefore be forbidden.

We begin with the common ground. Under the First Amendment there is no such thing as a false idea. However pernicious an opinion may seem, we depend for its correction not on the conscience of judges and juries but on the competition of other ideas. But there is no constitutional value in false statements of fact. Neither the intentional lie nor the careless error materially advances society's interest in "uninhibited, robust, and wide-open" debate on public issues. New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S., at 270 * * *. They belong to that category of utterances which "are no essential part of any exposition of ideas, and are of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality." Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568, 572 * * * (1942). [Emphasis added.]

Although the erroneous statement of fact is not worthy of constitutional protection, it is nevertheless inevitable in free debate. As James Madison pointed out in the Report on the Virginia Resolutions of 1798: "Some degree of abuse is inseparable from the proper use of every thing; and in no instance is this more true than in that of the press." 4 J. Elliot, Debates on the Federal Constitution of 1787, p. 571 (1876). And punishment of error runs the risk of inducing a cautious and restrictive exercise of the constitutionally guaranteed freedoms of speech and press. Our decisions recognize that a rule of strict liability that compels a publisher or broadcaster to guarantee the accuracy of his factual assertions may lead to intolerable self-censorship. Allowing the media to avoid liability only by proving the truth of all injurious statements does not accord adequate protection to First Amendment liberties. As the Court stated in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, "Allowance of the defense of truth with the burden of proving it on the defendant, does not mean that only false speech will be deterred." The First Amendment requires that we protect some falsehood in order to protect speech that matters. [Emphasis added.]

The need to avoid self-censorship by the news media is, however, not the only societal value at issue. If it were, this Court would have embraced long ago the view that publishers and broadcasters enjoy an unconditional and indefeasible immunity from liability for defamation. Such a rule would, indeed, obviate the fear that the prospect of civil liability for injurious falsehood might dissuade a timorous press from the effective exercise of First Amendment freedoms. Yet absolute protection for the communications media requires a total sacrifice of the competing value served by the law of defamation.

The legitimate state interest underlying the law of libel is the compensation of individuals for the harm inflicted on them by defamatory falsehood. We would not lightly require the State to abandon this purpose, for, as Justice Stewart has reminded us, the individual's right to the protection of his own good name

> "reflects no more than our basic concept of the essential dignity and worth of every human being—a concept at the root of any decent system of ordered liberty. The protection of private personality, like the protection of life itself, is left primarily to the individual States under the Ninth and Tenth Amendments. But this does not mean that the right is entitled to any less recognition by this Court as a basic of our constitutional system." Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75, 92 (1966) (concurring opinion).

* * *

The New York Times standard defines the level of constitutional protection appropriate to the context of defamation of a public person. Those who, by reason of the notoriety of their achievements or the vigor and success with which they seek the public's attention, are properly classed as public figures and those who hold governmental office may recover for injury to reputation only on clear and convincing proof that the defamatory falsehood was made with knowledge of its falsity or with reckless disregard for the truth. This standard administers an extremely powerful antidote to the inducement to media self-censorship of the common-law rule of strict liability for libel and slander. And it exacts a correspondingly high price from the victims of defamatory falsehood. Plainly many deserving plaintiffs, including some intentionally subjected to injury, will be unable to surmount the barrier of the New York Times test. Despite this substantial abridgment of the state law right to compensation for wrongful hurt to one's reputation, the Court has concluded that the protection of the New York Times privilege should be available to publishers and broadcasters of defamatory falsehood concerning public officials and public figures. We think that these decisions are correct, but we do not find their holdings justified solely by reference to the interest of the press and broadcast media in immunity from liability. Rather, we believe that the New York Times rule states an accommodation between this concern and the limited state interest present in the context of libel actions brought by public persons. For the reasons stated below, we conclude that the state interest in compensating injury to the reputation of private individuals requires that a different rule should obtain with respect to them. [Emphasis added.]

* * *

* * * The first remedy of any victim of defamation is self-help—using available opportunities to contradict the lie or correct the error and thereby to minimize its adverse impact on reputation. Public officials and public figures usually enjoy significantly greater access to the channels of effective communication and hence have a more realistic opportunity to counteract false statements than private individuals normally enjoy. Private individuals are therefore more vulnerable to injury, and the state interest in protecting them is correspondingly greater.

More important than the likelihood that private individuals will lack effective opportunities for rebuttal, there is a compelling normative consideration underlying the distinction between public and private defamation plaintiffs. An individual who decides to seek governmental office must accept certain necessary consequences of that involvement in public affairs. He runs the risk of closer public scrutiny than might otherwise be the case. And society's interest in the officers of government is not strictly limited to the formal discharge of official duties. As the Court pointed out in Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S., at 77 * * *, the public's interest extends to "anything which might touch on an official's fitness for office. * * * Few personal attributes are more germane to fitness for office than dishonesty, malfeasance, or improper motivation, even though these characteristics may also affect the official's private character."

Those classed as public figures stand in a similar position. Hypothetically, it may be possible for someone to become a public figure through no purposeful action of his own, but the instances of truly involuntary public figures must be exceedingly rare. For the most part those who attain this status have assumed roles of especial prominence in the affairs of society. Some occupy positions of such persuasive power and influence that they are deemed public figures for all purposes. More commonly, those classed as public figures have thrust themselves to the forefront of particular public controversies in order to influence the resolution of the issues involved. In either event, they invite attention and comment. [Emphasis added.]

Even if the foregoing generalities do not obtain in every instance, the communications media are entitled to act on the assumption that public officials and public figures have voluntarily exposed themselves to increased risk of injury from defamatory falsehood concerning them. No such assumption is justified with respect to a private individual. He has not accepted public office or assumed an "influential role in ordering society." He has relinquished no part of his interest in the protection of his own good name, and consequently he has a more compelling call on the courts for redress of injury inflicted by defamatory falsehood. Thus, private individuals are not only more vulnerable to injury than public officials and public figures; they are also more deserving of recovery.

For these reasons we conclude that the States should retain substantial latitude in their efforts to enforce a legal remedy for defamatory falsehood injurious to the reputation of a private individual. The extension of the New York Times test proposed by the Rosenbloom plurality would abridge this legitimate state interest to a degree that we find unacceptable. And it would occasion the additional difficulty of forcing state and federal judges to decide on an ad hoc basis which publications address issues of "general or public interest" and which do not—to determine, in the words of Justice Marshall, "what information is relevant to self-government." Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, Inc., 403 U.S., at 79 * * *. We doubt the wisdom of committing this task to the conscience of judges. Nor does the Constitution require us to draw so thin a line between the drastic alternatives of the New York Times privilege and the common law of strict liability for defamatory error. The "public or general interest" test for determining the applicability of the New York Times standard to private defamation actions inadequately serves both of the competing values at stake. On the one hand, a private individual whose reputation is injured by defamatory falsehood that does concern an issue of public or general interest has no recourse unless he can meet the rigorous requirements of New York Times. This is true despite the factors that distinguish the state interest in compensating private individuals from the analogous interest involved in the context of public persons. On the other hand, a publisher or broadcaster of a defamatory error which a court deems unrelated to an issue of public or general interest may be held liable in damages even if it took every reasonable precaution to ensure the accuracy of its assertions. And liability may far exceed compensation for any actual injury to the plaintiff, for the jury may be permitted to presume damages without proof of loss and even to award punitive damages.

We hold that, so long as they do not impose liability without fault, the states may define for themselves the appropriate standard of liability for a publisher or broadcaster of defamatory falsehood injurious to a private individual. This approach provides a more equitable boundary between the competing concerns involved here. It recognizes the strength of the legitimate state interest in compensating private individuals for wrongful injury to reputation, yet shields the press and broadcast media from the rigors of strict liability for defamation. At least this conclusion obtains where, as here, the substance of the defamatory statement "makes substantial danger to reputation apparent." This phrase places in perspective the conclusion we announce today. Our inquiry would invqlve considerations somewhat different from those discussed above if a State purported to condition civil liability on a factual misstatement whose content did not warn a reasonably prudent editor or broadcaster of its defamatory potential. Such a case is not now before us, and we intimate no view as to its proper resolution. [Emphasis added.]

Our accommodation of the competing values at stake in defamation suits by private individuals allows the States to impose liability on the publisher or broadcaster of defamatory falsehood on a less demanding showing than that required by New York Times. This conclusion is not based on a belief that the considerations which prompted the adoption of the New York Times privilege for defamation of public officials and its extension to public figures are wholly inapplicable to the context of private individuals. Rather, we endorse this approach in recognition of the strong and legitimate state interest in compensating private individuals for injury to reputation. But this countervailing state interest extends no further than compensation for actual injury. For the reasons stated below, we hold that the States may not permit recovery of presumed or punitive damages, at least when liability is not based on a showing of knowledge of falsity or reckless disregard for the truth. [Emphasis added.]

The common law of defamation is an oddity of tort law, for it allows recovery of purportedly compensatory damages without evidence of actual loss. Under the traditional rules pertaining to actions for libel, the existence of injury is presumed from the fact of publication. Juries may award substantial sums as compensation for supposed damage to reputation without any proof that such harm actually occurred. The largely uncontrolled discretion of juries to award damages where there is no loss unnecessarily compounds the potential of any system of liability for defamatory falsehood to inhibit the vigorous exercise of First Amendment freedoms. Additionally, the doctrine of presumed damages invites juries to punish unpopular opinion rather than to compensate individuals for injury sustained by the publication of a false fact. More to the point, the States have no substantial interest in securing for plaintiffs such as this petitioner gratuitous awards of money damages far in excess of any actual injury.

We would not, of course, invalidate state law simply because we doubt its wisdom, but here we are attempting to reconcile state law with a competing interest grounded in the constitutional command of the First Amendment. It is therefore appropriate to require that state remedies for defamatory falsehood reach no farther than is necessary to protect the legitimate interest involved. It is necessary to restrict defamation plaintiffs who do not prove knowledge of falsity or reckless disregard for the truth to compensation for actual injury. We need not define "actual injury," as trial courts have wide experience in framing appropriate jury instructions in tort actions. Suffice it to say that actual injury is not limited to out-of-pocket loss. Indeed, the more customary types of actual harm inflicted by defamatory falsehood include impairment of reputation and standing in the community, personal humiliation, and mental anguish and suffering. Of course, juries must be limited by appropriate instructions, and all awards must be supported by competent evidence concerning the injury, although there need be no evidence which assigns an actual dollar value to the injury. [Emphasis added.]

We also find no justification for allowing awards of punitive damages against publishers and broadcasters held liable under state-defined standards of liability for defamation. In most jurisdictions jury discretion over the amounts awarded is limited only by the gentle rule that they not be excessive. Consequently, juries assess punitive damages in wholly unpredictable amounts bearing no necessary relation to the actual harm caused. And they remain free to use their discretion selectively to punish expressions of unpopular views. Like the doctrine of presumed damages, jury discretion to award punitive damages unnecessarily exacerbates the danger of media self-censorship, but, unlike the former rule, punitive damages are wholly irrelevant to the state interest that justifies a negligence standard for private defamation actions. They are not compensation for injury. Instead, they are private fines levied by civil juries to punish reprehensible conduct and to deter its future occurrence. In short, the private defamation plaintiff who establishes liability under a less demanding standard than that stated by New York Times may recover only such damages as are sufficient to compensate him for actual injury. [Emphasis added.]

Notwithstanding our refusal to extend the New York Times privilege to defamation of private individuals, respondent contends that we should affirm the judgment below on the ground that petitioner is either a public official or a public figure. There is little basis for the former assertion. Several years prior to the present incident, petitioner had served briefly on housing committees appointed by the mayor of Chicago, but at the time of publication he had never held any remunerative governmental position. Respondent admits this but argues that petitioner's appearance at the coroner's inquest rendered him a "de facto public official." Our cases recognized no such concept. Respondent's suggestion would sweep all lawyers under the New York Times rule as officers of the court and distort the plain meaning of the "public official" category beyond all recognition. We decline to follow it.

Respondent's characterization of petitioner as a public figure raises a different question. That designation may rest on either of two alternative bases. In some instances an individual may achieve such pervasive fame or notoriety that he becomes a public figure for all purposes and in all contexts. More commonly, an individual voluntarily injects himself or is drawn into a particular public controversy and thereby becomes a public figure for a limited range of issues. In either case such persons assume special prominence in the resolution of public questions. [Emphasis added.]

Petitioner has long been active in community and professional affairs. He has served as an officer of local civic groups and of various professional organizations, and he has published several books and articles on legal subjects. Although petitioner was consequently well known in some circles, he had achieved no general fame or notoriety in the community. None of the prospective jurors called at the trial had ever heard of petitioner prior to this litigation, and respondent offered no proof that this response was atypical of the local population. We would not lightly assume that a citizen's participation in community and professional affairs rendered him a public figure for all purposes. Absent clear evidence of general fame or notoriety in the community, and pervasive involvement in the affairs of society, an individual should not be deemed a public personality for all aspects of his life. It is preferable to reduce the public-figure question to a more meaningful context by looking to the nature and extent of an individual's participation in the particular controversy giving rise to the defamation. [Emphasis added.]

In this context it is plain that petitioner was not a public figure. He played a minimal role at the coroner's inquest, and his participation related solely to his representation of a private client. He took no part in the criminal prosecution of Officer Nuccio. Moreover, he never discussed either the criminal or civil litigation with the press and was never quoted as having done so. He plainly did not thrust himself into the vortex of this public issue, nor did he engage the public's attention in an attempt to influence its outcome. We are persuaded that the trial court did not err in refusing to characterize petitioner as a public figure for the purpose of this litigation.

We therefore conclude that the New York Times standard is inapplicable to this case and that the trial court erred in entering judgment for respondent. Because the jury was allowed to impose liability without fault and was permitted to presume damages without proof of injury, a new trial is necessary. We reverse and remand for further proceedings in accord with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

Reversed and remanded.

COMMENT

Justices Brennan and White wrote strong dissenting opinions for different reasons. Brennan, who authored the landmark opinion for the Court in New York Times v. Sullivan and the opinion for the plurality in Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, did not wish to abandon the actual malice standard of those cases. In his view anyone involved in events of public or general interest should have to show knowing or reckless falsity to win a libel judgment.

Matters of public interest, said Brennan, reiterating his opinion for the Court in Rosenbloom, do not "suddenly become less so merely because a private individual is involved, or because in some sense the individual did not 'voluntarily' choose to become involved."

Brennan had used his opinion for the Court in the landmark privacy case, Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374 (1967), this text, p. 316, to argue for a "public issue" or "newsworthiness" test in all libel and privacy cases. Anything less, for example a "reasonable care" standard, is "elusive," said Brennan, and would saddle the press with "the intolerable burden of guessing how a jury might assess the reasonableness of steps taken by it to verify the accuracy of every reference to a name, picture or portrait." The result would be self-censorship.

At the other end of the spectrum, Justice White would have moved the Court back to the common law standard of "strict liability." That is, one who publishes a statement that later turns out to be inaccurate can never be "without fault," for one is not compelled to circulate a falsehood.

White, joined by Chief Justice Warren Burger, objected to the scrapping of state libel laws in favor of a newly announced First Amendment mandate which required private plaintiffs to prove actual injury to their reputations and culpability on the part of the defendant. People would now be powerless to protect their reputations. "No longer," said White, "will the plaintiff be able to rest his case with proof of a libel defamatory on its face or proof of a slander historically actionable per se." And it was the apparent demise of libel per se through a discarding of "history and precedent" that White lamented. Clearly, White was calling for a return to something like the common law rules of libel.

It was also the "severe invasion of the prerogatives of the [s]tates" that exercised Justice White. But the trend may truly be in the other direction. Justice Brennan has called the ascendancy of the states "probably the most important development in constitutional jurisprudence today."[89] Two 1986 New Jersey Supreme Court rulings reflect the renewed reliance on state statute or precedent.[90] The question remains: How do we fit such cases into the federal mandate of New York Times v. Sullivan and its progeny?

Whatever the merits of Justice White's long and vigorous Gertz dissent, he was at least partially correct when he said that "judges and juries who must live by these rules [the Gertz rules] will find them * * * incomprehensible."

Two years after Gertz, the Supreme Court tried unsuccessfully to clarify it in a melodramatic case involving the scion of one of America's wealthier industrial families and his socialite spouse.[91] In dissolving their marriage, a Florida circuit court issued a judgment containing language such as "extramarital escapades * * * which would have made Dr. Freud's hair curl" and "bounding from one bedpartner to another with the erotic zest of a satyr." In a comparatively temperate "Milestones" paragraph, Time magazine erroneously reported that Mary Alice Firestone had been divorced for adultery. Technically she hadn't. The marriage had been dissolved because "neither of the parties has shown the least susceptibility to domestication." Mrs. Firestone sued.

In spite of the fact that plaintiff employed a clipping bureau, regularly held press conferences and was a visible part of the Palm Beach social whirl, Justice Rehnquist, writing for the Court, defined her as a private person who had "not thrust herself to the forefront of any particular public controversy. * * * She was compelled to go to court by the state in order to obtain legal release from the bonds of matrimony."

Privilege to report on judicial proceedings, Rehnquist added, did not include the false and inaccurate. But here the jury's finding rested on a rather technical point of legal language: the divorce court had not based its decision on adultery, as stated in the Time article. Granted that the trial court's decree was unclear: this did not license Time, said the Court, to choose from among several conceivable interpretations the one most damaging to Mrs. Firestone.

Another obfuscating element in the case was that Mrs. Firestone had withdrawn her claim for damages to reputation and had based her case on "personal humiliation and mental anguish and suffering." This would have the effect of giving life to a new tort that would eventually be aborted in the 1988 case involving Hustler magazine and the Rev. Jerry Falwell[92] (see p. 261).

The Core of Libel

Gertz and Firestone, whatever their problems, do get us, finally, to the core of libel: There can be no liability without fault. Public persons would be required to show actual malice; private persons negligence. [Dun & Bradstreet, Inc. v. Greenmoss Builders, Inc., 472 U.S. 749 (1985) may require amendment of this core principle of libel, i.e., fault must be shown only where there is a matter of public concern. Otherwise, state rules of strict liability may still be valid.] Mrs. Firestone, in the circumstances of the case, was a private person. Had the news magazine been negligent in misreading the complicated judicial order? No court below had considered the question. Said Justice Rehnquist:

> It may well be that petitioner's account in its "Milestones" section was the product of some fault on its part, and that the libel judgment against it was, therefore, entirely consistent with Gertz. But in the absence of a finding in some element of the state court system that there was fault, we are not inclined to canvass the record to make such a determination in the first instance. [Emphasis added.]

The judgment of Florida's supreme court was vacated, and the case remanded. It appears that a retrial was never held.

Central to the case was the question of how much care the publication took in reading an admittedly ambiguous court order. Should the magazine have known that Florida law denies alimony to an adulterous spouse? That question aside, the report was inaccurate. In Cox Broadcasting Corp. v. Cohn, 420 U.S. 469 (1975), the Court did say that the Constitution precludes states from imposing liability on truthful publication based on official court records open to public inspection. But Time's report was false.

Gertz and Firestone leave a number of questions unanswered but, at the same time, lay down what are the current rules of libel law. For example:

1. There is no more strict liability, that is, libel per se where defamation, falsity, and injury are presumed, even where there is a private-person plaintiff if the defamation involves a matter of public concern. These elements in such circumstances must now be demonstrated by the plaintiff.
2. The line between public and private persons is often a fine one, and, according to Justice Rehnquist, the involuntary public figure may indeed be a rare breed.

91. Time, Inc. v. Firestone, 424 U.S. 448, 96 S.Ct. 958, 47 L.Ed.2d 154 (1976).
92. Hustler Magazine v. Falwell, 14 Med.L.Rptr. 2281, 108 S.Ct. 876 (1988).

3. As long as fault has been demonstrated, the states may define negligence (the burden of proof placed on private plaintiffs) as they see fit.[93] By implication the actual malice standard, applicable to public plaintiffs, is a federal constitutional standard with a firm definition—knowing falsehood or reckless disregard as to truth or falsity. (Actually there are two definitions within that single phrase.)
4. States may only compensate plaintiffs for actual injury (whatever form that injury may take).
5. Punitive damages, even for private plaintiffs if involved in matters of public concern, require a showing of actual malice. Unrestrained punitive damages, the Court believes, "inhibit the vigorous exercise of First Amendment freedoms."

CONSTRUCTING A DEFENSE

Falsity and Fault

It can be argued from Gertz and Firestone that he who must prove fault (negligence or actual malice depending upon the private/public status of the plaintiff) must also prove falsity. They are part of the same package. Falsity alone is not enough. But failure to demonstrate falsity at the threshold may lead to summary judgment in favor of the defendant news organization and end the suit. Certainly minor errors of fact are not enough if the general characterization or contours of a situation are adequately presented.

The headline, "Killer Who Came Straight From Hell," characterizing a convicted triple murderer, was close enough to the truth to warrant summary judgment for a newspaper, despite a pending appeal.[94] More precisely, of course, the headline has nothing to do with the elusive concept of truth at all: it is purely a statement of opinion (see p. 252 ff).

This is not to suggest that an editor shouldn't have tangible evidence of truth at her fingertips. Latitude will be given to inaccuracies where the complex or technical language of law, science, or economics is involved.

The highly publicized libel cases of the generals—Sharon and Westmoreland—demonstrate the symbiosis between falsity and fault. Sharon and Westmoreland sued Time and CBS for $50 million and $120 million respectively. In a report on the massacre of Palestinian refugees, a Time report intimated that the Israeli general had discussed revenge with Phalangist assassins. Westmoreland was accused in a 1982 broadcast, "The Uncounted Enemy: A Vietnam Deception," of conspiring to deflate the reported number of enemy troops.

Both libel cases were heard at the same time in a federal district court building in Manhattan and were presided over by two distinguished federal judges, Abraham Sofaer for Sharon and Pierre Leval for Westmoreland. Each judge tried to simplify the rules of libel for the jury. Judge Sofaer, in fact, instructed his jury to consider three factors separately and in order: defamation; falsity; and actual malice (fault).

It is important to note that both cases were concluded in early 1985 before the juries ever reached the "fault" question. General Sharon claimed victory when the jury, at the second stage of his case as defined by the judge, said, yes, the story was false. He was probably correct in anticipating that actual malice (knowing falsehood or reckless disregard as to truth or falsity) would be difficult to prove. General Westmoreland dropped his case against CBS in exchange for a statement from the network saying that it had never intended to impugn the general's patriotism or loyalty. Westmoreland's case never got beyond the barrier of falsity. When two former aides to the general indicated that some of their testimony would contradict his, his probability of showing falsity diminished. Although no damages were paid, both plaintiffs claimed victory against the news media. And, in a sense, they did win.

William Shannon in a November 9, 1986 Washington Post review of Renata Adler's book on the two cases, Reckless Disregard, wrote that she "leaves in shreds and tatters the professional reputations of both Time and CBS * * *" They were wrong, he added, refused to admit error, and deployed huge financial and legal resources "to obscure the truth and defeat justice."

Marvin Frankel's same-day review in the New York Times called the book a critical commentary on both law and journalism, perhaps equally repre-

93. Firestone may also stand for the proposition that "the law must allow some leeway for misinterpretation and error" where the technical language of the law is concerned. See Orr v. Argus-Press Co., 586 F.2d 1108 (6th Cir. 1978), cert. den. 440 U.S. 960 (1979).

hensible, and both not above trying to intimidate an author—lawyers by attempting to discourage original publication of the book in The New Yorker[95] and journalists by threatening lawsuits of their own.

Eventually Adler, lawyer, critic, reporter, and novelist, became as adversarial as the lawyers she criticized for using any means to win. She sued and was herself sued. Numerous reviews faulted the accuracy of Adler's report and interpretations of the trial documents. Some of the reviewers, however, did not appear to have read the book carefully. Frankel, for example, missed her explanation for Westmoreland's decision to settle: her feeling that his attorney had been outmatched and no longer had stomach for the contest.

Among the most thoughtful and temperate reviews of Adler and her book was Jonathan Z. Larsen's "Tort Song Trilogy" in the November 1986 issue of Manhattan, Inc. The disagreements over accuracy in interpreting complex judicial records and the records of actual events, he believes, are best left to history. But he does criticize Adler for using techniques herself that she condemns in others, e.g., failing to contact those against whom allegations are to be made. Nevertheless, Adler does write with an authority missing in the work of some of her detractors.

What other evidence was there in the cases for flawed journalism? Under questioning by Judge Sofaer, Time magazine's correspondent, David Halevy, admitted that he had merely inferred that Appendix B to the Kahan Commission report (an Israeli government document) implicated General Sharon in the Phalangist massacre of more than 500 Palestinian women and children.

Katherine Evans, writing in the New York Times Book Review, reminded her readers that the CBS program was attacked in TV Guide (Don Kowet and Sally Bedell), on PBS, and in its own in-house investigation by CBS veteran Burton Benjamin (Fair Play: CBS, General Westmoreland, and How a Television Documentary Went Wrong, New York: Harper & Row, 1988). His report uncovered imbalance, coddling of sympathetic witnesses, misleading editing, and lack of supervision by editors. Speculation on the effects of the suit on CBS are contained in P. J. Boyer's, Who Killed CBS? (New York: Random House, 1988) and in E. Joyce's Prime Times, Bad Times (New York: Doubleday, 1988).

Bob Brewin of The Village Voice and Sydney Shaw of UPI in Vietnam on Trial (New York: Atheneum, 1987), an evenhanded account of the Westmoreland case, believe that all the players felt a need to justify their positions within the debacle that was Vietnam. CBS was unfair. Westmoreland's case was greatly weakened when two military aides testified that he had placed a lid on enemy troop estimates.

The cases of the generals do demonstrate the advantage the New York Times/Gertz standards give defendants in libel suits. First, the plaintiff must prove falsity, that a publication is not true. The law may be assuming too clear a line between truth and falsehood, especially when one moves into the nether world of opinion. But the law expects the threshold requirement of falsity to be met by the plaintiff, and, if the plaintiff fails, it becomes a defense for the publisher. Plaintiff will attack defendant's evidence of truth—witnesses, sources, veracity—and defendant will respond. Together they will test the probable truth of a publication. Plaintiff will have some advantage in having more convincing evidence about himself than a defendant has. The discovery process preceding trial is meant to uncover all relevant evidence of truth or falsity. Many cases end at this point either by dismissal or summary judgment.

In Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps, 106 S.Ct. 1558, 12, Med. L.Rptr. 1558 (1986), the Court said that inability to prove a publication false would prevent a judgment for the plaintiff where the defamation involved a matter of public concern, no matter how reprehensible the media defendant's conduct. And a poorly written story, handled recklessly or negligently, is not actionable if true.

Having proven falsity, the plaintiff must move on to prove fault, a no less formidable task. Fault comes in two sizes: negligence for private-person plaintiffs, actual malice for public-person plaintiffs.

Negligence

Adding complexity to the tapestry of libel law was Gertz's invitation to the states to define for themselves the appropriate standard of liability for defamation of private persons. There would be "no liability without fault," said the Court, but application of the rule might vary from state to state.

More than forty states have adopted the negligence rule of Gertz for private-person libels. A few states, among them Alaska, California, Colorado, Indiana, and New Jersey, require the higher standard of actual malice where private plaintiffs are involved in controversial issues of public concern. This may suggest the sturdiness of Rosenbloom's public issue test.

A few states seem to require something less than actual malice but more than negligence for private-person plaintiffs. Although this situation is always fluid and must be checked carefully by the practitioner, Connecticut, Iowa, Louisiana, Montana, and New Hampshire may fall in this category.

New York's somewhat unique private person test, also somewhere between negligence and actual malice, echoes the Butts-Walker "prudent-publisher" test. A New York public school teacher sued a Utica newspaper for reporting erroneously that he was part of a trio arrested for a serious drug offense involving heroin. A trial court denied the newspaper's motion for summary judgment, but the appellate division reversed and was affirmed by the court of appeals, New York's highest court. The news report was said to fall within a sphere of legitimate public concern. In such circumstances a plaintiff may recover only if it is established by a preponderance of evidence that the publisher acted in a grossly irresponsible manner and without due consideration for standards of information gathering and dissemination ordinarily followed by responsible journalists. The offending article was written only after two authoritative sources had been consulted, and it was not published until it had been checked by at least two persons other than the writer. Chapadeau v. Utica Observer-Dispatch, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1693, 379 N.Y.S.2d 61 (1975). In Greenberg v. CBS, 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1470, 419 N.Y.S.2d 988, 997 (1979), another New York court used a "gross negligence" standard. Yet another in Karaduman v. Newsday, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2345, 435 N.Y.S.2d 556 (1980), spoke of plaintiffs having to show that an editor acted in a "grossly irresponsible manner."

Justice Powell in Gertz talks about the "reasonably prudent editor or broadcaster." Chapadeau suggests that fault be measured against the standards of the profession of journalism, the industry, or what is "normal" publishing practice. States, however, increasingly appear to favor a "reasonable man" or "ordinary care" standard. Courts have been unwilling to allow the press to establish its own standard as the norm. A host of questions rush in at this point.

What are the standards of industry? Journalism educators have made themselves controversial by testifying on the question as expert witnesses.[96] Professor W. Wat Hopkins recommends a "journalistic malpractice" standard which can be compared with known news presentation norms.[97] Could it be? Would journalism's codes of ethics become the standard? And is this acceptable? Or would judges and jurors, in the final analysis, measure compliance against codes and decide what is proper journalistic practice? How about "expert" opinions from other editors as a help to courts in establishing norms? Should anyone believe fellow members of the "news" club?

While these questions remain for the most part unanswered, it may be useful to suggest some of the journalistic sins that have constituted negligence: Reliance on a single or an anonymous source without further checking. Reliance on other media without an independent investigation. Careless misstatement of the contents of a document, transcript, or report to the detriment of the plaintiff. Failure to contact a defamed person before publication or make use of available sources who might view that person favorably. Check and recheck is still the best guide to accuracy. And use tape-recorders where feasible, although jurors have proven not to like surreptitious taping. Consider the reliability of sources—always. Strive for balance and fairness. Print denials. Check the accuracy of previously published information. Watch letters to the editor like a hawk. Look out for sources with axes to grind or a financial interest in what you print.

Normally a publication crossing many state lines should be prepared to meet at least the negligence standard of Gertz. Federal courts have followed the case more strictly than state courts, although federal courts will show deference to state libel laws.[98] Gertz has been interpreted to mean that any state standard will do as long as there is "no liability without fault"—at least where the defamation involves a matter of public concern.

Actual Malice

Actual malice is negligence raised to a higher power. "Knowledge of falsity or reckless disregard for the truth" is how Gertz defines the term. Knowing falsehood would seem to require the reading of a newsperson's mind, and there is a divergence of opinion as to whether our First Amendment tradition permits that kind of governmental intrusion. Judges Kaufman and Oakes in their Second Circuit Court of Appeals opinions in Herbert v. Lando[99] acknowledged that "knowing falsehood" and its parent concept of malice had always implied the reading of a defendant's mind by hunch, impression, inference, or what Oakes would call later the "inquisition of Galileo."[100] But they would close the door to such probing on the assumption that exposure of subjective thought processes would chill journalistic endeavor completely.

Justice Brennan, dissenting in part in the next step of the case that would reverse Kaufman and Oakes,[101] defined the interior mental sets of newspersons as unprivileged matters of fact which, if regulated, would regulate expression itself. But, he said, if mental processes can't be regulated, they can be probed. Any other view, of course, would seriously question the actual malice test that Brennan had fashioned for the Court. Brennan went on to suggest that the editorial process writ large, predecisional and deliberative conversations among newsroom personnel, would be privileged in the absence of prima facie evidence of defamatory falsehood. But once falsity is demonstrated, does he mean that what one says in the newsroom is better protected than what one thinks? Is this judicial "sodium pentathol," court certification of the probing of the unconscious journalistic mind?[102]

In Herbert v. Lando a federal district court held that a public figure who had brought a $45 million libel suit against a "60 Minutes" producer was entitled under the federal rules of civil procedure to undertake pretrial discovery of any documents in the network's files relevant to the broadcast in order to produce evidence of defendant's "slipshod and sketchy investigative techniques."[103] Plaintiff, a maverick former army colonel, was permitted to appraise conclusions reached by CBS reporters during and after their investigations by having access to their informal conversations with one another and with their sources and by exploring their states of mind and intentions. Newspeople were distressed. Lando's deposition required twenty-six sessions and stretched over a year. The nearly 3,000 pages of transcripts and 240 exhibits included reporters' notes, network memoranda, drafts and scripts, unused film, and videotapes of interviews. Plaintiff's depositions were in turn substantial.

HERBERT v. LANDO ET AL.

Justice WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

By virtue of the First and Fourteenth Amendments, neither the Federal nor a State Government may make any law "abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press * * *." The question here is whether those Amendments should be construed to provide further protection for the press when sued for defamation than has hitherto been recognized. More specifically, we are urged to hold for the first time that when a member of the press is alleged to have circulated damaging falsehoods and is sued for injury to the plaintiff's reputation, the plaintiff is barred from inquiring into the editorial processes of those responsible for the publication, even though the inquiry would produce evidence material to the proof of a critical element of his cause of action.

We have concluded that the Court of Appeals misconstrued the First and Fourteenth Amendments and accordingly reverse its judgment.

* * *

* * * New York Times and its progeny made it essential to proving liability that plaintiffs focus on the conduct and state of mind of the defendant. To be liable, the alleged defamer of public officials or of public figures must know or have reason to suspect that his publication is false. In other cases proof of some kind of fault, negligence perhaps, is essential to recovery. Inevitably, unless liability is to be completely foreclosed, the thoughts and editorial processes of the alleged defamer would be open to examination.

It is also untenable to conclude from our cases that, although proof of the necessary state of mind could be in the form of objective circumstances from which the ultimate fact could be inferred, plaintiffs may not inquire directly from the defendants whether they knew or had reason to suspect that their damaging publication was in error. In Butts, 388 U.S. 130 (1967), for example, it is evident from the record that the editorial process had been subjected to close examination and that direct as well as indirect evidence was relied on to prove that the defendant magazine had acted with actual malice. The damages verdict was sustained without any suggestion that plaintiff's proof had trenched upon forbidden areas.

Reliance upon such state-of-mind evidence is by no means a recent development arising from New York Times and similar cases. Rather, it is deeply rooted in the common-law rule, predating the First Amendment, that a showing of malice on the part of the defendant permitted plaintiffs to recover punitive or enhanced damages. In Butts, the Court affirmed the substantial award of punitive damages which in Georgia were conditioned upon a showing of "wanton or reckless indifference or culpable negligence" or "ill will, spite, hatred and an intent to injure * * *." 388 U.S., at 165–166. Neither Justice Harlan, id., at 156–162, nor Chief Justice Warren, concurring, id., at 165–168, raised any question as to the propriety of having the award turn on such a showing or as to the propriety of the underlying evidence, which plainly included direct evidence going to the state of mind of the publisher and its responsible agents.

Furthermore, long before New York Times was decided, certain qualified privileges had developed to protect a publisher from liability for libel unless the publication was made with malice. Malice was defined in numerous ways, but in general depended upon a showing that the defendant acted with improper motive. This showing in turn hinged upon the intent or purpose with which the publication was made, the belief of the defendant in the truth of his statement, or upon the ill will which the defendant might have borne towards the defendant.

Courts have traditionally admitted any direct or indirect evidence relevant to the state of mind of the defendant and necessary to defeat a conditional privilege or enhance damages. The rules are applicable to the press and to other defendants alike, and it is evident that the courts across the country have long been accepting evidence going to the editorial processes of the media without encountering constitutional objections.

In the face of this history, old and new, the Court of Appeals nevertheless declared that two of this Court's cases had announced unequivocal protection for the editorial process.

In each of these cases, Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974), and Columbia Broadcasting System v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. 94 (1973), we invalidated governmental efforts to pre-empt editorial decision by requiring the publication of specified material. In Columbia Broadcasting System, it was the requirement that a television network air paid political advertisements and in Tornillo, a newspaper's obligation to print a political candidate's reply to press criticism. Insofar as the laws at issue in Tornillo and Columbia Broadcasting System sought to control in advance the content of the publication, they were deemed as invalid as were prior efforts to enjoin publication of specified materials.

But holdings that neither a State nor the Federal Government may dictate what must or must not be printed neither expressly nor impliedly suggest that the editorial process is immune from any inquiry whatsoever. It is incredible to believe that the Court in Columbia Broadcasting System or in Tornillo silently effected a substantial contraction of the rights preserved to defamation plaintiffs in Sullivan, Butts and like cases.

Tornillo and Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., were announced on the same day; and although the Court's opinion in Gertz contained an overview of recent developments in the relationship between the First Amendment and the law of libel, there was no hint that a companion case had narrowed the evidence available to a defamation plaintiff. Quite the opposite inference is to be drawn from the Gertz opinion since it, like prior First Amendment libel cases, recited without criticism the facts of record indicating that the state of mind of the editor had been placed at issue. Nor did the Gertz opinion, in requiring proof of some degree of fault on the part of the defendant editor and in forbidding punitive damages absent at least reckless disregard of truth or falsity, suggest that the First Amendment also foreclosed direct inquiry into these critical elements.

In sum, contrary to the views of the Court of Appeals, according an absolute privilege to the editorial process of a media defendant in a libel case is not required, authorized or presaged by our prior cases, and would substantially enhance the burden of proving actual malice, contrary to the expectations of New York Times, Butts and similar cases.

In the first place, it is plain enough that the suggested privilege for the editorial process would constitute a substantial interference with the ability of a defamation plaintiff to establish the ingredients of malice as required by New York Times. As respondents would have it, the defendant's reckless disregard of the truth, a critical element, could not be shown by direct evidence through inquiry into the thoughts, opinions and conclusions of the publisher but could be proved only by objective evidence from which the ultimate fact could be inferred. It may be that plaintiffs will rarely be successful in proving awareness of falsehood from the mouth of the defendant himself, but the relevance of answers to such inquiries, which the District Court recognized and the Court of Appeals did not deny, can hardly be doubted. To erect an impenetrable barrier to the plaintiff's use of such evidence on his side of the case is a matter of some substance, particularly when defendants themselves are prone to assert their good-faith belief in the truth of their publications, and libel plaintiffs are required to prove knowing or reckless falsehood with "convincing clarity." New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S., at 285–286.

Furthermore, the outer boundaries of the editorial privilege now urged are difficult to perceive. The opinions below did not state, and respondents do not explain, precisely when the editorial process begins and when it ends. Moreover, although we are told that respondent Lando was willing to testify as to what he "knew" and what he had "learned" from his interviews, as opposed to what he "believed," it is not at all clear why the suggested editorial privilege would not cover knowledge as well as belief about the veracity of published reports. It is worth noting here that the privilege as asserted by respondents would also immunize from inquiry the internal communications occurring during the editorial process and thus place beyond reach what the defendant participants learned or knew as the result of such collegiate conversations or exchanges. If damaging admissions to colleagues are to be barred from evidence, would a reporter's admissions made to third parties not participating in the editorial process also be immune from inquiry? We thus have little doubt that Herbert and other defamation plaintiffs have important interests at stake in opposing the creation of the asserted privilege.

Nevertheless, we are urged by respondents to override these important interests because requiring disclosure of editorial conversations and of a reporter's conclusions about the veracity of the material he has gathered will have an intolerable chilling effect on the editorial process and editorial decision-making. But if the claimed inhibition flows from the fear of damages liability for publishing knowing or reckless falsehoods, those effects are precisely what New York Times and other cases have held to be consistent with the First Amendment. Spreading false information in and of itself carries no First Amendment credentials. "[T]here is no constitutional value in false statements of fact." Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S., at 340.

Realistically, however, some error is inevitable; and the difficulties of separating fact from fiction convinced the Court in New York Times, Butts, Gertz, and similar cases to limit liability to instances where some degree of culpability is present in order to eliminate the risk of undue self-censorship and the suppression of truthful material. Those who publish defamatory falsehoods with the requisite culpability, however, are subject to liability, the aim being not only to compensate for injury but also to deter publication of unprotected material threatening injury to individual reputation. Permitting plaintiffs such as Herbert to prove their cases by direct as well as indirect evidence is consistent with the balance struck by our prior decisions. If such proof results in liability for damages which in turn discourages the publication of erroneous information known to be false or probably false, this is no more than what our cases contemplate and does not abridge either freedom of speech or of the press.

Of course, if inquiry into editorial conclusions threatens the suppression not only of information known or strongly suspected to be unreliable but also of truthful information, the issue would be quite different. But as we have said, our cases necessarily contemplate examination of the editorial process to prove the necessary awareness of probable falsehood, and if indirect proof of this element does not stifle truthful publication and is consistent with the First Amendment, as respondents seem to concede, we do not understand how direct inquiry with respect to the ultimate issue would be substantially more suspect. Perhaps such examination will lead to liability that would not have been found without it, but this does not suggest that the determinations in these instances will be inaccurate and will lead to the suppression of protected information. On the contrary, direct inquiry from the actors, which affords the opportunity to refute inferences that might otherwise be drawn from circumstantial evidence, suggests that more accurate results will be obtained by placing all, rather than part, of the evidence before the decisionmaker. Suppose, for example, that a reporter has two contradictory reports about the plaintiff, one of which is false and damaging, and only the false one is published. In resolving the issue whether the publication was known or suspected to be false, it is only common sense to believe that inquiry from the author, with an opportunity to explain, will contribute to accuracy. If the publication is false but there is an exonerating explanation, the defendant will surely testify to this effect. Why should not the plaintiff be permitted to inquire before trial? On the other hand, if the publisher in fact had serious doubts about accuracy, but published nevertheless, no undue self-censorship will result from permitting the relevant inquiry. Only knowing or reckless error will be discouraged; and unless there is to be an absolute First Amendment privilege to inflict injury by knowing or reckless conduct, which respondents do not suggest, constitutional values will not be threatened.

It is also urged that frank discussion among reporters and editors will be dampened and sound editorial judgment endangered if such exchanges, oral or written, are subject to inquiry by defamation plaintiffs. We do not doubt the direct relationship between consultation and discussion on the one hand and sound decisions on the other; but whether or not there is liability for the injury, the press has an obvious interest in avoiding the infliction of harm by the publication of false information, and it is not unreasonable to expect the media to invoke whatever procedures that may be practicable and useful to that end. Moreover, given exposure to liability when there is knowing or reckless error, there is even more reason to resort to prepublication precautions, such as a frank interchange of fact and opinion. Accordingly, we find it difficult to believe that error-avoiding procedures will be terminated or stifled simply because there is liability for culpable error and because the editorial process will itself be examined in the tiny percentage of instances in which error is claimed and litigation ensues. Nor is there sound reason to believe that editorial exchanges and the editorial process are so subject to distortion and to such recurring misunderstanding that they should be immune from examination in order to avoid erroneous judgments in defamation suits. The evidentiary burden Herbert must carry to prove at least reckless disregard for the truth is substantial indeed, and we are unconvinced that his chances of winning an undeserved verdict are such that an inquiry into what Lando learned or said during editorial process must be foreclosed.

This is not to say that the editorial discussions or exchanges have no constitutional protection from casual inquiry. There is no law that subjects the editorial process to private or official examination merely to satisfy curiosity or to serve some general end such as the public interest; and if there were, it would not survive constitutional scrutiny as the First Amendment is presently construed. No such problem exists here, however, where there is a specific claim of injury arising from a publication that is alleged to have been knowing or recklessly false.[23]

Evidentiary privileges in litigation are not favored, and even those rooted in the Constitution must give way in proper circumstances. The President, for example, does not have an absolute privilege against disclosure of materials subpoenaed for a judicial proceeding. United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974). In so holding, we found that although the President has a powerful interest in confidentiality of communications between himself and his advisers, that interest must yield to a demonstrated specific need for evidence. As we stated, in referring to existing limited privileges against disclosure, "[w]hatever their origins, these exceptions to the demand for every man's evidence are not lightly created nor expansively construed, for they are in derogation of the search for truth." Id., at 710.

With these considerations in mind, we conclude that the present construction of the First Amendment should not be modified by creating the evidentiary privilege which the respondents now urge.

Although defamation litigation, including suits against the press, is an ancient phenomenon, it is true that our cases from New York Times to Gertz have considerably changed the profile of such cases. In years gone by, plaintiffs made out a prima facie case by proving the damaging publication. Truth and privilege were defenses. Intent, motive and malice were not necessarily involved except to counter qualified privilege or to prove exemplary damages. The plaintiff's burden is now considerably expanded. In every or almost every case, the plaintiff must focus on the editorial process and prove a false publication attended by some degree of culpability on the part of the publisher. If plaintiffs in consequence now resort to more discovery, it would not be surprising; and it would follow that the costs and other burdens of this kind of litigation have escalated and become much more troublesome for both plaintiffs and defendants. It is suggested that the press needs constitutional protection from these burdens if it is to perform its task, which is indispensable in a system such as ours.

Creating a constitutional privilege foreclosing direct inquiry into the editorial process, however, would not cure this problem for the press. Only complete immunity from liability from defamation would effect this result, and the Court has regularly found this to be an untenable construction of the First Amendment. Furthermore mushrooming litigation costs, much of it due to pretrial discovery, are not peculiar to the libel and slander area. There have been repeated expressions of concern about undue and uncontrolled discovery, and voices from this Court have joined the chorus. But until and unless there are major changes in the present rules of civil procedure, reliance must be had on what in fact and in law are ample powers of the district judge to prevent abuse.

The Court has more than once declared that the deposition-discovery rules are to be accorded a broad and liberal treatment to effect their purpose of adequately informing the litigants in civil trials. But the discovery provisions, like all of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, are subject to the injunction of Rule 1 that they "be construed to secure the just, speedy, and inexpensive determination of every action." [Emphasis added.] To this end, the requirement of Rule 26(b)(1) that the material sought in discovery be "relevant" should be firmly applied, and the district courts should not neglect their power to restrict discovery where "justice requires [protection for] a party or person from annoyance, embarassment, oppression, or undue burden or expense. * * *" Fed. Rule Civ.Proc. 26(c). With this authority at hand, judges should not hesitate to exercise appropriate control over the discovery process.

Whether, as a nonconstitutional matter, however, the trial judge properly applied the rules of discovery was not within the boundaries of the question certified under 28 U.S.C.A. § 1292(b) and accordingly is not before us. The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed. So ordered.

23. Justice Brennan would extend more constitutional protection to editorial discussion by excusing answers to relevant questions about in-house conversations until the plaintiff has made a prima facie case of falsity. If this suggestion contemplates a bifurcated trial, first on falsity and then on culpability and injury, we decline to subject libel trials to such burdensome complications and intolerable delay. On the other hand, if, as seems more likely, the prima facie showing does not contemplate a mini-trial on falsity, no resolution of conflicting evidence on this issue, but only a credible assertion by the plaintiff, it smacks of a requirement that could be satisfied by an affidavit or a simple verification of the pleadings. We are reluctant to imbed this formalism in the Constitution.

[Authors' note: Ironically, this bifurcated trial that Justice White rejected would be the modus operandi of the trial judges in the 1984 Sharon and Westmoreland cases.]

Burger, C. J., and Blackmun, Powell, Rehnquist, and Stevens, JJ., joined the opinion of the Court.

Justice STEWART, dissenting.

It seems to me that both the Court of Appeals and this Court have addressed a question that is not presented by the case before us. As I understand the constitutional rule of New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), inquiry into the broad "editorial process" is simply not relevant in a libel suit brought by a public figure against a publisher. And if such an inquiry is not relevant, it is not permissible. Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 26(b).

Although I joined the Court's opinion in New York Times, I have come greatly to regret the use in that opinion of the phrase "actual malice." For the fact of the matter is that "malice" as used in the New York Times opinion simply does not mean malice as that word is commonly understood. In common understanding, malice means ill will or hostility, and the most relevant question in determining whether a person's action was motivated by actual malice is to ask "why." As part of the constitutional standard enunciated in the New York Times case, however, "actual malice" has nothing to do with hostility or ill will, and the question "why" is totally irrelevant.

Under the constitutional restrictions imposed by New York Times and its progeny, a plaintiff who is a public official or public figure can recover from a publisher for a defamatory statement upon convincingly clear proof of the following elements:

1. the statement was published by the defendant.
2. the statement defamed the plaintiff,
3. the defamation was untrue,
4. and the defendant knew the defamatory statement was untrue, or published it in reckless disregard of its truth or falsity.

The gravamen of such a lawsuit thus concerns that which was in fact published. What was not published has nothing to do with the case. And liability ultimately depends upon the publisher's state of knowledge of the falsity of what he published, not at all upon his motivation in publishing it—not at all, in other words, upon actual malice as those words are ordinarily understood.

This is not the first time that judges and lawyers have been led astray by the phrase "actual malice" in the New York Times opinion. In Greenbelt Cooperative Publishing Association v. Bresler, 398 U.S. 6 (1970), another defamation suit brought by a public figure against a publisher, the trial judge instructed the jury that the plaintiff could recover if the defendant's publication had been made with malice, and that malice means "spite, hostility, or deliberate intention to harm." In reversing the judgment for the plaintiff, we said that this jury instruction constituted "error of constitutional magnitude." 398 U.S., at 10.

In the present case, of course, neither the Court of Appeals nor this Court has overtly committed the egregious error manifested in Bresler. Both courts have carefully enunciated the correct New York Times test. But each has then followed a false trail, explainable only by an unstated misapprehension of the meaning of New York Times "actual malice," to arrive at the issue of "editorial process" privilege. This misapprehension is reflected by numerous phrases in the prevailing Court of Appeals opinions: "a journalist's exercise of editorial control and judgments," "how a journalist formulated his judgments," "the editorial selection process of the press," "the heart of the editorial process," "reasons for the inclusion or exclusion of certain material." See 568 F.2d 974, passim. Similar misapprehension is reflected in this Court's opinion by such phrases as "improper motive," "intent or purpose with which the publication is made," "ill will," and by lengthy footnote discussion about the spite or hostility required to constitute malice at common law.

Once our correct bearings are taken, however, and it is firmly recognized that a publisher's motivation in a case such as this is irrelevant, there is clearly no occasion for inquiry into the editorial process as conceptualized in this case. I shall not burden this opinion with a list of the 84 discovery questions at issue.[2] Suffice it to say that few if any of them seem to me to come within even the most liberal construction of Rule 26(b), Fed. Rule Civ. Proc.

* * *

In a system of federal procedure whose prime goal is "the just, speedy, and inexpensive determination

2. The following are some random samples:

"Did you ever come to a conclusion that it was unnecessary to talk to Capt. Laurence Potter prior to the presentation of the program on February 4th?

of every action," time-consuming and expensive pretrial discovery is burdensome enough, even when within the arguable bounds of Rule 26(b). But totally irrelevant pretrial discovery is intolerable.

Like the Court of Appeals, I would remand this case to the District Court, but with directions to measure each of the proposed questions strictly against the constitutional criteria of New York Times and its progeny. Only then can it be determined whether invasion of the editorial process is truly threatened.

Justice Marshall, dissenting.

Justice BRENNAN, dissenting in part.

* * * The Court today rejects respondents' claim that an "editorial privilege" shields from discovery information that would reveal respondents' editorial processes. I agree with the Court that no such privilege insulates factual matters that may be sought during discovery, and that such a privilege should not shield respondents' "mental processes." I would hold, however, that the First Amendment requires predecisional communication among editors to be protected by an editorial privilege, but that this privilege must yield if a public figure plaintiff is able to demonstrate to the prima facie satisfaction of a trial judge that the libel in question constitutes defamatory falsehood.

* * * An editorial privilege would thus not be merely personal to respondents, but would shield the press in its function "as an agent of the public at large. * * * The press is the necessary representative of the public's interest in this context and the instrumentality which effects the public's right." Saxbe v. Washington Post Co., 417 U.S. 843, 863–864 (1974) [Powell, J., dissenting].

* * * Through the editorial process expression is composed; to regulate the process is therefore to regulate the expression. The autonomy of the speaker is thereby compromised, whether that speaker is a large urban newspaper or an individual pamphleteer. The print and broadcast media, however, because of their large organizational structure, cannot exist without some form of editorial process. The protection of the editorial process of these institutions thus becomes a matter of particular First Amendment concern.

I find compelling these justifications for the existence of an editorial privilege. The values at issue are sufficiently important to justify some incidental sacrifice of evidentiary material. The Court today concedes the accuracy of the underlying rationale for such a privilege, stating that "[w]e do not doubt the direct relationship between consultation and discussion on the one hand and sound decisions on the other * * *." The Court, however, contents itself with the curious observation that "given exposure to liability when there is knowing or reckless error, there is even more reason to resort to prepublication precautions, such as a frank interchange of fact and opinion." Because such "prepublication precautions" will often prove to be extraordinarily damaging evidence in libel actions, I cannot so blithely assume such "precautions" will be instituted, or that such "frank interchange" as now exists is not impaired by its potential exposure in such actions.

I fully concede that my reasoning is essentially paradoxical. For the sake of more accurate information, an editorial privilege would shield from disclosure the possible inaccuracies of the press; in the name of a more responsible press, the privilege would make more difficult of application the legal restraints by which the press is bound. The same paradox, however, inheres in the concept of an executive privilege: so as to enable the government more effectively to implement the will of the people, the people are kept in ignorance of the workings of their government. The paradox is unfortunately intrinsic to our social condition. Judgment is required to evaluate and balance these competing perspectives.

Judgment is also required to accommodate the tension between society's "pervasive and strong interest in preventing and redressing attacks upon reputation," Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75, 86 (1966), and the First Amendment values that would be served by an editorial privilege. In my view this tension is too fine to be resolved in the abstract. As is the case

"Did you ever come to the conclusion that you did not want to have a filmed interview with Sgt. Carmon for the program?

"When you prepared the final draft of the program to be aired, did you form any conclusion as to whether one of the matters presented by that program was Col. Herbert's view of the treatment of the Vietnamese?

"Prior to the publication of the Atlantic Monthly article, Mr. Lando, did you discuss that article or the preparation of that article with any representative of CBS?"

with executive privilege, there must be a more specific balancing of the particular interests asserted in a given lawsuit. A general claim of executive privilege, for example, will not stand against a "demonstrated, specific need for evidence * * *." United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 713 (1974). Conversely, a general statement of need will not prevail over a concrete demonstration of the necessity for executive secrecy. United States v. Reynolds, 345 U.S. 1, 11 (1953). Other evidentiary privileges are similarly dependent upon the particular exigencies demonstrated in a specific lawsuit. Roviaro v. United States, 353 U.S. 53 (1957), for example, held that the existence of an informer's privilege depends "on the particular circumstances of each case, taking into consideration the crime charged, the possible defenses, the possible significance of the informer's testimony, and other relevant factors." Id., at 62. Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S. 495 (1947), similarly required ad hoc balancing to determine the existence of an attorneys' work product privilege. The procedures whereby this balancing is achieved, so far from constituting mere "formalism," are in fact the means through which courts have traditionally resolved competing social and individual interests.

In my judgment the existence of a privilege protecting the editorial process must, in an analogous manner, be determined with reference to the circumstances of a particular case. In the area of libel, the balance struck by New York Times between the values of the First Amendment and society's interest in preventing and redressing attacks upon reputation must be preserved. This can best be accomplished if the privilege functions to shield the editorial process from general claims of damaged reputation. If, however, a public figure plaintiff is able to establish, to the prima facie satisfaction of a trial judge, that the publication at issue constitutes defamatory falsehood, the claim of damaged reputation becomes specific and demonstrable, and the editorial privilege must yield. Contrary to the suggestion of the Court, an editorial privilege so understood would not create "a substantial interference with the ability of a defamation plaintiff to establish the ingredients of malice as required by New York Times." Requiring a public figure plaintiff to make a prima facie showing of defamatory falsehood will not constitute an undue burden, since he must eventually demonstrate these elements as part of his case-in-chief. And since editorial privilege protects only deliberative and policymaking processes and not factual material, discovery should be adequate to acquire the relevant evidence of falsehood. A public figure plaintiff will thus be able to redress attacks on his reputation, and at the same time the editorial process will be protected in all but the most necessary cases.

Applying these principles to the instant case is most difficult, since the five categories of objectionable discovery inquiries formulated by the Court of Appeals are general, and it is impossible to determine what specific questions are encompassed within each category. It would nevertheless appear that four of the five categories (see fn. 2, Opinion of the Court) concern respondents' mental processes, and thus would not be covered by an editorial privilege. Only the fourth category—"Conversations between Lando and Wallace about matter to be included or excluded from the broadcast publication"—would seem to be protected by a proper editorial privilege. The Court of Appeals noted, however, that respondents had already made available to petitioner in discovery "the contents of pretelecast conversations between Lando and Wallace * * *." 568 F.2d, at 982 [Kaufman, C.J.]. Whether this constitutes waiver of the editorial privilege should be determined in the first instance by the District Court. I would therefore, like the Court of Appeals, remand this case to the District Court, but would require the District Court to determine (a) whether respondents have waived their editorial privilege; (b) if not, whether petitioner Herbert can overcome the privilege through a prima facie showing of defamatory falsehood; and (c) if not, the proper scope and application of the privilege.

COMMENT

Herbert v. Lando got nearly as much attention for its being "leaked" to the press and reported by ABC forty-eight hours before being announced by the Court as it did for its substance.

Some lawyers were quick to note that the ruling did little to disturb the doctrine of New York Times. Yet Justice White, consistent with his dissenting opinion in Gertz, and in an array of authorities dating back to 1837 (see his fn. 15 in the full text), reiterated his belief in the common law standards of "strict liability," libel per se, and broad state definitions of malice.

Justice Powell in a concurring opinion reminded the Court of First Amendment interests, while Justice Stewart, clearly disturbed about White's preferences, especially his flexible definition of actual malice, reminded the Court of what it had done in New York Times v. Sullivan.

Justice Thurgood Marshall's dissent best represented the initial fears of the press that investigative reporting of public matters would be discouraged by the ruling and that the status of existing shield laws would be endangered.

Justice William Brennan, dissenting in part, sought a palliative for an actual malice test, a test that didn't seem to be working.

The near hysterical response of the press to Herbert v. Lando offended Brennan. It had been a difficult case. It seemed to him that the press misunderstood the actual malice concept. Brennan, in a speech at Rutgers University, quietly rebuked the press and attempted to rehabilitate the concept.[103] But he remained entangled in it.

Brennan's 1965 invocation of Meiklejohn's theory[104] had largely been in vain. Wouldn't Meiklejohn have extended, at the very least, an absolute, or near absolute, privilege to all communication bearing on the public behavior of public officials and quite likely to the utterances of public figures involved in controversial issues of public importance as well? Political libel is seditious libel and should not be subject to governmental control.

What, then, is actual malice? The first part of its definition—knowing falsehood—suggests a mind oblivious to evidence of falsity. Gertz calls it "subjective awareness of probable falsity"; Garrison "a high degree of awareness of * * * probable falsity"; Butts an "awareness of probable falsity"; and St. Amant (see p. 201) "serious doubts as to the truth of his publication." All of these imply a state of mind, an intention to hurt whatever the truth of the matter. Reckless disregard, a seemingly lesser degree of fault, could be construed to mean all of the above with less thought given to the matter and therefore less premeditation.

Actual malice, a concept well established in common law and much discussed in America at least since passage of the Sedition Act of 1798, had long been defined as "well knowing" or "designed" falsity. In New York Times, Justice Brennan relied on the influential opinion of Judge Rousseau Burch for the Kansas Supreme Court in a 1908 case, Coleman v. MacLennan.[105] Although Burch's thresholds for state interference with freedom of the press are lower than today's courts would allow, he did speak of the need for a plaintiff to show actual malice where matters of public interest were involved. By 1964 and the Supreme Court's landmark ruling, at least six states and a number of legal commentators had adopted, or favored, what had evolved from the nineteenth century as a more liberal but still minority rule of public-person defamation.

A problem remains in distinguishing actual malice from common law malice. "In the context of a libel suit," said a federal district judge in Reliance Insurance Co. v. Barron's,[106] " 'actual malice' simply does not mean ill will or spite. Rather, 'malice' must be taken to mean fraudulent, knowing publication of a falsehood or reckless disregard of falsity. And we also note that reckless does not mean grossly negligent, its common use, but rather intentional disregard. When the Supreme Court uses a word, it means what the Court wants it to mean."

Ill will, for example, a prior statement of hatred of plaintiff by defendant, may be relevant and admissible as evidence of a state of mind conducive to reckless disregard of falsity,[107] but it is not itself actual malice. Specific evidence does seem to be needed: fabrication, fictionalization, failure to check with available sources or with parties to your investigation, use of anonymous or unverified phone calls, obviously biased sources, or inherently improbable allegations. An Oklahoma reporter, overhearing a telephone conversation in a sheriff's office and without further checking, assumed and reported that a police officer in breaking up a fight between two boys had kidnapped one at gunpoint. The Oklahoma Supreme Court said that was reckless disregard of truth or falsity.[108]

Protection for defendants will be found in agreement among reputable sources as to what was said to reporters and how accurately it was recounted; by headlines that agree with the possibly defamatory portions of a story; and by prompt publication of retractions, although retractions alone are not sufficient to establish lack of malice.[109] With "hot" news, slight inaccuracies may not constitute actual malice.[110]

Failure to discuss a charge with a potential plaintiff (although it's often a good idea) or to search for contrary evidence to a charge does not constitute actual malice. Flights of imagination in a story, sources or contributors of established incompetence or unreliability may. It's often a close call. It's a question of a defendant's prepublication state of mind. Did she intend to print something she knew to be false? Errors of judgment, misconceptions, bias, or ill will are not enough. A reporter trying to confirm a previously formed suspicion, and so, obviously biased, was not guilty of actual malice.[111] But a reporter who relied on an anonymous source who was trying to get the plaintiff fired and didn't check further was said to show actual malice.[112] In the highly publicized libel case brought by presidential candidate Pat Robertson against former Congressman Paul McCloskey, and later dropped, a federal district court judge wrote, "McCloskey's sin of omission was not simply a failure to investigate, but a failure to consider contradictory evidence already in his possession."[113]

A South Carolina court held that reliance on an obviously biased source, a warning that the information conveyed was false, and the lack of investigation into material that was not "hot news" was evidence of actual malice.[114] Similarly, an Arizona publisher who, when told of inaccuracies in his reports, made no effort at verification was also in trouble.[115] A reporter's intentional and reckless distortion of overheard comments of a football coach to his quarterback was evidence of actual malice.[116] Context will be an important consideration for judge and jury since biased, even hostile, sources alone may not constitute actual malice, nor does carelessness in investigating or checking information.

Shoddy journalism alone is not enough.[117] Nor is ill will, omissions, or lack of deadline pressure.[118] The case of Carol Burnett against the National Enquirer was one of the few jury verdicts for plaintiffs to be sustained on appeal on the issue of actual malice:

BURNETT v. NATIONAL ENQUIRER

7 MED.L.RPTR. 1321, (CAL. SUP. CT. 1981).

SMITH, J.:

It is not the intention of the court to deal at great length with every issue raised by defendant in its motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict and motion for new trial, but simply to articulate the reasons for denying defendant's motions, save and except the motion for new trial as it relates to the issue of damages.

Initially, defendant contends that its publication of March 2, 1976 about plaintiff was not libelous per se. It is clear to the court that the average reader, viewing the article in its entirety, would conclude that plaintiff was intoxicated and causing a disturbance. The evidence is undisputed that the article was false. There can be little question that the described conduct of plaintiff holds her up to ridicule within the meaning of California Civil Code section 45.

The National Enquirer's protestation that it was not guilty of actual malice borders on absurdity. Not only did plaintiff establish actual malice by clear and convincing evidence, but she proved it beyond a reasonable doubt. At the very minimum Brian Walker, the de facto gossip columnist, had serious doubts as to the truth of the publication. There is a high degree of probability that Walker fabricated part of the publication—certainly that portion relating to plaintiff's row with Henry Kissinger.

Walker received information from Couri Hay, a free lance tipster for the National Enquirer, that Carol Burnett had been in the Rive Gauche restaurant, that she ordered a Grand Marnier souffle and that she passed her dessert to other parties in a boisterous or flamboyant manner, that she had been drinking, but was not drunk. Hay contends that this was verified through the maitre'd. On the other hand, Hay related to Walker that he had received unverified information that Burnett had spilled wine on a customer and the customer had returned the favor by spilling water on her.

Shortly after receiving the information from Hay, Walker called Steve Tinney, the nominal gossip columnist, to see if he had any contacts in Washington who could verify Hay's tip. Walker expressed doubts to Tinney about Hay's trustworthiness. Tinney agreed with Walker's assessment of Hay, but told him he had no contacts in Washington.

Next Walker asked Greg Lyon, defendant's employee, to verify the "incident at the Rive Gauche." Walker told Lyon he had a one hour deadline to meet even though the publication was not due to "hit the streets" for thirteen days.

Lyon was asked to verify the following information: That Carol Burnett had been in a Washington, D.C. restaurant, that she had some sort of interchange with other customers and that an altercation took place with another customer—to wit, "the wine spilling and water throwing incident."

Lyon reported to Walker that he had not been able to verify anything other than the fact that plaintiff had passed dessert to other patrons. Additionally, he told Walker a fact not previously disclosed to him by Hay—that Henry Kissinger and plaintiff had carried on a good-natured conversation at the Rive Gauche that same night.

Confronted with this disappointing revelation, Walker expressed concern to Lyon as to whether he should publish the article. He kept pushing Lyon for his opinion. Lyon became angry and told him that he (Walker) was being paid to make those decisions.

At this point, it is fair to infer that Walker decided that there was little news value in the fact that Burnett and Kissinger had a good-natured conversation and that Burnett distributed her dessert to other patrons. A little embellishment was needed to "spice up" the item.

An entire afternoon was devoted to the issue of whether the National Enquirer was a newspaper or magazine. The court reaffirms its finding that the defendant does not qualify for the protection of California Civil Code section 48a [California's retraction statute] because, * * * the predominant function of the publication is the conveying of news which is neither timely nor current. Additionally, the defendant has been registered as a magazine with the Audit Bureau of Circulation since 1963, and carries a designation as a magazine or periodical in eight mass media directories.

In Werner v. Southern California Associated Newspapers, 216 P.2d 825 (1950) our Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of California Civil Code section 48a against an attack that it unfairly discriminated in favor of newspaper and radio stations. The court articulated its rationale as follows:

> In view of the complex and far flung activities of the news services upon which newspapers and radio stations must largely rely and the necessity of publishing news while it's new [emphasis mine], newspapers and radio stations may in good faith publicize items that are untrue but whose falsity they have neither the time nor the opportunity to ascertain.

Since the defendant rarely deals with "news while it' s new," it is not entitled to the protection of Civil Code section 48a.

Defendant has gone to great lengths to blame the adverse jury verdict on prejudicial trial publicity and, in particular, the blast by entertainer Johnny Carson. Some will question the sagacity of Carson's timing, but no one can question his constitutional right to air his grievance with defendant. [Carson defended Burnett against the Enquirer in his nighttime show.] While the defendant had the right to publish an article about Carson, it exercised incredibly poor judgment in publishing the article on the eve of the trial.

The National Enquirer successfully challenged two jurors who viewed or heard the Carson tirade. It did not see fit to challenge any others even though the trial could have proceeded with as few as eight jurors. Accordingly, defendant cannot now complain about three other jurors being tainted. The court questioned all jurors individually in chambers in the presence of counsel. Counsel were afforded an opportunity to question the jurors. The court denied the defendant's motion for a mistrial because it was satisfied, without any reservation whatsoever, that the remaining eleven jurors could render a fair trial to defendant.

Preliminary to the subject of general and punitive damages is the question of whether defendant published an adequate correction since that is an issue relating to the mitigation of damages. In the present case, two critical questions must be answered:

1. Was the correction published with prominence substantially equal to the statement claimed to be libelous?
2. Did the correction without uncertainty and ambiguity, honestly and fully and fairly correct the statement claimed to be libelous?

The answer to both questions is in the negative. Had the defendant published a slightly modified version of Exhibit 154 [plaintiff's request for retraction in copy format, dated 3–15–76] * * * it would not be before the court in its present predicament. The correction would have passed muster even if the reference to defendant's negligence had been deleted. Should the defendant have chosen not to print a headline relating to the retraction, a photo of plaintiff in the gossip column next to the correction would have been sufficient to call attention to the retraction.

Instead, defendant tendered to plaintiff and published a "half hearted" correction that had a tendency to aggravate any reasonable person who had been previously libeled. The correction was buried at the bottom of the gossip column.

One can infer from the evidence that the National Enquirer's failure to publish an adequate correction was primarily motivated by an unwillingness to engage in some form of self deprecation which conceivably might adversely affect its circulation.

Ian Calder, the president of National Enquirer, knew shortly after March 2, 1976 that none of the libelous material in the article could be substantiated. Both he and Generoso Pope, the sole stockholder and Chairman of the Board of the defendant, approved the copy of the "correction" that appeared in the April 13, 1976 edition of the National Enquirer.

Despite the fact that Calder knew that none of the libelous material could be substantiated, he insisted on using the words "we understand" as a modifier so that a reader could conclude that even though the defendant had no personal knowledge of the events—that the incident could have occurred. It should be noted in passing that the March 2, 1976 gossip column contains an apology to Steve Allen for falsely accusing him of smashing in a glass door of the William Morris Agency. The columnist unequivocally observed that Steve Allen is not the window breaking type without prefacing the phrase with the words "we understand."

Calder and Pope's cavalier approach to plaintiff's demand for retraction was simply another manifestation of bad faith and malice.

Included within the sum of $300,000 compensatory damages was the sum of $299,750 general damages,[1] representing the jury's award for plaintiff's emotional distress. Plaintiff correctly felt that the article portrayed her as being drunk, rude, uncaring and abusive. This portrayal was communicated to approximately sixteen million readers nationally.

Burnett testified, "What really hurts is that I know most people believe what they read." This belief was reinforced when she was taunted by a New York cab driver, whom she never met before, "Hey, Carol, I didn't know you like to get into fights."

Plaintiff is a person who is very sensitive to the problems of alcoholism. Both her parents died at the age of 46 from complications brought about by alcohol abuse. As a result of her tragic experience, Carol Burnett became active in anti-alcohol work. Since the defendant's publication, she was worried about being viewed by the public as a hypocrite if and when she spoke out against alcohol abuse.

While the record is clear that she suffered no actual pecuniary loss as a result of the libelous article, she had every right to suffer anxiety reactions in the immediate aftermath of the March 2, 1976 article and in the ineffectual correction. Emotional distress is more difficult to quantify than pain and suffering, but it is no less real. A review of other verdicts for emotional distress is not particularly helpful since the facts of each case vary significantly. The fact that defendant's false publication was communicated to sixteen million readers coupled with an inadequate correction, is of substantial significance in measuring the extent of plaintiff's emotional distress. Finally, the only residual aspect of emotional distress which has lingered with plaintiff since the immediate aftermath of the publication is the fact she occasionally gets a little paranoid about talking too loudly in restaurants.

1. Plaintiff claimed special damages of $250.00, a sum expended for attorneys fees in order to obtain a retraction.

Defendant points to the fact that Burnett never sought the services of a psychiatrist, psychologist or counselor. Plaintiff acknowledged that she was able to set aside her anxiety to the point where she was able to function in her profession. Miss Burnett should be commended for not seeking the unnecessary services of some "phony build up artist" in order to inflate her damages. She should not be penalized for self-treating.

The court finds the plaintiff was a highly credible witness who did not exaggerate her complaints. Nevertheless, the jury award is clearly excessive and is not supported by substantial evidence. The court finds that the sum of $50,000.00 is a more realistic recompense for plaintiff's emotional distress and special damage.

In reviewing the award of $1,300,000 in punitive damages the court must consider the reprehensibility of defendant's acts, the wealth of the defendant and whether punitive damages bear a reasonable relationship to actual damages.

The evidence before the court cries out for a substantial award of punitive damages. The conduct of the defendant was highly reprehensible. The acts of fabrication and reckless disregard by Brian Walker are both clearly proscribed by California Civil Code section 3294. Failure by top management to publish an adequate correction is substantial evidence of malice and bad faith.

The defendant's net worth amounted to approximately $2,600,000 and it had earnings of $1,300,000 after taxes for the last ten month period. The court will not consider any evidence not before the jury, to wit: Mr. Pope's salary and dividends. The function of deterrence will not be served if the wealth of the defendant will allow it to absorb the award with little or no discomfort and by the same token, the function of punitive damages is not served by an award that exceeds the level necessary to properly punish and deter.

This court has the distinct impression, after listening to the testimony of certain officers and employees of the National Enquirer, that the defendant has absolutely no remorse for its misdeeds. The only issue defendant has not seriously contested is that the libelous statements were, in fact, false. Couri Hay, the admittedly untrustworthy tipster, whose misinformation started this travesty, was promoted to gossip columnist shortly after the article in question was published—a position he still held during the trial. Brian Walker only recently left the employ of defendant. Haydon Cameron, the spokesman for the defendant, asserts that it is the policy of the National Enquirer to publish two or three unflattering articles about celebrities every week.

The defendant engages in a form of legalized pandering designed to appeal to the readers' morbid sense of curiosity. This style of journalism has been enormously profitable to the defendant. While the First Amendment to the United States Constitution permits such journalistic endeavor, it does not immunize the defendant from accountability when the rules are broken in such a flagrant manner.

An award of $1,300,000 will probably not amount to "capital punishment" (bankruptcy), as publicly espoused by defendant's counsel after the jury verdict, because of the defendant's strong cash position. The court finds that it is excessive because it does not bear a reasonable relationship to the compensatory damages that amount to only $50,000. A review of California case law indicates that appellate courts have not sanctioned any particular ratio of general and punitive damages. Each case turns on its own set of facts.

The court finds that there is substantial evidence in the record to support an award of $750,000 in punitive damages, a sum which should be sufficient to deter the defendant from further misconduct.

The motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict is denied. The motion for new trial is denied because plaintiff accepted the remittitur in open court reducing actual damages to $50,000 and punitive damages to $750,000.

COMMENT

A California Court of Appeals later reduced the punitive damages award to $150,000. See Burnett v. National Enquirer, 9 Med.L.Rptr. 1921, 144 Cal. App. 3d 991 (1983), appeal dismissed, 104 S.Ct. 1260 (1984). The Court of Appeal gave Burnett the choice of accepting the lower award or of facing a new trial on the issue of punitive damages. It also gave credence in its complex opinion to what a New York trial judge said about malice in 1898:

> The jumble in some modern textbooks on slander and libel concerning malice, actual malice, malice in law, malice in fact, implied malice and express malice (all > derived from judicial utterances, it is true), is a striking testimony of the limitations of the human mind.[119]

Although the Enquirer, Hustler, and Penthouse are hardly the standardbearers of American journalism, their legal travails involve principles of constitutional law common to all publications. That it can happen to mainline news media is illustrated by the Brown & Williamson suit brought against CBS and Chicago TV anchorman Walter Jacobson, a case referred to in the opening pages of this chapter.

A CBS news report, misrepresented as a commentary, accused a cigarette manufacturer of linking smoking to "pot, wine, beer and sex" in order to attract young people to the habit. In the "commentary" Jacobson called the company "liars." The most compelling evidence of actual malice, in the opinion of the court, was the intentional destruction of documents critical to the case, contrary to CBS's own policy. Segments relevant to actual malice in the opinion of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit follow:

BROWN & WILLIAMSON v. JACOBSON

BAUER, C. J.

The attitude of most knowledgeable and disinterested persons toward the tobacco industry is certainly negative; at least it has been negative for the past decade. In such an atmosphere, it becomes difficult to imagine how the tobacco people can be libeled. The bashing of the industry by government and private groups has become a virtual cottage industry. This case, however, demonstrates that general bum raps against the whole tobacco industry are different from specific accusations of skulduggery by a specific company or person. And this case involves some very specific statements against a very specific company in the tobacco industry. The facts are as follows: Walter Jacobson, an employee of the CBS-owned Chicago television station WBBM-TV, has served for a number of years as the co-anchor for the 10 p.m. weekday newscasts. In addition to fulfilling his duties as an anchorman, Jacobson also delivers a nightly feature known as "Walter Jacobson's Perspective." When Jacobson delivers his Perspectives, he moves from his normal location at the anchor desk, which is located in the station's newsroom rather than in a separate studio, to a special "Perspective" section of the newsroom. During the feature, the word Perspective appears on the screen with Mr. Jacobson's signature below it. The Perspective segments are rebroadcast the following day during WBBM's early evening news broadcasts.

As part of its activities promoting the quality of its news personalities, CBS ran ads which stated that "[w]ith ten years of experience on our anchor desk, [Walter Jacobson] has established himself as the city's most savvy political reporter * * * with contacts as solid as his credentials." Jacobson was touted by CBS as someone who "pulls no punches" and "lays it on the line." According to the ads, he is a journalist who will "make you angry. Or make you cheer. Walter Jacobson is liable to evoke all kinds of reactions * * * and he'll always leave you informed." When he delivered his Perspective on November 11, 1981, he made the Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corporation very angry.

Jacobson's November 11 Perspective was the third in a series on the cigarette industry. The first in the series dealt with the political influence of tobacco manufacturers while the second in the series discussed the failure of cigarette manufacturers to incorporate fire prevention features into their products. The final segment in the series, which was promoted on the day of the broadcast as "[t]obacco industry hooks children * * * Tonight at 10:00," dealt with the marketing practices of the cigarette industry. After Jacobson had moved to the Perspective section of the newsroom, his co-anchor, Harry Porterfield, introduced Jacobson's Perspective by stating:

> For the past two nights in Perspective, Walter has been reporting on the companies that make cigarettes and the clout they carry in Washington.
>
> Tonight he has the last in his series of special reports, a look at how the cigarette business gets its customers.

Jacobson then delivered his Perspective:

> Ask the cigarette business how it gets its customers and you will be told over and over again, that it's hard these days to get customers; that the good old days are gone forever. The good old ads for cigarettes cannot be used anymore. Old St. Nick, for example, pushing Lucky Strikes because * * * "Luckies are easy on my throat." The cigarette business can't count on that kind of an ad anymore. Or the doctors pushing Camels; more doctors smoke Camels than any other cigarette. The business can't count on an ad like [that] anymore, either.

119. Ullrich v. New York Press Co., 50 N.Y.S. 788 (1898).

Nor can it count anymore on television. Pushing cigarettes on television is prohibited. Television is off limits to cigarettes. And so the business (the killer business) has gone to the ad business in New York for help; to the slicksters on Madison Avenue, with a billion dollars a year for bigger and better ways to sell cigarettes.

Go for the youth of America. Go get 'em guys. Get some young women, give them some samples. Pass them out on the streets, for free, to the teenagers of America. Hook 'em while they're young. Make 'em start now. Just think how many cigarettes they'll be smoking when they grow up.

Or, here's another cigarette-slickster idea. The Merit report wants your opinion; a survey, they say, on current events. A $270,000 Merit wagon. Walk in, children, and let us know what you think about President Reagan. Get involved, children. Thank you, on behalf of Merit cigarettes. Or another cigarette-slickster idea. Go for the children through sports. You'll never guess who's likely to be a winner at the Winter Olympics. How about Rudd Pyles, from Colorado? But better than that, how about Benson & Hedges? At-a-way. The best possible way to addict the children to poison. There are more subtle ways, as well. A scene, for example, in Superman II. A bus crashing into a truck. Could be any truck, couldn't it? But, in a movie that's being seen by millions of children who love Superman, the bus crashes into a Marlboro truck.

Jacobson then reached the portion of his Perspective that the jury and the district court found libeled Brown & Williamson:

The cigarette business insists, in fact, it will swear up and down in public, it is not selling cigarettes to children; that if children are smoking (which they are, more than ever before), it's not the fault of the cigarette business. Who knows whose fault it is, says the cigarette business.

That's what Viceroy is saying. Who knows whose fault it is that children are smoking? It's not ours. Well, there is a confidential report on cigarette advertising in the files of the federal government right now, a Viceroy advertising [sic]. The Viceroy strategy for attracting young people (starters, they are called) to smoking.

"For the young smoker a cigarette falls into the same category with wine, beer, shaving, or wearing a bra," says the Viceroy strategy. "A declaration of independence and striving for self-identity. Therefore, an attempt should be made," says Viceroy, "to present the cigarette as an initiation into the adult world, to present the cigarette as an illicit pleasure, a basic symbol of the growing-up maturity process. An attempt should be made," says the Viceroy slicksters, "to relate the cigarette to pot, wine, beer, and sex. Do not communicate health or health-related points."

That's the strategy of the cigarette-slicksters, the cigarette business which is insisting in public * * * we are not selling cigarettes to children.

They're not slicksters. They're liars.

While Jacobson was making his statements about Viceroy, superimposed on the screen was a current Viceroy ad featuring two packs of Viceroy Rich Lights, a golf ball, and a part of a golf club. The relation of that particular ad to "pot, wine, beer, and sex" advertisements is not clear. Jacobson testified that the golf club ad was used only as a means of identifying the brand name for the viewer.

The "confidential report in the files of the federal government" referred to by Jacobson was a report by members of the staff of the Federal Trade Commission (FTC). The report first came to the attention of Jacobson's researcher, Michael Radutzky, in the summer of 1981 when Radutzky saw an article in a Kentucky newspaper that referred to the FTC report. Radutzky, who went on to become the producer of the 5:00 p.m. and then the 10:00 p.m. news at WBBM-TV, received copies of the pertinent pages of the FTC report from the author of the newspaper article.

The FTC report stated that documents obtained from Brown & Williamson and one of its advertising agencies, Ted Bates & Company, "set forth the development of an advertising strategy for Viceroy cigarettes designed to suppress or minimize public concern about the health effects of smoking." The report stated that the documents showed that Bates, which had the Viceroy account in 1975, requested a marketing and research firm, Marketing and Research Counselors, Inc., (MARC) to assist Bates in developing a marketable image for Viceroy cigarettes. After conducting a number of focus group interviews on the subject of smoking, MARC delivered a report, which was authored by N. Kennan, to Bates. The MARC report made recommendations on what its author thought were the important elements of a successful cigarette advertising campaign. As summarized by the FTC report, "the basic premise of the [MARC] report's recommendations is that since there 'are not any real, absolute, positive qualities and attributes in a cigarette,' the most effective advertising is designed to 'reduce objections' to the product by presenting a picture or situation ambiguous enough to provide smokers with a rationale for their behavior and a means of repressing their health concerns about smoking."

The MARC report discussed in a later chapter how "starters" could be introduced to the Viceroy brand. The FTC report quoted the MARC report's discussion of how the young smoker related to cigarettes. "For them," the MARC report opined, "a cigarette, and the whole smoking process, is part of the illicit pleasure category. * * * In a young smoker's mind a cigarette falls into the same category with wine, beer, shaving, wearing a bra (or purposely not wearing one), declaration of independence and striving for self-identity. For the young starter, a cigarette is associated with introduction to sex life, with courtship, with smoking 'pot' and keeping late studying hours." FTC report at 17 (quoting MARC report) (emphasis in MARC report). The MARC report went on to suggest a strategy for attracting "starters" to the Viceroy brand based "on the following major parameters":

> Present the cigarette as one of a few initiations into the adult world.
> Present the cigarette as part of the illicit pleasure category of products and activities.
> In your ads create a situation taken from the day-to-day life of the young smoker but in an elegant manner have this situation touch on the basic symbols of the growing-up, maturity process.
> To the best of your ability, (considering some legal constraints), relate the cigarette to "pot," wine, beer, sex etc.
> Don't communicate health or health-related points.

FTC report at 18 (quoting MARC report). The FTC report then stated that Brown & Williamson had adopted many of the ideas contained in the MARC report in the development of an advertising campaign for Viceroy. Specifically, the reported noted that in a document it had received directly from Brown & Williamson, rather than from a advertising agency or a firm hired by the advertising agency, Brown & Williamson had indicated that it must provide consumers with a rationalization for smoking and a "means of repressing their health concerns about smoking a full flavor Viceroy." FTC report at 18 (quoting Viceroy strategy paper dated March 3, 1976). The Viceroy strategy paper also indicated that other major full flavor brands had either consciously or unconsciously "coped" with the smoking and health issues in advertising by appealing to repression. The strategy paper suggested that Viceroy's advertising objective should be to "communicate effectively that Viceroy is a satisfying flavorful cigarette which young adult smokers enjoy, by providing them a rationalization for smoking, or, a repression of the health concern they appear to need." FTC report at 19 (citing Viceroy strategy paper).

