45. When a gag order aimed directly at lawyers was appealed, the Seventh Circuit in a significant ruling struck it down because the trial court had used a "reasonable likelihood" test rather than a "clear and present danger" or "clear and imminent danger" test. The court was unconvinced that justice would be served by silenced lawyers, especially those representing the defense, given the fact that public opinion weighs heavily against most defendants after arrest and indictment. While recognizing that restraints on lawyers were sometimes permissible, the court found constitutionally infirm the blanket prohibitions contained in the standing rules recommended by the American Bar Association and the Judicial Conference. Seldom would lawyer comments pose a "clear and present danger" to the administration of justice. Chicago Council of Lawyers v. Bauer, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1094, 522 F.2d 242 (7th Cir. 1975), cert. den., 427 U.S. 912. See also, State ex rel. Angel v. Woodahl, 555 P.2d 501 (Mont.1976). But see, People v. Dupree, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 2015, 388 N.Y.S.2d 203 (1976) and Hirschkop v. Virginia State Bar, 406 F.Supp. 721 (D.Va.1976) where "reasonable likelihood" tests were preferred.

and 2) exclusionary orders barring the public, including the media, from the courtroom. It is little wonder that with such authoritative encouragement, these techniques became the most commonly reported devices used to circumvent the Nebraska Press holding.

CLOSED COURTROOMS

1. Generations of debate have focused on questions of access to the judicial process (hearings, trials, and records) and whether the constitutional guarantee of public trial is meant primarily for the protection of an accused or for the benefit of the public.<sup>46</sup> Nonetheless, courtrooms were routinely closed to press and public. They were closed to preserve order and decorum, to protect witnesses, public morality, trade secrets, the confidentiality of police, national security, the privacy rights of participants, and the fragile psyches of juveniles. Judicial records were sealed when it appeared to the court that there were no alternative means to protect a defendant against prejudice. Access might be argued successfully when it could be demonstrated that alternatives to closure had not been considered, that there was no showing of a serious and imminent threat to the fair administration of justice, that no thought had been given to closing portions of a hearing or redacting parts of a record, and that no hearing had been afforded the press pending an exclusionary order.

To complicate matters, there was wide variation in state rules or statutes on suppression hearings, competency hearings, bail hearings, deposition sessions, general preliminary hearings, voir dire, matrimonial and juvenile hearings, trials, and post-trial hearings.

In this atmosphere of uncertainty Gannett v. DePasquale<sup>47</sup> came to the Supreme Court. A divided Court, at least for a time, was to resolve doubts in favor of the accused. The Court held that press and public have no Sixth Amendment right of access to pretrial suppression hearings closed by agreement of both prosecution and defense. Guarantee of a public criminal trial was for the defendant's benefit alone, said the Court, and no First and Fourteenth Amendment issues were raised by the closure order of the New York trial court.

"To safeguard the due process rights of the accused," the Court added, "a trial judge has an affirmative constitutional duty to minimize the effects of prejudicial pretrial publicity, and he may take protective measures even though they are not strictly and inescapably necessary. Publicity concerning pretrial suppression hearings pose special risks of unfairness because it may influence public opinion against a defendant and inform potential jurors of inculpatory information wholly inadmissible at the actual trial."