The FTC report then cited three Viceroy advertising strategies that were used in a six-month media campaign conducted in three test cities in 1976. The first campaign was the "satisfaction" campaign which was intended to provide a "rationalization." Specifically, the intention was to convey the message that "Viceroy is so satisfying that smokers can smoke fewer cigarettes and still receive the satisfaction they want." The second campaign, the "tension release" campaign, was intended to convince the smoker that Viceroy's satisfying flavor would help the smoker in a tense situation. The third campaign, the "feels good" campaign, was intended to repress concerns that smokers might have about smoking by justifying it with the simple slogan "if it feels good, do it; if it feels good, smoke it." FTC report at 20 (citing internal memorandum dated July 14, 1976). None of these campaigns was cited in the FTC report as an example of Viceroy implementing the MARC report strategy to relate the cigarette to "pot," wine, beer, and sex. The FTC report stated, however, that Brown & Williamson documents did indicate that the company had "translated the advice on how to attract young 'starters' into an advertising campaign featuring young adults in situations that the vast majority of young people probably would experience and in situations demonstrating adherence to a 'free and easy, hedonistic lifestyle.' " FTC report at 20 (citing document titled Viceroy Marketing/Advertising Strategy dated January 26, 1976).

After reviewing the report, Radutzky contacted members of the FTC staff who had drafted the report to confirm that the partial copy of the report he had received from the Kentucky newspaper was accurate. The staff members told Radutzky that they could not send him the confidential documents cited in the report but did confirm that the report and its findings were accurate.

Radutzky also spoke on at least two occasions with Brown & Williamson public relations officer Thomas Humber. At trial, CBS introduced two internal Viceroy documents, which were written by Humber for his superiors, that relate the substance of the conversations that Humber had with Radutzky. In a conversation on November 4, 1981, Humber stated that the internal Viceroy memoranda could only be understood in context. The context included the fact that the Ted Bates agency was told prior to their submission of the memo that it was in trouble on the Viceroy account because Brown & Williamson was unhappy with its work. Humber told Radutzky that Brown & Williamson had not requested any ad campaign similar to the one suggested by Bates. Moreover, he stated that Brown & Williamson had rejected the strategy embodied in the documents submitted by Bates. Humber also noted that "thus far [we] have been unable to find copies of the proposed ads, to the best of our knowledge, no ads as described by the memo were ever actually published." Radutzky was also informed that partly as a result of Brown & Williamson's dissatisfaction with the specific proposal submitted by Bates, Brown & Williamson had terminated Bates' participation in Viceroy advertising. In a conversation with Radutzky on November 5, Humber told Radutzky that all Brown & Williamson ads must have the approval of the legal department and the highest levels of senior management. He also stated that the legal department did not get involved in the creative process and did not review the ads until they "are at the point of worked-up ads." Humber stated that the proposals referred to in the FTC report were similar to a proposed libelous story that a young inexperienced reporter might submit to his editors but that was corrected by a news organization's editors and attorneys. Humber stated that in such a case no legitimate criticism could be leveled at the news organization. He clearly implied that because Brown & Williamson had never run any of the controversial proposals as ads, it would be unfair to criticize Brown & Williamson simply because such proposals had been made by individuals who could not authorize an ad campaign.

In addition to contacting Brown & Williamson, Radutzky, on Jacobson's request, conducted a search for "pot," wine, beer and sex ads that were used by Viceroy. Unable to locate any such ads, Radutzky reported the result of his search to Jacobson. Radutzky also commented to Jacobson prior to the broadcast that Jacobson's script for the broadcast omitted Brown & Williamson's statement that it had never adopted a "pot," wine, beer or sex strategy. Jacobson did not alter his script.

During the course of his investigation, Radutzky made contemporaneous interview notes and extensive handwritten notes on his copy of the FTC report. In addition, he developed an eighteen-page sample script for the broadcast. The sample script, which was duplicated at least six times and distributed to various people in the newsroom including Walter Jacobson, reported "both sides of the issue." The jury never saw much of Radutzky's work product. Prior to trial, Radutzky destroyed all of his contemporaneous interview notes, five of the ten pages of the FTC report including those pages that contained the recommendations from the MARC report, and fifteen of the original eighteen pages of his sample script. CBS was unable to produce any of the copies of the sample script that Radutzky had distributed in the newsroom.

Radutzky testified that he destroyed his materials as part of a general housecleaning after the original complaint in this case had been dismissed by the district court but before he became aware that Brown & Williamson appealed that dismissal. His destruction of the documents contravened a CBS retention policy that provides that once litigation has commenced "any and all related materials should be retained until specifically released." The policy also provides that "[o]bviously if there is a * * * pending legal action, our policy is to retain all pertinent materials unless specifically released by the Law Department." Although Radutzky conceded that he did destroy the documents without the approval of the Law Department at CBS, he stated that he was unaware that the policy existed.

When Radutzky destroyed the documents, he was no longer assigned to the Perspective unit and therefore his desk was in a completely different section of the newsroom. Nonetheless, he apparently made a point of "cleaning house" in the Perspective section of the newsroom even though he had not worked there for several months.

Brown & Williamson attempted to prove that Jacobson's charges were false by introducing every Viceroy advertisement published between 1975 and 1982. They argued to the jury that none of these advertisements was a "pot," wine, beer, or sex ad. In addition, Robert Pittman, the Brown & Williamson Vice President whose approval was required before any Viceroy ad could be published, testified that he had never seen the MARC report prior to the litigation in this case. Pittman also stated that Brown & Williamson had never asked Bates to design any "pot," wine, beer, and sex ads. William Scholz, the Bates employee in charge of the Viceroy account, confirmed that Brown & Williamson had never asked Bates to utilize a "pot," wine, beer, and sex strategy in developing advertisements.

Brown & Williamson put forth evidence that it adhered vigorously to the Cigarette Advertising Code, which bars advertising to persons under 21. In addition to adhering to the Code, Brown & Williamson took the additional step of establishing a detailed procedure to ensure that its advertising agencies did not use models who either were or appeared to be younger than 25. When undertaking advertising campaigns that involved the distribution of samples, Brown & Williamson required the individuals distributing the samples to sign statements promising not to distribute cigarettes to people under 21.

Walter Jacobson also testified at trial. Jacobson indicated that he had read the FTC report prior to delivering his Perspective and was aware that the FTC report was quoting a document prepared by Market and Research Counselors. He agreed that the way in which the Perspective was delivered, with the Viceroy graphics on the screen at the time he was referring to the "pot," wine, beer, and sex strategy, would convey the impression that the "pot," wine, beer, and sex comment was made by Viceroy itself rather than MARC. After agreeing that such an impression would be created, Jacobson added that "I even said that 'Viceroy says.' "

Jacobson's testimony indicated that he had reviewed Radutzky's sample script prior to delivering the Perspective. Jacobson corroborated part of Radutzky's testimony by confirming that Radutzky had told him that he had been unable to find any ads showing that Brown & Williamson had implemented a "pot," wine, beer, and sex advertising strategy. Jacobson was also aware that Radutzky had spoken with Brown & Williamson and that the company denied adopting the strategy and therefore had no advertisements that they could supply that would reflect that strategy. According to Jacobson, he paraphrased Viceroy's denial in the broadcast when he stated "Viceroy insists * * * whose fault is it that children are smoking? It's not ours."

Jacobson also agreed, at least at one point, that it would be fair to say that when he wrote the Perspective script he wrote it in the present tense with respect to Viceroy and the purported "pot," wine, beer, and sex strategy. For example, he agreed that when he used a phrase such as "[t]hat's what Viceroy is saying," he realized that it would be interpreted by any reasonable listener as referring to the present tense. At other points during his testimony, however, Jacobson appeared to state that some language used during the broadcast was past tense. While recognizing that there was no indication in the Perspective that the strategy mentioned in the MARC report had been recommended in 1975, six years before the broadcast, Jacobson testified that because the FTC report described it as "the Viceroy strategy" he did not believe that he gave the viewer "an impression of time that varies from the facts." Under further questioning, Jacobson did agree that the phrase "[a]n attempt should be made, says the Viceroy slicksters to relate the cigarette to 'pot,' wine, and beer" would be "more current" than the phrase "the Viceroy strategy." [2]

Jacobson also noted that there was a distinction between a report, an analysis, a commentary and an editorial. An example of a report, according to Jacobson, would be if a newsperson went on the air and said "[t]he FTC says that Viceroy did such and such, and Viceroy says it did not." He agreed that when delivering such a statement a reporter should try to be fair and accurate. Jacobson also stated that "[m]y life is research" and indicated that what he said in the Perspective was "absolutely true."

On direct examination, Jacobson's counsel brought out his client's state of mind at the time of the broadcast. Jacobson asserted that he "believed" at the time he delivered the Perspective that it was truthful and that it was a fair and accurate summary of what the Federal Trade Commission had said about Viceroy cigarettes. Jacobson also testified about what he "intend[ed]" to inform the viewers about Viceroy when he "sat down to write" the Perspective. When cross examined, Jacobson confirmed that he had testified on direct examination about what he was thinking when he wrote the script and attempted to refute the allegation that he "really [had] no recollection at all of what [he] thought about in" preparing the script by stating that such an assertion was "absolutely untrue." Brown & Williamson's counsel then read Jacobson's 1984 deposition in which the following exchange took place:

2. Jacobson also agreed that when he said "Viceroy slicksters" he was talking about Brown & Williamson and the people who make Viceroy cigarettes as opposed to their advertising agency.

Question: I just want to know if you have a recollection whether in 1981, when you called the manufacturers of Viceroy cigarettes liars, you were attempting then to be objective?

Jacobson: I don't remember what I was thinking now when I wrote that three and a half years ago.

Question: Can you recall whether you wrote the November 11, 1981 script, you were trying to fairly present both sides of the question?

Jacobson: I don't remember what I was thinking when I wrote that script. It's hard to remember three and a half years ago.

Question: You don't remember what was in your mind?

Jacobson: Right.

Question: You do remember you wrote the script though?

Jacobson: I don't remember writing it. I do see it.

Question: You don't remember writing it?

Jacobson: Yes, I mean—I don't remember sitting at my typewriter, what I was thinking and how my hands were working. I see the script. It has a date. I wrote it, obviously, and I remember being involved in a series of reports on that subject.

On redirect examination, Jacobson asserted that his recollection of his state of mind at the time of the broadcast had improved from the time of his deposition to the time of the trial because he had "gone over everything that ha[d] been given to [him] by a whole team of lawyers" including the script that he used during his Perspective and the videotape of the actual broadcast. Jacobson stated that as a consequence his memory was jarred and he was able to "just recall more specifically some things that I didn't recall from before."

Disregarding Jacobson's testimony (including his admission that he intended to attribute the MARC language to Viceroy), the evidence shows that Jacobson received and reviewed the FTC report. In addition, he was aware that Radutzky's search for "pot," wine, beer, and sex ads had been unsuccessful and that Brown & Williamson had denied publishing ads implementing the strategy. Defendants argue vigorously that each of these facts, standing alone, cannot provide clear and convincing proof of actual malice. Responsive Brief at 26–31 (citing Time, Inc. v. Pape, 401 U.S. 279, 289–92 (1971) (rational misinterpretation of government report that "bristled with ambiguities" does not create jury issue on actual malice); Edwards v. National Audubon Society, Inc., 556 F.2d 113, 121 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 1002 (1977) (actual malice cannot be predicated solely on mere denials)); see also Bose, 466 U.S. at 511 (there is a significant difference between proof of actual malice and mere proof of falsity); Woods v. Evansville Press, 791 F.2d 480, 489 (7th Cir. 1986) (reporter's journalism skills are not on trial in a libel case). The cases defendants cite are unlike this one because none of them combines a distortion of a government report with a vehement denial of the "pot," wine, beer, and sex charge and an investigation by the journalist that tended to corroborate the denial. Moreover, none of those cases had evidence of document destruction. We conclude that when the intentional destruction of the sample script (which Jacobson did review prior to delivering the broadcast) is considered along with the distortion of the FTC report, Brown & Williamson's denial, and the corroboration of the denial, Brown & Williamson has met its burden of proving that Walter Jacobson and CBS acted with actual malice.[9]

Taking only the first two factors into account, we conclude that the district court's decision upholding the jury's punitive damage award was clearly correct. Brown & Williamson's attorney's fees were $1,360,000 prior to post-trial motions. Jacobson's net worth including his contract with CBS was over $5,000,000, while CBS's net worth was approximately one and one-half billion dollars. The punitive damage award of $50,000 against Jacobson is a modest one considering his net worth. It might provide some deterrent value without being destructive. In light of the attorney's fees that Brown & Williamson incurred and CBS's substantial net worth, the

9. Brown & Williamson also argues that pressures to produce interesting stories brought on by the November "sweeps" is "strong proof of actual malice." Ratings during "sweeps" months such as November and May are especially important in determining the rates that advertisers will pay to stations to promote their products. * * *

$2,000,000 award against CBS is reasonable. The award might provide some deterrence to future misconduct and yet will not burden CBS with a debt that it cannot easily discharge.[13] See also Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 680 F.2d 527, 540 (7th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1226 (1983) (upholding $300,000 punitive damage award).

One of the most important functions of the court system in the United States is to protect the freedom of the press. See, e.g., Bose v. Consumers Union, 466 U.S. 485 (1984); New York Times v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971); New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964). The federal courts of appeals including this one have played an important role in fulfilling this function. See, e.g., Tavoulareas v. Piro, — F.2d — (D.C. Cir. 1987) (en banc); Sunward Corporation v. Dun & Bradstreet, Inc., 811 F.2d 511, 538 (10th Cir. 1987); Woods v. Evansville Press, 791 F.2d 480, 489 (7th Cir. 1986). In considering the merits of this case, this court has granted the defendants the fullest possible review; the standard of review that we have used, giving essentially no deference to the jury's findings, may be far broader than the review to which the defendants are entitled. See Bose, 466 U.S. at 499–500 (constitutionally based rule of independent review permits reviewing court to give "due regard" to the trial court's opportunity to observe the demeanor of the witnesses). After conducting such a review, it is unfortunate that we are forced to conclude that this case does not involve freedom of the press. Rather, it is one in which there is clear and convincing evidence that a local television journalist acted with actual malice when he made false statements about Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corporation. Because false statements of fact made with actual malice are not protected by the First Amendment, this court is required to affirm the district court's finding that Jacobson and CBS libeled Brown & Williamson.

COMMENT

In early May 1988, the United States Supreme Court declined to hear the case. The result was to certify the largest libel award ever upheld on appeal: $3.05 million.

This costly case, and others, suggests that news organizations should have a standardized, rationalized policy on what to do with notes and other reportorial records. Unfortunately, reporters' notes are often destroyed. Memos about errors or potential lawsuits may be routed through lawyers to give them the attorney-client privilege. Anything circumventing this procedure may be exposed on discovery. The problem with this is that lawyers begin to assume editorial functions, and judges measure journalism against their own fanciful standards of investigative reporting.[120]

Live broadcasts are particularly hazardous because news directors have little control over defamatory statements by witnesses or law enforcement officers.[121]

William Tavoulareas and his son Peter sued the Washington Post for libel when the newspaper reported that Tavoulareas, president of Mobil Oil, had used his influence to set up Peter as a partner in a shipping firm that did millions of dollars of business with the oil company. After more than five years of litigation, a United States court of appeals, examining the entire record, found the original stories substantially true and declared that hostility toward the subject of an investigation does not in itself support a charge of actual malice against a reporter. The jury had found for plaintiffs; the judge overturned its verdict.

The case is important for a number of seemingly unrelated reasons. Tavoulareas had made himself a public figure through contentious speeches and the Mobil advertorials that appeared in some liberal periodicals. In passing, the court may have struck a blow against libel per quod when it noted that "nothing in law or common sense supports saddling a libel defendant with civil liability for a defamatory

13. Defendants also argue that the punitive damage award violates the Eighth Amendment which provides that "excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted." Even if we were to accept the defendants' argument that the excessive fines clause applies to civil proceedings, we conclude that the punitive damage award in this case is not excessive.

120. Lyle Denniston, Supreme Court reporter for the Baltimore Sun and absolutist in his support for freedom of speech and press, believes that Federal District Court Judge Oliver Gasch in the case of Tavoulareas v. Washington Post, 567 F.Supp. 651, 9 Med.L.Rptr. 1553 (D.D.C. 1983), functioned as an editor in his twenty-three-page opinion by measuring the newspaper against his personal standard of "fair, unbiased, investigative journalism." Denniston expressed this in columns and public presentations.

121. KARK-TV v. Simon, 656 S.W.2d 702 (Ark. 1983).

implication nowhere to be found in the published article itself."

On the negative side, the case provides further evidence of Judge Sofaer's concern in Sharon that jurors tend to confuse falsity with actual malice. It is for this reason that he asked the jurors in that case to consider the two matters separately. No wonder the confusion. In Tavoulareas the court says that "substantial truth precludes any reasonable inference of actual malice," and "defamation plaintiffs cannot show actual malice in the abstract; they must demonstrate actual malice in conjunction with a false defamatory statement."

But the court does provide this helpful elaboration on actual malice, using the influential St. Amant case as a model.

TAVOULAREAS v. WASHINGTON POST

13 MED.L.RPTR. 2377, 817 F.2D 762, (D.C. CIR. 1987).

STARR and WRIGHT, J. J.:

* * *

It is well established that the "serious doubt" standard requires a showing of subjective doubts by the defendant. It does not turn on whether a reasonably prudent person would have published under the circumstances. The rejection of an objective standard of care, however, does not mean that libel defendants can defame with impunity merely by testifying that they published the challenged statements with the belief that they were true. To the contrary, a plaintiff may prove the defendant's subjective state of mind through the cumulation of circumstantial evidence, as well as through direct evidence. See, e.g., Herbert v. Lando, 441 U.S. 153, 160 (1979); Washington Post Co. v. Keogh, 365 F.2d 965, 968 (D.C. Cir. 1966), cert. denied, 385 U.S. 1011 (1967).

At the same time, actual malice does not automatically become a question for the jury whenever the plaintiff introduces pieces of circumstantial evidence tending to show that the defendant published in bad faith. Such an approach would be inadequate to ensure correct application of both the actual malice standard and the requirement of clear and convincing evidence. Thus, as all parties and amici agree, the Supreme Court has directed us to "exercise particularly careful review," and to "make an independent examination of the whole record." Edwards, 372 U.S. at 235, quoted in Sullivan, 376 U.S. at 285.

This constitutionally mandated duty of independent review has been applied unflinchingly. The Supreme Court and other courts have more often than not concluded that public figure libel plaintiffs failed to adduce evidence of sufficient clarity to convincingly support a jury finding of actual malice. For example, in the leading case of St. Amant v. Thompson, 390 U.S. 727, the Supreme Court reversed a jury finding of liability in a public official's defamation action. Because of St. Amant's importance in actual malice analysis, we pause to recall the facts of that case. Briefly stated, Deputy Sheriff Thompson sued St. Amant, a candidate for public office, for repeating in the course of a televised speech the false allegation that Sheriff Thompson had taken bribes from a local Teamsters Union president. The record showed that St. Amant had based his allegation exclusively on information provided by an active member of a dissident faction within the Teamsters. At the time, the dissident faction was locked in a struggle for control against the faction led by the Teamster's official alleged to have paid bribes to the Sheriff. Although he had no knowledge of the source's reputation for veracity, St. Amant failed to investigate independently the obviously serious charge of bribery and failed to seek confirmation of the information from others who might have known the facts. Notwithstanding this evidence, the Supreme Court found the record insufficient to support a finding of actual malice.

Before evaluating the specific record before it, the St. Amant Court provided examples of the kind of proof that would likely support a finding of actual malice. The examples fell into three general categories: evidence establishing that the story was (1) "fabricated"; (2) "so inherently improbable that only a reckless man would have put [it] in circulation"; or (3) "based wholly on an unverified anonymous telephone call" or some other source that the defendant had "obvious reasons to doubt." 390 U.S. at 732. After setting forth these illustrative examples, the Court held that the evidence before it, by comparison, was clearly inadequate. St. Amant's failure to investigate was deemed not indicative of actual malice, inasmuch as the plaintiff had not proven "a low community assessment of [the source's] trustworthiness or unsatisfactory experience with him by St. Amant." Id. at 733. The court also found support for its decision in evidence tending to show that St. Amant published the charge in good faith, including St. Amant's testimony that he had verified other aspects of his source's information and evidence that the source had sworn to his answers in the presence of newsmen.

* * *

As the District Court correctly observed in the case at hand, the Supreme Court's reasoning and result in St. Amant are instructive for inferior tribunals in attempting faithfully to apply the "serious doubt" test. 567 F.Supp. at 656. The examples provided there of when a jury may reasonably infer actual malice from circumstantial evidence are by no means exhaustive, but, as numerous courts have recognized, constitute useful benchmarks for lower courts to employ in determining whether a record is sufficient to sustain a finding of constitutional malice. See, e.g., Marcone v. Penthouse International Magazine For Men, 754 F.2d 1072, 1089–90 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 106 S.Ct. 182 (1985); Hunt v. Liberty Lobby, 720 F.2d 631, 643–46 (11th Cir. 1983). When the entire record in this case is scrutinized in light of St. Amant and other governing precedents, it is clear beyond cavil that Judge Gasch's decision to grant j.n.o.v. [judgment notwithstanding the verdict of the jury] was fully justified.

COMMENT

Additional negative fallout from the Tavoulareas case was that it played a major role in the establishment by some major corporations of plaintiff insurance for their executives and in the founding in 1984 of the Libel Prosecution Resource Center, a fifty-state reference network of plaintiff libel lawyers. Sponsored by the American Legal Foundation, the new Center was meant to counter the Libel Defense Resource Center, already functioning for the benefit of defendants.

The Capital Legal Foundation provided funding and attorneys for the Westmoreland suit, and Accuracy in Media, a press monitoring group, has assisted libel plaintiffs in the past.

Public or Private Person

At least three forms of fault have been identified: Negligence must be demonstrated by private-person plaintiffs; knowing falsehood or reckless disregard of truth or falsity by public-person plaintiffs, both public officials and public figures. The trick is to be able to tell one kind of person from another. Appellate courts have provided some guidance, but it is all too easy to get fooled. At first glance, both Elmer Gertz and Mrs. Firestone looked like public people. The Supreme Court said that in the circumstances of their cases they were not. In anticipating a defense, public or private person is one of the first major questions the prospective defendant must ask.

Public Officials

In this category are elected or appointed government officials. Elected officials are particularly vulnerable to criticism, not only in office but while running for office and upon leaving office. Law enforcement officers, because they wield power in the name of the state, fit the category; public school teachers and administrators because they influence the minds of the citizenry. Rosenblatt v. Baer (see p. 198) is still an important precedent: the closer an official to the levers of power, the more open he or she is to criticism; but not everyone employed by government (the janitor, for example) will have the same burden of fault to prove. Defamatory statements about public officials should have a bearing on that person's public responsibilities, whatever they are. "A charge of criminal conduct, no matter how remote in time or place, can never be irrelevant to an official's * * * fitness for office * * *," said the Supreme Court in Monitor Patriot Co. v. Roy, 401 U.S. 265, 277 (1971). Consultants and aides to public officials may not qualify as "public officials," unless allegations made against them relate to their involvement in important public matters.[122] There are large patches of gray where engineers, architects, scientists, contractors, and developers supply services to government. When they participate in policymaking and their contributions have important public consequences, they may be open to criticism. But be careful! Even though judges will make the public/private distinctions at the threshold and will be influenced by federal definitions, their decisions will continue to be arbitrary and ambiguous. A police informant was said not to be a public official.[123] A civilian jailer with no policymaking power did not fit the category.[124]

Without drawing any precise boundaries, Chief Justice Burger did suggest in footnote 8 in Hutchinson v. Proxmire, 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1279, 443 U.S. 111 (1979), that not all public employees are public officials. In that case the Court also held that Senator Proxmire, in making his often uninformed Golden Fleece award to a publicly funded research behavioral scientist, was not insulated by the Constitution's speech or debate clause from a libel suit based on a press release sent from his office. The speech or debate clause, Proxmire argued, gave absolute immunity to libel committed in the course of one's legislative duties or, more generally, as part of the "informing function" of the Congress. Has the Court overruled, without citing it, Barr v. Matteo (see this text, p. 192) in which it held the "utterance of a federal official to be absolutely privileged if made 'within the outer perimeter' of his duties?" Senator Proxmire retracted erroneous statements contained in his newsletter and paid Dr. Hutchinson $10,000 in a settlement. The United States Senate paid $125,000 out of public funds for Proxmire's defense.

Nor has the Court drawn boundaries between the public and private lives of public officials. Can the two be separated? What aspects of one's private life bear on one's fitness or capacity for public office? Does a stormy marriage negatively affect the decision-making capabilities of a head of state? Does a record of psychiatric treatment disqualify a person for the vice-presidency of the United States?

Public Figures

Pervasive, All-Purpose, or Public Personality. Famous, widely known people fall in this category, those whose names have become common currency worldwide. Performers, athletes, authors, those who depend upon publicity and public approbation for their fame and success. Would we argue about the public status of Meryl Streep, Pete Rose, or Tom Wolfe?

When a Sports Illustrated writer sued New York Magazine for criticizing his prose, a New York court said, "plaintiff not only welcomed but actively sought publicity for his views and professional writing and by his own purposeful activities thrust himself into the public eye. He had become a public personality."[125] One who had expansively extolled his literary and public past as an author, public speaker, and award winner could not escape the "pervasive public figure" label.

In WTSP-TV v. Vick, 11 Med.L.Rptr. 1543, 1544, 475 S.2d 703 (Fla.Cir.Ct. 1985), a corporation took on the mantle of public figure. "How much more public can any person or corporation be?" asked the court, although it may better have placed the regulated public television station in the "public official" category.

President Nixon's friend and financial adviser Charles G. (Bebe) Rebozo was said to be an all-purpose public figure. Rebozo is quoted in the court's opinion as touting his own visibility: "[W]hen you are traveling in the circles that I have traveled in there are press people all over the place." Rebozo v. Washington Post, 637 F.2d 375 (5th Cir. 1981), cert. den. 454 U.S. 964 (1981).

An Oregon bank was not a pervasive public figure. "We find," said the court, "that the bank does not have 'general fame or notoriety' in the community in which the article was published, nor does it exhibit 'pervasive involvement' in the affairs of society."[126]

If it is any help, a bigtime gangster, Johnny Carson's wife, Ralph Nader, and candidates for public office have been classified as all-purpose public figures. Actors, athletes, Nobel Prize winners, former Playmates, civil rights activists, professors, and columnists have been called limited purpose public figures. Obviously, context or circumstances make a difference.

Vortex or Limited Purpose. This is one of the slipperiest concepts in libel law. Public figures in this category are those who, standing in the wings or sitting in the audience, may, voluntarily or involuntarily, make brief appearances on the stage of life. Here today, gone tomorrow.

Gertz defined vortex public figures as those who have "thrust themselves to the forefront of particular public controversies in order to influence the resolution of the issues involved." In Firestone the Court noted, "A person who engages in criminal conduct does not automatically become a public figure for purposes of comment on a limited range of issues relating to his conviction." To hold otherwise would create an "open season" for all who sought to defame persons convicted of crime.

In a companion case to Hutchinson—Wolston v. Reader's Digest Association, Inc., 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1273, 443 U.S. 157 (1979)—a plaintiff who twenty years earlier had pleaded guilty to criminal contempt of court charges during grand jury investigations into spy charges was said not to be a public figure. Although Wolston at a point in time past had consciously and half voluntarily chosen not to appear before a grand jury, he had long since returned to private life and had made no effort at any time to inject himself into a public controversy in order to change its course.

"A private individual," wrote Justice William Rehnquist for the Court, "is not automatically transformed into a public figure by becoming involved in or associated with a matter that attracts public attention. To accept such reasoning would in effect re-establish the doctrine advanced by the plurality opinion in Rosenbloom v. Metromedia."

An older rule—once a public figure always a public figure—was suggested by the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals in Street v. National Broadcasting Co., 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1001, 645 F.2d 1227 (6th Cir. 1981), cert. dismissed 454 U.S. 1095 (1981). The plaintiff, whom NBC had assumed to be dead, had been a witness forty years before in the rape prosecutions of the nine young and black Scottsboro Boys. NBC's docudrama depicted a judge setting aside a guilty verdict because he did not believe Street's testimony. The Sixth Circuit held that once a person becomes a public figure in connection with a particular public controversy, that person remains a public figure for purposes of later commentary on the same controversy. Street had given press conferences at the time of the trial. She therefore had access to the media. If she had been raped in 1931, however, her involvement in the case from that point forward could never have been a priori voluntary.

NBC chose to settle out of court before the Supreme Court could hear arguments, leaving only partly resolved the question of whether a public figure can retreat into anonymity and whether the factual accuracy of the broadcast would affect the issue of voluntariness. In other words, what effort was made by the plaintiff to attract public attention during the original episode? The key question seems to be: Can there be any such category as involuntary public figure? Can the media foist public figure status on an unwilling person? If the courts say no, are they making editorial judgments about public figures and public issues? What about potentially newsworthy people—criminals, for example—who take great pains to remain anonymous and behind the scene, or mask their involvement, but nevertheless contribute mightily to the passing parade?

In a 1976 case involving Playboy magazine and an alleged mobster, a federal district court in Georgia said that "Defining public figures is much like trying to nail a jellyfish to the wall." To rebut Playboy's evidence of extensive contacts over a period of years with underworld figures and criminal prosecutions, Louis Rosanova argued that he was not a public figure because he didn't have access to the media to contradict charges against him and because he had not thrust himself voluntarily into the vortex of any public issue. Again the involuntary public figure.

The court defined Rosanova somewhat vaguely as a public figure because of "his voluntary contacts and involvements related to the subject matter of the [offending] article." In the absence of clear and convincing proof of actual malice or reckless disregard of truth, the court granted Playboy summary judgment. Rosanova v. Playboy Enterprises, Inc., 411 F.Supp. 440 (D.Ga. 1976).

Noting that criminals, financial manipulators, and political power brokers may prefer to operate quietly behind the scenes, Bruce Sanford believes they are public figures once exposed. For those who commit heinous crimes or are frequent offenders Sanford constructs a "notorious public figure" category—persons whose activities will sooner or later come to public attention. Such plaintiffs, he believes, are "libel proof"; no reputation remains to be damaged.[127] A federal district court used the term "libel proof" in Logan v. District of Columbia, 447 F.Supp. 1328 (D.D.C. 1978).

Other courts doubt the existence of the involuntary public figure category.[128] Granted the status is rarely recognized by the courts. But where else do we put criminals, accident victims, and the relatives of famous people?

What examples have the courts provided of vortex public figures? A Texas attorney who as president of a soft drink company had experienced labor trouble was accused by columnist Jack Anderson of organizing an "unmercifully ruthless campaign of intimidation and terror." Since plaintiff played a role in a public controversy involving labor violence, he was a public figure.[129] This case, and others, set down a number of conditions for limited purpose public figures:

1. there must be a public controversy;
2. a person's role in that controversy should be
   a. prominent,
   b. voluntary,
   c. designed to influence the outcome, and preferably
   d. with access to media for rebuttal.[130]

A public controversy has been defined as any topic upon which sizable segments of society have different, strongly held views, Lerman v. Flynt Distributing Co., 745 F.2d 123, 137–138 (2d Cir. 1984).

Other examples of court designated vortex public figures were: an author who became embroiled in a controversy as to how intimate he was with Ernest Hemingway;[131] the sons of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg who publicly asserted the innocence of their parents in speeches and a book;[132] persons who voluntarily involved themselves in the fluoridation controversy;[133] a high school coach who verbally assaulted referees;[134] a civil rights activist;[135] a major corporation making a public stock option;[136] a civic organization member who wrote a letter to a newspaper editor on a public issue;[137] advertisers involved in an intensive advertising campaign;[138] a discharged police officer who had complained to the media;[139] a student senate president who ran for a school board seat;[140] and a journalist roommate of a noted fugitive from the law who agreed to an interview about the fugitive.[141]

Mercifully, the tide seems to be running against the Wolston notion that a public person can fade into anonymity once the event that gave him prominence has become history. One example: a libel plaintiff who was indicted and tried for murder in 1952 was a public figure then and remained a public figure in 1980, said a Minnesota district court, when his name appeared in a town history that summarized his trial.[142]

What remains vague and uncertain in libel law, and thereby contrary to our First Amendment mandate and the spirit of the New York Times doctrine, is the distinction between vortex public people and the private person. Case law gives us no rule by which to distinguish the two categories.[143]

Private Persons

It is tempting to define this category by putting in it all those who don't fit the foregoing categories. Case law will not permit that. Another approach might be to assume that everyone is a private person until a defendant news organization can demonstrate otherwise. Case law does not encourage that either. The following examples suggest the precarious quality of judicial distinctions between private and public persons: a public school teacher who was the subject of a newspaper story in which parents and students accused her of incompetence was a private person because she had only limited access to the media, was not in a position to influence school policy, and couldn't fully answer the charges against her without disclosing students' names and records in violation of the law.[144]

Also defined as private persons were the president of a shopping mall accused of criminal harassment following a traffic accident;[145] a man alleged to have shot his wife;[146] and an administrative aide to Spiro Agnew and later a political adviser to Senator Orrin Hatch in his election campaign who was called a "bagman" for the former vice president by an incumbent senator. Like Mrs. Firestone, who might have been a public person in Florida but didn't quite make it in a national arena, the aide, conversely, might have been a public figure in a national arena but was not in Utah where the defamation was first published.[147]

A man whose brother was convicted of murdering their parents, but who had played no part in the crime itself, was ruled a private person.[148] So was a historical and archaeological research corporation employed by a county as a scientific fact-finding consultant for the county's water supply.[149] Also private was a defendant in a wrongful-death civil suit,[150] a former airline executive whose competence was questioned,[151] and five corporate plaintiffs and two owners of a movie and television production company in a $490 million libel suit against Penthouse magazine.[152] In the latter case the judge said in his instructions to the jury that corporate plaintiffs would be all-purpose public figures only if they had achieved fame and notoriety in the affairs of society. Selling one's services to the public, buying advertising, and having access in this way to the media did not constitute involving oneself in a public controversy. Similarly, in a case brought by a Gulf + Western personnel director wrongfully accused of taking kickbacks, the court classified the plaintiff as private because he had no public office, did not have general fame or notoriety, had no pervasive involvement in public affairs, and had not injected himself into a public controversy.[153]

The question of voluntariness remains central, and fame appears to have geographical boundaries. Did the plaintiff enjoy access to the media to rebut allegations? Did she invite attention in any way? Burden of proof, generally by a preponderance of evidence, in making a private person "public" will rest with the defendant. And the judge will decide whether you have succeeded.

Courts are divided on whether the public/private/actual malice/negligence model of Gertz and its progeny applies to nonmedia defendants. Given the contributions nonmedia speakers make to the social dialogue and the danger to the press of being the recipient of special governmental privileges, not to mention the spirit of New York Times, no such distinction should be made.

Public Issue

It has been suggested that the inexorable logic of the public issue test has given the 1971 Rosenbloom case a life of its own. Dun & Bradstreet v. Greenmoss Builders, a 1985 Supreme Court ruling, combines that question, at least indirectly, with the question of whether nonmedia defendants enjoy the full protection of the New York Times-Gertz formulations.

Vermont's Supreme Court thought nonmedia defendants should not receive such protection and a divided United States Supreme Court affirmed on different grounds. A credit reporting agency had reported erroneously to five subscribers that a construction contractor had filed for bankruptcy. The Court held that presumed and punitive damages may be recovered by private persons in the absence of actual malice if no public issue is involved. So the Court revived the public issue test, at least by implication, gave new life to punitive damages (where the Gertz Court had tried to discourage them), and, because they played no part in a wider public dialogue, withheld constitutional protection against libel actions from nonmedia defendants.

Justice White, who concurred in the opinion of the Court, again demonstrated his desire to overturn Gertz and go back to the common law rules of libel. Four dissenters, Justices Brennan, Marshall, Blackmun, and Stevens, wanted a uniform application of fault requirements (negligence and actual malice) to all defendants.

DUN & BRADSTREET v. GREENMOSS BUILDERS

472 U.S. 749, 105 S.CT. 2939, 86 L.ED.2D 593 (1985).

Justice POWELL announced the judgment of the Court.

Petitioner Dun & Bradstreet, a credit reporting agency, provides subscribers with financial and related information about businesses. All the information is confidential; under the terms of the subscription agreement the subscribers may not reveal it to anyone else. On July 26, 1976, petitioner sent a report to five subscribers indicating that respondent, a construction contractor, had filed a voluntary petition for bankruptcy. This report was false and grossly misrepresented respondent's assets and liabilities. That same day, while discussing the possibility of future financing with its bank, respondent's president was told that the bank had received the defamatory report. He immediately called petitioner's regional office, explained the error, and asked for a correction. In addition, he requested the names of the firms that had received the false report in order to assure them that the company was solvent. Petitioner promised to look into the matter but refused to divulge the names of those who had received the report.

After determining that its report was indeed false, petitioner issued a corrective notice on or about August 3, 1976 to the five subscribers who had received the initial report. The notice stated that one of respondent's former employees, not respondent itself, had filed for bankruptcy and that respondent "continued in business as usual." Respondent told petitioner that it was dissatisfied with the notice and it again asked for a list of subscribers who had seen the initial report. Again petitioner refused to divulge their names.

Respondent then brought this defamation action in Vermont state court. It alleged that the false report had injured its reputation and sought both compensatory and punitive damages. The trial established that the error in petitioner's report had been caused when one of its employees, a seventeen year old high school student paid to review Vermont bankruptcy pleadings, had inadvertently attributed to respondent a bankruptcy petition filed by one of respondent's former employees. Although petitioner's representative testified that it was routine practice to check the accuracy of such reports with the businesses themselves, it did not try to verify the information about respondent before reporting it.

After trial, the jury returned a verdict in favor of respondent and awarded $50,000 in compensatory or presumed damages and $300,000 in punitive damages. Petitioner moved for a new trial. It argued that in Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc. this Court had ruled broadly "that the States may not permit recovery of presumed or punitive damages, at least when liability is not based on a showing of knowledge of falsity or reckless disregard for the truth," and it argued that the judge's instructions in this case permitted the jury to award such damages on a lesser showing. The trial court indicated some doubt as to whether Gertz applied to "non-media cases," but granted a new trial "[b]ecause of * * * dissatisfaction with his charge and * * * conviction that the interests of justice require[d]" it.

The Vermont Supreme Court reversed. 143 Vt. 66, 461 A.2d 414 (1983). Although recognizing that "in certain instances the distinction between media and nonmedia defendants may be difficult to draw," the court stated that "no such difficulty is presented with credit reporting agencies, which are in the business of selling financial information to a limited number of subscribers who have paid substantial fees for their services." Relying on this distinguishing characteristic of credit reporting firms, the court concluded that such firms are not "the type of media worthy of First Amendment protection as contemplated by New York Times [Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964),] and its progeny." It held that the balance between a private plaintiff's right to recover presumed and punitive damages without a showing of special fault and the First Amendment rights of "nonmedia" speakers "must be struck in favor of the private plaintiff defamed by a nonmedia defendant." Accordingly, the court held "that as a matter of federal constitutional law, the media protections outlined in Gertz are inapplicable to nonmedia defamation actions."

Recognizing disagreement among the lower courts about when the protections of Gertz apply,[1] we granted certiorari. (1983). We now affirm, although for reasons different from those relied upon by the Vermont Supreme Court.

As an initial matter, respondent contends that we need not determine whether Gertz applies in this case because the instructions, taken as a whole, required the jury to find "actual malice" before awarding presumed or punitive damages. The trial court instructed the jury that because the report was libelous per se, respondent was not required "to prove actual damages * * * since damage and loss [are] conclusively presumed." It also instructed the jury that it could award punitive damages only if it found "actual malice." Its only other relevant instruction was that liability could not be established unless respondent showed "malice or lack of good faith on the part of the Defendant." Respondent contends that these references to "malice," "lack of good faith," and "actual malice" required the jury to find knowledge of falsity or reckless disregard for the truth—the "actual malice" of New York Times—before it awarded presumed or punitive damages.

We reject this claim because the trial court failed to define any of these terms adequately. It did not, for example, provide the jury with any definition of the term "actual malice." In fact, the only relevant term it defined was simple "malice." And its definitions of this term included not only the New York Times formulation but also other concepts such as "bad faith" and "reckless disregard of the [statement's] possible consequences." The instructions thus permitted the jury to award presumed and punitive damages on a lesser showing than "actual malice." Consequently, the trial court's conclusion that the instructions did not satisfy Gertz was correct, and the Vermont Supreme Court's determination that Gertz was inapplicable was necessary to its decision that the trial court erred in granting the motion for a new trial. We therefore must consider whether Gertz applies to the case before us.

* * *

In Gertz, we held that the fact that expression concerned a public issue did not by itself entitle the libel defendant to the constitutional protections of New York Times. These protections, we found, were not "justified solely by reference to the interest of the press and broadcast media in immunity from liability." 418 U.S., at 343. Rather, they represented "an accommodation between [First Amendment] concern[s] and the limited state interest present in the context of libel actions brought by public persons." Ibid. In libel actions brought by private persons we found the competing interests different. Largely because private persons have not voluntarily exposed themselves to increased risk of injury from defamatory statements and because they generally lack effective opportunities for rebutting such statements, id., at 345, we found that the State possessed a "strong and legitimate * * * interest in compensating private individuals for injury to reputation." Id., at 348–349. Balancing this stronger state interest against the same First Amendment interest at stake in New York Times, we held that a State could not allow recovery of presumed and punitive damages absent a showing of "actual malice." Nothing in our opinion, however, indicated that this same balance would be struck regardless of the type of speech involved.

We have never considered whether the Gertz balance obtains when the defamatory statements involve no issue of public concern. To make this determination, we must employ the approach approved in Gertz and balance the State's interest in compensating private individuals for injury to their reputation against the First Amendment interest in protecting this type of expression. This State interest is identical to the one weighed in Gertz. There we found that it was "strong and legitimate." 418 U.S.,

1. Compare Denny v. Mertz, 106 Wis.2d 636, 318 N.W.2d 141, cert. denied, 459 U.S. 883 (1982) (Gertz inapplicable to private figure suits against nonmedia defendants); *Stuempges v. at 348. A State should not lightly be required to abandon it,

> "for, as Mr. Justice Stewart has reminded us, the individual's right to the protection of his own good name 'reflects no more than our basic concept of the essential dignity and worth of every human being—a concept at the root of any decent system of ordered liberty. The protection of private personality, like the protection of life itself, is left primarily to the individual States under the Ninth and Tenth Amendments. * * *' Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75, 92 (1966) (concurring opinion)." 418 U.S., at 341.

The First Amendment interest, on the other hand, is less important than the one weighed in Gertz. We have long recognized that not all speech is of equal First Amendment importance.[5] It is speech on " 'matters of public concern' " that is "at the heart of the First Amendment's protection." First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 776 (1978), quoting Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88, 101 (1940). As we stated in Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S. 138, 145 (1983), this "special concern [for speech on public issues] * * * is no mystery":

> "The First Amendment 'was fashioned to assure unfettered interchange of ideas for the bringing about of political and social changes desired by the people.' Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 484 (1957); New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 269 (1964). '[S]peech concerning public affairs is more than self-expression; it is the essence of self-government.' " Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64, 74–75 (1964). Accordingly, the Court has frequently reaffirmed that speech on public issues occupies the " 'highest rung of the hierarchy of First Amendment values,' " and is entitled to special protection. NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886 913 (1982); Carey v. Brown, 447 U.S. 455, 467 (1980)."

In contrast, speech on matters of purely private concern is of less First Amendment concern. 461 U.S., at 146–147. As a number of state courts, including the court below, have recognized, the role of the Constitution in regulating state libel law is far more limited when the concerns that activated New York Times and Gertz are absent.[6] In such a case,

> "[t]here is no threat to the free and robust debate of public issues; there is no potential interference with a meaningful dialogue of ideas concerning self-government; and there is no threat of liability causing a reaction of self-censorship by the press. The facts of the present case are wholly without the First Amendment concerns with which the Supreme Court of the United States has been struggling." Harley-Davidson Motorsports, Inc. v. Markley, 279 Or. 361, 366, 568 P.2d 1359, 1363 (1977).

While such speech is not totally unprotected by the First Amendment, see Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S., at 147, its protections are less stringent. In Gertz, we found that the state interest in awarding presumed and punitive damages was not "substantial" in view of their effect on speech at the core of First Amendment concern. 418 U.S., at 349. This interest, however, is "substantial" relative to the incidental effect these remedies may have on speech of significantly less constitutional interest. The ra-

5. This Court on many occasions has recognized that certain kinds of speech are less central to the interests of the First Amendment than others. Obscene speech and "fighting words" long have been accorded no protection. Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 483 (1957); Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568, 571–572 (1942); cf. Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U.S. 580, 591–592 (1952) (advocating violent overthrow of the government is unprotected speech); Near v. Minnesota ex rel. Olson, 283 U.S. 697, 716 (1931) (publication of troop ship sailings during war time may be enjoined). In the area of protected speech, the most prominent example of reduced protection for certain kinds of speech concerns commercial speech. Such speech, we have noted, occupies a "subordinate position in the scale of First Amendment values." Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Assn., 436 U.S. 447, 456 (1978). It also is more easily verifiable and less likely to be deterred by proper regulation. Virginia Pharmacy Bd. v. Virginia Consumer Council, 425 U.S. 748, 771–772 (1976). Accordingly, it may be regulated in ways that might be impermissible in the realm of noncommercial expression. Ohralik, supra, at 456; Central Hudson Gas & Elec. v. Public Serv. Comm'n, 447 U.S. 557, 562–563 (1980).

Other areas of the law provide further examples. In Ohralik we noted that there are "[n]umerous examples * * * of communications that are regulated without offending the First Amendment, such as the exchange of information about securities, * * * corporate proxy statements, * * * the exchange of price and production information among competitors, * * * and employers' threats of retaliation for the labor activities of employees." 436 U.S., at 456 (citations omitted). Yet similar regulation of political speech is subject to the most rigorous scrutiny. See Brown v. Hartlage, 456 U.S. 45, 52–53 (1982); New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 279, n. 19 (1964); Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 14 (1976). Likewise, while the power of the State to license lawyers, psychiatrists, and public school teachers—all of whom speak for a living—is unquestioned, this Court has held that a law requiring licensing of union organizers is unconstitutional under the First Amendment. Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516 (1945); see also Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, 403 U.S. 29, 44 (1971) (opinion of Brennan, J.) ("the determinant whether the First Amendment applies to state libel actions is whether the utterance involved concerns an issue of public or general concern").

6. As one commentator has remarked with respect to "the case of a commercial supplier of credit information that defames a person applying for credit"—the case before us today—"If the first amendment requirements outlined in Gertz apply, there is something clearly wrong with the first amendment or with Gertz." Shiffrin, The First Amendment and Economic Regulation: Away From a General Theory of the First Amendment, 78 Nw.L.Rev. 1212, 1268 (1983).

tionale of the common law rules has been the experience and judgment of history that "proof of actual damage will be impossible in a great many cases where, from the character of the defamatory words and the circumstances of publication, it is all but certain that serious harm has resulted in fact." W. Prosser, Law of Torts § 112, p. 765 (4th ed. 1971); accord, Rowe v. Metz, 425–426, 579 P.2d, at 84; Note, Developments in the Law—Defamation, 69 Harv.L.Rev. 875, 891–892 (1956). As a result, courts for centuries have allowed juries to presume that some damage occurred from many defamatory utterances and publications. Restatement of Torts § 568, comment b, at 162 (1938) (noting that Hale announced that damages were to be presumed for libel as early as 1670). This rule furthers the state interest in providing remedies for defamation by ensuring that those remedies are effective. In light of the reduced constitutional value of speech involving no matters of public concern, we hold that the state interest adequately supports awards of presumed and punitive damages—even absent a showing of "actual malice." [7]

The only remaining issue is whether petitioner's credit report involved a matter of public concern. In a related context, we have held that "[w]hether * * * speech addresses a matter of public concern must be determined by [the expression's] content, form, and context * * * as revealed by the whole record." Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S., at 147–148. These factors indicate that petitioner's credit report concerns no public issue.[8] It was speech solely in the individual interest of the speaker and its specific business audience. Cf. Central Hudson Gas & Elec. v. Public Service Comm., 447 U.S. 557, 561 (1980). This particular interest warrants no special protection when—as in this case—the speech is wholly false and clearly damaging to the victim's business reputation. Cf. id., at 566; Virginia Pharmacy Board v. Virginia Consumer Council, 425 U.S. 748, 771–772 (1976). Moreover, since the credit report was made available to only five subscribers, who, under the terms of the subscription agreement, could not disseminate it further, it cannot be said that the report involves any "strong interest in the free flow of commercial information." Id., at 764. There is simply no credible argument that this type of credit reporting requires special protection to ensure that "debate on public issues [will] be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open." New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S., at 270.

In addition, the speech here, like advertising, is hardy and unlikely to be deterred by incidental state regulation. See Virginia Pharmacy Board v. Virginia Consumer Council, supra, at 771–772. It is solely motivated by the desire for profit, which, we have noted, is a force less likely to be deterred than others. Arguably, the reporting here was also more objectively verifiable than speech deserving of greater protection. In any case, the market provides a powerful incentive to a credit reporting agency to be accurate, since false credit reporting is of no use to creditors. Thus, any incremental "chilling" effect of libel suits would be of decreased significance.

We conclude that permitting recovery of presumed and punitive damages in defamation cases absent a showing of "actual malice" does not violate the First Amendment when the defamatory statements do not involve matters of public concern. Accordingly, we affirm the judgment of the Vermont Supreme Court.

It is so ordered.

7. The dissent, purporting to apply the same balancing test that we do today, concludes that even speech on purely private matters is entitled to the protections of Gertz. * * * Its "balance," however, rests on a misinterpretation. In particular, the dissent finds language in Gertz that, it believes, shows the State's interest to be "irrelevant." * * * It is then an easy step for the dissent to say that the State's interest is outweighed by even the reduced First Amendment interest in private speech. Gertz, however, did not say that the state interest was "irrelevant" in absolute terms. Indeed, such a statement is belied by Gertz itself, for it held that presumed and punitive damages were available under some circumstances. 418 U.S., at 349. Rather, what the Gertz language indicates is that the State's interest is not substantial relative to the First Amendment interest in public speech. This language is thus irrelevant to today's decision.

The dissent's "balance," moreover, would lead to the protection of all libels—no matter how attenuated their constitutional interest. If the dissent were the law, a woman of impeccable character who was branded a "whore" by a jealous neighbor would have no effective recourse unless she could prove "actual malice" by clear and convincing evidence. This is not malice in the ordinary sense, but in the more demanding sense of New York Times. The dissent would, in effect, constitutionalize the entire common law of libel.

8. The dissent suggests that our holding today leaves all credit reporting subject to reduced First Amendment protection. This is incorrect. The protection to be accorded a particular credit report depends on whether the report's "content, form, and context" indicate that it concerns a public matter. We also do not hold, as the dissent suggests we do, * * * that the report is subject to reduced constitutional protection because it constitutes economic or commercial speech. We discuss speech, along with advertising, only to show how many of the same concerns that argue in favor of reduced constitutional protection in those areas apply here as well.

COMMENT

In his Rosenbloom dissent (Rosenbloom, you will recall, was the case in which the Court stretched the actual malice rule to extend to "public issues"), Justice Marshall said that he did not wish judges to be making editorial judgments as to the public interest, an elusive concept at best. This may be the chink in the armor of Rosenbloom.[154] The vague line between what is and what is not a public issue drawn in Dun & Bradstreet, and reinforced a year later in Hepps, seems to give judges the editorial discretion normally reserved for editors. Gertz, because it was content neutral, avoided this problem, but it does require editors to intuit the difference between public and private plaintiffs.

An additional problem with Dun & Bradstreet is that it revives the commercial/noncommercial debate, qualifying First Amendment protection to the former. Few communication or information transactions in modern society are without some profit elements.

What we are left with is a public issue test depending on the purpose of the speaker and the size and nature of her audience and a Gertz rule applied to nonmedia defendants in some states and not in others.

COMMON LAW OR STATUTORY DEFENSES

In constructing a libel defense, a news organization will attempt to use every available weapon. Prior to New York Times and the constitutionalization of the tort, only the common law defenses, largely incorporated into state statutes, were available. Their main drawback was that in using them the burden of proof of truth or privilege was on the defendant. New York Times would put the burden of proof on plaintiff.

Moreover, the common law defenses have in a sense been absorbed by the constitutional defense. If a defamation cannot be shown at the threshold to be false, it is true. So truth is a defense that does not initially have to be demonstrated by a defendant. One traditional form of privilege is fair comment and criticism, the right to express critical opinions about those who through politics, performance, or authorship seek public approval. Since the Court in Gertz ("no such thing as a false idea") made opinion part of the constitutional defense, the old fair comment privilege has also been absorbed.

Assuming then that there is advantage to the press in piling up its defenses, let us look briefly at how the common law protections against libel suits have been applied in the past.

Truth or Justification

Justice White's concurring opinion in Dun & Bradstreet has been interpreted by some as a reflection of his desire to abandon the New York Times doctrine and return to a situation where only common law defenses would be available against libel. "* * * First Amendment values," said White, "are not served by circulating false statements of fact about public officials. On the contrary, erroneous information frustrates those values. They are even more disserved when the statements falsely impugn the honesty of those men and women and lessen confidence in government."

If only common law defenses were available, what would the press face? Historically, some state jurisdictions, either by statute or constitutional mandate, considered truth a defense only if published for good motives and justifiable ends. In others, to plead truth unsuccessfully, that is, to insist upon defending a falsehood, was to show malice. The common law was inhospitable to libel, even when based on provable fact.

Justice O'Connor's opinion for the Court in Philadelphia Newspapers v. Hepps, reprinted earlier in part to illustrate the locus of the burden of proof of truth or falsity, implies that truth alone is now a complete defense, part of the constitutional fabric. And the burden of proof of falsity is on the plaintiff. In the common law of libel, contrary to the rule of other negligence torts and with no consideration for First Amendment values, the burden of proof of truth was on the defendant.

Where truth or justification alone is pleaded as a defense, the proof must be at least as broad as the charge. "[I]t is generally agreed," said Prosser, an authority on tort law, "that it is not necessary to prove the literal truth of the accusation in every detail, and that it is sufficient to show that the imputation is substantially true, or, as it is often put, to justify the 'gist,' the 'sting,' or the 'substantial truth' of the defamation." [155]

Where a plaintiff, in testifying before a congressional committee, attacked "political Zionist planners for absolute rule via a one-world government," a newspaper article charging that the plaintiff had attacked Jews was held substantially true and therefore not actionable. [156]

It is important for the press to understand that a truth defense requires proof of a defamatory charge, not simply proof that the charge has been made. For example, when a newspaper charging an architectural firm with the faulty design of a school building based its article on a confidential report, it was faced with proving not only that its informant made the statements attributed to him but with proving that those statements were in fact true. [157]

The defense of truth until recently was never satisfied by simply showing that the report was an accurate repetition of a libelous charge. For the journalist, the basic question was whether the facts he or she had stated were provably true, regardless of where they came from.

A publication will be considered in its entirety and in relation to its structure, nuances, implications, and connotations. It is not enough to take sentences separately and demonstrate their individual accuracy, detached and wrenched out of context.

Sometimes the evidence needed to prove the truth is just not available. Until it is, an alleged defamatory statement is presumed to be false under this common law defense. [158] A defendant may need depositions, affidavits, exhibits—difficult to obtain after the fact. Truth can be a costly and hazardous defense.

The strength of one's belief in the truth of a defamatory publication does not constitute proof of truth or justification. Truth is an acceptable defense only as part of the New York Times defense or as a complement to that defense.

Qualified Privilege

Also known as the fair report, the public eye or public record privilege, this defense is rooted in the theory that in some situations the public interest in the full disclosure of public business overrides harm to individual reputation. "A report of any meeting, assembly or gathering that is open to the general public and is held for the purpose of discussing or otherwise dealing with matters of public concern" [159] may be privileged. Although the purpose of the privilege was historically to expose to the citizenry the process of self-government, nongovernmental or private meetings may be covered when their agendas are political.

Here again state law is determinative. There are wide variations from one jurisdiction to another. Generally a news organization may publish with impunity a fair and accurate report of any judicial, quasi-judicial, legislative, executive or administrative proceeding at any level of government. Reports and documents relating to such proceedings are also protected.

Traditionally, common law malice would destroy the privilege. Thus a qualified privilege. There is disagreement as to whether actual malice even destroys the privilege since actual malice is a state of mind and a reporter's views of the truth or falsehood of a report are irrelevant. If they were not, it is argued, the idea of the privilege would be demolished. [160] At the same time, the purposeful distortion of a record in its reporting might destroy even the constitutional defense. Gertz says the privilege attaches only to fair and accurate republications of statements made in government documents. Not everything a legislator, an administrator, a council member, board member, committee member, or law enforcement officer says to a reporter is privileged, although some state laws stretch the rule. [161]

Look out for unofficial statements by police officers, witnesses, or attorneys in the early phases of crime stories. "Hot line" reports from police to media were not part of an official record and would not give a privilege to a newspaper's false report that a husband had shot his wife.[162]

Reports of judicial proceedings are generally privileged, although there is disagreement as to when a judicial process has begun. In some states privilege depends upon some official action having been taken by a judge or officer of the court. A pleading, deposition, or complaint filed in a case, but not yet acted upon, may not be privileged. The assumption is that these documents, containing possibly false, defamatory, and uncontradicted charges, are addressed to the courts and not to the public at large. In some states a reporter must be certain that a legal document has been served on the party named as defendant before its contents are divulged. If legal papers are filed in a court clerk's office but the defendant has not been served with process, there is no privilege, for no legal proceeding has begun.

The majority view, however, is that a report on pleadings or complaints is privileged whether or not judicial actions regarding them have occurred. Under California's broad law, even secret grand jury proceedings are covered.[163] In Washington, D.C., on the other hand, privilege applies only to statements that are clearly identifiable to the reader as based on public records and does not extend to statements that the ordinary reader would interpret as background information.[164] In Massachusetts, privilege covers nonpublic governmental reports that reveal government misconduct,[165] while New York prefers to protect more "official proceedings." State by state examples may only serve to confuse, however.

More important is the Court's holding in Firestone: a constitutional defense does not automatically extend to all judicial proceedings. The Court said that there was no reason that libel plaintiffs "should substantially forfeit that degree of protection which the law of defamation would otherwise afford them simply by virtue of their being drawn into a courtroom." Moreover, the Firestone case involved an inaccurate report of a judicial record. The case was distinguished from Cox Broadcasting Corp. v. Cohn, 420 U.S. 469 (1975), where an accurate report from a judicial record broadcasting the name of a rape victim, contrary to Georgia law, was said to be privileged.

Substantial accuracy may be the standard governing the privilege. Errors in fact may be overlooked where complex technical language is involved, if they do not lead to serious distortion.[166] Generally an editor's motivation for publishing will not come into play if the report fairly reflects the record.

So a substantially accurate account of a state auditor's report of "questionable ties" between a school board administrator and the suppliers of educational materials was privileged.[167]

Sealed records and documents withheld from public scrutiny by court order, or affidavits which have not become part of a judicial process, may not be privileged. In some states, court rules or statutes provide that papers filed in juvenile, matrimonial, divorce, and morals cases are sealed and not open to the public generally. Court hearings dealing with such matters, even though closed, may be privileged in the absence of a state secrecy statute. A fair and accurate report of a judicial proceeding involving a youthful offender not open to the public was nevertheless privileged, said a New York court.[168] But be careful. Know your state's rules.

Statements made in court but stricken from the record may not be privileged. A New York court, however, ruled that anything pertinent to a case, whether part of the record or not, would be protected. "To be outside of the privilege," it said, "a statement made in open court must be so outrageously out of context as to permit one to conclude, from the mere fact that the statement was uttered, that it was motivated by no other desire than to defame."[169] California's rule doesn't even require pertinence. Any publication that has any reasonable relation to a judicial proceeding, even though made outside the courtroom, may be privileged. The defamatory matter need not be relevant, pertinent, or material to any issue before the court, as long as there is a connection.[170]

Once again, reports must be balanced, fair, and substantially accurate. They need not be verbatim. Get names correct. Indicate the source of your information. It can be safely reported that a crime has been committed and a particular person is being held for questioning. An arrest should not be reported until a suspect is booked. A police blotter or log book is usually an official public record.[171] Although some states have statutes extending the protection of privilege to reports of arresting officers, police chiefs, country prosecutors, and coroners, collateral details on investigations and speculation on evidence from these such sources are generally not privileged.[172]

The "Community of Interests" Privilege

Closely related to the broader defense of qualified privilege is the conditional privilege to publish defamatory matter in defense of one's own reputation or property rights; or to circulate defamation among members of religious, fraternal, labor, corporate, or charitable organizations in pursuit of mutual property, business, or professional interests; among members of one's own family; or in fulfilling one's social obligations to assist in law enforcement.[173] Such activities frequently involve credit agencies, hired investigators, and prospective employers. Seldom does this defense pertain to the press.

A father's letter objecting to the involvement of a suspended policeman in a Boy Scout bus trip in which the father's fifteen-year-old son was a participant was conditionally privileged. The father's complaint was sent to the directors and officers of the corporation planning the trip. The policeman, who was facing trial for burglary, had the burden of showing actual malice on the part of the father in order to win a libel judgment.[174]

Fair Comment and Criticism: The "Opinion" Defense

Fair Comment and Criticism, another common law form of privilege, has been enfolded into the constitutional defense. Recall the Gertz Court saying: "Under the First Amendment there is no such thing as a false idea. However pernicious an opinion may seem, we depend for its correction not on the conscience of judges and juries but on the competition of other ideas."

The privilege may have come into the common law in Carr v. Hood, 1 Camp. 355, 170 Eng.Rep. 983 (1808). The classic American case is Cherry Sisters v. Des Moines Leader, 86 N.W. 323 (Iowa 1901). The latter case is amusing (the Cherry Sisters were a notoriously grotesque vaudeville act), and it established the general rule that one may go to the utmost lengths of denunciation, condemnation, and satirization when criticizing persons and institutions seeking public approval or inviting public attention.

Since fair comment was a defense for the libelous expression of an opinion, a perennial problem was to distinguish between fact and opinion and to avoid basing opinions on false facts. When you consider that factual implications are implicit or enmeshed in most opinions—the editorial or the review, for example—the task was near impossible.

John Stuart Mill, in chapter two of his great Essay on Liberty, seemed not to be making the distinction when he wrote: "We can never be sure that the opinion we are endeavoring to stifle is a false opinion; and if we were sure, stifling it would be an evil still." Nevertheless, the rule gradually emerged that defamatory opinions were actionable only if based on the allegation of undisclosed or false facts. A leading case was Rinaldi v. Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 2169, 397 N.Y.S.2d 943 (1977), cert. den. 434 U.S. 969 (1977). It appeared to certify opinion as a constitutional defense. The question of fact or opinion would initially be for the court. It is not certain that the opinion defense has taken the place of the older fair comment rule, a defense that could be overcome by common law malice—ill will, spite, or hostility. But as a broader defense, opinion has probably absorbed fair comment.

Under the opinion rule none of the following characterizations was actionable: "unscrupulous charlatans" and "cancer con artists;" [175] "the Al Capone of the City;" [176] "neo-Nazi;" [177] "an unbelievably unscrupulous character;" [178] "a sleazebag" who "kind of slimed up from the bayou;" [179] a school superintendent who was said to look like an "ignorant and spineless politician;" [180] an abortion activist referred to as a "merchant of death;" [181] and an editorial cartoon of former Los Angeles Mayor Yorty being approached by orderlies with straitjackets and thinking they were Secret Service officers sent to protect the new "secretary of defense." [182] Humor, if it is too subtle, may backfire; a reader could take a joke literally.

Communicators can also be on the receiving end. A letter-to-the-editor asserting that a journalist had conducted "the worst single example of a journalistic smear" in covering the appointment of a college president and was the "journalistic scum of the earth" was protected opinion. [183] So was a magazine's description of a newspaper publisher as "near-Neanderthal," whose newspaper is published "by paranoids for paranoids." Rhetorical hyperbole, said a federal district court, is absolutely protected under the First Amendment. [184] And magazine statements describing a television announcer as the "worst" sports announcer in Boston and "enrolled in a course for remedial speaking" were, said Massachusetts' highest court, protected statements of opinion, especially in the context of a humorous "best and worst" article. [185] The idea of context brings us to the leading case on the opinion defense.

Columnists Evans and Novak criticized the appointment of a Marxist, Bertell Ollman, to head the University of Maryland's department of politics and government. He would use the classroom, they said, as an instrument for preparing "the revolution." They belittled his standing in academe and challenged his pedagogic motives. Ollman asked for a retraction. It was refused, but a letter from Ollman was published in the Washington Post. Ollman sued and a federal district court granted summary judgment to the columnists. Ollman appealed that judgment.

This case presents us with the delicate and sensitive task of accommodating the First Amendment's protection of free expression of ideas with the common law's protection of an individual's interest in reputation. It is a truism that the free flow of ideas and opinions is integral to our democratic system of government. * * * At the same time, an individual's interest in his or her reputation is of the highest order. Its protection is an eloquent expression of the respect historically afforded the dignity of the individual in Anglo-American legal culture. hood, wreck his standing in the community, and seriously impair his sense of dignity and self-esteem.

The judiciary's task in accommodating these competing interests is by no means new: at common law, the fair comment doctrine bestowed qualified immunity from libel actions as to certain types of opinions in order that writers could express freely their views about subjects of public interest.[5] However, since Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1633 (1974), the nature of this accommodation has fundamentally changed. In Gertz, the Supreme Court in dicta seemed to provide absolute immunity from defamation actions for all opinions and to discern the basis for this immunity in the First Amendment. The Court began its analysis of the case by stating:

> Under the First Amendment there is no such thing as false idea. However pernicious an opinion may seem, we depend for its correction not on the conscience of judges and juries but on the competition of other ideas. But there is no constitutional value in false statements of fact. Neither the intentional lie nor the careless error materially advances society's interest in "uninhibited, robust, and wide-open debate on the public issues."[6]

By this statement, Gertz elevated to constitutional principle the distinction between fact and opinion, which at common law had formed the basis of the doctrine of fair comment. Gertz's implicit command thus imposes upon both state and federal courts the duty as a matter of constitutional adjudication to distinguish facts from opinions in order to provide opinions with the requisite, absolute First Amendment protection. At the same time, however, the Supreme Court provided little guidance in Gertz itself as to the manner in which the distinction between fact and opinion is to be discerned. That, as we shall see, is by no means as easy a question as might appear at first blush.

Indeed, Gertz did not focus on this distinction at all. Rather, assuming without lengthy discussion that the statements in that case could be construed as statements of fact, the Court held that the plaintiff, who was a private rather than public figure, could prove that the statements at issue there were libelous upon demonstrating that they were negligently made. The distinction in our law between public and private figures, however, does not directly bear on the distinction between fact and opinion. Expressions of opinion are protected whether the subject of the comment is a private or public figure. See Lewis v. Time, Inc., 710 F.2d 549, 555, 9 Med.L.Rptr. 1984 (9th Cir. 1983). In a word Gertz's reasoning immunizes an opinion, not because the opinion is asserted about a public figure, but because there is no such thing as a "false" opinion.

To evaluate the totality of the circumstances of an allegedly defamatory statement, we will consider four factors in assessing whether the average reader would view the statement as fact or, conversely, opinion. While necessarily imperfect, these factors will, we are persuaded, assist in discerning as systematically as possible what constitutes an assertion of fact and what is, in contrast, an expression of opinion.

First, we will analyze the common usage or meaning of the specific language of the challenged statement itself. Our analysis of the specific language under scrutiny will be aimed at determining whether the statement has a precise core of meaning for which

5. To establish the defense of fair comment, the defendant had to show (1) that the published criticism was one of legitimate public interest, (2) that the criticism was based on facts either stated or otherwise known to the reader, (3) that the criticism represented the actual opinion of the critic, and (4) that the criticism was not made solely for the purpose of causing harm to the person criticized. See Restatement (Second) of Torts §606 (1938). See also, Carman, Hutchinson v. Proxmire and the Neglected Fair Comment Defense: An Alternative to "Actual Malice," 30 DePaul L. As we discuss below, the actual holding of Gertz was that in order to prevail in a libel action, private figures did not have to show that a false statement was made with actual malice. Despite its status as dicta, a majority of federal circuit courts, including this one, have accepted the statement as controlling law. See McBride v. Merrell Dow and Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 717 F.2d 1460, 1464 & n.7 (D.C. Cir. 1983); *Bose Corp. v. The Gertz dictum was recently quoted with approval by the Supreme Court. See Bose Corp. v. Consumers Union, Inc., 104 S.Ct. 1949, 1961 (1984).

a consensus of understanding exists or, conversely, whether the statement is indefinite and ambiguous. See Buckley v. Littell, 539 F.2d 882, 895, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1762 (2d Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 1062 (1977). Readers are, in our judgment, considerably less likely to infer facts from an indefinite or ambiguous statement than one with a commonly understood meaning. Second, we will consider the statement's verifiability—is the statement capable of being objectively characterized as true or false? See, e.g., Hotchner v. Castillo-Puche, 551 F.2d at 913. Insofar as a statement lacks a plausible method of verification, a reasonable reader will not believe that the statement has specific factual content. And, in the setting of litigation, the trier of fact obliged in a defamation action to assess the truth of an unverifiable statement will have considerable difficulty returning a verdict based upon anything but speculation. Third, moving from the challenged language itself, we will consider the full context of the statement—the entire article or column, for example—inasmuch as other, unchallenged language surrounding the allegedly defamatory statement will influence the average reader's readiness to infer that a particular statement has factual content. See Greenbelt Cooperative Publishing Association v. Bresler, supra, 398 U.S. at 13–14; cf. Restatement (Second) of Torts § 563. Finally, we will consider the broader context or setting in which the statement appears. Different types of writing have, as we shall more fully see, widely varying social conventions which signal to the reader the likelihood of a statement's being either fact or opinion. See Old Dominion Branch No. 496, National Association of Letter Carriers v. Austin, supra, 418 U.S. at 286.

The first factor of our inquiry is to analyze the common usage or meaning of the allegedly defamatory words themselves.[17] We seek in this branch of our analysis to determine whether the allegedly defamatory statement has a precise meaning and thus is likely to give rise to clear factual implications.[18] A classic example of a statement with a well-defined meaning is an accusation of a crime. To be sure, such accusations are not records of sense perceptions. Quite to the contrary, they depend for their meaning upon social normative systems. But those norms are so commonly understood that the statements are seen by the reasonable reader or hearer as implying highly damaging facts. Post-Gertz courts have therefore not hesitated to hold that accusations of criminal conduct are statements "laden with factual content" that may support an action for defamation. See, e.g., Cianci v. New Times Publishing Co., 639 F.2d 54, 63, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1625, 2145 (2d Cir. 1980) (holding that an article which implied that the Mayor of Providence, R.I., had committed rape and which charged him with paying the alleged victim not to bring charges was not protected opinion). Even a somewhat less well defined accusation that a "judge is corrupt" has been held actionable. Rinaldi v. Holt, Rinehart & Winston, Inc., 366 N.E.2d 1299, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 2169 (N.Y.), cert. denied. 431 U.S. 969, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1432 (1977). "Corruption," at least in the context of public service, was deemed to imply factual allegations of bribery or other official malfeasance.

On the other hand, statements that are "loosely definable" or "variously interpretable" cannot in most contexts support an action for defamation. See Buckley v. Littell, supra, 539 F.2d at 895. In that case, a writer in his book on the political right in the United States accused columnist and author William F. Buckley, Jr., of being a "fellow traveler" of "fascists." Noting that Mr. Buckley and the author of this particular tome embraced widely different definitions of "fascism" and different views as to which journals could be described as "fascist," the court declined to develop a "correct" definition of

17. We do not, of course, suggest that the four-factor analysis is to be undertaken in a rigid lock-step fashion. Thus, as will become evident below, a logical starting point in applying the fact-opinion analysis may be the broad social context or setting within which the defamatory statement appears (factor "four") and the language surrounding the challenged statements (factor "three").

18. Our review of the definiteness of the allegedly defamatory statement should not be confused with the rather curious doctrine of "innocent construction." This doctrine prevents a statement from being found defamatory as a matter of law, if it has two or more meanings, one of which is nondefamatory. The doctrine is accepted only in Illinois. See John v. Tribune Co., 181 N.E.2d 105, 108 (Ill.), cert denied, 371 U.S. 877 (1962). See generally Comment, The Illinois Doctrine of Innocent Construction: A Minority of One, 30 U. Chi. L. Rev. 524 (1963). See also McBride v. Merrell Dow, supra, 717 F.2d at 1465.

When we review a statement and find that it is indefinite in this context, we are not declaring that the statement has an innocent meaning, but are instead holding that the statement is so ambiguous that the average reader would not fairly infer any specific factual content from it. Thus, the statement should be classified as protected opinion.

this pivotal term.[19] The Second Circuit held, rather, that the use of such expressions "cannot be regarded as having been proved to be statements of facts, among other reasons, because of the tremendous imprecision of the meaning and usage of these terms in the realm of political debate, an imprecision which is similarly echoed in the book."[20] Id. at 893. Pursuing a line of analysis similar to that found in Buckley, the same court that held actionable the term "corrupt" concluded that the term "incompetent" as applied to a judge was too vague to support a claim of libel. Rinaldi v. Holt, Rinehart & Winston, Inc., supra, 366 N.E.2d at 1303.

The use of indefinite terms is obviously not confined to the realm of politics and public policy. In Cole v. Westinghouse Broadcasting Co., Inc., 435 N.E.2d 1021, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1828 (Mass.), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1037 (1982), the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court held that the statement that a reporter had engaged in "sloppy and irresponsible reporting" and had poor reporting technique was too "imprecise" to support a defamation action. Similarly, in Avins v. White, 627 F.2d 637 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 982 (1982), the former dean of a law school claimed that his academic ability and performance had been falsely disparaged in the summary evaluation of the school's first accreditation report. The summary bluntly stated: "[T]he most important deficiency [of the law school] is an intangible one; there is an academic ennui that pervades the institution. The intellectual spark is missing in the faculty and students." Id. at 642. Emphasizing that the statement itself described its criticism as "intangible," the Avins court classified the statement as an expression of opinion.

The straightforward but important principle to be drawn from cases such as Buckley, Rinaldi, Cole and Avins is that in all types of discourse, the courts must analyze the allegedly defamatory statement to determine whether it has a sufficiently definite meaning to convey facts.

In assessing whether the challenged statements are facts, rather than opinion, courts should, secondly, consider the degree to which the statements are verifiable—is the statement objectively capable of proof or disproof? See Goodrich v. Waterbury Republican-American, supra, 448 A.2d at 1319; Hotchner v. Castillo-Puche, supra, 551 F.2d at 913. The reason for this inquiry is simple: a reader cannot rationally view an unverifiable statement as conveying actual facts. Moreover, insofar as a statement is unverifiable, the First Amendment is endangered when attempts are made to prove the statement true or false. Lacking a clear method of verification with which to evaluate a statement—such as labelling a well-known American author a "fascist," see Buckley v. Littell, supra—the trier of fact may improperly tend to render a decision based upon approval or disapproval of the contents of the statement, its author, or its subject.

In making this observation, we imply no criticism of a jury's ability to find facts, if facts are to be found. The rule against allowing unverifiable statements to go to the jury is, in actuality, merely one of many rules in tort law that prevent the jury from rendering a verdict based on speculation. Cf. Hobson v. Wilson, No. 82-2159, slip op. at 120 (D.C. Cir. June 8, 1984) (permitting First Amendment interests to be compensated "if they can be conceptualized and if harm can be shown with sufficient certainty to avoid damages based * * * on pure speculation"). An obvious potential for quashing or muting First Amendment activity looms large when juries attempt to assess the truth of a statement that admits of no method of verification.

Needless to say, it will often be difficult to assay whether a statement is verifiable. Statements made in written communication or discourse range over a spectrum with respect to the degree to which they can be verified rather than dividing neatly into categories of "verifiable" and "unverifiable." But even if the principle of inquiring as to verifiability pro-

19. The court did hold, however, that the following statement was not constitutionally protected: "Like Westbrook Pegler, who lied day after day in his column about Quentin Reynolds and goaded him into a lawsuit, Buckley could be taken to court by any one of several people who had enough money to hire competent legal counsel and nothing else to do." Buckley v. Littell, supra, 539 F.2d at 895. The court treated this statement as implying that Buckley was a libeler and found that this proposition was capable of being proven false. Id. at 896. The charge that one has committed libel, like the charge that one has committed a crime, is obviously verifiable through the submission of evidence to the trier of fact.

20. Of course, we do not hold that the term "fascist" cannot be a statement of fact in any context. The issue is obviously not before us. But as an illustration of the application of our analysis, we observe that if the term were applied in a history of Italy between the World Wars and from the context it was clear that the application of the term was to adherents of Mussolini, the statement would be defamatory. See Buckley v. Littell, supra, 539 F.2d at 894 n.11. Courts, however, must be sensitive to the fact that some words that began their existence with a definite meaning have simply become epithets.

vides no panacea, this approach will nonetheless aid trial judges in assessing whether a statement should have the benefit of the absolute privilege conferred upon expressions of opinion. Trial judges have rich experience in the ways and means of proof and so will be particularly well situated to determine what can be proven.

In addition to evaluating the precision-indefiniteness and verifiability-unverifiability of a challenged statement, courts should, thirdly, examine the context in which the statement occurs. Readers will inevitably be influenced by a statement's context, and the distinction between fact and opinion can therefore be made only in context. As the Supreme Court's opinions in Greenbelt and Letter Carriers suggest, the context to be considered is both narrowly linguistic and broadly social.

The degree to which a statement is "laden with factual content" or can be read to imply facts depends upon the article or column, taken as a whole, of which the statement is a part. See Information Control v. Genesis One Computer, supra, 611 F.2d at 783. The language of the entire column may signal that a specific statement which, standing alone, would appear to be factual is in actuality a statement of opinion. An example of the power of context to transform an ostensibly factual statement into one of opinion is Greenbelt Publishing. Because the local newspaper in that case had described the substance of the land developer's negotiating proposals, the use of the term "blackmail" to characterize those proposals was quite plainly to be seen as an expression of opinion.[23]

An article or column, however, plainly does not have to include a complete set of facts to make it clear that a statement is being used in a metaphorical, exaggerated or even fantastic sense. In Myers v. Boston Magazine Co., Inc., 403 N.E.2d 376, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1241 (Mass. 1980), the court held as protected opinion a magazine's statement that a television sports reporter was "the only newscaster in town who is enrolled in a course for remedial speaking." Id. at 377. Although the statement on its face appears quite factual, the court emphasized in its analysis that the statement appeared in an article describing the best and worst sports personalities in a series of "one-liners." Id. For instance, the court noted that another item in the article described the Boston Bruins hockey team members as looking "like a gargoyle" and that the various descriptions had corresponding cartoons. The court concluded that the average reader would have been put on notice that he or she was reading opinions, and not being showered with facts. Id. at 379.

Another consideration in this respect, of particular relevance to the case at hand and useful in distinguishing between fact and opinion, is the inclusion of cautionary language in the text in which the statement at issue is found, see Information Control, supra, 611 F.2d at 784 (noting that the allegedly libelous statement was preceded by the phrase, "In the opinion of Genesis' management" and that this favored treating the statement which followed as opinion), or framing the statement as an interrogatory ("Is it not true that * * * ?"). The rationale typically advanced for this consideration is that cautionary language or interrogatories of this type put the reader on notice that what is being read is opinion and thus weaken any inference that the author possesses knowledge of damaging, undisclosed facts. See Pease v. Telegraph Publishing Co., 426 A.2d 463, 465, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1114 (N.H. 1981). In a word, when the reasonable reader encounters cautionary language, he tends to "discount that which follows.' See Burns v. McGraw-Hill Broadcasting Co., 659 P.2d 1351, 1360, 9 Med.L.Rptr. 1257 (Colo. 1983).

To be sure, there is authority against giving weight to cautionary or interrogatory language. Stating that "[i]t would be destructive of the law of libel if a writer could escape liability for accusations of crime simply by using, explicitly or implicitly, the words 'I think,' " Cianci, supra, 639 F.2d at 64, the Second Circuit in an opinion by Judge Friendly rejected the notion that cautionary language could immunize an otherwise defamatory statement. While Judge Friendly's argument is not without force, it may be overstated if applied outside the type of facts before the court in Cianci—the accusation of a crime—since cautionary language is only one of several factors to be considered in assessing an allegedly defamatory statement.[24] Burns v. McGraw-Hill, supra, 659 P.2d at 1360 N.4. When a statement is as "factually laden" as the accusation of a crime, which of course was the issue in Cianci, cautionary language is by and large unavailing to dilute the statement's factual implications. However, in statements less clearly factual, cautionary language may make a more substantial difference to the reader's understanding.

23. See also Rinsley v. Brandt, 700 F.2d 1304 (10th Cir. 1983). In Rinsley, an author levied harsh criticism at one doctor's method of treatment. The author stated that the doctor had "a theory to which [he was] willing to sacrifice a life." Id. at 1309. In a second passage, the author put the question "What does it take to put a stop to such a man [the doctor]? How many more children must die?" Id. The doctor claimed that the statement purported to convey information that he had purposely killed a patient and that other patients were in imminent danger of being purposely killed. The court rejected the claim, stating that the author's actual descriptions of the doctor's method of treatment and the circumstances of a patient's death, made it clear that these statements constituted the author's opinion. Id.

What is more, we cannot forget that the public has an interest in receiving information on issues of public importance even if the trustworthiness of the information is not absolutely certain. The First Amendment is served not only by articles and columns that purport to be definitive but by those articles that, more modestly, raise questions and prompt investigation or debate. By giving weight on the opinion side of the scale to cautionary and interrogative language, courts provide greater leeway to journalists and other writers and commentators in bringing issues of public importance to the public's attention and scrutiny.

Besides looking to the immediate context of the allegedly defamatory statement, courts should examine, finally, the broader social context into which the statement fits. Some types of writing or speech by custom or convention signal to readers or listeners that what is being read or heard is likely to be opinion, not fact.[25] It is one thing to be assailed as a corrupt public official by a soapbox orator and quite another to be labelled corrupt in a research monograph detailing the causes and cures of corruption in public service. This observation reflects no novel principle. The Supreme Court has expressly recognized the importance of social context when, in finding as an expression of opinion the use of the word "traitor" as applied to an employee who crossed a picket line, the Court stated that "such exaggerated rhetoric was commonplace in labor disputes." Letter Carriers, supra, 418 U.S. at 286.

Similarly, in Myers v. Boston Magazine, supra, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court was even more explicit in focusing upon the reader's understanding of a particular type of writing. Emphasizing that the "magazine's statement partook of an ancient, lively tradition of criticizing, even lampooning, performers," the court concluded that the statement that a sportscaster was attending a course in remedial speaking constituted privileged opinion. Id. at 381. In the lampooning tradition, the court emphasized, it is well understood that "a critic may resort to caricature and rhetorical license." Id. See also Pring v. Penthouse, Inc., 695 F.2d 438, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 2409 (10th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S.Ct. 3112 (1983) (finding that the imputation that the plaintiff had committed sexual acts on stage at the Miss America Pageant could not support a libel action when the writing in which the statement appeared was clearly a "fantasy").

Courts have, in the same vein, considered the influence that other well established genres of writing will have on the average reader. Of particular relevance in this respect to the case before us is Loeb v. Globe Newspaper Co., 489 F.Supp. 481 (D. Mass. 1980). In that case, the court observed that the article containing the alleged defamations of the publisher of the Manchester Union-Leader was situated on the Boston Globe's editorial page. The court held that, in the specific context or setting at issue there, the statement to the effect that Mr. Loeb never backed a winner in a presidential election was protected opinion. Plainly, the general understanding of the nature of the statements on the editorial page was relevant to the decision; if the statement had appeared on the front page where news is reported, it would most likely have been treated as a statement of fact. See also National Rifle Association v. Dayton Newspapers, Inc., 555 F.Supp. 1299 (S.D. Ohio 1983) (holding that the statement in an editorial that the National Rifle Association "happily encourages * * * murders and robberies" was protected opinion). In short, it is well understood that editorial writers and commentators frequently "resort to the type of caustic bombast traditionally used in editorial writing to stimulate public reaction." Id. at 1309. Hence, in analyzing the distinction between fact and opinion, the court will take fully into account the different social conventions or customs inherent in different types of writing.[27]

[Judge Starr in his plurality opinion then proceeds to apply the four-part test to the Evans and Novak column and he finds that it fits. He concludes:]

* * *

But most fundamentally, we are reminded that in the accommodation of the conflicting concerns reflected in the First Amendment and the law of defamation, the deep-seated constitutional values embodied in the Bill of Rights require that we not engage, without bearing clearly in mind the context before us, in a Talmudic parsing of a single sentence or two, as if we were occupied with a philosophical enterprise or linguistic analysis. Ours is a practical task, with elemental constitutional values of freedom looming large as we go about our work. And in that undertaking, we are reminded by Gertz itself of our duty "to assure to the freedoms of speech and press that 'breathing space' essential to their fruitful exercise." Gertz, supra, 418 U.S. at 342. For the contraction of liberty's "breathing space" can only mean inhibition of the scope of public discussion on matters of general interest and concern. The provision of breathing space counsels strongly against straining to squeeze factual context from a single sentence in a column that is otherwise clearly opinion. As the Ninth Circuit so succinctly put it, "[t]he court must consider all the words used, not merely a particular phrase or sentence." Information Control Corp. v. Genesis One Computer Corp., supra, 611 F.2d at 784.

The judgment of the District Court is therefore Affirmed.

COMMENT

Judge Starr's four-point test, while not without its problems, is an improvement over the Restatements' older model of pure fact, pure opinion, and mixed fact/opinion. No dependable rule emerged from the myriad cases decided under that model. But no "bright-line rule" comes out of Starr's model either.

Although it has been variously interpreted, Starr's model seems to comprise (not necessarily in the order he presents them) the following elements:

1. Common Usage—the precision or indefiniteness with which the language is used;
2. Verifiability—the notion (probably erroneous) that only facts can be assessed as to truth or falsity;
3. Context—placement of the statement in the text, surrounding language, social conventions inherent in different types of writing, audience, and its likely interpretations;
4. Cautionary Language—metaphor, hyperbole, is the audience tipped off that the statement is an expression of opinion?

Former Judge Robert Bork, concurring in a ringing defense of freedom of the press, added a fifth element to the Starr test: political or public speech. "Those who step into areas of public dispute," said Bork, "who choose the pleasures and distractions of controversy, must be willing to bear criticism, disparagement and even wounding assessments."

Bork saw damage awards as "quite capable of silencing political commentators forever" and with respect to freedom of expression he observed: "A judge who refuses to see new threats to an established constitutional value, and hence provides a crabbed interpretation that robs a provision of its full, fair and reasonable meaning, fails in his judicial duty."

In a dissenting opinion that seemed designed to rebut Bork and reverse the trend of First Amendment doctrine, Judge Scalia, speculated in somewhat chilling language:

* * *

> It seems to me that the identification of "modern problems" to be remedied is quintessentially legislative rather than judicial business—largely because it is such a subjective judgment; and that the remedies are to be sought through democratic change rather than through judicial pronouncement that the Constitution now prohibits what it did not prohibit before. The concurrence perceives a "modern problem" consisting of "the freshening stream of libel actions, which * * * may threaten the public and constitutional interest in free, and frequently rough, discussion," and of claims for damages that are "quite capable of silencing political commentators forever." Perhaps that perception is correct, though it is hard to square with the explosion of communications in general, and political commentary in particular, in this "Media Age." But then again, perhaps those are right who discern a distressing tendency for our political commentary to descend from discussion of public issues to destruction of private reputations; who believe that, by putting some brake upon that tendency, defamation liability under existing standards not only does not impair but fosters the type of discussion the first amendment is most concerned to protect; and who view high libel judgments as no more than an accurate reflection of the vastly expanded damage that can be caused by media that are capable of holding individuals up to public obloquy from coast to coast and that reap financial rewards commensurate > with that power. I do not know the answers to these questions, but I do know that it is frightening to think that the existence or nonexistence of a constitutional rule (the willfully false disparagement of professional reputation in the context of political commentary cannot be actionable) is to depend upon our ongoing personal assessments of such sociological factors. And not only is our cloistered capacity to identify "modern problems" suspect, but our ability to provide condign solutions through the rude means of constitutional prohibition is nonexistent. What a strange notion that the problem of excessive libel awards should be solved by permitting, in political debate, intentional destruction of reputation—rather than by placing a legislative limit upon the amount of libel recovery. It has not often been thought, by the way, that the press is among the least effective of legislative lobbyists.

> In recent years, the Supreme Court confronted a similar assertion of a "modern problem" that required a new first amendment mutant. The omnipresence of the modern press, the popularity of "investigative reportage," and the eagerness of many dissident groups actively to seek out press coverage, have with increasing frequency caused members of the press to be in possession of information regarding unlawful activity, necessary for the detection or prevention of crime.

Bork's "public issue" test was added to the Starr model in Janklow v. Newsweek, Inc., 12 Med.L.Rptr. 1961, 788 F.2d 1300 (8th Cir. 1986), when a divided court of appeals rejected the libel claim of the governor of South Dakota against a magazine for recounting American Indian charges of rape of a teenaged Indian girl against the governor. "[T]he disputed statement," said a majority of the Eighth Circuit, " * * * is imprecise, unverifiable, presented in a forum where spirited writing is expected and involves criticism of the motives and intentions of a public official * * *."

In a nutshell, the less precise a statement, the more likely it is to be opinion; the less verifiable, the more likely it is to be opinion; and the literary, social, and political context of the statement will be considered in differentiating fact from opinion.

The Ollman model is not without its problems. "Context" can also be an extremely subjective matter. Objective proof of a fact in a statement is seldom available. But the model is better than anything preceding it. Some media lawyers see it as a firm defense of opinion; others are wary of it or think it applicable only to the D.C. Circuit.

Some courts have said that opinions are absolutely immune;[186] others have used variations of Ollman.[187] In the Belli case the court reduced the test to public figure and context considerations and noted that where the plaintiff aggressively advertised his own opinions about a public matter, he shouldn't be surprised when the targets of his wrath "returned the favor."

Press freedom may seem tenuous under tests that quickly dissolve into matters of literary predilection or political preference. A public issue test, standing alone, may be preferable for public officials and voluntary public figures. Anything less could make libel law unconstitutional due to vagueness, if not overbreadth.

Intentional Infliction of Emotional Distress

Recalling Mrs. Firestone's claim for damages based not on reputation but on "personal humiliation and mental anguish and suffering," media lawyers speculated on whether a new tort had entered the law when Jerry Falwell sued Larry Flynt for the "intentional infliction of emotional distress."

But was it a new tort? Something like it came into English law in 1897;[188] the tort was widely recognized after Dean William Prosser certified it in the 1950s; and the Restatement speaks of a tort involving extreme and outrageous conduct exceeding all reasonable bounds of decency that is extraordinarily vindictive, intentional, or reckless and leading to severe emotional distress.[189] Emotional distress for some time has been sufficient to support a libel suit in Maryland, Louisiana, Massachusetts, and Florida and perhaps in Virginia, whereas most states have required a showing of damage to reputation. And where libel has been presumed to cause shame, mental Virginia recognizes a similar cause of action if a plaintiff can show that he suffered severe distress as a result of intentional or reckless misconduct that exceeds "generally accepted standards of decency and morality." What does a provision such as this mean for the unpopular, unorthodox, or immoral speaker?

anxiety, and humiliation—and why wouldn't it—how does it differ from the "new" tort?

Whatever its origins and legal standing, the new tort was greatly limited by the Supreme Court in its 1988 ruling in Hustler Magazine v. Falwell. The principals, Flynt and Falwell, seemed to deserve one another. Flynt frankly declared that he intended metaphorically at least to "assassinate Jerry Falwell." Falwell, then, in spite of his deep emotional hurt, distributed the tasteless parody throughout the land, using it to raise $800,000 for his ministry.

Taking its cue from a brilliant dissent by Judge Wilkinson in the court below, the Supreme Court ruled for Hustler, and hundreds of libel lawyers, who believed Larry Flynt was "killing them," sighed in relief.

HUSTLER MAGAZINE v. FALWELL

14 MED.L.RPTR. 2281, 108 S.CT. 876 (1988).

REHNQUIST, C. J., delivered the opinion of the Court, in which Brennan, Marshall, Blackmun, Stevens, O'Connor, and Scalia, JJ., joined. White, J., filed an opinion concurring in the judgment. Kennedy, J., took no part in the consideration or decision of the case.

Petitioner Hustler Magazine, Inc., is a magazine of nationwide circulation. Respondent Jerry Falwell, a nationally known minister who has been active as a commentator on politics and public affairs, sued petitioner and its publisher, petitioner Larry Flynt, to recover damages for invasion of privacy, libel, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The District Court directed a verdict against respondent on the privacy claim, and submitted the other two claims to a jury. The jury found for petitioners on the defamation claim, but found for respondent on the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress and awarded damages. We now consider whether this award is consistent with the First and Fourteenth Amendments of the United States Constitution.

The inside front cover of the November 1983 issue of Hustler Magazine featured a "parody" of an advertisement for Campari Liqueur that contained the name and picture of respondent and was entitled "Jerry Falwell talks about his first time." This parody was modeled after actual Campari ads that included interviews with various celebrities about their "first times." Although it was apparent by the end of each interview that this meant the first time they sampled Campari, the ads clearly played on the sexual double entendre of the general subject of "first times." Copying the form and layout of these Campari ads, Hustler's editors chose respondent as the featured celebrity and drafted an alleged "interview" with him in which he states that his "first time" was during a drunken incestuous rendezvous with his mother in an outhouse. The Hustler parody portrays respondent and his mother as drunk and immoral, and suggests that respondent is a hypocrite who preaches only when he is drunk. In small print at the bottom of the page, the ad contains the disclaimer, "ad parody—not to be taken seriously." The magazine's table of contents also lists the ad as "Fiction; Ad and Personality Parody."

Soon after the November issue of Hustler became available to the public, respondent brought this diversity action in the United States District Court for the Western District of Virginia against Hustler Magazine, Inc., Larry C. Flynt, and Flynt Distributing Co. Respondent stated in his complaint that publication of the ad parody in Hustler entitled him to recover damages for libel, invasion of privacy, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The case proceeded to trial.[1] At the close of the evidence, the District Court granted a directed verdict for petitioners on the invasion of privacy claim. The jury then found against respondent on the libel claim, specifically finding that the ad parody could not "reasonably be understood as describing actual facts about [respondent] or actual events in which [he] participated." The jury ruled for respondent on the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim, however, and stated that he should be awarded $100,000 in compensatory damages, as well as $50,000 each in punitive damages from petitioners. Petitioners' motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict was denied.

On appeal, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit affirmed the judgment against petitioners. Falwell v. Flynt, 797 F.2d 1270, 13 Med.L.Rptr. 1145 (CA4 1986). The court rejected petitioners' argument that the "actual malice" standard of New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), must be met before respondent can recover for emotional distress. The court agreed that because respondent is concededly a public figure, petitioners are "entitled to the same level of first amendment protection in the claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress that they received in [respondent's] claim for libel." 797 F.2d, at 1274. But this does not mean that a literal application of the actual malice rule is appropriate in the context of an emotional distress claim. In the court's view, the New York Times decision emphasized the constitutional importance not of the falsity of the statement or the defendant's disregard for the truth, but of the heightened level of culpability embodied in the requirement of "knowing * * * or reckless" conduct. Here, the New York Times standard is satisfied by the state-law requirement, and the jury's finding, that the defendants have acted intentionally or recklessly. The Court of Appeals then went on to reject the contention that because the jury found that the ad parody did not describe actual facts about respondent, the ad was an opinion that is protected by the First Amendment. As the court put it, this was "irrelevant," as the issue is "whether [the ad's] publication was sufficiently outrageous to constitute intentional infliction of emotional distress." Id., at 1276. Petitioners then filed a petition for rehearing en banc, but this was denied by a divided court. Given the importance of the constitutional issues involved, we granted certiorari.

This case presents us with a novel question involving First Amendment limitations upon a State's authority to protect its citizens from the intentional infliction of emotional distress. We must decide whether a public figure may recover damages for emotional harm caused by the publication of an ad parody offensive to him, and doubtless gross and repugnant in the eyes of most. Respondent would have us find that a State's interest in protecting public figures from emotional distress is sufficient to deny First Amendment protection to speech that is patently offensive and is intended to inflict emotional injury, even when that speech could not reasonably have been interpreted as stating actual facts about the public figure involved. This we decline to do.

At the heart of the First Amendment is the recognition of the fundamental importance of the free flow of ideas and opinions on matters of public interest and concern. "[T]he freedom to speak one's mind is not only an aspect of individual liberty—and thus a good unto itself—but also is essential to the common quest for truth and the vitality of society as a whole." Bose Corp. v. Consumers Union of United States, Inc., 466 U.S. 485, 503–504 (1984). We have therefore been particularly vigilant to ensure that individual expressions of ideas remain free from governmentally imposed sanctions. The First Amendment recognizes no such thing as a "false" idea. Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 339 (1974). As Justice Holmes wrote, "[W]hen men have realized that time has upset many fighting faiths, they may come to believe even more than they believe the very foundations of their own conduct that the ultimate good desired is better reached by free trade in ideas—that the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market * * *." Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616, 630 (1919) (dissenting opinion).

The sort of robust political debate encouraged by the First Amendment is bound to produce speech that is critical of those who hold public office or those public figures who are "intimately involved in the resolution of important public questions or, by reason of their fame, shape events in areas of concern to society at large." Associated Press v. Walker, decided with Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130, 164 (1967) (Warren, C. J., concurring in result). Justice Frankfurter put it succinctly in Baumgartner v. United States, 322 U.S. 665, 673–674 (1944), when he said that "[o]ne of the prerogatives of American citizenship is the right to criticize public men and measures." Such criticism, inevitably, will not always be reasoned or moderate; public figures as well as public officials will be subject to "vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks," New York times, supra, at 270. "[T]he candidate who vaunts his spotless record and sterling integrity cannot convincingly cry 'Foul!' when an opponent or an industrious reporter attempts to demonstrate the contrary." Monitor Patriot Co. v. Roy, 401 U.S. 265, 274 (1971).

Of course, this does not mean that any speech about a public figure is immune from sanction in the form of damages. Since New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, supra, we have consistently ruled that a public figure may hold a speaker liable for the damage to reputation caused by publication of a defamatory falsehood, but only if the statement was made "with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not." Id., at 279–280. False statements of fact are particularly valuless; they interfere with the truth-seeking function of the marketplace of ideas, and they cause damage to an individual's reputation that cannot easily be repaired by counterspeech, however persuasive or effective. See Gertz, 418 U.S., at 340, 344, n. 9. But even though falsehoods have little value in and of themselves, they are "nevertheless inevitable in free debate," id., at 340, and a rule that would impose strict liability on a publisher for false factual assertions would have an undoubted "chilling" effect on speech relating to public figures that does have constitutional value. "Freedoms of expression require 'breathing space.' " Philadelphia Newspaper, Inc. v. Hepps, 475 U.S. 767, 772 (1986) (quoting New York Times, 376 U.S., at 272). This breathing space is provided by a constitutional rule that allows public figures to recover for libel or defamation only when they can prove both that the statement was false and that the statement was made with the requisite level of culpability.

Respondent argues, however, that a different standard should apply in this case because here the State seeks to prevent not reputational damage, but the severe emotional distress suffered by the person who is the subject of an offensive publication. Cf. Zacchini v. Scripps-Howard Broadcasting Co., 433 U.S. 562 (1977) (ruling that the "actual malice" standard does not apply to the tort of appropriation of a right of publicity). In respondent's view, and in the view of the Court of Appeals, so long as the utterance was intended to inflict emotional distress, it is of no constitutional import whether the statement was a fact or an opinion, or whether it was true or false. It is the intent to cause injury that is the gravamen of the tort, and the State's interest in preventing emotional harm simply outweighs whatever interest a speaker may have in speech of this type.

Generally speaking the law does not regard the intent to inflict emotional distress as one which should receive much solicitude, and it is quite understandable that most if not all jurisdictions have chosen to make it civilly culpable where the conduct in question is sufficiently "outrageous." But in the world of debate about public affairs, many things done with motives that are less than admirable are protected by the First Amendment. In Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64 (1964), we held that even when a speaker or writer is motivated by hatred or ill-will his expression was protected by the First Amendment:

> "Debate on public issues will not be uninhibited if the speaker must run the risk that it will be proved in court that he spoke out of hatred; even if he did speak out of hatred, utterances honestly believed contribute to the free interchange of ideas and the ascertainment of truth." Id., at 73.

Thus while such a bad motive may be deemed controlling for purposes of tort liability in other areas of the law, we think the First Amendment prohibits such a result in the area of public debate about public figures.

Were we to hold otherwise, there can be little doubt that political cartoonists and satirists would be subjected to damages awarded without any showing that their work falsely defamed its subject. Webster's defines a caricature as "the deliberately distorted picturing or imitating of a person, literary style, etc. by exaggerating features or mannerisms for satirical effect." Webster's New Unabridged Twentieth Century Dictionary of the English Language 275 (2d ed. 1979). The appeal of the political cartoon or caricature is often based on exploration of unfortunate physical traits or politically embarrassing events—an exploration often calculated to injure the feelings of the subject of the portrayal. The art of the cartoonist is often not reasoned or even-handed, but slashing and one-sided. One cartoonist expressed the nature of the art in these words:

> "The political cartoon is a weapon of attack, of scorn and ridicule and satire; it is least effective when it tries to pat some politician on the back. It is usually as welcome as a bee sting and is always controversial in some quarters." Long, The Political Cartoon: Journalism's Strongest Weapon, The Quill, 56, 57 (Nov. 1962).

Several famous examples of this type of intentionally injurious speech were drawn by Thomas Nast, probably the greatest American cartoonist to date, who was associated for many years during the post-Civil War era with Harper's Weekly. In the pages of that publication Nast conducted a graphic vendetta against William M. "Boss" Tweed and his corrupt associates in New York City's "Tweed Ring." It has been described by one historian of the subject as "a sustained attack which in its passion and effectiveness stands alone in the history of American graphic art." M. Keller, The Art and Politics of Thomas Nast 177 (1968). Another writer explains that the success of the Nast cartoon was achieved "because of the emotional impact of its presentation. It continuously goes beyond the bounds of good taste and conventional manners." C. Press, The Political Cartoon 251 (1981).

Despite their sometimes caustic nature, from the early cartoon portraying George Washington as an ass down to the present day, graphic depictions and satirical cartoons have played a prominent role in public and political debate. Nast's castigation of the Tweed Ring, Walt McDougall's characterization of presidential candidate James G. Blaine's banquet with the millionaires at Delmonico's as "The Royal Feast of Belshazzar," and numerous other efforts have undoubtedly had an effect on the course and outcome of contemporaneous debate. Lincoln's tall, gangling posture, Teddy Roosevelt's glasses and teeth, and Franklin D. Roosevelt's jutting jaw and cigarette holder have been memorialized by political cartoons with an effect that could not have been obtained by the photographer or the portrait artist. From the viewpoint of history it is clear that our political discourse would have been considerably poorer without them.

Respondent contends, however, that the caricature in question here was so "outrageous" as to distinguish it from more traditional political cartoons. There is no doubt that the caricature of respondent and his mother published in Hustler is at best a distant cousin of the political cartoons described above, and a rather poor relation at that. If it were possible by laying down a principled standard to separate the one from the other, public discourse would probably suffer little or no harm. But we doubt that there is any such standard, and we are quite sure that the pejorative description "outrageous" does not supply one. "Outrageousness" in the area of political and social discourse has an inherent subjectiveness about it which would allow a jury to impose liability on the basis of the jurors' tastes or views, or perhaps on the basis of their dislike of a particular expression. An "outrageousness" standard thus runs afoul of our longstanding refusal to allow damages to be awarded because the speech in question may have an adverse emotional impact on the audience. See NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886, 910 (1982) ("Speech does not lose its protected character * * * simply because it may embarrass others or coerce them into action"). And, as we stated in FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978):

> "[T]he fact that society may find speech offensive is not a sufficient reason for suppressing it. Indeed, if it is the speaker's opinion that gives offense, that consequence is a reason for according it constitutional protection. For it is a central tenet of the First Amendment that the government must remain neutral in the marketplace of ideas." Id., at 745–746.

See also Street v. New York, 394 U.S. 576, 592 (1969) ("It is firmly settled that * * * the public expression of ideas may not be prohibited merely because the ideas are themselves offensive to some of their hearers").

Admittedly, these oft-repeated First Amendment principles, like other principles, are subject to limitations. We recognized in Pacifica Foundation, that speech that is " 'vulgar,' 'offensive,' and 'shocking' " is "not entitled to absolute constitutional protection under all circumstances." 438 U.S., at 747. In Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568 (1942), we held that a state could lawfully punish an individual for the use of insulting " 'fighting' words—those which by their very utterance inflict injury or tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace." Id., at 571–572. These limitations are but recognition of the observation in Dun & Bradstreet, Inc. v. Greenmoss Builders, Inc., 472 U.S. 749, 758 (1985), that this Court has "long recognized that not all speech is of equal First Amendment importance." But the sort of expression involved in this case does not seem to us to be governed by any exception to the general First Amendment principles stated above.

We conclude that public figures and public official[s] may not recover for the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress by reason of publications such as the one here at issue without showing in addition that the publication contains a false statement of fact which was made with "actual malice," i.e., with knowledge that the statement was false or with reckless disregard as to whether or not it was true. This is not merely a "blind application" of the New York Times standard, see Times, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374, 390 (1967), it reflects our considered judgment that such a standard is necessary to give adequate "breathing space" to the freedoms protected by the First Amendment.

Here it is clear that respondent Falwell is a "public figure" for purposes of First Amendment law.[5] The jury found against respondent on his libel claim when it decided that the Hustler ad parody could not "reasonably be understood as describing actual facts about [respondent] or actual events in which [he] participated." The Court of Appeals interpreted the jury's finding to be that the ad parody "was not reasonably believable," 797 F.2d, at 1278, and in accordance with our custom we accept this finding. Respondent is thus relegated to his claim for damages awarded by the jury for the intentional infliction of emotional distress by "outrageous" conduct. But for reasons heretofore stated this claim cannot, consistently with the First Amendment, form a basis for the award of damages when the conduct in question is the publication of a caricature such as the ad parody involved here. The judgment of the Court of Appeals is accordingly

5. Neither party disputes this conclusion. Respondent is the host of a nationally syndicated television show and was the founder and president of a political organization formerly known as the Moral Majority. He is also the founder of Liberty University in Lynchburg, Virginia, and is the author of several books and publications. Who's Who in America 849 (44th ed. 1986–1987).

Reversed.

COMMENT

Falwell voided a method of circumventing the libel laws, firmed up the New York Times doctrine (without the support of Justice White), and reassured parodists, satirists, cartoonists, and others that their work falls within the boundaries of protected opinion.

An additional concern for the opinion doctrine is "faction" or the docudrama, those presentations in which the distinction between reportage and art becomes blurred. How is the Ollman test, with the public interest appendage, applied to this mix of journalism and the creative process?

Did creators of the film Missing portray an American official with actual malice as ordering or approving an order to kill Charles Horman, an American residing in Chile at the time of the 1973 coup? A federal district court thought not and had this to say about actual malice and this hybrid art form in dismissing the complaint with costs.

DAVIS v. COSTA-GAVRAS

13 MED.L.RPTR. 2112, 654 F.SUPP. 653 (S.D.N.Y. 1987).

Pollock, J.

The theme of the film is the search for a missing man by his father and his wife. The man who disappeared is finally found to have been executed by the Chilean military. The film is based upon a true story. It is only in that setting that the composite conduct of the American governmental representatives in Chile at the time and the degree of their assistance in that search comes under scrutiny and criticism. There is no person named Ray Davis referred to in the film at any time. Ray Tower, with whom the plaintiff associates himself, is a symbolic fictional composite of the entire American political and military entourage in Chile.

The film derives from and is solidly documented and supported by the stories relied on by the filmmakers, taken from the acts and statements of the concerned father and the anguished wife set forth in detail in Thomas Hauser's book, Execution. Those sources are shown to have been heavily investigated and confirmed by the filmmakers, who entertained no serious doubts of their truth or knowledge to the contrary of what they portrayed.

There is nothing in the record tending to show that the filmmakers questioned Hauser's credentials or his book in any respect at the time "Missing" was made. The record is to the contrary. The filmmakers met with Hauser, went over his investigation and sources, supplied him with drafts of the script under preparation and were satisfied that there was no reason to doubt his work. No evidence whatever challenges those facts. Certainly the filmmakers obtained no knowledge contradicting the veracity or accuracy of Hauser's book and the stories of the Hormans as told to them and reflected in the book. There is no suggestion to the contrary from any provable sources. Indeed, nothing in plaintiff's papers demonstrates that either Hauser's credentials or his book, which was nominated for a Pulitzer Prize, are in fact "suspect" in any way.

The filmmakers knew that Hauser was a lawyer who had served as a judicial clerk in the Chambers of a Federal Judge and then worked for a prestigious Wall Street law firm. They knew that Hauser interviewed Captain Ray Davis, as well as other United States officials in Chile and numerous other persons when preparing Execution. The filmmakers also knew that no legal action whatsoever was taken against the book in the approximately four years since its publication. In an August 1980 meeting where Costa-Gavras, the film's director, and Stewart, the co-scriptwriter, met with Hauser to verify the accuracy of his book, Hauser described his meticulous research methods and broad inquiries. There is no evidence to the contrary.

The filmmakers then met with Charles Horman's parents, his wife, and one Terry Simon, a close friend who was in Chile with Charles around the time of his disappearance. Each of these individuals made clear to Costa-Gavras and Stewart that Hauser's book accurately and reliably depicted events as they knew and believed them. There is no evidence that any of defendants' further research and review of documents regarding Horman and events in Chile during the coup caused them to doubt the veracity of Hauser's book.

Plaintiff enumerates nine scenes in "Missing" which the filmmakers allegedly created, or in which they distorted the context, or made baseless suggestions. None of these scenes provides or contributes to the requisite evidence of actual malice.

It should be made clear that "Missing" is not a documentary, but a dramatization of the Horman disappearance and search. The film does not purport to depict a chronology of the events precisely as they actually occurred; it opens with the prologue: "This film is based on a true story. The incidents and facts are documented. Some of the names have been changed to protect the innocent and also to protect the film." (emphasis supplied). No one challenged the accuracy and veracity of Hauser's book to the knowledge of defendants. Defendants concede that although the substance of the film's scenes is extracted almost directly from Thomas Hauser's book, not everything in their film is literally faithful to the actual historical record as if in a documentary. That is not to say that which was not historical was set out in bad faith, portrayed with actual malice, or established or increased the defamatory impact.

The film is not a documentary. A documentary is a non-fictional story or series of historical events portrayed in their actual location; a film [of] real people and real events as they occur. A documentary maintains strict fidelity to fact.

"Missing," on the other hand, is an art form sometimes described as "Docu-Drama." The line separating a documentary from a docudrama is not always sharply defined, but is nonetheless discernible. Both forms are necessarily selective, given the time constraints of movies and the attention span of the viewing audience. The docudrama is a dramatization of an historical event or lives of real people, using actors or actresses. Docudramas utilize simulated dialogue, composite characters, and a telescoping of events occurring over a period into a composite scene or scenes. This treatment is singularly appropriate and unexceptionable if the context is not distorted when dealing with public and political figures.

Self-evidently a docudrama partakes of author's license—it is a creative interpretation of reality—and if alterations of fact in scenes portrayed are not made with serious doubts of truth of essence of the telescoped composite, such scenes do not ground a charge of actual malice.

Each scene questioned by the plaintiff is a telescoped composite of events, personalities, and of the American representatives in Chile who are involved therein. Each uses permissible literary license to fit historical detail into a suitable dramatic context. Such dramatic embellishments as are made do not distort the fundamental story being told—the frantic search by his family for a missing man who has suddenly disappeared, their emotions, anxieties, impatience, frustration, and doubts of assistance from American officialdom. The scenes are thus a hybrid of fact and fiction, which, however, do not materially distort the analysis. Always to be remembered is that they fairly represent the source materials for the film believed to be true by the filmmakers. Leeway is properly afforded to an author who thus attempts to recount a true event.

As a matter of law, the dramatic overlay supplied by the film does not serve to increase the impact of what plaintiff charges as defamatory since it fairly and reasonably portrays the unassailable beliefs of the Hormans, the record thereof in the Hauser book, and the corroborative results of the authors' inquiries. In docudrama, minor fictionalization cannot be considered evidence or support for the requirement of actual malice.

The nine scenes selected by plaintiff as support for the requirement of actual malice do no such thing. Each is related solely and unquestionably to the theme of this film. The movie's Ray Tower character is a fictional composite of the American presence operating in Chile at the time. He is a symbolic figure. The artistic input in the scenes questioned is found in permissible syntheses and composite treatment in the film. Although in actuality particular individuals were not physically present when certain dialogue occurred, in the movie scene the composite character portrayed was.

The content of the film reflects what happened according to the book, the persons who complained, and the sources relied on by defendants. While the actual persons involved in the events portrayed do not appear in on-scene interviews to describe their experiences, actions, and motivations, the real names of some individuals are employed. But the name Ray Davis is never mentioned. Real life personalities are accordingly represented by telescope composites in many instances.

The cases on point demonstrate that the First Amendment protects such dramatizations and does not demand literal truth in every episode depicted; publishing a dramatization is not of itself evidence of actual malice.

The complaint is dismissed with cause.

Neutral Reportage

Court definitions of "reckless disregard" have greatly modified the reporter's liability for simply stating someone else's libelous charges. To have a reliable source and to represent it objectively may be all that is needed.

"While verification of the facts remains an important reporting standard," the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals said in 1966, "a reporter, without a 'high degree of awareness of their probable falsity,' may rely on statements made by a single source even though they reflect only one side of the story without fear of libel prosecution. * * * "[190]

And the constitutional rule of Medina v. Time, Inc. in 1971[191] was that news media reports of statements made by participants in a public controversy are protected, where the fact that one participant levels charges against another is itself a newsworthy event.

The difficult but necessary task is to report such charges dispassionately and not to assert them as your own views. Perhaps courts are willing to concede that newspapers are in no position to guarantee the truth of everything they print.

When the Illinois Crime Investigating Commission director said in a published interview that two men were "lieutenants of * * * [a] Southern Illinois crime syndicate chieftain," one of the men filed suit against the Chicago Sun-Times. An appellate court upheld a lower court's granting of a summary judgment to the newspaper and ruled that the news story was an accurate account of a government official's statement and was therefore privileged. Doss v. Field Enterprises, Inc., 332 N.E.2d 497 (Ill. 1975). Similarities to the qualified privilege of reporting governmental processes were also noted in Joplin v. WEWS Television Station, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1331 (Ohio App. 1980).

The defense of neutral reportage came into its own in the framework of a long and heated controversy between opponents and proponents of the use of DDT. While both sides were impugning the honesty of the other, the New York Times got in the middle, and in 1972 reported that officials of the National Audubon Society were accusing a number of prominent scientists of being "paid to lie" by pesticide companies.

The reporter, however, contacted as many of the maligned scientists as he could and incorporated their angry responses into his story. Three of them nevertheless brought libel suits against the Society and the New York Times, and a jury awarded them each $20,000 in damages.

Concluding that the jury believed the reporter "reckless" in failing to investigate further when the scientists warned him of the libel potential of the charges, the trial judge let the verdict stand. The court of appeals reversed, dismissing the complaints.

Relying on a series of cases beginning with Time, Inc. v. Pape (see this text, p. 201), as appellant's brief had proposed, Judge Kaufman for the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit gave the defense of neutral reportage its initial articulation.

EDWARDS v. NATIONAL AUDUBON SOCIETY

556 F.2D 113 (2D CIR. 1977), CERT. DEN. 434 U.S. 1002.

Irving R. KAUFMAN, Chief Judge:

* * *

At stake in this case is a fundamental principle. Succinctly stated, when a responsible, prominent organization like the National Audubon Society makes serious charges against a public figure, the First Amendment protects the accurate and disinterested reporting of those charges, regardless of the reporter's private views regarding their validity. What is newsworthy about such accusations is that they were made. We do not believe that the press may be required under the First Amendment to suppress newsworthy statements merely because it has serious doubts regarding their truth. Nor must the press take up cudgels against dubious charges in order to publish them without fear of liability for defamation. The public interest in being fully informed about controversies that often rage around sensitive issues demands that the press be afforded the freedom to report such charges without assuming responsibility for them.

The contours of the press's right of neutral reportage are, of course, defined by the principle that gives life to it. Literal accuracy is not a prerequisite: if we are to enjoy the blessings of a robust and unintimidated press, we must provide immunity from defamation suits where the journalist believes, reasonably and in good faith, that his report accurately conveys the charges made. It is equally clear, however, that a publisher who in fact espouses or concurs in the charges made by others, or who deliberately distorts these statements to launch a personal attack of his own on a public figure, cannot rely on a privilege of neutral reportage. In such instances he assumes responsibility for the underlying accusations. See Goldwater v. Ginzburg, 414 F.2d 324 (2d Cir. 1969), cert. den., 396 U.S. 1049 (1970). [Emphasis added.]

* * * The Times article * * * was the exemplar of fair and dispassionate reporting of an unfortunate but newsworthy contretemps. Accordingly, we hold that it was privileged under the First Amendment.

COMMENT

Publication of a "completely fabricated accusation" and "wholly imagined but supposedly precisely quoted conversations" will destroy any privilege of neutral reportage,[192] as will an admission by a defendant that "he did not know whether what he said was true" and that he "did nothing, or almost nothing, to verify his charges."[193] Such behavior also reflects "reckless disregard" for the truth.

Echoes of Rosenbloom's public issue test ring in Edwards. A newsworthy source, even an irresponsible one, may develop into a libel defense. A year later in Dickey v. CBS, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 1353, 583 F.2d 1221, 1225–6 (3d Cir. 1978), the Third Circuit took pains to repudiate the rule of Edwards. See also, Medico v. Time, Inc., 643 F.2d 134 (3d Cir. 1981), cert. den., 454 U.S. 836 (1981), where the same court declined to follow Edwards but said the press would not likely be punished for what others say, especially public officials. But the rule was adopted by an Illinois appeals court in Krauss v. Champaign News Gazette, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 2507, 375 N.E.2d 1362 (Ill. 1978), and rejected by another Illinois court in Catalano v. Pechous, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 2094, 387 N.E.2d 714 (1978), affirmed 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2511, 419 N.E.2d 350 (Ill. 1980). Kentucky's Supreme Court disavowed the neutral reportage defense in McCall v. Courier Journal & Louisville Times, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2118, 623 S.W.2d 882 (Ky. 1981).

As of this writing, some courts in Wyoming, Indiana, Florida, Ohio, and Vermont, as well as Illinois, have adopted the neutral reportage defense. Courts in New York, and South Dakota, as well as Kentucky, have rejected it.

Neutral reportage remains a new and half-fashioned common law defense that ought to be approached with caution. Many federal courts—but not the U.S. Supreme Court—have given Edwards some credence, although less enthusiastically, or not at all, where the plaintiff is a private person[194] or where the charges are originated by the media.[195] A New York federal district court judge said pointedly in a 1980 ruling that the Edwards privilege did not apply to investigative reporting: "Unlike Edwards, no controversy raged around the libelous statement before the reporter entered the scene." [196]

There remains substantial disagreement among courts on the constitutional acceptability of the neutral reportage defense. Most have not decided.

In summary, the defense of neutral reportage will require a controversy of public importance, charges made by responsible persons of the organizations party to the dispute, and an accurate and somewhat disinterested job of reporting.

Consent

Consent, especially if it is in written form, may on occasion be a sturdy defense. Most often, however, consent is simply implied. When a reporter asks a person to comment on a charge someone has made against him or her, it is not possible to write about a denial without mentioning the original charge. A denial alone could be meaningless. One who initiates a conversation with a reporter has consented.

Controversy of any kind obligates the reporter to try hard to get both sides and to tell readers he or she has tried. When successful, consent may be implied in what was reported. Reporters write for publication. Talk to a reporter and you are speaking for publication.

A vice chairman of the Democratic National Committee was fired for negotiating a $9 million tungsten contract with the federal government on behalf of a Portuguese corporation. In his own defense he gave the old New York Herald Tribune a detailed statement for publication, and he issued a statement to the wire services.

One day before the statute of limitations would have run, he brought libel actions against a number of newspapers. In ruling against him a federal appeals court judge, Chief Judge Parker, wrote:

> The only portions of the article of which plaintiffs can complain as not being statements of fact is that portion relating to the Herald-Tribune's terming the case "the biggest five percenter deal ever exposed in Washington" and General Eisenhower's referring to it as the "sort of crookedness that goes on and on in Washington." These, however, cannot be deemed unfair comments when read, as they must be, in connection with the remainder of the article, which sets forth in detail the facts to which the comments relate and carries the statement of Westbrook with regard thereto including his denial that he had used or attempted to use his position to influence the awarding of the contract or that his services were of the "so-called 'five percenter' variety." In view of the fact that Westbrook gave this statement to the press in an interview to be published, he is hardly in a position to complain of the publication with it of the charge to which it was an answer, even if the latter were otherwise objectionable. [Emphasis added.] Pulvermann v. A. S. Abell Co., 228 F.2d 797 (4th Cir. 1956).

Similarly, when a Methodist minister and his family were unintentionally libeled in a college humor magazine, the minister found himself without a remedy after granting interviews to two student journalists. Where the plaintiff told the reporters that he wanted publicity, and publicity printed in his own words, and then referred them to his lawyer for legal details, the newspaper publication was absolutely privileged. The Tennessee court of appeals dismissed the minister's libel suit against the college newspaper, and a similar suit against the humor magazine never came to trial. Langford v. Vanderbilt University, 318 S.W.2d 568 (Tenn. 1958).

Similarly, the Rev. Jerry Falwell was unsuccessful in a suit against Penthouse magazine following publication of a concededly accurate account of an interview he had granted. Violation of conditions imposed by the minister did not negate his consent nor constitute publication with actual malice. Falwell v. Penthouse International, Limited, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1891, 521 F.Supp. 1204 (D.Va. 1981).

TECHNICAL DEFENSES

The following defenses are so complete, when available, that they should be considered at the very outset of constructing a libel defense.

Statute of Limitations

Statutes of limitations define the time span within which legal actions can be brought. Their purpose is to protect an alleged wrongdoer against stale claims which he or she may be totally unprepared to meet.

196. McManus v. Doubleday, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1475, 513 F.Supp. 1383 (D.N.Y. 1981). For a useful review of the defense, see Stonecipher, Neutral Reportage Privilege Faces an Uncertain Future, 59 Joum.Q. 367 (Autumn 1982).

The statutes of limitations for libel are one, two, or three years in most jurisdictions. Among one-year states are New York, California, New Jersey, Mississippi, and Maryland. At this writing Florida has a four-year statute, New Hampshire and Rhode Island six-year statutes. Rhode Island and Arkansas (a three-year state) have one-year statutes for slander. These laws may change from time to time and must be regularly checked by those who would depend upon them. Statutes of limitations provide an absolute defense against libel actions.

Parade magazine tried to deny liability in a libel action by arguing that 1,800 advance copies had been sold a month earlier in a particular locale, thus giving the magazine the protection of the statute of limitations. But a federal court said that under such a rule scurrilous articles could be printed without fear of retribution simply by selling a few advance copies and keeping the date secret until a libel action had been brought. This would be particularly easy where the statute is a single year. So the statute starts running, said the court, when the publication goes into general circulation for the first time. Osmers v. Parade Publications, 234 F.Supp. 924 (D.N.Y. 1964).

In at least one state, the statute covers an analogous false light invasion of privacy claim. Smith v. Esquire, Inc., 6 Med.L.Rptr., 1825, 494 F.Supp. 967 (D.Md. 1980).

In 1977 Kathy Keeton, associate publisher of Penthouse, sued Hustler and its publisher for libel and invasion of privacy. The claims were dismissed because Ohio's statute of limitations had run. Keeton then filed suit in New Hampshire because that state's six-year statute had not expired. A federal district court dismissed the suit on the ground that the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment forbade application of New Hampshire's long-arm statute to acquire personal jurisdiction over Hustler. The court of appeals affirmed holding that Keeton's lack of contact with New Hampshire made it unfair for the state to assert jurisdiction over the magazine.

In an opinion by Justice Rehnquist, a unanimous U.S. Supreme Court reversed. Rehnquist was starkly unsympathetic with the statute of limitations argument.

"The chance duration of statutes of limitations in nonforum jurisdictions has nothing to do with the contacts among respondent (Hustler), New Hampshire and this multistate libel action," wrote Rehnquist. "Whether Ohio's limitations period is six months or six years does not alter the jurisdictional calculus in New Hampshire. Petitioner's [Keeton's] successful search for a State with a lengthy statute of limitations is no different from the litigation strategy of countless plaintiffs who seek a forum with favorable substantive or procedural rules or sympathetic local populations. Certainly Hustler Magazine, Inc., which chose to enter the New Hampshire market, can be charged with knowledge of its laws and no doubt would have claimed the benefit of them if it had a complaint against a subscriber, distributor, or other commercial partner." Keeton v. Hustler, 10 Med.L.Rptr. 1405, 465 U.S. 770, (1984).

The implications of Rehnquist's arguments for "statute hunters" greatly distressed media lawyers at the time, even though the Court's animus toward Hustler's publisher Larry Flynt was evident.

Equal Time in Political Broadcasts

POLITICAL BROADCASTS. Prior to 1959, radio and television stations granting equal time to political candidates under the provisions of § 315 of the Federal Communications Act of 1934 were liable for any defamation in those broadcasts. At the same time, a station was absolutely prohibited from censoring a political talk:

> (a) If any licensee shall permit any person who is a legally qualified candidate for any public office to use a broadcasting station, he shall afford equal opportunities to all other such candidates for that office in the use of such broadcasting station: Provided, That such licensee shall have no power of censorship over the material broadcast under the provisions of this section. No obligation is imposed upon any licensee to allow the use of its station by any such candidate. 47 U.S.C.A. § 315(a).

Surely then, the broadcasting industry had argued for many years, if stations are required to carry libelous speeches and prevented from exerting any editing judgment, they should not be held responsible for damages.

The test case came in North Dakota. On October 29, 1956, A. C. Townley, a colorful remnant of the Progressive movement which had swept the Dakotas like a prairie fire four decades earlier, demanded equal time as an independent candidate for the United States Senate. Equal time was provided, and in a telecast over WDAY-TV, Fargo, a highly reputable station, Townley charged that the North Dakota Farmers Union was Communist controlled. WDAY had warned Townley that it believed his charge was libelous.

It was, and the Farmers Union brought a $100,000 damage suit against Townley and the station. A district court dismissed the complaint against WDAY on the ground that § 315 rendered the station immune from liability. The Farmers Union carried an appeal to the North Dakota Supreme Court, and that court became the first appellate court in the country to consider the question of whether a broadcasting station is liable for defamatory statements made by a political candidate using the station's facilities in accordance with federal law.

Attorneys for the Farmers Union contended that § 315 did not apply in this case because a third party—the Farmers Union—was involved, making the case something more than a heated confrontation between opposing political candidates. They cited a Nebraska case, Sorensen v. Wood, 243 N.W. 82 (Neb. 1932), which they interpreted as holding that a station could not willingly join in publication of a libel and that the "no censorship" provision referred only to the political content of the speech.

In a 4–1 decision the North Dakota Supreme Court ruled that radio and television broadcasters are not liable for false or libelous statements made over their facilities by political candidates. Noting that WDAY had advised Townley that his remarks, if false, were libelous, the court said: "We cannot believe that it was the intent of Congress to compel a station to broadcast libelous statements and at the same time subject it to the risk of defending actions for damages." Farmers Educational & Cooperative Union of America, North Dakota Division v. WDAY, 89 N.W.2d 102, 109 (N.D. 1958).

The majority felt the attack on the Farmers Union was "in context" with a candidate's criticism of his opponent since "Communism" was a campaign issue. The majority added that the Farmers Union should have brought action against Townley alone. (The problem here was that Townley's income was a mere $98.50 a month—a promise of little satisfaction to an aggrieved party.)

The Farmers Union carried an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. The American Civil Liberties Union intervened on the side of WDAY and in support of the North Dakota Supreme Court decision. In its appeal, the Farmers Union posed two questions with First Amendment implications:

a. Does § 315 relieve radio and television stations from liability for broadcasting libelous statements by candidates when the statements defame a third party, not a competing candidate?

b. Did Congress, when it passed the 1934 act, intend to repeal or annul state laws covering liability?

In a surprisingly close 5–4 decision, the U.S. Supreme Court answered "yes" to the questions and affirmed the North Dakota decision upholding WDAY.

FARMERS EDUCATIONAL AND CO-OPERATIVE UNION OF AMERICA v. WDAY INC.

360 U.S. 525, 79 S.CT 1302, 3 L.ED.2D 1407 (1959).

Justice BLACK delivered the Opinion of the Court:

* * * Petitioner argues that § 315's prohibition against censorship leaves broadcasters free to delete libelous material from candidates' speeches, and that therefore no federal immunity is granted a broadcasting station by that section. The term censorship, however, as commonly understood, connotes any examination of thought or expression in order to prevent publication of "objectionable" material. We find no clear expression of legislative intent, nor any other convincing reason to indicate Congress meant to give "censorship" a narrower meaning in § 315. In arriving at this view, we note that petitioner's interpretation has not generally been favored in previous considerations of the section. Although the first, and for years the only judicial decision dealing with the censorship provision did hold that a station may remove defamatory statements from political broadcasts, subsequent judicial interpretations of § 315 have with considerable uniformity recognized that an individual licensee has no such power. And while for some years the Federal Communications Commission's views on this matter were not clearly articulated, since 1948 it has continuously held that licensees cannot remove allegedly libelous matter from speeches by candidates. Similarly, the legislative history of the measure both prior to its first enactment in 1927, and subsequently, shows a deep hostility to censorship either by the Commission or by a licensee. More important, it is obvious that permitting a broadcasting station to censor allegedly libelous remarks would undermine the basic purpose for which § 315 was passed—full and unrestricted discussion of political issues by legally qualified candidates. That section dates back to, and was adopted verbatim from, the Radio Act of 1927. In that Act,

Congress provided for the first time a comprehensive federal plan for regulating the new and expanding art of radio broadcasting. Recognizing radio's potential importance as a medium of communication of political ideas, Congress sought to foster its broadest possible utilization by encouraging broadcasting stations to make their facilities available to candidates for office without discrimination, and by insuring that these candidates when broadcasting were not to be hampered by censorship of the issues they could discuss. Thus, expressly applying this country's tradition of free expression to the field of radio broadcasting, Congress has from the first emphatically forbidden the Commission to exercise any power of censorship over radio communication. It is in line with this same tradition that the individual licensee has consistently been denied "power of censorship" in the vital area of political broadcasts.

The decision a broadcasting station would have to make in censoring libelous discussion by a candidate is far from easy. Whether a statement is defamatory is rarely clear. Whether such a statement is actionably libelous is an even more complex question, involving as it does, consideration of various legal defenses such as "truth" and the privilege of fair comment. Such issues have always troubled courts. Yet, under petitioner's view of the statute they would have to be resolved by an individual licensee during the stress of a political campaign, often, necessarily, without adequate consideration or basis for decision. Quite possibly, if a station were held responsible for the broadcast of libelous material, all remarks even faintly objectionable would be excluded out of an excess of caution. Moreover, if any censorship were permissible, a station so inclined would intentionally inhibit a candidate's legitimate presentation under the guise of lawful censorship of libelous matter. Because of the time limitation inherent in a political campaign, erroneous decisions by a station could not be corrected by the courts promptly enough to permit the candidate to bring improperly excluded matter before the public. It follows from all this that allowing censorship, even of the attenuated type advocated here, would almost inevitably force a candidate to avoid controversial issues during political debates over radio and television, and hence restrict the coverage of consideration relevant to intelligent political decision. We cannot believe, and we certainly are unwilling to assume, that Congress intended any such result.

Petitioner alternatively argues that § 315 does not grant a station immunity from liability for defamatory statements made during a political broadcast even though the section prohibits the station from censoring allegedly libelous matter. Again, we cannot agree. For under this interpretation, unless a licensee refuses to permit any candidate to talk at all, the section would sanction the unconscionable result of permitting civil and perhaps criminal liability to be imposed for the very conduct the statute demands of the licensee. Accordingly, judicial interpretations reaching the issue have found an immunity implicit in the section. And in all those cases concluding that a licensee had no immunity, § 315 had been construed—improperly as we hold—to permit a station to censor potentially actionable material. In no case has a court even implied that the licensee would not be rendered immune were it denied the power to censor libelous material.

* * * Thus, whatever adverse inference may be drawn from the failure of Congress to legislate an express immunity is offset by its refusal to permit stations to avoid liability by censoring broadcasts. And more than balancing any adverse inferences drawn from congressional failure to legislate an express immunity is the fact that the Federal Communications Commission—the body entrusted with administering the provisions of the Act—has long interpreted § 315 as granting stations an immunity. Not only has this interpretation been adhered to despite many subsequent legislative proposals to modify § 315, but with full knowledge of the Commission's interpretation Congress has since made significant additions to that section without amending it to depart from the Commission's view. In light of this contradictory legislative background we do not feel compelled to reach a result which seems so in conflict with traditional concepts of fairness.

Petitioner nevertheless urges that broadcasters do not need a specific immunity to protect themselves from liability for defamation since they may either insure against any loss, or in the alternative, deny all political candidates use of station facilities. We have no means of knowing to what extent insurance is available to broadcasting stations, or what it would cost them. Moreover, since § 315 expressly prohibits stations from charging political candidates higher rates than they charge for comparable time used for other purposes, any cost of insurance would probably have to be absorbed by the stations themselves. Petitioner's reliance on the stations' freedom from obligation "to allow use of its station by any such candidate," seems equally misplaced. While denying all candidates use of stations would protect broadcasters from liability, it would also effectively withdraw political discussion from the air. Instead the thrust of § 315 is to facilitate political debate over radio and television. Recognizing this, the Communications Commission considers the carrying of political broadcasts a public service criterion to be considered both in license renewal proceedings, and in comparative contests for a radio or television construction permit. Certainly Congress knew the obvious—that if a licensee could protect himself from liability in no other way but by refusing to broadcast candidates' speeches, the necessary effect would be to hamper the congressional plan to develop broadcasting as a political outlet, rather than to foster it. We are aware that causes of action for libel are widely recognized throughout the States. But we have not hesitated to abrogate state law where satisfied that its enforcement would stand "as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress." Here, petitioner is asking us to attribute to § 315 a meaning which would either frustrate the underlying purposes for which it was enacted, or alternatively impose unreasonable burdens on the parties governed by that legislation. In the absence of clear expression by Congress we will not assume that it desired such a result. Agreeing with the state courts of North Dakota that § 315 grants a licensee an immunity from liability for libelous material it broadcasts, we merely read § 315 in accordance with what we believe to be its underlying purpose.

Affirmed.

A Practical Defense: Insurance

Libel insurance can help restore an editor's flagging courage. Available in one form or another for at least the past twenty-five years, it is estimated that only about one-half of broadcasters and publishers carry it. This is unfortunate. Insurance dims the prospect of devastating losses resulting from frivolous suits or the shriveling of the journalistic spirit from out-of-court settlements.

It is estimated that damage awards have increased by more than 400 percent since New York Times v. Sullivan. The additional costs of defending against a suit have gone up almost as much. Damage awards in 1986 were estimated to average $2 million, more than twice that of product liability or medical malpractice awards.[197]

Given these figures, some companies have left the libel insurance business. Others have increased both premiums and deductibles, or policyholders are expected to pay a percentage of legal fees beyond the deductible. If smaller news organizations can't afford coverage, they may not be able to afford the risks of investigative journalism; the costs of defending against a suit can be staggering. The libel business did begin to stabilize somewhat in 1987 after premium increases of 300 percent between 1983 and 1986, although this may be temporary.

Attractive policies are those that cover a broad range of First Amendment matters such as privacy, access, copyright, piracy, plagiarism, disparagement, antitrust, and possibly, refusals to identify sources, which could lead to loss of a libel suit by default. At the very least, punitive damages and lawyers fees and court costs in the pretrial period should be covered. Be certain also that the policy leaves editor and publisher in control of the suit. Because foreign underwriters of American libel insurance companies do not always appreciate the constitutional principles at stake in libel litigation, they encourage settlements on a cost-benefit basis when a publisher or a broadcaster would have preferred a trial or the appeal of an adverse judgment.

State law may limit some forms of insurance coverage, but courts have generally recognized that libel laws are not designed to destroy publications.[198] Instead they are meant to provide a public forum for vindicating a reputation and awarding just compensation when it is due.

Mitigation

When none of the defenses so far discussed appears to be available or applicable, a defendant must consider mitigating factors. This last line of defense is meant to demonstrate to a judge or jury good faith on the part of a publisher or, if you will, lack of malice. The result could be a substantial decrease in damages paid.

Retraction and Correction

In at least thirty states there are retraction statutes, all of them differing in detail. Most require that a defamed person ask for a retraction in writing within a specified period of time before bringing a lawsuit.[199] If a retraction is printed, only special or actual damages (however these are defined) may be available. Some laws use the words "retraction" and "correction" interchangeably. In part a retraction is meant to be a full and fair apology. It is more than a correction. A correction may have nothing to do with libel; a retraction always does. Unlike the right-of-reply statute struck down by the Supreme Court in the Tornillo case (see p. 497), both corrections and retractions are arguably voluntary, and failure to retract should not indicate actual malice on the part of a publisher. In fact, a refusal to retract may assert the publisher's confidence in the validity of what's been published. And, if there is no fault on the part of a publisher, he or she is under no obligation to retract, whatever a retraction statute says, because the constitution has clicked in.

Libel laws can be idiosyncratic. See Sanford, Libel and Privacy (1985), Appendix B. California's doesn't cover magazines. Minnesota's does not apply to any libel imputing unchastity to a woman. Wisconsin's confuses retraction and correction. Mississippi's exempts candidates for public office when the libel occurs ten days before an election. Know your state's statute. Be simple, direct, and calmly apologetic when you retract. Keep a record of what you do from the moment a retraction is requested. Do not use a retraction to take another poke at a defamed person; that will aggravate the original libel. Mere publication of a defamed person's denial does not constitute a retraction. Some statutes require expressions of regret; a correction of facts is sufficient in others. Some statutes speak to position, type size, placement, and heading.

Retractions, of course, are requested before a libel suit is threatened, although suit may be implied. A publisher may express regret at this point, apologize, and discuss the problem of further publicity in the publication of a retraction. Once a threat has been made, only a lawyer should speak for the publisher.

Lawyers should also be involved when the retraction is part of a written or verbal agreement (preferably written) with an injured person and constitutes a complete accord and satisfaction—also known as a settlement. A settlement when properly executed will bar a suit for damages. While a settlement relieves a defendant of lawyers fees, court costs, and damages, if not made carefully and selectively, it will encourage suits by others more intent on money damages than the purifying of reputation.

An offer to retract, whether or not the state has a retraction statute, may mitigate damages. So will an injured person's refusal to accept a retraction offer. Courts generally wish plaintiffs, particularly private-person plaintiffs, to have opportunities for reply and rebuttal.

Courts which have regarded retraction statutes unfavorably have done so because they believe the constitutional protections of life, liberty, and property militate against such laws. They have also argued that the defamed person is denied a speedy recovery for injury to reputation and that retraction statutes represent class legislation favoring the press and denying the equal protection of the laws.

A less philosophical inadequacy of retraction statutes was noted by Justice Brennan in his plurality opinion in Rosenbloom. "Denials, retractions, and corrections," he said, "are not 'hot' news, and rarely receive the prominence of the original story." Nevertheless he implied the constitutionality of retraction statutes in his concurring opinion in Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974), see p. 503.

As the ethical standards of the press improve, more and more publishers, short of retraction, are printing or broadcasting corrections and clarifications. In perhaps fifty newspapers, ombudsmen of one kind or another intercede with management on behalf of readers.

Tornillo has invalidated mandatory right-of-reply laws. Publication of replies, when they are free of defamation, is becoming a mark of good journalism. But like retractions, their publication must remain voluntary.

With the gradual demise of punitive damages, retractions may be losing some of their appeal.

199. Plaintiffs failure to give defendant seven days' notice, as required by Wisconsin's retraction statute, warrants dismissal of action. Rogers v. Milwaukee Journal, 14 Med.L.Rptr. 1767 (Wisc.Cir.Ct. 1987).

Nevertheless, judges and juries will still consider retraction as evidence of goodwill.

Proof of Previous Bad Reputation

A showing that the character and reputation of a prospective plaintiff are so bad that they cannot be further impaired by a fresh accusation will mitigate damages. Such people may even be "libel proof."[200] In a case involving a bishop, a federal district court said: "On the issue of general damages, the reputation of the plaintiff is a definite issue and the defendant may show the plaintiff's bad reputation in order to mitigate damages." The court added, however, that bad reputation may not be established by showing misconduct at a time and place removed from the date and situation of the original injury. Reference to unrelated acts, criminal or otherwise, may be no more sufficient in mitigation than rumors and hearsay.[201]

Reliance on a Usually Reliable Source: the "Wire Service" Defense

Since New York Times, reliance on a usually reliable source will contradict a charge of actual malice, but it may only mitigate a charge of negligence. In Time, Inc. v. Pape, 401 U.S. 279 (1971), the Supreme Court said that "Where the source of the news makes bald assertions of fact—such as that a policeman has arrested a certain man on a criminal charge—there may be no difficulty. But where the source itself has engaged in qualifying the information released, complexities ramify. Any departure from full direct quotations of the words of the source, with all its qualifying language, inevitably confronts the publisher with a set of choices."

In this case a Civil Rights Commission report was considered by the Court to be "extravagantly ambiguous," and the reporter's "adoption of one of a number of possible interpretations * * * though arguably reflecting a misconception" was not enough to create liability.

But quotations taken out of context or material selected to fit a publisher's preconceptions, as in Goldwater v. Ginzburg, 414 F.2d 324 (2d Cir. 1969), may not only constitute negligence but actual malice as well. And in Pape the Court warned reporters that the word "alleged" may be better than no qualification at all in reports damaging to reputation or those based on less than authoritative sources.

Usually reliable sources are informed persons who have proven accurate in the past and whom reasonable people would have no reason to doubt. Although informants occupy many roles in government, business, and academe, to mention only three, wire services are expected to know a little bit about everything. Moreover, news media rely on wire services for a significant proportion of their news.

A news magazine which relied on a newspaper and wire service reports for an allegedly defamatory article about a divorce case was not negligent, said a Florida court, since the magazine was entitled to rely on other reliable periodicals and wire service reports.[202]

Citing cases in Florida, Puerto Rico, Hawaii, Alaska, New York, and the District of Columbia, Massachusetts's highest court, in a case involving a chain suit against ninety-four newspapers, also invoked the "wire service" defense:

> * * * AP and UPI are recognized throughout the newspaper industry as accurate sources of information. Because of this each of the defendant newspapers stated, in an uncontroverted affidavit, that it customarily republishes wire service stories without independent corroboration for the information they contain. In fact, the newspapers stated that, given their resources and personnel, independent corroboration would ordinarily be impractical. We note that an examination of cases from other jurisdictions suggests that such reliance on the accuracy of the wire services is common throughout the country. We think that the inference is inescapable that requiring verification of wire service stories prior to publication would impose a heavy burden on the media's ability to disseminate newsworthy material.[203]

While some courts may not insist, it may still be advisable for editors to try to confirm libelous references in wire service reports to persons in the paper's immediate circulation area. Those efforts not only suggest responsible journalistic practice, but they may mitigate damages.

Miscellaneous Mitigating Factors

Statements uttered in the heat and passion of the moment or provoked by actions of the plaintiff lend themselves to mitigation.[204] Efforts to correct errors by stopping the presses or seeking to retrieve copies of a newspaper containing errors must be considered by the jury in mitigation of damages, said a Maryland court.[205]

Belief in the truth of the facts, a Nevada court observed, even though the evidence has not convinced a jury, should be considered in mitigation.[206] So should evidence that positive items concerning the plaintiff were published before or with the libel or evidence that other responsible publications had carried the same charge. The libel may be an unintended case of mistaken identity. Evidence of partial truth may help, as will evidence of journalistic care and competence in getting the plaintiff's side of the story and, where justified, in giving it adequate space.

Journalistic care is an idea that opens the door to the world of ethics and those crossroads where questions of ethics and matters of law meet. The law is an ethical system, albeit one with sanctions, sometimes severe. A Louisiana appeals court nicely expressed the connection:

"To hold a newsperson accountable for his transgressions is not to censor him, it is merely to make him mindful of the awesome responsibility he has to the public. Accountability is not a clarion call of 'stop the press'; it is but a whisper for respect for the people who make the news."[207]

SEEKING SUMMARY JUDGMENT

Construction of a libel defense is designed to win a defendant summary judgment. Summary judgment means that your win without having to go to trial. Rule 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provides for summary judgment where there "is no genuine issue as to any material fact and * * * the moving party [defendant in a libel suit] is entitled to judgment as a matter of law." Generally this would mean that the plaintiff is unable to show with convincing clarity that a defendant has published with actual malice.

The rationale of summary judgment, at least from a press perspective, was well stated by Judge Skelly Wright in Washington Post Co. v. Keogh, 365 F.2d 965 (D.C. Cir. 1966):

* * *

> In the First Amendment area, summary procedures are even more essential. For the stake here, if harassment succeeds, is free debate. One of the purposes of the Times principle, in addition to protecting persons from being cast in damages in libel suits filed by public officials, is to prevent persons from being discouraged in the full and free exercise of their First Amendment rights with respect to the conduct of their government. The threat of being put to the defense of a lawsuit brought by a popular public official may be as chilling to the exercise of First Amendment freedoms as fear of the outcome of the lawsuit itself, especially to advocates of unpopular causes. All persons who desire to exercise their right to criticize public officials are not as well equipped financially as the Post to defend against a trial on the merits. Unless persons, including newspapers, desiring to exercise their First Amendment rights are assured freedom from the harassment of lawsuits, they will tend to become self-censors. And to this extent debate on public issues and the conduct of public officials will become less uninhibited, less robust, and less wide-open, for self-censorship affecting the whole public is "hardly less virulent for being privately administered."

In a brief to a Minnesota district court on behalf of the Minneapolis Star Tribune, which had been sued for libel by the dean of an unaccredited and, as it turned out, ephemeral law school, Minneapolis attorney John Borger demonstrated how summary judgment should be approached. He mustered all relevant libel defenses in short, pithy paragraphs under the following headings: plaintiff must establish each element of his case by clear and convincing evidence; the statements of which plaintiff complains are true; certain statements of which plaintiff complains are nonactionable expressions of opinion; certain statements are not defamatory; the allegedly defamatory statements are privileged under the constitutions of the United States and Minnesota and at common law because plaintiff is a public figure and the statements concern matters of public interest and plaintiff can recover damages only upon clear and convincing evidence that defendant published with actual malice; certain articles are conditionally privileged as fair and accurate reports of official actions and public proceedings; certain statements of which plaintiff complains are privileged as responses to his own accusations; others are privileged as neutral reportage of newsworthy statements and events; Minnesota law bars most of plaintiff's claims for general and punitive damages; and any award of punitive damages would be unconstitutional.[208]

Not only was the $14.7 million libel suit against the newspaper dismissed, but the plaintiff was ordered by the court to reimburse the Star and Tribune Company for attorney's fees. An appeals court later excused the fees assessment.

Frivolous suits will increasingly face countersuits. When former Senator Paul Laxalt of Nevada sued the Sacramento Bee for its investigation into a gambling casino he once owned, McClatchy Newspapers countersued charging that Laxalt's suit was designed to cut off discussion. The suit was resolved out of court in 1987.

In 1986 the Vermont legislature passed an amendment to the state's libel law aimed at reducing the number of frivolous lawsuits by requiring courts to award "costs and reasonable attorney fees" to prevailing defendants if the court finds a suit "frivolous and without merit."

Uncertainty as to the availability of summary judgment was created by footnote 9 in Chief Justice Burger's opinion for the Court in Hutchinson v. Proxmire in 1979 (text, p. 241):

> Considering the nuances of the issues raised here, we are constrained to express some doubt about the so-called "rule." The proof of "actual malice" calls a defendant's state of mind into question * * * and does not readily lend itself to summary disposition.

Although lower courts generally ignored Burger's recommendation for trial, doubts about summary judgment remained until the Court spoke again in two cases in 1984 and 1986. In Bose Corporation v. Consumers Union, 10 Med.L.Rptr. 1625, 466 U.S. 485 (1984)—an unlikely case since the offending statements were clearly opinions about the sound qualities of loudspeakers—Justice Stevens for the Court not only recommended summary judgment but also directed courts to "make an independent examination of the whole record" in order to make sure "that the judgment does not constitute a forbidden intrusion on the field of free expression." Sanford reads the case as a reaffirmation of the New York Times doctrine.[209] A further refinement of Bose is found in Connaughton v. Harte-Hanks Communications, Inc., 842 F.2d 825 (6th Cir. 1989), aff'd 109 S.Ct. ___ (1989), which held that in New York Times cases, independent appellate review should be exercised only over the "ultimate conclusion" of actual malice.

The second case, Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 12 Med.L.Rptr. 2297, 477 U.S. 242 (1986), in spite of what a dissenting Justice Brennan considered confusion in both language and logic that will confound lower courts, has been interpreted as negating any lingering influence of footnote 9 and reinstating the preference for summary judgment in libel cases.[210] Justice White for the Court declared that in a New York Times libel case the issue on summary judgment is whether the evidence in the record can support a reasonable jury finding that the plaintiff has shown actual malice by clear and convincing evidence.

The influence of both cases was apparent in lower courts. For example, the California Supreme Court held in McCoy v. Hearst Corp., 727 P.2d 711 (Cal. 1986), that an appellate body must scrutinize that part of the record having to do with actual malice and make its own decisions as to fault. And absent specific, strong, positive, unmistakable evidence of actual malice, that motion must be granted defendant.[211]

210. With or without Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, most libel cases are decided against plaintiffs on summary judgment or on motions to dismiss. In a 1981 study of the states which provide plaintiffs with the largest number of libel victories (14 percent) against 3 percent in all other states, the following emerged: Alabama, Alaska, California, Florida, Hawaii, New Hampshire, Oklahoma, South Carolina, and Vermont. There are undoubtedly differences among the states as to the availability of summary judgment in libel cases. Summary judgment, for example, is difficult to attain in Pennsylvania.

The Supreme Court in the latter case said that "one of the principal purposes of the summary judgment rule is to isolate and dispose of factually unsupported claims or defenses."

ALTERNATIVES TO LIBEL LITIGATION

Will New York Times v. Sullivan continue to dominate American libel law? In Dun & Bradstreet (text, p. 245), Justice White, in a vigorous concurrence, called for the abandonment of the Times doctrine. If the Times doctrine continues to be unloved by both libel plaintiffs and media defendants, what should take its place? A number of judges, writers, and scholars have addressed themselves to that question. Some of their conclusions follow.

Judge Sofaer in Sharon v. Time, Inc., 609 F.Supp. 1291 (S.D.N.Y. 1984), expressed regret that libel laws are being used by parties to inflict as much harm on one another as possible, and he recommended conciliation alternatives.

Jerome Barron, a senior author of this text, believes that libel plaintiffs lack alternative mechanisms of redress. He would combine vindication statutes (a plaintiff would be able to obtain a judgment of falsity without having to prove fault), a right of reply limited to the defamation context, and the usual libel laws. The result, he believes, would be a stimulation of debate with relief from the chilling effects of heavy damages.[212]

In her book, A Chilling Effect (1987), Judge Lois G. Forer discusses the need for a legal mechanism to encourage apologies and retractions so as to avoid litigation. She would have a federal statute govern libel and privacy to rationalize the chaos in the law and eliminate jury-shopping.[213]

Because it appeared that most libel plaintiffs claim emotional suffering rather than financial loss, the Iowa Libel group embarked in 1988 on a three-year Libel Dispute Resolution program with the American Arbitration Association. The goal: a dispassionate assessment of truth or falsity, not a settlement but what one of the Iowa group, Gilbert Cranberg, calls "combat by other means."

New York Congressman Charles Schumer earlier introduced a bill in Congress that would have had the same effect: a declaratory judgment that a publication was or was not false and defamatory; but no determination as to publisher's state of mind and no damages.[214]

But libel is not only about truth or falsity. It has to do with criticism of and doubts about those who wield power. It is about opinion; it is about deflation; it is about skepticism. In 1983 the American Civil Liberties Union proposed that no individual, public or private, ought to be protected by libel laws if the subject matter of the attack is of "public concern, anything having an impact on the social or political system or climate."

A compromise might be to deny public officials a libel remedy unless a defamatory publication could be shown to reflect on an area of that person's private life having nothing to do with his or her public responsibilities. And that would be rare. Public figures would be unprotected by libel laws only when their activities impinged upon the public business. Of course, defining the public business would remain a challenge, first for editors and ultimately for the courts. People would not have a libel remedy if they injected themselves into a definable issue of public concern—the inexorable logic of Rosenbloom's public issue test. But public figures, both vortex and all-purpose, might have a lesser standard of proof of damages to reputation and fault than public officials.[215] This proposal and others like it could be a disaster for freedom of expression unless the discussion of ideas, political or not, was given the widest latitude.

Others have had more comprehensive proposals. Rodney Smolla in his Suing the Press (1986) would put greater emphasis on retraction and reply, restorative speech to cure damaging speech. He would also have losers pay all legal fees. He would put caps on all nonpecuniary losses and eliminate punitive damages. He would also eliminate public official suits, but only those brought by high-ranking policymakers. He would put all ideological debates in the protected opinion category. (Ralph Nader, he says, justifiably sued General Motors for harassment, but he unjustifiably sued columnist Ralph de To-

212. Barron, The Search for Media Accountability, 19 Suffolk L.R. 789 (Winter 1985). Barron condones punitive damages because he thinks they get the media's attention. Although he believes some cases should never have been brought—Tavoulareas, Bose, Sharon—he would rather have public people involved in public debate than exempted from libel laws. His preference is for reply as an alternative remedy to damages in defamation cases.

213. Letter to author, November 23, 1987. Some of Forer's statutory proposals may be too broad, e.g., prohibiting release of names and photos of all rape victims and juveniles accused of crimes. Many editors would also disagree with her notion that the press and the law are allies. Not enemies certainly, but also not allies.

214. House Resolution #2846, 99th U.S. Congress 1st Session.

ledano simply for disagreeing with him.) He would ask the courts to pay more attention to context in deciding on who is a public person and who is a private person. And he would streamline the complicated and therefore expensive judicial process.

First Amendment advocate Floyd Abrams would also protect opinion, make losers pay, and limit compensatory damages, that is damages for emotional injury. Once corrections were made he would favor damages only for actual out-of-pocket losses.

Many threads of these suggestions came together in Proposal for the Reform of Libel Law published late in 1988 by the Annenberg Washington Program. Stage One of the proposal would ask a complainant to seek either a retraction or an opportunity to reply. Stage Two would involve a suit but only to the point of a declaratory judgment as to truth or falsity. A final Stage Three would move beyond declaratory judgment to the question of damages, but actual damages only.

While these recommendations may influence the development of the law in the long run, they will not change it in the short run. New York Times v. Sullivan abruptly changed the law by taking libel out of tort law and constitutionalizing it. As its rules have evolved, it has brought unexpected problems to defendants. The most grievous, of course, is the intrusive tactics of plaintiff's attorney in "reading the mind" of an editor or reporter in order to prove "knowing falsehood." Another is the time and expense involved in the discovery process. A defendant then may win in a legal sense, usually on summary judgment, but lose in the material sense of time and money.

It will also be time-consuming and expensive to pursue the truth/falsity phase of a suit, whether or not the case concludes at that point. Like the line between fact and opinion, the distinction between truth and falsehood is much harder to draw than lawyers presume. Truth is an elusive and relative concept more attuned to metaphysics than to science. New York Times may be intended to reward defendants simply for trying to find the truth.

Were the Annenberg Proposal to become law, it would soon face a test of constitutionality since defendants would lose the protection of the New York Times fault standards in Stage Two. Also, the retraction/reply option might lead us back to Tornillo. In practice, private-person plaintiffs would have little to gain from bringing a suit and much to lose. But it is not clear whether the Proposal would result in more or fewer lawsuits. One might imagine a lively demand for favorable declaratory judgments.

Some media lawyers fear putting the matter of a model law into the hands of legislators, many of whom may be hostile to the press and unschooled in libel law. Others would accept the Annenberg Proposal only if a defendant could convert a declaratory judgment into a suit where New York Times standards of fault would have to be shown by plaintiff. Proponents argue that editors would be relieved of judicially imposed standards of fault if the Proposal were adopted. The debate is not over.

Wall Street insurance broker Ann Heavner estimates that 80 percent of the costs of a libel suit are in defense costs rather than damages—lawyer's fees in large part. Defense costs may be insurable therefore only up to a certain point. Or insurance companies will avoid tenacious defendants. If control of the defense of a libel suit goes from an editor to an insurance company, suits are more likely to be settled on cost efficient grounds than defended on philosophical ones. And settlements attract new suits.

Pessimists fear that in the present judicial climate the media will enjoy no special place in the body politic, that the Gertz rules will be applied narrowly to vaguely defined public issues, and that Justice Byron White might just succeed in getting the Court to return to strict liability common law rules by overruling New York Times. Media generally seem to be unpopular institutions. Reporters and editors might be momentarily cheered by recalling the words of Justice Black in his New York Times concurrence:

> I doubt that a country can live in freedom where its people can be made to suffer physically or financially for criticizing their government, its actions or its officials.

Eugene L. Roberts, Jr., executive editor of the Philadelphia Inquirer, said it more concretely in the first paragraph of a cover story for the April 1985 issue of The Quill:

> We, as a society, have delivered into the hands of government officials the nation over—indeed the world over—a simple but effective weapon against freedom of expression. It is the capability of using protracted litigation to harass, intimidate and punish the press and private citizens alike for views and reports that officials do not like. * * * We have created an awesome imbalance: public officials who can sue, but who cannot be sued, who can speak with impunity, but who can punish those who speak against them.

For a free society New York Times v. Sullivan didn't go far enough, and Justices Black, Douglas, and Goldberg were prescient in their critical concurring opinions. Nevertheless, Smolla is undoubtedly correct in stating what seems to be the premise of his book: the evolution of American law is always more deeply influenced by changing cultural moods than by changes in technical legal doctrine. This has been a premise of other writers as well.[216]

THREE

Privacy and the Press

WHAT IS PRIVACY?

Privacy is best understood first as a concept and only second as a cause of action in law. The general idea of privacy is that individuals are entitled to protect personal, intimate aspects of their lives from use or interference by others. Definitions of privacy, however, are necessarily subjective, abstract, elusive. It has perhaps most often been explained using Thomas Cooley's phrase, "the right to be let alone,"[1] which does little to explain what privacy, or a right to privacy, entails. Whatever its form, an invasion of privacy is presumed to have an adverse effect on an identifiable person's psychological well-being.

"The injury is to our individuality," says Professor Edward Bloustein, "to our dignity as individuals, and the legal remedy represents a social vindication of the human spirit thus threatened rather than a [dollar and cents] recompense for the loss suffered."[2]

Others are not so sure. Harry Kalven, Jr. thought privacy a petty tort when measured against First Amendment freedoms.[3] Professor Don Pember is concerned about the number of frivolous privacy claims.[4] Clearly, definition remains a problem. In the absence of evidence of an intent to injure or observable symptoms of pain on the part of the victim, one is seldom certain that real damage has been done. How, then, is an invasion of privacy to be measured? There is no clear answer.

Nevertheless there has been in the past three decades an explosion of interest in protecting privacy in its myriad guises against private, governmental, and press encroachments. Privacy is widely recognized in American jurisdictions.

Justice Louis Brandeis, who with a law partner introduced the right to American law, saw it as the "most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men."[5] "The right to be let alone," said Justice William O. Douglas, "is indeed the beginning of all freedom."[6] Milton Konvitz, a constitutional scholar, described privacy as "a kind of space that a man may carry with him into his bedroom or into the street."[7]

Alan Westin defined privacy as "the voluntary and temporal withdrawal of a person from the general society through physical or psychological means, either in a state of solitude or small-group intimacy or, when among larger groups, in a condition of anonymity or reserve." Each person, says Westin, must find an acceptable balance between solitude and companionship, intimacy and broader social participation, anonymity and visibility, reserve and disclosure. And a free society will leave these choices to the individual, with only extraordinary exceptions allowed in the general interest of society.[8] It is the extraordinary exception that requires judicial weighing of privacy claims against freedom of the press.

First Amendment scholar Thomas Emerson defines privacy as a set of rules which cut across any opposing rules of the collectivity and which constitute "a sphere of space that has not been dedicated to public use or control." He would include in that space, at the very least, the privacy of bodily functions—such as procreation and contraception,[9] rights of privacy which have been recognized in recent years by the United States Supreme Court.[10]

Within this concept, privacy would protect the woman in childbirth, the couple privately engaged in sexual intercourse, the sleeper from raucous sound trucks operating in residential neighborhoods in the middle of the night.[11] The rule would certainly cover the woman in York v. Story, 324 F.2d 450 (9th Circ. 1963), who, when she came to a police station complaining of an assault, was asked to undress and was photographed in the nude; her picture was then cirulated among policemen for their amusement. It would also have protected the woman who found herself without a legal remedy when she was photographed in the rest room of Sad Sam's tavern in Delafield, Wisconsin by the proprietor who used such photos for the entertainment of his male customers.[12]

While Cooley was referring to privacy in general when he referred to "the right to be let alone," three types of privacy rights have become recognized in American law, largely in this century. It is important to distinguish among them, for only one is normally of concern to the mass media. One type of privacy right is based on constitutional law, either federal or state. A second concerns what could be called "data privacy," protection of personal information such as medical or credit records. The third, the common law right of privacy, is concerned with protecting the dignity and personal well-being of the individual rather than information about the individual, although harm to well-being is usually associated with dissemination of information.

While the term privacy does not appear in the U.S. Constitution, the individual's interest in being free from government intrusion is explicit in the Fourth Amendment's guarantee against unreasonable searches and seizures and in the Fifth Amendment's guarantee against self-incrimination.[13] Both the Fourth and Fifth Amendments act as antecedents for later development of privacy law. The Fourth creates an expectation that 'spatial' privacy will be safeguarded, while the Fifth prevents disclosure of information an individual prefers to keep private.

The Fourth Amendment is made effective by the exclusionary rule, which prevents the introduction of evidence at trial if the evidence was the product of an unreasonable search or seizure.[14] When there is no expectation of privacy, as when someone leaves materials in "plain view" or allows material to be distributed to others, no violation of the constitutional guarantee occurs. For example, police did not need a signed warrant from a judge—the usual requirement—to look through garbage that had been left curbside. "It is common knowledge that plastic garbage bags left on or at the side of a public street are readily accessible to animals, children, scavengers, snoops and other members of the public," Justice White wrote for the Court in a recent case.[15] One must wonder if "snoops" includes reporters.

Of more recent vintage is creation of an explicit constitutional right to privacy. The Court struck down a state law that made it a crime for even married couples to use contraceptives in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965). The law also forbade Planned Parenthood from giving advice on the use of contraceptives. The Court was galled by the prospect of the long arm of the government reaching into the marital chamber. In his opinion for the Court, Justice Douglas found a privacy interest in the "penumbras" of the First, Third, Fourth, and Ninth Amendments.

> Specific guarantees in the Bill of Rights have penumbras, formed by emanations from those guarantees that give them life and substance. Various guarantees create zones of privacy. The right of association contained in the penumbra of the First Amendment is one. * * * The Third Amendment in its prohibition against the quartering of soldiers "in any house" in time of peace without the consent of the owner is another facet of that privacy. The Fourth Amendment explicitly affirms the "right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures." The Fifth Amendment in its Self Incrimination Clause enables the citizen to create a zone of privacy which government may not force him to surrender to his detriment. The Ninth Amendment provides: "The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people." * * * We have had many controversies over these penumbral rights of "privacy and repose." * * * These cases bear witness that the right of privacy which presses for recognition here is a legitimate one. [Emphasis added.]

Douglas had begun his opinion by citing the broad protection afforded speech and press in the First and Fourteenth Amendments:

> [T]he [s]tate may not, consistent with the spirit of the First Amendment, contract the spectrum of available knowledge. The right of freedom of speech and press includes not only the right to utter or to print, but the right to distribute, the right to receive, the right to read and freedom of inquiry, freedom of thought, and freedom to teach. * * * Without these peripheral rights, the specific rights would be less secure.

Some Court watchers viewed the case as a shocking example of judicial improvisation; others saw it as an affirmation of the Doctrine of Judicial Review whereby the Court could invalidate a noxious law which Connecticut representatives dared not repeal.

Justice Harry Blackmun leaned on Griswold in his opinion for the Court in its historic 1973 abortion ruling, Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973).

> The Constitution does not explicity mention any right of privacy. In a line of decisions, however, going back perhaps as far as Union Pacific Railway Co. v. Botsford, 141 U.S. 250 (1891), the Court has recognized that a right of personal privacy, or a guarantee of certain areas or zones of privacy, does exist under the Constitution. In varying contexts the Court or individual justices have indeed found at least the roots of that right in the First Amendment; in the Fourth and Fifth Amendments; in the penumbras of the Bill of Rights; in the Ninth Amendment; or in the concept of liberty guaranteed by the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment. These decisions make it clear that only personal rights that can be deemed "fundamental" or "implicit in the concept of ordered liberty" are included in this guarantee of personal privacy. They also make it clear that the right has some extension to activities relating to marriage, procreation, contraception, family relationships, and child rearing and education. [Case citations are omitted.]

"This right of privacy," Blackman added, "* * * is broad enough to encompass a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy. * * * We therefore conclude that the right of personal privacy includes the abortion decision, but that this right is not unqualified and must be considered against important state interests in regulation." The controversial decision has been subjected to frequent attacks by opponents of abortion and by frequent attempts by states to apply limitations on the right to an abortion.[16]

The constitutional right to privacy has been applied in many contexts, from cases invalidating state laws prohibiting interracial marriages to guaranteeing individuals the right to live in neighborhoods of their choice.[17] The right was held not strong enough to prevent a state from enforcing antisodomy statutes against consensual homosexual activity that took place in a private home.[18]

As with other constitutional guarantees, only privacy violations by government or those that amount to "state action" are protected against.[19] Violations by private parties must be addressed through common law or statute, if at all. The states may, as with other constitutional rights, expand but not restrict the rights. Some states have incorporated privacy into the state constitution,[20] or have otherwise interpreted their state constitutions as providing greater privacy rights.[21]

Controlling the flow of data about individuals—"data privacy"—has become a great concern in the last part of the twentieth century as computer data bases and instantaneous transmissions make it ever easier to compile information and more difficult to prevent its dissemination. Electronic snooping by business, government, and even individuals poses a far greater threat to the liberal tradition of individual freedom than does vigorous journalism.

In their separate works on privacy, Westin and Arthur R. Miller[22] were primarily concerned with governmental assaults on privacy for the sake of law enforcement and national security. Computer assisted, government is capable of watching, wiretapping, and data-banking information about the citizenry in a frighteningly Orwellian manner. Every one—almost—has been reduced to a file.

In the last three decades, statutory attempts to protect data privacy have grown, ranging from assuring confidentiality of students' records to preventing access to information about cable television customers. For example, the Federal Privacy Act of 1974[23] is designed to safeguard individual privacy stemming from misuse of federal records. It also provides individuals a right of access to data about themselves. In the act, Congress defines privacy as a fundamental constitutional right. Minnesota, one of the first states to adopt a data privacy statute protecting personal information in official records, has been followed by other states.

Whether or not attempts to keep information private can succeed is widely doubted.[24] In any event, data privacy legislation has not presented problems for the news media, mainly because the statutes are aimed at those who compile and use private information in their normal trade or business activities. The press does not normally create and retain files of matters such as student grades or checking account balances. If, however, a reporter "tapped" into a data base of another that was protected by statute from newsgathering, it is likely that no defense would be available against civil charges based on the unauthorized entry.[25]

Since we cannot deal here with every aspect of what Professor Freund calls the "greedy" concept of privacy,[26] we shall settle on those dimensions of privacy that engage the press. Omitted then are at least the following contexts in which privacy claims arise, claims that are sometimes more urgent and significant than those brought against the press: eavesdropping; surveillance; unreasonable searches and seizures by government; the reasonable expectation of some privacy in public places or in the public mails against obscenity, inappropriate advertising, or certain forms of picketing; door-to-door solicitation; the privacy of a business office or a college dormitory; bodily privacy, for example, hair length or sexual preference; euthanasia; psychosur-

Movie Systems used a van with electronic sensing equipment to patrol the streets of Minneapolis and St. Paul in search of unauthorized users. Since the surveillance was by a private party, the court concluded that Heller's Fourth Amendment rights had not been infringed. Heller also lost on state common law privacy grounds, since Minnesota is one of a handful of states that has refused to recognize the cause of action.

gery; self-incrimination; and statutory relational privileges between husband and wife, doctor and patient, lawyer and client, and priest and penitent.