Here the defendant's right to a fair trial outweighed the constitutional rights of 46. E.W. Scripps Co. v. Fulton, 125 N.E.2d 896 (Ohio 1955); Kirstowsky v. Superior Court, 300 P.2d 163 (Cal.1956); United Press Association v. Valente, 123 N.E.2d 777 (N.Y.1954); Geise v. United States, 265 F.2d 659 (9th Cir. 1959); Singer v. United States, 380 U.S. 24 (1964); Phoenix Newspapers, Inc. v. Jennings, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 2404, 490 P.2d 563 (Ariz.1971); Oliver v. Postel, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 2399, 331 N.Y.S.2d 407 (1972); United States v. Clark, 475 F.2d 240 (2d Cir. 1973); Gannett Co. v. Mark, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1189, 387 N.Y.S.2d 336 (1976); Hearst Corp. v. Cholakis, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 2085, 386 N.Y.S.2d 892 (1976); Commercial Printing v. Lee, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 2352, 553 S.W.2d 270 (Ark.1977); CBS, Inc. v. Young, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1024, 522 F.2d 234 (6th Cir. 1975); Society of Professional Journalists v. Martin, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 2146, 556 F.2d 706 (4th Cir. 1977); United States v. Gurney, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1081, 558 F.2d 1202 (5th Cir. 1977); New Jersey v. Allen, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1737, 373 A.2d 377 (N.J.1977); Illinois v. March, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1465, 419 N.E.2d 1212 (Ill.1981).

47. 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1337, 443 U.S. 368 (1979).

press and public. But Justice Stewart's opinion for the Court was ambiguous as to whether trials as well as pretrial hearings would be covered by the rule. Chief Justice Burger, in a concurring opinion, sharply differentiated trial and pretrial proceedings but provided no clear constitutional distinction. Justice Rehnquist saw no right of access to either part of the judicial process under First or Sixth Amendments.

Only in Justice Powell's concurring opinion<sup>48</sup> could the press find a ray of hope. Powell wrote that there was a qualified First Amendment right to attend pretrial hearings, although he found no equivalent Sixth Amendment right. And press and public must have an opportunity to be heard on the question of their exclusion.

In a vigorous dissenting opinion in which Justices Brennan, White, and Marshall joined, Justice Blackmun read public access in the Sixth Amendment. He would require an accused to show that there existed a "substantial probability that irreparable damage" to fair trial would result from public proceedings and that alternatives to closure would not suffice.

In the twelve-month period after the ruling, an estimated 270 efforts were made to close various phases of criminal proceedings: 131 closure motions were granted and upheld on appeal; 14 were reversed; and 111 were either denied by the trial court or withdrawn by counsel. Of the total number of motions, 171 sought to close pretrial hearings, 49 to close trials. About half were granted in each category.<sup>49</sup>

In the meantime, the justices themselves seemed to be unsure whether the Court's opinion had meant to ease the closing of trials as well as pretrial hearings. That question would be faced in a landmark case a year later, Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1833, 448 U.S. 555 (1980). There Chief Justice Burger held for the Court that closing of a criminal trial in the absence of an overriding counter interest was invalid under First and Fourteenth Amendments.

In spite of the potential significance of the case and the near unanimity of its vote, the Court remained "badly splintered"<sup>50</sup> and imprecise as to what it would take to overcome the federal constitutional right to attend criminal trials.

A brief summary of the Richmond opinions may help in reading substantial excerpts from the case itself.

Justice Stewart, who wrote the opinion for the Court in Gannett, joined the judgment of the Court in Richmond and wrote a separate concurrence recognizing a First Amendment right to attend trials. Stevens, who had joined Stewart in Gannett, agreed and characterized the case as a watershed: "[F]or the first time, the Court unequivocally holds that an arbitrary interference with access to important information is an abridgement of the freedom of speech and of the press protected by the First Amendment."

Blackmun, who dissented in Gannett, concurred, recognizing a First Amendment right of access to trials in addition to a Sixth Amendment guarantee of access to all judicial proceedings. Brennan and Marshall, who had also dissented in Gannett, concurred only in the judgment of the Court, holding that the First Amendment, applied through the Fourteenth, gives the press a structural role to play in keeping the public informed and the public an independent right of access to trials. And Justice White, the fourth dissenter in Gan-

48. Powell's concurrence had originally been a dissent. The switch made Stewart's original dissent the opinion for the Court. This last minute and end-of-term rearrangement accounts for some of the uncertainty in the Gannett opinions.