The bulk of media and scholarly attention has been focused on the third type, the common law of privacy. Unlike defamation, a privacy violation does not depend upon the altered attitudes other persons have toward you. Rather, it concerns how you are made to feel about yourself. It involves your self-esteem. When first proposed by Louis Brandeis and Samuel Warren in what was to become a seminal law review article,[27] it was referred to strictly in terms of "inviolate personality." The two young Boston lawyers were reacting to what they considered graceless newspaper gossip about private social affairs of the patrician Warren family. Although there is an aura of injured gentility about their rhetoric, Brandeis and Warren were prophetic when they observed that someday "mechanical devices (would) threaten to make good the prediction that 'what is whispered in the closet shall be proclaimed from the housetops'."

More important, Brandeis and Warren for the first time wrenched privacy from the domain of property law, where it had been protected, if at all, in the common law. Their key argument was that law and society should recognize a certain category of intimate information about individuals that was sacrosanct. Both textual and photographic information were included. Brandeis and Warren were prepared to exempt publications of public or general interest from their law of privacy but, diverging from libel, would not generally permit truth as a defense in a privacy suit. They would allow a privacy suit where the "dignity and convenience" of the individual was intruded upon in an unwarranted fashion, but did not define what was unwarranted. The action would include damages for mental suffering as well as for any more determinable damages.

Privacy gained momentum when New York in 1903 passed a law making it a misdemeanor and a tort to use someone's name or picture for trade purposes without authorization (New York Civil Rights Law, §§ 50, 51). The legislature was responding to the plight of a young woman who, finding her portrait on posters advertising flour in stores, warehouse walls, and saloons, could invoke no legal remedy.[28] But the right remained one of property, analogous to a breach of contract or copyright. The New York statute, however, has frequently been invoked by plaintiffs pursuing other, nonproperty-related, privacy actions.

Two years later, the Georgia Supreme Court, in a similar case of appropriating one's photograph for trade purposes—this time by an insurance company—became the first court to recognize a personal right of privacy.[29] Under the influence of Brandeis and Warren's arguments, the tort was stretched by courts and commentators to accommodate other kinds of invasions of privacy. The influential Dean William Prosser finally organized the case law into the four categories—appropriation, intrusion, false light, and embarrassing private facts—which today provide a popular framework of analysis. Prosser, Privacy, 48 Calif.L.Rev. 389 (1960). For a study of the coalescing quality of the four-category typology, see Ellis, Damages and the Privacy Tort: Sketching a Legal Profile, 64 Iowa L.Rev. 1111 (1979).

Most states and the District of Columbia today give common law or statutory recognition to some or all of Prosser's four privacy torts.[30] Eleven states have privacy statutes, but only Rhode Island's provides a cause of action under all four of Prosser's categories. In other states with statutes, privacy categories not covered may nonetheless have been recognized by the courts as a matter of common law. It might also be inferred, however, that the absence of a category in a statute indicates nonrecognition of the cause of action. That view was clearly articulated in Arrington v. New York Times, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2354, 433 N.Y.S.2d 164 (Sup.Ct., App.Div. 1980), when the court would recognize neither a common law nor constitutional privacy cause of action beyond its statute. A false light claim was rejected by the court. One state, North Dakota, has not addressed privacy either in court decisions or by statute.

Just as with libel, federal courts may hear privacy cases where diversity of citizenship jurisdiction applies. More than in most areas of common law where federal courts are required to "predict" state law, predictions of a state's privacy law are likely to be in error.[31] More than most other areas of communication law, the protections from state to state vary widely under the common law right of privacy. Knowing the provisions of local law is advised.

While common law invasion of privacy has always had criticism because it is confusing, sometimes contradictory, and always in conflict with the First Amendment goal of a wide-open marketplace of ideas, and its demise has often been predicted or desired,[32] it remains the basis for a considerable number of lawsuits against mass media. Most of those suits result in decisions for defendants, rendering the vast majority of editorial decisions on what the press might do to personal privacy a matter of ethics and good taste rather than of law.[33]

"PURE" PRIVACY: DISCLOSURE OF EMBARRASSING PRIVATE FACTS

Unreasonable public disclosure of embarrassing private facts is the branch of invasion of privacy that Warren and Brandeis had most in mind, and it is the branch to which most current definitions of privacy apply. It is also the most difficult for a plaintiff to pursue. Despite odds against winning, plaintiffs file embarrassing private facts lawsuits frequently; only false light actions appear to outnumber them among all privacy cases.

Why do plaintiffs fail? Because the defense of newsworthiness intervenes to protect the publisher. Newsworthiness, of course, means different things to different people. A British parliamentary commission attempted definition when it suggested a distinction between material in the public interest and material merely of interest to the public.[34] The commission ultimately opposed creating any privacy law. An editor will likely consider all published stories newsworthy, while a court may consider only stories covering issues that directly affect readers as newsworthy.[35]

The problem with such Meiklejohnian interpretations is that they focus on the value of the story, especially political value, rather than on the intimacy of the material as originally proposed. Narrow distinctions also underestimate the significance of nonpolitical, even purely entertaining, speech. Newsworthiness has been applied with a broad brush anyway, using a common sense approach rather than a categorical one. Ironically, where plaintiffs have succeeded, they have done so at the cost of additional publicity.

The leading case on embarrassing private facts arose from a story that asked the perennial reporter's question, "whatever happened to . . . ?" A writer for The New Yorker in 1937 decided to learn what had become of William James Sidis, a one-time child prodigy who had attracted extensive press attention in the early part of the century. Sidis had become an anonymous recluse. Although the magazine article was sympathetic,[36] the privacy Sidis had carefully cultivated was shattered. In 1940, a federal appeals court rejected Sidis's privacy claim.

Warren and Brandeis realized that the interest of the individual in privacy must ineveitably conflict with the interest of the public in news. Certain public figures, they conceded, such as holders of public office, must sacrifice their privacy and expose at least part of their lives to public scrutiny as the price of the powers they attain. But even public figures were not to be stripped bare.

Sidis today is neither politician, public administrator, nor statesman. Even if he were, some of the personal details revealed were of the sort that Warren and Brandeis believed "all men alike are entitled to keep from popular curiosity."

But despite eminent opinion to the contrary, we are not yet disposed to afford to all the intimate details of private life an absolute immunity from the prying of the press. Everyone will agree that at some point the public interest in obtaining information becomes dominant over the individual's desire for privacy. Warren and Brandeis were willing to lift the veil somewhat in the case of public officers. We would go further, though we are not yet prepared to say how far. At least we would permit limited scrutiny of the "private" life of any person who has achieved, or has had thrust upon him, the questionable and indefinable status of a "public figure."

William James Sidis was once a public figure. As a child prodigy, he excited both admiration and curiosity. Of him great deeds were expected. In 1910, he was a person about whom the newspapers might display a legitimate intellectual interest, in the sense meant by Warren and Brandeis, as distinguished from a trivial and unseemly curiosity. But the precise motives of the press we regard as unimportant. And even if Sidis had loathed public attention at that time, we think his uncommon achievements and personality would have made the attention permissible. Since then Sidis has cloaked himself in obscurity, but his subsequent history, containing as it did the answer to the question of whether or not he had fulfilled his early promise, was still a matter of public concern. The article in The New Yorker sketched the life of an unusual personality, and it possessed considerable popular news interest.

We express no comment on whether or not the newsworthiness of the matter printed will always constitute a complete defense. Revelations may be so intimate and so unwarranted in view of the victim's position as to outrage the community's notions of decency. [Emphasis added.] But when focused upon public characters, truthful comments upon dress, speech, habits, and the ordinary aspects of personality will usually not transgress this line. Regrettably or not, the misfortunes and frailties of neighbors and "public figures" are subjects of considerable interest and discussion to the rest of the population. And when such are the mores of the community, it would be unwise for a court to bar their expression in the newspapers, books, and magazines of the day.

COMMENT

The rule of Sidis—that revelations so intimate and so unwarranted in view of the victim's position as to outrage the community's notions of decency are actionable under privacy standards—has stood the test of time. Truthful publication may be punished in some circumstances.

"One who gives publicity to a matter concerning the private life of another is subject to liability to the other for invasion of privacy, if the matter publicized is of a kind that (a) would be highly offensive to a reasonable person and (b) is not of legitimate concern to the public." Restatement (Second) of Torts § 652D (1977).

As in libel, where the Supreme Court extended substantial latitude to the states to develop their own standards of fault, the Court in privacy has developed what is essentially a community standards test, or what one commentator has called the unconscionability rule.[37]

The Scope of "Outrage" and the Defense of Newsworthiness

Just what is able to "outrage the community's notions of decency" has been addressed in many cases. Stories that resulted from routine reporting and publishing practices have seldom been subjected to liability. Only material that is truly intimate or media practices that are truly unreasonable have sufficed to impose liability.

A case in point involved a plastic surgeon who used "before and after" photos of a patient for public demonstrations and television appearances. Mary Vassiliades, a retired secretary, underwent cosmetic surgery—apparently a facelift—in 1978. Photos were taken during surgery and at postoperation visits, the doctor assuring her that taking photos was "part of the doctor's regular routine." In 1979, the doctor appeared on a Washington, D.C. talk show and gave a presentation at Garfinckel's department store. The doctor used four photos and identified Vassiliades by name. Acquaintances of Vassiliades saw the television show and began spreading the news of her surgery. Vassiliades herself testified that she was "devastated" and "went into a terrible depression" upon learning of the use of the photos. Vassiliades v. Garfinckel's, 11 Med.L.Rptr. 2057, 492 A.2d 580 (D.C.App. 1985).

Relying upon Barber v. Time, Inc.,[38] an early case where a hospital patient with an eating disorder was photographed without consent while her attention was diverted, the court agreed that Vassiliades's privacy was invaded. "Although the photographs may not have been uncomplimentary or unsavory, the issue is whether the publicity * * * was highly offensive to a reasonable person * * *", the court said. The defense argued that plastic surgery is a matter of legitimate public interest. This newsworthiness argument was rejected. The court could find no "logical nexus" between the admittedly newsworthy subject and the use of Vassiliades's photos to explain the subject. Surely, the court reasoned, the need to inform the public does not include a need to use photos of the most intimate sort. In an interesting side issue, the court held the department store was not responsible, since it had been given assurances of consent by the doctor.

Similar arguments were used after the Oakland Tribune identified Toni Ann Diaz, the recently elected first female president of the student body at the College of Alameda, as having undergone sex change surgery some years before. Diaz had concealed knowledge of the operation, telling only immediate family members and close friends. A reporter developed the story from a tip and confirmed it using confidential sources. The story also reported on an arrest record for Antonio Diaz from 1971. Diaz v. Oakland Tribune, 9 Med.L.Rptr. 1121, 139 Cal.App.3d 118, 188 Cal.Rptr. 762 (1983).

In the course of deciding to send the case back to trial, the court examined the four elements of public disclosure actions in California: "(1) public disclosure (2) of a private fact (3) which would be offensive and objectionable to the reasonable person and (4) which is not of legitimate public concern." The court determined that sexual identity, Diaz's Puerto Rican birth certificate, and the arrest were all private matters. The Tribune's connection of Antonio Diaz to Toni Diaz, relying upon records that did not contain both names and on confidential sources, was seen as tenuous. Regarding the arrest record itself, the court noted, "[M]atter which was once of public record may be protected as private facts where disclosure of that information is not newsworthy." In addition, the court said that Diaz's status as student body president did not support a newsworthiness defense. "The public arena entered by Diaz is concededly small," the court said. Diaz could be considered a public figure for only a limited range of matters.

While Diaz and Vassiliades might seem to indicate that details of one's sex life or medical history are especially intimate details deserving protection, such is not always the case. Oliver Sipple sued after he was identified in news stories as a member of San Francisco's gay community. The former Marine, who had kept his sexual preference from his family, suffered estrangement from his parents, brothers, and sisters. But Sipple had become a hero when he deflected Sara Jane Moore's gun hand when Moore tried to shoot President Gerald Ford in San Francisco in 1975. Since Sipple was a widely known and active member of the city's gay community, and that information was not capable of shocking the community, the court refused to consider his sexual preference a private fact. Even if it had, the court said, newsworthiness prevented any liability. While Sipple could perhaps not have foreseen the consequences, his voluntary actions made Sipple subject to coverage, which "is not limited to the event that itself arouses the public interest. * * *" Sipple v. Chronicle Pubg. Co., 10 Med.L.Rptr. 1690, 154 Cal.App.3d 1040, 201 Cal.Rptr. 665 (1984). Is there any genuine difference between Diaz and Sipple?

Similarly, two minors who filed suit against Hustler magazine after its publication of nude photos taken years earlier and republished by the magazine as part of a review of two books containing the photos, lost their case because the facts had ceased to be private. Their mother had originally consented to the taking of the photos and had signed a release. No matter how embarrassing the facts were today to the children and mother, that which had been allowed to become public could not later be made private by judicial fiat. The plaintiffs also claimed false light and appropriation, but since the court determined that no reasonable person could interpret the appearance of the photos as approval of Hustler or as indicating the plaintiffs posed for the magazine, the extra claims were also thrown out. Faloona v. Hustler, 13 Med.L.Rptr. 1353, 799 F.2d 1000 (5th Cir. 1986). The attempt to combine several related claims occurs frequently in privacy litigation. The case is typical of a growing number of suits brought against Hustler for its tendency to run photographs from virtually any source of subjects posing nude. Not surprisingly, many photo subjects are dismayed, to say the least, at appearing in Larry Flynt's magazine without notice.[39] Apparently many plaintiffs consider merely appearing in Hustler at odds with notions of decency.

Note that cases addressing issues of community standards do not, with the exception of Sipple, make explicit reference to the community in which the story appeared. The "community" that truly matters for private facts cases is the jury. Since what is private and what violates community standards is an issue of fact, it is initially for the jury to decide. And some appeals courts are reluctant to reverse juries. In one case, a teenage mother told a newspaper reporter that Craig Hawkins was the father of her child. The reporter also talked to Hawkins himself. Despite what was apparently a fairly well-known fact, the court said a jury was entitled to find it a private fact. Hawkins v. Multimedia, 12 Med.L.Rptr. 1878, 344 S.E.2d 145 (S.C. 1986). The court also upheld a jury decision that the fact was not newsworthy. In addition, the fact that Hawkins was a minor, and it was not clear that his telephone interview constituted consent, seemed to influence the court. The court emphasized that, "the reporter never asked Craig if she could use his name in a newspaper article." The court referred to plaintiff by first name throughout the opinion. The apparent reporter-never-asked standard of Hawkins should chill the spine of every reporter who has conducted an interview without getting permission to publish—in other words, every reporter.

A case that addressed the community standards or decency test at length involved an eccentric bodysurfer and Sports Illustrated. Michael Virgil agreed to an interview but revoked consent when he learned that the picture story would include details of what can only be called weird behavior. The article was published anyway and included the following paragraphs:

> Virgil's carefree style at the Wedge appears to have emanated from some escapades in his younger days, such as the time at a party when a young lady approached him and asked where she might find an ashtray. "Why, my dear, right here," said Virgil, taking her lighted cigarette and extinguishing it in his mouth. He also won a small bet one time by burning a hole in a dollar bill that was resting on the back of his hand. In the process he also burned two holes in his wrist.
>
> The article quotes Virgil as saying:
>
> Every summer I'd work construction and dive off billboards to hurt myself or drop loads of lumber on myself to collect unemployment compensation so I could surf at the Wedge. Would I fake injuries? No, I wouldn't fake them. I'd be damn injured. But I would recover. I guess I used to live a pretty reckless life. I think I might have been drunk most of the time.
>
> I love tuna fish. Eat it all the time. I do what feels good. That's the way I live my life. If it makes me feel good, whether it's against the law or not, I do it. I'm not sure a lot of things I've done weren't pure lunacy. Cherilee [plaintiff's wife] says, "Mike also eats spiders and other insects and things."

The article notes: "Perhaps because most of his time was spent engaged in such activity, Virgil never learned how to read."

A photo caption reads: "Mike Virgil, the wild man of the Wedge, thinks it possible his brain is being slowly destroyed."

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals wrote no brief for the press when it said:

> To hold that privilege extends to all true statements would seem to deny the existence of "private" facts, for if facts be facts—that is, if they be true—they would not (at least to the press) be private, and the press would be free to publicize them to the extent it sees fit. The extent to which areas of privacy continue to exist, then, would appear to be based not on rights bestowed by law but on the taste and discretion of the press. We cannot accept this result.

Nevertheless, the court added that news of legitimate concern to the public is protected by the First Amendment, and "in determining what is a matter of legitimate public interest, account must be taken of the customs and conventions of the community; and in the last analysis what is proper becomes a matter of the community mores. The line is to be drawn when the publicity ceases to be the giving of information of which the public is entitled, and becomes a morbid and sensational prying into private lives for its own sake, with which a reasonable member of the public, with decent standards, would say that he had no concern. * * * But if there is room for differing views as to the state of community mores or the manner in which it would operate upon the facts in question, there is room for the jury function." [Emphasis added.] Virgil v. Time, Inc., 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1835, 527 F.2d 1122 (9th Cir. 1975).

The press had argued that the First Amendment should provide a privilege for publication of any true material. But the Ninth Circuit would accept only the traditional newsworthiness defense, although it noted the defense was required to be allowed under the First Amendment. The case was returned to federal district court for trial.

The district court found that the Virgil story did not violate the "outrageousness" or "unconscionability" standard adopted by the Ninth Circuit. While agreeing that the facts in the story were "generally unflattering and perhaps embarrassing," the court found the story just as positive about Virgil as negative (a concern more appropriate to libel cases). In any event, bodysurfing was a matter of legitimate public interest, and Virgil's prominence in the sport made him fair game. "Any reasonable person * * * would have to conclude that the personal facts concerning Mike Virgil were included as a legitimate journalistic attempt to explain Virgil's extremely daring and dangerous style of bodysurfing at the Wedge." Virgil v. Sports Illustrated, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1271, 424 F.Supp. 1286 (S.D.Cal. 1976).

Journalism practices were the focus of other cases. In Pasadena Star-News v. Los Angeles Superior Court, 15 Med.L.Rptr. 1867, 203 Cal.App.3d 131, 249 Cal.Rptr. 729 (1988), the mother of an abandoned baby girl filed a privacy suit after the Star-News published a story identifying by name the mother and her brother, who had deposited the baby in a cardboard box at a hospital. The plaintiff asserted that her name was not an integral part of the story, although she conceded the story's newsworthiness. The appeals court issued a writ of mandate ordering the superior court to grant the defendant's motion for summary judgment. The court focused on the consequences of plaintiff's argument in deciding against her. "Plaintiff's proposed rule—that a published report of embarrassing but newsworthy private facts is actionable unless the report omits the name of its subject—would overhaul journalism as we know it," the court said. "The press could not without consent reveal the name of anyone other than a public official or a public figure. * * * * This would change the tone of stories about matters of the greatest public concern, many of which are stories about individuals of no renown." (Emphasis added.)

Iowa's Supreme Court held that a newspaper report of a patient subjected to sterilization was not an invasion of privacy because it was newsworthy and insufficiently intimate to outrage the community's notions of decency, and it was part of a public record. Of the story the court said:

> [I]t offered a personalized frame of reference to which the reader could relate, fostering perception and understanding * * * the editors also had a right to buttress the force of their evidence by naming names. We do not say it was necessary for them to do so, but we are certain they had a right to treat the identity of victims of involuntary sterilization as matters of legitimate public concern. * * * The specificity of the report would strengthen the accuracy of the public perception of the merits of the controversy. Howard v. Des Moines Register and Tribune Co., 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1667, 283 N.W.2d 289 (Ia. 1979), cert. den. 445 U.S. 904 (1980).

Indeed, successful private facts cases have been difficult to find since Time, Inc. v. Hill[40] in 1967. A federal district court thought it had reached the outer boundaries of community decency when it denied a Twin Cities television station's request to make copies of videotapes that had been shown to a jury in a kidnap-rape-murder trial. The defendant had made videotapes that recorded his multiple rapes of his former high school teacher. The victim and her daughter later escaped their captor. A boy who had been picked up during their abduction had been murdered.

Although not a privacy case as such, the judge relied on privacy notions in denying the motion to copy the videotapes. And the victim, who had agreed to a showing of the tapes for prosecution purposes, also opposed the motion. It is not clear if the denial was premised on private facts grounds or on bodily privacy grounds. The judge expressly declined to say, concluding that: "To now expose Mrs. Stauffer to public humiliation and degradation by releasing the tapes for public dissemination would, at best, be unseemly and shameless; it would constitute an unconscionable invasion of her privacy." In re Application of KSTP-TV, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2249, 504 F.Supp. 360 (D.Minn. 1980). The ruling appeared based in part on a presumption that the station would broadcast everything the jury had seen. It would not have.

The KSTP case seems to have more in common perhaps with non-media bodily privacy cases such as those involving police strip searches of women arrested for minor crimes and traffic offenses[41] or surreptitious taking of photos of female patrons in the rest room of a bar,[42] or the woman who went to the police to report an assault who was asked to undress, was photographed nude, and the photos later circulated among policemen for their amusement.[43]

The element of misbehavior was at work in a somewhat similar media privacy case involving what might be considered an "ambush" report. When a temporarily deranged man was arrested at his home by Boise, Idaho police for using a shotgun in a threatening manner, he was framed in his doorway, and he was naked. TV cameras filmed the arrest, and for a fraction of a second the man's buttocks and genitals appeared on the evening news. The news editor was fired. The arrested man, claiming embarrassment and humiliation, sued the television station for invasion of privacy, and a jury awarded him $15,000. On appeal to the Supreme Court of Idaho, the judgment was reversed, and the case remanded for retrial. The state supreme court went astray, however, by directing the trial court to decide the case on the issue of actual malice, an issue not governing private facts cases but reserved for false light suits.[44] Does the fact that Taylor appeared naked in his front door, where anyone could have seen him, weaken his private facts claim? Does the fact that the reporter accompanied police make the (un)coverage newsworthy?

A Florida case indicates that facts which might otherwise clearly be considered private will be newsworthy when official police involvement occurs or the magnitude of an event is sure to attract public attention. A Cocoa Beach jury ordered a newspaper to pay $10,000 to a woman who was photographed fleeing from her home naked except for slight coverage from a hand towel after having been held captive by her estranged husband. An appeals court reversed. Cape Publications v. Bridges, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 2535, 423 So.2d 426 (Fla.Dist.Ct.App. 1982). The court explicitly noted that the Restatement of Torts regards police activities as newsworthy. The court also noted that the event itself provided a defense to the newspaper, because crime—and by extension crime victims—are matters of public interest. The newspaper's photo, "which won industry awards, could be considered by some to be in bad taste," the court said. Matters of taste, however, should not be the basis for a court's substituting its judgment for that of editors. Notably, the photo run was one of the least revealing taken and "revealed little more than could be seen had appellee been wearing a bikini. * * *" Her claim for intentional infliction of mental distress was thrown out for failure to provide evidence of "outrageousness."

Even in cases of egregious bad taste and faulty editorial judgment, the public interest defense will protect a publisher. A newspaper printed photos of a murdered child's body, wrapped in chains, being pulled from a lake. Additional prints showing the gruesome effects of the crime were sold to the public. But a privacy claim brought by the parents was rejected because, said a Georgia court, the crime, at least until its perpetrator was apprehended, was a matter of urgent public interest. Waters v. Fleetwood, 91 S.E.2d 344 (Ga. 1956).

Does "Private Facts" Have a Future?

The rationale underlying the private facts cause of action was severely critiqued by the Oregon Supreme Court in a 1986 case. Justice Hans Linde's opinion for the court argued that the cause of action fails to serve the purposes it was created to protect, 41. Mary Beth G. v. City of Chicago, 723 F.2d 1263 (7th Cir. 1983).

42. Yoeckel v. Samonig, 75 N.W.2d 925 (Wis. 1956). The facts also support an action for intrusion on seclusion since most people have a reasonable expectation of solitude in a rest room.

43. York v. Story, 324 F.2d 450 (9th Cir. 1963).

44. Taylor v. KTVB, Inc., 525 P.2d 984 (Idaho 1974).

while doing considerable damage to the operations of the press. Richard Anderson filed suit after station KATU-TV used footage of him from an automobile accident in promotional advertising for its special report on emergency medical services. The material had never been used in a newscast. In the videotape Anderson was identifiable, shown injured and bleeding. He claimed violation of his right of privacy on private facts and appropriation grounds. A trial court gave the station summary judgment on the issue of newsworthiness. The court of appeals had reversed, holding that newsworthiness was a fact issue for the jury.

ANDERSON v. FISHER BROADCASTING COS.

12 MED.L.RPTR. 1604, 712 P.2D 803 (ORE. 1986).

LINDE, J.:

A television cameraman for defendant broadcasting company photographed the scene of an automobile accident in which plaintiff was injured. Plaintiff was recognizable and was shown bleeding and in pain while receiving emergency medical treatment. Defendant did not use the videotaped pictures or report the accident on its regular news program. Some time later, without seeking plaintiff's consent, defendant used a brief excerpt showing plaintiff to illustrate promotional spots advertising a special news report about a new system for dispatching emergency medical help.

Plaintiff sued for general damages for mental anguish, alleging that defendant "violated plaintiff's right to privacy" by "appropriating to defendant's own use and advantage" the pictures its photographer had taken of plaintiff and by "publicizing" his picture in a condition "offensive to a reasonable person" and not of legitimate public concern. In defense, the broadcaster asserted that its use of plaintiff's picture occurred in advertising another news program, that this use was constitutionally privileged and that the undisputed facts gave rise to no common law claim. The trial court gave summary judgment for defendant. * * *

The Court of Appeals held that there was an issue of fact whether the film showing plaintiff's injured condition was newsworthy, because it was not used to report plaintiff's accident itself but only to draw viewers for a different program in which the accident was not mentioned.

* * *

In this court, defendant again stressed its constitutional claims along with its common law arguments, understandably so in defending against a tort claim for wrongful publicity to which media of mass communication are peculiarly vulnerable. The constitutional issues are significant. The right to "speak, write, or print freely on any subject whatever" guaranteed by Article I, section 8, of the Oregon Constitution accommodates laws providing civil responsibility and remedies (though not punitive damages) for an "injury done another in his person, property, or reputation," as guaranteed in Article I, section 10, if the interest said to be injured falls within section 10 and if the defendant's expression meets the test of the word "abuse" in section 8.

* * *

We therefore included the constitutional issues among the questions that we submitted to counsel before argument. But we shall not decide this case on constitutional grounds when it is unnecessary to do so, and when a premature decision would foreclose legislative consideration. In the present case, we hold that the undisputed facts do not give rise to a claim for damages. We therefore reverse the Court of Appeals and reinstate the judgment of the circuit court.

* * *

The question whether truthfully publicizing a fact about a private individual that the individual reasonably prefers to keep private is, without more, a tort, has not yet been squarely decided by this court.

Generally, Oregon decisions have not allowed recovery for injury to a stranger's feelings as such, unless the infliction of psychic distress was the object of defendant's conduct or the conduct violated some legal duty apart from causing the distress. See Norwest v. Presbyterian Intercommunity Hosp., 293 Or at 558–59, reviewing the cases. In the absence of some other duty or relationship of the defendant to plaintiff, it does not suffice for tort liability that defendant's offensive conduct is an intentional act. The conduct must be designed to cause severe mental or emotional distress, whether for its own sake or as a means to some other end, and it must qualify as extraordinary conduct that a reasonable jury could find to be beyond the farthest reach of socially tolerable behavior. Hall v. The May Dept. Stores, 292 Or at 137. Here the use of plaintiff's picture, of course, was intentional, but there is no claim or evidence that the broadcaster wished to distress plaintiff.

* * *

"Privacy" denotes a personal or cultural value placed on seclusion or personal control over access to places or things, thoughts or acts. "Privacy" also can be used to label one or more legally recognized interests, and this court has so used the term in several cases. * * * But like the older word "property," which it partially overlaps, "privacy" has been a difficult legal concept to delimit.

* * *

The common law tort claim based solely on publicizing private facts that are true but not newsworthy has met critical response. * * * Such a tort was not part of the "common law of England" adopted by Oregon in 1843, and after studying it was rejected in England, the home of the common law, in favor of alternative theories. Criticism has not implied a lack of sympathy with the feelings of persons whose past or present lives are brought to public attention against their own wishes; but the obstacles to defining when publicity as such is tortious, without more, are formidable.

What is "private" so as to make its publication offensive likely differs among communities, between generations, and among ethnic, religious, or other social groups, as well as among individuals. Likewise, one reader's or viewer's "news" is another's tedium or trivia. The editorial judgment of what is "newsworthy" is not so readily submitted to the ad hoc review of a jury as the Court of Appeals believed. It is not properly a community standard.

* * *

If the tort is defined to protect a plaintiff's interest in nondisclosure only against widespread publicity, as in the Restatement's § 652D, it singles out the print, film, and broadcast media for legal restraints that will not be applied to gossip-mongers in neighborhood taverns or card parties, to letter writers or telephone tattlers. Finally, a successful tort action may serve to rectify a defamatory, appropriative, or "false light" publication, but in the pure "private facts" tort even success sacrifices rather than protects the plaintiff's interest in the privacy of the wrongfully publicized facts, for litigation only breeds renewed and often wider publicity, this time unquestionably privileged. Writing in 1979, Professor Dorsey D. Ellis, Jr., found that there had been no reported case in which a plaintiff successfully recovered damages for truthful disclosure by the press since the United States Supreme Court reversed a New York judgment in Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374, 87 S.Ct. 534, 17 L.Ed.2d 456 (1967), and he concluded that the tort's "very existence is in doubt, at least outside the law reviews." Ellis, Damages and the Privacy Tort: Sketching a Legal Profile, 64 Iowa L.Rev. 1111, 1133 (1979).

Doubtless in many instances a picture not only is worth a thousand words to a publisher but words would be worth nothing at all. * * * Some filmed or broadcast scenes compare to verbal reports in dramatic impact about as hearing music compares to reading a score, and the emotional reaction of the person who is depicted rather than described may likewise be greater. * * *

Nonetheless, the difference between undesired publicity by word or by picture seems to concern only the degree of the subject's psychic discomfort rather than the nature of the interest claimed to be invaded. Perhaps the present plaintiff would not have felt offended if KATU-TV had verbally described his bloodied and disheveled condition rather than showing it. But neither the courts nor the commentators have made a distinction in principle between one woman's objections to a book based on her experiences, Cason v. Baskin, 155 Fla. 198, 20 So.2d 243 (1944), and another's to a motion picture, Melvin v. Reid, 112 Cal.App. 285, 297 P. 91 (1931), and we perceive none.

* * *

Plaintiff in the present case concedes that KATU-TV would not be liable to him if it had included his picture in the ordinary news coverage of a traffic accident. He contends that the broadcaster became liable because instead it used the footage to draw audience attention to a later broadcast concerning emergency medical services, in which plaintiff's picture was not included. Does the distinction between "commercial" and "noncommercial" use of a person's name, likeness, or life history rest on a difference in the interest invaded by the publication or in the character of the publisher's motives and purposes? The reason should bear on the remedy.

* * *

This theory is not available, however, to a person whose image, with no established public familiarity, appears in a commercial context only incidentally, perhaps as one of several persons in a public scene, or otherwise under circumstances that plainly are not presented so as to convey any endorsement by that person.

In the present case, plaintiff does not claim that KATU-TV's promotional spots portrayed him as an accident victim in a manner implying that he endorsed its forthcoming program about emergency medical services, and the record on summary judgment suggests no such inference. His claim is not for the economic value of such an endorsement, nor for any gain unjustly realized by the broadcaster from appropriating a photograph belonging to plaintiff. The videotape was made at the accident scene by defendant's cameraman, and the identity of the accident victim was immaterial. Rather, plaintiff claims damages for mental distress from its publication. Without a showing that plaintiff's picture was either obtained or broadcast in a manner or for a purpose wrongful beyond the unconsented publication itself, that claims fails.

To summarize, we conclude that in Oregon, the truthful presentation of facts concerning a person, even facts that a reasonable person would wish to keep private and that are not "newsworthy," does not give rise to common-law tort liability for damages for mental or emotional distress, unless the manner or purpose of defendant's conduct is wrongful in some respect apart from causing the plaintiff's hurt feelings. * * * Because plaintiff has shown no such wrongful element in defendants' conduct, we have no occasion to anticipate constitutional questions in the event the legislature were to enter this field of tort law.

The decision of the Court of Appeals is reversed, and the judgment of the circuit court is reinstated.

COMMENT

Why did the court not adopt a state constitutional or First Amendment defense for the media against any private facts or appropriation lawsuit whenever the complained-of content was news? Such an analysis would have retained the common law actions for other, nonmedia or non-news purposes. The court instead says that the content of media itself cannot become the basis for a suit, only a "wrongful element in defendants' conduct." In any event the publication of truthful information cannot, standing alone, support a privacy action in Oregon, no matter how private the facts may be. Oregon is nearly alone in its interpretation at present.[45] The logic of not recognizing an action which the court notes had resulted in "no reported case in which a plaintiff successfully recovered damages" seems sound. The factor of wrongful behavior is at the core of cases involving the other three branches of common law privacy, as we shall see. The courts have not always recognized that behavior, not content, is the central issue, however.

Privileging Facts from Official Records

It is reasonable to expect that information gathered from government records and from official proceedings is generally unlikely to be considered so private a fact that its publication warrants liability. That material appears either in records or is made available in proceedings is itself almost prima facie evidence of public interest, hence newsworthiness. Judicial records are the least vulnerable to private facts suits. And, despite Diaz, a newsworthiness defense based upon records obtained from officials is strong.[46]

In spite of a Georgia statute protecting the identity of rape victims, the privacy claim of a father whose daughter was raped and murdered by six fellow high school students was rejected. A broadcast reporter got the name from a clerk of court since it was included in an official indictment record open to public inspection.

COX BROADCASTING CORP. v. COHN

1 MED.L.RPTR. 1819, 420 U.S. 469, 95 S.CT. 1029, 43 L.ED.2D 328 (1975).

Justice WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * *

45. North Carolina recently rejected the private facts cause of action as unsound as a matter of common law and as constitutionally suspect. Hall v. Post, 15 Med.L.Rptr. 2329 (N.C. 1988). The court noted instead that a plaintiff could seek remedy through actions for intrusion or for infliction of emotional distress, both of which focus on a defendant's conduct rather than a defendant's content. North Carolina had previously rejected the false light cause of action as constitutionally suspect. Renwick v. News & Observer, 10 Med.L.Rptr. 1443, 312 S.E.2d 405 (N.C. 1984).

46. Andren v. Knight-Ridder Newspapers, 10 Med.L.Rptr. 2109 (E.D.Mich. 1984) (action not allowed where defendant published material from diaries of murdered daughter, in action by parents, because diaries were made available to defendant by police officers; deceased's privacy interest also did not pass to parents).

Georgia stoutly defends both § 26-9901 and the State's common-law privacy action challenged here. Its claims are not without force, for powerful arguments can be made, and have been made, that however it may be ultimately defined, there is a zone of privacy surrounding every individual, a zone within which the State may protect him from intrusion by the press, with all its attendant publicity. Indeed, the central thesis of the root article by Warren and Brandeis, "The Right To Privacy", 4 Harv.L.Rev. 193, 196 (1890), was that the press was overstepping its prerogatives by publishing essentially private information and that there should be a remedy for the alleged abuses.

More compellingly, the century has experienced a strong tide running in favor of the so-called right of privacy. * * * Nor is it irrelevant here that the right of privacy is no recent arrival in the jurisprudence of Georgia, which has embraced the right in some form since 1905 when the Georgia Supreme Court decided the leading case of Pavesich v. New England Life Insurance Co. * * * 50 S.E. 68 (Ga. 1905).

These are impressive credentials for a right of privacy, but we should recognize that we do not have at issue here an action for the invasion of privacy involving the appropriation of one's name or photograph, a physical or other tangible intrusion into a private area, or a publication of otherwise private information that is also false although perhaps not defamatory. The version of the privacy tort now before us—termed in Georgia "the tort of public disclosure,"—is that in which the plaintiff claims the right to be free from unwanted publicity about his private affairs, which, although wholly true, would be offensive to a person of ordinary sensibilities. Because the gravamen of the claimed injury is the publication of information, whether true or not, the dissemination of which is embarassing or otherwise painful to an individual, it is here that claims of privacy most directly confront the constitutional freedoms of speech and press. The face-off is apparent, and the appellants urge upon us the broad holding that the press may not be made criminally or civilly liable for publishing information that is neither false nor misleading but absolutely accurate, however damaging it may be to reputation or individual sensibilities.

The Court has nevertheless carefully left open the question whether the First and Fourteenth Amendments require that truth be recognized as a defense in a defamation action brought by a private person as distinguished from a public official or public figure. * * * In similar fashion, Time, Inc. v. Hill, expressly saved the question whether truthful publication of very private matters unrelated to public affairs could be constitutionally proscribed.

In this sphere of collision between claims of privacy and those of the free press, the interests on both sides are plainly rooted in the traditions and significant concerns of our society. Rather than address the broader question whether truthful publications may ever be subjected to civil or criminal liability consistently with the First and Fourteenth Amendments, or to put it another way, whether the State may ever define and protect an area of privacy free from unwanted publicity in the press, it is appropriate to focus on the narrower interface between press and privacy that this case presents, namely, whether the State may impose sanctions on the accurate publication of the name of a rape victim obtained from public records—more specifically, from judicial records which are maintained in connection with a public prosecution and which themselves are open to public inspection. We are convinced that the State may not do so.

In the first place, in a society in which each individual has but limited time and resources with which to observe at first hand the operations of his government, he relies necessarily upon the press to bring to him in convenient form the facts of those operations. Great responsibility is accordingly placed upon the news media to report fully and accurately the proceedings of government, and official records and documents open to the public are the basic data of governmental operations.

* * *

Appellee has claimed in this litigation that the efforts of the press have infringed his right to privacy by broadcasting to the world the fact that his daughter was a rape victim. The commission of crime, prosecutions resulting from it, and judicial proceedings arising from the prosecutions, however, are without question events of legitimate concern to the public and consequently fall within the responsibility of the press to report the operations of government.

* * *

The developing law surrounding the tort of invasion of privacy recognizes a privilege in the press to report the events of judicial proceedings. The Warren and Brandeis article, supra, noted that the proposed new right would be limited in the same manner as actions for libel and slander where such a publication was a privileged communication: "the right to privacy is not invaded by any publication made in a court of justice * * * and (at least in many jurisdictions) reports of any such proceedings would in some measure be accorded a like privilege."

The Restatement of Torts, § 867, embraced an action for privacy. Tentative Draft No. 13 of the Second Restatement of Torts, §§ 652A–652E, divides the privacy tort into four branches; and with respect to the wrong of giving unwanted publicity about private life, the commentary to § 652D states: "There is no liability when the defendant merely gives further publicity to information about the plaintiff which is already public. Thus there is no liability for giving publicity to facts about the plaintiff's life which are matters of public record. * * *" According to this draft, ascertaining and publishing the contents of public records are simply not within the reach of these kinds of privacy actions.

Thus even the prevailing law of invasion of privacy generally recognizes that the interests in privacy fade when the information involved already appears on the public record. The conclusion is compelling when viewed in terms of the First and Fourteenth Amendments and in light of the public interest in a vigorous press. The Georgia cause of action for invasion of privacy through public disclosure of the name of a rape victim imposes sanctions on pure expression—the content of a publication—and not conduct or a combination of speech and nonspeech elements that might otherwise be open to regulation or prohibition. * * *

By placing the information in the public domain on official court records, the State must be presumed to have concluded that the public interest was thereby being served.

* * *

We are reluctant to embark on a course that would make public records generally available to the media but forbid their publication if offensive to the sensibilities of the supposed reasonable man. Such a rule would make it very difficult for the media to inform citizens about the public business and yet stay within the law. The rule would invite timidity and self-censorship and very likely lead to the suppression of many items that would otherwise be published and that should be made available to the public. At the very least, the First and Fourteenth Amendments will not allow exposing the press to liability for truthfully publishing information released to the public in official court records. If there are privacy interests to be protected in judicial proceedings, the States must respond by means which avoid public documentation or other exposure of private information. Their political institutions must weigh the interests in privacy with the interests of the public to know and of the press to publish.[26] Once true information is disclosed in public court documents open to public inspection, the press cannot be sanctioned for publishing it. In this instance as in others reliance must rest upon the judgment of those who decide what to publish or broadcast.

Appellant Wassell based his televised report upon notes taken during the court proceedings and obtained the name of the victim from the indictments handed to him at his request during a recess in the hearing. Appellee has not contended that the name was obtained in an improper fashion or that it was not on an official court document open to public inspection. Under these circumstances, the protection of freedom of the press provided by the First and Fourteenth Amendments bars the State of Georgia from making appellants' broadcast the basis of civil liability.

Reversed.

COMMENT

The Cox decision was a mixed victory for the press. While the Court appears to have erected a near-absolute privilege or defense in private facts cases when the information is obtained from public records that anybody could have seen, the Court declined the press's invitation to declare truth as a defense in all circumstances, a result which would have gutted the private facts tort. The Court's opinion, in fact, is extremely narrow.

---

26. We mean to imply nothing about any constitutional questions which might arise from a state policy not allowing access by the public and press to various kinds of official records, such as records of juvenile-court proceedings.

Is the difference between Cox, where the First Amendment interest was upheld, and Firestone, where it was not, that Cox involved publication of accurate information while Firestone did not? Recall that in Firestone's libel case, the allegedly false information concerned the divorce decree. Firestone never actually contested the defamatory assertions—only that the assertions were not the basis for the judge's granting the divorce. See discussion of Firestone, text, p. 215.

Does the Court's footnote 26 suggest that certain kinds of trials be closed to avoid creating a public record? There may be no need for such extreme measures, since most news organizations do not publish the names of rape victims as a matter of internal policy. Wolf, Thomason and LaRocque, The Right to Know vs. the Right of Privacy: Newspaper Identification of Crime Victims, 64 Journalism Quarterly 503 (1987). The implicit suggestion of closure would also apply to coverage of juveniles, drug offenders, morals violators, and all sorts of persons who may have been rehabilitated. Any rules of automatic closure of proceedings are of dubious constitutionality.[47]

The Scope of the Defense

Cox has been read as creating a virtually impenetrable defense for the media, at least where the information published could have been obtained by anyone. In Doe v. Sarasota-Bradenton Television, 9 Med.L.Rptr. 2074, 436 So.2d 328 (Fla.App. 1983), the plaintiff was a rape victim who agreed to testify at trial after assurances from the state that her name and photograph would not be published or displayed. The media defendant was covering the trial and ran a videotape that included part of Doe's testimony on the same day's evening newscast. The plaintiff attempted to rely on a Florida statute making it unlawful to publish material identifying sexual offense victims, but the court concluded that the statute placed the burden of confidentiality on the state, not the press, much as the Georgia statute did in Cox. The Florida court reluctantly applied Cox but reserved judgment on the constitutionality of the statute itself. "[W]e do not conclude that the statute can never be invoked by persons seeking to shield themselves from public scrutiny," the court said, pointing to Justice White's footnote 26 in Cox. The court added that it reached its decision "*reluctantly because the information disclosed * * * appears to us to have been completely unnecessary to the story being presented.*" [Emphasis added.] Were it not for Cox, the court surely would have opted for "balancing the competing interests at stake here. * * *"

Florida's protection of the identities of rape victims by statute was used as the basis for finding a newspaper liable for damages in a private facts case. In an extremely brief opinion, an appeals court said that victims' names were "not to be published as a matter of law" under the statute. Any such publication would, therefore, present what amounts to a per se private facts case. The prior restraint aspects of its holding were not even discussed, nor was privacy law. Florida Star v. B.J.F., 499 So.2d 883 (Fla.Dist.Ct.App. 1986). In June 1989, the U.S. Supreme Court, on a 6–3 vote, upheld the newspaper's right to use information released in public documents. It did not directly address the privacy issues. Florida Star v. B.J.F., No. 87–329.

The Florida Star decision was virtually alone in allowing recovery against a media defendant for information obtained from official proceedings or records. Recall that the Iowa Supreme Court held that a report on an involuntary sterilization was privileged in part because based on public record. See discussion of Howard v. Des Moines Register and Tribune Co., text, p. 290. And when the breach of security is not the media's fault, the defense is especially strong. In one case, two newspapers published the results of a bar association rating of a nominee for a judgeship. State law stipulated that such ratings be confidential. The bar found the nominee "unqualified," and he was not appointed. The plaintiff filed suit against both the newspapers and the bar association. Claims against the press were dismissed. The plaintiff was a public figure at the time, so a newsworthiness defense was proper. But the press could not be liable in any event. The court said, "While the government may desire to keep some proceedings confidential and may impose the duty upon participants to maintain confidentiality, it may not impose criminal or civil liability upon the press for obtaining and publishing newsworthy information through routine reporting techniques." [Emphasis added.] Nicholson v. McClatchy

Similar results have obtained when the press got information about a juvenile offense from a public parole report,[48] when a newspaper reported the name of a fourteen-year-old rape victim obtained in an open preliminary hearing,[49] and when a newspaper published medical details about a teenager's apparent hit-and-run death from a county sheriff's report.[50] In one case, a rationale similar to that in Cox was used to affirm dismissal of complaints by police officers whose names and addresses were reported in a newspaper story about a gun battle between police and gang members. The court reasoned that since a person's address appears in many public records, all open to public inspection, a home address is always a public fact. McNutt v. New Mexico State Tribune, 538 P.2d 804 (N.M.App. 1975).

As shall be noted in the section on the intrusion category of invasion of privacy, it does make a difference how information is obtained. In Smith v. Daily Mail Publishing Co., 443 U.S. 97 (1979), the Supreme Court said, "[I]f a newspaper lawfully obtains truthful information about a matter of public significance, then state officials may not constitutionally punish publication of the information, absent a need to further a state interest of the highest order." In the cases discussed so far, information was obtained openly.[51]

Not all records have provided a defense. Government's interest in prosecuting criminals through changing witnesses' names was cited as a countervailing interest preventing summary judgment on newsworthiness grounds. A press release from a racing association had given the plaintiffs' former identities. Anthony Ciulla had been convicted of fixing horse races and was allowed to participate in the federal witness protection program in exchange for testimony. Relocated and renamed, his wife Helen applied for a claiming license from the California Horse Racing Board. The defendant conducted an inquiry for the board, denied her application, and issued the press release. While noting that witness protection was a value that deserved weight, the court also urged the jury on remand to consider to what extent the plaintiffs had voluntarily exposed themselves to potential publicity. Capra v. Thoroughbred Racing Ass'n., 12 Med.L.Rptr. 2006, 787 F.2d 463 (9th Cir. 1986). The press release was not on its own a public record, and the defendant was a private entity working on behalf of a government agency. Are those facts alone sufficient to distinguish Capra from Cox?

An individual's interest in personal safety and the state's interest in conducting criminal investigations were considered sufficient to allow trial on a privacy suit brought by a witness to a murder who was identified by name. Times Mirror v. San Diego Superior Court, 15 Med.L.Rptr. 1129, 198 Cal.App.3d 1420, 244 Cal.Rptr. 556 (1988). The plaintiff, identified in the opinion only as Doe, found her roommate's body. The roommate had been raped, beaten, and strangled. Looking up, she saw a man, then fled the apartment. She provided a description to the police, who withheld her identity. The Los Angeles Times published a story identifying Doe. The Times claimed it had obtained her name from an "unknown person" at the coroner's office. Doe sued for publication of private facts and for infliction of emotional distress. The court said that Cox did not apply because there was a question of fact about the Times having gotten the name from the coroner's office. And while coroner's reports are public records, Doe was not the decedent, and the report on the murder was not made public until a month passed. Newsworthiness would not support a summary judgment for the newspaper because the value to the public in being informed of a witness's name must be balanced against the effect publication might have on the witness. A dissenting opinion urged that the majority erred by failing to apply a "public event" analysis to the case, an analysis that clearly would cover the use of Doe's

The action was also disallowed because the subject of the article was deceased, and privacy rights normally terminate at death under common law.

The court relied on Smith v. Daily Mail, which involved the naming of a juvenile murder suspect.

name. The majority seemed determined to find that no defense or privilege applied, at least at the pretrial stage.

The Passage of Time and Newsworthiness By Implication

Two additional lines of cases in private facts concern whether facts which occurred in the past and were of public interest or public record then will be considered public today if resurrected by the media, and whether one who is closely associated with another who is newsworthy will also be considered newsworthy. Overall, the courts appear to take the position that a person who was newsworthy or an event that was newsworthy will remain so over time. One typical situation involved the Iberville South's "Page From Our Past" column, which each week drew from its files of stories on local events. Twice in four years, the paper published stories more than twenty years old about the plaintiffs'—three brothers—cattle theft trial and subsequent convictions. Asserting that the story was no longer of public concern, they filed a private acts suit. Roshto v. Hebert, 9 Med.L.Rptr. 2417, 439 So.2d 428 (La. 1983). The court determined that controlling weight should be given to the fact that the stories were true and a matter of public record. It distinguished a case that had allowed an action by a rehabilitated criminal for a story that retold of his conviction for truck hijacking.[52]

Even mere allegations, when taken from public records, were sufficient to prevent liability when a newspaper published twenty-year-old charges based on FBI reports.[53] The existence of public records, of course, is not necessary to a finding of continued newsworthiness over time, as Sidis makes plain. For example, the Julius and Ethel Rosenberg espionage case retains its public character to this day. When Michael and Robert Meeropol, the natural children of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, brought a multiclaim suit based on the book, The Implosion Conspiracy, they lost on privacy, defamation, and copyright grounds. An appeals court upheld a trial court determination that the events remained of public interest. Meeropol v. Nizer, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 2269, 560 F.2d 1061 (2d Cir. 1977). Ironically, the brothers were never referred to in the books by their adoptive name, and their identities were known to only a handful of individuals. By suing, they attracted the publicity they had shunned.

Newsworthiness by proximity to an event or to another person has been less of a concern. In Campbell v. Seabury Press, 5 Med.L.Rptr. 2612, 614 F.2d 395 (5th Cir. 1980), a federal appeals court seemed to answer that question when it decided that private facts based on references to a former sister-in-law in a civil rights leader's biography were nonactionable. Citing Cox, the court extended the public interest or newsworthiness privilege to entirely private persons because of a "logical nexus * * * between the complaining individual and the matter of legitimate public interest." The complainant, who asserted that her virtue had been impugned, would pay for her brother-in-law's notoriety, and he, by inference, would have no private facts claim whatsoever.

In Gilbert v. Medical Economics, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2372, 665 F.2d 305 (10th Cir. 1981), the subject of an article entitled "Who Let This Doctor in the O.R.?" found no remedy in privacy law because accurate personal facts about the doctor again were closely related to his malpractice suit.

Flora Schreiber, a criminal justice professor at New York University, wrote The Shoemaker, which detailed the psychological makeup of Joseph Kallinger, who had committed a series of rapes and murders during a string of robberies in New Jersey and Pennsylvania. The book recounted the ordeal of several people held hostage, including the murder of one, in 1975. When the book appeared in 1983, a number of the survivors sued for publication of private facts, false light privacy, libel, and unjust enrichment. The key to resolving all the claims lay in the incident's continued newsworthiness or lack thereof.

ing the course of robberies of suburban homes. Kallinger murdered his victims on three occasions. In 1983, approximately eight years after Kallinger and his son had been apprehended, the defendant Simon & Schuster Publishing Inc. published a book entitled "The Shoemaker," written by the defendant Flora Rheta Schreiber, depicting the life and crimes of Joseph Kallinger. The book gave rise to this litigation.

The plaintiffs, Randi Romaine, Edwina Wiseman, Retta Romaine Welby, and Frank Welby, were victims of Kallinger, whose criminal acts against them resulted in the murder of a young woman, Maria Fasching. Plaintiffs sued the defendants Kallinger, Elizabeth Kallinger, his wife, Schreiber, Simon & Schuster, and Paul J. Giblin, claiming to have been legally injured by defamatory and offensively intrusive statements relating to those crimes contained in "The Shoemaker." Plaintiffs sought in separate counts the award of compensatory and punitive damages based respectively on libel and invasion of privacy by being cast in a false light; they also claimed that their privacy had been invaded through the unreasonable publication of private facts.

The trial court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment with respect to the defamation and privacy claims. It also granted defendants summary judgment with respect to the unjust enrichment claims. However, the court denied the motions for summary judgment with respect to claims based on the Criminal Injuries Compensation Act. The court also denied plaintiffs' cross-motion for summary judgment.

Plaintiffs filed a notice of appeal; no cross-appeals were filed by defendants. In an unpublished opinion, the Appellate Division affirmed the dismissal of the defamation and privacy claims substantially for the reasons expressed in the comprehensive opinion of Judge Cassidy, the trial judge. Plaintiffs then filed a petition for certification, which was granted by this Court. ____N.J. ____(1987).

The factual context of this litigation is important. Ms. Schreiber, the author of "The Shoemaker," is a professor at the City University of New York, John Jay College of Criminal Justice. Although she has no formal training as a psychologist, Ms. Schreiber has written extensively about psychological subjects, and has focused on the problem of child abuse in her work. She is the author of Sybil, a study of a woman who suffered from a multiple-personality disorder.

According to defendants, Professor Schreiber's work is an in-depth study of the psychological make-up of a killer. Specifically, the book explores the relationship between the abuse suffered by Kallinger as a child and the psychotic behavior that led to his criminal acts. "The Shoemaker" received a significant amount of critical praise and Schreiber was named "Author of the Year" by the American Society of Journalists and Authors in 1985 in recognition of her work.

The complaint focuses on a chapter of "The Shoemaker" called "The Hunting Knife." The chapter, which consists of twenty-one pages out of a total of 423, describes the murder of Maria Fasching on January 8, 1975, in Leonia, New Jersey. The chapter relates that Kallinger and his son broke into the home of Mr. and Mrs. DeWitt Romaine. Eight people, who were in the home, were held hostage by Kallinger and his son. Kallinger ordered several of them to remove their clothes, and tied them up. He committed acts of personal abuse and physical degradation on two of the women. While this was occurring, Maria Fasching, a friend of one of the victims, the plaintiff Randi Romaine, came into the house. She was also captured by Kallinger. He directed Ms. Fasching, a nurse, to perform an act of sexual mutilation on plaintiff Frank Welby, who was tied up and helpless. When she refused to do so, he killed her by slashing her throat several times. About one-half of the chapter is devoted to Kallinger's own recollections of the murder, obtained by Schreiber during interviews with him; those recollections are presented to indicate the extent that Kallinger's acts were the product of his mental illness. The balance of the chapter consists of the recreation of the murder, as derived from testimony offered at Kallinger's trial by the survivors of the incident.

[The court determined the chapter was not defamatory.]

Plaintiffs contend that the chapter "The Hunting Knife" publicizes matters pertaining to their private lives in a manner offensive to a reasonable person. They thus claim a cause of action based upon the invasion of privacy by the unreasonable publication of private facts. In making this claim, plaintiffs concede that the chapter is an accurate and truthful depiction of the events that occurred on January 8, 1975. However, they contend that their criminal victimization, personal degradation, and physical abuse at the hands of Kallinger occurred in private, and that disclosure of the details of these crimes eight years after their occurrence is highly offensive.

The invasion of privacy by unreasonable publication of private facts occurs when it is shown that "the matters revealed were actually private, that dissemination of such facts would be offensive to a reasonable person, and that there is no legitimate interest of the public in being apprised of the facts publicized." * * *

It is important to stress that this privacy tort permits recovery for truthful disclosures. For this reason the recognition of such a tort creates significant potential for conflict with the guarantees contained in the first amendment of the Constitution. * * * This constitutional dimension explains the stringency of the requirements that must be met in order successfully to establish this privacy-invasion cause of action.

The critical chapter describes the painful treatment, the humiliation, and abuse that the plaintiffs suffered at the hands of Kallinger. Such publicity is likely traumatic and profoundly disturbing for plaintiffs and would be highly offensive to a reasonable person because it exposes to the public eye the suffering and degradation that they were forced to endure. However, plaintiffs' appeal fails because the facts revealed are not private, and even if they were private, they are of legitimate concern to the public and so privileged under the "newsworthiness" exception to the "unreasonable publication of private facts" claim.

The determination as to whether published facts are actually private constitutes the first key element of this cause of action. If the facts are public information, even though they relate to matters of individual privacy, they cannot for these purposes be considered "private." The court must first determine then whether the published facts were in the public domain, and hence not private facts.

Public records that recount or disclose particular facts may serve to place such facts in the public arena and thus bar a claim for publication of private facts. While the term "public records" is not self-defining, we need not in this case determine the extent to which particular official governmental records place facts in the public domain. Here, the facts complained of were contained in nonconfidential official court records of the Kallinger trial. * * * The circumstances of this case fall squarely within the freedom to publish information contained in public court records sanctioned by Cox Broadcasting. The details and facts that plaintiffs claim invaded their privacy were made public by the testimony in court by plaintiffs and other witnesses. They were part of the court record in Kallinger's trial and were extensively reported on at the time of the trial.

Plaintiffs also contend that recovery should not be barred in this case because eight years passed between the crimes depicted in "The Shoemaker" and the publication of the book. This argument is unpersuasive. The Cox Broadcasting opinion does not suggest that the absolute privilege to publish matters contained in public records is limited if the events are not contemporaneous or recent. Moreover, courts after Cox Broadcasting have found a privilege to disseminate matters contained in public court records despite the passage of a significant period of time. * * *

This claim is related to the additional argument made by defendants that the information that was published in "The Shoemaker" was newsworthy and therefore its publication was privileged. If facts cannot otherwise be considered "private," then a determination of their "newsworthiness" is obviated. Restatement (Second) of Torts § 652D, Comment b. However, if the critical facts are private, publication of those facts would not constitute an actionable invasion of privacy if they are "newsworthy" and thus a matter of legitimate public concern.

The "newsworthiness" defense in privacy-invasion tort actions is available to bar recovery where the subject matter of the publication is one in which the public has a legitimate interest. * * * A publication is commonly understood to be "newsworthy" when it contains an "indefinable quality of information" that arouses the public's interest and attention." * * * In such cases it is for the court to determine whether a matter is of legitimate public interest. * * *

In addition, once a matter is found to be within the sphere of public interest, otherwise private facts that are related to the subject may also be considered "newsworthy," and therefore publishable. * * *

* * *

The events that occurred in the Romaine home on January 8, 1975, were newsworthy and matters of legitimate public concern. These events were the subject of widespread and intense publicity when they occurred. Extensive contemporaneous publicity of this sort is a strong indication that the subject is one that is clearly newsworthy. * * * Moreover, the facts surrounding the commission of a crime are subjects of legitimate public concern. * * * This concern extends to victims and other individuals who unwillingly become involved in the commission of a crime or its prosecution. * * *

The contention of plaintiffs that the publicized matter is stale or remote may suggest that the publicized information was not "newsworthy" or a matter of legitimate public concern, and therefore recovery ought not be barred. The news value and public interest in criminal events are not abated by the passage of time.

* * *

In sum, we conclude that the trial court properly dismissed plaintiffs' unreasonable publicity claim. The facts reported in "The Shoemaker" were in the public domain, newsworthy, and matters of legitimate public concern. Thus, their publication is entitled to protection.

For the reasons set forth in this opinion, we affirm the judgment below.

COMMENT

The plaintiffs sued not only the publisher but also the perpetrator, a somewhat unusual move apparently prompted by New Jersey's "Son of Sam" law, the Criminal Injuries Compensation Act, which is designed to prevent criminals from profiting from their wrongdoing by selling their stories.

The court noted in a separate section that the privacy claims were invalid in any event because the book relied upon interviews with Kallinger and transcripts from the trial. There was no evidence that any additional "prying" had occurred.

A similar analysis was applied in the case of the brother of a murderer who was written about extensively in the book Life for Death. Lee Dresbach sued after the story of his brother Wayne's murder of their parents appeared. The book contained details of the family's home life and of the dismal relationship between the brothers. The book was written by a former neighbor, Michael Mewshaw, with the cooperation of Wayne Dresbach. The plaintiff argued that the murders were no longer of public interest and that he wasn't either. The court disagreed. "The public has a legitimate interest in the facts about past crimes and their investigation and prosecution, as well as the possible motivating forces in the background of the criminal," the court said. His parents' unfavorable comparisons of him to his younger brother were part of what motivated Wayne Dresbach to murder his parents. Further, the court said that the story of Wayne's rehabilitation contributed a more contemporary newsworthy angle. Dresbach v. Doubleday, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2105, 518 F.Supp. 1285 (D.D.C. 1981). Lee Dresbach was allowed to continue his case on libel grounds only. Can the retelling of a famous (or infamous) crime ever be the object of a private facts claim?

The question that remains only partially answered is—what does it take today to outrage a community's sense of decency? Have our sensitivities toward personal privacy diminished? We do know what has outraged some communities and their judicial systems in the past. For example, a woman's disfigured face photographed without her consent while she was semiconscious,[54] a published photograph of an employee's mangled thigh,[55] a photograph of a woman with her skirt blown over her head as she entered a county fair "fun house,"[56] and a newspaper piece which contained the words, "Wanna hear a sexy telephone voice? Call * * * and ask for Louise."[57] In the latter case, the court compared the objectionable language of the newspaper with that commonly found on the walls of public lavatories.

Any iota of voluntariness would seem to invoke a newsworthiness or consent defense. A man simply unfortunate enough to have been having a drink at a bar when police raided for drugs could not recover for television footage of the raid that included his likeness.[58] And a plaintiff, a heroin addict, who had consented to an interview, was said to have constructively consented to use of her photograph.[59] Older cases follow the same lines.

A news report identifying a twelve-year-old mother, despite her objections, was protected. So was a news review ridiculing an inventor's invention, and a photograph of corpulent women exercising in a gymnasium. A group of young Americans who allowed themselves to be interviewed and photographed living in a communal cave in Crete had no privacy claim. Neither did a casino customer who got caught in a photograph which was later used to dress up an article on gambling and organized crime. The Boston "Strangler's" notoriety and the fact that he had consented to a film portrayal of his life, and had even offered technical advice to the filmmaker, left him without a privacy claim. A Pennsylvania court held that public figures have no exclusive right to their own biographies and could not claim an invasion of privacy when their life stories were published.[60]

Nathan Leopold was unable to protect his privacy from invasion by a book and motion picture, the fictionalized aspects of which were reasonably true to the record in the celebrated Leopold and Loeb murder case of many years before. Leopold had pleaded guilty, had served a life sentence, and his participation in the murder of Bobby Franks was a matter of public and historical interest, said an Illinois court, even though the plaintiff had since become a useful citizen.[61]

The last case illustrates the rule that information obtained in a public place will almost never be considered a private fact. When coverage of Ted Fry's death in a fire and of his rumored association with another woman resulted in Mrs. Fry's suing, the court said that all the facts about the fire occurred in public.[62] Plaintiffs who have alleged invasions of privacy because they could be seen leaving or cleaning portable toilets have lost because anyone could have seen them.[63]

Where can a line be drawn between legitimate news and the public's seemingly insatiable appetite for sensational intimacies? Should a line be drawn at all? And, if so, by whom? These questions must await further academic analysis, legislative determination, and case law. In the meantime, there will continue to be uneasiness here in permitting community norms to set the bounds of either one's innermost private life or of freedom of the press.

"SPATIAL" PRIVACY: THE OFFENSE OF INTRUSION

Intrusion upon one's solitude or seclusion is an invasion of privacy likely to occur while news is being gathered but may not result in a lawsuit until the news is published, although publication is not essential to the tort. Surveillance and trespass are forms of intrusion. The Restatement includes them both plus a third category.[64]

Intrusion may overlap with other categories of privacy. In the Penwell case, for example, where the plaintiff was drinking in a bar, he argued that he had a reasonable expectation of physical solitude.

As a practical matter, intrusion suits present little serious danger to the mass media. Few suits are filed. And, in any event, the rules governing intrusion are relatively clear-cut, so that the press can easily avoid suit in most situations. Successful suits are rare. The clarity of intrusion analysis seems derived in part from its closeness to the common law tort of trespass. At common law, a case for trespass may be made when a plaintiff can show that a defendant has entered into private property and to some extent interfered with the owner's rights of exclusive possession.[65] The key, however, is that the place or property must be a place the plaintiff normally has a right to exclude others from. The similarity to the reasonable expectation of seclusion in Fourth Amendment cases is obvious too. A person is entitled to an expectation of seclusion when it is reasonable under the circumstances to expect that others will not interfere. That the tort is referred to formally as intrusion on seclusion affirms the connection.

Intrusion is also closely related in some respects to nuisance law, especially when it comes to reporting by surveillance. The conduct of a journalist in obtaining information may be so beyond the pale that a court might punish the behavior. In such cases, offensive reporting techniques are objectionable in much the same way it is objectionable when a neighbor makes extremely loud noises[66] or starts up a hog farm.[67]

A clear case of intrusion occurred when a Life magazine reporter and photographer gained access to a "healer's" home by pretending to be the friends of a friend, then surreptitiously took pictures and relayed tape recordings to law enforcement officials waiting outside while the subject of their investigation examined one of them for breast cancer.

Since the district attorney's office and the state department of health were in on the ruse, although they were not totally dependent upon Life's evidence, it did seem that the magazine was acting as an agent of law enforcement.

The "healer," who specialized in clay, minerals, herbs, and gadgetry, was subsequently arrested and charged with practicing medicine without a license. He pleaded nolo contendere and was cited for a number of misdemeanors. The basis of a subsequent privacy suit was Life's illustrated article entitled "Crackdown on Quackery."

A federal district court awarded the plaintiff $1,000 for an invasion of his privacy, and Life appealed. The judgment was affirmed by a federal appeals court in an opinion that combined elements of both surveillance and trespass in its analysis.

DIETEMANN v. TIME, INC.

1 MED.L.RPTR. 2417, 449 F.2D 245 (9TH CIR. 1971).

HUFSTEDLER, Circuit Judge:

* * *

In jurisdictions other than California in which a common law tort for invasion of privacy is recognized, it has been consistently held that surreptitious electronic recording of a plaintiff's conversation causing him emotional distress is actionable. Despite some variations in the description and the labels applied to the tort, there is agreement that publication is not a necessary element of the tort, that the existence of a technical trespass is immaterial, and that proof of special damages is not required.

Although the issue has not been squarely decided in California, we have little difficulty in concluding that clandestine photography of the plaintiff in his den and the recordation and transmission of his conversation without his consent resulting in his emotional distress warrants recovery for invasion of privacy in California. * * *

Concurrently, with the development of privacy law, California had decided a series of cases according plaintiffs relief from unreasonable penetrations of their mental tranquility based upon the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. [Citations omitted.] Although these cases are not direct authority in the privacy area, they are indicative of the trend of California law to protect interests analogous to those asserted by plaintiff in this case.

We are convinced that California will "approve the extension of the tort of invasion of privacy to instances of intrusion, whether by physical trespass or not, into spheres from which an ordinary man in plaintiff's position could reasonably expect that the particular defendant should be excluded." (Pearson v. Dodd, 410 F.2d at 704.)

Plaintiff's den was a sphere from which he could reasonably expect to exclude eavesdropping newsmen. He invited two of defendant's employees to the den. One who invites another to his home or office takes a risk that the visitor may not be what he seems, and that the visitor may repeat all he hears and observes when he leaves. But he does not and should not be required to take the risk that what is heard and seen will be transmitted by photograph or recording, or in our modern world, in full living color and hi-fi to the public at large or to any segment of it that the visitor may select. * * *

The defendant claims that the First Amendment immunizes it from liability for invading plaintiff's den with a hidden camera and its concealed electronic instruments because its employees were gathering news and its instrumentalities "are indispensable tools of investigative reporting." We agree that newsgathering is an integral part of news dissemination. We strongly disagree, however, that the hidden mechanical contrivances are "indispensable tools" of newsgathering. Investigative reporting is an ancient art; its successful practice long antecedes the invention of miniature cameras and electronic devices. The First Amendment has never been construed to accord newsmen immunity from torts or crimes committed during the course of newsgathering. [Emphasis added.] The First Amendment is not a license to trespass, to steal, or to intrude by electronic means into the precincts of another's home or office. It does not become such a license simply because the person subjected to the intrusion is reasonably suspected of committing a crime.

Defendant relies upon the line of cases commencing with New York Times Co. v. Sullivan and extending through Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, Inc. to sustain its contentions that (1) publication of news, however tortiously gathered, insulates defendant from liability for the antecedent tort, and (2) even if it is not thus shielded from liability, those cases prevent consideration of publication as an element in computing damages. * * *

Privilege concepts developed in defamation cases and to some extent in privacy actions in which publication is an essential component are not relevant in determining liability for intrusive conduct antedating publication. Nothing in New York Times or its progeny suggests anything to the contrary. Indeed, the Court strongly indicates that there is no First Amendment interest in protecting news media from calculated misdeeds. (E.g., Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. at 389–390 and 384 n. 9)

No interest protected by the First Amendment is adversely affected by permitting damages for intrusion to be enhanced by the fact of later publication of the information that the publisher improperly acquired. Assessing damages for the additional emotional distress suffered by a plaintiff when the wrongfully acquired data are purveyed to the multitude chills intrusive acts. It does not chill freedom of expression guaranteed by the First Amendment. A rule forbidding the use of publication as an ingredient of damages would deny to the injured plaintiff recovery for real harm done to him without any countervailing benefit to the legitimate interest of the public in being informed. The same rule would encourage conduct by news media that grossly offends ordinary men.

The judgment is affirmed.

COMMENT

Dietemann illustrates that in privacy intrusion actions a First Amendment defense is very weak. The court did not consider the news value of the story. Why? The newsworthiness of a story has just not balanced well against the offense of intruding upon someone's seclusion. Most courts have followed Dietemann's lead. For example, in Anderson v. WROC-TV, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1987, 441 N.Y.S.2d 220 (1981), the fact that the reporter entered a private home at the invitation of a humane society officer executing a search warrant provided no defense to intrusion, although it would seem to support a newsworthiness defense if the suit was based on disclosure of private facts. Similarly, news value did not immunize reporters charged with trespass after they followed a group of protesters onto a nuclear power plant construction site after the protesters broke through a fence.[68]

Only one court has determined that a trespass onto private property was justified on First Amendment grounds, at least when there is no proof that the media knew it was trespassing. The judge in the case considered the distinction between newsgathering and news publication questionable in an era of live mini-cam television coverage, the type of coverage at issue in the case.[69] The decision, by a trial court, has no authority as precedent and has apparently not been adopted by any appeals courts.

Another case that resulted in a full defense for the press involved the photographing of dead cattle on plaintiff's farm. Reporters accompanied the county sheriff onto the farm. The sheriff had been on the farm several times with the owner's consent as part of an ongoing investigation.[70] The consent was apparently extended to the press.

An action for a trespass form of invasion of privacy and for wrongful intentional infliction of emotional distress was brought against Florida news media by a mother whose daughter died in a fire in her home. So badly was she burned that, after removal of the body, a silhouette of her body remained on a bedroom floor. The mother learned of the tragedy by reading a news story and seeing a picture of the silhouette in the Florida Times-Union.

Lower courts refused to grant summary judgment to the newspaper's publisher on the trespass count. On appeal the Florida Supreme Court held that where there was an implied consent by custom and usage authorizing a news photographer to accompany police and fire marshals into a home, there was no trespass. In fact a fire marshal had requested that the photographer take the "silhouette" picture for his official file.

Television networks, newspapers, wire services, and professional organizations had provided the court with affidavits attesting to the common practice of reporters accompanying officials into homes where there has been crime or tragedy. The court agreed that "as a matter of law an entry, that may otherwise be an actionable trespass, becomes lawful and nonactionable when it is done under common usage, custom and practice."

The court's opinion can be read to imply that had the plaintiff been present and objected to the photographer's entry, she would have had a stronger case. Florida Publishing Co. v. Fletcher, 340 So.2d 914 (Fla. 1976), cert. den. 431 U.S. 930 (1977).[71]

Reporters and photographers who entered "Son of Sam's" apartment after his arrest on suspicion of murder were not guilty of criminal trespass, said a New York city court. Although police had earlier entered the apartment with a warrant, they had no "possessory interest." Only the defendant himself, or the apartment owner, could have withheld consent from the newsmen. Police, however, could have excluded persons from the premises while a lawful criminal search was being conducted. People v. Berliner, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1942 (N.Y.City Ct. 1978).

Deception as occurred with the surveillance in Dietemann seems likely to result in some kind of liability. When a television reporter pretended to be an alcoholic to gain entry to an alcohol treatment center, privacy claims were disallowed because, under Missouri law, corporate plaintiffs cannot sue for invasion of privacy. The suit was allowed to continue on common law fraud grounds, however. Fraud rules require that the plaintiff be deceived into having taken some action, normally to plaintiff's detriment. The hospital in which the treatment center was located also claimed a prima facie tort violation, which was not allowed because fraud is a more specific cause of action.[72]

Seldom has intrusion been as clear-cut as in Dietemann when Life photographed and "bugged" the about-to-be-convicted quack doctor. But what if the plaintiff is a very public person, a celebrity, or a government official suspected of corruption? And what if that person constantly appears in public places? Surely a First Amendment-based defense would be considered. Not if the defendant's behavior goes from beyond outer boundaries to almost beyond belief.

The first part of the question was addressed by federal courts in New York in an incredible case involving a peripatetic photographer, said to be America's only paparazzo, and Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis. Ronald Galella, a free-lancer, made a modest living photographing celebrities. But his specialty was Mrs. Onassis. His strategy was aggressive pursuit, described by Jackie as a continual stalking of her, popping up everywhere while emitting a curious "grunting" sound which, she said, terrified her.

Galella argued that his subject was simply a camera-shy and uncooperative public person. When she asked the Secret Service and other police officers to intervene on her behalf, the photographer, claiming that he had been roughed up, brought a $1.3 million damage suit and a plea for an injunction against interference with his making a living. Mrs. Onassis then filed a counterclaim for $1.5 million in compensatory and punitive damages and for injunctive relief. The United States joined her to seek injunctive relief against Galella's interference with the activities of Secret Service agents assigned to protect the former first lady and her children.

The two cases were joined, and a federal district court held that the photographer's antics were not protected by the First Amendment but constituted actionable assault, battery, and harassment, violation of the civil rights statute, and tortious infliction of emotional distress. Both Mrs. Onassis and the government were granted injunctive relief in a ruling in which the court expressed enormous distaste for Galella and rejected his claim along with what it called his perjured testimony. A portion of the ruling follows.

GALELLA v. ONASSIS

353 F.SUPP. 196 (S.D.N.Y. 1972).

COOPER, District Judge:

* * * [T]wenty further episodes are summarized in our supplemental findings of fact. These include instances where the children were caused to bang into glass doors, school parents were bumped, passage was blocked, flashbulbs affected vision, telephoto lenses were used to spy, the children were imperilled in the water, a funeral was disturbed, plaintiff pursued defendant into the lobby of a friend's apartment building, plaintiff trailed defendant through the City hour after hour, plaintiff chased defendant by automobile, plaintiff and his assistants surrounded defendant and orbited while shouting, plaintiff snooped into purchases of stockings and shoes, flashbulbs were suddenly fired on lonely black nights—all accompanied by Galella jumping, shouting and acting wildly. Many of these instances were repeated time after time; all preceded our restraining orders.

He was like a shadow: everywhere she went he followed her and engaged in offensive conduct; nothing was sacred to him whether defendant went to church, funeral services, theatre, school, restaurant, or board a yacht in a foreign land. While plaintiff denied so deporting himself, his admissions clearly spell out his harassment of her and her children.

* * *

Mrs. Onassis' severe emotional distress is evident and reasonable.

When Galella rushed her limousine on September 21, 1969, she was terrified. Galella's pursuit of her and the children at the horse show in Gladstone, New Jersey, caused her concern and anxiety for fear that his activities would frighten the horse and thereby endanger her children. Galella's sudden appearance behind bursting flash bulbs at 2 o'clock in the morning at Oliver Smith's house in Brooklyn Heights stunned and startled her. When Galella crashed about in the tunnel beneath Lincoln Center and tried to push his way through a revolving door with Mrs. Onassis and her children she was frightened that someone would be injured in the door. Galella's antics in the theatre at 40 Carats so upset Mrs. Onassis that she covered her face with Playbill. When Galella cruised around Mrs. Onassis in a power boat as she was swimming off Ischia, he was so close that she was afraid she would be cut by the propeller. Galella's dogging of Mrs. Onassis' footsteps throughout her shopping trip in Capri left her terrified and upset. Galella's taxicab chase with Joyce Smith on October 7, 1971 left Mrs. Onassis a "wreck."

When Galella suddenly jumped from behind the wall in Central Park, frightening John and causing him to lose control of his bicycle, Mrs. Onassis described her state of mind as having been "terrorized." The Santa Claus pursuit in and around the Collegiate School in December 1970 left Mrs. Onassis extremely upset. Galella's outrageous pursuit of Mrs. Onassis on the night of Two Gentlemen of Verona terrified her and left her in an "anguished," "humiliated" and "terribly upset" state. Numerous times, and at dangerous speeds, he has followed cars in which the children were passengers, violating the rules of the road, and the Secret Service agents assigned to protect the children have frequently expressed concern for the safety of their principals as a result of Galella's activities.

Additionally, Mrs. Onassis and her children are people who have a very special fear of startling movements, violent activity, crowds and other hostile behavior. It is clear that the assassinations of the first husband of Mrs. Onassis and of her brother-in-law (Senator Robert F. Kennedy) are matters of common knowledge to virtually every citizen. These matters were certainly known to Galella who "specializes" in the affairs of Mrs. Onassis and who chronicled her brother-in-law's funeral. These events make Mrs. Onassis and her children particularly susceptible to Galella's erratic behavior and make his acts all the more outrageous and utterly devoid of any sensitivity whatever for his subjects.

* * *

The proposition that the First Amendment gives the press wide liberty to engage in any sort of conduct, no matter how offensive, in gathering news has been flatly rejected.

* * *

We conclude that the First Amendment does not license Galella to trespass inside private buildings, such as the children's schools, lobbies of friends' apartment buildings and restaurants. Nor does that Amendment command that Galella be permitted to romance maids, bribe employees and maintain surveillance in order to monitor defendant's leaving, entering and living inside her own home.

* * *

Invasion of Privacy. Plaintiff's endless snooping constitutes tortious invasion of privacy.

* * *

First let us reconsider plaintiff's close-shadowing of defendant. Continuously he has had her under surveillance to the point where he is notified of her every movement. He waits outside her residence at all hours. * * * His surveillance is so overwhelmingly pervasive that he has said he has not married because he has been unable to "get a girl who would be willing to go looking for Mrs. Onassis at odd hours."

* * * He has intruded into her children's schools, hidden in bushes and behind coat racks in restaurants, sneaked into beauty salons, bribed doormen, hatcheck girls, chauffeurs, fishermen in Greece, hairdressers and schoolboys, and romanced employees. In short, Galella has insinuated himself into the very fabric of Mrs. Onassis' life and the challenge to this Court is to fashion the tool to get him out.

* * *

The surveillance, close-shadowing and monitoring were clearly "overzealous" and therefore actionable. Moreover, Galella's corruption of doormen, romancing of the personal maid, deceptive intrusions into children's schools, and return visits to restaurants and stores to inquire about purchases were all exclusively for the "purpose of gathering information of a private and confidential nature" * * *. The dictum in Roberson v. Rochester Folding-Box Co., * * * 64 N.E. 442 (1902), does not support the conclusion that invasion of privacy is not actionable under New York law. * * * Roberson involved the commercial appropriation of a likeness, which, Dean Prosser teaches has "almost nothing in common" with intrusion, the gravamen of the case at bar.

* * *

Since the Roberson dictum was enunciated, freedom from extensive shadowing and observation has come to be protected in most other jurisdictions.

* * *

The essence of the privacy interest includes a general "right to be left alone," and to define one's circle of intimacy; to shield intimate and personal characteristics and activities from public gaze; to have moments of freedom from the unremitted assault of the world and unfettered will of others in order to achieve some measure of tranquility for contemplation or other purposes, without which life loses its sweetness. The rationale extends to protect against unreasonably intrusive behavior which attempts or succeeds in gathering information.

COMMENT

Galella and his agents were enjoined by the district court from approaching within 300 feet of the Onassis and Kennedy homes and the schools attended by the children; they were also required to remain 225 feet from the children and 150 feet from Mrs. Onassis at all other locations. Galella was also prohibited from putting the family under surveillance or trying to communicate with them.

The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit essentially upheld the lower court decision. The appeals court did something else. It sharply scaled down the distances Galella was to keep from Mrs. Onassis and her children. It reduced from 150 to 25 feet the distance the photographer must put between himself and Mrs. Onassis; from 225 to 30 feet the distance he must stay from Caroline and John; and it lifted the restriction on Mrs. Onassis's Fifth Avenue home. Galella v. Onassis, 487 F.2d 986 (2d Cir. 1973).

The court of appeals ruling essentially put Galella back in business. But it wasn't until 1982 that the original New York federal district court, more impatient with Galella than ever, held that the photographer's flagrant, deliberate, and persistent violations of federal court orders restricting coverage of Jacqueline Onassis and her children constituted a contempt of court. He had violated the courts' orders on distance-from-subject at least twelve times. Galella v. Onassis, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1321, 533 F.Supp. 1076 (S.D.N.Y. 1982).

Clearly, Galella's behavior was more akin to a nuisance, even harassment, than to an intrusion. The positions of the various courts uphold the notion that we carry to some extent a zone of privacy wherever we go. While that "zone" may not be a legal construct, it is a practical one. Just try conducting an interview with a source at nose-to-nose closeness.

More typically, an intrusion involves places, not people. Just as in private facts cases, a plaintiff will not prevail when reporters or photographers only observed what anyone could have seen. For example, plaintiffs who objected to pictures of their home could not maintain an intrusion action.[73] Anybody could have taken the same pictures from the public street. Filming the interior of a pharmacy using telephoto lenses was not considered an intrusion when a television station was preparing a story on Medicaid fraud.[74]

Implicit in such cases is the notion that information readily seen is to some extent newsworthy, or at least eligible for news uses. A good general rule for those who would avoid publicity is not to conduct one's affairs where anybody can see. Search and seizure law's plain view doctrine applies—but by another name—in intrusion cases. Will photos taken from outer space be considered as defensible under a plain view rationale? See Lipschutz, Mediasat and the Tort of Invasion of Privacy, 65 Journalism Quarterly 507 (1988). Whether or not to report on or photograph what occurs in public places has been left primarily to the field of ethics, not law. Coleman, Private Lives, Public Places: Street Photography Ethics, 2 J. of Mass Media Ethics (Spring/Summer 1987), 60.

Newsworthiness can be a prodigious defense. In spite of the fact that Wayne Williams's parents were practically prisoners in their own home and reporters themselves found the stakeout "gross" and "repellent," close coverage of the murder suspect was not enough to support a privacy claim.[75] Williams was convicted of the murders of two of twenty-eight young blacks slain in Atlanta.

On the other side of the law, a policeman had no privacy claim after being filmed by a television camera through a two-way mirror while investigating a massage parlor. Imagine the policeman's consternation when a door opened and someone suddenly cried, "Channel 7 News," and the camera crew exited filming the scene before them. After making suggestive remarks and physical advances to a "lingerie" model and after she had responded with "sufficient physical contact," the officer arrested her for solicitation.[76] His being a public official served to distinguish this case from Dietemann.

Less dramatic forms of news gathering, especially those involving mundane events, are normally protected by their newsworthiness. A District of Columbia district court rejected a claim against the Washington Post for reporting that an undercover police officer had participated in a narcotics therapy program. But it did permit an embarrassing private facts action against another federal officer who had made the information about his colleague-patient available in violation of federal law and the confidentiality of the doctor-patient relationship.[77]

A federal district court dismissed a privacy claim brought by undercover narcotic agents who had been photographed entering a courthouse, but permitted an award of damages for "emotional distress" brought about by their being identified. That award was reversed by the Sixth Circuit which found the publication insufficiently outrageous—"so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community."[78]

A recent Supreme Court case on another issue allowed a community to prevent intense but orderly and peaceful picketing directed at a specific individual from in front of that individual's house.[79] Although decided on time, place, and manner grounds, Justice O'Connor's opinion for the Court noted that, "[A] special benefit of the privacy all citizens enjoy within their own walls, which the State may legislate to protect, is an ability to avoid intrusions." The Court referred repeatedly to privacy interests, although the opinion appears to consider the picketing at issue more a form of nuisance or harassment than an invasion of privacy—like having a pig farm next door. In dissent, Justice Stevens referred to a case that involved an especially noisy sound truck in a residential neighborhood—Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77 (1949)—to compare the picketing to a nuisance. Will Frisby influence intrusion analysis?

In one of the strangest cases alleging intrusion, plaintiff claimed that repeated mailings from the Columbia Record Club constituted a privacy violation. The court agreed that a privacy interest extends to one's mailbox but could not explain how such a right would be effectuated. In any event, the court said, only unreasonable intrusions are triable and receiving junk mail simply cannot rise to the level of causing distress to a reasonable person.[80]

Not all cases have resulted in victory for media defendants. CBS News was less fortunate when one of its reporters and a camera crew "with cameras rolling" entered a posh French restaurant, Le Mistral, as a follow-up to a New York City Health Service Administration press release alleging health code violations at several city restaurants. Le Mistral sued for defamation and trespass following a WCBS-TV news report which included film clips of the restaurant's staff attempting to eject the CBS crew.

The trial court judge dismissed the defamation suit on "fair comment" grounds but granted a trial on the trespass count since, he said, "the right to publish does not include the right to break and enter upon and trespass upon the property of these plaintiffs." A year later a jury awarded Le Mistral $250,000 in punitive and $1,200 in compensatory damages for trespass. On CBS's motion, the trial court upheld the trespass verdict but set aside the damage awards. "Patronizing a restaurant," said the court, "does not carry with it an obligation to appear on television."

In March 1978 an appeals court reinstated the compensatory damages and directed a new trial solely on the issue of punitive damages. Punitive or exemplary damages require a showing of common law malice (evil or wrongful motive). CBS, the court said, was entitled to explain its motive. A dissenting judge thought CBS perhaps overaggressive, but not malicious. Le Mistral, Inc. v. CBS, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1913, 402 N.Y.S.2d 815 (N.Y.Sup.Ct., App.Div. 1978).

In Stessman v. Black Hawk Broadcasting Co., 14 Med.L.Rptr. 2073, 416 N.W.2d 685 (Iowa 1987), a lower court determination that defendant was entitled to dismissal because plaintiff was seated in a restaurant for anyone to see was reversed. The Iowa Supreme Court thought she was entitled to try convincing a jury that there was an expectation of seclusion in the restaurant. The parties disputed whether plaintiff had been in a private room.

A more dramatic form of trespass referred to earlier—that is, where the plaintiff is a public official suspected of corruption—arose in a case involving columnist Drew Pearson and Senator Thomas Dodd. A number of significant questions came into focus in the case.

What is the journalist's liability when he or she receives information "lifted" from the files of a public official? Is receiving information taken without authorization from government files the equivalent of receiving stolen property? In short, how far can the right to gather news be extended?

In the Pentagon Papers case, Justices White and Stewart underlined the power of Congress to enact specific criminal laws to protect government property. Justice Marshall also recognized the power of Congress to make criminal the receipt or purchase of certain classifications of official documents. Chief Justice Burger and Justice Blackmun agreed with White that penal sanctions were an appropriate way of protecting government secrets.

In the Dodd case, four former employees removed documents from the senator's office, gave photostats to Drew Pearson and his associate Jack Anderson, then returned the originals to the files. Stories appeared based on the documents, and Dodd sued for libel. A United States district court, invoking the New York Times rule, disallowed the libel action.

Dodd's lawyers came back with an invasion of privacy plea and an inventive argument based on the common law tort of trover and conversion—"an unauthorized assumption and exercise of the right of ownership over goods or personal chattels belonging to another, to the alteration of their condition or the exclusion of an owner's rights."

Because of the public interest inherent in the documents, the privacy claim was rejected; but the court granted partial summary judgment to Senator Dodd on the theory of conversion. Dodd v. Pearson, 279 F.Supp. 101 (D.D.C. 1968), aff'd in part and rev'd in part, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1809, 410 F.2d 701 (D.C. Cir. 1969), cert. den. 395 U.S. 947 (1969).

80. Bennett v. CBS, 13 Med.L.Rptr. 1237, 798 F.2d 1413 (6th Cir. 1986).

The court said:

> It is well settled, however, that a person who receives and uses the property of another that has been wrongfully obtained, knowing that it was so obtained, is likewise guilty of conversion and liable for damages. * * *
>
> It follows hence that the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages in this case, but only on the theory of a conversion and not on the theory of a violation of a right of privacy. The distinction is not purely theoretical, as a more liberal, flexible and broad measure of damages may perhaps be applicable to actions for invasion of privacy, than govern actions for conversion. * * *

The district court's extension of the tort of conversion to apply to information and ideas rather than to taking possession of physical property was criticized on the ground that the court made a publisher's liability hinge on whether or not the publisher knew the material was wrongfully obtained.[81] But scienter, or knowledge of the offense, has never been considered a requirement for imposing liability for conversion at common law. It is enough to take possession of the property of another; wrongful behavior might add to damages, not prove the cause of action.

The District of Columbia Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the district court on the privacy claim and reversed on conversion. The court emphasized that Pearson could not be held liable for intrusion committed by others. On the conversion claim Judge J. Skelly Wright, writing for the court, reasoned: "The most significant feature of conversion is the measure of damages, which is the value of the goods converted." Since the documents in Dodd's files were photocopied and the originals returned, the court stated that Dodd was therefore not deprived of his files: "Insofar as the documents' value to appellee resided in their usefulness as records of the business of his office, appellee was clearly not substantially deprived of his use of them." But the court then acknowledged that "documents often have value above and beyond that springing from their physical possession." On the conversion point Judge Wright stated:

> Appellee [Dodd] complains, not of the misappropriation of property bought or created by him, but of the exposure of information either (1) injurious to his reputation or (2) revelatory of matters which he believes he has a right to keep to himself. Injuries of this type are redressed at law by suit for libel and invasion of privacy respectively, where defendants' liability for those torts can be established under the limitations created by common law and by the Constitution.
> Because no conversion of the physical contents of appellee's files took place, and because the information copied from the documents in those files has not been shown to be property subject to protection by suit for conversion, the District Court's ruling that appellants are guilty of conversion must be reversed.

Judge Wright's opinion clearly closes the opening wedge of media liability in a Dodd-type situation. But the court's emphasis on the money value of the documents themselves rather than on the money value of the information contained in them seems less persuasive more than twenty years later as we hurtle into the "information age."

The court is on much stronger ground basing its arguments on the First Amendment and public interest. Since Pearson had not himself committed an intrusion and the information was of public interest, a First Amendment-based defense was sufficient. It would necessarily follow that active participation in intrusion or commissioning of others to commit an intrusion would prevent the application of a First Amendment defense. The public interest or newsworthiness defense only applies when considering the content after publication in any event. Wrongdoing in reporting is clearly separable from publication.

The issue of conversion was raised in another case involving Drew Pearson after he had obtained copies of personal letters from the plaintiff's files. Here the court preferred to ground its ruling on the firmer base of prior restraint. Writing for the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, then Circuit Court Judge Warren Burger said:

> Upon a proper showing the wide sweep of the First Amendment might conceivably yield to an invasion of privacy and deprivation of rights of property in private manuscripts. But that is not this case; here there is no clear showing as to ownership of the alleged private papers or of an unlawful taking and no showing that Appellees had any part in the removal of these papers or copies from the offices of Appellants or any act other than receiving them from a person with a colorable claim to possession. Liberty Lobby, Inc. v. Pearson, 390 F.2d 489 (D.C.Cir. 1967).

Dodd has generally been followed. And its rule that the journalist must be an active participant in or instigator of intrusion is easy to apply, both for judges and journalists.

There was no intrusion, said a Maryland appeals court, when newspaper reporters received the academic files of University of Maryland basketball players from an unnamed source. The press itself had not sought out, inspected, or solicited the files. Bilney v. Evening Star Newspaper Co., 4 Med.L.Rptr. 1924, 406 A.2d 652 (Md. 1979).

Exceeding Consent by Recording

Is a reporter liable to wiretap charges if telephone interviews with sources are recorded without consent? More and more states bar nonconsensual (one-party consent) recording either of telephone conversations or of individuals in person.[82]

Illinois was the first state to do so, but only in Florida has such a law been upheld against a press challenge. There a reporter's tape recording of a caller who was unaware that the conversation was being recorded constituted an illegal wire intercept under Florida's Security of Communication Act, even though the reporter was using the recording only to help her write a news story.[83] The constitutionality of Florida's law requiring that all parties to an interception give prior consent was affirmed by the Florida Supreme Court in Shevin v. Sunbeam Television, 351 So.2d 723 (Fla. 1977). The United States Supreme Court declined review. A number of state courts, however, have construed their statutes so as to permit one-party participant recording of telephone conversations.[84]

Journalists have not appreciated finding themselves at the other end of the tape recorder. In 1978 a D.C. Circuit Court panel held that the First Amendment was not violated by law enforcement officials' good faith inspection of the toll-call records of reporters released by the telephone company without prior notice. Any First Amendment newsgathering right, said the court, is subject to those general and incidental burdens that arise from good faith enforcement of valid civil and criminal laws. Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press v. AT & T, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 1177, 593 F.2d 1030 (D.C.Cir. 1978), cert.den. 440 U.S. 949 (1979).

Federal court decisions have interpreted 18 U.S.C.A. § 2510 of Title III of the Omnibus Crime Control Act of 1968 (the Federal Wiretap Statute) to mean that if one party to a conversation records it, there is no illegal intercept. United States v. Turk, 526 F.2d 654 (5th Cir. 1976). See also, Boddie v. ABC, 10 Med.L.Rptr. 1923, 731 F.2d 333, (6th Cir. 1984), and the Electronic Communications Privacy Act of 1986.

The FCC, in its supervisory capacity over broadcasting, prohibits the monitoring and divulging of nonpublic radio broadcasts such as police radios, a hallmark of most newsrooms, but it has not enforced the rule. It has admonished broadcasters to respect the rule and has pointed out the danger of attracting crowds to scenes of crime and disaster.[85]

The FCC also prohibits the private use of radio devices to monitor conversations without the consent of all parties (13 Fed.Reg. 3397, 1966);[86] and it requires broadcasters to give advance warning if a recorded telephone conversation is intended for broadcast.[87] This has superseded the earlier "beep-tone" requirement.

Unannounced recording for broadcast purposes is not permitted, but the federal agency has made notable exceptions for reporters investigating crime.

Wiretapping and bugging by the media are illegal. Eavesdropping or recording conversations that are within hearing distance in public or quasi-public places is legal for both print and broadcast reporters. A Kentucky court had an opportunity in 1980 to address this question. An indicted drug dealer had given two reporters the impression that a lawyer had agreed to "fix" her case for $10,000. The reporters agreed to provide money to the suspect, if necessary, and asked her to meet with the lawyer in his office and record their conversation with a concealed recording device. When the slightly suspicious lawyer asked her if she was recording, she denied it, and a conversation ensued in which it was clear that the lawyer was not breaking the law or clearly violating his professional code. Nevertheless, part of the recorded conversation was published by the newspaper, and the attorney brought suit. His privacy claims of intrusion by trespass and false light were rejected by the court, as were libel claims. The intrusion portions of the ruling follow.

McCALL v. COURIER-JOURNAL

6 MED.L.RPTR. 1112 (KY.APP. 1980).

HOWERTON, Judge:

* * *

McCall is an attorney. He counseled with Kristie Frazier concerning two criminal charges. Frazier began spreading insinuations that she could buy her way out of her trouble. The appellees, Krantz and Van Howe, reporters for The Louisville Times, met with Frazier. In Frazier's words, McCall told her that "for $10,000.00 he would guarantee me that I'd walk in, but I would turn around and walk back out with him."

Krantz and Van Howe decided to investigate the possibility of bribery in the judiciary and met with Frazier again. They furnished her with a tape recorder and asked her to return to McCall's office. They also instructed her as to what questions to ask. They agreed to provide the $10,000.00 for her, if the dismissal of the criminal charges could be fixed.

On March 10, 1976, Frazier returned to McCall's office with the recorder. She asked the prearranged questions. The attorney told her there would be no "fix" and then inquired as to whether she had a recording device on her person. After Frazier's denial, McCall then stated that if he was able to keep Frazier out of jail, his fee would be $10,000.00, but if not, $9,000.00 would be returned to her. Although McCall's conduct was questionable in relation to the professional code, there was no evidence of bribery in the judicial system. Nevertheless, on March 17, 1976, The Louisville Times published and circulated a news article based on these events. On August 19, 1976, the newspaper carried an account of the lawsuit which resulted.

* * *

The first tort theory argued is labeled by McCall as invasion of privacy—intrusion/trespass. The appellees claim the nonexistence of this tort, stating that McCall created a hybrid cause of action. Prosser labels the tort "intrusion," which consists of "intrusion upon the plaintiff's physical solitude or seclusion, as by invading his home or other quarters * * *." W. Prosser, Torts § 117, at 807 (4th ed. 1971). Prosser extends the tort to include eavesdropping upon private conversations through wiretaps or microphones. Necessary elements of the tort include an intrusion in the nature of prying which is offensive or objectionable to a reasonable man. Also, the thing into which there is an intrusion must be private. Id. at 808.

In this case, nothing was learned about McCall which was private or personal. The conversation dealt with Frazier and her legal problems and with how McCall proposed to resolve them. McCall spoke to her at his own risk, and Frazier was free to reveal the conversation to anyone. It is well settled that the attorney-client privilege "is not personal to the attorney but for the protection of the client." * * *

As to the allegation of trespass, we must conclude that neither the conduct of Frazier nor that of the newspaper or its reporters was sufficient under this theory. 75 Am.Jr.2d, Trespass, § 14, states:

> The fact that a professional man, merchant, or other person opens an office to transact business with and for the public is a tacit invitation to all persons having business with him, and a permission for such persons to enter, unless forbidden. * * *

Thus, Frazier cannot be considered a trespasser. When McCall suspected a recorder on her person, he should have asked her to depart. By continuing the conversation, McCall consented to her presence and continued to discuss legal services for a fee. McCall argued that even if Frazier is considered an invitee, the newspaper and its reporters are trespassers. * * * However, since Frazier was not a trespasser, this argument must fail.

* * *

Undoubtedly, Mr. McCall's professional reputation has been damaged, but the judgment of the Jefferson Council must be affirmed.

All concur.

COMMENT

It is important to note that the lower court in McCall distinguished Dietemann on grounds that no fraud or deception was involved in gaining access to the lawyer's office. As a client, the indicted drug dealer suspect was neither a trespasser nor an intruder. How about the reporters? But were the reporters in Dietemann also clients who, at least by implication, had been invited into the "healer's" laboratory? Dietemann may be an unusual case, but it does establish one-party (consensual) recording or filming in newsgathering as the basis for a tort.

A year later the Kentucky Supreme Court reinstated the lawyer's libel and false light invasion of privacy suits while, at the same time, declining to discuss the intrusion claim. The court seemed to be saying that publication wrongs, i.e., libel and false light privacy violations, were more deserving of a jury's attention than the newsgathering wrong of intrusion. McCall v. Courier-Journal, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2118, 623 S.W.2d 882 (Ky. 1981).

The two parties later reached a settlement, and McCall brought a libel suit against the newspaper for its report of the settlement. That suit was dismissed by a circuit court, and McCall appealed again seven years after the original publication.

"IMPLICATIVE" PRIVACY: FALSE LIGHT INVASIONS FROM HILL TO HUSTLER

Invasion of privacy by portrayal in a false light is a legal hybrid. Under the common law, damage awards in false light cases were based upon false statements of facts, as in libel, but the false statements were generally expected to be nondefamatory. Hence the privacy rather than libel approach.

When Prosser attempted to outline false light privacy in his famous article delineating the four branches of common law privacy, he was forced to proceed by examples. No definition other than the phrase "publicity that places the plaintiff in a false light in the public eye * * *" was given.[88] Prosser noted that the material need not be defamatory, but might be, and that a dual claim for false light and libel was appropriate. However uncertain its application, false light lawsuit filings remain numerous enough to constitute a significant concern for the press.

The similarity to libel has plagued attempts at consistent analysis in false light cases. Among the most typical instances of false light are coincidental uses of names, fictionalization, distortion, embellishment, and misuse of names or pictures through unfortunate juxtapositions in otherwise legitimate news stories. If there is a general clue to spotting what may constitute a false light privacy invasion, it appears to be that some interpretation or implication that is inaccurate must be drawn.

A classic case illustrating false light is Duncan v. WJLA-TV, 10 Med.L.Rptr. 1395, 106 F.R.D. 4 (D.D.C. 1984). Linda Duncan was walking on a street in downtown Washington, D.C. at the same time a television crew was broadcasting a live 6 p.m. report on a new treatment for herpes. Duncan was clearly visible and recognizable to viewers. On the 11 p.m. newscast, the station again used the video, but with a closer focus on Duncan. The anchor led into the story with the phrase "[f]or the twenty million Americans who have herpes, it's not a cure * * *." Duncan was looking directly at the camera during the voiceover.

Duncan sued for libel and false light. The court determined that the same analysis applied to both claims. The early story was not considered capable of a negative interpretation because it was in context: it showed other pedestrians nearby and did not zero in on Duncan. The 11 p.m. story was different:

> [P]laintiff was the only pedestrian who paused and unknowingly looked directly into the camera. As plaintiff turned and walked away from the camera, the film ended; viewers did not see Ms. Ashton [the reporter] as they did in the six o'clock report.
>
> The coalescing of the camera action, plaintiff's action, and the positions of the passersby caused plaintiff to be the focal point on the screen. The juxtaposition of this film and the commentary concerning twenty million Americans with herpes, is sufficient to support an inference that indeed plaintiff was a victim.

The court denied the station's motion for summary judgment. What distinguishes Duncan as more false light than libel is the absence of any assertion that the plaintiff had herpes. The audience had to reach, or not reach, that conclusion by considering the pictures and words together.

The combination of libel rules with false light rules is somewhat at odds with the traditional common law formulation of false light. That formula, as given in the Second Restatement of Torts, allows recovery upon proof of offensiveness, that is, publicity "highly offensive to a reasonable person," but hedges on whether or not knowledge of falsity, reckless disregard, negligence, or the mere fact of having published materials placing someone in a false light constitutes a second requirement.[89]

Analysis similar to that in Duncan was used to reverse a grant of summary judgment for a newspaper that used an old photo of a female coal miner. The picture had originally been used in a 1977 article on women miners, and was concededly nonobjectionable then. In 1979, another area newspaper obtained and used the photo to accompany an article concerning incidents of harassment of women miners. Plaintiff asserted that the use of the photo caused harm to her reputation and also caused embarrassment and humiliation. Since the court could not say as a matter of law that the photo failed to place plaintiff in a false light, as the paper claimed, it was considered best decided by a jury. Crump v. Beckley Newspapers, 10 Med.L.Rptr. 2225, 320 S.E.2d 70 (W.V. 1983).

Earlier false light cases followed a similar pattern. For example, in 1948 a federal district court granted relief to an honest taxi driver whose photograph had been used by the Saturday Evening Post to illustrate a story about crooked cabbies.[90] And an invasion of privacy was acknowledged by a New York court in 1955 when a law-abiding slum child's photo was used in a story about juvenile delinquents.[91] A more frequently cited case, and one which gave impetus to the false light category of suits, is Leverton v. Curtis Publishing Co., 192 F.2d 974 (3d Cir. 1951). A newspaper photo of a child being helped to her feet after a car ran a stoplight and knocked her down was reprinted twenty months later in the Saturday Evening Post under the caption, "They Asked To Be Killed." Although the article was concerned with pedestrian carelessness, it erroneously implied that this particular child pedestrian had been at fault. A trial court judgment of $5,000 was sustained.

The original publication of the photo was not actionable because its legitimate news interest overbalanced any claim to privacy. But the magazine's use of the photo, said the court, exceeded the bounds of privilege and would be offensive to persons of ordinary sensibilities.

Since the Post had purchased the photograph from a commercial agency, was it aware of the misleading impression it would create? False light cases today turn on the answers to questions of this kind. How will a publisher know when an unaltered photograph has the capacity of placing someone in a false light or when something omitted from an article may embarrass?

The overlap between false light and libel, always lurking in the tort, was brought to the forefront in 1967 when the Supreme Court, perhaps imbued with the spirit of New York Times v. Sullivan, invoked the First Amendment to defeat a privacy suit. In so doing, it tied together false light privacy, defamation, and the actual malice test.

The case began in 1952 when James Hill, his wife, and five children were held hostage in their suburban Philadelphia home by three escaped convicts. The Hills were not harmed; in fact they were treated surprisingly well by the intruders. A year later, a novel, Desperate Hours, purported to describe the dramatic episode but with the fictionalized addition of captor violence against the father and a son and a verbal sexual assault on a daughter.

The novel led to a Broadway play and the play to a promotional picture-story review in Life magazine. By this time the Hill family had moved to Connecticut, supposedly for the purpose of avoiding any further public attention. Hill's privacy suit was brought under New York's privacy statute, which is mainly concerned with appropriation, although the suit contained all the elements of a common law false light action.

Hill found particularly offensive to his desire for anonymity Life's characterization of the play as "a heart-stopping account of how a family rose to heroism in a crisis." The play was set in the actual house the Hills had occupied in suburban Philadelphia; otherwise there was little resemblance between the docile captivity of the family and the sensationalized story line of the play. The incident inevitably became a Hollywood film starring a commando-like Frederick March as the father and Humphrey Bogart as the convict leader.

Hill won a $75,000 judgment from a jury. The Appellate Division of the New York Supreme Court (which despite its name is the trial court) upheld the verdict for Hill but ordered a new trial on the question of damages. A second jury awarded Hill $30,000 in compensatory damages. That judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeals, New York's highest court. Time, Inc. appealed to the United States Supreme Court and argued that the rules pertaining to the standards of newsworthiness had not been measured against guidelines which, since 1964 under New York Times v. Sullivan, were required under the First Amendment.

A majority of the Court agreed and applied the New York Times rule of actual malice to the Life article.

TIME, INC. v. HILL

1 MED.L.RPTR. 1791, 385 U.S. 374, 87 S.CT.534, 17 L.ED.2D 456 (1967).

Justice BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question in this case is whether appellant, publisher of Life Magazine, was denied constitutional protections for speech and press by the application by the New York courts of §§ 50–51 of the New York Civil Rights Law, McKinney's Consol.Laws, c. 6 to award appellee damages on allegations that Life falsely reported that a new play portrayed an experience suffered by appellee and his family.

* * *

Although "Right to Privacy" is the caption of § 51, the term nowhere appears in the text of the statute itself. The text of the statute appears to proscribe only conduct of the kind involved in Roberson, that is, the appropriation and use in advertising or to promote the sale of goods, of another's name, portrait or picture without his consent. An application of that limited scope would present different questions of violation of the constitutional protections for speech and press.

The New York courts have, however, construed the statute to operate much more broadly. * * * Specifically, it has been held in some circumstances to authorize a remedy against the press and other communications media which publish the names, pictures, or portraits of people without their consent. Reflecting the fact, however, that such applications may raise serious questions of conflict with the constitutional protections for speech and press, decisions under the statute have tended to limit the statute's application.

* * *

But although the New York statute affords "little protection" to the "privacy" of a newsworthy person, "whether he be such by choice or involuntarily" the statute gives him a right of action when his name, picture, or portrait is the subject of a "fictitious" report or article.

* * *

The Court of Appeals sustained the holding that in these circumstances the publication was proscribed by § 51 of the Civil Rights Law and was not within the exceptions and restrictions for newsworthy events engrafted on the statute. * * *

The opinion goes on to say that the "establishment of minor errors in an otherwise accurate" report does not prove "fictionalization." Material and substantial falsification is the test. However, it is not clear whether proof of knowledge of the falsity or that the article was prepared with reckless disregard for the truth is also required. In New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, we held that the Constitution delimits a State's power to award damages for libel in actions brought by public officials against critics of their official conduct. Factual error, content defamatory of official reputation, or both, are insufficient to an award of damages for false statements unless actual malice—knowledge that the statements are false or in reckless disregard of the truth—is alleged and proved. The Spahn opinion reveals that the defendant in that case relied on New York Times as the basis of an argument that application of the statute to the publication of a substantially fictitious biography would run afoul of the constitutional guarantees. The Court of Appeals held that New York Times had no application.

* * *

If this is meant to imply that proof of knowing or reckless falsity is not essential to a constitutional application of the statute in these cases, we disagree with the Court of Appeals. We hold that the constitutional protections for speech and press preclude

the application of the New York statute to redress false reports of matters of public interest in the absence of proof that the defendant published the report with knowledge of its falsity or in reckless disregard of the truth. [Emphasis added.]

The guarantees for speech and press are not the preserve of political expression or comment upon public affairs, essential as those are to healthy government. One need only pick up any newspaper or magazine to comprehend the vast range of published matter which exposes persons to public view, both private citizens and public officials. * * * Erroneous statement is no less inevitable in such case than in the case of comment upon public affairs, and in both, if innocent or merely negligent, "* * * it must be protected if the freedoms of expression are to have the 'breathing space' that they 'need * * * to survive' * * *." We create grave risk of serious impairment of the indispensable service of a free press in a free society if we saddle the press with the impossible burden of verifying to a certainty the facts associated in news articles with a person's name, picture or portrait, particularly as related to nondefamatory matter. Even negligence would be a most elusive standard, especially when the content of the speech itself affords no warning of prospective harm to another through falsity. A negligence test would place on the press the intolerable burden of guessing how a jury might assess the reasonableness of steps taken by it to verify the accuracy of every reference to a name, picture or portrait.

* * *

But the constitutional guarantees can tolerate sanctions against calculated falsehood without significant impairment of their essential function. We held in New York Times that calculated falsehood enjoyed no immunity in the case of alleged defamation of a public official's official conduct. Similarly calculated falsehood should enjoy no immunity in the situation here presented us. * * *

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is set aside and the case is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

COMMENT

By applying the actual malice test in Hill, the Court accepted the argument that false light and libel were in effect twin torts. Importing a test that apparently varies the rule to be applied depending upon the public interest in an event or person in effect brings the private facts newsworthiness defense into false light. A big difference is that, in private facts, the defense ends the case, while in false light it only changes the plaintiff's burden of proof.

Hill required proof of actual malice without regard to whether or not the plaintiff is a private figure or public figure, so long as the publicity concerned a matter of public interest. The rule strongly suggests that the interests served by libel and false light are parallel if not identical. But a number of scholars continued to urge that false light must be considered separately, as a privacy tort addressing the individual's interest in personal well-being and peace of mind.[92]

The actual malice test of Hill has been applied in many cases. In Machleder v. Diaz, 13 Med.L.Rptr. 1369, 801 F.2d 46 (2d Cir. 1986), the court reversed a jury finding of actual malice stemming from an "ambush" interview of the plaintiff. Diaz, an investigative reporter for WCBS-TV, conducted an interview with plaintiff as part of a story on toxic waste dumping. Diaz spotted abandoned drums and approached the door of Flexcraft, the paint manufacturing plant Machleder managed. Diaz starting asking questions while the cameras rolled. Machleder got upset, told Diaz "I don't need any publicity," but then invited Diaz into the office for an interview. That evening, the station ran the story and included footage of the confrontation. Diaz opened the story admitting he did not know who owned the barrels or had placed them there.[93]

Machleder based his false light claim on two arguments—that viewers would assume he had put the barrels full of toxic waste where they were, and that he had been portrayed as "intemperate and evasive." Machleder was unable to prove that any false assertions or even implications had been made and lost on the first claim. A jury had awarded him $250,000 compensatory damages and $1 million punitive damages for having been portrayed as intemperate and evasive. There could be no falsity in the presentation, the court said, since "it was based on his own conduct which was accurately captured by the cameras." The "true light" was that plaintiff had been intemperate and evasive.[94]

93. For false light claims involving television reporting, see the following, Clark v. ABC, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 2049, 684 F.2d 1208 (6th Cir. 1982) and Cantrell v. ABC, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1239, 529 F.Supp. 746 (N.D.Ill. 1981). The former involved passersby in an investigative report on prostitution, the latter a building manager interviewed at the scene of a suspected case of arson.

A case in which actual malice was proved involved a surviving husband who was awarded $5,000 compensatory and $15,000 punitive damages when a National Enquirer story under the headline, "Happiest Mother Kills Her Three Children and Herself," was held sufficiently untruthful and offensive to constitute an invasion of privacy. The plaintiff pleaded that he had suffered mental anguish to the extent of requiring psychiatric treatment, unemployment, and the disdain of his friends and acquaintances, the latter offense suggesting the affinity of libel and privacy. The "happiest" mother in reality had been extremely depressed and unstable, and only fictitious dialogue in the story could make her appear otherwise. The actual malice standard of knowing falsehood or reckless disregard of truth or falsity had been met. Varnish v. Best Medium Publishing Co., 405 F.2d 608 (2d Cir. 1968).

The Supreme Court's plurality in Rosenbloom[95] would temporarily establish the same public interest or public issue standard for defamation. But that case was superseded by Gertz,[96] which substantially returned private persons to the protective cloak of libel law. Time, Inc. v. Firestone, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1665, 424 U.S. 448 (1976), with its reluctance to consider a plaintiff who held press conferences a public figure and its recognition of the plaintiff's damage claim based on mental distress rather than harm to reputation, also appeared likely to affect privacy law. What was the effect of the two cases? Should a negligence test replace actual malice in false light as in libel for private figures? It is arguably illogical to use a newsworthiness test in privacy when it has been rejected in libel.[97]

An opportunity to either merge or distinguish false light and libel was provided the Court in a post-Gertz case, Cantrell v. Forest City Publishing Co., 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1815, 419 U.S. 245 (1974). In that case a story in the Cleveland Plain Dealer Sunday Magazine purported tc describe an interview with Margaret Cantrell, whose husband had died in a bridge collapse, leaving her and her four children in proud but abject poverty. Mrs. Cantrell, however, had been absent when a reporter and photographer entered the home and talked with one of her children. Inaccuracies and false characterizations such as "she wears the same mask of non-expression she wore at the funeral" were inevitable in the story that followed, and the Court reversed the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit and upheld a district court award of compensatory damages. On these facts alone the case may represent two other categories of privacy—intrusion and true but embarrassing private facts.

Since the actual malice test of New York Times had again been met, the Court found "no occasion to consider whether a state may constitutionally impose a more severe standard of liability for a publisher or broadcaster of false statements injurious to a private individual under a false light theory of invasion of privacy, or whether the constitutional standard announced in Time, Inc. v. Hill applies to all false light cases." [Emphasis added.]

"In essence," Justice Potter Stewart wrote, joined by seven of his colleagues, "the theory of the case was that by publishing the false feature story about the Cantrells and thereby making them the objects of pity and ridicule, the respondents damaged Mrs. Cantrell and her son William by causing them to suffer outrage, mental distress, shame and humiliation. * * * These were 'calculated falsehoods,' and the jury was plainly justified in finding that [the reporter] had portrayed the Cantrells in a false light through knowing or reckless untruth." The photographer was exonerated.

Cantrell, though clearly a private figure, had no occasion to charge negligence against the Plain Dealer because its falsehoods had already reached the level of actual malice. Since Cantrell, lower courts have disagreed on the amount to which Hill should be modified to coexist with Gertz.

In the Crump v. Buckley Newspapers case, discussed earlier, the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals explicitly held that that state's common law version of the false light tort served an interest different from defamation:

> [p]rivacy actions involve injuries to emotions and mental suffering, while defamation actions involve injury to reputation * * * Second, the false light need not be defamatory, although it often is, * * * Finally, although widespread publication is not necessarily required for recovery under a defamation cause of action, it is an essential ingredient to any false light invasion of privacy claim.

On the conflict between Hill and Gertz, the court concluded that it would "eventually be resolved in favor of Gertz." The court engaged in an exhaustive review of other cases in deciding that a negligence standard was to be used in private person false light suits.[98]

A California appeals court opted to resurrect the public interest test of Rosenbloom in a 1981 libel and privacy suit.[99] In 1979, an Arkansas court held that a private person must prove actual malice in a false light case if the publication is a matter of public concern.[100] An earlier case, Rinsley v. Brandt, 446 F.Supp. 850 (D.Kan. 1977), stood for the rule that Gertz limits the actual malice standard to false light claims brought by public persons and thus infers that private persons need only show negligence. Another federal district court crystallized that inference in Dresbach v. Doubleday, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2105, 518 F.Supp. 1285 (D.D.C. 1981), by applying the District of Columbia's negligence standard for libel to false light actions brought by private persons.[101]

Eventual adoption of the Gertz approach would aid the cause of legal symmetry, but the split in approaches remains. Some states have addressed narrower issues. For example, it is urged that if libel and false light are very similar, the measure and proof of damages should be as well.[102] In some states the statute of limitations for libel, at one or two years usually shorter than that for privacy, has been held to apply to both causes of action.[103] Most states, however, have retained a longer statute of limitations for false light—three years or more.[104]

The uncertainty of false light has influenced some courts to disallow the cause of action. Two courts were not convinced that the tort was needed,[105] and two have categorically rejected it.[106]

Fictionalization and Embellishment

How can publishers anticipate fictional characters coming to life—and filing lawsuits? In recent years, a number of cases have charged that novels, and even biographies, contained characterizations that placed someone in a false light. In fiction, the claim typically is that a character is a too-thinly-disguised representation of a real person. In embellishment, the plaintiff usually admits the overall accuracy of a portrayal but claims that a small portion is exaggerated or misleading.

One area of special trouble has been the television docudrama, a dramatic form that blends fact, interpretation, and fiction. Former aides to Senator Joseph McCarthy were portrayed without their consent in a television movie. Their real names were used in advertising and promoting the program. Their false light-type claim based on New York's privacy statute was dismissed on public interest grounds.[107] On the other hand, a false light claim was sustained when the real name of an attorney who had represented gangster Lucky Luciano was used in a wholly fictionalized, although not defamatory, episode in a novel.[108]

NBC found itself embroiled in litigation after it ran a docudrama entitled "Judge Horton and the Scottsboro Boys," which won several major awards. Dubbed "the most famous rape case of the twentieth century" by the Sixth Circuit, the case involved Victoria Price Street who, forty years before as Victoria Price, had charged nine black men with raping her on a train. Price was white. The evidence against the defendants consisted of little more than Price's accusations, and, despite this, Price pressed charges which could have meant the death penalty. All nine were tried quickly in Scottsboro, Alabama, found guilty, and sentenced to death by all-white juries. Several convictions were reversed, some by the U.S. Supreme Court. Judge Horton presided over one of the retrials, setting the new guilty verdict aside as based on insufficient evidence—a decision which did not make Horton popular in the South at the time.

The drama was particularly harsh on Victoria Price, who throughout the many years of trials sought out the press to present her side of the story. NBC had good reason to be harsh. A book the network relied upon and Judge Horton's own comments supported the portrayal of Price as a perjurer and generally bad character. It also had been told that Price, who in the meantime had married and become an absolute nonentity in another state, was dead, and the dead, of course, cannot sue. Street filed, claiming both libel and false light. It was imperative that NBC get her considered a public figure and the Scottsboro Boys case a matter of continuing interest because the network had not done any independent research or fact checking, evidence that the court said could support a jury verdict of negligence. The court decided that Street, despite anonymity and a new name, remained a public figure so long as the case remained of public interest. A bristling dissent argued that Street's lifelong desire for anonymity deserved consideration; apparently no one in her new hometown was aware of her past, and she had been completely rehabilitated. In fact, NBC might never have been sued had it not run a note at the end of the program announcing that Street had died and giving her later name. Street v. NBC, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1001, 645 F.2d 1227 (6th Cir. 1981). Street appealed to the Supreme Court, and certiorari was granted. The parties reached a settlement, and the writ of certiorari was dismissed. How might the high court have approached the issues in the case?

Identification is obviously a key issue in fiction as opposed to "faction." Was Kimberly Pring, a former Miss Wyoming, identified by a salacious Penthouse short story about a baton-twirling former Miss Wyoming who wore a costume similar to Pring's? The Tenth Circuit did not reach the identification issue, privileging the story instead as satire.[109] Evidently few of her neighbors in Cheyenne knew the story referred to her, or even knew of the story, until Pring announced it by filing suit.

In another identification case, an author was unwise enough to use the real name and physical description of a casual acquaintance for a fictional transsexual character.[110] Where there is no connection between author and plaintiff, the risk may not be as great.[111] In any case where identification is in doubt, it is initially a question for the jury.

Identification was no issue when A. J. Quinnell wrote and got published In the Name of the Father, a novel about a plan concocted by three high Roman Catholic officials to assassinate the late Soviet leader Yuri Andropov. In a preface, readers were alerted that "some real people . . . appear as characters in the book to give a sense of historical accuracy." One of those appearing was Paul Marcinkus, an archbishop who formerly headed the Vatican Bank. In the novel, Marcinkus is the central plotter. Ironically, the author himself had used a pseudonym. When Marcinkus filed suit, the court declared that the disclaimer was insufficient to protect against either false light assertions or a claim of appropriation. Adding insult to injury, the publisher had used Marcinkus's name in promoting and advertising the book.[112]

Traditional disclaimers, such as "all characters portrayed are wholly fictional and any resemblance to actual persons living or dead is purely coincidental," are useful, but they cannot cover every conceivable kind of character. Disclaimers should be explicit, although it is not clear that being explicit alone will provide more protection. Generally speaking, the better known a claimant, the stronger a false light claim looks. Conversely, the rarer a work of imagination, the less vulnerable it should be. When the "real" T. J. Hooker filed a right of publicity suit against the network television show about a California policeman with the same name, the court had no difficulty finding that no reasonable person would have connected the two.[113] The real T. J. Hooker was a professional wood-carver from Woodstock, Illinois. Hooker would have fared no better under false light. On the other hand, few fictionalized conversations will be held privileged as fair comment on the life of actual public figures.[114]

In Frosch v. Grosset & Dunlap, 4 Med.L.Rep. 2307 (N.Y.Sup.Ct. 1979), aff'd 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1271, 427 N.Y.S.2d 828 (App.Div. 1980), claims by the executors of Marilyn Monroe's estate against the publisher of Norman Mailer's biography Marilyn were dismissed on the ground that false light claims do not survive death. A similar case was Hicks v. Casablanca Records, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 1497, 464 F.Supp. 426 (S.D.N.Y. 1978), although it was technically brought on the grounds of a right of publicity. Heirs of mystery writer Agatha Christie sued the producers of the film Agatha, which purported to tell the events that occurred during an eleven-day disappearance by Christie in 1962 that has intrigued her fans ever since. In the film, Christie was seen as emotionally unstable and starved for affection, which she receives from a man other than her husband. No one knows the truth about the eleven days. It died with her in 1976. The court said that any reasonable audience member would see the film as a work of fiction and not consider portions as assertions of fact. Plaintiffs sought injunctions against the film and a book by the same name, but were unable to get injunctions either on publicity or unfair competition grounds.

The most ominous example of a case of failed fictionalization and one that exercised the literary world was Bindrim v. Mitchell. Author Gwen Davis Mitchell not only lost a libel suit (the libel claim here being indistinguishable from a false light claim) to a "nude-encounter" therapist but was also sued by her publisher which, under its contract with her, had a right to recover whatever costs might result from a libel suit. Doubleday had stuck with its author until she finally lost her case. Mitchell, who claimed that she had gone to great pains to change, disguise, and transmute—partly with vulgar dialogue—events at a nude therapy marathon into her novel Touching, maintains that there can be no libel in fiction.

The case was complicated by the fact that the plaintiff's appearance and academic credentials had changed to resemble those of the fictional character of "Dr. Herford" between publication and trial. Moreover, Mitchell had signed a contract with the plaintiff not to disclose in any manner what was to take place in the therapy sessions.

Essentially, Mitchell's disguise was inadequate. So again the question of identification. How many persons have to relate the fictional character to an actual person? In Bindrim, the California court said that one would suffice. Although technically a libel rather than a false light privacy case, it may be instructive to present here portions of the court's opinion.

KINGSLEY, J.:

There is clear and convincing evidence to support the jury's finding that defendant Mitchell entertained actual malice, and that defendant Doubleday had actual malice when it permitted the paperback printing of Touching, although there was no actual malice on the part of Doubleday in its original printing of the hardback edition.

Mitchell's reckless disregard for the truth was apparent from her knowledge of the truth of what transpired at the encounter, and the literary portrayals of that encounter. Since she attended sessions there can be no suggestion that she did not know the true facts. Since "actual malice" concentrates solely on defendants' attitude toward the truth or falsity of the material published * * * and not on malicious motives, certainly defendant Mitchell was in a position to know the truth or falsity of her own material, and 114. For an exception to this rule, see Rosemount Enterprises, Inc. v. Random House, 366 F.2d 303 (2d Cir. 1966), where the court said that even the imaginary ramblings of Howard Hughes were of interest to the public.

the jury was entitled to find that her publication was in reckless disregard of that truth or with actual knowledge of falsity.

However, plaintiff failed to prove by clear and convincing evidence that the original hardback publication by Doubleday was made with knowledge of falsity or in reckless disregard of falsity. McCormick of Doubleday cautioned plaintiff that the characters must be totally fictitious and Mitchell assured McCormick that the characters in Touching were incapable of being identified as real persons. McCormick arranged to have the manuscript read by an editor knowledgeable in the field of libel. * * * There must be sufficient evidence to permit the conclusion that defendant in fact entertained serious doubts as to the truth of his publication, (St. Amant v. Thompson (1968) * * * 390 U.S. 727, 731), and there is nothing to suggest that Doubleday entertained such doubts prior to the hardback publication.

Plaintiff suggests that, since the book did not involve "hot news," Doubleday had a duty to investigate the content for truth. Courts have required investigation as to truth or falsity of statements which were not hot news (Widener v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co. (1977) * * * 75 Cal.App.3d 445, Carson v. Allied News Co. (1976) * * * 529 F.2d 206), but those cases involved factual stories about actual people. In the case at bar, Doubleday had been assured by Mitchell that no actual, identifiable person was involved and that all the characters were fictitious in the novel. Where the publication comes from a known reliable source and there is nothing in the circumstances to suggest inaccuracy, there is no duty to investigate. (See Baldine v. Sharon Herald Co. (1968) 391 F.2d 703, 707.) There was nothing in the record to suggest that, prior to the hardback printing defendant Doubleday in fact entertained serious doubts as to the truth or falsity of the publication, and investigatory failure alone is insufficient to find actual malice.

However, prior to the paperback printing there were surrounding circumstances to suggest inaccuracy, such that at that point Doubleday had a duty to investigate. Plaintiff did show that Doubleday sold the rights to the New American Library after receiving a letter from plaintiff's attorney explaining that plaintiff was Herford and the inscription in the paperback said, "This is an authorized edition published by Doubleday and Company." * * * The jury could have inferred that at that point Doubleday either had serious doubts, or should have had serious doubts, as to the possibility that plaintiff was defamed by "Touching" and that at that point Doubleday had some duty to investigate.

* * * Appellants claim that, even if there are untrue statements, there is no showing that plaintiff was identified as the character, Simon Herford, in the novel Touching.

Appellants allege that plaintiff failed to show he was identifiable as Simon Herford, relying on the fact that the character in Touching was described in the book as a "fat Santa Claus type with long white hair, white sideburns, a cherubic rosy face and rosy forearms" and that Bindrim was clean shaven and had short hair. Defendants rely in part on Wheeler v. Dell Publishing Co. (1962) 300 F.2d 372, which involved an alleged libel caused by a fictional account of an actual murder trial.

* * *

However, in Wheeler the court found that no one who knew the real widow could possibly identify her with the character in the novel. In the case at bar, the only differences between plaintiff and the Herford character in Touching were physical appearance and that Herford was a psychiatrist rather than psychologist. Otherwise, the character Simon Herford was very similar to the actual plaintiff. We cannot say, as did the court in Wheeler, that no one who knew plaintiff Bindrim could reasonably identify him with the fictional character. Plaintiff was identified as Herford by several witnesses and plaintiff's own tape recording of the marathon sessions show that the novel was based substantially on plaintiff's conduct in the nude marathon.

Defendant also relies on Middlebrooks v. Curtis Publishing Co. (1969) 413 F.2d 141, where the marked dissimilarities between the fictional character and the plaintiff supported the court's finding against the reasonableness of identification. In Middlebrooks, there was a difference in age, an absence from the locale at the time of the episode, and a difference in employment of the fictional character and plaintiff; nor did the story parallel the plaintiff's life in any significant manner. In the case at bar, apart from some of those episodes allegedly constituting the libelous matter itself, and apart from the physical difference and the fact that plaintiff had a Ph.D., and not an M.D., the similarities between Herford and Bindrim are clear, and the transcripts of the actual encounter weekend show a close parallel between the narrative of plaintiff's novel and the actual real life events. Here, there were many similarities between the character, Herford, and the plaintiff Bindrim and those few differences do not bring the case under the rule of Middlebrooks. (See Fetler v. Houghton Mifflin Co. (1966) 364 F.2d 650.) There is overwhelming evidence that plaintiff and "Herford" were one.

However, even though there was clear and convincing evidence to support the finding of "actual malice," and even though there was support for finding that plaintiff is identified as the character in Mitchell's novel, there still can be no recovery by plaintiff if the statements in Touching were not libelous. There can be no libel predicated on an opinion. The publication must contain a false statement of fact. (Gregory v. McDonnell Douglas Corp. (1976) 17 Cal.3d 596.)

Plaintiff alleges that the book as a whole was libelous and that the book contained several false statements of fact. Plaintiff relies in part on [a] conversation between plaintiff and the minister as one libelous statement of fact. Plaintiff also argues that a particular incident in the book is libelous. That incident depicts an encounter group patient as so distressed upon leaving from the weekend therapy that she is killed when her car crashes. Plaintiff also complains of an incident in the book where he is depicted as "pressing," "clutching," and "ripping" a patient's cheeks and "stabbing against a pubic bone." Plaintiff complains, too, of being depicted as having said to a female patient, "Drop it, bitch." There are also other incidents alleged to be libelous.

Our inquiry then is directed to whether or not any of these incidents can be considered false statements of fact. It is clear from the transcript of the actual encounter weekend proceeding that some of the incidents portrayed by Mitchell are false: i.e., substantially inaccurate description of what actually happened. * * * [W]e regard the case at bench as involving a different issue. Defendants contend that the fact that the book was labeled as being a "novel" bars any claim that the writer or publisher could be found to have implied that the characters in the book were factual representations not of the fictional characters but of an actual nonfictional person. That contention, thus broadly stated, is unsupported by the cases. The test is whether a reasonable person, reading the book, would understand that the fictional character therein pictured was, in actual fact, the plaintiff acting as described. (Middlebrooks v. Curtis Publishing Co. (1969) * * * 413 F.2d 141, 143.) Each case must stand on its own facts. In some cases, such as Greenbelt Pub. Assn. v. Bresler (1970) * * * 398 U.S. 6, an appellate court can, on examination of the entire work, find that no reasonable person would have regarded the episodes in the book as being other than the fictional imaginings of the author about how the character he had created would have acted. * * * We cannot make any similar determination here. Whether a reader, identifying plaintiff with the "Dr. Herford" of the book, would regard the passages herein complained of as mere fictional embroidering or as reporting actual language and conduct, was for the jury. Its verdict adverse to the defendants cannot be overturned by this court.

Defendants raise the question of whether there is "publication" for libel where the communication is to only one person or a small group of persons rather than to the public at large. Publication for purposes of defamation is sufficient when the publication is to only one person other than the person defamed. (Brauer v. Globe Newspaper Co. (1966) 217 N.E.2d 736, 739.) Therefore, it is irrelevant whether all readers realized plaintiff and Herford were identical.

COMMENT

Judge Files wrote a dissenting opinion expressing amazement and displeasure at the majority's reading of the facts and interpretation of libel law. The identification issue was resolved wrongly, the dissent argued, on the basis of three witnesses, all former therapy patients of Bindrim's, rather than on the issue of whether a reader would have identified Bindrim as Dr. Herford. The dissent also urged that Bindrim had failed to prove adequately that a reasonable reader would consider Mitchell's account as containing assertions of fact. Most troubling, however, was the actual malice analysis:

> The majority opinion adopts the position that actual malice may be inferred from the fact that the book was "false." That inference is permissible against a defendant who has purported to state the truth. But when the publication purports to be fiction, it is absurd to infer malice because the fiction is false.
> As the majority agrees, a public figure may not recover damages for libel unless "actual malice" is shown.

> Sufficiency of the evidence on this issue is another constitutional issue. (St. Amant v. Thompson (1968) 390 U.S. 727, 730.) Actual malice is a state of mind, even though it often can be proven only by circumstantial evidence. The only apparent purpose of the defendants was to write and publish a novel. There is not the slightest evidence of any intent on the part of either to harm plaintiff. No purpose for wanting to harm him has been suggested.
>
> From an analytical standpoint, the chief vice of the majority opinion is that it brands a novel as libelous because it is "false," i.e., fiction; and infers "actual malice" from the fact that the author and publisher knew it was not a true representation of plaintiff. From a constitutional standpoint the vice is the chilling effect upon the publisher of any novel critical of any occupational practice, inviting litigation on the theory "when you criticize my occupation, you libel me."

The Bindrim case is the judiciary's strongest warning that authors not get too close to describing real characters in their works. While the extent of Mitchell's actual malice can be debated forever, the fact that her portrayal of Herford is directly taken from her own experience should put any author on notice to be careful when drawing characters based on people they know. Friends, families, business colleagues, and acquaintances after all are likely to be among the first to read one's work, and also the first to recoil at an unflattering portrait.

Embellishment presents similar problems of analysis to the courts. When Shila Morganroth's singular method of styling hair caught the attention of Detroit News reporter Susan Whitall, the result was a feature article in the newspaper's Sunday magazine. Morganroth thought the personality profile cast her in a false, even foolish, light. Distressed, she sued claiming both libel and false light invasion of privacy.

MORGANROTH v. WHITALL

14 MED.L.RPTR. 1411, 411 N.W.2D 859 (MICH.APP. 1987)

SAWYER, J.:

* * *

In this heated dispute, the trial court granted summary disposition in favor of defendants on plaintiff's claims of libel and invasion of privacy by false light. Plaintiff now appeals and we affirm.

Plaintiff alleges that she was libeled and cast in false light by an article written by defendant Whitall which appeared in the Sunday Supplement of the Detroit News on November 11, 1984. The article was entitled "Hot Locks: Let Shila burn you a new 'do.' " The article was accompanied by two photographs, one depicting plaintiff performing her craft on a customer identified as "Barbara X" and the second showing Barbara X and her dog, identified as "Harry X", following completion of the hairdressing. Central to the article was the fact that plaintiff used a blowtorch in her hairdressing endeavors. According to the article, plaintiff's blowtorch technique is dubbed "Shi-lit" and is copyrighted. The article also describes two dogs, Harry and Snowball, the latter belonging to plaintiff, noting that the canines have had their respective coats colored at least in part. The article also indicates that the blowtorch technique had been applied to both dogs. Additionally, the article described plaintiff's somewhat unusual style of dress, including a silver holster for her blowtorch and a barrette in her hair fashioned out of a $100 bill. * * *

Plaintiff's rather brief complaint alleges that the article, when read as a whole, is false, misleading and constitutes libel. More specifically, the complaint alleges that the article used the terms "blowtorch lady," "blowtorch technique" and the statement that plaintiff "is dressed for blowtorching duty in a slashed-to-there white jumpsuit" without any factual basis and as the result of defendants' intentional conduct to distort and sensationalize the facts obtained in the interview. The complaint further alleges that the article falsely portrays plaintiff as an animal hairdresser, again as part of a deliberate action by defendants to distort and sensationalize the facts.

In determining whether an article is libelous, it is necessary to read the article as a whole and fairly and reasonably construe it in determining whether a portion of the article is libelous in character. * * *

Reading the article as a whole, we believe that it is substantially true; therefore plaintiff's complaint lacks an essential element of her defamation claim, namely falsity. In looking at plaintiff's specific allegations of falsity, for the most part we find no falsehood. * * * In looking at the photographic exhibits filed by defendants, we believe that the instrument used by plaintiff in her profession can accurately be described as a blowtorch. Accordingly, while the use of the term "blowtorch" as an adjective in connection with references to plaintiff or her hairdressing technique may have been colorful, it was not necessarily inaccurate and certainly not libelous. As for the reference that plaintiff was "dressed for blowtorching duty in a slashed-to-there white jumpsuit", we have examined the photographic exhibits submitted by defendant at the motion hearing and we conclude that reasonable minds could not differ in reaching the conclusion that plaintiff did, in fact, wear a jumpsuit "slashed-to-there." * * *

In her brief, plaintiff claims that defendant inaccurately described her as being a hairdresser for dogs, giving dogs a Mohawk cut, and using a blowtorch on the dogs. While it appears that plaintiff did do hairdressing on dogs, it is not necessarily certain at this point that she did, in fact, use the blowtorch on the dogs. * * * Thus, there has been no showing by plaintiff that the statements relating to the dogs were false.

Moreover, inasmuch as it appears undisputed that plaintiff at least dyed the fur of the dogs, which would constitute hairdressing of dogs, we are not persuaded that the article, when read as a whole, becomes libelous because of an inaccurate reference to using the blowtorch on the dogs. This is particularly true since, by plaintiff's conduct, she asserts that blowtorching is a safe practice when performed on humans. Therefore, it would appear that, from plaintiff's perspective, blowtorching would also be safe on dogs, even if she did not engage in such a practice

For the above-stated reasons, we conclude that, when reviewing the article and accompanying photographs as a whole, the article was not libelous.

On appeal, plaintiff also argues that the article invaded her privacy by casting her in a false light. * * * As indicated in the above discussion under the theory of defamation, with the exception of certain references to hairdressing dogs, none of the conduct attributed to plaintiff in the article was false. Therefore, it could not place plaintiff in a false light. With reference to the assertions concerning her hairdressing of dogs, we do not believe that a rational trier of fact could conclude that, even if inaccurate, those references are unreasonable or put plaintiff in a position of receiving highly objectionable publicity. The article did not indicate that plaintiff harmed, injured or inflicted pain upon the dogs. Rather, at most, the article inaccurately stated that plaintiff used techniques on the dogs, such as blowtorching, which she also used on humans. While the article may have overstated the techniques that she uses on dogs, inasmuch as she advocates those techniques for use on humans, we cannot conclude that plaintiff would believe it highly objectionable that those techniques also be performed on dogs. Similarly, she cannot have been placed in false light as being both the hairdresser of dogs and humans inasmuch as the tinting of the canines' fur would constitute hairdressing. Thus, it would not be placing plaintiff in a false light to indicate that she serves both dog and man. Accordingly, we believe that summary disposition was also properly granted on the false light claim.

In summary, although the manner in which the present article was written may have singed plaintiff's desire for obtaining favorable coverage of her unique hairdressing methods, we cannot subscribe to the view that it was libelous. We believe that the trial court aptly summarized this case when it stated that "this Court is of the Opinion that the Plaintiff sought publicity and got it." Indeed, it would appear that the root of plaintiff's dissatisfaction with defendants' article is that the publicity plaintiff received was not exactly the publicity she had in mind. While the publicity may have been inflammatory from plaintiff's vantage point, we do not believe it was libelous. At most, defendants treated the article more lightheartedly than plaintiff either anticipated or hoped. While this may give plaintiff cause to cancel her subscription to the Detroit News, it does not give her cause to complain in court.

Affirmed. Costs to defendants.

COMMENT

The Morganroth case amply demonstrates the enduring difficulties in this area of the law. While the result ratifies the value of colorful, lively writing, reporters and authors should not rejoice. Consider that the plaintiff consented to the interview, then sued nonetheless. Excepting the disputed line about dog hairdressing, all else in the story appears to be an accurate description of what the reporter saw and heard. When a Massachusetts reporter said that an interview subject was "passionate" and "bitter," the interview subject said the reporter was not entitled to make such an interpretation based on observation, and sued for false light. Characterizing the interpretation as opinion incapable of supporting a false light claim, a trial court judgment for the defendant was upheld.[115] In both this case and Morganroth, the major harm is that the claims ever made it to trial, much less to appeal.

Morganroth is like many other false light cases in the way it combines causes of actions and concepts. In addition to the explicit false light and libel claims, one can find familiar strains from intrusion on seclusion and from private facts cases. Shila Morganroth's case seems indistinguishable from Mike Virgil's a decade earlier but for the cause of action. There is even a hint of intellectual property law or appropriation to her complaint.

At present, a major source of false light filings is Hustler magazine's tendency to use photos of people who agreed to pose nude for other photographers, photos that later appeared in Hustler without the subjects' consent. The plaintiff's claim typically centers on objections to being allied with Hustler in the minds of readers. In general, cases involving the magazine have rejected the argument that one is portrayed in a false light simply by association. A false assertion must be proved, and a claim that appearance in the magazine asserts consent is unpersuasive.[116] Similarly, when footage of paraders at Mardi Gras found its way into a softcore sex film, the paraders could not complain about the company they were unwillingly keeping.[117] And plaintiffs who were photographed wearing negligible costumes at the Halloween Exotic Erotic Ball could not complain when they were later accurately portrayed in printed versions of the photo.[118]

From a journalistic perspective, it is perhaps still best to hope for an eventual merger of false light privacy and libel under the rules of Gertz. Justice Brennan's opinion in Hill has not been repudiated by the Court. In Hill, Brennan nevertheless kept libel and privacy distinct, although, as Rosenbloom would demonstrate later, their protection would depend on parallel lines of reasoning based on the "public interest" or "public issue" test first suggested by Warren and Brandeis in their Harvard Law Review article. Arguably, if determining when a "libel" involves material which affects the "public interest" is an unsuitable task for courts in a regime governed by the First Amendment, it is a similarly unsuitable task for courts to decide when a publication is "newsworthy" in a privacy case since by doing so they interfere with journalistic prerogatives.

Gertz discarded the "public interest" standard for libel when the media is the defendant, a standard that focused essentially on the subject matter of the defamatory report, in favor of a test based on the private/public status of the plaintiff.[119]

Applying Gertz has advantages. For one, the plaintiff would clearly have the burden of proof on all elements. Presumed fault, damages, and most likely falsity would not be allowed. It would also clarify an unsettled issue on the malice standard. Cantrell appeared to approve of using common law malice rather than actual malice to allow punitive damages in false light cases, which seems plainly contradictory.

Obviously false light invasions do not always harm reputation. Baseball pitcher Warren Spahn was given a fictional Bronze Star by his admiring biographer, and the dramatizers of Hill's captivity made him a hero. But the differences in the nature of the injury—to mental well-being rather than reputation—only suggest that the action is a bit different, not that it should be easier for plaintiffs to prevail in false light cases.

The well-known but nonetheless private figure Mary Alice Firestone may have brought libel and privacy closer together. Though described as an adulteress, she withdrew her claim of damage to reputation and relied solely on a privacy-style claim of mental pain and anguish. Until the tensions and ambiguities in false light privacy are resolved, the press can only hope that the actual malice bond that joins the two areas of mass communication law will remain sturdy and that, as a corollary, truth will remain a defense against both libel and false light privacy claims.

PERSONA AS PROPERTY: APPROPRIATION AND THE RIGHT OF PUBLICITY

Appropriation of someone's name, picture, or distinctive personal characteristics was the first type of invasion of privacy tort to be widely accepted by states. It is committed more frequently by advertising, promotions, and merchandising personnel than by news reporters or photographers. Nonetheless, the tort is of concern for mass media.

At bottom, all that is required for someone to prove appropriation is that they were used in an identifiable fashion for a commercial purpose. The original tort was designed to protect the average person from having their "persona" used by the press. In the earliest common law appropriation case, an insurance company used the plaintiff's name and picture in an advertisement, which also contained a phony endorsement from the plaintiff.[120] The two elements—identification and commercial use—have remained to the present.

As originally put forth, appropriation like other privacy actions aimed to protect well-being and self-esteem. But starting in the 1950s and snowballing in the past two decades, more and more cases have involved taking the name, likeness, or characteristics of the famous rather than the unknown. From this line of cases has sprung a separate tort, the right of publicity, which seeks to protect the monetary interests of those whose names, likenesses, and attributes are marketable.[121]

It should be obvious that the best defense against either an appropriation action or a right of publicity action will be a signed consent or release from the person whose identity is used. Actually, consent forms are applicable for defense in all four of the privacy torts, although rarely sought in situations likely to provoke private facts, intrusion, or false light cases. Release forms are especially important where private figures are the subject of news or promotional activities. If minors or those incompetent to sign are involved, their parents or guardians should be asked to sign the release. If the signed release accurately reflects how a name or photo is going to be used, it should be a complete defense. The big difference with celebrities is that it normally requires payment to get a release signed. Oral releases may be argued in court, but their validity or strength is dubious; generally they are worth the paper they're not printed on. Miller v. Madison Square Garden Corp., 28 N.Y.S.2d 811 (1941).

Major alterations in a photograph or major changes in treatment will void consent and may open one to false light charges as well. Since passage of time and changed circumstances may nullify the reasons for consent, renewed releases should be sought if a picture or name is to be used for commercial or trade purposes again at a later time, or anytime if the use is for a different reason. Hustler publisher Larry Flynt prevailed on false light grounds but lost the right of publicity claim filed against him by nascent actress Robyn Douglass. Flynt obtained nude photos of Douglass with another woman from a photographer who offered verbal assurances that Douglass consented. When the time came to offer proof, the consent forms introduced in evidence were not originals, and expert testimony for Douglass disputed the genuineness of her signature. Douglass had originally signed a valid release for the use of some photos of her alone to Playboy. The court, however, reduced her damages to the extent that they relied on distress from having appeared naked in Hustler, since she has appeared in the media frequently without clothes.[122]

Consent is apparently required of the heirs and assigns of deceased celebrities in many states that have adopted the right of publicity.[123]

The only other meaningful defense against these two actions is newsworthiness, often claimed on a First Amendment basis. If a person is caught up in a newsworthy event or voluntarily steps forward to participate in debate on a public issue and becomes a public figure, appropriation claims are weak.[124]

Isolated references to television news reporters in the book The Amityville Horror did not support their invasion-of-privacy claims under New York's law since reports of psychic phenomena were matters of public interest.[125] Following allegations of fraud, they also became matters of public debate.

Joe Namath failed in a suit against Sports Illustrated when the magazine used a Super Bowl picture of the football hero it had published in 1969 to promote its subscriptions in other publications. The New York statute permits incidental use of once newsworthy photographs for trade purposes but not their direct or collateral use. The distinction is sometimes a fine one. But then newsworthiness is a broad and compassing defense. Since the photos had been taken during the 1969 Super Bowl while Namath was doing his job, it could also be argued that any interest in the publicity belonged to the New York Jets who, along with the leagues, had invited photographers to attend. Namath v. Sports Illustrated, 371 N.Y.S.2d 10 (N.Y.Sup.Ct., App.Div. 1975), aff'd 386 N.Y.S.2d 397 (N.Y. 1976).[126]

Note that the cases seldom focus on private figures. As a practical matter, appropriation of an unknown person to promote or sell something is bad business. As a result, most of the true appropriation cases arise from news rather than from commercial contexts. For example, use of a murder suspect's picture by a gubernatorial candidate was held not to be for trade purposes under New York's statute. The First Amendment value of free political discussion outweighed individual injury.[127] When NBC's Chicago station aired an investigation into judicial bribery, "Operation Greylord," using plaintiff's name and photograph in promotions for the story, it was considered an appropriation, although the same facts might support a false light claim.[128] And when two infants were photographed at a public downtown festival in Baltimore and their pictures later used in an advertising campaign, the court held that the original news value extended to the later advertising use. In addition, the court said, no reader could see the use as an endorsement, a factor seldom addressed in appropriation cases.[129]

Not all subsequent uses will be considered news apparently. In 1987, George Mendonsa filed a suit against Life, arguing that he was the sailor in the famous cover photo from V-J day in 1945 by Alfred Eisenstadt. The photo showed a sailor kissing a nurse in Times Square. It is one of the most famous photographs of all time. The sailor and nurse were never identified. In 1980, the magazine ran a copy of the picture and asked anyone who believed they were the two in the picture to contact it. Mendonsa wrote to say he was the man in the photograph; Life never responded. In 1987, the magazine began selling copies of the photograph at $1,600. Although the court seemed dubious about Mendonsa's ability to prove that his image was being used for commercial purposes (the faces were largely unseen), it said he had a right to try convincing a jury. The newsworthiness issue was not addressed.[130] The bigger question is why Mendonsa did not step forward earlier. The photograph has been used for promotion many times. A person must be identified to claim appropriation. A claim based on proximity to another is insufficient. That may pose a problem yet for Mendonsa.

Although unsettled by the film Dog Day Afternoon, the unidentified wife and children of the bank robber in that true story had not themselves been used in promoting the film, and plaintiffs had chosen subsequently to identify themselves.[131] A race car driver whose face and name were not used in a cigarette ad, but whose race car was, prevailed because the famous car was precisely identified with him. It is also notable that there was no news purpose.[132]

A shoe-on-the-other-foot situation occurred when a WCBS reporter, who had done a story on home insulation, found herself being used to promote a particular product. She brought a $4.5 million damage suit and asked for an injunction against the unauthorized use of the original news film.

"To be effective," said a New York appellate court in permitting the suit to continue, "a news reporter must maintain an image of absolute integrity and impartiality. The commercial exploitation of an impartial report by the use of a video tape or other reproduction of the name or picture of such reporter, for advertising or trade purposes, will not only tarnish the reporter's reputation for objectivity, but will have a chilling effect on reporters now involved in a field of expanding concern—consumer protection." [133]

The connections between consent and newsworthiness in the use of a name or picture received a new twist when a television station aired the entire act of human cannonball Hugo Zacchini. The entertainer's act was to shoot himself from a cannon into a net 200 feet away. By all reports, it was a dramatic act lasting about fifteen seconds. Zacchini was reportedly one of the last human cannonballs in the nation.

Zacchini was approached by a free-lance reporter linked to Cleveland station WEWS-TV while Zacchini appeared at a county fair. Zacchini asked that the act not be filmed. The next day, at his employer's behest, the reporter returned and filmed the act. A segment was shown on the evening news.

Contending that the station had appropriated his professional property, Zacchini sued for $25,000. A trial court granted the station summary judgment. An appeals court reversed. The Ohio Supreme Court then reversed again. It first said that plaintiff's claim should be based on a right of publicity, not on appropriation, because the two serve different interests. Zacchini lost in any event because the Ohio court, apparently relying on Time, Inc. v. Hill, said a "legitimate public interest test" applied. On a third appeal, the U.S. Supreme Court again reversed. The Court held that the state might provide a newsworthiness defense on state law grounds but was not required to by the First Amendment. The Court also held that the right of publicity did not conflict with the First Amendment. Zacchini had won the battle.

ZACCHINI v. SCRIPPS-HOWARD

2 MED.L.RPTR. 2089, 433 U.S. 562, 97 S.CT. 2849, 53 L.ED.2D 965 (1977).

Justice WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

The Ohio Supreme Court held that respondent is constitutionally privileged to include in its newscasts matters of public interest that would otherwise be protected by the right of publicity, absent an intent to injure or to appropriate for some nonprivileged purpose. If under this standard respondent had merely reported that petitioner was performing at the fair and described or commented on his act, with or without showing his picture on television, we would have a very different case. But petitioner is not contending that his appearance at the fair and his performance could not be reported by the press as newsworthy items. His complaint is that respondent filmed his entire act and displayed that film on television for the public to see and enjoy. This, he claimed, was an appropriation of his professional property. The Ohio Supreme Court agreed that petitioner had "a right of publicity" that gave him "personal control over the commercial display and exploitation of his personality and the exercise of his talents." * * *

The Ohio Supreme Court nevertheless held that the challenged invasion was privileged, saying that the press "must be accorded broad latitude in its choice of how much it presents of each story or incident, and of the emphasis to be given to such presentation. No fixed standard which would bar the press from reporting or depicting either an entire occurrence or an entire discrete part of a public performance can be formulated which would not unduly restrict the 'breathing room' in reporting which freedom of the press requires." 351 N.E.2d 454 (1976). Under this view, respondent was thus constitutionally free to film and display petitioner's entire act.

The Ohio Supreme Court relied heavily on Time, Inc. v. Hill, but that case does not mandate a media privilege to televise a performer's entire act without his consent. * * *

Time, Inc. v. Hill, which was hotly contested and decided by a divided court, involved an entirely different tort than the "right of publicity" recognized by the Ohio Supreme Court. * * * It is also abundantly clear that Time, Inc. v. Hill did not involve a performer, a person with a name having commercial value, or any claim to a "right of publicity." This discrete kind of "appropriation" case was plainly identified in the literature cited by the Court and had been adjudicated in the reported cases.

The differences between these two torts are important. First, the State's interests in providing a cause of action in each instance are different. "The interest protected" in permitting recovery for placing the plaintiff in a false light "is clearly that of reputation, with the same overtones of mental distress as in defamation." Prosser, 48 Calif.L.Rev., at 400. By contrast, the State's interest in permitting a "right of publicity" is in protecting the proprietary interest of the individual in his act in part to encourage such entertainment. As we later note, the State's interest is closely analogous to the goals of patent and copyright law, focusing on the right of the individual to reap the reward of his endeavors and having little to do with protecting feelings or reputation. Second, the two torts differ in the degree to which they intrude on dissemination of information to the public. In "false light" cases the only way to protect the interests involved is to attempt to minimize publication of the damaging matter, while in "right of publicity" cases the only question is who gets to do the publishing. An entertainer such as petitioner usually has no objection to the widespread publication of his act as long as he gets the commercial benefit of such publication.

* * *

It is evident, and there is no claim here to the contrary, that petitioner's state-law right of publicity would not serve to prevent respondent from reporting the newsworthy facts about petitioner's act. Wherever the line in particular situations is to be drawn between media reports that are protected and those that are not, we are quite sure that the First and Fourteenth Amendments do not immunize the media when they broadcast a performer's entire act without his consent. The Constitution no more prevents a State from requiring respondent to compensate petitioner for broadcasting his act on television than it would privilege respondent to film and broadcast a copyrighted dramatic work without liability to the copyright owner. * * *

The broadcast of a film of petitioner's entire act poses a substantial threat to the economic value of that performance. As the Ohio court recognized, this act is the product of petitioner's own talents and energy, the end result of much time, effort and expense. Much of its economic value lies in the "right of exclusive control over the publicity given to his performance"; if the public can see the act for free on television, they will be less willing to pay to see it at the fair. The effect of a public broadcast of the performance is similar to preventing petitioner from charging an admission fee.

"The rationale for [protecting the right of publicity] is the straight-forward one of preventing unjust enrichment by the theft of good will. No social purpose is served by having the defendant get for free some aspect of the plaintiff that would have market value and for which he would normally pay." Kalven, Privacy in Tort Law—Were Warren and Brandeis Wrong?, 31 Law and Contemporary Problems 326, 331 (1966). Moreover, the broadcast of petitioner's entire performance, unlike the unauthorized use of another's name for purposes of trade or the incidental use of a name or picture by the press, goes to the heart of petitioner's ability to earn a living as an entertainer. Thus in this case, Ohio has recognized what may be the strongest case for a "right of publicity"—involving not the appropriation of an entertainer's reputation to enhance the attractiveness of a commercial product, but the appropriation of the very activity by which the entertainer acquired his reputation in the first place.

Of course, Ohio's decision to protect petitioner's right of publicity here rests on more than a desire to compensate the performer for the time and effort invested in his act; the protection provides an economic incentive for him to make the investment required to produce a performance of interest to the public. This same consideration underlies the patent and copyright laws long enforced by this Court.

* * *

These laws perhaps regard the "reward to the owner [as] a secondary consideration," United States v. Paramount Pictures, 334 U.S. 131, 158 (1948), but they were "intended definitely to grant valuable, enforceable rights" in order to afford greater encouragement to the production of works of benefit to the public. * * *

Petitioner does not seek to enjoin the broadcast of his performance; he simply wants to be paid for it. Nor do we think that a state-law damages remedy against respondent would represent a species of liability without fault contrary to the letter or spirit of Gertz. Respondent knew exactly that petitioner objected to televising his act, but nevertheless displayed the entire film.

We conclude that although the State of Ohio may as a matter of its own law privilege the press in the circumstances of this case, the First and Fourteenth Amendments do not require it to do so.

Reversed.

Mr. Justice POWELL, with whom Mr. Justice Brennan and Mr. Justice Marshall join, dissenting.

Disclaiming any attempt to do more than decide the narrow case before us, the Court reverses the decision of the Supreme Court of Ohio based on repeated incantation of a single formula: "a performer's entire act." * * * I do not view respondent's action as comparable to unauthorized commercial broadcasts of sporting events, theatrical performances, and the like where the broadcaster keeps the profits. There is no suggestion here that respondent made any such use of the film. Instead, it simply reported on what petitioner concedes to be a newsworthy event, in a way hardly surprising for a television station—by means of film coverage. The report was part of an ordinary daily news program, consuming a total of 15 seconds. It is a routine example of the press fulfilling the informing function so vital to our system.

* * *

In my view the First Amendment commands a different analytical starting point from the one selected by the Court. Rather than begin with a quantitative analysis of the performer's behavior—is this or is this not his entire act?—we should direct initial attention to the actions of the news media: what use did the station make of the film footage? When a film is used, as here, for a routine portion of a regular news program, I would hold that the First Amendment protects the station from a "right of publicity" or "appropriation" suit, absent a strong showing by the plaintiff that the news broadcast was a subterfuge or cover for private or commercial exploitation.

COMMENT

The split between White and Powell is also the split that has pervaded right of publicity analysis generally. Powell focuses on the news or First Amendment value of the use to which the information is put, while White focuses on the economic value of the thing taken. Since there has been no other case in which a celebrity's entire act has been at issue, the viability of the "entire act" standard has not been tested.

One argument for a First Amendment "fair use" defense is based on the public's investment in celebrities. Since the value of their personae stems from the public, it is argued, the rights should be shared; placing all rights with the celebrity puts full control over information of general public interest in just a few hands. And it is argued that, after death, a celebrity's persona should fall into the public domain on the grounds that the celebrity has reaped the rewards of fame.[134] Most celebrities, after all, are able to protect heirs through contracts without relying on the right of publicity. In addition, copyright endures after death.

Note that the Court's opinions in Zacchini dealt with the right of publicity, not appropriation, in line with Ohio's view that the two torts serve different interests. The Court finds the right of publicity more akin to copyright, an intellectual property issue, than to privacy. Later right of publicity cases draw upon many related areas of law: copyright, trademark, service mark, unfair competition, and misappropriation.[135] As a result, publicity cases often become extremely complicated.

The Court never reached the issue of harm or damages, but it is difficult to conceive of how the news story actually cost Zacchini anything. Did the station gain extra viewers or advertisers? Such evidence would seem extremely relevant to proving that there was a commercial as opposed to news purpose. Might not the fifteen-second film be considered "free" advertising for Zacchini? The station in fact urged viewers that they should see the act in person. Is it true that the public will be less willing to pay to see Zacchini after seeing the act for nothing? Certainly general admission to the fair promised much more than just the human cannonball show.

In the years since Zacchini, many states have recognized a right of publicity, either on a common law basis or by statute. States with statutes include California, Florida, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Nebraska, New York, Oklahoma, Rhode Island, Tennessee, Utah, Virginia, and Wisconsin.[136] New York's right of publicity is considered implicit in its privacy statute. On common law grounds, apparently every state that has had occasion to consider the right has recognized it.[137] The general rule for establishing the existence of publicity rights in most states is twofold: the celebrity's name or likeness must have some value and the celebrity must have exploited the right,[138] although the ability to exploit the right may be sufficient.[139] Some states, such as California, treat the right as nearly identical to copyright. And like copyright it is descendible, even salable, after death. A recent Tennessee case, one of many involving the estate of Elvis Presley, sees the issue primarily in property law terms.

STATE EX REL. PRESLEY v. CROWELL

14 MED.L.RPTR. 1043, 733 S.W.2D 89 (TENN. APP. 1987).

KOCH, J.:

This appeal involves a dispute between two not-for-profit corporations concerning their respective rights to use Elvis Presley's name as part of their corporate names. The case began when one corporation filed an unfair competition action in the Chancery Court for Davidson County to dissolve the other corporation and to prevent it from using Elvis Presley's name. Elvis Presley's estate intervened on behalf of the defendant corporation. It asserted that it had given the defendant corporation permission to use Elvis Presley's name and that it had not given similar permission to the plaintiff corporation.

The trial court determined that Elvis Presley's right to control his name and image descended to his estate at his death and that the Presley estate had the right to control the commercial exploitation of Elvis Presley's name and image. Thus, the trial court granted the defendant corporation's motion for summary judgment and dismissed the complaint.

The plaintiff corporation has appealed. Its primary assertion is that there is no descendible right of publicity in Tennessee and that Elvis Presley's name and image entered into the public domain when he died.

* * *

Elvis Presley's career is without parallel in the entertainment industry. * * * Elvis Presley was aware of this recognition and sought to capitalize on it during his lifetime. He and his business advisors entered into agreements granting exclusive commercial licenses throughout the world to use his name and likeness in connection with the marketing and sale of numerous consumer items. As early as 1956, Elvis Presley's name and likeness could be found on bubble gum cards, clothing, jewelry and numerous other items. * * *

Elvis Presley's death on August 16, 1977 did not decrease his popularity. If anything it preserved it.

* * *

The demand for Elvis Presley merchandise was likewise not diminished by his death. The older memorabilia are now collector's items. New consumer items have been authorized and are now being sold. Elvis Presley Enterprises, Inc., a corporation formed by the Presley estate, has licensed seventy-six products bearing his name and likeness and still controls numerous trademark registrations and copyrights. * * * The commercial exploitation of Elvis Presley's name and likeness continues to be a profitable enterprise. It is against this backdrop that this dispute between these two corporations arose.

A group of Elvis Presley fans approached Shelby County officials sometime in 1979 concerning the formation of a group to support a new trauma center that was part of the Memphis and Shelby County hospital system. This group, calling themselves the Elvis Presley International Memorial Foundation, sought a charter as a Tennessee not-for-profit corporation in October, 1980. The Secretary of State denied their application on November 12, 1980 stating that "[t]he name Elvis Presley cannot be used in the charter."

Lawyers representing the group of fans and the Presley estate met to discuss the group's use of Elvis Presley's name following the Secretary of State's rejection of the charter application. In December, 1980, the Presley estate and its trademark counsel formally declined to give the group the unrestricted right to use Elvis Presley's name and likeness. However, the Presley estate offered the group a royalty-free license to use Elvis Presley's name and likeness if the group agreed to abide by eight conditions limiting the group's activities. The group declined the offer of a royalty-free license.

The Presley estate incorporated Elvis Presley Enterprises, Inc. on February 24, 1981. Two days later on February 26, 1981, the Secretary of State, reversing its original decision, granted the fan group's renewed application and issued a corporate charter to the Elvis Presley International Memorial Foundation (International Foundation). The International Foundation raises funds by charging membership fees and dues and by sponsoring an annual banquet in Memphis. It uses its funds to support the trauma center of the new City of Memphis Hospital which was named after Elvis Presley and to provide an annual award of merit.

139. Grant v. Esquire, Inc., 367 F.Supp. 876 (S.D.N.Y. 1973) (actor Cary Grant objected to use of his likeness in sweater promotion largely because he never sold the highly marketable rights to his name or likeness).

The Presley estate and Elvis Presley Enterprises, Inc. incorporated the Elvis Presley Memorial Foundation, Inc. (Foundation) as a Tennessee not-for-profit corporation on May 14, 1985. The Foundation is soliciting funds from the public to construct a foundation in the shopping center across the street from Elvis Presley's home.

The International Foundation's heretofore amicable relationship with the Presley estate and Elvis Presley Enterprises, Inc. deteriorated after the formation of the Foundation. On July 17, 1985, the International Foundation filed this action seeking to dissolve the Foundation and to enjoin it from using a deceptively similar name.

* * *

We are dealing in this case with an individual's right to capitalize upon the commercial exploitation of his name and likeness and to prevent others from doing so without his consent. This right, now commonly referred to as the right of publicity, is still evolving and is only now beginning to step out of the shadow of its more well known cousin, the right of privacy.

The confusion between the right of privacy and the right of publicity has caused one court to characterize the state of the law as a "haystack in a hurricane." Ettore v. Philco Television Broadcasting Corp., 229 F.2d 481, 485 (3d Cir. 1956). This confusion will not retard our recognition of the right of publicity because Tennessee's common law tradition, far from being static, continues to grow and to accommodate the emerging needs of modern society. * * *

Writing in 1890, Warren and Brandeis could not have foreseen today's commercial exploitation of celebrities. They did not anticipate the changes that would be brought about by the growth of the advertising, motion picture, television and radio industries. American culture outgrew their concept of the right of privacy and soon began to push the common law to recognize and protect new and different rights and interests.

It would be difficult for any court today, especially one sitting in Music City U.S.A. practically in the shadow of the Grand Ole Opry, to be unaware of the manner in which celebrities exploit the public's recognition of their name and image. The stores selling Elvis Presley tee shirts, Hank Williams, Jr. bandannas or Barbara Mandrell satin jackets are not selling clothing as much as they are selling the celebrities themselves. We are asked to buy the shortening that makes Loretta Lynn's pie crusts flakier or to buy the same insurance that Tennessee Ernie Ford has or to eat the sausage that Jimmy Dean makes.

There are few every day activities that have not been touched by celebrity merchandising. This, of course, should come as no surprise. Celebrity endorsements are extremely valuable in the promotion of goods and services. * * * These endorsements are of great economic value to celebrities and are now economic reality. * * *

In his later writings, Prosser characterized the right of publicity as:

> an exclusive right in the individual plaintiff to a species of trade name, his own, and a kind of trade mark in his likeness. It seems quite pointless to dispute over whether such a right is to be classified as "property;" it is at least clearly proprietary in nature. W. Prosser, Handbook of the Law of Torts §117, at 807 (4th ed. 1971).

* * *

Now, courts in other jurisdictions uniformly hold that the right of publicity should be considered as a free standing right independent from the right of privacy. * * *

The status of Elvis Presley's right of publicity since his death has been the subject of four proceedings in the Federal courts. The conflicting decisions in these cases mirror the difficulty other courts have experienced in dealing with the right of publicity.

The first case originated in Tennessee and involved the sale of pewter statuettes of Elvis Presley without the exclusive licensee's permission. The United States District Court recognized Elvis Presley's independent right of publicity and held that it had descended to the Presley estate under Tennessee law. Memphis Development Foundation v. Factors, Etc. Inc., 441 F.Supp. 1323 * * * (W.D.Tenn. 1977). The United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit reversed. Apparently without considering Tennessee law, the court held that Tennessee courts would find that the right of publicity would not survive a celebrity's death. Memphis Development Foundation v. Factors, Etc., Inc., 616 F.2d 956 (6th Cir. 1980).

* * *

The second and third cases originated in New York and were originally decided under New York law. On two successive days, Judge Charles H. Tenney recognized Elvis Presley's right of publicity and held that it descended at death like any other intangible property right. Factors Etc., Inc. v. Creative Card Co., 444 F.Supp. 279 * * * (S.D.N.Y. 1977) and Factors Etc., Inc. v. Pro Arts, Inc., 444 F.Supp. 288, 290 (S.D.N.Y. 1977). Pro Arts, Inc. appealed, and the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, applying New York law, agreed that Elvis Presley's right of publicity survived his death and remanded the case. Factors Etc., Inc. v. Pro Arts, Inc., 579 F.2d 215 (2d Cir. 1978).

* * *

The dispute between Factors, Etc., Inc. and Pro Arts, Inc. did not end. On remand, Judge Tenney permanently enjoined Pro Arts from making any commercial use of Elvis Presley's name and likeness. Pro Arts, Inc. again appealed to the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. This time Pro Arts insisted that the controversy was governed by Tennessee law and that the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit's opinion in Memphis Development Foundation v. Factors, Etc., Inc. should control.

The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit agreed that Tennessee law controlled the case. While it expressly disagreed with the Sixth Circuit's holding in Memphis Development Foundation v. Factors, Etc., Inc., it concluded that it was required to accept the Sixth Circuit's decision as controlling authority. Factors Etc., Inc. v. Pro Arts, Inc., 652 F.2d 278 (2d Cir. 1981).

* * *

The fourth case originated in New Jersey and involved an Elvis Presley impersonator. Applying New Jersey Law, the United States District Court recognized Elvis Presley's right of publicity and held that it would be descendible under New Jersey law. Estate of Elvis Presley v. Russen, 513 F.Supp. 1339, 1354–55 (D.N.J. 1981).

The courts in each of these cases recognized the existence of Elvis Presley's right of publicity. All the courts, except one, also recognized that this right was descendible upon Elvis Presley's death.

* * *

The appellate courts of this State have had little experience with the right of publicity. The Tennessee Supreme Court has never recognized it as part of our common law or has never undertaken to define its scope. However, the recognition of individual property rights is deeply embedded in our jurisprudence.

* * *

The concept of the right of property is multifaceted. It has been described as a bundle of rights or legally protected interests. These rights or interests include: (1) the right of possession, enjoyment and use; (2) the unrestricted right of disposition; and (3) the power of testimonial disposition. * * *

Our courts have recognized that a person's "business," a corporate name, a trade name and the good will of a business are species of intangible personal property.