49. News Media & the Law, August/September, November/December, 1979, pp. 7-9, 10-23.

50. Archibald Cox, Freedom of Expression, 1982.

nett, said that that case should have construed the Sixth Amendment to forbid excluding the public from criminal proceedings except under certain narrowly defined circumstances.

Rehnquist held to his Gannett view that First and Sixth Amendments extend no right of access to judicial proceedings. Justice Powell took no part in Richmond.

None of the justices explained why a Sixth Amendment analysis was used in Gannett and a First Amendment approach in Richmond. And there is still little agreement on what ought to be the standards for closure.

While he was reluctant to denote a First Amendment right of access in Richmond, Justice Blackmun's standard of "substantial probability of irreparable damage" for closing courtrooms would commend itself to Justices Brennan, Marshall, and White. And all four would likely join White in wanting to be sure that alternatives to closure would not work and, if closure were required, it would be effective. It is not clear, however, how far White would support access beyond judicial situations. Brennan and Marshall on the other hand, have suggested that only national security interests should override the virtue of open judicial hearings.

"A reasonable probability of prejudice" would justify closure for Justice Stevens and the Chief Justice. And Burger appears to be more hospitable to the long tradition of public trials than he is to open pretrial hearings, the use of which may not have been anticipated by the Framers. Nor would he automatically extend access to other institutions of government. Although Justice Powell did not participate in Richmond, his rather relaxed "likelihood of prejudice" standard might be what he would apply to a trial closure.

So Richmond, leaving Gannett intact, presented the press with something less than certainty about its news-gathering rights.

RICHMOND NEWSPAPERS, INC. v. VIRGINIA

6 MED.LRPTR. 1833, 448 U.S. 555,
100 S.CT. 2814, 65 L.ED.2D 973 (1980).

* * *

Chief Justice BURGER announced the judgment of the Court and delivered an opinion in which Justice White and Justice Stevens joined.

The narrow question presented in this case is whether the right of the public and press to attend criminal trials is guaranteed under the United States Constitution.

I

In March 1976, one Stevenson was indicted for the murder of a hotel manager who had been found stabbed to death on December 2, 1975. Tried promptly in July 1976, Stevenson was convicted of second-degree murder in the Circuit Court of Hanover County, Va. The Virginia Supreme Court reversed the conviction in October 1977, holding that a bloodstained shirt purportedly belonging to Stevenson had been improperly admitted into evidence. * * *

Stevenson was retried in the same court. This second trial ended in a mistrial on May 30, 1978 when a juror asked to be excused after trial had begun and no alternate was available.

A third trial, which began in the same court on June 6, 1978, also ended in a mistrial. It appears that the mistrial may have been declared because a prospective juror had read about Stevenson's previous trials in a newspaper and had told other prospective jurors about the case before the retrial began. * * *

Stevenson was tried in the same court for a fourth time beginning on September 11, 1978. Present in the courtroom when the case was called were appellants Wheeler and McCarthy, reporters for appellant Richmond Newspapers, Inc. Before the trial began, counsel for the defendant moved that it be closed to the public:

[T]here was this woman that was with the family of the deceased when we were here before. She had sat in the Courtroom. I would like to ask that everybody be excluded from the Courtroom because I don't want any information being shuffled back and forth when we have a recess as to what—who testified to what. * * *

The trial judge, who had presided over two of the three previous trials, asked if the prosecution had any objection to clearing the courtroom. The prosecutor stated he had no objection and would leave it to the discretion of the court. * * * Presumably referring to Virginia Code § 19.2-266, the trial judge then announced: “[T]he statute gives me that power specifically and the defendant has made the motion.” He then ordered “that the Courtroom be kept clear of all parties except the witnesses when they testify.” * * *<sup>2</sup> The record does not show that any objections to the closure order were made by anyone present at the time, including appellants Wheeler and McCarthy.

Later that same day, however, appellants sought a hearing on a motion to vacate the closure order. The trial judge granted the request and scheduled a hearing to follow the close of the day's proceedings. When the hearing began, the court ruled that the hearing was to be treated as part of the trial; accordingly, he again ordered the reporters to leave the courtroom, and they complied.