* * *

Tennessee's common law thus embodies an expansive view of property. Unquestionably, a celebrity's right of publicity has value. It can be possessed and used. It can be assigned, and it can be the subject of a contract. Thus, there is ample basis for this Court to conclude that it is a species of intangible personal property.

* * *

What remains to be decided by the courts in Tennessee is whether a celebrity's right of publicity is descendible at death under Tennessee law. * * * The only reported opinion holding that Tennessee law does not recognize a postmortem right of publicity is Memphis Development Foundation v. Factors, Etc., Inc. * * * We have carefully reviewed this opinion and have determined that it is based upon an incorrect construction of Tennessee law and is inconsistent with the better reasoned decisions in this field.

The United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit appears to believe that there is something inherently wrong with recognizing that the right of publicity is descendible. * * * We do not share this subjective policy bias. Like the Supreme Court of Georgia, we recognize that the "trend since the early common law has been to recognize survivability, notwithstanding the legal problems which may thereby arise." * * *

We have also concluded that recognizing that the right of publicity is descendible promotes several important policies that are deeply ingrained in Tennessee's jurisprudence. First, it is consistent with our recognition that an individual's right of testamentary distribution is an essential right. If a celebrity's right of publicity is treated as an intangible property right in life, it is no less a property right at death. * * *

Second, it recognizes one of the basic principles of Anglo-American jurisprudence that "one may not reap where another has sown nor gather where another has strewn." * * * This unjust enrichment principle argues against granting a windfall to an advertiser who has no colorable claim to a celebrity's interest in the right of publicity. * * *

Third, recognizing that the right of publicity is descendible is consistent with a celebrity's expectation that he is creating a valuable capital asset that will benefit his heirs and assigns after his death. * * *

It is now common for celebrities to include their interest in the exploitation of their right of publicity in their estate. While a celebrity's expectation that his heirs will benefit from his right of publicity might not, by itself, provide a basis to recognize that the right of publicity is descendible, it does recognize the effort and financial commitment celebrities make in their careers. This investment deserves no less recognition and protection than investments celebrities might make in the stock market or in other tangible assets. * * *

Fourth, concluding that the right of publicity is descendible recognizes the value of the contract rights of persons who have acquired the right to use a celebrity's name and likeness. The value of this interest stems from its duration and its exclusivity. If a celebrity's name and likeness were to enter the public domain at death, the value of any existing contract made while the celebrity was alive would be greatly diminished. * * *

Fifth, recognizing that the right of publicity can be descendible will further the public's interest in being free from deception with regard to the sponsorship, approval or certification of goods and services. * * *

Finally, recognizing that the right of publicity can be descendible is consistent with the policy against unfair competition through the use of deceptively similar corporate names.

The legal literature has consistently argued that the right of publicity should be descendible. A majority of the courts considering this question agree. We find this authority convincing and consistent with Tennessee's common law and, therefore, conclude that Elvis Presley's right of publicity survived his death and remains enforceable by his estate and those holding licenses from the estate.

While Tennessee's courts are capable of defining the parameters of the right of publicity on a case by case basis, the general Assembly also has the prerogative to define the scope of this right. The General Assembly undertook to do so in 1984 when it enacted Tenn. Code Ann. §47-25-1101 et seq. which is known as "The Personal Rights Protection Act of 1984." Tenn. Code Ann. §47-25-1103(a) recognizes that an individual has "a property right in the use of his name, photograph or likeness in any medium in any manner." Tenn Code Ann. §47-25-1103(b) provides that this right is descendible. Tenn. Code Ann. §47-25-1104(a) & (b)(1) provide that the right is exclusive in the individual or his heirs and assigns until it is terminated. Tenn. Code Ann. §47-25-1104(b)(2) provides that the right is terminated if it is not used after the individual's death.

Our decision concerning the descendibility of Elvis Presley's right of publicity is not based upon Tenn. Code Ann. §47-25-1101 et seq, but rather upon our recognition of the existence of the common law right of publicity. We note, however, that nothing in Tenn. Code Ann. §47-25-1101 et seq. should be construed to limit vested rights of publicity that were in existence prior to the effective date of the act. To do so would be contrary to Article I, Section 20 of the Tennessee Constitution. A statute cannot be applied retroactively to impair the value of a contract right in existence when the statute was enacted. * * *

Our finding that Elvis Presley's estate has retained the exclusive right to control the commercial exploitation of his name and likeness does not end our inquiry. Elvis Presley Enterprises, Inc. sought relief through a Tenn.R.Civ.P. 56 motion for summary judgment. It was entitled to this relief only if there are no disputes of material fact and if it satisfied the trial court that it was entitled to a judgment as a matter of law.

* * *

There is evidence in this record indicating that Elvis Presley Enterprises, Inc. was aware for over four years that the International Foundation was using Elvis Presley's name in its corporate name, that it acquiesced and even encouraged this use, and that the International Foundation relied upon Elvis Presley Enterprises, Inc.'s apparent acquiescence to its detriment.

* * *

There is also evidence that the International Foundation relied to its detriment upon the Presley estate's apparent acquiescence in its use of Elvis Presley's name. It has solicited funds and sponsored various activities. It has also entered into contracts for marketing and promotion. * * * This record does not support finding that the International Foundation has carried its burden of proof with regard to its laches defense. However, it does not support finding that Elvis Presley Estate, Inc. is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law.

The summary judgment granted in favor of Elvis Presley Enterprises, Inc. is vacated and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. * * *

COMMENT

The court traces the history of litigation involving the Presley estate, citing seven separate court opinions involving Elvis's right of publicity. It is an understatement to say that the estate zealously guards its right of publicity.

Once the property rights approach is accepted, descendibility and transferability naturally follow. Unsettling to the media is that the courts give no weight or mention to public uses of the persona of Elvis Presley. One court found that an Elvis impersonator violated the "King's" right of publicity and service mark by presenting the "Big El Show." By all accounts the excellent Elvis impersonator, Rob Russen, may have been too good. Under the right of publicity, the court said, only Elvis's estate has the right to commission live imitations. But of course the estate could not provide the real thing, an Elvis performance. The tort was created to protect a celebrity from having others take something only the celebrity can provide. In Russen, no reasonable audience member could have thought that defendant was really Elvis. The argument that Russen is somehow in competition with the estate is hard to swallow. In addition, the court shunted aside Russen's First Amendment arguments, saying that the show was not informative, only entertaining. While the "Big El Show" might have some value, this court concluded that some values are more protected than others.[140]

Much as in libel, right of publicity standards vary widely from state to state. But generally, all require a "taking" of a celebrity's persona for commercial gain. In some cases there is no commercial gain because the picture or attribute had already been used with consent. When a magazine published a photo from a movie of actress Ann-Margret partially clothed, she was unable to collect both because she is a public figure and because the rights belonged to the film owners. The court in addition seemed puzzled she'd complained after millions had seen the movie.[141] Clint Eastwood established his right to sue for the National Enquirer's nondefamatory use of his name and photo on the front page and in television advertising at common law, but to recover under the California statute he would have to prove actual malice. The Enquirer's claim of newsworthiness failed. The court said the statute had no news privilege but tracked libel law instead. The Enquirer's argument that there was no portrayal of Eastwood as endorsing the publication was almost summarily dismissed.[142] Is this the kind of fact pattern the right of publicity was meant to apply to? Is Eastwood trying to protect the commercial value of his name or his reputation? Can the two be separated?

Just what constitutes an identifiable attribute that will be considered part of a person's right of publicity? Is it necessary that potential audience members will interpret the use as an endorsement? Those questions arose when Johnny Carson's "trademark" slogan was used in a company's name. The Sixth Circuit opinion is also an excellent review of the elements in common law right of publicity cases.

CARSON v. HERE'S JOHNNY PORTABLE TOILETS, INC.

9 MED.L.RPTR. 1153, 698 F.2D 831 (6TH CIR. 1983).

BROWN, J.:

This case involves claims of unfair competition and invasion of the right of privacy and the right of publicity arising from appellee's adoption of a phrase generally associated with a popular entertainer.

Appellant, John W. Carson (Carson), is the host and star of "The Tonight Show," a well-known television program broadcast five nights a week by the National Broadcasting Company. Carson also appears as an entertainer in night clubs and theaters around the country. From the time he began hosting "The Tonight Show" in 1962, he has been introduced on the show each night with the phrase "Here's Johnny." This method of introduction was first used for Carson in 1957 when he hosted a daily television program for the American Broadcasting Company. The phrase "Here's Johnny" is generally associated with Carson by a substantial segment of the television viewing public. In 1967, Carson first authorized use of this phrase by a chain of restaurants called "Here's Johnny Restaurants." [The court recounts other Carson licensing ventures.]

Appellee, Here's Johnny Portable Toilets, Inc., is a Michigan corporation engaged in the business of renting and selling "Here's Johnny" portable toilets. Appellee's founder was aware at the time he formed the corporation that "Here's Johnny" was the introductory slogan for Carson on "The Tonight Show." He indicated that he coupled the phrase with a second one, "The World's Foremost Commodian," to make "a good play on a phrase."

Shortly after appellee went into business in 1976, appellants brought this action alleging unfair competition, trademark infringement under federal and state law, and invasion of privacy and publicity rights. They sought damages and an injunction prohibiting appellee's further use of the phrase "Here's Johnny" as a corporate name or in connection with the sale or rental of its portable toilets.

The [trial] court ordered the dismissal of the appellants' complaint. On the unfair competition claim, the court concluded that the appellants had failed to satisfy the "likelihood of confusion" test. On the right of privacy and right of publicity theories, the court held that these rights extend only to a "name or likeness," and "Here's Johnny" did not qualify.

* * *

Appellants' first claim alleges unfair competition from appellee's business activities in violation of §43(a) of the Lanham Act, 15 U.S.C. §1125(a) (1976), and of Michigan common law. The district court correctly noted that the test for equitable relief under both § 43(a) and Michigan common law is the "likelihood of confusion" standard.

* * *

In Frisch's Restaurants we approved the balancing of several factors in determining whether a likelihood of confusion exists among consumers of goods involved in a § 43(a) action. In that case we examined eight factors:

1. strength of the plaintiff's mark;
2. relatedness of the goods;
3. similarity of the marks;
4. evidence of actual confusion;
5. marketing channels used;
6. likely degree of purchaser care;
7. defendant's intent in selecting the mark;
8. likelihood of expansion of the product lines.

The district court first found that "Here's Johnny" was not such a strong mark that its use for other goods should be entirely foreclosed. 498 F.Supp. at 74. Although the appellee had intended to capitalize on the phrase popularized by Carson, the court concluded that appellee had not intended to deceive the public into believing Carson was connected with the product. Id. at 75. The court noted that there was little evidence of actual confusion and no evidence that appellee's use of the phrase had damaged appellants. For these reasons, the court determined that appellee's use of the phrase "Here's Johnny" did not present a likelihood of confusion, mistake, or deception. Id. at 75–77.

Our review of the record indicates that none of the district court's findings is clearly erroneous. Moreover, on the basis of these findings, we agree with the district court that the appellants have failed to establish a likelihood of confusion. The general concept underlying the likelihood of confusion is that the public believe that "the mark's owner sponsored or otherwise approved the use of the trademark."

* * *

The facts as found by the district court do not implicate such likelihood of confusion, and we affirm the district court on this issue.

The appellants also claim that the appellee's use of the phrase "Here's Johnny" violates the common law right of privacy and right of publicity. The confusion in this area of the law requires a brief analysis of the relationship between these two rights.

* * *

Dean Prosser's analysis has been a source of some confusion in the law. His first three types of the right of privacy generally protect the right "to be let alone," while the right of publicity protects the celebrity's pecuniary interest in the commercial exploitation of his identity. * * * Thus, the right of privacy and the right of publicity protect fundamentally different interests and must be analyzed separately.

We do not believe that Carson's claim that his right of privacy has been invaded is supported by the law or the facts. Apparently, the gist of this claim is that Carson is embarrassed by and considers it odious to be associated with the appellee's product. Clearly, the association does not appeal to Carson's sense of humor. But the facts here presented do not, it appears to us, amount to an invasion of any of the interests protected by the right of privacy.

* * *

The district court dismissed appellants' claim based on the right of publicity because appellee does not use Carson's name or likeness. 498 F.Supp. at 77. It held that it "would not be prudent to allow recovery for a right of publicity claim which does not more specifically identify Johnny Carson." 498 F.Supp. at 78. We believe that, on the contrary, the district court's concept of the right of publicity is too narrow. The right of publicity, as we have stated, is that a celebrity has a protected pecuniary interest in the commercial exploitation of his identity. If the celebrity's identity is commercially exploited, there has been an invasion of his right whether or not his "name or likeness" is used. Carson's identity may be exploited even if his name, John W. Carson, or his picture is not used.

* * *

In Ali v. Playgirl, Inc., 447 F.Supp. 723 (S.D.N.Y. 1978), Muhammad Ali, former heavyweight champion, sued Playgirl magazine under the New York "right of privacy" statute and also alleged a violation of his common law right of publicity. The magazine published a drawing of a nude, black male sitting on a stool in a corner of a boxing ring with hands taped and arms outstretched on the ropes. The district court concluded that Ali's right of publicity was invaded because the drawing was captioned "Mystery Man." The district court found that the identification of Ali was made certain because of an accompanying verse that identified the figure as "The Greatest." The district court took judicial notice of the fact that "Ali has regularly claimed that appellation for himself." Id. at 727.

In Hirsch v. S.C. Johnson & Son, Inc., 90 Wis.2d 379, 280 N.W.2d 129 (1979), the court held that the use by defendant of the name "Crazylegs" on a shaving gel for women violated plaintiff's right of publicity. Plaintiff, Elroy Hirsch, a famous football player, had been known by this nickname. The court said:

> The fact that the name, "Crazylegs," used by Johnson, was a nickname rather than Hirsch's actual name does not preclude a cause of action. All that is required is that the name clearly identify the wronged person. In the instant case, it is not disputed at this juncture of the case that the nickname identified the plaintiff Hirsch. It is argued that there were others who were known by the same name. This, however, does not vitiate the existence of a cause of action. It may, however, if sufficient proof were adduced, affect the quantum of damages should the jury impose liability or it might preclude liability altogether. Prosser points out "that a stage or other fictitious name can be so identified with the plaintiff that he is entitled to protection against its use." 49 Cal.L. Rev., supra at 404. He writes that it would be absurd to say that Samuel L. Clemens would have a cause of action if that name had been used in advertising, but he would not have one for the use of "Mark Twain." If a fictitious name is used in a context which tends to indicate that the name is that of the plaintiff, the factual case for identity is strengthened. Prosser, supra at 403., 280 N.W.2d at 137.

In this case, Earl Braxton, president and owner of Here's Johnny Portable Toilets, Inc., admitted that he knew that the phrase "Here's Johnny" had been used for years to introduce Carson. Moreover, in the opening statement in the district court, appellee's counsel stated:

> Now, we've stipulated in this case that the public tends to associate the words "Johnny Carson," the words "Here's Johnny" with plaintiff, John Carson and, Mr. Braxton, in his deposition, admitted that he knew that and probably absent that identification, he would not have chosen it.

That the "Here's Johnny" name was selected by Braxton because of its identification with Carson was the clear inference from Braxton's testimony irrespective of such admission in the opening statement.

We therefore conclude that, applying the correct legal standards, appellants are entitled to judgment. The proof showed without question that appellee had appropriated Carson's identity in connection with its corporate name and its product.

* * *

It should be obvious from the majority opinion and the dissent that a celebrity's identity may be appropriated in various ways. It is our view that, under the existing authorities, a celebrity's legal right of publicity is invaded whenever his identity is intentionally appropriated for commercial purposes. We simply disagree that the authorities limit the right of publicity as contended by the dissent. It is not fatal to appellant's claim that appellee did not use his "name." Indeed, there would have been no violation of his right of publicity even if appellee had used his name, such as "J. William Carson Portable Toilet" or the "John William Carson Portable Toilet" or the "J. W. Carson Portable Toilet." The reason is that, though literally using appellant's "name," the appellee would not have appropriated Carson's identity as a celebrity. Here there was an appropriation of Carson's identity without using his "name."

* * *

The judgment of the district court is vacated and the case remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

COMMENT

The Carson and Crowell cases give a sense of how solicitous the courts have been to right of publicity claims. While the phrase concededly is identified with Carson, there is no proof of financial harm and no evidence that anyone confused the portable toilet company with Carson. Might the concern celebrities have about their attributes be similar to those of companies fearing that media use of trademarked names will render the terms generic? [143]

One characteristic the right of publicity retains in common with common law invasion of privacy is the notion of wrongful use or wrongful behavior. Plaintiffs Carson, Eastwood, and Presley seem more concerned with exclusive control than with financial harm. Using anyone's name or likeness is wrongful in the sense that it falsely implies assent. But the cases are not consistent in requiring proof that the typical audience member interpret the use as assent, an apparently critical element to establishing that a defendant is profiting from a celebrity.

Judge Kennedy's dissent in Carson was based largely on the false implication of assent argument:

* * *

> There is nothing in the record to suggest that "Here's Johnny" has any nexus to Johnny Carson other than being the introduction to his personal appearances. The phrase is not part of an identity that he created. In its content "Here's Johnny" is a very simple and common introduction. The content of the phrase neither originated with Johnny Carson nor is it confined to the world of entertainment. The phrase is not said by Johnny Carson, but said of him. Its association with him is derived, in large part, by the context in which it is said—generally by Ed McMahon in a drawn out and distinctive voice after the theme music to "The Tonight Show" is played, and immediately prior to Johnny Carson's own entrance. Appellee's use of the content "Here's Johnny," in light of its value as a double entendre, written on its product and corporate name, and therefore outside of the context in which it is associated with Johnny Carson, does little to rob Johnny Carson of something which is unique to him or a product of his own efforts.

> The right of publicity, whether tied to name, likeness, achievements, identifying characteristics or actual performances, etc. conflicts with the economic and expressive interests of others.

Kennedy suggested in a footnote that the phrase may be more closely associated with McMahon than with Carson.

In a similar case, Guy Lombardo's common law claim for appropriation of his "public personality" as "Mr. New Year's Eve" was allowed. [144]

The greatest risk for the press and media generally is from those cases that have allowed actions or recovery despite plainly creative or newsworthy ventures. A Broadway musical's use in parody of the appearance and style of the Marx Brothers violated the deceased entertainers' right of publicity.[145] A First Amendment defense was allowed when comedian Pat Paulsen, a perennial gag candidate for president, found his picture being sold on campaign posters.[146] Similarly, a New York political activist's claim failed when he was satirized in print. The use of the public figure's identity was a fair one.[147]

By contrast, overt commercial uses are normally easy to spot—and therefore easy for the press and media to avoid. When a car company hired Bette Midler's former backup singer to imitate Midler as closely as possible on a song associated with Midler, it took little time to see the wrongful use.[148]

The issues regarding the right of publicity, as so much else in the law of privacy and related areas of the law, are in flux. The best advice for those who would use another's likeness or name is to be sure to get a release or be confident that the use is newsworthy. Some have suggested a federal right of publicity statute is needed.[149] Until such a statute is passed or the courts reach uniformity, it will be important to know local state law.

SEARCHING FOR MEDIA LIABILITY: EMOTIONAL DISTRESS, FORESEEABLE HARMS, AND OUTRAGEOUS BEHAVIORS

Resourceful plaintiffs, or more likely resourceful plaintiffs' lawyers, are always seeking new approaches to imposing liability upon the press. Recently numerous cases have been filed alleging either negligent or intentional infliction of emotional (mental) distress. A key to the cause of action is that, like private facts, liability hinges on the behavior and content of the press, not on truth or falsity.

Like privacy, infliction of mental distress protects individual well-being, and has been adopted slowly as a common law tort against the media. Generally, negligent infliction requires that the defendant have published something where danger of harm is apparent.[150] For example, it would be reasonable to foresee that publication of names and pictures of undercover espionage agents places them at risk. The infliction of distress occurs when the risk was recognized and information published anyway, or when the risk was not recognized but was of a nature that it should have been. The latter was the basis of a claim by a woman who had been assaulted. When the local newspaper obtained her address from the police and published it with the suspect still at large, she claimed they put her at risk, and sued both.

HYDE v. CITY OF COLUMBIA

637 S.W.2D 251 (MO.APP. 1982).

SHANGLER, Presiding J.:

The plaintiff Hyde sued the City of Columbia for the negligent disclosure of her name and address by the city police to reporter Brown of the Columbia Daily Tribune and to reporter Potter of the Columbia Missourian and for the negligent publication of that information subsequently by the newspapers. The petition alleges that on August 20, 1980, after midnight, the plaintiff was abducted and kidnapped by an unknown male assailant but escaped from his car; that she made a full report of that incident to the City of Columbia Police Department; that on that date, the police, without knowledge or authority of the plaintiff, released her name and address to the reporters for publication when the police knew the assailant was still at large; that on that very day the Columbia Daily Tribune published that information and on the next day, August 21, 1980, the Columbia Missourian published that information with the knowledge that the assailant was not in custody. The petition then alleges that the release and publication of her name and address identified the plaintiff to the unknown assailant who thereafter terrorized her on seven different occasions. The petition joined the reporters Brown and Potter, the newspapers Columbia Daily Tribune and Columbia Missourian and the City of Columbia as defendants. The prayer was for actual damages.

The several defendants moved to dismiss the petition on the general ground that the allegations failed to state a claim for relief. The memorandum of reporter Brown and newspaper Columbia Daily Tribune explicated the grounds more specifically: "The plaintiff's petition fails to state a claim against these defendants either as an action for libel, or for the invasion of privacy." The memorandum of the defendant City of Columbia explicated that the petition amounted to neither a claim of outrageous conduct nor of an invasion of privacy and that the information disclosed to the press was, in any event, a public record under §§ 610.010 and 610.025, so the disclosure was not actionable. The motions were sustained and the court dismissed the petition with prejudice. The plaintiff appeals the judgment, but only as to the defendants City of Columbia, reporter Brown and newspaper Columbia Daily Tribune.

Actionable negligence encompasses essential proofs: a duty by the defendant to protect the plaintiff from harm, neglect of that duty, and injury to the plaintiff from that neglect. Stevens v. Wetterau Foods, Inc., 501 S.W.2d 494, 498[7, 8] (Mo.App. 1973). To plead the ultimate fact of actionable negligence [and hence a substantive remedy well-stated], the petitioner must describe the duty owed by the defendant, the breach the petitioner charges, and the injury which results. Einhaus v. O. Ames Co., 547 S.W.2d 821[4, 5] (Mo.App. 1977).

The pleadings enlarged by the interrogatory evidence, understood in legal effect, posit that the plaintiff reported the kidnapping and assault to the police as an official account of a crime and not for publication, and that the municipality owed the victim a duty not to disclose her identity and address to the reporter for publication without prior consent—and so protect her from the foreseeable risk of intentional harm by the assailant, when the police knew the assailant was still at large and the practice of disclosure was otherwise forbidden in the circumstances by internal policy, but that the municipality breached the duty and the plaintiff suffered emotional harm from the intentional threats of imminent death and injury proximately caused by the negligent conduct of the City of Columbia. The pleadings understood in legal effect posit also that the defendants reporter and newspaper owed a duty to the victim not to publish her identity and address and so protect her from the foreseeable risk of intentional harm by the assailant, when they knew the assailant was still at large and the practice of publication was otherwise forbidden by internal policy, but that reporter Brown and newspaper Columbia Daily Tribune breached the duty and the plaintiff suffered emotional harm from the intentional threats of imminent death and injury proximately caused by the negligent conduct of the reporter and newspaper.

The several defendants contend, nevertheless, that these averments amount to no duty the law fixes upon them, and so none they are bound to observe. The newspaper defendants contend moreover that such a duty were onerous to the free speech and free press the First Amendment protects, and so not a valid limitation to that exercise. The several defendants argue also that, in any event, a crime against persons report is a public record under the Sunshine Law [§§ 610.010 to 610.120], thus, to give publicity to information already public can engender no liability.

In negligence jurisprudence, whether a duty exists presents a question of law. Restatement (Second) of Torts § 4 (1965). When the existence of a duty to use due care rests on a relationship between persons, the law has simply placed the actor under obligation for the benefit of another person—the plaintiff—in the given circumstances. Or, more simply, the law has determined that "the interest of the plaintiff which has suffered invasion [is] entitled to legal protection at the hands of the defendant." Prosser, The Law of Torts, § 37, p. 206 and § 53 (4th ed. 1971). Thus, essential to liability for negligence is a relationship the law recognizes as the basis of a duty of care between the inflictor of injury and the person injured. * * * The judicial determination of the existence of a duty rests on sound public policy as derived from a calculus of factors: among them, the social consensus that the interest is worthy of protection; the foreseeability of harm and the degree of certainty that the protected person suffered injury; moral blame society attaches to the conduct; the prevention of future harm; considerations of cost and ability to spread the risk of loss; the economic burden upon the actor and the community—and others. * * * To these determinants we add that, when the actor is a public agency [or quasi-public institution, such as the press], the role the law assigns to that function.

* * *

Our law imposes the duty of an actor in some circumstances to foresee that the misconduct of a third person will result in injury to another [the plaintiff] and imposes liability for failure to protect against that risk of harm. * * * Scheibel v. Hillis, 531 S.W.2d 285 (Mo. banc 1976) expounds the standard [a paraphrase of Restatement (Second) of Torts § 449 (1965)], l.c. 288[9]:

> [I]f the foreseeable likelihood that a third person may act in a particular manner is one of the hazards which makes a person negligent, such an act of a third party, whether innocent, negligent, intentionally tortious or criminal, does not prevent that person from being liable for the harm caused thereby.

* * * Thus, conduct may be negligent solely because the actor should have recognized that it would expose the person of another to an unreasonable risk of criminal aggression. Restatement (Second) of Torts § 448, comment c (1965). In certain situations, the law expects a reasonable actor to anticipate and protect the plaintiff against the intentional or criminal misconduct of a third person whom the actor has given occasion for association with the plaintiff, when the actor knows or should know that the third person is "peculiarly likely to commit intentional misconduct, under circumstances which afford a peculiar opportunity for temptation for such misconduct."

* * *

The integral Law opens to the public—even without an interest to vindicate—the meetings and records of those entrusted with the public business. * * * The information disclosed by the municipal police department to the reporter and published by the newspaper was not from a record of arrest, but from a criminal investigation record. The enumerations of § 610.025 do not exempt from disclosure the investigation records of a law enforcement agency. [In that respect, our Conduct of Public Business [Sunshine] Law stands alone and singular from all other such enactments.] Thus, absent an intention otherwise discernible from the statutory purpose as aided by construction of the text, the records of the criminal investigation process up to the event of arrest are public records and altogether unprotected from disclosure on demand.

* * *

The averments of the petition given the most favorable intendment as a negligence cause of action fall within these statements of principle and incidences of tort liability. The allegations by the female plaintiff that she was abducted by an unknown assailant, made escape, then gave official report of the crime [and description of the assailant] to the municipal police, the release of the name and address of the victim by the police to the reporter without her consent and with knowledge that the assailant was still at large, and the publication of that information by the newspaper also with that knowledge, describe conditions which posed an especial temptation and opportunity to the third-party assailant for intentional and criminal aggression upon the victim to her injury, and so plead a prima facie breach of duty—unless, as the municipality and newspaper contend, the information was a public record under the Sunshine Law and otherwise protected by the First Amendment. The press enjoys no constitutional right to police records. * * * The right of the defendant news medium to have the name and address of the victim from the municipal police, therefore, depends upon whether that information was a public record.

* * * Whatever vestige of a common law interest to enable inspection lingered in §§ 109.180 and 109.190 was swept away by the enactment of the Sunshine Law [§§ 610.010 through 610.120]. That chapter defines a public record as any record retained by or of any public governmental body [§ 610.010(4)] and then directs that the public records shall be open to the public for inspection and duplication [§ 610.015].

* * *

To construe the Sunshine Law to open all criminal investigation information to anyone with a request subserves neither the public safety policy of our state nor the personal security of a victim—but rather, courts constitutional violations of the right of privacy of a witness or other citizen unwittingly drawn into the criminal investigation process as well as the right of an accused to a fair trial. Such a construction leads to the absurdity [adroitly drawn by the defendants] that an assailant unknown as such to the authorities, from whom the victim has escaped, need simply walk into the police station, demand name and address or other personal information—without possibility of lawful refusal, so as to intimidate the victim as a witness or commit other injury. * * *

* * *

To avoid an absurd—even unlawful—application of the statute as written, we determine that the name and address of a victim of crime who can identify an assailant not yet in custody is not a public record under the Sunshine Law.

In the absence of an obligation imposed by the statute, the disclosure of the name and address of the victim-plaintiff by the municipal police department to the reporter was gratuitous. The disclosure served no essential criminal investigation role of the police, but rather was a foreseeable impediment to that function by the encouragement of an obstruction of justice by the assailant. The disclosure was also a threat to the very personal safety of the victim. The deliberate practice of the municipal police department to withhold information of that ilk from the general public attests to the fact that the risk of injury to the victim-plaintiff from disclosure was foreseeable.

* * *

The defendant reporter and newspaper contend that the report of the abduction by the victim to the police—facts pleaded in the petition—was her consent to the preparation of the formal crime report and its subsequent publication by the news medium. That argument disregards altogether the duty of citizenship to report criminal conduct—to raise a "hue and cry" of felony to the authorities. * * *

That the victim-name-and-address information kept by the municipal police department was by law confidential does not mean that once disclosed to a newspaper it retained its confidential character. Nor do allegations which suffice to plead a cause of action against the official keeper for the negligent release of that confidential record ipso facto suffice as a tort cause of action against a news medium for publication of that information. * * *

The defendants reporter and newspaper contend that the report of crime was a matter of legitimate public concern and interest so that the adjudication of tort liability for the publication of that information were an impermissible interference with the exercise of free speech and of a free press in violation of the First Amendment. The defendants develop argument in terms of newsworthiness of the publication and the status of the victim-plaintiff as a subject of public interest. They apply these considerations and commingle them with the invasion of privacy, outrageous conduct and defamation torts. The petition, however, pleads negligence—a tort which protects an interest distinctive from the other torts. The First Amendment protects a news medium from tortious publication to the extent that the interest in free speech and free press overbalances the governmental interest the tort protects.

* * *

New York Times v. Sullivan, held that the First Amendment protects a newspaper from liability for defamatory publications about the official conduct of a public official unless done with actual malice * * * with a knowing falsity or reckless disregard for the truth. That decision rested on the rationale that the First Amendment protected erroneous speech exercised in good faith more than the personal reputation of a public official—and, cognately, that the threat of large damage awards unduly inhibits open debate on public issues.

* * *

Gertz repudiated the public interest-newsworthy test [the principle the news media defendants assert to avoid liability to the victim-plaintiff] in actions for defamation and balanced, rather, the free speech free press values against the cogent state interests in the compensation of private injury to reputation. In that analysis, the Court acknowledged the unique role of the institutional press under the constitution.

* * *

It is thus the public figure—private person dichotomy [and not the newsworthiness of the conduct] which determines between a public and private defamation plaintiff—and hence whether the stricture of the New York Times constitutional privilege applies. * * *

> The state may not impose liability without fault [the usual common law rule] against the news media; a plaintiff must prove at least negligence against the publisher. [Gertz, l.c. 347, 94 S.Ct. 3010] The recovery is limited to compensation for actual damages and compensation for a tort injury. [Gertz, l.c. 348, 94 S.Ct. 3011]
>
> A recovery for punitive damages is allowed only * * * upon proof of * * * the New York Times knowing or reckless falsity standard of liability. [Gertz, l.c. 350, 94 S.Ct. 3012]

* * *

The cause of action the victim-plaintiff asserts against the news medium defendants is for negligence, and not on any theory of liability without fault. The events the petition describes are of a private person become unwilling victim of a crime—not of one who has injected her person into a public controversy. The damages she pleads are for actual loss. In sum, the petition comes validly within the culminated constitutional balance struck by Gertz which allows a private redress against a newspaper for a negligent publication of information on a theory of fault free from the proof constraints of New York Times. The question remains then whether under the negligence law of our state the petition pleads a cause of action.

The contentions of the several defendants confront the petition, variously, as a cause of action for defamation, invasion of privacy, and for outrageous conduct. Their constitutional, as well as local law, arguments recite principles apt to defamation and privacy, but not negligence cases. The defendants assume that each of those remedies protects the same private interest. They do not. * * * The negligence remedy extends to protect against invasion of bodily security even to life itself.

* * *

Just as the law does not extend privilege to protect a news medium against the defamatory or invasion of privacy publication of information of trivial public interest, so the law does not impose a duty of care to foresee an injury to another on a slight probability alone, but only on "some probability of sufficient moment to induce the reasonable mind to take precautions which would avoid it."

* * *

We have determined that the name and address of the victim-plaintiff prior to the arrest of the assailant was not an official report under the Sunshine Law and so was not a privileged publication under the tenor of that statute or the rules of the common law. That view accords with the rationale of our decisions, the statement of principle in Restatement (Second) of Torts § 611 (1977) and other sound authority. Cianci v. New York Times Publishing Company, 639 F.2d 54, 70 (2d Cir. 1980); Lancour v. Herald & Globe Ass'n., 111 Vt. 371, 17 A.2d 253 (1941). We determine also that the name and address of an abduction witness who can identify an assailant still at large before arrest is a matter of such trivial public concern compared with the high probability of risk to the victim by their publication, that a news medium owes a duty in such circumstances to use reasonable care not to give likely occasion for a third party [assailant still at large] to do injury to the plaintiff by the publication. That duty derives as an "expression of the sum total of those considerations of policy which lead the law to say that the particular plaintiff is entitled to protection." Prosser, The Law of Torts, 325–6 (4th ed. 1971). It derives from a balance of interests between the public right to know and the individual right to personal security—between the social value of the right the press advances and the social value of the right of the individual at risk. Restatement (Second) of Torts §§ 291–293 (1965). It derives from the social consensus that common decency considers such information of insignificant public importance compared to the injury likely to be done by the exposure. * * *

The petition does not contest the truth of the publication nor assail an unpopular opinion. It does not tend the medium to that course of self-censorship which offends a free press, but engenders an attitude of due care for the safety of one likely to be harmed from the reportage of trivial information. To delete the name and address of the abduction victim from the news medium publication would impair no significant news function nor public interest in the reportage of crime and apprehension of criminals. To report that information when the assailant can be identified—as the news publication clearly informs—rather, encourages not only a likelihood of injury but of additional crime.

The petition of the victim-plaintiff taken at most favorable intendment states a cause of action in negligence against the news medium defendants free from the proof constraints of New York Times v. Sullivan as well as any constraints of common law privilege.

* * *

The municipal defendant contends finally that—a legal duty to the plaintiff and a breach of that duty assumed—nevertheless the petition does not allege a physical injury and so does not state a cause of action in negligence. The argument goes that "absent physical injury or malicious, wilfull, wanton and inhuman conduct" our law does not permit recovery for mental distress—the only injury the petition pleads.

The petition is in negligence. It is the likelihood of injury to another that gives rise to the duty to exercise due care. The test of negligence liability is foreseeability: that the actor knows or has reason to foresee that the act involves an unreasonable risk of injury to another but fails to protect against that hazard.

* * *

These pleadings and facts of discovery, at best intendment, allow inference that the past conduct, reported character and tendency of the third-person assailant to violence, were known or reasonably knowable to the several defendants so that it was reasonably foreseeable that the publication of the name and address of the victim, while the assailant was still at large, was a temptation to that third person to inflict an intentional harm upon the victim-plaintiff—a foreseeable risk the several defendants had a duty to prevent.

COMMENT

The court seemed to be influenced by evidence of the police practice of not ordinarily giving out addresses. The practice, the court said, "attests to the fact that the risk of injury to the victim-plaintiff from disclosure was foreseeable." While that may be true of the risk of injury, it does not explain how the newspaper could have or should have assessed the risk of mental distress.

The court refused to apply libel law's qualified privilege to report on matters in the public interest in this context. The privilege applies, the court said, "only as to information which affects a sufficiently important public interest." Why was not truth or newsworthiness a defense?

The Hyde case has understandably worried many. It is not easy to foresee the limits of its rationale. Can any information which carries the potential of causing harm now be the subject of a negligent infliction of mental distress action? For example, can the press harm people by printing truthful but defamatory stories? Is injured reputation the sort of harm the Hyde court has in mind?

While the newspaper's decision to publish the address and name certainly appears unwise, is the corollary of having judges and juries address these issues wiser? Such editorial judgments have traditionally been the province of ethics, not law. Under the Sullivan approach used in libel and much of privacy, the law will countenance much that is questionable, tacky, even undesirable. Does Hyde signal a judicial willingness to enforce social responsibility upon the press? [151]

The courts have certainly been busy with mental and emotional distress claims. Few cases have succeeded. Some courts see the cause of action as duplicative of privacy or libel and tell plaintiffs to bring those suits instead. [152] Several cases have involved erroneous obituaries or telephone listings, with decisions for defendants. [153] One plaintiff failed after charging that an inadequate retraction constituted infliction. [154] But at the same time specific cases fail, many states have nonetheless recognized the cause of action as it applies to the media. The difficult part for plaintiffs has been foreseeability.

Intentional infliction requires proof of intent, normally by showing a pattern or course of behavior. In addition, the harmful material generally must be aimed directly at the person claiming distress. In common law cases not involving media, four factors were identified with proving intentional infliction. The defendant's conduct must be extreme and outrageous; the defendant must have acted with intent or recklessness; the defendant's conduct must have been the proximate cause of the distress; and, the distress must be severe. [155] Most of the elements were in place when Jerry Falwell sued Larry Flynt for libel, invasion of privacy, and intentional infliction of emotional distress over a parody that portrayed Falwell as a drunkard who was introduced to sex by his mother. There was no doubt about intent—Flynt stood on the steps of the Supreme Court to tell reporters he had aimed to cause Falwell distress. By the time the case reached the high court, only the infliction claim remained.

The Supreme Court's opinion in Hustler Magazine, Inc. v. Falwell, 14 Med.L.Rptr. 2281, 108 S.Ct. 876 (1988), see this text, p. 261, makes it plain that parody or satire of public figures is unlikely to result in liability. But the Court's holding implies that imposing liability will be easier for private figures:

> We conclude that public figures and public officials may not recover for the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress by reason of publications such as the one here at issue without showing in addition that the publication contains a false statement of fact which was made with "actual malice," i.e., with knowledge that the statement was false or with reckless disregard as to whether or not it was true.

The Court applies a libel test to a case where truth or falsity is not the issue. It had already been decided that no reasonable reader would construe the parody as a statement of fact. So a test focusing on falsity seems misplaced. Why didn't the Court simply say that humor was absolutely protected? Perhaps it is willing to see how the tort develops in the lower courts. Based on Falwell, intentional infliction of emotional distress, like false light privacy before it, seems to be on its way to becoming a hybrid tort.

Closely related to negligent or intentional infliction are claims that media content led to physical injury. In the past, such cases have usually failed. When teens committed suicide after listening to heavy metal rock music[156] and a child was injured trying to duplicate a trick from the Mickey Mouse Club,[157] they were barred from suit on First Amendment grounds. Although plaintiffs have not prevailed, again largely on the grounds that it was not reasonable to expect that defendants would have foreseen risks to specific plaintiffs, scholarly comment seems to favor recovery.[158]

When murder is the risk, attention gets focused. Soldier of Fortune magazine, a specialized publication for self-styled mercenary soldiers, lost twice in two separate cases in its attempts for summary judgment. In both cases, plaintiffs claimed that the magazine ran ads promoting murderers for hire. In the first case, the murder was attempted but failed,[159] in the second the victim was murdered.[160] The parties dispute whether the language of the advertisements clearly enough solicits contracts for murder to have placed the magazine on notice of the risk. Normally, publishers have no duty to investigate the contents of advertisements. If the courts subsequently adopt a rule that ads must be investigated if the risk of harm is apparent, the press will have another avenue to liability to deal with. Does the argument that extreme risks justify imposing a standard of reasonable inspection seem persuasive?

Other causes of action, including outrage, and even conspiracy under federal civil rights laws, have been tried by plaintiffs seeking to impose liability on the media. These alternative actions have failed—for now. Modern tort law development has focused to a significant extent on preventing harms and on spreading the costs of injuries.[161] Perhaps recent developments in media liability for nondefamatory content are part of that trend.

Journalist's Privilege

IS THERE A CONSTITUTIONAL OR COMMON LAW PRIVILEGE TO PROTECT NOTES, TAPES, AND THE IDENTITIES OF SOURCES?

The acceptance of a privilege for reporters to withhold the names of sources or to refuse to provide notes and materials used in preparing news stories was high on the media's agenda of journalism law issues in the 1970s and early 1980s. Journalists argued that safeguarding identities of sources was essential to effective newsgathering. They claimed, and continue to claim, that the privilege is needed to ensure the flow of vital information to the public. Refusal to recognize the privilege would result in a "chill" on the newsgathering process.

Chill occurs when sources who might otherwise give information to reporters refuse to do so because their identities or information may not remain confidential. It also occurs when journalists fearing reprisals do not publish what they otherwise would. Calls for recognition of the privilege are not new, having been made since the mid-1850s. The practice of using anonymous sources itself began in the early years of the nation.

Rapid increases in the number of subpoenas issued against journalists and news organizations in the late 1960s and early 1970s gave urgency to the call for privilege.[1] Most subpoenas at that time derived from criminal proceedings and grand jury investigations. The subpoena explosion coincided with a growth in the role of investigative reporting in American journalism and, later, with the Watergate scandal.

However sound the privilege appeared to reporters, it is directly opposed by the legal system's distaste for evidentiary privileges. Traditionally, "the public has a right to every man's evidence."[2] The tradition is based on the belief that society is best served by requiring every individual to testify to relevant facts on issues being investigated or litigated.[3] Unless covered by a specific statutory or other exception to the general requirement of testifying, one must appear and answer questions when subpoenaed or otherwise called.

A number of privileges have long been accepted, but a privilege for reporters and journalists is not among them. Traditionally, the common law exempted compelled testimony concerning a lawyer-client relationship. Relationships between husbands and wives, priests and penitents, and doctors and patients were accorded a similar privilege. These privileges entered our legal system through the common law but are now usually covered by state and federal statutes.

A number of other privileges have been recognized in some jurisdictions, including relationships between accountants, architects, and their clients. Even government informers have enjoyed anonymity unless their identities are needed to determine guilt or innocence.[4] Limited privilege has also been granted against disclosure of religious beliefs, political votes, trade secrets, state secrets, and other categories of personal or official information. Even those privileges provided by statute, however, are subject to a judicial rule that any privilege must be interpreted as narrowly as possible,[5] to keep exceptions at a minimum.

Similar recognition of journalists' claims for a privilege to protect the identities of sources and material such as unpublished notes, tapes, and photographs has been slower to emerge.

Massachusetts, for example, has been more resistant than most states to a privilege for reporters. In 1982, when Paul Corsetti of the Boston Herald American refused to testify in court about what an identified source told him in a telephone conversation, he was sentenced to three months in jail for criminal contempt. Corsetti's source had implicated himself in a murder. The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court (that state's highest court) upheld the contempt order.[6] Corsetti ultimately served only eight days in jail as the case wound its way through the courts.

The Massachusetts court rejected both Corsetti's claims for a constitutional and common law privilege to refuse to testify. But the court implied that in some circumstances it might recognize a privilege:

> Where the source is disclosed and the testimony sought from the reporter concerns information already made public, the [s]tate's interest in the use of that information overrides the reporter's claim that the use of that information should be restricted. This is not a case where the Commonwealth has used a reporter to obtain an indictment or to do its investigative work.

The court reflects a judicial willingness to balance what it sees as the needs of justice against the reporter's perception of what it takes to serve the public's informational needs.

In Sinnott v. Boston Retirement Board, 15 Med.L.Rptr. 1608, 524 N.E.2d 100 (Mass. 1988), the same Massachusetts court upheld a trial judge's decision to deny a motion that would have compelled a nonparty reporter to disclose confidential sources. Richard Sinnott filed a civil action against various city officials after the contents of his application for a disability pension had been disclosed in a Boston Globe story written by reporter Charles Radin. Sinnott, according to the article, attributed his disability to the emotional effects of having acted as "city censor" at two rock concerts, among other things. A lone appeals court judge had entered a judgment of civil contempt against Radin. Radin's article specifically noted that the information was "shared with a Globe reporter by City Hall sources." Characterizing the issue as simply one of whether the trial judge had abused his discretion in supervising discovery, the court concluded:

> It is well settled that, in supervising discovery, a presiding judge is "obliged to consider the effect that compelled discovery would have on the 'values protected by the First Amendment [even] though * * * entitled to no constitutional privilege.' " * * * [T]he critical inquiry, once there is "some showing that the asserted damage to the free flow of information is more than speculative" * * * requires "a balancing between the public interest in every person's evidence and the public interest in protecting the free flow of information." (Emphasis added.)

The court reviewed the trial judge's balancing of the interests and concluded that denial of the motion was appropriate because Sinnott had not exhausted potential alternative sources before seeking Radin's sources. While the Supreme Judicial Court protested that it had not previously recognized and was not now recognizing a special privilege for journalists, it nonetheless prevented disclosure of sources for reasons that would not apply to "every person," using a variety of legal bases.

The disingenuous Massachusetts approach is not unusual. Flat assertions of absolute privilege on either constitutional or common law grounds have generally been rejected. Common law is an awkward device for creation of evidentiary privileges at a time when most are statutory. And the federal Constitution by its terms extends no such privilege beyond the Fifth Amendment's provision against self-incrimination. Developments in Massachusetts and other states are a result of a direct invitation by the United States Supreme Court.

THE ENIGMATIC BRANZBURG CASE

In 1972, a divided Court in Branzburg v. Hayes, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 2617, 408 U.S. 665 (1972), struck the balance in favor of requiring reporters to testify when called. The Court, recognizing a duty to testify that covers even the president of the United States, refused to find either an absolute or a qualified privilege in the First Amendment that protects reporters when called to testify before a grand jury.

A minority of four justices vigorously pressed the case for privilege. Justice Potter Stewart modified his position from a 1958 case in which Marie Torre, a columnist for the New York Herald Tribune, went to jail in spite of her then-novel First Amendment justification for refusing to name a source. The source, who remained unidentified, was responsible for a statement that provoked Judy Garland into filing a libel suit against CBS. Stewart, then a circuit judge, held for a unanimous court that the duty to testify in court had roots as deep as the free press guarantee. The question asked of Torre, the court said, went to the heart of the plaintiff's claim, and there were no alternate sources.

"The right to sue and defend in the courts," said Stewart, "is the alternative of force. In an organized society it is the right conservative of all other rights, and lies at the foundation of orderly government." The suggestion is that balancing in these kinds of cases is possible. Garland v. Torre, 259 F.2d 545 (2d Cir. 1958), cert. den. 358 U.S. 910 (1958).

In Branzburg, the Court considered three appeals. All three involved reporters who were called to testify before grand juries. Paul Branzburg, a reporter for the Louisville Courier-Journal, had written a story in 1969 describing his observations of marijuana being processed into hashish. He promised confidentiality as a condition of being allowed to observe. The published story noted the confidentiality promise. Branzburg was subpoenaed by the county grand jury, appeared, but refused to answer when asked to identify his sources. He based his refusal on Kentucky's reporters' privilege statute, the First Amendment, and the Kentucky constitution. The state court said that the constitutional and statutory arguments did not permit a reporter to refuse to testify about events that had been personally observed. Branzburg v. Pound, 461 S.W.2d 345 (Ky.App. 1970).

A grand jury sought Branzburg's testimony a second time after a January 1971 story on drug use in Frankfort, Kentucky. Part of the report was based on information from sources also promised anonymity. Branzburg moved to quash the grand jury subpoena. He did obtain an order protecting him from revealing "confidential associations, sources, or information," but was told to testify concerning what he had witnessed. He refused to appear, and the court of appeals again rejected his privilege arguments.

Paul Pappas, a reporter for television station WTEV in New Bedford, Massachusetts, reported on civil disorders there. He planned to cover a Black Panther news conference, but the group was initially distrustful. The militant Blank Panthers were believed by many officials to be planning guerrilla warfare against white society. Pappas was allowed to enter the group's headquarters on condition that he not disclose anything he saw or heard. He prepared no story based on the visit. Later he was called by the county grand jury. He appeared but refused to answer questions about what had taken place, claiming a privilege based on the First Amendment. A second summons was served, and Pappas this time refused even to appear. The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court denied Pappas's motion to quash, emphasizing the need for everyone's testimony. The claim that lack of privilege would chill newsgathering was deemed "indirect, theoretical, and uncertain." In re Pappas, 266 N.E.2d 297 (Mass. 1971).

Earl Caldwell, West Coast bureau chief for the New York Times, was in California also covering the Black Panthers. He received a subpoena duces tecum ordering him both to appear before a federal grand jury and to bring his notes, tape-recorded interviews, and other materials. Caldwell and his attorneys negotiated a continuance with federal government attorneys. A second subpoena ordered Caldwell to appear and testify. He moved to quash, arguing that appearing in secret before the grand jury would destroy his working relationship with sources among the Black Panthers. A federal district court issued a protective order preventing disclosure of sources and materials. Application of Caldwell, 311 F.Supp. 358 (N.D.Cal. 1970). The grand jury term expired.

A new grand jury was convened, and a third subpoena was issued to Caldwell. This time Caldwell's motion to quash was denied, and he was found in contempt. The Ninth Circuit reversed. Viewing the issue as whether Caldwell was required to appear before the grand jury at all, the court first agreed that the First Amendment provided a qualified testimonial privilege to journalists. The court accepted Caldwell's arguments that compelled testimony would deter informants and cause him to censor his writings. The court held that Caldwell was privileged to withhold his testimony unless there were compelling reasons for it. The Ninth Circuit began to fashion a three-part test to balance interests: (1) relevance, (2) lack of alternate sources, and (3) compelling public need. The court also determined there was little need for Caldwell to appear before the grand jury since there was nothing he could testify to that had not already been made public in his news stories. Caldwell v. United States, 434 F.2d 1081 (9th Cir. 1970). The three-part test would reappear a year later in Alexander Bickel's oral arguments before the Supreme Court on the New York Times's behalf in Branzburg.

The Ninth Circuit had delivered what ultimately would become a key decision in the realm of journalist's privilege. The court declared:

> To convert news gatherers into Department of Justice investigators is to invade the autonomy of the press by imposing a governmental function upon them. To do so where the result is to diminish their future capacity as news gatherers is destructive of their public function. To accomplish this where it has not been shown to be essential to the Grand Jury inquiry simply cannot be justified in the public interest. Further it is not unreasonable to expect journalists everywhere to temper their reporting so as to reduce the probability that they will be required to submit to interrogation. The First Amendment guards against governmental action that induces self-censorship.

The stage was set for a landmark decision.

BRANZBURG v. HAYES

408 U.S. 665, 92 S.CT. 2646, 33 L.ED.2D 626 (1972).

[EDITORIAL NOTE Certiorari was granted to review judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, upholding refusal of a newsman to appear and testify before a grand jury with respect to confidential sources, and judgments of the Court of Appeals of Kentucky, and the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, rejecting claimed rights of newsmen to refuse to testify before grand juries with respect to confidential sources. The Supreme Court, per Justice White, held that requiring journalists to appear and testify before state or federal grand juries does not abridge the freedom of speech and press guaranteed by the First Amendment; and that a journalist's agreement to conceal criminal conduct of his news sources, or evidence thereof, does not give rise to any constitutional testimonial privilege with respect thereto.]

* * *

Opinion of the Court by Justice WHITE, announced by the Chief Justice.

* * *

Petitioners Branzburg and Pappas and respondent Caldwell press First Amendment Claims that may be simply put: that to gather news it is often necessary to agree either not to identify the source of information published or to publish only part of the facts revealed, or both; that if the reporter is nevertheless forced to reveal these confidences to a grand jury, the source so identified and other confidential sources of other reporters will be measurably deterred from furnishing publishable information, all to the detriment of the free flow of information protected by the First Amendment. Although petitioners do not claim an absolute privilege against official interrogation in all circumstances, they assert that the reporter should not be forced either to appear or to testify before a grand jury or at trial until and unless sufficient grounds are shown for believing that the reporter possesses information relevant to a crime the grand jury is investigating, that the information the reporter has is unavailable from other sources, and that the need for the information is sufficiently compelling to override the claimed invasion of First Amendment interests occasioned by the disclosure.

* * *

We do not question the significance of free speech, press or assembly to the country's welfare. Nor is it suggested that news gathering does not qualify for First Amendment protection; without some protection for seeking out the news, freedom of the press could be eviscerated. But this case involves no intrusions upon speech or assembly, no prior restraint or restriction on what the press may publish, and no express or implied command that the press publish what it prefers to withhold. * * * The use of confidential sources by the press is not forbidden or restricted; reporters remain free to seek news from any source by means within the law. No attempt is made to require the press to publish its sources of information or indiscriminately to disclose them on request.

The sole issue before us is the obligation of reporters to respond to grand jury subpoenas as other citizens do and to answer questions relevant to an investigation into the commission of crime. [Emphasis added.] Citizens generally are not constitutionally immune from grand jury subpoenas; and neither the First Amendment nor other constitutional provision protects the average citizen from disclosing to a grand jury information that he has received in confidence. The claim is, however, that reporters are exempt from these obligations because if forced to respond to subpoenas and identify their sources or disclose other confidences, their informants will refuse or be reluctant to furnish newsworthy information in the future. This asserted burden on news gathering is said to make compelled testimony from newsmen constitutionally suspect and to require a privileged position for them.

It is clear that the First Amendment does not invalidate every incidental burdening of the press that may result from the enforcement of civil or criminal statutes of general applicability. * * *

The prevailing view is that the press is not free with impunity to publish everything and anything it desires to publish. Although it may deter or regulate what is said or published, the press may not circulate knowing or reckless falsehoods damaging to private reputation without subjecting itself to liability for damages, including punitive damages, or even criminal prosecution. See New York Times Co. v. Sullivan. * * *

Despite the fact that news gathering may be hampered, the press is regularly excluded from grand jury proceedings, our own conferences, the meetings of other official bodies gathered in executive session, and the meetings of private organizations. Newsmen have no constitutional right of access to the scenes of crime or disaster when the general public is excluded, and they may be prohibited from attending or publishing information about trials if such restrictions are necessary to assure a defendant a fair trial before an impartial tribunal.

It is thus not surprising that the great weight of authority is that newsmen are not exempt from the normal duty of appearing before a grand jury and answering questions relevant to a criminal investigation. At common law, courts consistently refused to recognize the existence of any privilege authorizing a newsman to refuse to reveal confidential information to a grand jury. * * * These courts have applied the presumption against the existence of an asserted testimonial privilege, and have concluded that the First Amendment interest asserted by the newsman was outweighed by the general obligation of a citizen to appear before a grand jury or at trial, pursuant to a subpoena, and give what information he possesses. * * *

The prevailing constitutional view of the newsman's privilege is very much rooted in the ancient role of the grand jury which has the dual function of determining if there is probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed and of protecting citizens against unfounded criminal prosecutions. Grand jury proceedings are constitutionally mandated for the institution of federal criminal prosecutions for capital or other serious crimes, and "its constitutional prerogatives are rooted in long centuries of Anglo-American history." The Fifth Amendment provides that "No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury." The adoption of the grand jury "in our Constitution as the sole method for preferring charges in serious criminal cases shows the high place it held as an instrument of justice." Although state systems of criminal procedure differ greatly among themselves, the grand jury is similarly guaranteed by many state constitutions and plays an important role in fair and effective law enforcement in the overwhelming majority of the States.

* * *

"It is a grand inquest, a body with powers of investigation and inquisition, the scope of whose inquiries is not to be limited narrowly by questions of propriety or forecasts of the probable result of the investigation, or by doubts whether any particular individual will be found properly subject to an accusation of crime." Hence the grand jury's authority to subpoena witnesses is not only historic, but essential to its task. * * * The long-standing principle that "the public has a right to every man's evidence," except for those persons protected by a constitutional, common law, or statutory privilege, 8 J. Wigmore, Evidence § 2192 (McNaughton rev. 1961), is particularly applicable to grand jury proceedings.

A number of States have provided newsmen a statutory privilege of varying breadth, but the majority have not done so, and none has been provided by federal statute. Until now the only testimonial privilege for unofficial witnesses that is rooted in the Federal Constitution is the Fifth Amendment privilege against compelled self-incrimination. We are asked to create another by interpreting the First Amendment to grant newsmen a testimonial privilege that other citizens do not enjoy. This we decline to do.

* * *

Thus, we cannot seriously entertain the notion that the First Amendment protects a newsman's agreement to conceal the criminal conduct of his source, or evidence thereof, on the theory that it is better to write about crime than to do something about it. In so far as any reporter in these cases undertook not to reveal or testify about the crime he witnessed, his claim of privilege under the First Amendment presents no substantial question. The crimes of news sources are no less reprehensible and threatening to the public interest when witnessed by a reporter than when they are not.

There remain those situations where a source is not engaged in criminal conduct but has information suggesting illegal conduct by others. Newsmen frequently receive information from such sources pursuant to a tacit or express agreement to withhold the source's name and suppress any information that the source wishes not published. Such informants presumably desire anonymity in order to avoid being entangled as a witness in a criminal trial or grand jury investigation. They may fear that disclosure will threaten their job security or personal safety or that it will simply result in dishonor or embarrassment.

The argument that the flow of news will be diminished by compelling reporters to aid the grand jury in a criminal investigation is not irrational, nor are the records before us silent on the matter. But we remain unclear how often and to what extent informers are actually deterred from furnishing information when newsmen are forced to testify before a grand jury. The available data indicates that some newsmen rely a great deal on confidential sources and that some informants are particularly sensitive to the threat of exposure and may be silenced if it is held by this Court that, ordinarily, newsmen must testify pursuant to subpoenas, but the evidence fails to demonstrate that there would be a significant constriction of the flow of news to the public if this Court reaffirms the prior common law and constitutional rule regarding the testimonial obligations of newsmen. Estimates of the inhibiting effect of such subpoenas on the willingness of informants to make disclosures to newsmen are widely divergent and to a great extent speculative. * * * Reliance by the press on confidential informants does not mean that all such sources will in fact dry up because of the later possible appearance of the newsman before a grand jury. The reporter may never be called and if he objects to testifying, the prosecution may not insist. Also, the relationship of many informants to the press is a symbiotic one which is unlikely to be greatly inhibited by the threat of subpoena: quite often, such informants are members of a minority political or cultural group which relies heavily on the media to propagate its views, publicize its aims, and magnify its exposure to the public.

There is little before us indicating that informants whose interest in avoiding exposure is that it may threaten job security, personal safety, or peace of mind, would in fact, be in a worse position, or would think they would be, if they risked placing their trust in public officials as well as reporters. We doubt if the informer who prefers anonymity but is sincerely interested in furnishing evidence of crime will always or very often be deterred by the prospect of dealing with those public authorities characteristically charged with the duty to protect the public interest as well as his.

Accepting the fact, however, that an undetermined number of informants not themselves implicated in crime will nevertheless, for whatever reason, refuse to talk to newsmen if they fear identification by a reporter in an official investigation we cannot accept the argument that the public interest in possible future news about crime from undisclosed, unverified sources must take precedence over the public interest in pursuing and prosecuting those crimes reported to the press by informants and in thus deterring the commission of such crimes in the future.

* * *

Of course, the press has the right to abide by its agreement not to publish all the information it has, but the right to withhold news is not equivalent to a First Amendment exemption from the ordinary duty of all other citizens to furnish relevant information to a grand jury performing an important public function. Private restraints on the flow of information are not so favored by the First Amendment that they override all other public interests.

* * *

Neither are we now convinced that a virtually impenetrable constitutional shield, beyond legislative or judicial control, should be forged to protect a private system of informers operated by the press to report on criminal conduct, a system that would be unaccountable to the public, would pose a threat to the citizen's justifiable expectations of privacy, and would equally protect well-intentioned informants and those who pay for or otherwise betray their trust to their employer or associates. The public through its elected and appointed law enforcement officers regularly utilizes informers, and in proper circumstances may assert a privilege against disclosing the identity of these informers. * * * Such informers enjoy no constitutional protection. Their testimony is available to the public when desired by grand juries or at criminal trials; their identity cannot be concealed from the defendant when it is critical to his case.

It is said that currently press subpoenas have multiplied, that mutual distrust and tension between press and officialdom have increased, that reporting styles have changed, and that there is now more need for confidential sources. * * * These developments, even if true, are treacherous grounds for a far-reaching interpretation of the First Amendment fastening a nationwide rule on courts, grand juries, and prosecuting officials everywhere.

* * *

The requirements of those cases, which hold that a State's interest must be "compelling" or "paramount" to justify even an indirect burden on First Amendment rights, are also met here. As we have indicated, the investigation of crime by the grand jury implements a fundamental governmental role of securing the safety of the person and property of the citizen, and it appears to us that calling reporters to give testimony in the manner and for the reasons that other citizens are called "bears a reasonable relationship to the achievement of the governmental purpose asserted as its justification." If the test is that the Government "convincingly show a substantial relation between the information sought and a subject of overriding and compelling state interest," it is quite apparent (1) that the State has the necessary interest in extirpating the traffic in illegal drugs, in forestalling assassination attempts on the President, and in preventing the community from being disrupted by violent disorders endangering both persons and property; and (2) that, based on the stories Branzburg and Caldwell wrote and Pappas' admitted conduct, the grand jury called these reporters as they would others—because it was likely that they could supply information to help the Government determine whether illegal conduct had occurred, and, if it had, whether there was sufficient evidence to return an indictment.

Similar considerations dispose of the reporters' claims that preliminary to requiring their grand jury appearance, the State must show that a crime has been committed and that they possess relevant information not available from other sources, for only the grand jury itself can make this determination. The role of the grand jury as an important instrument of effective law enforcement necessarily includes an investigatory function with respect to determining whether a crime has been committed and who committed it.

* * *

The privilege claimed here is conditional, not absolute; given the suggested preliminary showings and compelling need, the reporter would be required to testify. Presumably, such a rule would reduce the instances in which reporters could be required to appear but predicting in advance when and in what circumstances they could be compelled to do so would be difficult. Such a rule would also have implications for the issuance of compulsory process to reporters at civil and criminal trials and at legislative hearings. If newsmen's confidential sources are as sensitive as they are claimed to be, the prospect of being unmasked whenever a judge determines the situation justifies it is hardly a satisfactory solution to the problem. For them it would appear that only an absolute privilege would suffice.

We are unwilling to embark the judiciary on a long and difficult journey to such an uncertain destination. The administration of a constitutional newsman's privilege would present practical and conceptual difficulties of a high order. [Emphasis added.] Sooner or later, it would be necessary to define those categories of newsmen who qualified for the privilege, a questionable procedure in light of the traditional doctrine that liberty of the press is the right of the lonely pamphleteer who uses carbon paper or a mimeograph just as much as of the large metropolitan publisher who utilizes the latest photocomposition methods. Freedom of the press is a "fundamental personal right" which "is not confined to newspapers and periodicals. It necessarily embraces pamphlets and leaflets * * *." The informative function asserted by representatives of the organized press in the present cases is also performed by lecturers, political pollsters, novelists, academic researchers, and dramatists. Almost any author may quite accurately assert that he is contributing to the flow of information to the public, that he relies on confidential sources of information, and that these sources will be silenced if he is forced to make disclosures before a grand jury.

In each instance where a reporter is subpoenaed to testify, the courts would also be embroiled in preliminary factual and legal determinations with respect to whether the proper predicate had been laid for the reporters' appearance: Is there probable cause to believe a crime has been committed? Is it likely that the reporter has useful information gained in confidence? Could the grand jury obtain the information elsewhere? Is the official interest sufficient to outweigh the claimed privilege?

Thus, in the end, by considering whether enforcement of a particular law served a "compelling" governmental interest, the courts would be inextricably involved in distinguishing between the value of enforcing different criminal laws.

* * *

At the federal level, Congress has freedom to determine whether a statutory newsman's privilege is necessary and desirable and to fashion standards and rules as narrow or broad as deemed necessary to address the evil discerned and, equally important, to re-fashion those rules as experience from time to time may dictate. There is also merit in leaving state legislatures free, within First Amendment limits, to fashion their own standards in light of the conditions and problems with respect to the relations between law enforcement officials and press in their own areas. It goes without saying, of course, that we are powerless to erect any bar to state courts responding in their own way and construing their own constitutions so as to recognize a newsman's privilege, either qualified or absolute. [Emphasis added.]

In addition, there is much force in the pragmatic view that the press has at its disposal powerful mechanisms of communication and is far from helpless to protect itself from harassment or substantial harm. Furthermore, if what the newsmen urged in these cases is true—that law enforcement cannot hope to gain and may suffer from subpoenaing newsmen before grand juries—prosecutors will be loath to risk so much for so little. Thus, at the federal level the Attorney General has already fashioned a set of rules for federal officials in connection with subpoenaing members of the press to testify before grand juries or at criminal trials.[41] * * *

Finally, as we have earlier indicated, news gathering is not without its First Amendment protections, and grand jury investigations if instituted or conducted other than in good faith, would pose wholly different issues for resolution under the First Amendment. Official harassment of the press undertaken not for purposes of law enforcement but to disrupt a reporter's relationship with his news sources would have no justification. Grand juries are subject to judicial control and subpoenas to motions to quash. We do not expect courts will forget that grand juries must operate within the limits of the First Amendment as well as the Fifth.

We turn, therefore, to the disposition of the cases before us. From what we have said, it necessarily follows that the decision in United States v. Caldwell must be reversed. If there is no First Amendment privilege to refuse to answer the relevant and material questions asked during a good-faith grand jury investigation, then it is a fortiori true that there is no privilege to refuse to appear before such a grand jury until the Government demonstrates some "compelling need" for a newsman's testimony. * * *

The decisions in Branzburg v. Hayes and Branzburg v. Meigs must be affirmed. Here, petitioner refused to answer questions that directly related to criminal conduct which he had observed and written about. The Kentucky Court of Appeals noted that marijuana is defined as a narcotic drug by statute, and that unlicensed possession or compounding of it is a felony punishable by both fine and imprisonment. It held that petitioner "saw the commission of the statutory felonies of unlawful possession of marijuana and the unlawful conversion of it into hashish." Petitioner may be presumed to have observed similar violations of the state narcotics laws during the research he did for the story which forms 41. Guidelines for Subpoenas to the News Media were first announced in a speech by the Attorney General on August 10, 1970, and then were expressed in Department of Justice Memo. No. 692 (Sept. 2, 1970), which was sent to all United States Attorneys by the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Criminal Division. [New guidelines were promulgated in 1980. See Guidelines on News Media Subpoenas, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2153 (1980)].

the basis of the subpoena in Branzburg v. Meigs. In both cases, if what petitioner wrote was true, he had direct information to provide the grand jury concerning the commission of serious crimes.

The only question presented at the present time in In the Matter of Paul Pappas is whether petitioner Pappas must appear before the grand jury to testify pursuant to subpoena. The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court characterized the record in this case as "meager," and it is not clear what petitioner will be asked by the grand jury. It is not even clear that he will be asked to divulge information received in confidence. We affirm the decision of the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court and hold that petitioner must appear before the grand jury to answer the questions put to him, subject, of course, to the supervision of the presiding judge as to "the propriety, purposes, and scope of the grand jury inquiry and the pertinence of the probable testimony."

So ordered.

Justice POWELL, concurring in the opinion of the Court.

I add this brief statement to emphasize what seems to me to be the limited nature of the Court's holding. The Court does not hold that newsmen, subpoenaed to testify before a grand jury, are without constitutional rights with respect to the gathering of news or in safeguarding their sources.

* * *

As indicated in the concluding portion of the opinion, the Court states that no harassment of newsmen will be tolerated. If a newsman believes that the grand jury investigation is not being conducted in good faith he is not without remedy. Indeed, if the newsman is called upon to give information bearing only a remote and tenuous relationship to the subject of the investigation, or if he has some other reason to believe that his testimony implicates confidential source relationships without a legitimate need of law enforcement, he will have access to the Court on a motion to quash and an appropriate protective order may be entered. The asserted claim to privilege should be judged on its facts by the striking of a proper balance between freedom the press and the obligation of all citizens to give relevant testimony with respect to criminal conduct. The balance of these vital constitutional and societal interests on a case-by-case basis accords with the tried and traditional way of adjudicating such questions.

Justice STEWART, with whom Justice Brennan and Justice Marshall join, dissenting.

The Court's crabbed view of the First Amendment reflects a disturbing insensitivity to the critical role of an independent press in our society. The question whether a reporter has a constitutional right to a confidential relationship with his source is of first impression here, but the principles which should guide our decision are as basic as any to be found in the Constitution. While Justice Powell's enigmatic concurring opinion gives some hope of a more flexible view in the future, the court in these cases holds that a newsman has no First Amendment right to protect his sources when called before a grand jury. The Court thus invites state and federal authorities to undermine the historic independence of the press by attempting to annex the journalistic profession as an investigative arm of government. Not only will this decision impair performance of the press' constitutionally protected functions, but it will, I am convinced, in the long run, harm rather than help the administration of justice.

I respectfully dissent.

The reporter's constitutional right to a confidential relationship with his source stems from the broad societal interest in a full and free flow of information to the public. It is this basic concern that underlies the Constitution's protection of a free press because the guarantee is "not for the benefit of the press so much as for the benefit of all of us."

Enlightened choice by an informed citizenry is the basic ideal upon which an open society is premised, and a free press is thus indispensable to a free society. * * *

In keeping with this tradition, we have held that the right to publish is central to the First Amendment and basic to the existence of constitutional democracy.

A corollary of the right to publish must be the right to gather news. The full flow of information to the public protected by the free press guarantee would be severely curtailed if no protection whatever were afforded to the process by which news is assembled and disseminated. We have, therefore, recognized that there is a right to publish without prior governmental approval.

No less important to the news dissemination process is the gathering of information. News must not be unnecessarily cut off at its source, for without freedom to acquire information the right to publish would be impermissibly compromised. Accordingly, a right to gather news, of some dimensions, must exist. * * *

The right to gather news implies, in turn, a right to a confidential relationship between a reporter and his source. This proposition follows as a matter of simple logic once three factual predicates are recognized: (1) newsmen require informants to gather news; (2) confidentiality—the promise or understanding that names or certain aspects of communications will be kept off-the-record—is essential to the creation and maintenance of a news-gathering relationship with informants; and (3) the existence of an unbridled subpoena power—the absence of a constitutional right protecting, in any way, a confidential relationship from compulsory process—will either deter sources from divulging information or deter reporters from gathering and publishing information.

It is obvious that informants are necessary to the news-gathering process as we know it today. If it is to perform its constitutional mission, the press must do far more than merely print public statements or publish prepared handouts.

* * *

It is equally obvious that the promise of confidentiality may be a necessary prerequisite to a productive relationship between a newsman and his informants. An officeholder may fear his superior; a member of the bureaucracy, his associates; a dissident, the scorn of majority opinion. All may have information valuable to the public discourse, yet each may be willing to relate that information only in confidence to a reporter whom he trusts.

* * *

Finally, and most important, when governmental officials possess an unchecked power to compel newsmen to disclose information received in confidence, sources will clearly be deterred from giving information, and reporters will clearly be deterred from publishing it, because uncertainty about exercise of the power will lead to "self-censorship." The uncertainty arises, of course, because the judiciary has traditionally imposed virtually no limitations on the grand jury's broad investigatory powers. See Antell, The Modern Grand Jury: Benighted Supergovernment, 51 A.B.A.J. (1965).

After today's decision, the potential informant can never be sure that his identity or off-the-record communications will not subsequently be revealed through the compelled testimony of a newsman. A public spirited person inside government, who is not implicated in any crime, will now be fearful of revealing corruption or other governmental wrongdoing, because he will now know he can subsequently be identified by use of compulsory process.

* * *

Again, the common sense understanding that such deterrence will occur is buttressed by concrete evidence. The existence of deterrent effects through fear and self-censorship was impressively developed in the District Court in Caldwell. Individual reporters and commentators have noted such effects. Surveys have verified that an unbridled subpoena power will substantially impair the flow of news to the public, especially in sensitive areas involving governmental officials, financial affairs, political figures, dissidents, or minority groups that require in-depth, investigative reporting. And the Justice Department has recognized that "compulsory process in some circumstances may have a limiting effect on the exercise of First Amendment rights." No evidence contradicting the existence of such deterrent effects was offered at the trials or in the briefs here by the petitioners in Caldwell or by the respondents in Branzburg and Pappas.

The impairment of the flow of news cannot, of course, be proven with scientific precision, as the Court seems to demand. * * *

But we have never before demanded that First Amendment rights rest on elaborate empirical studies demonstrating beyond any conceivable doubt that deterrent effects exist; we have never before required proof of the exact number of people potentially affected by governmental action, who would actually be dissuaded from engaging in First Amendment activity.

Rather, on the basis of common sense and available information, we have asked, often implicitly, (1) whether there was a rational connection between the cause (the governmental action) and the effect (the deterrence or impairment of First Amendment activity) and (2) whether the effect would occur with some regularity, i.e., would not be de minimus. * * * And, in making this determination, we have shown a special solicitude towards the "indispensable liberties" protected by the First Amendment for "freedoms such as these are protected not only against heavy-handed frontal attack, but also from being stifled by more subtle government interference." Once this threshold inquiry has been satisfied, we have then examined the competing interests in determining whether there is an unconstitutional infringement of First Amendment freedoms.

* * *

Thus, we cannot escape the conclusion that when neither the reporter nor his source can rely on the shield of confidentiality against unrestrained use of the grand jury's subpoena power, valuable information will not be published and the public dialogue will inevitably be impoverished.

* * *

Accordingly, when a reporter is asked to appear before a grand jury and reveal confidences, I would hold that the government must (1) show that there is probable cause to believe that the newsman has information which is clearly relevant to a specific probable violation of law; (2) demonstrate that the information sought cannot be obtained by alternative means less destructive of First Amendment rights; and (3) demonstrate a compelling and overriding interest in the information. [Emphasis added.]

This is not to say that a grand jury could not issue a subpoena until such a showing were made, and it is not to say that a newsman would be in any way privileged to ignore any subpoena that was issued. Obviously, before the government's burden to make such a showing were triggered, the reporter would have to move to quash the subpoena, asserting the basis on which he considered the particular relationship a confidential one.

The crux of the Court's rejection of any newsman's privilege is its observation that only "where news sources themselves are implicated in crime or possess information relevant to the grand jury's task need they or the reporter be concerned about grand jury subpoenas." But this is a most misleading construct. * * * As noted above, given the grand jury's extraordinarily broad investigative powers and the weak standards of relevance and materiality that apply during such inquiries, reporters, if they have no testimonial privilege, will be called to give information about informants who have neither committed crimes nor have information about crime. It is to avoid deterrence of such sources and thus to prevent needless injury to First Amendment values that I think the government must be required to show probable cause that the newsman has information which is clearly relevant to a specific probable violation of criminal law.

Similarly, a reporter may have information from a confidential source which is "related" to the commission of crime, but the government may be able to obtain an indictment or otherwise achieve its purposes by subpoenaing persons other than the reporter. It is an obvious but important truism that when government aims have been fully served, there can be no legitimate reason to disrupt a confidential relationship between a reporter and his source. To do so would not aid the administration of justice and would only impair the flow of information to the public. Thus, it is to avoid deterrence of such sources that I think the government must show that there are no alternative means for the grand jury to obtain the information sought.

Both the "probable cause" and "alternative means" requirements would thus serve the vital function of mediating between the public interest in the administration of justice and the constitutional protection of the full flow of information. These requirements would avoid a direct conflict between these competing concerns, and they would generally provide adequate protection for newsmen. No doubt the courts would be required to make some delicate judgments in working out this accommodation. But that, after all, is the function of courts of law. Better such judgments, however difficult, than the simplistic and stultifying absolutism adopted by the Court in denying any force to the First Amendment in these cases.

* * *

The sad paradox of the Court's position is that when a grand jury may exercise an unbridled subpoena power, and sources involved in sensitive matters become fearful of disclosing information, the newsman will not only cease to be a useful grand jury witness; he will cease to investigate and publish information about issues of public import. I cannot subscribe to such an anomalous result, for, in my view, the interests protected by the First Amendment are not antagonistic to the administration of justice. Rather, they can, in the long run, only be complementary, and for that reason must be given great "breathing space."

In deciding what protection should be given to information a reporter receives in confidence from a news source, the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed the holding of a District Court that the grand jury power of testimonial compulsion must not be exercised in a manner likely to impair First Amendment interests "until there has been a clear showing of a compelling and overriding national interest that cannot be served by alternative means." Caldwell v. United States, 434 F.2d 1081, 1086 (9th Cir. 1970). * * *

I think this decision was correct. On the record before us the United States has not met the burden which I think the appropriate newsman's privilege should require.

* * *

In the Caldwell case, the Court of Appeals further found that Caldwell's confidential relationship with the leaders of the Black Panther Party would be impaired if he appeared before the grand jury at all to answer questions, even though not privileged. On the particular facts before it, the Court concluded that the very appearance by Caldwell before the grand jury would jeopardize his relationship with his sources, leading to a severance of the news-gathering relationship and impairment of the flow of news to the public.

* * *

I think this ruling was also correct in light of the particularized circumstances of the Caldwell case. Obviously, only in very rare circumstances would a confidential relationship between a reporter and his source be so sensitive that mere appearance before the grand jury by the newsman would substantially impair his news-gathering function. But in this case, the reporter made out a prima facie case that the flow of news to the public would be curtailed. And he stated, without contradiction, that the only non-confidential material about which he could testify was already printed in his newspaper articles.

* * *

Accordingly, I would affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals in United States v. Caldwell. In the other two cases before us, Branzburg v. Hayes and Branzburg v. Meigs, and In the Matter of Paul Pappas, I would vacate the judgments and remand the cases for further proceedings not inconsistent with the views I have expressed in this opinion.

Justice DOUGLAS, dissenting.

It is my view that there is no "compelling need" that can be shown which qualifies the reporter's immunity from appearing or testifying before a grand jury, unless the reporter himself is implicated in a crime. His immunity in my view is therefore quite complete, for absent his involvement in a crime, the First Amendment protects him against an appearance before a grand jury and if he is involved in a crime, the First Amendment stands as a barrier. [Emphasis added.] Since in my view there is no area of inquiry not protected by a privilege, the reporter need not appear for the futile purpose of invoking one to each question. And, since in my view a newsman has an absolute right not to appear before a grand jury it follows for me that a journalist who voluntarily appears before that body may invoke his First Amendment privilege to specific questions. The basic issue is the extent to which the First Amendment * * * must yield to the Government's asserted need to know a reporter's unprinted information.

The starting point for decision pretty well marks the range within which the end result lies. The New York Times, whose reporting functions are at issue here, takes the amazing position that First Amendment rights are to be balanced against other needs or conveniences of government. My belief is that all of the "balancing" was done by those who wrote the Bill of Rights. By casting the First Amendment in absolute terms, they repudiated the timid, watered-down, emasculated versions of the First Amendment which both the Government and the New York Times advances in the case.

COMMENT

Long before courts ruled in either Caldwell or Branzburg, journalists had contended that the First Amendment implied at least a qualified or conditional right to protect confidential sources. And for at least 100 years reporters and editors had argued that compelled testimony not only chills newsgathering but also violates their employers' rules and violates professional codes of journalism ethics. Compelled testimony could also cost journalists their jobs.

For most journalists, however, protecting source confidentiality has been seen as an ethical and professional imperative. Few tenets of journalism are so sacred as that calling for reporters to abide by promises of confidentiality.[7] Indeed, in some of the cases that have arisen, the potential harm to newsgathering seems so slight and the benefit to society from disclosure so great that only a stand based on principle can explain refusal to testify.

In Idaho in 1980, Ellen Marks of The Idaho Statesman wrote an article based on an interview with a father who had taken his daughter into hiding in violation of a court's custody order following divorce. The child's mother brought a habeas corpus proceeding to regain lawful custody, and Marks was called to testify while she covered the habeas corpus hearing. Marks refused to testify and moved to quash. The magistrate found her in contempt and levied a $500 per day fine. The Idaho Supreme Court ultimately affirmed the contempt order. Marks v. Vehlow, 9 Med.L.Rptr. 2361 (Idaho 1983). The Idaho court, which had previously vigorously refused to recognize a privilege, and in fact had interpreted Branzburg as prohibiting state courts from creating reporter privileges, Caldero v. Tribune Publishing Co., 2 Med.L.Rptr., 562 P.2d 791, 1490 (Idaho), cert. den. 434 U.S. 930 (1977), noted its agreement with a number of post-Branzburg cases creating privilege. Disclosure was nonetheless ordered because both the writ of habeas corpus and the safety of the child constituted compelling interests, and Marks was the only person with any clue to the father's whereabouts.

Most cases where privilege is claimed present conflicts between newsgathering and law enforcement more clearly. That was especially true in the tumultuous period between the 1968 Democratic Convention in Chicago and the Watergate scandal of the early 1970s, when a cloudburst of subpoenas showered the press.

In a typical case, Will Lewis, manager of station KPFK-FM in Los Angeles, was held in contempt and jailed in 1973 for refusing to turn over to a federal grand jury the originals of a letter and tape recording sent him by two radical groups claiming to have inside information on the Patty Hearst affair.

After sixteen days in solitary confinement at Terminal Island Federal Prison, Lewis was released by Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas pending appeal. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the contempt conviction, Lewis appealed, and the U.S. Supreme Court denied review. That left Lewis with the choice of going back to jail or turning over the subpoenaed material to federal prosecutors. Lewis chose the latter.[8] Other reporters have chosen either to remain in or to go back to jail.

William Farr of the Los Angeles Herald-Examiner, for example, refused to disclose to a county court judge the names of prosecution attorneys who had supplied him with a copy of a witness's deposition in the gruesome Charles Manson case, this after the judge had forbidden officers of the court to publicize the case. Farr spent two months in jail.[9]

Judges—especially in California it would seem—take umbrage when their direct orders are defied. In the Rosato case,[10] bribery-conspiracy indictments had been handed down by a Fresno County grand jury against three accused. A day before the grand jury transcripts would have become public documents, the judge sealed the record for the duration of the trial and issued a restrictive order prohibiting public communications by attorneys, parties, public officials, and witnesses. Stories replete with quotations from the sealed transcript nevertheless appeared in the Fresno Bee, and the judge demanded to know where they came from. When he asked reporters to name their sources, he was met with silence. Two reporters, the city editor, and the managing editor of the Bee were then cited for contempt.

The court's rationale was that in enforcing its power over its own officers, the concomitant interest of journalists in protecting their sources was irrelevant and the California "shield" law inapplicable. The journalists went to jail.

Despite inclusion of a reporter privilege in state statute and in the California Constitution, that state's courts continue to limit the protection of the privilege. While the constitution forbids entry of contempt against journalists, it does not prevent a court from imposing other sanctions, including entry of judgment against the journalist when the journalist is a party in the case.[11]

Punishment has most frequently resulted from refusals to cooperate with grand juries and in criminal trials. The Supreme Judicial Court of Maine affirmed a conviction of criminal contempt against Robert Hohler, a reporter for the Concord Monitor in New Hampshire, after Hohler refused to testify in a murder trial about an article based on an interview with the defendant which named the defendant as the source. The court reversed a Superior Court holding that Maine would recognize a qualified privilege against compelled testimony concerning nonconfidential, published information.[12]

In a celebrated case of yesteryear, Peter Bridge of the Newark News was jailed for three weeks because he would not reveal to a grand jury unpublished details of an interview with a state bureaucrat who alleged she had been offered a bribe. Bridge had forfeited protection under the New Jersey shield law, as it stood in 1972, by naming the source in the article. New Jersey's highest court declined to hear the case, and the U.S. Supreme Court denied a stay of his contempt sentence.[13]

Television news reporter Stewart Dan and cameraman Roland Barnes of WGR-TV, Buffalo, were pressed to tell a grand jury what they had seen and heard inside Attica prison during a 1971 riot. They refused, and later Dan was sentenced to thirty days in jail. Reporter Joe Pennington of KAKZ-TV, Wichita, was sentenced to sixty days for criminal contempt after he refused to turn over information believed by defendant's counsel to be relevant to the issue of guilt or innocence.[14]

THE MEANING OF BRANZBURG

The Branzburg decision has been, it seems, given almost as many interpretations as there have been lower courts construing it. Derived meanings range from conclusions that Branzburg precludes creation of a journalist's privilege,[15] to determinations that the case allows lower courts (or legislatures) to devise such a privilege,[16] all the way to assertions that Branzburg itself recognizes a privilege.[17]

Much as in libel law, the law of journalist's privilege varies from jurisdiction to jurisdiction and from context to context. Unlike libel law, however, the reporter who wants to understand the entire law of journalist's privilege must consider the standards of the federal circuit courts and of a number of federal district courts in addition to the laws of the fifty states.

Some form of the privilege, most often a variation of the three-part test first offered by the Ninth Circuit in Caldwell and championed by Justice Stewart in Branzburg, has permeated the constitutional, statutory, and common law of both state and federal courts. Stewart's dissent in Branzburg legitimized the test, so that by the late 1980s eight circuit courts plus the District of Columbia circuit recognized it,[18] federal district courts in the other circuits apparently recognized it, and at least fourteen state courts had apparently accepted it despite the absence of a shield statute.[19] In states without shield laws, nearly all of their courts have applied at least some of the three-part test, and usually the journalist's claim of privilege has been upheld.

The Court held narrowly in Branzburg that the First Amendment, because it is silent on the privilege, does not immunize a journalist from the usual duty of responding to a grand jury subpoena seeking evidence in a criminal case. A journalist witnessing a crime, moreover, clearly has no testimonial privilege under the holding.

Note that none of the opinions discusses the constitutional status of notes, tapes, or other raw materials of a reporter's work-a-day world. The majority opinion does not address itself to whether a privilege might exist when there was no reason to think a reporter had observed illegal activity. Similarly, the status of privilege in civil actions and in nontrial legal proceedings other than grand juries was not addressed.

The single question in Branzburg, Justice White emphasized in a footnote, is "whether a newspaper reporter who has published articles about an organization can, under the First Amendment, properly refuse to appear before a grand jury investigating possible crimes by members of that organization who have been quoted in the published articles."

Not even Justice Stewart believed that a subpoena could simply be ignored. Only Justice Douglas thought that. Both Stewart and Justice Powell in his concurring opinion stress the need for a judge to balance the interests of reporters and of justice by allowing a hearing before a reporter is compelled to testify.

The case is made even narrower by the majority's reliance upon the constitutionally guaranteed function of grand juries as an interest counterbalancing journalists' interests in First Amendment activities. Justice White consistently emphasizes that no privilege will be recognized due to the facts of the case. Perhaps the combined appeals in Branzburg did not represent the best occasion for the press to seek a constitutionally based privilege before the Supreme Court. It is clear from Powell's concurrence that he would have been more favorably disposed to a privilege claim under a different fact pattern.

In Justice White's opinion for the Court an explicit invitation was extended to the state legislatures and to Congress to create—within constitutional limits—a statutory privilege. Led by Maryland in 1896, twenty-six states have done just that, six since the Branzburg decision. Other states have amended their pre-Branzburg shield statutes since 1972. White's invitation urges a response to the privilege issue based on principles of federalism, recognizing that states may offer more protection either under their constitutions or by statute than is required by the First Amendment, exactly the approach taken regarding state fault standards for libel in Gertz.

"At the federal level," White wrote, "Congress has freedom to determine whether a statutory newsman's privilege is necessary and desirable. * * * [T]here is also merit in leaving state legislatures free * * * to fashion their own standards. * * * It goes without saying, of course, that we are powerless to erect any bar to state courts responding in their own way * * * to recognize a newsman's privilege. * * *"

Both leading opinions addressed the available empirical evidence as to the use of confidential sources and on the effect of subpoenas, whatever the quality of that evidence. For the majority, White suggests that the empirical data fail to show the existence of a chilling effect when source identity is compelled or that the evidence indicates the effect is not significant. In a footnote, Stewart responded to White's concern about the "speculative nature" of the evidence:

> Empirical studies, after all, can only provide facts. It is the duty of courts to give legal significance to facts; and it is the special duty of this Court to understand the constitutional significance of facts. We must often proceed in a state of less then perfect knowledge, either because the facts are murky or the methodology used in obtaining the facts is open to question. It is then that we must look to the Constitution for the values that inform our presumptions.

Use of anonymous sources was widespread in the early 1970s, with some reporters using them in half their stories. By 1984, however, reliance on anonymous sources had decreased significantly.[20] Since a majority of jurisdictions had accepted a privilege in some form, lesser reliance on anonymous sources cannot be attributed to a chilling effect alone. Journalists report that on-the-record sources are preferred to assure credibility. Many news organizations have also become more cautious in their use of confidential sources following nationwide embarrassment in 1981 when Washington Post reporter Janet Cooke admitted that statements attributed to a confidential source in an article that had won a Pulitzer Prize had been fabricated. Approval of and review by editors of reporters' use of confidential sources has since become routine.

Justice White said that a subpoena is just another example of application to the press of valid general laws like tax laws or labor laws. But those laws are enforced neutrally and impose no special burden on First Amendment freedoms and, if they do, are subject to constitutional challenge. See text, p. 124. White also observed that prosecutors risk a great deal when they subpoena newsmen. Does the press have powerful means of protecting itself as he suggests?

What do reporters actually risk when, having assured their sources they will go to jail rather than reveal source identities, they ignore subpoenas or refuse to testify? James Reston, perhaps facetiously, sees jail sentences as providing reporters much-needed respite. But should jail be an occupational hazard of journalism? Editors and reporters take the risks of anonymous sources seriously; in most newsrooms, using anonymous sources routinely is forbidden. Only extremely important stories that would go unreported in the absence of an anonymous source should use them, editors say.

20. St. Dizier, Reporters' Use of Confidential Sources, 1974 and 1984: A Comparative Study, 6 Newspaper Research J. 44 (Summer 1985).

Justice White noted that "* * * the privilege claimed is that of the reporter, not the informant, and * * * if the authorities independently identify the informant, neither his own reluctance to testify nor the objection of the newsman would shield him * * * whatever the impact on the flow of news. * * *" It has been agreed by subsequent courts that the privilege, and with it the decision to disclose or not, lies with the journalist,[21] not the source. The major reason for granting the journalist control over the privilege is that, unlike traditional evidentiary privileges, the public interest is served directly with reporter privilege by enhancing the free flow of information. By contrast, in doctor-patient or lawyer-client privileges, the patient or client, not the professional, controls the privilege. The interest protected is primarily private, although these professional privileges assume that the public interest is indirectly enhanced by increased confidence in these professionals.

One court recently announced that journalistic privilege is not a one-way matter. During a three-party race for governor and lieutenant governor in Minnesota in 1982, Dan Cohen, a former city council member, provided information about a twelve-year-old shoplifting conviction against a candidate for lieutenant governor. Cohen, a Republican operative, secured a promise of anonymity from reporters employed by the St. Paul Pioneer Press Dispatch and the Minneapolis Star Tribune. Editors at both papers, thinking Cohen's disclosure a dirty trick, named him as the source. Cohen was fired from his public relations job the same day.

Cohen filed suit alleging that the promise of confidentiality was a contract that was breached by the two newspapers. After defenses based on both the First Amendment and contract law were rejected by the trial court, the case was tried before a six-person jury. The newspapers had argued that the promise of confidentiality was not substantial enough to constitute an enforceable contract and that the First Amendment in any event protected their editorial freedom to name Cohen in the stories. Cohen argued that the reporters, as agents of the newspapers, had legal authority to enter a binding contract on the newspapers' behalfs, and he argued fraud and misrepresentation. The jury agreed 5–1 and awarded $100,000 in actual damages and $250,000 in punitive damages against each newspaper, a total of $700,000.[22]

The case had immediate effect in other ways. The Star Tribune paper was forced to pull all 640,000 copies of its next Sunday magazine because it contained an article identifying by name a woman who said she had been promised anonymity. She had threatened to sue if the story was published.

Part of the trial strategy in the Cohen case was to capitalize on public unease about news leaks to the mass media and about the media in general. Throughout the trial, Cohen's lawyer referred to notable issues such as revelations about Senator Joe Biden's plagiarism while a candidate for president in 1987, and Senator Thomas Eagleton's emotional disorders while the Democratic nominee for vice-president in 1972. The tactic drew criticism from trial judge Franklin Knoll.[23]

Media lawyers see endless possibilities for plaintiffs using a contract approach. Would it be a breach of contract to quote someone inaccurately, to surprise a source by disparaging his views, or to disappoint a source by playing down statements she assumed would get front-page attention? And what if a confidential source lies to a reporter? Does the contract remain binding? Will Cohen's victory mean that the privilege protects the source as much as it does the journalist? How much did the decision of Twin Cities's editors erode a fundamental proposition of American journalism: journalistic privilege serves the flow of the information to the public?

It is likely that the law of newsgathering will grow in the next decade, and courts may continue to give First Amendment arguments in this area less than their full attention.

The greatest puzzle of the various opinions in Branzburg was the dispositive concurring opinion by Justice Powell. Although joining the result, Powell did not reject a qualified privilege based on the First Amendment. Powell instead emphasized that courts would be open to journalists' claims "under circumstances where legitimate First Amendment interests require protection."

Why didn't Powell join the dissenters? Apparently because he thought journalists should obey the summons of a grand jury. Only after appearing could they press their privilege claims. This approach would have done Caldwell, who asserted that merely appearing would chill sources, no good.

Would Powell's approach be the same as Stewart's in contexts other than grand jury inquiries? No. For Powell, Stewart's three-part test placed too heavy a burden of proof on government. A balancing approach, on the other hand, placed the clashing interests in a more desirable state of rough equivalence. Do you agree with Powell that a journalist should at least appear before the grand jury and that rights to confidentiality should be determined after questions have been posed? In Caldwell, the Ninth Circuit emphasized that reporters would seldom have as sensitive a relationship with sources as Caldwell had.

An interesting sidelight on the Caldwell case is that the New York Times, although paying legal expenses, did not wholeheartedly support the appeal. "We are not joining the appeal," said Managing Editor A. M. Rosenthal in a memo to his staff, "because we feel that when a reporter refuses to authenticate his story, the Times must, in a formal sense, step aside. Otherwise some doubt may be cast upon the integrity of the Times news stories." How does this square with the position of the Times in the Pentagon Papers case? In the Farber case? See text, p. 377.

Enactment of a federal shield law, qualified or unqualified, seems unlikely. Repeated introductions of bills to establish a federal privilege have gone nowhere. One major reason is that the press itself is not sure it supports a federal shield law. Under the rationale that what Congress gives, Congress can take away, many members of the press oppose shield laws and prefer instead a privilege squarely based on the First Amendment. Under the Supremacy Clause of the U.S. Constitution, a First Amendment-based privilege would override any less protective statute. But why would journalists oppose shield laws in the interim while waiting for creation of a First Amendment privilege?

The great surprise of the Branzburg decision was that its most influential feature has not been Justice White's plurality decision but Justice Stewart's dissent advocating a qualified First Amendment-based journalist's privilege. The Stewart approach now governs much of the law of journalist's privilege in the context of civil and criminal proceedings. The three-part test of Stewart's Branzburg dissent has thus become enormously important.

The fact that the Stewart dissent has become so influential is really not that remarkable if a careful count of how the justices actually voted in Branzburg is undertaken. The plurality opinion authored by Justice White, refusing to acknowledge the existence of a First Amendment-based privilege, either absolute or qualified, in the context of the criminal grand jury, was supported by three justices in addition to Justice White. Justice Powell, however, filed a concurring opinion which did acknowledge that courts would be "available to newsmen under circumstances where legitimate First Amendment interests require protection." Two justices (Brennan and Marshall) joined Justice Stewart in his dissent in Branzburg. Justice Douglas, in a separate dissent, advocated even greater First Amendment protection. As a result, if a careful count of the justices in Branzburg is made, it becomes clear that a majority supports some basis in the First Amendment for the establishment of a constitutionally based journalist's privilege.

Although the Supreme Court has not heard another case on journalist's privilege, it has recently indicated that there is no impediment in a state's choosing to apply its shield law in a libel case by a plaintiff required to prove falsity. "We recognize that the plaintiff's burden in this case is weightier because of Pennsylvania's 'shield' law, which allows employees of the media to refuse to divulge their sources," Justice O'Connor wrote for the majority. "* * * [W]e are unconvinced that the State's shield law requires a different constitutional standard than would prevail in the absence of such a law." [24] The Court noted that the issue had not been addressed by state courts earlier. Still, the almost offhand dismissal of the plaintiff's claim to source identities indicates the Court is comfortable with how privilege has developed since Branzburg.

Although the influence of Stewart's three-part test on the lower courts is clear, its application has not always been. Interpretations of the test vary. When a murder defendant sought documents from reporters for the University of New Hampshire student newspaper that would have identified sources, the state supreme court affirmed a lower court quashing the subpoena. Although the state had no shield law, a qualified privilege based on both the First Amendment and the state constitution was held to exist. This qualified privilege could be overcome only by the following showing on the part of the defendant: (1) exhaustion of alternative sources, (2) relevance, and (3) a reasonable probability that information sought would affect the verdict. The third qualification or condition had not been met. New Hampshire v. Siel, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1265, 444 A.2d 499 (N.H. 1982).

Variations on the three-part test are sometimes semantic. At other times, they either expand or contract the test. Where "information going to the heart of the claim" subsumes "relevance" and "compelling public need," we have a two-part test. Where the information seeker's purpose must be more than "frivolous," we may have a four-part test. In Ohio "relevance" and "exhaustion of alternative sources" are standard parts of the test, but the information seeker also must make an effort to examine a reporter's nonconfidential information first and request an in camera inspection of anything confidential. People v. Monica (Ohio Ct. of Appeals, 8th Dist., No. 39950, April 12, 1979). In Florida "less chilling" means of getting information have to be tried, and there has to be a showing that failure to produce the information sought will result in a miscarriage of justice or substantially prejudice a defendant's case. Florida v. Reid, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1249 (Fla. 1982).

Washington state's qualified privilege, said to be part of its common law, requires all or part of a five-part test. The privilege can be defeated by showing that the request for information is necessary, there are no alternative sources, the purpose is nonfrivolous, the reporter got the information by unacceptable means, and the source had no reasonable expectation of confidentiality. Senear v. Daily Journal-American, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1151, 641 P.2d 1180 (Wash. 1982). Why do some courts rely on a common law-based privilege rather than a constitutional privilege? In West Virginia, the burden may be placed on the reporter to show harm to the newsgathering process in support of a motion to quash. Maurice v. NLRB, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2221, 691 F.2d 182 (4th Cir. 1982).

There are almost as many variations in interpretation and application of the test as there are jurisdictions which have adopted it. Journalists should be aware of the qualifications in their jurisdiction.

Only a handful of state courts, led by Washington and Florida, have relied exclusively on common law as the source of a journalist's privilege. One reason is that the common law has traditionally opposed the creation of evidentiary privileges. Another is that most states link constitutional justifications with common law ones. Just to be sure, they might even hold that a privilege is created under both federal and state constitutions as well as under common law. In re Contempt of Wright, 11 Med.L.Rptr. 1937, 700 P.2d 40 (Idaho 1985).

Although federal courts have not had authority to create common law for over fifty years, Erie Railroad Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64 (1983), and common law—judge-made law—is now the sole province of the states, the limitation applies only to substantive, not procedural law. Federal courts retain power to create common law rules of evidence, including journalist's privilege, since it is commonly considered procedural in nature. In diversity of citizenship cases, federal courts are supposed to apply state substantive law but also use federal procedure. It is an issue whether privilege is substantive or procedural.

In a civil federal rights action filed by William Riley, a policeman who was running for mayor of Chester, Pennsylvania, against the incumbent mayor and chief of police for having damaged Riley by disclosing information, the Third Circuit used federal common law to create a privilege. Riley called Gerry Oliver, a reporter for the Delaware County Daily Times, to testify about how she obtained leaks of investigative materials. Oliver refused. The court said that Rule 501 of the Federal Rules of Evidence justified its creation of a testimonial privilege. Rule 501 provides in part:

> * * * the privilege of a witness, person, government, State, or political subdivision thereof shall be governed by the principles of the common law as they may be interpreted by the courts of the United States in the light of reason and experience.

The Third Circuit reasoned that the free expression interests underlying Oliver's claim of privilege outweighed Riley's interest in obtaining her testimony. Several other reporters had already identified sources for the same material. The test adopted for determining when the privilege is overcome blends elements of Powell's demand for case-by-case balancing and of Stewart's three-part test. Riley v. City of Chester, 5 Med.L.Rptr. 2161, 612 F.2d 708 (3d Cir. 1979).

Some of the variations on the three-part test have themselves been subject to litigation, and there have been differences of definition and application from one jurisdiction to another. In a case on the issue of exhaustion of alternate sources from Massachusetts, at a time when that state still steadfastly opposed any privilege, Justice William Brennan granted a stay of a civil contempt conviction because he thought the information could have been obtained by "other—albeit roundabout—methods." He feared that First Amendment interests were being weighed to their detriment against the court's convenience.

The case—In re Roche, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1551, 448 U.S. 1312 (1980)—had to do with information about a state judge that led to an investigation by the Massachusetts Commission on Judicial Conduct and formal charges. Sixty-five witnesses, including Roche, a television reporter, were identified. Roche refused to identify any of his sources or disclose what they had said to him unless the judge could independently uncover them on the list, for they were on the list. A judge of Massachusetts's Supreme Judicial Court ordered Roche to testify. The court saw the central issue as whether a reporter could determine the sequence of discovery and by that means delay the release of information.

Justice Brennan granted the reporter's petition for a stay of enforcement of the Massachusetts judge's order holding him in civil contempt pending petition for writ of certiorari. Brennan described the matter as follows:

> If I am correct, therefore, that a majority of the Court recognizes at least some degree of constitutional protection for newsgatherers' confidences it is reasonably probable that four of my Brothers will vote to grant certiorari, and there is a fair prospect that the Court will reverse the decision below.

Interestingly enough, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court picked up the gauntlet thrown down by Justice Brennan and subsequently upheld the Massachusetts judge's denial of the journalist's motion for a protective order against disclosure. The Massachusetts court said a protective order would only delay the disclosure of sources and thus the danger to the free flow of information was negligible. See In re Roche, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2121, 411 N.E.2d 466 (Mass. 1980).

Justice White's opinion for the Court in Branzburg raises another problem with the privilege that has not been resolved. Who is a journalist or reporter? Who is covered by the constitutional or statutory shield? Can a workable definition be achieved? Was Daniel Ellsberg, who leaked the Pentagon Papers, covered? Underground, minority, and student editors? Pollsters, pamphleteers, book authors, freelancers, researchers? White believes that crafting a privilege will require courts to define categories of qualified, legitimate, or "respectable" journalists, a process that offends a First Amendment tradition hostile to any form of state certification or licensing.

The question was put in memorable language in the case of Annette Buchanan, a college editor who on May 24, 1966 wrote a story for the University of Oregon Daily Emerald about pot smoking on the campus. The story quoted seven unidentified marijuana users under the unfortunate headline, "Students Condone Marijuana Use." A district attorney subpoenaed Buchanan, and she twice refused to identify her sources before the grand jury. She was cited for contempt, tried, and convicted. Upholding her conviction the Oregon Supreme Court addressed the problem of adjusting the definition of newsman to the implications of the First Amendment:

> Assuming that legislators are free to experiment with such definitions, it would be dangerous business for courts, asserting constitutional grounds, to extend to an employee of a "respectable" newspaper a privilege which would be denied to an employe of a disreputable newspaper; or to an episodic pamphleteer; or to a freelance writer seeking a story to sell on the open market; or, indeed, to a shaggy nonconformist who wishes only to write out his message and nail it to a tree. If the claimed privilege is to be found in the Constitution, its benefits cannot be limited to those whose credentials may, from time to time, satisfy the government. State v. Buchanan, 436 P.2d 79 (Or. 1968).

Although the Oregon court assumed that legislators could experiment with definition, that too is risky for reporters and others. Two reporters for the student newspaper at Hofstra University were ordered to testify at a pretrial hearing in a criminal case. Their argument that New York's shield law protected them was rejected because that law "* * * is limited to protecting the class of professional journalists, who, for gain or livelihood are engaged in preparing or editing of news for a newspaper." The shield law requires that a newspaper have paid circulation and a second class postal classification to qualify. Hofstra's paper had neither. New York v. Hennessy, 13 Med.L.Rptr. 1109 (N.Y.Dist.Ct. 1986).

A student, Mario Brajuha, who was doing research work for his Ph.D. degree while employed as a waiter at a restaurant to do field research on "The Sociology of the American Restaurant," was subpoenaed to appear before a federal grand jury investigating a fire at the restaurant. Brajuha moved to quash on grounds that the material sought should be privileged. Academics doing scholarly research, he argued, would be chilled if material identifying parties to the research was routinely disclosable. The Second Circuit did not find a privilege under the facts of the case and remanded to a lower court for more fact-finding. The appeals court did say that a privilege should be available if a researcher can demonstrate the nature and seriousness of the research. In re Grand Jury Subpoena, 11 Med.L.Rptr. 1224, 750 F.2d 223 (2d Cir. 1984). How would a researcher demonstrate the nature and seriousness of a research project?

In September 1977, Karen Silkwood, a nuclear industry worker, died under mysterious circumstances while driving to meet a reporter to whom she apparently was to divulge information alleging unsafe working conditions at a Kerr-McGee nuclear power plant. The administrator of Silkwood's estate brought a civil action against the company claiming violation of her civil rights.

The company subpoenaed Arthur Hirsch, a documentarist who, while not a party to the suit, had investigated Silkwood's death and had received confidential information in the course of his filmmaking. The federal district court denied Hirsch's claim of privilege because he was not a newsman regularly engaged in obtaining, editing, or otherwise preparing news.

The Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals concluded that Hirsch was an investigative reporter as far as the film was concerned and noted that the Supreme Court had not limited the privilege to newspaper reporters. The court said the three-part test applied. Silkwood v. Kerr-McGee, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1087, 563 F.2d 433 (10th Cir. 1977).

STATE LAW PRIVILEGES: COMMON LAW, CONSTITUTIONAL, AND STATUTORY GROUNDS

The state courts and legislatures have taken seriously the Supreme Court's recommendation to look at shield laws on their own. Virtually every state has considered passing such a statute. Twenty-six states have shield laws, while at least fourteen others have recognized a privilege based on common law, state constitutional law, the First Amendment, or a combination of the three.

The shield law states are Alabama, Alaska, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Delaware, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland,[25] Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Tennessee. New Mexico's first attempt at a shield law was passed in 1975, but declared unconstitutional the next year by the state supreme court as an interference with judicial prerogatives concerning evidence.[26] The statute was later amended to address the constitutional issues.

States without shield laws that have recognized a qualified privilege based on common law or constitutional law include Connecticut, Florida, Idaho, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Texas, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, and Wisconsin. Generally, states taking a nonstatutory approach have adopted Stewart's three-part test or a variation of it. A key advantage of a state court's relying on state rather than federal law as the basis for the privilege is that its interpretation cannot be overridden unless there is an overt conflict with federal law.

Some states straddle the line between common law and constitutional grounds. Wisconsin, for example, implied a qualified common law privilege based upon its constitutional guarantees of freedom of speech and press. The case, State v. Knops, 183 N.W.2d 93 (Wis. 1971), grew out of a grand jury investigation into the bombing of a research center on the University of Wisconsin-Madison campus in which a young research assistant was killed.

A Madison "underground" newspaper, Kaleidoscope, had printed a front page story entitled "The Bombers Tell Why and What Next—Exclusive to the Kaleidoscope." The editor, Mark Knops, was subpoenaed, appeared, asserted his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination, was granted immunity, and then pleaded that he had a First Amendment privilege against revealing his confidential informants.

Wisconsin's Supreme Court rejected his claim and upheld a contempt sentence on the ground that the answers sought carried an overriding need of the public to protect itself against attack. Relevance was discussed when the court, comparing the case with Caldwell, noted that unlike that case Knops did not face "an unstructured fishing expedition composed of questions which will meander in and out of his private affairs without apparent purpose or direction."

A telling admission was made, however, in Justice Heffernan's dissenting opinion. Could the compelling state interest in obtaining Knops' testimony have been achieved by alternative means? It was a comment on the times that, according to Heffernan, both state and federal officials had stated under oath that they knew who had bombed Sterling Hall and that federal warrants had been issued for the arrest of the suspects. Did official action in the case reflect anathema toward editor Knops and his newspaper more than a concern for criminal justice?

Seven years later in Zelenka v. Wisconsin, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 1055, 266 N.W.2d 279 (Wis. 1978), the Wisconsin Supreme Court squarely based a qualified privilege on its constitutional guarantee of freedom of speech and press.

While most states have relied on a combination of grounds for the privilege, others have taken the Court's invitation in Branzburg literally and narrowly. In an advisory opinion sought by state officials, the New Hampshire Supreme Court relied solely on that state's constitution in finding that a reporter has a privilege not to disclose sources in a civil proceeding:

> In the absence of a statutory reporter's privilege we turn briefly to the question of whether such a privilege exists at common law. * * * No such general right existed at common law for civil proceedings.
>
> However, in rejecting the proposed test in criminal proceedings before a grand jury the (U.S. Supreme) Court made clear that it was "powerless to bar state courts from responding in their own way." * * * The New Hampshire Constitution, part 1, article 22 provides that "liberty of the press" is "essential to the security of freedom in a state" and ought, therefore, "to be inviolably preserved."
>
> Our constitution quite consciously ties a free press to a free state, for effective self-government cannot succeed unless the people have access to an unimpeded and uncensored flow of reporting. News gathering is an integral part of the process.

The court declined to offer an opinion on the scope of the privilege, what persons it applied to, or if the analysis would be different in a criminal proceeding. Opinion of the Justices, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 2083, 373 A.2d 644 (N.H. 1977). Advisory opinions are allowed in the states, but federal courts are prevented from rendering advisory opinions due to the federal constitution's requirement that there be a "case or controversy." Note how the New Hampshire court carefully used its specific state constitutional language in deciding in favor of a privilege. Are there advantages to this approach? Disadvantages?

The scope of the privilege has been addressed in a number of states using a common law or constitutional privilege. The privilege has been held to include other material, such as unpublished notes, but it has also been held inapplicable when a plaintiff in a libel suit was required to prove that a defendant entertained serious doubts about a story.[27] And generally, no privilege applies when a reporter is called to answer questions about nonconfidential, published information from named sources.[28]

It is somewhat dangerous to generalize about common law and constitutional interpretations, 27. Florida v. Reid, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1249 (Fla. 1982). See also, Coira v. Depoo Hospital, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 1692 (Fla. 1978). The Coira court held also that in civil litigation the reporter's privilege not to produce unpublished information is paramount. In Downing v. Monitor Publishing Co., 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1193, 415 A.2d 683 (N.H. 1980), the New Hampshire Supreme Court decided that disclosure was required where plaintiff had no other way to demonstrate that a newspaper had reason to doubt its source under the actual malice test. In the absence of disclosure, the court could assume the newspaper had no source. California did the same in Rancho La Costa, Inc. v. Superior Ct. of Los Angeles County, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1249, 106 Cal.App.3d 646, 165 Cal.Rptr. 347 (1980).

however, because the differences between the various states are significant. Curiously, the interpretations of these courts are often similar to those of courts in other states with shield statutes.

The Scope of Shield Laws

State shield laws are perhaps a firmer form of protection because they are formalized in statutes and are therefore less susceptible to alteration or manipulation than is the case-by-case approach used under common law and constitutional tests. Shield laws are written in both absolute and conditional terms; most are conditional. Shield laws may cover only the identity of sources or may cover everything up to and including a reporter's thought processes; most protect sources, notes, and videotapes or negatives. Shield laws may be written so that they apply in only certain types of proceedings. They define who is protected and occasionally specify what news-gathering intent is required for a reporter to claim protection. However written, nearly all shield laws contain exceptions allowing compelled testimony or production of materials.

Shield laws range from stingy to generously absolute. Michigan's shield law is the stingiest, protecting journalists only before state grand juries and under no other circumstances. The statute was even narrower before Brad Stone, a reporter and producer for a Detroit television station, was subpoenaed to appear before a grand jury. He was also told to bring all written and filmed materials from his station's coverage of youth gangs in Detroit. The grand jury, investigating the death of an off-duty policeman, thought that Stone's materials and testimony might help identify suspects. Stone protested that many of his sources had been promised anonymity, and argued that the identities of youth gang members he interviewed were readily available to the police. Stone also relied on the state shield law. In a decision that is an example of the tendency of state courts to construe privileges literally and narrowly, the Michigan Court of Appeals told Stone the shield law, written in 1949, did not apply to him:

> First, we note that the statute itself makes no mention of television or radio reporters. Rather, it refers to "reporters of newspapers or other publications." Appellant urges us to construe the statute broadly to read "publication" as including a television news show.
>
> Courts may not speculate as to the probable intent of the Legislature beyond the words employed in a statute. Ordinary words are given their plain and ordinary meaning. When the language of a statute is clear and unambiguous, judicial construction is neither required nor permitted. Such a statute * * * speaks for itself.
>
> As the trial court noted, reading the statute to include television news reporters would be an inappropriate exercise of the judicial function, and arguments concerning the fairness of the statute must be addressed to the Legislature.

The court also rejected Stone's claim that the statute as written violated the First Amendment by treating some members of the press preferentially. Only a broad interpretation, he argued, would render the statute constitutional. This argument too was rejected. Michigan v. Storer Communications, 13 Med.L.Rptr. 1901 (Mich.App. 1986). Stone's First Amendment equal protection argument was rejected later by the Sixth Circuit, which first read Branzburg as allowing no privilege under the circumstances, then said that, under a rational basis standard, "such action by a legislature is presumed to be valid." Storer Communications v. Giovan, 13 Med.L.Rptr. 2049, 810 F.2d 580 (6th Cir. 1987). Within months, the Michigan legislature amended the law to include broadcast reporters. But at the same time, an exception allowing compelled disclosure when grand juries are investigating capital crimes was inserted into what had been an absolute shield law.[29]

Even the most absolutist privilege laws may fall before the Sixth Amendment rights of a criminal defendant.[30] The federal constitutional right takes precedence over the state shield. In civil cases absolute shields are more likely to be applied absolutely,[31] but a demonstration that disclosure is needed for preservation of a constitutional or compelling interest may override the shield.[32]

The scope of shield laws shows complex variation from state to state. They may cover the source of information but not shield the information itself.[33] In others, shield laws discriminate between regular employees of the traditional news media and free-lancers.[34] Still others differentiate, as Michigan does, among media, granting more protection to newspaper writers than magazine writers, for example.[35] In still others, the question of who is covered is determined solely by discerning an intent to disseminate to the public, regardless of the journalistic status of the individual claiming protection.[36] Some states, including Florida and Illinois, do not protect reporters who are defendants in libel cases. And in some states the courts have found it relatively easy to find that a journalist has waived the privilege, which would otherwise have applied.[37]

California's shield law did not protect William Farr while he was between newspaper jobs, even though the information he was ordered to produce was gathered while he was employed as a reporter. A New York court ruled that its law did not cover a television cameraman. In 1981, amendments extended that law's protection to free-lancers, photographers, book authors, employers of journalists and nonestablishment media. It also protects information not solicited by a reporter, and thereby from nonconfidential sources, and information that may be highly relevant to a judicial proceeding.[38] Minnesota's statute protects all persons communicating with the public. Does it trivialize the privilege to extend it to those on the periphery of public affairs?

Since sources may be inferred from a journalist's work product, the hazard of state laws that protect only sources should be recognized.[39] Some laws require that there be publication and an implied or express agreement of confidentiality between source and reporter for the privilege to be invoked.[40] The privilege may attach to a reporter but not to his or her employer.[41]

The argument for a nationwide, federal shield law is largely based on the uncertainty resulting from so much variation, an uncertainty which some consider unacceptable in a time when much journalism crosses state boundaries.[42] The potential for both uncertainty and overt conflict among and between state shields is more than theoretical. It has arisen frequently in cases where journalistic activities cross state borders. In a case where it is arguable that more than one state's law could apply, a court must choose which is the proper law to apply. Usually that law will be the law of the state where the reporting occurred. But other courts may feel so strongly about local law that another state's law will not be applied, especially if the two conflict. Former Senator Paul Laxalt of Nevada sued three California newspapers for libel over several articles implying he had relationships with organized crime figures. Nevada's federal district court applied that state's rules for deciding what law applies. Despite the fact that the newspapers had performed almost all reporting, writing, and editing in California, and despite limited circulation of the newspapers in Nevada, the court decided that Nevada's shield law applied, not California's. Some of the sources apparently were from Nevada. Under Nevada's shield, the newspapers were protected from compelled source disclosure but were also told they could not rely on the sources in their libel defense. Laxalt v. McClatchy, 14 Med.L.Rptr. 1199 (D.Nev. 1987). Does the Laxalt case mean that reporters should consider the privilege law of another state when the subject of an article lives in that state? Could the reporters have anticipated that Nevada law applied to their reporting in California?

Other complications abound. In most—but not all—jurisdictions a contempt order for failure to appear or disclose is considered a final, appealable judgment.[43] In some states the person seeking disclosure is expected to show that the material will be admissible at trial. There is uncertainty over the burden of proof applicable to those seeking disclosure. It may be preponderance of the evidence, clear and convincing evidence, or proof of a compelling interest.[44] And the burden of proof may vary depending upon in what type of proceeding disclosure is sought.

Nonetheless, a shield law works as the first line of defense for a journalist who is plainly covered by it. The "plain meaning" of the words of a statute can settle a dispute readily. A reporter for the Omaha Sun who went undercover in 1981 to obtain material on underage drinking and lax enforcement by area bars was subpoenaed to testify as to what and whom she had seen. The newspaper argued that disclosure of anything was precluded by Nebraska's shield law. Arguably the most absolute, Nebraska's shield prevents compelled disclosure of "data of whatever sort" from any person or organization processing information for "communication to the public" in "any state or federal proceeding."[45] The disclosure request was quashed on the basis of the text of the statute alone without any formal hearing.

Obviously shield laws must be carefully drafted if they are to avoid judicial interpretations that puncture them. Minnesota's statute, stronger than most, provides an example of comprehensiveness, notably in its broad definition of newsgatherer and use of the three-part test. It also shows economy and clarity of language, which discourages strained constructions by the courts. Note also its exception for libel suits.

MINNESOTA FREE FLOW OF INFORMATION ACT

MINN. STAT. ANN. §§595.021–.025 (WEST SUPP. 1988).

Sec. 1 (Citation.) Sections 1 and 4 may be cited as the Minnesota free flow of information act.

Sec. 2 (Public Policy.) In order to protect the public interest and the free flow of information, the news media should have the benefit of a substantial privilege not to reveal sources of information or to disclose unpublished information. To this end, the freedom of press requires protection of the confidential relationship between the news gatherer and the source of information. The purpose of this act is to insure and perpetuate, consistent with the public interest, the confidential relationship between the news media and its (sic) sources.

Sec. 3 (Disclosure Prohibited.) No person who is or has been directly engaged in the gathering, procuring, compiling, editing, or publishing of information for the purpose of transmission, dissemination or publication to the public shall be required by any court, grand jury, agency, department or branch of the state, or any of its political sub-divisions or other public body, or by either house of the legislature or any committee, officer, member, or employee thereof, to disclose in any proceeding the person or means from or through which information was obtained, or to disclose any unpublished information procured by him in the course of his work or any of his notes, memoranda, recording tapes, film or other reportorial data which would tend to identify the person or means through which the information was obtained.

Sec. 4 (Exception and Procedure.) Subdivision 1. A person seeking disclosure may apply to the district court of the county where the person employed by or associated with a news media resides, has his principal place of business or where the proceeding in which the information sought is pending.

Subd. 2. The application shall be granted only if the court determines after hearing the parties that the person making application, by clear and convincing evidence, has met all three of the following conditions:

1. that there is probable cause to believe that the source has information clearly relevant to a specific violation of the law other than a misdemeanor,
2. that the information cannot be obtained by any alternative means or remedy less destructive of first amendment rights, and

3. that there is a compelling and overriding interest requiring the disclosure of the information where the disclosure is necessary to prevent injustice.

Subd. 3. The district court shall consider the nature of the proceedings, the merits of the claims and defenses, the adequacies of alternative remedies, the relevancy of the information sought, and the possibility of establishing by other means that which the source is expected or may tend to prove. The court shall make its appropriate order after making findings of fact, which order may be appealed directly to the Supreme Court according to the appropriate rule of appellate procedure. The order is stayed and non-disclosure shall remain in full force and effect during the pendency of the appeal.

Sec. 5 (Defamation.) Subdivision 1. The prohibition of disclosure provided in Section 3 shall not apply in any defamation action where the person seeking disclosure can demonstrate that the identity of the source will lead to relevant evidence on the issue of actual malice.

Subd. 2. Notwithstanding the provisions of Subdivision 1 of this Section, the identity of the source of information shall not be ordered disclosed unless the following conditions are met:

a. that there is probable cause to believe that the source has information clearly relevant to the issue of defamation;
b. that the information cannot be obtained by any alternative means or remedy less destructive of First Amendment rights.

Subd. 3. The court shall make its order on the issue of disclosure after making findings of fact, which order may be appealed directly to the Supreme Court according to the rules of appellate procedure. During the appeal the order is stayed and nondisclosure shall remain in full force and effect.

One significant advantage of a statute is that it can be amended readily to cover more individuals and more types of media. Shield law amendments have almost always expanded protection rather than contracted it. Under a common law or constitutional approach, those seeking protection must wait for a lawsuit to arise to seek expanded protection. The concern that legislatures will reduce protection or revoke shields altogether as a way of punishing the press has not as yet materialized.

JOURNALIST'S PRIVILEGE IN THE CRIMINAL CONTEXT

Consistent with Branzburg, a journalist who witnesses a crime remains highly vulnerable to subpoena. Traditional privilege analysis refuses to recognize a right to refuse to testify unless there is an understanding that a communication is privileged. When a reporter has simply seen what anyone else could have seen, no confidential relationship exists because no communication was understood as privileged. Typically, in Pankratz v. Colorado District Court, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1269, 609 P.2d 1101 (Colo. 1980), the court held there was no state or federal constitutional privilege or common law privilege when a reporter witnesses a crime. The court noted that the reporter was not shielding the identity of a source, only testimony about a meeting attended by the reporter.

Even when a journalist witnesses a crime or has material amounting to a confession by a defendant under a confidentiality agreement, courts may look unfavorably on the claim. Following publication of a story in which a murder defendant made incriminating statements and prosecutors issued a subpoena, a New Jersey court determined that the state's shield law was waived so far as published information was concerned. In re Schumann, 15 Med.L.Rptr. 1113 (N.J. Super.Ct. 1988). The New Jersey Supreme Court later said a waiver applies only if a defendant seeks testimony.

In other cases, courts have found that the compelling interest part of Stewart's three-part test is met by government's interest in public safety and in successful prosecution of criminals.

Reporters called to testify before grand juries may rely upon rules in addition to those of privilege. While federal and state constitutional privilege may apply, and so may state shield laws or state common law, grand jury subpoenas may also be attacked generally on grounds of overbreadth, prematurity, duplication, and harassment. The Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination may be raised in appropriate cases, but a grant of immunity to the reporter witness will negate the right. A reporter who must "take the Fifth" probably has worries other than protecting sources or notes, however.

In federal cases, the Department of Justice's Guidelines on News Media Subpoenas[46] and the Federal Rules of Evidence may be added. The Guidelines try to strike a balance between news flow and justice, between negotiation and demand. Reporters are not entitled under the First or Fourth Amendments to advance warning that a subpoena is coming, however. Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press v. American Telephone & Telegraph Co., 4 Med.L.Rptr. 1177, 593 F.2d 1030 (D.C.Cir. 1978), cert. den. 440 U.S. 949 (1979). In federal grand jury cases, express authorization by the U.S. Attorney General is required, and in all cases involving news media, alternative sources must be pursued. If the guidelines are not followed, a subpoena may be challenged and quashed. United States v. Blanton, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1106, 534 F.Supp. 295 (S.D.Fla. 1982).

Federal Rules of Evidence § 403 allows a judge to exclude relevant evidence or quash subpoenas altogether if the testimony or subpoena is unlikely to produce significant new information. Any subpoena against a reporter that does not promise new information is premature. United States v. Burke, 9 Med.L.Rptr. 1211, 700 F.2d 70 (2d Cir. 1983). Section 501 provides that when state law supplies the rule for a defense, a federal court should apply state law when considering a privilege claim. If a federal circuit recognizes a privilege similar to Stewart's three-part test as a matter of federal constitutional law or federal common law, a federal court would normally apply federal privilege rules if there is no state law or state privilege protection is less than the federal. Where the state's law provides greater protection, Branzburg itself may require that state law apply.[47]

Under the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure § 17(c), only "evidentiary materials" may be subpoenaed—in other words, material that would be admissible at trial. State criminal procedure rules may be similar. The case which follows shows the complexity when § 17(c), a federal journalist's privilege, and the Sixth Amendment right of "compulsory process for obtaining witnesses" must be considered together. It also illustrates the difficulty of applying a journalist's privilege generally.

The Third Circuit heard two appeals in the case. In the first appeal, the court extended its common law privilege to notes and materials as well as to the identities of sources. United States v. Cuthbertson, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1551, 630 F.2d 139 (3d Cir. 1980), cert. den. 449 U.S. 1126 (1981) (Cuthbertson I). After further trial court proceedings, the case arose again. Both involved subpoenas by defendants in a criminal fraud and conspiracy trial of outtakes and transcripts of interviews with trial witnesses from CBS's "60 Minutes." What follows is an edited version of Cuthbertson II.

UNITED STATES v. CUTHBERTSON

7 MED.L.RPTR. 1377, 651 F.2D 189 (3D CIR. 1981), CERT. DEN. 454 U.S. 1056.

ALDISERT, Circuit Judge.

Because the facts are detailed in Cuthbertson I, we need set forth only a synopsis. On December 3, 1978, CBS presented on its news program "60 Minutes" an investigative report describing fast-food franchising by an organization known as Wild Bill's Family Restaurants. The report was based on interviews with a number of persons, including certain franchisees and former employees of Wild Bill's, and local government officials. On September 5, 1979, a federal grand jury returned an indictment against several principals of Wild Bill's charging them with fraud and conspiracy in the operation of the company. On February 4, 1980, on the eve of trial, the defendants served on CBS a subpoena pursuant to rule 17(c) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure demanding production of all reporters' notes, file "out takes," audiotapes, and transcripts of interviews prepared in connection with the "60 Minutes" program. The district court's denial of CBS' motion to quash the subpoena and its subsequent order holding CBS in contempt were before us in the previous appeal.

In Cuthbertson I, we held that "journalists possess a qualified privilege not to divulge confidential sources and not to disclose unpublished information in their possession in criminal cases." 630 F.2d at 147. We recognized that "compelled production of a reporter's resource materials can constitute a significant intrusion into the newsgathering and editorial processes." Id. We concluded that this qualified privilege may be superseded by "countervailing interests" in particular cases, requiring the district courts to "balance the defendant's need for the material against the interests underlying the privilege * * *." Id. at 148.

We also established guidelines for the district courts to use in applying rule 17(c) to subpoenas duces tecum directed to third parties. Rule 17(c) was not intended to be a broad discovery device, and only materials that are "admissible as evidence" are subject to subpoena under the rule. See Bowman Dairy Co. v. United States, 341 U.S. 214, 221 (1951). To obtain pretrial production and inspection of unprivileged materials from a third party witness, a party must show:

> (1) that the documents are evidentiary and relevant; (2) that they are not otherwise procurable reasonably in advance of trial by exercise of due diligence; (3) that the party cannot properly prepare for trial without such production and inspection in advance of trial and that the failure to obtain such inspection may tend unreasonably to delay the trial; and (4) that the application is made in good faith and is not intended as a general "fishing expedition." 630 F.2d at 145 quoting United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 699–700 (1974). * * *

Because the district court had ordered in camera review rather than presentation to the moving party, however, we deemed the second and third elements of this test inapplicable. 630 F.2d at 145.

Defendants had requested previous statements by persons whose names did not appear on the government's witness list as well as statements by persons whose names did appear. They asserted no basis for admissibility of the non-witness statements other than a hope that they would contain some exculpatory material. Accordingly, we held the district court's order to be invalid under rule 17(c) to the extent it sought non-witness material. 630 F.2d at 146. We found, however, that statements of persons on the government's witness list may be inconsistent with trial testimony and admissible for impeachment purposes. 630 F.2d at 144. We recognized that "because such statements ripen into evidentiary material for purposes of impeachment only if and when the witness testifies at trial, impeachment statements, although subject to subpoena under rule 17(c), generally are not subject to production and inspection by the moving party prior to trial." Id. Nevertheless, because in camera review would aid the district court's trial preparation, we held that the district court's order to produce statements by witnesses for in camera inspection before trial was not an abuse of discretion under rule 17(c). Id. at 145.

After remand from this court, CBS submitted to the district court for in camera review transcripts and audio tapes of three interviews with two persons whose names appear on the government witness list. After some skirmishing over and a hearing on related matters, the court ruled that the witness statements would materially aid the defendants and therefore would be turned over to them before trial under the rationale of Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963).

The present conflict emerged from that decision. This court had approved in camera inspection of witness statements for the purpose of deciding whether they would have impeachment value; if so, they could be turned over to the defendants during the trial after the particular government witness had testified. On remand, however, the district court determined that these statements could be turned over to the defendants after commencement of trial but before the witnesses testified because they qualified as exculpatory evidence. It entered an order on March 24, 1981, directing disclosure of the materials to defendants on March 30, 1981. * * * On March 25, Judge Gibbons granted a stay of the order, and on March 28, a motions panel consisting of Chief Judge Seitz and Judge Adams extended the stay pending a decision on the merits. The other petition for writ of mandamus * * * challenges the district court's ruling of March 23, 1981, which required CBS to submit certain non-witness material to enhance intelligibility of the witness statements. Although no formal order directing this submission has been filed, CBS filed this second petition for writ of mandamus on March 28.

* * *

[There follows a discussion on the technicalities of appellate jurisdiction and review.] * * *

In Cuthbertson I, CBS sustained a contempt citation by refusing to comply with a subpoena. On appeal, we also ordered CBS to submit some documents to the district court for in camera review, and the Supreme Court denied defendants' petition for a writ of certiorari. After denial of the petition for writ of certiorari, CBS had no alternative but to comply by submitting the documents.

* * *

We conditioned our mandate, however, by limiting in camera inspection to examination of the documents to determine their possible value in impeaching government witnesses. Only after the district court had the materials in its possession did it announce its intention to allow the defendants to examine them prior to the witnesses' trial testimony. Because the trial court was already in possession of the materials as a result of the earlier appeal, it was impossible for CBS to generate an appealable order by resisting production and incurring contempt sanctions.

In the absence of the more lenient methods of appealing interlocutory orders available to civil litigants under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) and Fed.R.Civ.P. 54(b), a steadfast requirement that CBS incur contempt before appealing would foreclose it from obtaining review of important issues likely to arise after it submits the documents to the district court. Such a rule would be disadvantageous both to CBS and to the development of this uncertain area of the law. In addition, an invariable requirement of a contempt citation as a ticket to appellate review would work at cross purposes with our earlier admonition that "trial courts should be cautious to avoid an unnecessary confrontation between the courts and the press." Riley v. City of Chester, 612 F.2d 708, 718 (3d Cir. 1979). * * *

CBS contends that the materials do not qualify as exculpatory evidence retrievable under rule 17(c), and that the defendants have not met the standards for compelling disclosure of press materials under our decisions in Riley, Cuthbertson, and Criden because they have not demonstrated that this privileged material is the only source of the desired information. We agree on both points.

Rule 17(c) provides:

> A subpoena may also command the person to whom it is directed to produce the books, papers, documents or other objects designated therein. The court on motion made promptly may quash or modify the subpoena if compliance would be unreasonable or oppressive. The court may direct that books, papers, documents or objects designated in the subpoena be produced before the court at a time prior to the trial or prior to the time when they are to be offered in evidence and may upon their production permit the books, papers, documents or objects or portions thereof to be inspected by the parties and their attorneys.

The Supreme Court has determined that a rule 17(c) subpoena reaches only evidentiary materials. "In short, any document or other materials, admissible as evidence, obtained by the Government by solicitation or voluntarily from third persons is subject to subpoena." Bowman Dairy Co. v. United States, 341 U.S. at 221 (emphasis added). The court extended the admissibility requirement of rule 17(c) to materials held by third parties in United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. at 699–700, 699 n. 12. See also United States v. Iozia, 13 F.R.D. 335, 338, 340–41 (S.D.N.Y. 1952). Neither the government nor the defendants have explained how the CBS materials could be admissible as evidence, unless the interviewees testified and made inconsistent statements.

We believe that the basic error of the district court in its discussion of the statements' potential lay in its failure to discriminate between potential exculpatory material in the possession of the prosecution, generally available under the teachings of Brady v. Maryland, and exculpatory evidence in the possession of third parties. Only the latter is retrievable under a rule 17(c) subpoena; naked exculpatory material held by third parties that does not rise to the dignity of admissible evidence simply is not within the rule. That is the teaching of Bowman Dairy and Nixon, and we applied it in Cuthbertson I.

The appellees in this case have not demonstrated, nor does our research disclose, any potential use of the present materials as evidence in the trial other than for purposes of impeachment. On their face, these materials are simply hearsay.

* * *

Accordingly, as a matter of law the materials may not be obtained at this time by a rule 17(c) subpoena. Because the district court's in camera possession is based on the necessity of evaluating the material against the evidentiary requirement of rule 17(c), it may not release the material to the parties unless that requirement is met. It failed to make such a determination of admissibility in this case, and we therefore reverse its order releasing the materials to the defendants.

We also reverse the district court's order for a separate and independent reason.

* * *

In our most recent decision in the reporters' privilege context, United States v. Criden, 633 F.2d 346 (3d Cir. 1980), cert.. denied sub nom. Schaffer v. United States, 49 U.S.L.W. 3512 (Jan. 20, 1981), we reviewed our prior decisions in Cuthbertson I and Riley and cited three criteria that must be met before a reporter may be compelled to disclose confidential information:

> First, the movant must demonstrate that he has made an effort to obtain the information from other sources. Second, he must demonstrate that the only access to the information sought is through the journalist and her sources. Finally, the movant must persuade the Court that the information sought is crucial to the claim, 633 F.2d at 358–359.

In this case, the identities of the possible witnesses are available from the witness list. The statements were made by franchisees and potential franchisees, with whom the defendants have had business relationships. Defense counsel have conceded that "[w]e know because of the dealings that the defendants have had with all the franchisees, who all of these people are."

In this case, the sources have not yet testified. If their testimony at trial differs from their statement to CBS, the defendants will have the opportunity to obtain the materials for impeachment purposes.

* * *

Our conclusion that the evidentiary potential of the witness statements will arise only when the witnesses testify governs our disposition of the second petition for writ of mandamus. It is our understanding that, at the time the second petition was filed in this court, no formal order on this issue had been entered by the district court. * * * Moreover, the threshold determination giving rise to the appeal and the first petition—that the materials contain exculpatory information to which defendants are entitled—was not made with regard to the non-witness materials. Therefore, the second petition for writ of mandamus is not ripe, and we need not now address it.

Accordingly, * * * the district court's order of March 24, 1981, releasing the witness materials to the defendants, will be reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. [T]he petition for writ of mandamus will be dismissed as moot; [a second] petition for writ of mandamus will be dismissed as not ripe.

COMMENT

The Third Circuit essentially reversed the federal district court because the defendants seeking disclosure of information failed to make a sufficient showing that the information was needed. Specifically, the court held that disclosure prior to trial could not be ordered since there was no showing that (1) the tapes would be admissible at trial as Rule 17(c) requires, and (2) that alternate sources had been exhausted. Cuthbertson II recognized and applied a qualified journalist's privilege, consistent with Riley v. City of Chester, 5 Med.L.Rptr. 2161, 612 F.2d 708 (3d Cir. 1979). The complex opinion demonstrates multiple strands of analysis possible in privilege cases. Rules of evidence are examined alongside common law privilege in light of First Amendment principles.

Cuthbertson II upholds journalists' claims that they should not be made arms either of the government or of parties in a case when it comes to investigating or proving a case. A privilege claim is most likely to be overcome in criminal cases where the defendant can show that information held by a journalist is essential to the defense because of the Sixth Amendment's guarantee of a fair trial to the defendant. Nonetheless, overcoming the privilege is difficult.

An earlier state case similar to Cuthbertson II was Brown v. Commonwealth of Virginia, 204 S.E.2d 429 (Va. 1974), where it was held that journalist's privilege could be pierced if the information was material to a defense or to reduction in the charge or penalty for the offense. While the opinion did not rely upon Stewart's three-part test, the court did require defendants to show that the information was (1) essential to the case, and (2) not available from alternative sources. No mention was made of Stewart's third part, that there be a compelling interest for disclosure, but the court may have assumed that the Sixth Amendment fair trial right satisfies it. See Barron and Dienes, Handbook of Free Speech and Free Press 447 (1979). The court said that, once the defendant meets the test, "the defendant has a fair trial right to compel disclosure. * * * the newsman must, upon pain of contempt, yield to that right."

In Brown, the information sought concerned inconsistent statements of a prosecution witness. The Virginia Supreme Court appeared to rely upon both its state law and upon the First Amendment in recognizing a privilege. The material sought was held to be nonessential:

> [T]he record fails to show that either the statements made at trial or the prior statements were material to proof of the crime, to proof of Brown's defense, or to a reduction in the classification or penalty of the crime charged. Since the inconsistent statements were collateral and not material, the identity of the source was irrelevant.

In criminal cases, the greatest stumbling block for defendants or for prosecutors seeking disclosure of confidential sources or information has been the second prong of Stewart's three-part test, the requirement that there be no alternative method of obtaining the information sought. In Hallissy v. Contra Costa Superior Court, 15 Med.L.Rptr. 1325 (Cal.App. 1988), a defendant in a murder trial argued that it was essential to his defense to call as a witness a reporter to whom the defendant had granted an interview. The interview resulted in an article in the Contra Costa Times entitled, "I kill many for pay," which included incriminating statements by the defendant. The prosecution relied on the article in pressing charges against the defendant. The trial judge considered a claim of First Amendment protection a "travesty" when the source was known, the information largely known, and the defendant was facing the death penalty.

The court of appeals reversed, noting that the defendant, who sought to attack his own credibility in the published interview, claimed to have confessed to others besides the reporter. This, the court held, indicated that alternative sources existed. In addition, under California's shield law, the defendant had failed to show that the material sought created a "reasonable possibility" that the evidence would exonerate him.

In State ex rel. Gèrbitz v. Curriden, 14 Med.L.Rptr. 1797, 738 S.W.2d 192 (Tenn. 1987), the court applied the alternative means analysis to refuse to compel testimony before a grand jury by a reporter whose radio interview with a self-proclaimed killer had prompted a subpoena. The killer used a false name during the interview. The reporter said he did not know the identity of the killer and could provide only a general description. The court, applying the alternative means analysis, reasoned that the state had failed to investigate well enough:

> There is no explanation of what information was sought from appellee or what other efforts, if any, the Attorney General or other law enforcement agencies had made to determine the identity of the criminal offense, the offender himself, or the site of the offense. It does not appear whether the alleged crime occurred in Hamilton County or was subject to the jurisdiction of the Hamilton County grand jury. No investigation or inquiry by Hamilton County officials with officials from surrounding counties appears to have been made, nor has any check of prison or parole records been shown.

In another case where a murder defendant had granted an exclusive interview to a reporter, however, the court ordered disclosure. Waterman Broadcasting v. Reese, 14 Med.L.Rptr. 2246, 523 So.2d 1161 (Fla.Dist.Ct.App. 1988). The court reasoned that (1) a confession is always relevant in a criminal case, (2) the exclusivity of the interview alone assured that no alternative sources existed, and (3) the state's interest in law enforcement constituted a compelling interest. Which approach is more persuasive—that of California and Tennessee refusing disclosure, or that of Florida requiring disclosure?

The privilege also applies in nontrial contexts. A television reporter was held to be entitled to refuse to answer questions posed during a deposition hearing prior to a criminal case in State of Vermont v. St. Peter, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 2671, 315 A.2d 254 (Vt. 1974), "unless the interrogator can demonstrate to the judicial officer appealed to that there is no other adequately available source for the information and that it is relevant and material on the issue of guilt or innocence."

As these cases illustrate, Branzburg has resulted in the adoption of a qualified First Amendment privilege in most jurisdictions, even in the grand jury context. In re Ridenhour, 15 Med.L.Rptr. 1022 (La. 1988): "The vast majority of the courts that have considered this issue [grand jury subpoenas] after Branzburg have read Branzburg as merely holding that reporters who witness a crime may be compelled to testify before a grand jury as to whom and what they saw." Despite the apparently unequivocal language of the Sixth Amendment, the rough outlines in Stewart's Branzburg dissent prevail in most jurisdictions.

In jurisdictions with decisions less sympathetic to a journalist's privilege—California, Massachusetts, Michigan, and New York among them—neither state shield laws nor the First Amendment will protect journalists in all circumstances. In the Rosato case, a judge anxious to discover who defied his orders to not discuss a case recognized neither a privilege for unpublished material nor the requirement of exhausting alternative sources, despite the language of California's statute at the time.[48]

48. Rosato v. Superior Court, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 2560, 51 Cal.App.3d 190, 124 Cal.Rptr. 427 (1975), cert. den. 427 U.S. 912 (1976).

Similarly, in CBS v. Superior Court, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 1568, 149 Cal.Rptr. 421 (1978), the California Court of Appeal required in camera disclosure of outtakes from the program "60 Minutes" showing negotiations for drug sales between undercover agents and the defendants in the case. The officers' identities had been revealed at a hearing on a motion to quash the subpoena. The court reasoned that all of the confidential material must be provided when part of it is revealed. This has sometimes been called the "exposure to view" theory.

After Michigan's shield law, which applied only to print reporters, was held inapplicable to provide protection for a television reporter, Storer Communications v. Giovan, 13 Med.L.Rptr. 2049, 810 F.2d 580 (6th Cir. 1987), the state legislature amended the statute to include broadcasters but added an exception and retained the narrow scope of the statute, which shields only in grand jury contexts.

Idaho and Massachusetts refused to recognize a privilege for many years and appear ready to construe theirs narrowly now. Narrow application of shield laws or refusal to provide or apply a privilege is a primary reason for a pattern of nonprotection in a number of states.

Sometimes the balance tips the other way. In United States v. Burke, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2019 (E.D.N.Y. 1981), a federal court applying state law required a magazine reporter to appear after his witness-source had testified but refused to order disclosure of work product.

At an early stage in the "Abscam" investigation, NBC and newspapers in New York and Philadelphia were privy to prosecution strategy. Defendants wanted to learn about relationships between prosecutors and the press. Although defendants met the three-part test, and Justice Department employees were punished for making disclosures to the press, reporter testimony was kept minimal. In re Schaffer, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1554 (E.D.Pa. 1980), aff'd sub nom. United States v. Criden, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1993, 633 F.2d 346 (3d Cir. 1980), cert. den. 449 U.S. 1113 (1981).

The Special Case of New Jersey: In re Farber

The famous Farber case at the time seemed a retreat from the advance of a qualified journalist's privilege in the lower courts. More than a decade later, it is clear that Farber did not signal a retreat but was at most a delay. Still, the case serves to warn journalists of the dangers possible when they get very close to their sources or when they independently investigate criminal activity.

Investigative work of New York Times reporter Myron Farber led to the indictment and prosecution of Dr. Mario E. Jascalevich for murder. Jascalevich subpoenaed Farber's notes on the ground that this might enable him to establish his innocence. Farber and his employer, the New York Times, contended that the subpoena was overbroad and that the material sought was privileged under both the new New Jersey and New York shield laws and the First Amendment. The trial judge ruled that the notes in controversy were "necessary and material." Farber and the New York Times requested a hearing to air their arguments that the material sought was privileged prior to having to produce it. The trial court judge, William Arnold, rejected this request and ordered that the subpoenaed material be produced for in camera inspection by the court.

Farber and the Times sought unsuccessfully to stay the trial judge's order for in camera or private inspection of Farber's notes in the New Jersey state courts. Both Justices White and Marshall separately declined to stay the trial court's order requiring compliance with the subpoena. Appeals Court Judge Trautwein then determined that Judge Arnold's order for in camera inspection had been "willfully condemned" and found Farber and the Times guilty as charged.

Judge Trautwein imposed a $100,000 fine on the New York Times and ordered Myron Farber to serve six months in the Bergen County jail and to pay a fine of $1,000. In addition, a fine of $5,000 for every day that Judge Arnold's production order was disobeyed was imposed on the Times. Farber was confined to the Bergen County jail for forty days. The Times and Farber then sought and obtained review of the judgments of civil and criminal contempt against them.

The New Jersey Supreme Court, per Justice Fountain, rejected the contention that the New York Times and Myron Farber had a "privilege to remain silent with respect to confidential information and the sources of such information by virtue of the First Amendment.

"In our view the Supreme Court of the United States (in Branzburg) has clearly rejected this claim and has squarely held that no such First Amendment right exists." At the same time, it was conceded that "despite the holding in Branzburg, those who gather and disseminate news are by no means without First Amendment protections." Among these protections was the right to refrain from revealing sources except upon legitimate "demand."

What was illegitimate demand? "Demand is not legitimate when the desired information is patently irrelevant to the needs of the inquirer or his needs are not manifestly compelling." However, among the protections afforded by the First Amendment to the press, "there is not to be found the privilege of refusing to reveal relevant and confidential information and its sources to a grand jury."

> Thus, we do no weighing or balancing of societal interests in reaching our determination that the First Amendment does not afford appellants the privilege they claim. The weighing and balancing has been done by a higher court. Our conclusion that appellants cannot derive the protection they seek from the First Amendment rests upon the fact that the ruling in Branzburg is binding upon us and we interpret it as applicable to, and clearly including, the particular issue framed here. It follows that the obligation to appear at a criminal trial on behalf of a defendant who is enforcing his Sixth Amendment rights is at least as compelling as the duty to appear before a grand jury.

The New Jersey Supreme Court's decision in Farber was hard to evaluate. Unlike the cases discussed earlier, it appeared to take the position that no First Amendment-based newsman's privilege may ever attach in a grand jury context or where a criminal defendant seeks information from a reporter relevant to his case.

At the same time, the New Jersey Supreme Court emphasized that the journalist's duty to provide information to a grand jury, spoken of in Branzburg, related to "relevant information he possesses." If we speak of "relevant" information, isn't the implication that a privilege would attach to information sought which would not be "relevant"?

A fascinating aspect of the Farber case was that it presented a direct clash between the state and federal constitutions and the state shield law. The New Jersey Supreme Court described its shield law, N.J.S.A., 2A:84A–21 and 21A, as one which was "as strongly worded as any in the country." Approached as a matter of statutory construction, the "appellants come fully within the literal language of the enactment." But it was successfully argued in Farber that if the shield law was enforced, the Sixth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution as well as Art. I, § 110 of the New Jersey Constitution would be violated:

> Essentially, the argument is this: The Federal and State Constitutions each provide that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall have the right "to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor." Dr. Jascalevich seeks to obtain evidence to use in preparing and presenting his defense in the ongoing criminal trial in which he has been accused of multiple murders. He claims to come within the favor of these constitutional provisions—which he surely does. Finally, when faced with the shield law, he invokes the rather elementary but entirely sound proposition that where Constitution and statute collide, the latter must yield. Subject to what is said below, we find this argument unassailable.

An important part of the decision of the New Jersey Supreme Court involved its rejection of the contention of Farber and the Times that permitting in camera inspection by the trial court of the information in controversy would be a violation of the shield law. While agreeing with Farber and the Times that "they are entitled to a full hearing on the issues of relevance, materiality, and overbreadth of the subpoena," the New Jersey Supreme Court defended preliminary in camera inspection of the information "to determine whether, and if so to what extent, the statutory privilege must yield to the defendant's constitutional rights: * * * Judge Arnold refused to give ultimate rulings with respect to relevance and other preliminary matters until he had examined the material. We think he had no other course. It is not rational to ask a judge to ponder the relevance of the unknown."

The appellants had objected that the subpoena was vague and uncertain and that the data sought under it might not be relevant and material. This was all the more reason "for the trial court to inspect in camera the subpoenaed items."

IN RE FARBER

4 MED.L.RPTR. 1360, 394 A.2D 330 (N.J. 1978).

FOUNTAIN, J.

While we agree, then, that appellants should be afforded the hearing they are seeking, one procedural aspect of which calls for their compliance with the order for in camera inspection, we are also of the view that they, and those who in the future may be similarly situated, are entitled to a preliminary determination before being compelled to submit the subpoenaed materials to a trial judge for such inspection. Our decision in this regard is not, contrary to the suggestion in some of the briefs filed with us, mandated by the First Amendment; for in addition to ruling generally against the representatives of the press in Branzburg, the Court particularly and rather vigorously, rejected the claims there asserted that before going before the grand jury, each of the reporters, at the very least, was entitled to a preliminary hearing to establish a number of threshold issues. Rather, our insistence upon such a threshold determination springs from our obligation to give as much effect as possible, within ever-present constitutional limitations, to the very positively expressed legislative intent to protect the confidentiality and secrecy of sources from which the media derive information. To this end such a determination would seem a necessity.

The threshold determination would normally follow the service of a subpoena by a defendant upon a newspaper, a reporter or other representative of the media. The latter foreseeably would respond with a motion to quash. If the status of the movant—newspaper or media representative—were not conceded, then there would follow the taking of proofs leading to a determination that the movant did or did not qualify for the statutory privilege. Assuming qualification, it would then become the obligation of the defense to satisfy the trial judge, by a fair preponderance of the evidence including all reasonable inferences, that there was a reasonable probability or likelihood that the information sought by the subpoena was material and relevant to his defense, that it could not be secured from any less intrusive source, and that the defendant had a legitimate need to see and otherwise use it. * * * We wish to make it clear, however, that this opinion is not to be taken as a license for a fishing expedition in every criminal case where there has been investigative reporting, nor as permission for an indiscriminate rummaging through newspaper files.

Although in this case the trial judge did not articulate the findings prescribed above, it is perfectly clear that on the record before him a conclusion of materiality, relevancy, unavailability of another source, as well as need was quite inescapable.

* * *

As of June 30, 1978, the date of the challenged decision to examine the materials in camera, Judge Arnold had been trying the case for about 18 weeks. He had dealt with earlier pretrial motions. His knowledge of the factual background and of the part Farber had played was intimate and pervasive. Perhaps most significant is the trial court's thorough awareness of appellant Farber's close association with the Prosecutor's office since a time preceding the indictment. This glaring fact of their close working relationship may well serve to distinguish this case from the vast majority of others in which defendants seek disclosure from newsmen in the face of the shield law. Two and a half months before his June 30th decision, Judge Arnold observed,

> The facts show that Farber has written articles for the New York Times about this matter, commencing in January 1976. According to an article printed in the New York Times (hereinafter the Times) on January 8, 1976, Farber showed Joseph Woodcock, the Bergen County Prosecutor at that time, a deposition not in the State's file and provided additional information that convinced the prosecution to reopen an investigation into some deaths that occurred at Riverdell Hospital. [Emphasis added.] [State v. Jascalevich; In the Matter of the Application of Myron Farber and the New York Times Company re: Sequestration, 158 N.J.Super. 488, 490 (Law Div. 1978).]

And

> The court has examined the news stories in evidence and they demonstrate exceptional quality, a grasp of intricate scientific knowledge, and a style of a fine journalist. They, also, demonstrate considerable knowledge of the case before the court and deep involvement by Farber, showing his attributes as a first-rate investigative reporter. [Emphasis added.] However, if a newspaper reporter assumes the duties of an investigator, he must also assume the responsibilities of an investigator and be treated equally under the law, unless he comes under some exception. [Id. at 493–94.]

In the same vein is a letter before the trial court dated January 14, 1977 from Assistant Prosecutor Moses to Judge Robert A. Matthews, sitting as a Presiding Judge in the Appellate Division, undertaking to explain "how the investigation, from which the [Jascalevich] indictment resulted, came to be reopened." In the course of that explanation it is revealed that sometime in the latter part of 1975 "a reporter for the New York Times began an investigation into the 1965–66 deaths and circumstances surrounding them. The results of the New York Times inquiry were made available to the Prosecutor. It was thus determined that there were certain items which were not in the file of the Prosecutor." [Emphasis added.]

* * *

We hasten to add that we need not, and do not, address (much less determine) the truth or falsity of these assertions. The point to be made is that these are the assertions of the criminal defendant supported by testimonial or documentary proof; and based thereon it is perfectly clear that there was more than enough before Judge Arnold to satisfy the tests formulated above. Of course all of this information detailed above has long been known to appellants. Accordingly we find that preliminary requirements for in camera inspection have been met.

* * *

The judgment of conviction of criminal contempt and that in aid of litigant's rights are affirmed. Stays heretofore entered are vacated * * *.

COMMENT

Chief Judge Hughes, concurring, said the press claim that in camera inspection was impermissible was an "absurd proposition that the press, and not the courts should be the final arbiter of the constitutional mandate."

Justice Pashman issued a strong dissent disputing the court's assertion that Farber and the New York Times were granted a sufficient hearing prior to issuance of the disclosure order. "[A]ppellants were to be afforded an opportunity to contest the legality of the in camera disclosure only after the materials had been so disclosed," he said. "Mr. Farber probably assumed, as did I, that hearings were supposed to be held and findings made before a person went to jail and not afterwards."

Another much-publicized aspect of the case was that Farber was writing a book on the Jascalevich case and had received a large advance from a publisher.[49] Pashman challenged the majority's intimation that a reporter could lose shield law protection if characterized as an investigator:

> To hold therefore that the Shield Law is not applicable to a reporter who is also an investigator is to hold that the Shield Law will never be applicable * * *. [P]ublishing journalistic books for money is no less an illustrious way to perform the function of the press than is writing newspaper articles for a salary.

Pashman disagreed with the majority's implication that a determination of the relevancy of materials sought was appropriate when reporters gained "considerable knowledge" concerning a criminal case. He also thought in camera disclosure to determine relevancy was premature and should not be assumed to be appropriate. The hearing on relevance, materiality, and necessity should always precede a disclosure order, he said.

The New Jersey Legislature agreed with Pashman and amended the shield law to protect against routine in camera disclosure and to assure a hearing on a disclosure motion prior to any order to disclose. New Jersey v. Boiardo, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1337, 416 A.2d 793 (N.J. 1980). In Boiardo, the New Jersey Supreme Court vacated an order compelling a reporter to produce for in camera inspection a letter written by a prospective government witness in a murder trial. Once a journalist's status is certified, a party seeking disclosure of either sources or materials in New Jersey must now meet a stiff four-part test. The law also protects eyewitness newsgathering unless the crime witnessed involves "physical violence or property damage."[50]

Still, with its history of reading the shield law narrowly and a number of cases finding that reporters have waived their privilege, New Jersey courts have remained amenable to demands for disclosure in criminal cases. In a noncriminal case, the New Jersey Supreme Court had held that partial disclosure did not constitute a waiver, an apparent rejection of the "exposure to view" analysis. Maressa v. New Jersey Monthly, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1473, 445 A.2d 376 (N.J. 1982).

The Farber case became a cause celébre. In a dramatic finale, the jury acquitted Jascalevich. The need for information was gone, and Farber was released from jail. With heavy fines still outstanding, the Times sought review in the U.S. Supreme Court but was refused. In 1982, New Jersey Governor Brendan Byrne pardoned both the New York Times and Farber and returned $101,000 in criminal penalties to the newspaper.

Was the case unique in that investigative reporter Farber had become the sole expert on the case and could therefore be assumed to hold information vital to the defense? That assumption was part of the court's holding.

If nothing else is certain when privilege is claimed in the context of a criminal investigation or trial, it is clear that "fishing expeditions" are disfavored and will typically result in a decision protecting journalist's sources and materials. The Journal of the American Medical Association published an anonymous essay by a doctor who advocated euthanasia for some patients and who claimed to have actually killed a terminal patient. A Cook County, Illinois grand jury subpoenaed the magazine to name the source of its essay. Applying the Illinois shield law, the court refused to enforce the subpoena. Only if the state could provide more information would a subpoena be appropriate. Since there was no evidence that a crime had been committed, much less in Cook County, no basis for disclosure existed. The name of the source was not relevant. In re Grand Jury Investigation, 15 Med.L.Rptr. 1469 (Ill.Cir.Ct. 1988).

JOURNALIST'S PRIVILEGE IN LIBEL LITIGATION

Claims of privilege not to disclose identities of sources or not to provide materials create uneasy situations when the journalist or news organization—usually both—find themselves in the defendant's chair in a libel suit. The libel plaintiff frequently asserts that source identification or reporter work product materials are essential to proving the case. And, when the plaintiff is required to prove that a reporter acted negligently or with actual malice, the plaintiff is often correct: the quality and credibility of sources, along with the scope and accuracy of reporting materials, may be the evidence needed to show the requisite evidence of fault.

Courts considering privilege claims in libel litigation have tended to be less solicitous of the privilege than in other contexts. A reporter-defendant has more than a principled desire to prevent a "chilling effect" on newsgathering as a result of government-ordered disclosures. In libel cases, a journalist also has self-interest in avoiding liability. The courts on occasion find it difficult to overlook the specter of media self-interest in addressing issues of principle.

For example, in Downing v. Monitor Publishing Company, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1193, 415 A.2d 683 (N.H. 1980), the police chief of the town of Boscawen sued for libel after the Concord Monitor asserted in an article that the chief had failed a lie detector test. Downing sought disclosure of the names of undisclosed sources used in preparing the article. The newspaper refused, was ordered to disclose, and appealed to the New Hampshire Supreme Court. Holding that the plaintiff would be unable to prove that the defendant had "obvious reasons to doubt" the accuracy of its story without the identities of the sources, the court ordered disclosure. The police chief, a public official required to prove actual malice, would be "completely foreclosed" from recovery absent the informer's identity, the court said.

The newspaper argued that Downing should be required to make a facial showing of falsity prior to any disclosure order, reasoning both that falsity must be proved by any libel plaintiff and that a determination of truthfulness would eliminate any need for disclosure. The court instead held that disclosure may be ordered in libel cases if a plaintiff can show "that there is a genuine issue of fact regarding the falsity of the publication." The court's opinion implies a broad, general exception to the application of a journalist's privilege in libel litigation:

> Our earlier ruling in Opinion of the Justices, 117 N.H. 386, 373 A.2d 642 (1977), that there is a press privilege under the New Hampshire Constitution not to disclose the source of information when the press is not a party to an action is not applicable here. * * * In the case at hand we do not have * * * governmental involvement versus the press * * *. (Emphasis added.]

Concerned that the reporters involved might elect jail rather than reveal their sources, the court concluded that:

> Confining newsmen to jail in no way aids the plaintiff in proving his case. Therefore, we hold that when a defendant in a libel action, brought by a plaintiff who is required to prove actual malice under New York Times, refuses to declare his sources of information upon a valid order of the court, there shall arise a presumption that the defendant had no source. [Emphasis added.]

Such a presumption of course amounts to a direction by the court that a defendant acted recklessly, virtually assuring that the plaintiff will prove the necessary elements of constitutional libel.

The Monitor case highlights the collision of the principles of New York Times v. Sullivan (this text, p. 190) with the First Amendment philosophy in Stewart's Branzburg dissent, since adopted in most jurisdictions. In short, how can a libel plaintiff prove actual malice if the sources and information underlying the story cannot be obtained? If a public official or public figure plaintiff can show that identification of a news source will help prove actual malice, does the New York Times case in effect guarantee the plaintiff a right to disclosure?

Or, is the risk to the news media of an exception to privilege in libel suits greater because those suits may be filed primarily for the purpose of discovering the identities of confidential sources rather than to obtain money damages for harm to reputation? Regardless of a plaintiff's motivation, the media must bear the expense and inconvenience of litigation.

The issues were joined in a 1972 suit brought by St. Louis Mayor Alfonso Cervantes against Life magazine. Life's story alleged that Cervantes had connections with organized crime. Except for the identities of sources, the story was heavily documented. Cervantes took issue with only four out of eighty-seven paragraphs in the story. Arguing that he could not prove actual malice without the identities of specific FBI and Department of Justice sources, Cervantes moved for disclosure.

CERVANTES v. TIME, INC.

1 MED.L.RPTR. 1751, 464 F.2D 986 (8TH CIR. 1972), CERT. DEN. 409 U.S. 1125 (1973).

STEPHENSON, J.:

Mayor Cervantes instituted this diversity libel action in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Missouri seeking $2,000,000 compensatory and $10,000,000 punitive damages. He sought relief against and named as defendants the publisher of Life magazine and the reporter whose investigative efforts produced grist for the article.

* * *

The District Court (The Honorable James H. Meredith, Chief Judge), did not reach the merits of the motion to compel. However, on the basis of a well-developed record consisting of affidavits, depositions, and other documentary evidence, it entered summary judgment for the defendants on the grounds that neither defendant had knowledge of falsity, that neither entertained serious doubts as to the truth of any statement in the article, and that neither acted with reckless disregard for truth or falsity. 330 F.Supp. 936, 940 (1970). This appeal followed.

* * *

Central to the mayor's appellate attack is his contention that he cannot possibly meet his burden of proof if the reporter is allowed to hide behind anonymous news sources. He argues that in a libel case of this kind the identity of a reporter's sources is absolutely essential to the successful outcome of the lawsuit. His arguments in favor of compulsory disclosure may be summarized as follows: (a) disclosure enables the plaintiff to scrutinize the accuracy and balance of the defendant's reporting and editorial processes; (b) through disclosure it is possible to derive an accurate and comprehensive understanding of the factual data forming the predicate for the news story in suit; (c) disclosure assists successful determination of the extent to which independent verification of the published materials was secured; and (d) disclosure is the sole means by which a libeled plaintiff can effectively test the credibility of the news source, thereby determining whether it can be said that the particular source is a perjurer, a well-known libeler, or a person of such character that, if called as a witness, any jury would likely conclude that a publisher relying on such a person's information does so with reckless disregard for truth or falsity. Moreover, these particularized considerations are said to assume extraordinary importance when, as in this case, the information forming the core of the publication by its nature is not available to the public generally and is obtainable only from governmental employees who are under a duty not to reveal it to outsiders. On the basis of these considerations, the mayor advanced arguments in the District Court that it should not reach the defense motion for summary judgment until he was given the opportunity to depose and examine the Federal Bureau of Investigation and Department of Justice employees who supplied Life's reporter with confidential reports and corroboratory materials used in connection with the article. The failure of the District Court to respond favorably to this plea is urged as error here.

* * *

We are aware of the prior cases holding that the First Amendment does not grant to reporters a testimonial privilege to withhold news sources. But to routinely grant motions seeking compulsory disclosure of anonymous news sources without first inquiring into the substance of a libel allegation would utterly emasculate the fundamental principles that underlay the line of cases articulating the constitutional restrictions to be engrafted upon the enforcement of State libel laws. Such a course would also overlook the basic philosophy at the heart of the summary judgment doctrine.

* * *

Where there is a concrete demonstration that the identity of defense news sources will lead to persuasive evidence on the issue of malice, a District Court should not reach the merits of a defense motion for summary judgment until and unless the plaintiff is first given a meaningful opportunity to cross-examine those sources, whether they be anonymous or known. For only then can it be said that no genuine issue remains to be tried. Thus, if, in the course of pretrial discovery, an allegedly libeled plaintiff uncovers substantial evidence tending to show that the defendant's published assertions are so inherently improbable that there are strong reasons to doubt the veracity of the defense informant or the accuracy of his reports, the reasons favoring compulsory disclosure in advance of a ruling on the summary judgment motion should become more compelling. Similarly, where pretrial discovery produces some factor which would support the conclusion that the defendant in fact entertained serious doubt as to the truth of the matters published, identification and examination of defense news sources seemingly would be in order, and traditional summary judgment doctrine would command pursuit of further discovery prior to adjudication of a summary judgment motion. The point of principal importance is that there must be a showing of cognizable prejudice before the failure to permit examination of anonymous news sources can rise to the level of error. Mere speculation or conjecture about the fruits of such examination simply will not suffice.

But such is not this case. As the opinion of the District Court makes clear, the record contains substantial evidence indicating that it was over a period of many months that Life's reporter carefully collected and documented the data on the basis of which the article was written and published. In turn, Life's key personnel, including one researcher, four editors and three lawyers, spent countless hours corroborating and evaluating this data. Once suit was instituted, the mayor was provided with hundreds of documents utilized in preparation of the article. He then deposed virtually every Life employee who possessed any connection whatever with the article's preparation and publication and, with one exception, each affirmed his or her belief in the truth of the article and each gave deposition testimony sufficient to raise a strong inference that there was good reason for that belief. To rebut this evidence, and to support his claim that 4 of the 87 paragraphs conveyed false information, the mayor was content to present little more than a series of self-serving affidavits from himself and from Mr. Sansone, together with other evidentiary materials which framed but a minimal assault on the truth of the matters contained in the four paragraphs. Aside from this evidence, he has not produced a scintilla of proof supportive of a finding that either defendant in fact entertained serious doubts about the truth of a single sentence in the article. Neither has he come forward with competent evidence from which the District Court could reasonably discern the inherent improbability of the matters published. In short, the mayor's proof simply does not meet the standard traditionally required of one against whom a motion for summary judgment is interposed.

* * *

Where, as here, the published materials, objectively considered in the light of all the evidence, must be taken as having been published in good faith, without actual malice and on the basis of careful verification efforts, that is, they were published in good faith without regard to the identity of the news sources, there is no rule of law or policy consideration of which we are aware that counsels compulsory revelation of news sources. Neither is there any evidence by which a jury could reasonably find liability under the constitutionally required instructions. When these factors conjoin, the proper disposition is to grant the defense motion for summary judgment. The judgment of the District Court must therefore be affirmed.

Affirmed.

COMMENT

The Cervantes decision attempts a compromise that gives weight to both the interests of plaintiffs and the interests of media defendants. Is it a fair compromise, or does it place an impossible burden on the plaintiff? How does one decide, as Cervantes apparently requires, when the suit is frivolous and brought simply to unearth a source, or when a suit is a legitimate response to a false and irresponsible report which perhaps has no source at all?

A defendant's motion for summary judgment in a libel suit is typically accompanied by affidavits claiming the publisher had good reason to believe the story was true. But where a source is confidential, a defendant has great difficulty proving the claim. It makes for a strong reason supporting the decision of most news organizations to avoid relying solely on anonymous sources. Moreover, such stories are less believable.

Cervantes's dilemma was similar to that of San Francisco Mayor Joseph Alioto, who sued Look magazine for a story linking him with organized crime. Both mayors had the burden of proving actual malice whether the sources were identified or not. In Cervantes, Life had corroboration for what its sources said. In Alioto, Look lacked corroboration, and Alioto eventually succeeded in forcing disclosure.[51]

The problems that arose in Cervantes and in Monitor have become more critical, and there is now a significant body of case law addressing claims of journalist's privilege in libel litigation. The courts faced with the problem have had varying reactions. Some have found recognition of a qualified privilege entirely consistent with the Sullivan doctrine. Others have been concerned that the privilege might erode the actual malice standards of Sullivan or the fault requirements of Gertz.

Since 1979, lower courts considering privilege claims in libel cases have addressed the issue in light of the Supreme Court's refusal to create a separate privilege to protect a media defendant's editorial process from inquiry by libel plaintiffs. Herbert v. Lando, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1241, 568 F.2d 974 (2d Cir. 1977), reversed, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 2575, 441 U.S. 153 (1979). The Second Circuit, relying on Branzburg, had recognized such a privilege as a necessary corollary to newsgathering. But the Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice White, declared that the privilege went too far by limiting a plaintiff's inquiry into a defendant's state of mind, necessary to show that a defendant had reason to doubt the accuracy of a story.

A number of courts, including the New Hampshire Supreme Court in Downing, read Lando as requiring that there be an exception to privilege in libel cases. Other courts concluded instead that individual reputation was but one of many interests a state could choose to protect or not. Mazzella v. Philadelphia Newspapers, 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1983, 479 F.Supp. 523 (E.D.N.Y. 1979).

Pennsylvania's shield law, which had previously been held to protect against disclosure of source identities or of any material that might lead to identification of sources, was read narrowly when a libel plaintiff sought nonbroadcast material from a defendant television station. Relying in part on Lando, the court ordered that material be disclosed and placed the burden of deciding if a source might be identified from the material on the trial courts. In effect, the opinion called for in camera inspection. Hatchard v. Westinghouse Broadcasting Company, 14 Med.L.Rptr. 2000, 532 A.2d 346 (Pa. 1987). In passing, the court also added that reputation constitutes a "fundamental interest protected by the Pennsylvania Constitution. * * *" If reputation is considered a fundamental constitutional right, it would follow that reputation would constitute as compelling an interest as the Sixth Amendment's fair trial guarantee in criminal cases:

> [I]n interpreting the statute in question we must presume that the legislature did not intend to violate the Constitution of the United States or of this Commonwealth. Were we to interpret the Shield Law's protection as broadly as appellees urge, serious questions would arise as to the constitutionality of the statute in light of the protection of fundamental rights provided for in the Pennsylvania Constitution.

How does the Hatchard case analysis compare with that of the New Jersey Supreme Court in Farber? Should the opinion be taken as a sign that the courts will now interpret Pennsylvania's shield law, regarded as one of the strongest in the nation, narrowly to allow disclosures?

A number of courts have addressed the question of whether or not reputation constitutes a fundamental or "compelling" interest for purposes of analyzing a claim of journalist's privilege. Generally, the claim has not fared well, occasionally dismissed by the court almost in passing. McNabb v. Oregonian Publishing Company, 10 Med.L.Rptr. 2181, 685 P.2d 458 (Ore.Ct.App. 1984). The strongest rejection of a claim that reputation itself constitutes a compelling interest for disclosure was offered by the New Jersey Supreme Court. Joseph Maressa, a state senator, sued New Jersey Monthly for libel over an article entitled "Rating the Legislature." Maressa was called one of the worst state senators in New Jersey. He sued and during pretrial sought names and addresses of all sources, copies of all drafts, notes, memos, and writings used by the magazine, plus a summary of what each source told the magazine. Citing New Jersey's shield law, the magazine refused.

51. Alioto v. Cowles Communications, Inc., 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1801, 430 F.Supp. 1363 (N.D.Cal. 1977), aff'd, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1573, 623 F.2d 616 (9th Cir. 1980), cert. den. 449 U.S. 1102 (1981).

Maressa relied on the Farber and Lando cases to obtain disclosure. Rejecting the argument as "simplistic," the court said that Maressa would have to show that refusal to disclose jeopardized a constitutional interest. He claimed to find that interest in the New Jersey Constitution.

MARESSA v. NEW JERSEY MONTHLY

8 MED.L.RPTR. 1473, 445 A.2D 376 (N.J. 1982).

PASHMAN, J.:

* * *

The article discusses several categories of representatives—including "The Best," "The Worst" and "The Drones." Plaintiff, Senator Joseph Maressa, appeared under "The Worst" category. He was described as a "floundering and ineffectual" man whose shortcomings went unnoticed by scores of extremists who, "appealing to Maressa's considerable ego, managed to enlist him as their advocate this term." Describing Maressa as "callous, stupid, and just plain devious," the article's authors listed several incidents upon which they based the senator's low rating. The article claimed that during a Senate debate of the death penalty, Maressa whined and attempted to cut off debate; that he smuggled an anti-gay lobbyist onto the Senate floor and then lied to the sergeant-at-arms that the lobbyist was his aide; that he was called before the Legislative Ethics Committee; and that he was "shot down" by the Supreme Court Advisory Committee. The article concluded, "Maressa's problem is not so much that he is evil as that he is sneaky, self-interested, and basically unprincipled."

Maressa filed a libel action in the Superior Court, Law Division, on December 12, 1979 against the magazine's owner, publisher, editor-in-chief, an editor and the three reporters who wrote the article. He alleged that the article falsely conveyed to the public that he was unfit to serve the people of New Jersey, and that he had participated in dishonest, illegal and unethical practices. Maressa further alleged that defendants had published the defamatory falsehoods without making reasonable inquiries as to their accuracy, thereby defaming him in reckless disregard of the truth.

This interlocutory appeal arose during pretrial discovery proceedings. On February 11, 1980 plaintiff served interrogatories upon defendants, and on April 8, 1980 plaintiff took the depositions of the three reporter defendants. Maressa sought a broad range of information including names and addresses of all sources interviewed, copies of all rough drafts, notes, questions and memos pertaining to the article, and a summary of what each source told the reporters. Defendants refused to provide any information about their sources or editorial processes. They answered each interrogatory with the word "privileged."

Plaintiff sought an order from the Law Division compelling more specific answers to the interrogatories and deposition questions. On June 27, 1980 the trial court ruled that the responses sought by plaintiff were not privileged; alternatively, the court found that any newsperson's privilege had been waived. Maressa then served upon defendants a supplemental set of interrogatories containing the unanswered questions. After defendants again claimed the newsperson's privilege, the trial court on October 15, 1980 directed them to provide more specific answers within 20 days or face judicial sanctions.

The Appellate Division granted defendants leave to appeal the order compelling disclosure. Before that court heard the appeal, we directly certified the matter on our own motion. We now reverse.

* * *

Unlike most other privileges, however, a newsperson's privilege has a constitutional foundation. While narrowly upholding a grand jury's right to subpoena reporters, the United States Supreme Court has unanimously recognized that a reporter's gathering of information receives some First Amendment protection. See Branzburg v. Hayes, [1 Med.L.Rptr. 2617], 408 U.S. 665, 691, (1972).

* * *

Federal constitutional protection of news gathering, however, gives newspersons only a qualified privilege not to reveal sources and other confidential information. In Branzburg v. Hayes, supra, the Court upheld grand jury subpoenas of newspaper reporters in three state courts. And in Herbert v. Lando, [4 Med.L.Rptr. 2575], 441 U.S. 153, 60 L.Ed.2d 115, (1979), the Court held that the First Amendment does not preclude a plaintiff's inquiries into the editorial processes leading to publication of an allegedly defamatory television program.

To buttress the constitutional protection for news gathering, the Legislature has amended the Shield Law, N.J.S.A. 2A:84A-21, twice in recent years. Both enactments were in large part responses to judicial construction limiting the effect of the statute.

* * *

These amendments left no doubt that the Legislature intended to provide comprehensive protection for all aspects of news gathering and dissemination. The Court recognized this intent in In re Farber, holding:

> We read the legislative intent in adopting this statute in its present form as seeking to protect the confidential sources of the press as well as information so obtained by reporters and other news media representatives to the greatest extent permitted by the Constitution of the United States and that of the State of New Jersey. [78 N.J. at 270 (emphasis added).]

Disclosure of confidential information was ordered in Farber only because the newsperson's privilege conflicted with a criminal defendant's constitutional right to compel the attendance of witnesses and production of evidence in his favor.

* * *

Absent any countervailing constitutional right, the newsperson's statutory privilege not to disclose confidential information is absolute.

* * *

However, the existence of a judicial remedy for injury to reputations is entirely a matter of state law. A plaintiff's "interest in reputation is simply one of a number which the State may protect against injury by virtue of its tort law, providing a forum for vindication of those interests by means of damages actions." Paul v. Davis, 424 U.S. 693, 712, 47 L.Ed.2d 405, 420 (1976).

* * *

We respectfully reject Justice Schreiber's argument that the New Jersey Constitution creates a constitutional right to maintain a libel action. Our dissenting colleague relies on Article 1, ¶6 of the Constitution:

> 6. Liberty of speech and of the press; libel; province of jury.
>
> Every person may freely speak, write and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right. No law shall be passed to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech or of the press. In all prosecutions or indictments for libel, the truth may be given in evidence to the jury; and if it shall appear to the jury that the matter charged as libelous is true, and was published with good motives and for justifiable ends, the party shall be acquitted; and the jury shall have the right to determine the law and the fact. [Emphasis added]

Justice Schreiber would find a constitutional right to sue for libel in the underscored subordinate clause.

We disagree that the framers intended that clause to have such wide-ranging effect. The entire thrust of Art. 1, ¶6 is protection of speech. The framers, however, did not want that protection to be absolute. Specifically, they did not view the existence of a libel action as inimical to free speech. They therefore inserted a clause to insure that the broad speech protection they were providing would not be construed to preclude libel suits.

This is all that the clause means. We do not believe it was intended to create a right to sue for damages in libel. Had the framers intended such a right, they surely would have expressed that intent more directly. In form and in context, this clause is no more than a caveat to the New Jersey equivalent to the First Amendment.

It would not be wise to construe our Constitution in a way that etches in stone any particular resolution of the difficult conflict between the right of the media to criticize public figures and the right of public figures to have redress for libel. Our holding, premised on our perception of legislative intent, balances those interests differently than the dissent would balance them. But the balance we adopt can always be changed by the Legislature. If we were to adopt the dissent's view, full protection for sources or editorial processes could only be provided by constitutional amendment.

* * *

In this case, however, we need not evaluate plaintiff's interest in compelling disclosure, other than to affirm that it does not reach constitutional dimensions. The newsperson's privilege contains no limiting language. Compare N.J.S.A. 2A:84A-21 with N.J.S.A. 2A:84A-28(b) (limiting language found in informer's privilege). The Legislature has already balanced the interests and concluded that the newsperson's privilege shall prevail. Since a plaintiff in a defamation action has no overriding constitutional interest at stake, the newsperson's privilege is absolute in libel cases.

* * *

The Shield Law privilege may burden some libel plaintiffs who will not survive a summary judgment motion without discovery. It would be unfortunate if some newspersons fabricated malicious lies and then claimed immunity from liability by claiming that they relied in good faith on a confidential source whose identity they decline to reveal. Contrary to states without a Shield Law, in New Jersey a media defendant's refusal to name its source cannot support an inference that no source existed.

* * *

We recognize that our holding may be unfair to certain defamed individuals who cannot meet the difficult burden of proving reckless falsehood without discovery. But the Legislature has determined that the competing interest in a free press outweighs the possibility of damaged reputations. Since defamation is a common law action without a constitutional foundation, the Legislature has the power to limit that action in favor of the right of freedom of press.

Our Constitution grants the press wide freedom because we believe that the public interest is served by an informed citizenry. Those responsible for informing the public can discharge their function best when they can publish without anyone looking over their shoulders. The media must meet stringent deadlines, and it is inevitable that they will occasionally publish an inaccurate statement. The State House is no place for the meek and thin-skinned. Sometimes published statements will hurt. Sometimes they will turn out to be untrue. Nevertheless, those regrettable consequences must yield to the need for an informed citizenry.

Every libel law and every law affecting libel actions, including the New Jersey Shield Law, must balance important competing interests. We in no way seek to minimize the individual's interest in protection of his or her good name, which "reflects no more than our basic concept of the essential dignity and worth of every human being." Rosenblatt v. Baer, [1 Med.L.Rptr. 1558], 383 U.S. 75, 92, 15 L.Ed.2d 597, 609, (1966) (Stewart, J., concurring). But the Legislature has weighed the competing interests in a free press and the individual interest in reputation. It has chosen to give greater protection to freedom of speech, and our duty is to enforce that choice.

We therefore hold that the Shield Law affords newspersons complete protection against disclosure of their confidential sources and the editorial processes leading to publication of an alleged libel. The order of the Superior Court, Law Division, is reversed, and the matter is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

COMMENT

Justice Schreiber, dissenting, found it incomprehensible that the framers of the state constitution would insert a responsibility clause and mention of libel in the document unless reputation was considered of constitutional magnitude. He noted that similar language appears in many state constitutions. "This terminology acknowledges the press's responsibility for abusing its right to write and publish," he said. "The sense of the words is to protect those who would be defamed by irresponsible utterances."

Despite Hatchard, Pennsylvania journalists are still able to rely upon either the credibility of unnamed sources or the material obtained from those sources in defending against a libel suit under that state's shield law. Noting that the Supreme Court in the Hepps case apparently found application of a shield law in libel cases constitutionally acceptable, the court determined that refusing defendants use of the information amounted to a form of punishment for having relied on the shield law and kept useful information from the jury. Sprague v. Walter, 13 Med.L.Rptr. 1177, 516 A.2d 706 (Pa. 1986).

Other states have adopted rules that limit reliance upon confidential sources or information, while not going so far as to declare reputation a constitutional right. Reasoning that a defendant is unduly advantaged if allowed to rely on sources or evidence that cannot be tested at trial, these courts have said that such benefit is not within the scope of protection of the privilege. Oak Beach Inn v. Babylon Beacon, 10 Med.L.Rptr. 1761, 62 N.Y.2d 158, 476 N.Y.S.2d 269 (N.Y. 1984). One approach is to offer media defendants a choice: they may keep their sources and materials confidential, or they may present as witnesses persons they used as sources and thereby waive the privilege, allowing full examination. Laxalt v. McClatchy, 14 Med.L.Rptr. 1199, 116 F.R.D. 438 (D.Nev. 1987). One court determined that when a reporter took the stand to testify, the testimony effectively waived the privilege protecting notes. Identities of sources remained protected. Sible v. Lee Enterprises, Inc., 13 Med.L.Rptr. 1738 (Mont. 1986).

An illustrative and significant case in this area is Carey v. Hume, 492 F.2d 631 (D.C.Cir. 1974), where a qualified First Amendment-based privilege was recognized in a civil libel suit. On the facts of the case, the qualified privilege was overcome and the journalist, columnist Jack Anderson, was ordered to identify his sources.

In Carey, a union official plaintiff brought an action for libel based on defendant's newspaper column report that the union official had removed documents from the union president's office and then complained to the police that burglars had stolen a box full of items from the office. The court of appeals held that the district court did not abuse its discretion in requiring the journalist who wrote the item to reveal the names of eyewitnesses to the alleged removal. The libel plaintiff in Carey was bound by the standard of liability set forth in New York Times v. Sullivan. Carey gave forceful expression to the conflict between the application of the "actual malice" standard of the Sullivan case and a qualified journalist's privilege based on the First Amendment:

> In the context of an asserted newsman's privilege to protect confidential news sources, the Sullivan rule is a source of tension. On the one hand, the Court's concern that the spectre of potential libel actions might have an inhibiting effect on the exercise of press freedom militates against compulsory disclosure of sources. Contrarily, the heavy burden of proof imposed upon the plaintiff in such a case will often make discovery of confidential sources critical to any hope of carrying that burden.

In an interesting passage, Judge McGowan rejected the idea that, with the advent of the Sullivan doctrine and its imposition of new burdens on some libel plaintiffs, the journalist's First Amendment interest in nondisclosure was the weightier interest in case of conflict:

> In striking the constitutional balance contemplated in Garland [259 F.2d 545 (2d Cir. 1958), cert. den. 358 U.S. 910 (1958)] it could perhaps be argued that, although the Sullivan decision did not eliminate civil libel suits entirely, it has so downgraded their social importance that a plaintiff's interest in pressing such a claim can rarely, if ever, outweigh a newsman's interest in protecting his sources. The tenor of the Court's opinion in Sullivan may be thought to reflect an attitude toward libel actions palpably different from its approach to grand jury proceedings in Branzburg. There is, however, the matter of the Court's continuing post-Sullivan citations of Garland. This strongly suggests the continuing vitality of the latter case, and negates any inference that the Court does not consider the interest of the defamed plaintiff an important one.

The court then explained why it thought that on balance the qualified privilege protecting the journalist had to yield under the facts of Carey:

> Turning to the facts of the case before us, the information sought appears to go to the heart of appellee's libel action, certainly the most important factor in Garland. It would be exceedingly difficult for appellee to introduce evidence beyond his own testimony to prove that he did not at any time of day or night over an indefinite period of several weeks, remove boxfuls of documents from the UMW offices. Even if he did prove that the statements were false, Sullivan also requires a showing of malice or reckless disregard of the truth. That further step might be achieved by proof that appellant in fact had no reliable sources, that he misrepresented the reports of his sources, or that reliance upon those particular sources was reckless.
>
> Knowledge of the identity of the alleged sources would logically be an initial element in the proof of any of such circumstances. Although it might be possible to submit the question of malice to the jury simply on the basis of the conflicting allegations of the parties, that procedure would seem to provide the plaintiff little prospect of success in view of his heavy burden of proof. Consequently, we find that the identity of appellant's sources is critical to appellee's claim.

A case which contrasted sharply with Carey was Caldero v. Tribune Publishing Co., 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1490, 562 P.2d 791 (Idaho 1977), cert. den. 434 U.S. 930 (1977). The Idaho Supreme Court apparently felt that Branzburg precluded recognition of a journalist's privilege, either qualified or absolute, in the libel case at hand or in other contexts.

The Lewiston Morning Tribune ran a story about one of Caldero's experiences while an undercover agent for the Idaho Bureau of Narcotic Enforcement. During an arrest and scuffle, Caldero fired three shots through a car windshield, injuring a companion of the man being arrested. More than a year later the article appeared, questioning the "professional propriety of Caldero's conduct." The story quoted an off-the-record police expert who said Caldero's version of the story "didn't add up." The reporter refused to name his source when asked, was judged in contempt, and ordered to spend thirty days in jail. The order was stayed pending appeal.

The opinion in the Caldero case was remarkably insensitive to the journalist's interest in nondisclosure. It rejected all cases adopting a privilege as unpersuasive, and read Garland v. Torre, a $1 million libel suit brought by Judy Garland against CBS in which a columnist went to jail for refusing to name a source, as rejecting a First Amendment-based privilege when that case represented the start of current interpretations concerning the privilege. Despite the breadth of the Caldero court's rejection of privilege even in civil litigation, the United States Supreme Court refused to review the case. The Idaho court did agree, however, that nondisclosure should be protected if the request was to harass the media or the information sought had an "unnecessary impact" on free expression rights. The court's position is summed up well in the last sentence of its opinion:

> We cannot accept the premise that the public's right to know the truth is somehow enhanced by prohibiting the disclosure of truth in the courts of the public.

Close to the trial date, the widow of the source consented to disclosure. The source was Caldero's boss.

Can anything definitive be said, then, about the status of a journalist's privilege claim in libel litigation? Under most lower court interpretations of Branzburg, state statutes, state constitutions, or state common law, disclosure will be ordered if the libel suit is valid, especially in terms of its falsity, if other possible sources have been exhausted and if the information sought is relevant and critically important to the case. If the trial court is uncertain about those points, it can defer disclosure to conduct further discovery that may lead to summary judgment. It can seal notes and documents and forbid attorneys to discuss evidence with their clients. And it can limit attendance at depositions. Note that the last two options may be incompatible with the presumptions of openness of judicial proceedings and of access to court documents (this text, pp. 443).

It may make a difference that a libel case is brought in federal court on the basis of diversity of citizenship. The federal courts have tended to apply federal rules of evidence—and hence a qualified First Amendment privilege—rather than a state privilege. Although Massachusetts recognized no privilege in any form, and all the reporting activities at issue in a libel suit occurred in that state, federal courts applied the First Amendment privilege. Bruno & Stillman v. Globe Newspaper, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2057, 633 F.2d 583 (1st Cir. 1980). In other words, a libel defendant in federal court may have the protections of the analysis from cases such as Carey and Cervantes, while a libel defendant in state court may not.

On the other hand, many state shield statutes specifically provide an exception to the privilege in libel cases. Recall that Minnesota's shield law, while it may not be typical, has a section that makes the privilege inapplicable in any libel case where information sought would lead to "relevant evidence" about actual malice.

There may come a time when a reporter's string runs out. That person may then have to comply with a court order or face a contempt citation. Or, the reporter may be assumed to have had no source. Or, the reporter will be barred from using at trial any evidence based on anonymous sources or confidential information. The consequences then may be to lose the suit almost by default. It is little wonder the press has become cautious when promising anonymity.

JOURNALIST'S PRIVILEGE IN THE CIVIL CONTEXT

Privilege claims in civil cases where journalists are third parties are much easier to sustain. There is less of a compelling need at stake in civil suits because the rights asserted by parties are unlikely to be of constitutional or equivalent magnitude. In addition, a greater array of alternative sources is typically available in civil cases.

One of the earliest and most influential post-Branzburg cases recognizing a qualified First Amendment privilege was Baker v. F & F Invest- ment, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 2551, 470 F.2d 778 (2d Cir. 1972), cert. den. 411 U.S. 966 (1973). A number of potential black home buyers brought a class action suit alleging racially discriminatory housing practices by the defendant. The plaintiffs sought the names of sources used in a 1962 Saturday Evening Post article, "Confessions of a Block-Buster," from the article's author, Alfred Balk, who by the time of trial was an editor of the Columbia Journalism Review. The federal district court refused to order disclosure, relying both upon First Amendment analysis and on the Illinois and New York shield laws.

The Second Circuit squarely adopted a First Amendment-based privilege. The court agreed that the plaintiffs had failed to prove that all sources had been exhausted or that disclosure was critical to protection of the public interest at issue in the case. Judge Kaufman emphasized that the nature of the claim was important in determining the scope of privilege. He distinguished Branzburg, noting, "No such criminal overtones color the facts in this civil case." Referring to Branzburg, he added:

> If, as Mr. Justice Powell noted in that case, instances will arise in which First Amendment values outweigh the duty of a journalist to testify even in the context of a criminal investigation, surely in civil cases, courts must recognize that the public interest in non-disclosure of journalists' confidential news sources will often be weightier than the private interest in compelled disclosure. [Emphasis added.]

Another case where a qualified First Amendment-based privilege was recognized was Democratic National Committee v. McCord, 356 F.Supp. 1394 (D.D.C. 1973). On motions to quash the subpoenas by news organizations, Federal District Judge Charles Richey granted their request and refused to enforce the subpoenas. Even though the issue was raised after the Supreme Court decision in Branzburg had declined to create a journalist's privilege in grand jury proceedings based on the First Amendment, Judge Richey held that in these circumstances the news people concerned were entitled to a qualified privilege under the First Amendment. The federal district court, reflecting Justice Stewart's dissent in Branzburg, stated that absent a showing that alternative sources of evidence had been exhausted and absent a showing of the materiality of the documents sought, an order quashing the subpoenas was warranted.

McCord involved subpoenas arising out of civil litigation. In what might be called a "fishing expedition," the Committee for the Re-election of the President (Nixon) seemed to be looking for anything that might help them in a number of civil suits against the opposition party.

Recognizing the reluctance of other courts in civil and criminal cases, including the Supreme Court, to recognize even a qualified journalist's privilege, Judge Richey distinguished the present case as being not a criminal case but an action for monetary damages. Moreover the media were not parties but were simply being used to produce documents. More important, the parties on whose behalf the subpoenas had been issued had not demonstrated that the testimony represented by the documents would go to the "heart of their claim." Note the recurrence of this concept.

"Without information concerning the workings of the [g]overnment," said the Judge, "the public's confidence in its integrity will inevitably suffer. This is especially true where, as here, strong allegations have been made of corruption within the highest circles of government and in a campaign for the presidency itself. This court cannot blind itself to the possible 'chilling effect' the enforcement of the subpoenas would have on the flow of information to the press and, thus, to the public. This court stands convinced that if it allows the discouragement of investigative reporting into the highest levels of government, no amount of legal theorizing could allay the public's suspicions. * * *"

Richey appeared to be following the recommendation in Justice Powell's concurring opinion in Branzburg that a journalist's claim of privilege should be judged "on its facts by the striking of the proper balance between freedom of the press and the obligation of all citizens to give relevant testimony."

Federal courts have followed Baker and McCord almost religiously. But recent cases indicate that, while the privilege itself is nearly universally recognized, qualification to assert the privilege is still an issue. A fired schoolteacher filed a civil suit against former colleagues alleging that they conspired to stigmatize him and get him dismissed. The plaintiff sought identities of sources, background materials, and details of the editorial process from both newspaper and television reporters. The court indicated that the first order of inquiry was for reporters to show that the privilege applies. That proof requires a "prima facie showing that responding to particular questions or producing particular documents will impinge on First Amendment interests." While the court labeled this burden "minimal," only after it is made by the journalist will the burden of proving the three-part test be shifted to a party seeking disclosure. Bauer v. Brown, 11 Med.L.Rptr. 2168 (W.D.Va. 1985). What factors should a court use when deciding if First Amendment interests are being impinged?

An alarming recent case is von Bulow v. von Bulow, 13 Med.L.Rptr. 2041, 811 F.2d 136 (2d Cir. 1987), cert. den. 107 S.Ct. 1891 (1987). Determining that the qualified privilege provided by the First Amendment and the protections of the New York shield law were congruent, the court said that a reporter was required to prove an intent to use the undisclosed material sought for dissemination to the public and must show that the intent existed at the start of the newsgathering process.

The case was the civil law aftermath of the well-known von Bulow trial, in which Claus von Bulow had been charged with attempting to kill his wife with drugs. He was acquitted, and Martha von Bulow's two children from a previous marriage brought a civil action. Andrea Reynolds, an "intimate friend of [Claus] von Bulow," had commissioned researchers to prepare reports on the case and testified that she planned to write a book on it. When asked to produce some of the documents, Reynolds asserted a claim of privilege. The court said that she did not fit within the class intended to be protected:

> As stated above, the burden was on Reynolds to establish that she had those characteristics which we have delineated as the essential attributes of a journalist. She failed to sustain her burden. * * * At oral argument before us Reynolds' counsel conceded that, when Reynolds commissioned the reports, "her primary concern was vindicating Claus von Bulow." There is no dispute * * * that * * * "Reynolds did not intend to use the reports to disseminate information to the public."

The court's concern appears to have been that a person involved in the case was using journalist's privilege to prevent personal disclosures, not to protect newsgathering. But in the process of ordering discovery, the court applied two qualifications not previously addressed as part of qualified First Amendment analysis. First, anyone claiming journalist's privilege must qualify as a journalist. Second, the person claiming the privilege must prove an intent to serve the public by disseminating news. Both requirements may be found in a number of state statutes and are also found in the case law of New York courts interpreting that state's shield law.

The von Bulow court's passing assurance that even "one who is a novice in the field" may meet the burden should be little comfort to journalists who are naturally uneasy over the prospect that government, even in the form of judges, will be placed in the position of deciding who is a journalist or which journalists are "fit" to be covered by the privilege. Was there some way for the court to order disclosure without limiting journalist's privilege?

Other seemingly lesser suits have been lost. While a federal district court in Texas recognized a qualified privilege in a civil action brought by a suspended employee against the Dallas school district, it held a reporter in contempt for refusing to testify in camera. The plaintiff argued that the school district had released information to the reporter which led to his suspension after the resulting story was published. The court accepted the plaintiff's assertions that his case affected constitutional interests:

> That claim includes assertion of a denial of constitutionally ordered due process in connection with Dr. Trautman's suspension from duty. * * * It bears repeating that we are here engaged in a sensitive and important balancing exercise of competing needs and interests rooted in constitutional values.

The plaintiff's claim was based on a denial of due process and liberty under the Fourteenth Amendment and also upon a federal civil rights provision, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1983. Trautman v. Dallas School District, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1088 (N.D.Tex. 1982).

More typically, disclosure attempts in civil cases fail. Chilling effect "is a paramount consideration," said a federal district court in New York. A drug company sought the identity of a source that had been consulted for evaluation of a drug in a medical newsletter article but had not met the three-part test.[52] United States Steel, however, was successful in getting outtakes from ABC on its coverage of an underground coal mine fire since there were no confidential sources and ABC had already shown outtakes to one of its outside consultants.[53]

THE STANFORD DAILY OR "INNOCENT" SEARCH CASE

One response to odds favoring journalists was a circumvention of the subpoena process altogether and the use of search warrants to permit the ransacking of an "innocent" third-party newspaper. Although there were fewer than thirty of these in ten states between the famous Standard Daily case in 1978 and ameliorating intervention by federal legislation in 1981, they did represent one of the most serious ruptures ever in press-bench relationships.

Student reporters for The Stanford Daily at Stanford University had covered a student demonstration at a hospital which had resulted in violence and injuries to police officers. The newspaper published articles and photographs about the demonstration. A municipal court judge at the request of the police issued a warrant authorizing a search of The Stanford Daily. He found probable cause to believe that photographs and negatives would be found on the newspaper premises which would help to identify the demonstrators who had assaulted the police officers. The warrant was issued even though the newspaper's personnel were not suspected of having committed a crime or of having participated in any unlawful acts.

The students brought an action in federal district court against the municipal judge and the law enforcement officers on the ground that their rights under the First and Fourth Amendments had been violated. The federal district court agreed with the students and rendered a declaratory judgment. Where the subject of the search is innocent of wrongdoing and First Amendment considerations are present, the court ruled a search warrant could be issued "only in the rare circumstances where there is a clear showing that (1) important materials will be destroyed or removed from the jurisdiction; and (2) a restraining order would be futile." The United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed. But the Supreme Court resolution of the issue left the press angry and disturbed. The Court upheld the search of a newspaper's premises even though no one on the paper's staff was suspected of any crime.

The lineup of the justices was similar to those in Branzburg and Lando. Justice White wrote the opinion for the Court in a 5–3 decision. Powell wrote an enigmatic concurring opinion. Stewart led three dissenters. White subjected the newsroom to the search warrant mandates of the Fourth Amendment with the same egalitarian approach used to apply the fair trial requirements of the Sixth Amendment in Branzburg. Powell steered a middle course. And Stewart urged that newsroom searches should be allowed only if something greater than probable cause was proved.

ZURCHER v. THE STANFORD DAILY

3 MED.L.RPTR. 2377, 463 U.S. 547, 98 S.CT. 1970, 56 L.ED.2D 525 (1978).

Justice WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * *

But presumptively protected materials are not necessarily immune from seizure under warrant for use at a criminal trial. Not every such seizure, and not even most, will impose a prior restraint. And surely a warrant to search newspaper premises for criminal evidence such as the one issued here for news photographs taken in a public place carries no realistic threat of prior restraint or of any direct restraint whatsoever on the publication of the Daily or on its communication of ideas. The hazards of such warrants can be avoided by a neutral magistrate carrying out his responsibilities under the Fourth Amendment, for he has ample tools at his disposal to confine warrants to search within reasonable limits.

* * *

We accordingly reject the reasons given by the District Court and adopted by the Court of Appeals for holding the search for photographs at The Stanford Daily to have been unreasonable within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment and in violation of the First Amendment. Nor has anything else presented here persuaded us that the Amendments forbade this search. It follows that the judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed.

So ordered.

Justice Brennan took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

Justice POWELL, concurring.

* * *

While there is no justification for the establishment of a separate Fourth Amendment procedure for the press, a magistrate asked to issue a warrant for the search of press offices can and should take cognizance of the independent values protected by the First Amendment—such as those highlighted by Justice Stewart—when he weighs such factors. If the reasonableness and particularity requirements are thus applied, the dangers are likely to be minimal.

In any event, considerations such as these are the province of the Fourth Amendment. There is no authority either in history or in the Constitution itself for exempting certain classes of persons or entities from its reach.

COMMENT

Press commentary on the case was bitter, as it would be later in Herbert v. Lando. How would the ruling have affected Watergate and the Pentagon Papers case had it been in place then? Suddenly, subpoenas didn't look so bad; at least you could see them coming.

Following Stanford Daily, a printer's office was searched in Flint, Michigan, a television newsroom in Boise, Idaho, the Associated Press in Butte, Montana, the home of an editor in Albany, Georgia. On October 13, 1980, Congress passed the Privacy Protection Act (18 U.S.C.A. § 793 ff). While media organizations had lobbied Congress to prevent surprise invasions of the newsroom, they had asked for a ban on searches of the premises of all innocent third parties. What they got was legislation specific to them. Many journalists are uncomfortable with these kinds of laws since they permit lawmakers to intrude themselves into the realm of the First Amendment.

Nevertheless the law, which went into effect for federal searches on January 1, 1981 and for state searches on October 14, 1981, made it unlawful for law enforcement officers to search for or seize raw materials (photos, audio and videotapes, interview notes) or work products (drafts of articles and notes) possessed by anyone engaged in the dissemination of news or information to the public through newspapers, books, or electronic broadcasts unless there was probable cause to believe that the person with the material was committing a crime.

Exceptions were threats to national defense, the theft of classified or restricted information, and seizures that would be necessary to prevent death or serious injury. Searches would also be permitted if there was reason to believe that a subpoena would lead to the destruction of material that would serve the needs of justice. Police are expected to request voluntary cooperation from news organizations and scholars or, if that fails, to seek a subpoena before going after a search warrant.[54]

State laws incorporating some or all of these provisions in ways having both more and less impact than the parent federal law have been passed in California, Connecticut, Illinois, Nebraska, New Jersey, Oregon, Texas, Washington, and Wisconsin.

POSTSCRIPT

Journalist's privilege continues to provoke much debate among news people. Many prefer a First Amendment approach to legislative enactments, even when the legislature acts with the best intentions, because what is enacted may later be repealed or amended. Others have argued vigorously for no special privileges at all. Still others have supported enactment of a federal shield law which, despite repeated attempts, has never come close to passing.

The Branzburg case was greeted with dismay by journalists. Yet, after almost two decades, it is clear that Branzburg laid the foundation for privileges in the majority of state and federal courts. While Stewart's three-part test has been most influential, White's invitation to experimentation has also led to adoption of privileges in many instances. More than two-thirds of the states have a legislative or judicially created privilege. And a qualified First Amendment privilege has been adopted in each federal circuit court of appeal that has considered the issue.

For reporters, the spread of journalist's privilege is a mixed blessing, however. Whether a pledge of confidentiality will be upheld in court depends upon whether state or federal privilege applies. And, when a journalist reports on matters from other states in a story, the question of what rule applies is even harder to answer. Reporters who assume that their promises of confidentiality are protected by the First Amendment or by statute are taking a great risk. Unfortunately, many reporters assume protection exists and may have been so taught in journalism schools.[55] On the other hand, some have learned that "no protection of confidential sources in federal courts" exists.[56]

Journalists consider honoring pledges of confidentiality a matter of professional obligation and as necessary for effective news gathering. Many reporters remain prepared to go to jail to protect confidential sources. The news media, however, reacting to both the threat of forced disclosure and to a perceived loss of credibility with the public, have reduced their reliance on anonymous sources, believed to have accounted at its peak for 30 to 50 percent of newsgathering.[57]

However the privilege is applied, it appears to protect the communicator, not the source. Only the reporter may waive the privilege. Minnesota's Cohen case alone suggests otherwise. Generally, a broken promise by a reporter raises an ethical question but provides no legal cause of action.

Casual assurances of confidentiality may be dangerous for a reporter. A court might wish to know how confidentiality was established with a source. An unambiguous method of establishing confidentiality is needed before facing the prospect of testifying in court. Under some state shield laws, employers are not protected, making evidence of the reporter-source relationship more important. The Associated Press was required to produce a tape recording of a reporter's conversation with a suspected kidnapper because Montana law only covered the reporter. In re Investigative File, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 1865 (Mont.Dist.Ct. 1978).

As has been noted, there are many tactics reporters may adopt to deflect subpoenas. As the three-part test continues to permeate the judicial system, the privilege will gain even wider recognition and clearer application. But idiosyncratic state laws and state court interpretations have slowed the spread of Stewart's approach and delayed the day when journalists might know how the privilege works regardless of jurisdiction.

Access to the Judicial Process: Free Press and Fair Trial

THE PARAMETERS OF THE CONFLICT

The number of cases in which news organizations have challenged limitations on their ability to report on legal proceedings has increased dramatically in recent years.[1] But the tensions between journalism and the judiciary that prompt increased litigation are almost as old as the republic itself.

The freedom of the press guaranteed by the First Amendment and the right of a criminal defendant to a fair trial guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment do not always coexist easily. Often judges and lawyers, whose first obligation is to protect a defendant's rights and assure fairness in the judicial process, fear that extensive news coverage will affect the outcome of a trial. Whether the coverage is designated as pretrial publicity or occurs during or after trial, the concern is the same—that the press, performing its usual task of chronicling events, will alter the resolution of those events.

Fair trial fears center on the jury. The Sixth Amendment requires that a criminal defendant have an "impartial jury" drawn from the geographic area in which the crime was allegedly committed. Generations of judges and lawyers have reasoned that heavy local news coverage of a crime and resulting trial will be noticed by potential jurors; it further stands to reason that some of those potential jurors—called veniremen—may be swayed by the news coverage.[2] To the extent publicity renders finding impartial jurors more difficult, so too does the job of assuring a fair trial become more difficult.

An impartial jury is one capable of rendering a verdict based upon the evidence presented in the case. It is not essential that jurors be totally ignorant of the case, however.[3] The key question in free press-fair trial disputes, then, is the point at which publicity creates prejudgment in such a large number of potential jurors that impaneling an impartial jury becomes impossible as a practical matter.

Other influences may also affect the fairness of a trial. Judges and attorneys might be swayed by news coverage, for example, thereby affecting the outcome of the trial in a material way. And, sometimes, parties in the dispute seek contact with the press outside the courtroom, apparently hoping to affect public opinion if not the outcome of the trial.

Written more than 100 years ago, Mark Twain's seriocomic analysis of the law's search for an impartial jury in Roughing It still outlines the problem well:

"I remember one of those sorrowful farces, in Virginia," Twain recounts, "which we call a jury trial. A noted desperado killed Mr. B., a good citizen, in the most wanton and coldblooded way. Of course the papers were full of it, and all men capable of reading read about it. And of course all men not deaf and dumb and idiotic talked about it. A jury list was made out, and Mr. B.L., a prominent banker and a valued citizen, was questioned precisely as he would have been questioned in any court in America:

'Have you heard of this homicide?'

'Yes.'

'Have you held conversations upon the subject?'

'Yes.'

'Have you formed or expressed opinions about it?'

'Yes.'

'Have you read the newspaper accounts of it?'

'Yes.'

'We do not want you.'

"A minister, intelligent, esteemed, and greatly respected; a merchant of high character and known probity; a mining superintendent of intelligence and unblemished reputation; a quartz-mill owner of excellent standing, were all questioned in the same way, and all set aside. Each said the public talk and the newspaper reports had not so biased his mind but that sworn testimony would overthrow his previously formed opinions and enable him to render a verdict without prejudice and in accordance with the facts. But of course such men could not be trusted with the case. Ignoramuses alone could mete out unsullied justice.

"When the peremptory challenges were all exhausted, a jury of twelve men was impaneled—a jury who swore they had neither heard, read, talked about, nor expressed an opinion concerning a murder which the very cattle in the corrals, the Indians in the sage-brush, and the stones in the streets were cognizant of! It was a jury composed of two desperadoes, two low beer-house politicians, three barkeepers, two ranchmen who could not read, and three dull, stupid, human donkeys! It actually came out afterward, that one of these latter thought that incest and arson were the same thing.

"The verdict rendered by this jury was, Not Guilty. What else could one expect?

"The jury system puts a ban upon intelligence and honesty, and a premium upon ignorance, stupidity, and perjury. It is a shame that we must continue to use a worthless system because it was good a thousand years ago. In this age, when a gentleman of high social standing, intelligence, and probity, swears that testimony given under solemn oath will outweigh, with him, street talk and newspaper reports based upon mere hearsay, he is worth a hundred jurymen who will swear to their own ignorance and stupidity, and justice would be far safer in his hands than in theirs."

Twain highlights an incongruity of the process. The best potential jurors in terms of ability to judge are also often those most likely to stay informed about the news.

When a potential juror is excused due to bias, the basis for the action is a challenge for cause. Any juror who shows bias toward a party in a case is generally subject to challenge for cause. Attorneys for the parties also are given a number of "peremptory" challenges, challenges which can be made for any or no reason, including uneasiness about a juror's appearance or mannerisms.[4] The proceeding at which jurors are questioned and impaneled is the voir dire.

While nothing is more basic to the participants in a criminal proceeding than meeting the fair trial demands of the Sixth Amendment, reporting on crime and criminal trials is also one of the most basic functions of American journalism. No category of news gets as much local coverage as does crime and criminal trials.[5] Since James Gordon Bennett and other penny press editors first emphasized crime news more than 150 years ago, crime news

In criminal cases, peremptory challenges may number fifteen to twenty. Federal court judges rather than attorneys control the examination of a prospective juror. Impaneling is faster, but the procedure is often less thorough than its counterpart in the state courts. Defense attorneys in criminal cases are especially critical of the federal procedure, believing lawyers are better equipped to elicit answers that accurately reflect a potential juror's opinion. See Garry and Riordan, Gag Orders: Cui Bono?, 29 Stan.L.Rev. 575, at 583 (1977).

5. Denniston, The Reporter and the Law (1980), 3–11. According to one recent study, law enforcement stories and criminal legal proceedings stories in twenty-one major metropolitan daily newspapers are clearly the most dominant type of local news coverage in terms of total stories published, with almost a third more stories than the next largest category, stories about local government. Simon, Fico and Lacy, Covering Conflict and Controversy: Measuring Balance, Fairness and Defamation in Local News Stories, 66 Journalism Quarterly ____ (1989).

has caused controversy. Occasional incidents throughout history of news coverage affecting legal proceedings are well known and easy to establish.[6] More often, crime coverage is excoriated as having more generalized negative effects on readers or upon society in general.[7]

Civil disputes traditionally have received less news coverage than criminal proceedings. Nonetheless, reporting on civil cases has increased in recent years, coinciding with the rise in numbers of civil cases filed. Civil disputes involving well-known people or featuring unique issues have attracted reporters' attention and have also been the focus of attempts to restrict press coverage of and access to the judicial process.

Lyle Denniston argues that the legal community's discomfort with journalism is in part a result of basic differences in the operating methods of the legal profession and of journalism:

> The journalist will not (often he cannot) take the time the lawyer must to know his subject before he acts. The lawyer will not risk the journalist's daring in drawing quick conclusions.
>
> The journalist tells his story by moving from most significant to least. The lawyer often builds his case the other way around.
>
> The journalist hopes for immediate impact with his audiences—and usually can expect it. The lawyer works toward a contemplative judgment from the courts. . . .
>
> The journalist pursues the novel. The lawyer searches for the familiar.
>
> The journalist is fascinated by the illogical. The lawyer reduces events and emotions to logic.[8]

The standards of news judgment used by most journalists, then, call for the "juiciest"—and therefore most likely prejudicial—facts about a case to be featured most prominently, precisely because they have impact, are novel, have importance and, in criminal cases where an offense by definition violates society's standards, are often illogical. It is little wonder that criticism of criminal trial coverage often accuses the press of "trial by newspaper."

Judge Charles Clark, writing for the Second Circuit in 1951,[9] clearly saw press coverage as a mixed, but unavoidable, blessing when he said:

> Trial by newspaper may be unfortunate, but it is not new and, unless the court accepts the standard judicial hypothesis that cautioning instructions are effective, criminal trials in the metropolitan centers may well prove impossible.

During trial, a copy of the New York Times, containing an inaccurate report, had found its way into the jury room. The trial judge reasoned that, since he had given explicit instructions to the jury to disregard the newspaper and had pointed out how the offenses set forth in the indictment differed from those described in the article, there was no error in allowing the trial to proceed.

In a bristling dissent in the same case, Judge Jerome Frank did invoke Mark Twain. "My colleagues admit that 'trial by newspaper' is unfortunate," he declared. "But they dismiss it as an unavoidable curse of metropolitan living (like, I suppose, crowded subways). They rely on the old 'ritualistic admonition' to purge the record. The futility of that sort of exorcism is notorious. As I have elsewhere observed, it is like the Mark Twain story of the little boy who was told to stand in a corner and not to think of a white elephant."

Most judges and lawyers over time have probably agreed with Justice Robert Jackson's position in an earlier case. "The naive assumption that prejudicial effects can be overcome by instructions to the jury, all practicing lawyers know to be unmitigated fiction."[10]

Unwilling to rely on this kind of speculation, social scientists for the last forty years have attempted to measure by survey and experiment the real effects of trial and pretrial publication on jury verdicts. Their findings, while informative and useful, have been equivocal and contradictory on the question of whether publicity causes jury bias.[11] Their studies have been faulted for failing to replicate the actual world of the juror. A hesitant conclusion that may be drawn is that juries or prospective jurors are prejudiced when news of a defendant's confession or past criminal record comes to their attention. Even then, there is less than perfect agreement.

Whatever their value in aiding comprehension of juror behavior, social science findings may be beside the point anyway. Relying on their own impressions of psychological effects, courts will reverse convictions or declare mistrials where press coverage appears to be part of a pattern of community prejudice.

Early Supreme Court cases on jury impartiality stretch back more than 130 years. Their compound holding appeared to be that even preconceived notions of guilt or innocence were not enough to overturn a conviction if the juror swore ability to decide a case based solely on the evidence. Subtle doubts about press influence on jury verdicts were expressed. The burden of proof, as it is today, was clearly on the defendant to demonstrate unfairness.[12]

Not until 1961 did the United States Supreme Court reverse a state criminal conviction solely on the grounds that prejudicial pretrial publicity had made a fair trial before an impartial jury impossible.

On April 8, 1955, Leslie Irvin, a parolee, was arrested by Indiana state police on suspicion of burglary and bad check writing. A few days later Evansville, Indiana police and the county prosecutor issued press releases proclaiming that their burglary suspect, "Mad Dog" Irvin, had confessed to six murders, including the killing of three members of a single family. Irvin went to trial in November, was found guilty, and sentenced to death.

Bothersome was the fact that of 430 prospective jurors questioned by the court before trial, 370 said they believed Irvin guilty. Defense counsel was never satisfied with the level of impartiality of the twelve jurors finally accepted by the court. Theoretically the jury selection process is designed to identify bias-free persons. In fact the selection proceeds on radically different grounds, each attorney scrupulously dedicated to finding jurors whose biases will favor his client's cause.[13]

One research report estimated that 60 percent of lawyers' voir dire time was spent indoctrinating jurors and only 40 percent differentiating partial from impartial jurors.[14] Social scientists have begun to play a greater role in trial strategy. In one case, a sociologist conducted a telephone survey to support a change of venue, and psychologists helped select the jurors for the trial.[15] A University of Puerto Rico professor found that 59 percent of potential jurors were highly prejudiced against defendants who were accused of terrorist acts; the court thought it reasonable to draw jurors from the remaining 41 percent.[16] The Puerto Rico court's reasoning tracks that of the Second Circuit in one of the ABSCAM prosecutions in 1980. Philadelphia Congressman Michael Myers was accused of taking bribes from undercover agents posing as Arab businessmen. The transactions were videotaped. When the major television networks sought to copy the tapes, which had been introduced into evidence, Myers objected that broadcast of the tapes would prejudice his fair trial rights. The court responded:

> Defendants, as well as the news media, frequently overestimate the extent of the public's awareness of news. In this very case, despite the extensive publicity about Abscam * * * about half of those summoned for jury selection had no knowledge of Abscam, and only a handful had more than cursory knowledge.[17]

Leslie Irvin didn't have the benefit of sophisticated social science techniques. Nevertheless, after six years of legal maneuvering—and a successful prison break—his case reached the United States Supreme Court for a second time. In a unanimous decision the Court, considering Irvin's constitutional claims in terms of prejudicial news reporting, concluded that he had not been accorded a fair trial before an impartial jury. Moreover he should have been granted a second change of venue, said the Justices, in spite of an Indiana law allowing only a single change in the place of the trial; and it was the duty of the court of appeals to evaluate independently the voir dire testimony of the jurors.

IRVIN v. DOWD*

1 MED.L.RPTR. 1178, 366 U.S. 717, 81 S.CT. 1639, 6 L.ED.2D 751 (1961).

Justice CLARK delivered the opinion of the Court:

* * *

It is not required that jurors be totally ignorant of the facts and issues involved, * * * and scarcely any of those best qualified to serve will not have formed some impression or opinion as to the merits of the case. * * * It is sufficient if the juror can lay aside his impression or opinion and render a verdict based on the evidence presented in court.

* * *

Here the build-up of prejudice is clear and convincing. An examination of the then current community pattern of thought as indicated by the popular news media is singularly revealing. For example, petitioner's first motion for a change of venue from Gibson County alleged that the awaited trial of petitioner had become the cause célèbre of this small community—so much so that curbstone opinions, not only as to petitioner's guilt but even as to what punishment he should receive, were solicited and recorded on the public streets by a roving reporter, and later were broadcast over the local stations. A reading of the 46 exhibits which petitioner attached to his motion indicates that a barrage of newspaper headlines, articles, cartoons and pictures was unleashed against him during the six or seven months preceding his trial. The motion further alleged that the newspapers in which the stories appeared were delivered regularly to approximately 95% of the dwellings in Gibson County and that, in addition, the Evansville radio and TV stations, which likewise blanketed that county, also carried extensive newscasts covering the same incidents. These stories revealed the details of his background, including a reference to crimes committed when a juvenile, his convictions for arson almost 20 years previously, for burglary and by a court-martial on AWOL charges during the war. He was accused of being a parole violator. The headlines announced his police lineup identification, that he faced a lie detector test, had been placed at the scene of the crime and that the six murders were solved but petitioner refused to confess. Finally, they announced his confession to the six murders and the fact of his indictment for four of them in Indiana. They reported petitioner's offer to plead guilty if promised a 99-year sentence, but also the determination, on the other hand, of the prosecutor to secure the death penalty, and that petitioner had confessed to 24 burglaries. * * * On the day before the trial the newspapers carried the story that Irvin had orally admitted the murder of Kerr (the victim in this case) as well as "the robbery-murder of Mrs. Mary Holland; the murder of Mrs. Wilhelmina Sailer in Posey County, and the slaughter of three members of the Duncan family in Henderson County, Ky."

It cannot be gainsaid that the force of this continued adverse publicity caused a sustained excitement and fostered a strong prejudice among the people of Gibson County. In fact, on the second day devoted to the selection of the jury, the newspapers reported that "strong feelings, often bitter and angry, rumbled to the surface," and that "the extent to which the multiple murders—three in one family—have aroused feelings throughout the area was emphasized Friday when 27 of the 35 prospective

*Although Irvin was the first reversal of a state court conviction, two years earlier in Marshall v. United States, 360 U.S. 310 (1959), the Court for the first time reversed a conviction in a federal court solely on grounds of prejudicial pretrial publicity. Jurors were exposed to newspapers containing defendant's criminal record.

jurors questioned were excused for holding biased pretrial opinions. * * *"

Finally, and with remarkable understatement, the headlines reported that "impartial jurors are hard to find." * * * An examination of the 2,783-page voir dire record shows that 370 prospective jurors or almost 90% of those examined on the point (10 members of the panel were never asked whether or not they had any opinion) entertained some opinion as to guilt—ranging in intensity from mere suspicion to absolute certainty. * * *

Here the "pattern of deep and bitter prejudice" shown to be present throughout the community, was clearly reflected in the sum total of the voir dire examination of a majority of the jurors finally placed in the jury box. [Emphasis added.] Eight out of the 12 thought petitioner was guilty. With such an opinion permeating their minds, it would be difficult to say that each could exclude this preconception of guilt from his deliberations. The influence that lurks in an opinion once formed is so persistent that it unconsciously fights detachment from the mental processes of the average man. * * * Where one's life is at stake—and accounting for the frailties of human nature—we can only say that in the light of the circumstances here the finding of impartiality does not meet constitutional standards. * * * As one of the jurors put it, "You can't forget what you hear and see." With his life at stake, it is not requiring too much that petitioner be tried in an atmosphere undisturbed by so huge a wave of public passion and by a jury other than one in which two-thirds of the members admit, before hearing any testimony, to possessing a belief in his guilt.

COMMENT

Irvin's case was remanded to the district court. He was retried in a less emotional atmosphere, found guilty, and sentenced to life imprisonment, a sentence for which, he confided to his attorney, he was grateful.

Justice Felix Frankfurter, long an advocate of curbing pretrial press reports, concurred in Irvin, noting that "such extraneous influences, in violation of the decencies guaranteed by our Constitution, are sometimes so powerful that an accused is forced, as a practical matter, to forego trial by jury." In the same opinion, Frankfurter noted that a per curiam reversal of a federal court conviction a week earlier had turned on a single article in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.[18] "The Court has not yet decided," Frankfurter warned the press, "that, while convictions must be reversed and miscarriages of justice result because the minds of jurors or potential jurors were poisoned, the poisoner is constitutionally protected in plying his trade."

Despite Frankfurter's comments, Irvin and the Sheppard case that follows are perhaps best seen as especially extreme departures from the normal role of journalism in the judicial process. The intensity and extent of coverage, along with the apparent intent of the press to affect the outcome, surely sets these cases apart.

Frankfurter's comments are reflective of the times. The press had not reached rapprochement with the judiciary after more than a century of crime reporting remembered best as sensational rather than serious. Despite the occasional case that receives saturation coverage reminiscent of past times,[19] modern practitioners or students of either journalism or law must rely on historical accounts for the full flavor of crime reporting at its most uninhibited.

THE TRADITION OF CRIME REPORTING

Although the fourth chief justice of the United States, John Marshall, took note in 1807 of extralegal newspaper comment in a reference to the Alexandria, Virginia Expositor's coverage of the treason trial of Aaron Burr, crime reporting probably came into its own when London's Bow Street police reporters discovered that crime news, when presented sensationally, had mass appeal.

Florida*, 341 U.S. 50 (1951), where Justice Jackson for the Court concluded that the press, in the trial of three black defendants, had dictated the verdict through inflammatory news reports including the report of a confession. But in Murphy v. Florida, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1252, 421 U.S. 794 (1975), the Court concluded that press reports had not caused bias to permeate the community. Murphy can be read to reject the idea that bias should be implied from the very fact of publicity which, arguably, Irvin and later Estes may suggest. Or can Murphy be distinguished from Irvin on the ground that the voir dire in Irvin disclosed prejudice while in Murphy it did not?

Benjamin Day's New York Sun, the first successful penny press, specialized in news of crime and violence. Day hired George Wisner, a Bow Street veteran, to cover the courts, and within a year Wisner was co-owner of the paper.[20] Charles Dickens was a Bow Street reporter par excellence, and in 1846 his own paper, the Daily News, carried a series of articles by Dickens on the brutalizing effects of the death penalty.

Crime news contributed to the success of Pulitzer's World; and James Gordon Bennett's Herald had no equal in sensational, aggressive, and even fictional crime coverage. William Randolph Hearst's Journal led America's "yellow" tabloids into the Jazz Age of journalism.

In 1907, Irwin S. Cobb wrote 600,000 words on the dramatic Harry K. Thaw murder trial for the World. Twelve years later the renowned stylist William Bolitho shocked the nation with his accounts in the World of the Paris trial of Henri Landru, better known as Bluebeard.

Ben Hecht and the Daily News were just right for Chicago in the roaring 20s. Bernarr Macfadden's Graphic, nicknamed the "pornographic," promoted the execution of Ruth Snyder in its inimitable style:

> Don't fail to read tomorrow's Graphic. An installment that thrills and stuns. A story that fairly pierces the heart and reveals Ruth Snyder's last thoughts on earth; that pulses the blood as it discloses her final letters. Think of it! A woman's final thoughts just before she is clutched in the deadly snare that sears and burns and FRIES AND KILLS! Her very last words! Exclusively in tomorrow's Graphic.[21]

Journalistic history was made when a New York Daily News photographer strapped a tiny camera to his leg, smuggled it into Sing Sing's execution chamber, and took a picture of Snyder straining at the thongs of the electric chair moments after the current had been turned on. The picture was a front-page sensation. It sold 250,000 extra copies of the paper.

No wonder Damon Runyon compared the big murder trial with a sporting event. "The trial," he wrote, "is a sort of game, the players on the one side the attorneys for the defense, and on the other side the attorneys for the State. The defendant figures in it merely as the prize."[22]

With the Lindbergh kidnaping trial, American crime reporting perhaps reached its zenith. As many as 800 newspersons and photographers joined by the great figures of stage and screen, United States senators, crooners, social celebrities, and 20,000 curious nobodies turned the little town of Flemington, New Jersey into a midsummer Mardi Gras. The small courtroom became a twenty-four-hour propaganda bureau spewing out headlines such as "Bruno Guilty, But Has Aides, Verdict of Man in Street," and story references to Bruno Hauptmann as "a thing lacking human characteristics." One report had it that the jury was seriously considering an offer to go into vaudeville.

From Hauptmann's trial to the present, America has never for very long lacked a case cause célèbre, be it the trials of John Z. DeLorean of car-design fame[23] or of Joel Steinberg, a lawyer convicted of beating an illegally adopted daughter to death.[24]

Defense lawyers, prosecutors, and police officers remain the surest sources of information about pending cases. Still, reporters and editors sometimes rush into print, occasionally without even a passing thought for the presumption of innocence.[25] The trial of Dr. Samuel Sheppard was such a case. After a murder conviction and twelve years in prison, Sheppard's attorneys got his case heard by the Supreme Court. He was given a new trial and acquitted.

Sheppard was accused of the July 4, 1954 murder of his wife Marilyn at their home in Bay Village, a suburb of Cleveland. "From the outset officials focused suspicion on Sheppard," Justice Clark noted in his opinion for the Court. He recounted the press's role in subsequent events.

First the newspapers reported extensively on Sheppard's refusal to take a lie detector test. An editorial suggested that Sheppard should have been "subjected instantly to the * * * third degree." Another editorial demanded an inquest. When the coroner called an inquest, it was held in a school gymnasium, was attended by a "swarm" of reporters and photographers, and was broadcast live. The three-day inquest ended with a "public brawl." Sheppard's attorneys were allowed to attend but not to participate. The newspapers reported details of the investigation obtained from police that were never introduced at trial, all of which tended toward showing Sheppard's guilt. The newspapers reported extensively that Sheppard was a womanizer, implying motive, but that too was never introduced at trial. Later editorials asked "Why Don't Police Quiz Top Suspect?" and "Why Isn't Sam Sheppard in Jail?"

When Sheppard was arrested, a crowd of newscasters, reporters, and photographers was waiting for his arrival at city hall. Sensational coverage continued until the trial.

The trial itself began two weeks before elections in which the prosecutor was a candidate for municipal judge and the trial judge was a candidate for reelection. A list of seventy-five prospective jurors was drawn. The newspapers were given and printed each person's name and address. The courtroom was 26 by 48 feet. A temporary table was set up inside the bar for approximately twenty reporters who were given assigned seats. Four other rows of benches were assigned to media representatives for the duration of the trial. The press used all the other rooms on the same floor of the courthouse. Telegraph and telephone lines were installed. One radio station set up broadcasting facilities on the third floor, next to the jury room.

During trial, one television broadcast carried an interview with the judge as he entered the courthouse. Prospective jurors were photographed during voir dire. Witnesses, counsel, and jurors were all photographed and televised whenever they entered or left. Sheppard himself was brought into the courtroom about ten minutes before the start of each session to allow photographing; picture taking was prohibited while court was in session. Every juror testified at voir dire of reading or hearing about the case in the media. During trial, pictures of the jury appeared in the Cleveland papers more than forty times. One feature story told of a juror's home life. On the second day of voir dire a live debate was staged on radio. Reporters in the debate said Sheppard effectively admitted his guilt by hiring a prominent criminal defense attorney.

Sheppard's attorneys sought a continuance, a change of venue, and a mistrial, all denied. The jury, however, was not sequestered, and no attempt was made to limit outside contacts and, thereby, exposure to news accounts.

There had long been agreement among parties on both sides of the case that responsibility for preventing "trial by newspaper" rests on judges, prosecutors, and police, not the press. For the second reversal of a state court conviction on due process grounds, the Supreme Court agreed.

SHEPPARD v. MAXWELL

1 MED.L.RPTR. 1220, 384 U.S. 333, 86 S.CT. 1507, 16 L.ED.2D 600 (1966).

Justice CLARK delivered the opinion of the Court:

* * *

A responsible press has always been regarded as the handmaiden of effective judicial administration, especially in the criminal field. Its function in this regard is documented by an impressive record of service over several centuries. The press does not simply publish information about trials but guards against the miscarriage of justice by subjecting the police, prosecutors, and judicial processes to extensive public scrutiny and criticism. This Court has, therefore, been unwilling to place any direct limitations on the freedom traditionally exercised by the news media for "[w]hat transpires in the court room is public property." Craig v. Harney, 331 U.S. 367 (1947). * * * But the Court has also pointed out that "[l]egal trials are not like elections, to be won through the use of the meeting-hall, the radio, and the newspaper." Bridges v. State of California, 314 U.S. at 271 (1941). * * * And we cited with approval the language of Justice Black for the Court in In re Murchison, 349 U.S. 133, 136 (1955), that "our system of law has always endeavored to prevent even the probability of unfairness."

It is clear that the totality of circumstances in this case also warrant such an approach. * * * Sheppard was not granted a change of venue to a locale away from where the publicity originated; nor was his jury sequestered. * * *

At intervals during the trial, the judge simply repeated his "suggestions" and "requests" that the jury not expose themselves to comment upon the case. Moreover, the jurors were thrust into the role of celebrities by the judge's failure to insulate them from reporters and photographers. The numerous pictures of the jurors, with their addresses, which appeared in the newspapers before and during the trial itself exposed them to expressions of opinion from both cranks and friends. The fact that anonymous letters had been received by prospective jurors should have made the judge aware that this publicity seriously threatened the jurors' privacy. * * * Charges and countercharges were aired in the news media besides those for which Sheppard was called to trial. * * *

While we cannot say that Sheppard was denied due process by the judge's refusal to take precautions against the influence of pretrial publicity alone, the court's later rulings must be considered against the setting in which the trial was held. In light of this background, we believe that the arrangements made by the judge with the news media caused Sheppard to be deprived of that "judicial serenity and calm to which [he] was entitled." The fact is that bedlam reigned at the courthouse during the trial and newsmen took over practically the entire courtroom, hounding most of the participants in the trial, especially Sheppard. * * * The bar of the court is reserved for counsel, providing them a safe place in which to keep papers and exhibits, and to confer privately with client and co-counsel. It is designed to protect the witness and the jury from any distractions, intrusions or influences, and to permit bench discussions of the judge's rulings away from the hearing of the public and the jury. Having assigned almost all of the available seats in the courtroom to the news media the judge lost his ability to supervise that environment. * * *

There can be no question about the nature of the publicity which surrounded Sheppard's trial. * * * Indeed, every court that has considered this case, save the court that tried it, has deplored the manner in which the news media inflamed and prejudiced the public.

* * *

Nor is there doubt that this deluge of publicity reached at least some of the jury. On the only occasion that the jury was queried, two jurors admitted in open court to hearing the highly inflammatory charge that a prison inmate claimed Sheppard as the father of her illegitimate child. Despite the extent and nature of the publicity to which the jury was exposed during trial, the judge refused defense counsel's other requests that the jury be asked whether they had read or heard specific prejudicial comment about the case, including the incidents we have previously summarized. In these circumstances, we can assume that some of this material reached members of the jury.

The court's fundamental error is compounded by the holding that it lacked power to control the publicity about the trial. From the very inception of the proceedings the judge announced that neither he nor anyone else could restrict prejudicial news accounts. And he reiterated this view on numerous occasions. Since he viewed the news media as his target, the judge never considered other means that are often utilized to reduce the appearance of prejudicial material and to protect the jury from outside influence. We conclude that these procedures would have been sufficient to guarantee Sheppard a fair trial and so do not consider what sanctions might be available against a recalcitrant press nor the charges of bias now made against the state trial judge. [Emphasis added.]

The carnival atmosphere at trial could easily have been avoided since the courtroom and courthouse premises are subject to the control of the court. * * * Bearing in mind the massive pretrial publicity, the judge should have adopted stricter rules governing the use of the courtroom by newsmen, as Sheppard's counsel requested. The number of reporters in the courtroom itself could have been limited at the first sign that their presence would disrupt the trial. They certainly should not have been placed inside the bar. Furthermore, the judge should have more closely regulated the conduct of newsmen in the courtroom. * * *

Secondly, the court should have insulated the witnesses. All of the newspapers and radio stations apparently interviewed prospective witnesses at will, and in many instances disclosed their testimony. A typical example was the publication of numerous statements by Susan Hayes, before her appearance in court, regarding her love affair with Sheppard.

* * *

Thirdly, the court should have made some effort to control the release of leads, information, and gossip to the press by police officers, witnesses, and the counsel for both sides. Much of the information thus disclosed was inaccurate leading to groundless rumors and confusion.

* * *

Under such circumstances, the judge should have at least warned the newspapers to check the accuracy of their accounts. And it is obvious that the judge should have further sought to alleviate this problem by imposing control over the statements made to the news media by counsel, witnesses, and especially the Coroner and police officers. The prosecution repeatedly made evidence available to the news media which was never offered in the trial. Much of the "evidence" disseminated in this fashion was clearly inadmissible.

* * *

More specifically, the trial court might well have proscribed extra-judicial statements by any lawyer, party, witness, or court official which divulged prejudicial matters. * * * The court could also have requested the appropriate city and county officials to promulgate a regulation with respect to dissemination of information about the case by their employees. In addition, reporters who wrote or broadcast prejudicial stories, could have been warned as to the impropriety of publishing material not introduced in the proceedings. * * * In this manner, Sheppard's right to a trial free from outside interference would have been given added protection without corresponding curtailment of the news media.

* * *

From the cases coming here we note that unfair and prejudicial news comment on pending trials has become increasingly prevalent. Due process requires that the accused receive a trial by an impartial jury free from outside influences. Given the pervasiveness of modern communications and the difficulty of effacing prejudicial publicity from the minds of the jurors, the trial courts must take strong measures to ensure that the balance is never weighed against the accused. And appellate tribunals have the duty to make an independent evaluation of the circumstances. Of course, there is nothing that proscribes the press from reporting events that transpire in the courtroom. [Emphasis added.] But where there is a reasonable likelihood that prejudicial news prior to trial will prevent a fair trial, the judge should continue the case until the threat abates or transfer it to another county not so permeated with publicity. In addition, sequestration of the jury was something the judge should have raised sua sponte with counsel. If publicity during the proceedings threatens the fairness of the trial, a new trial should be ordered. But we must remember that reversals are but palliatives; the cure lies in those remedial measures that will prevent the prejudice at its inception. The courts must take such steps by rule and regulation that will protect their processes from prejudicial outside interferences. [Emphasis added.] Neither prosecutors, counsel for defense, the accused, witnesses, court staff nor enforcement officers coming under the jurisdiction of the court should be permitted to frustrate its function. Collaboration between counsel and the press as to information affecting the fairness of a criminal trial is not only subject to regulation, but is highly censurable and worthy of disciplinary measures.

* * *

The case is remanded to the District Court with instructions to issue the writ and order that Sheppard be released from custody unless the State puts him to its charges again within a reasonable time.

It is so ordered.

Justice Black dissents.

COMMENT

The clearest message from Sheppard is the Court's affirmation that it is primarily the judge's job to assure a fair trial. Only after considering a lengthy "laundry list" of alternative measures, apparently, would direct action affecting the press be justified. The Sheppard opinion is simultaneously a rebuke based on the effects of press coverage and a defense of the First Amendment. The requirement that alternative measures be tried first means that the defendant and not the press will be inconvenienced, at least initially. It is worth noting the practical effects of the alternatives Clark said the trial judge should have considered.

Change of venue is perhaps the most attractive of the alternatives. In most criminal cases, news coverage is local, not widespread. That means as a practical matter that a shift to another county or another part of the state may remedy any potential publicity effects. There are two problems associated with change of venue, however. First, the Court's suggestion runs counter to the change of venue provisions of many state statutes. Second, it is of little help to the defendant who has attracted statewide or even nationwide news coverage.

Continuance means delaying the trial while waiting for the publicity to wane. It is useful only to allay the effects of pretrial publicity, since the trial itself will attract renewed press attention. Still, delay can make impaneling an impartial jury easier by allowing bias, if it exists, to erode with incomplete recollection. Unfortunately, the sort of recollection most likely to remain is an impression of guilt or innocence.[26]

Sequestering the jury can help prevent publicity effects during actual trial. It presents tremendous practical problems. It is expensive; jurors may be housed and fed at court expense in hotels for weeks. Jurors would rather be home than effectively held prisoner to assure a fair trial. Court and police personnel must monitor jurors to assure that inappropriate contact or exposure does not occur.

Conducting an intense voir dire is perhaps the best of the remedies. It has been the primary method of guaranteeing an impartial jury almost as long as the jury system has been used. And ignorance itself is not necessarily a virtue. In Murphy v. Florida, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1232, 421 U.S. 794 (1975), defendant had been on trial for his part in a series of thefts, including theft of a famous sapphire, the Star of India. Although jurors admitted knowing of the highly publicized case, the Court could find no evidence of juror hostility toward the defendant in the voir dire record.

Admonishing the jury to disregard potentially irrelevant or prejudicial information is another traditional remedy, one in fact used by the trial judge in Sheppard. But how can a judge be confident that a warning to disregard will be heeded? Often jurors are admonished not to read a newspaper, watch television news, or listen to radio, but unless sequestered, a jury's adherence relies on an unspoken and hard-to-enforce honor system.

Sheppard suggests a judge might place limits on dissemination of information by any person subject to the court's jurisdiction. Court employees and police would automatically fall subject to limits, as would lawyers in their licensed capacity as "officers of the court." Witnesses are also mentioned in Sheppard as candidates for limitations, as well as for protection by the court from reporters. Court-ordered "gags" on parties other than the press have raised issues about the First Amendment rights of those parties in recent years, however (see p. 446, this text).

The only direct action against the press approved in Sheppard is time, place, and manner regulation in the courtroom. A trial judge has an obligation to assure that the conduct of observers, including the press, does not have a detrimental effect on either the conduct or outcome of proceedings.

Clark did emphasize that, "The courts must take such steps by rule and regulation that will protect their processes from prejudicial outside interferences," an admonition that could be interpreted as justifying if not advocating direct restraints on the press. The courts, the legal profession, and journalists would all react differently to the message of Sheppard.

THE AFTERMATH OF SHEPPARD

If Justice Clark spoke sternly to trial judges in the opinion, commanding them to control their courtrooms and use all available remedies to counteract unfairness, he also had words for the press. It would require self-delusion to interpret his pained account of press coverage as anything but disgust for journalism's disregard for fairness. Sheppard would be parent to hundreds of "gag" orders directed at the press by lower court judges, culminating in Nebraska Press Ass'n v. Stuart in 1976. And the Nebraska Press case has not necessarily been the last word on the issue.

In the interim, and partly in response to criticism in the Warren Report on press coverage of Lee Harvey Oswald,[27] the American Bar Association set up an Advisory Committee on Fair Trial and Free Press under chairman Paul C. Reardon, then an associate justice on the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court.[28] While the Reardon Report, as it came to be called, primarily addressed officers of the courts, it recommended that judges use the long discredited power of constructive contempt.[29] Constructive contempt allows judges to cite for contempt anyone who disseminates extrajudicial statements willfully designed to influence a trial's outcome, or anyone who violates a valid court order not to reveal information from a closed judicial hearing, despite the fact that the action took place outside the courtroom.[30]

The Reardon Report also favored closing pretrial hearings to the press and public if it appeared to the court that a fair trial was in jeopardy. Since 90 percent of criminal cases are disposed of in the pretrial stage, widespread closure of pretrial hearings would curtail newsgathering about criminal cases significantly.

The controversial report also established categories of prohibited and publishable information. Prohibited comment included: prior criminal records; character references; confessions; test results; and out-of-court speculation on either guilt or innocence or the merits of evidence. Publishable information included: facts and circumstances of arrests; identity of the person arrested; identity of the arresting officer or agency; descriptions of physical evidence; the charge; facts from public court records; and the next probable steps in the judicial process. The report was soon exerting nationwide influence on both press and bar.

Where there was a threatened interference with the right to a fair trial, the report agreed with Justice Clark in Sheppard that motions should be granted for change of venue or venire, severance, continuance, waiver of the right to trial by jury, sequestration, new trial, mistrial, and habeas corpus. Under voir dire, jurors could be challenged, and once the jurors were seated, judges could take pains to instruct them on what and what not to consider.

To be sure, these judicial remedies are useful, but there are some obvious problems. The ubiquity of mass media, especially broadcasting, casts a shadow on the effectiveness of changes of venue and venire. A continuance, or postponement, may lead to the disappearance of witnesses and evidence, and, if unable to raise bail, a defendant remains in jail. A mistrial subjects a defendant to the expense and trauma of a new trial. There is some debate over the usefulness of peremptory challenges to jurors and of challenges for cause, both part of voir dire proceedings. Jurors as a rule don't like being sequestered, or locked up, and may react adversely to the party initiating such a motion; moreover they have, in most cases, already been exposed to pretrial publicity.

One survey reported that judges favored most of the above remedies appropriate to the pretrial period. Once the trial had begun, motion for a new trial on due process grounds was their choice. Most agreed that the reporting of criminal records, confessions, and the results of pretrial tests, such as the lie detector, were the most damaging forms of pretrial coverage.[31]

The Reardon Report also had a positive side. The report gave momentum to the work of bar-press committees in the states. In most states, representatives of the legal and journalism communities met to discuss what items of coverage were appropriate when the press covered criminal proceedings. The press was motivated, at least in part, to seek better relations with the bar as a way of blunting the Reardon Report's effects after the report was formally adopted by the ABA.

The committees typically wrote bar-press guidelines, which the press hoped would assure limited judicial intervention in newsgathering and which the bar hoped would provide more balanced, less biased coverage. The "Nebraska Bar-Press Guidelines," promulgated by the Nebraska State Bar Association's Committee on Bar/News Media in 1975, are typical. Despite the undesirable notoriety the guidelines attracted in the Nebraska Press case, the guidelines were still being distributed to and encouraged upon journalists through the 1980s.

NEBRASKA BAR-PRESS GUIDELINES[32]

Prior Criminal Records

Lawyers and law enforcement personnel should not volunteer their prior criminal records of an accused except to aid in his apprehension or to warn the public of any dangers he presents. The news media can obtain prior criminal records from the public records of the courts, police agencies and other governmental agencies and from their own files. The news media acknowledge, however, that publication or broadcasts of an individual's criminal record can be prejudicial, and its publication or broadcast should be considered very carefully, particularly after the filing of formal charges and as the time of the trial approaches, and such publication or broadcast should generally be avoided because readers, viewers and listeners are potential jurors and an accused is presumed innocent until proven guilty.

32. Bar/News Media Committee, Journalists' Guide to Nebraska Courts (1980), 43.

Photographs

1. Generally, it is not appropriate for law enforcement personnel to deliberately pose a person in custody for photographing or televising by representatives of the news media.
2. Unposed photographing and televising of an accused outside the courtroom is generally appropriate, and law enforcement personnel should not interfere with such photographing or televising except in compliance with an order of the court or unless such photographing or televising would interfere with their official duties.
3. It is appropriate for law enforcement personnel to release to representatives of the news media photographs of a suspect or an accused. Before publication of any such photographs, the news media should eliminate any portions of the photographs that would indicate a prior criminal offense or police record.

For Disclosure and Reporting of Information Relating to Imminent or Pending Criminal Litigation

These voluntary guidelines reflect standards which bar and news media representatives believe are a reasonable means of accommodating, on a voluntary basis, the correlative constitutional rights of free speech and free press with the right of an accused to a fair trial. They are not intended to prevent the news media from inquiring into and reporting on the integrity, fairness, efficiency and effectiveness of law enforcement, the administration of justice, or political or governmental questions whenever involved in the judicial process.

As a voluntary code, these guidelines do not necessarily reflect in all respects what the members of the bar or the news media believe would be permitted or required by law.

Information Generally Appropriate for Disclosure, Reporting

Generally, it is appropriate to disclose and report the following information:

1. The arrested person's name, age, residence, employment, marital status and similar biographical information.
2. The charge, its text, any amendments thereto, and, if applicable, the identity of the complainant.
3. The amount or conditions of bail.
4. The identity of and biographical information concerning the complaining party and victim, and if a death is involved, the apparent cause of death unless it appears that the cause of death may be a contested issue.
5. The identity of the investigating and arresting agencies and the length of the investigation.
6. The circumstances of arrest, including time, place, resistance, pursuit, possession of and all weapons used, and a description of the items seized at the time of arrest. It is appropriate to disclose and report at the time of seizure the description of physical evidence subsequently seized other than a confession, admission or statement. It is appropriate to disclose and report the subsequent finding of weapons, bodies, contraband, stolen property and similar physical items if, in view of the time and other circumstances, such disclosure and reporting are not likely to interfere with a fair trial.
7. Information disclosed by the public records, including all testimony and other evidence adduced at the trial.

Information Generally Not Appropriate for Disclosure, Reporting

Generally, it is not appropriate to disclose or report the following information because of the risk of prejudice to the right of an accused to a fair trial:

1. The existence or contents of any confession, admission or statement given by the accused, except it may be stated that the accused denies the charges made against him. This paragraph is not intended to apply to the statements made by the accused to representatives of the news media or to the public.
2. Opinions concerning the guilt, the innocence or the character of the accused.
3. Statements predicting or influencing the outcome of the trial.

4. Results of any examination or tests or the accused's refusal or failure to submit to an examination or test.
5. Statements or opinions concerning the credibility or anticipated testimony of prospective witnesses.
6. Statements made in the judicial proceedings outside the presence of the jury relating to confessions or other matters which, if reported, would likely interfere with a fair trial.

THE CONTEMPT POWER AND GAG ORDERS

With Sheppard, the Reardon Report, and various states' guidelines in place, the stage was set for numerous confrontations between the judiciary and the press. The primary question anytime a judge orders the press not to report information is whether or not the order must be obeyed. The second question concerns the constitutional validity of the order.

While the news media were predictably negative toward broad prohibitions against publishing information in public records, such as criminal records, their strongest condemnation was reserved for the part of the Reardon Report that proposed punishing editors for what they printed. History was largely on the editors' side.

As early as 1788, Americans began having doubts about the summary procedure for punishing contempts by publication;[33] the judge acts as complainant, jury, and judge in his or her own case. Pennsylvania passed a law limiting its use in 1809, followed by New York in 1829. Congress enacted the Federal Contempt Act of 1831, limiting punishable contempt to disobedience to any judicial process or decree and to misbehavior in the presence of the court, "or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice." [34]

Judges disagreed on whether "so near thereto" required a geographical or causal construction.[35] Until 1941 the "immemorial" power of judges to punish summarily prevailed. Then, in Nye v. United States, 313 U.S. 33 (1941), the Court did an about-face and held that "so near thereto" meant physical proximity. It also rejected the "reasonable tendency" rule used to uphold contempt citations, a rule that virtually assured all citations would be upheld.

That same year, in Bridges v. California, 314 U.S. 252 (1941), the power of judges to punish publication was severely limited. Labor leader Harry Bridges and the Los Angeles Times had both criticized a judge and the judicial process while a case was pending. The Court declared in this and subsequent cases[36] that the contempt power could be used only against out-of-court comments creating a "clear and present danger" of impairing justice. "The assumption that respect for the judiciary can be won by shielding judges from published criticism wrongly appraises the character of American public opinion," Justice Hugo Black wrote for the Court. "[A]n enforced silence * * * would probably engender resentment, suspicion, and contempt much more than it would enhance respect." Dissenters in Bridges argued that applying a prior restraint analysis was inappropriate, since the punishment was for past conduct; they also thought the case upset the states' traditional right to establish laws to protect the integrity of their courts.

While of little moment perhaps to the journalist facing a contempt citation, it is important to note that American law provides for two types of contempt, civil contempt and criminal contempt. The difference refers to the actions of the person cited, however, and not to the nature of the action from 34. 18 U.S.C.A. § 401.

35. Toledo Newspaper Co. v. United States, 247 U.S. 402 (1918). In a strong dissent, Justice Holmes, interpreting the phrase as "geographical," sought to discredit the summary power in favor of firm and steadfast judges not easily deflected from their sworn duty.
36. Pennekamp v. Florida, 328 U.S. 331 (1946). Zechariah Chafee, Jr., an eminent commentator on freedom of speech and press, would have made Justice Frankfurter's concurring opinion in the case required reading in every school of journalism, newspaper office, and broadcasting station. See Chafee, Government and Mass Communications, Vol. 2, 1947, p. 433. Frankfurter argued that, ultimately, freedom of the press would depend for its survival on an independent judiciary. "To deny," he said, "that bludgeoning or poisonous comment has power to influence, or at least to disturb, the task of judging is to play make-believe and to assume that men in gowns are angels." And he contended that every right carries with it a concomitant responsibility.

In Craig v. Harney, 331 U.S. 367 (1947), the third in a series of cases denying the contempt power to judges, Justice Douglas said: "Judges are supposed to be men of fortitude, able to thrive in a hardy climate."

which the contempt citation arose.[37] Decided cases offer little sure guide to determining when activity will prompt either type of contempt citation, but criminal contempt is more likely when the refusal to obey a court order is knowing and willful. The biggest difference is in penalties, with criminal contempt typically bringing harsher ones. The exact rules for contempt vary depending upon whether a court is federal or state, whether the action is civil or criminal, and even then they vary tremendously among the states. Normally persons cited for contempt are entitled to a hearing and counsel.

The traditional rule regarding court orders is that they must be obeyed, pending appeal, even when First Amendment interests are affected. The leading modern case on the duty of journalists to obey even an obviously invalid order constituting prior restraint developed from a 1971 Baton Rouge murder-conspiracy case that reminded reporters that judges were not helpless when it came to enforcing their orders. At a preliminary hearing designed to determine whether the state had a legitimate motive in prosecuting a VISTA worker on a charge of conspiring to murder the city's mayor or whether its action was based on racial prejudice, a federal district judge prohibited the publication of testimony taken at a public hearing. Two State-Times reporters ignored the order, wrote their stories, and were adjudged guilty of criminal contempt of court. The reporters appealed to the Fifth Circuit, and, in what may have been a turning point in press-bar cooperation, that court upheld the principle that even an unconstitutional court order must be obeyed pending appeal. The court refused to make the First Amendment question of prior restraint the dispositive issue in the case. And it relied heavily on a United States Supreme Court ruling, Walker v. Birmingham, 388 U.S. 307 (1967), which required obedience even to a court order that was in apparent violation of the First Amendment pending appeal of the order.

Noting that no jury was yet involved in the case and the press had not created a carnival atmosphere, the Fifth Circuit court observed that the public's right to know the facts brought out in the hearing was particularly compelling since the issue being litigated was a charge that elected state officials had trumped up charges against an individual solely because of his race and civil rights activities. The federal district court's cure, said the federal appeals court, was worse than the disease. But it went on to say the following.

UNITED STATES v. DICKINSON

1 MED.L.RPTR. 1338, 465 F.2D 496 (5TH CIR. 1972).

John R. BROWN, Chief Judge:

* * *

The conclusion that the District Court's order was constitutionally invalid does not necessarily end the matter of the validity of the contempt convictions. There remains the very formidable question of whether a person may with impunity knowingly violate an order which turns out to be invalid. We hold that in the circumstances of this case he may not.

We begin with the well-established principle in proceedings for criminal contempt that an injunction duly issuing out of a court having subject matter and personal jurisdiction must be obeyed, irrespective of the ultimate validity of the order. Invalidity is no defense to criminal contempt. * * * Walker v. City of Birmingham, 388 U.S. 307 (1967). * * * "People simply cannot have the luxury of knowing that they have a right to contest the correctness of the judge's order in deciding whether to wilfully disobey it. * * * Court orders have to be obeyed until they are reversed or set aside in an orderly fashion."

* * *

The criminal contempt exception requiring compliance with court orders, while invalid non-judicial directives may be disregarded, is not the product of self-protection or arrogance of Judges. Rather it is born of an experience-proved recognition that this rule is essential for the system to work. Judges, after all, are charged with the final responsibility to adjudicate legal disputes. * * *

On the other hand, the deliberate refusal to obey an order of the court without testing its validity through

37. For a more comprehensive treatment of the history of the contempt power, see Nelles and King, Contempt by Publication in the United States, 28 Colum. L. Rev. 401–431 and 525–562 (1928); Goldfarb, The Contempt Power (1963); Gillmor, Free Press and Fair Trial, 1966, Chapt. 11, "Contempt and the Constitution."

established processes requires further action by the judiciary, and therefore directly affects the judiciary's ability to discharge its duties and responsibilities. Therefore, "while it is sparingly to be used, yet the power of the courts to punish for contempts is a necessary and integral part of the independence of the judiciary, and is absolutely essential to the performance of the duties imposed on them by law. Without it they are mere boards of arbitration whose judgments and decrees would be only advisory."

[P]articular language in the recent Supreme Court decision of New York Times Co. v. United States, 1971, 403 U.S. 713 suggests that that Court would not sanction disobedience of a court order, even where the injunction unconstitutionally restrains publication of news. In the Times case, the lower courts had issued temporary restraining orders prohibiting further publication of the Pentagon Papers pending judicial determination of the merits of the Government's objections. Six of the Justices agreed that these injunctions were violative of the First Amendment. Nevertheless, no one suggested that the injunctions could have been ignored with impunity.

* * *

Where the thing enjoined is publication and the communication is "news," this condition presents some thorny problems. Timeliness of publication is the hallmark of "news" and the difference between "news" and "history" is merely a matter of hours. Thus, where the publishing of news is sought to be restrained, the incontestable inviolability of the order may depend on the immediate accessibility of orderly review. But in the absence of strong indications that the appellate process was being deliberately stalled—certainly not so in this record—violation with impunity does not occur simply because immediate decision is not forthcoming, even though the communication enjoined is "news." Of course the nature of the expression sought to be exercised is a factor to be considered in determining whether First Amendment rights can be effectively protected by orderly review so as to render disobedience to otherwise unconstitutional mandates nevertheless contemptuous. But newsmen are citizens, too. They too may sometimes have to wait. * * * As a matter of jurisdiction, the District Court certainly has power to formulate Free Press-Fair Trial orders in cases pending before the court and to enforce those orders against all who have actual and admitted knowledge of its prohibitions. Secondly, as the District Court's findings of fact establish, both the District Court and the Court of Appeals were available and could have been contacted that very day, thereby affording speedy and effective but orderly review of the injunction in question swiftly enough to protect the right to publish news while it was still "news."