At the closed hearing, counsel for appellants observed that no evidentiary findings had been made by the court prior to the entry of its closure order and pointed out that the court had failed to consider any other, less drastic measures within its power to ensure a fair trial. * * * Counsel for appellants argued that constitutional considerations mandated that before ordering closure, the court should first decide that the rights of the defendant could be protected in no other way.

Counsel for defendant Stevenson pointed out that this was the fourth time he was standing trial. He also referred to “difficulty with information between jurors,” and stated that he “didn't want information to leak out,” be published by the media, perhaps inaccurately, and then be seen by the jurors. Defense counsel argued that these things, plus the fact that “this is a small community,” made this a proper case for closure. * * *

The trial judge noted that counsel for the defendant had made similar statements at the morning hearing. The court also stated:

[O]ne of the other points that we take into consideration in this particular Courtroom is layout of the Courtroom. I think that having people in the Courtroom is distracting to the jury. Now, we have to have certain people in here and maybe that's not a very good reason. When we get into our new Court Building, people can sit in the audience so the jury can't see them. The rule of the Court may be different under those circumstances. * * *

The prosecutor again declined comment, and the court summed up by saying:

I'm inclined to agree with [defense counsel] that, if I feel that the rights of the defendant are infringed in any way, [when] he makes the motion to do something and it doesn't completely override all rights of everyone else, then I'm inclined to go along with the defendant's motion. * * *

2. Virginia Code § 19.2-266 provides in part: “In the trial of all criminal cases, whether the same be felony or misdemeanor cases, the court may, in its discretion, exclude from the trial any persons whose presence would impair the conduct of a fair trial, provided that the right of the accused to a public trial shall not be violated.”

The court denied the motion to vacate and ordered the trial to continue the following morning "with the press and public excluded." * * *

What transpired when the closed trial resumed the next day was disclosed in the following manner by an order of the court entered September 12, 1978:

[I]n the absence of the jury, the defendant by counsel made a Motion that a mis-trial be declared, which motion was taken under advisement. At the conclusion of the Commonwealth's evidence, the attorney for the defendant moved the Court to strike the Commonwealth's evidence on grounds stated to the record, which Motion was sustained by the Court. And the jury having been excused, the Court doth find the accused NOT GUILTY of Murder, as charged in the Indictment, and he was allowed to depart. * * *

On September 27, 1978 the trial court granted appellants' motion to intervene nun pro tunc in the Stevenson case. Appellants then petitioned the Virginia Supreme Court for writs of mandamus and prohibition and filed an appeal from the trial court's closure order. On July 9, 1979, the Virginia Supreme Court dismissed the mandamus and prohibition petitions and, finding no reversible error, denied the petition for appeal. * * *

Appellants then sought review in this Court. * * * [W]e grant the petition.

The criminal trial which appellants sought to attend has long since ended, and there is thus some suggestion that the case is moot. * * * If the underlying dispute is "capable of repetition, yet evading review," * * *, it is not moot.

Since the Virginia Supreme Court declined plenary review, it is reasonably foreseeable that other trials may be closed by other judges without any more showing of need than is presented on this record. More often than not, criminal trials will be of sufficiently short duration that a closure order "will evade review, or at least considered plenary review in this Court." Ne- braska Press, 427 U.S., at 547. * * * Accordingly, we turn to the merits.

II

We begin consideration of this case by noting that the precise issue presented here has not previously been before this Court for decision. In Gannett Co., Inc. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368, * * * (1979), the Court was not required to decide whether a right of access to trials, as distinguished from hearings on pre trial motions, was constitutionally guaranteed. The Court held that the Sixth Amendment's guarantee to the accused of a public trial gave neither the public nor the press an enforceable right of access to a pre trial suppression hearing. One concurring opinion specifically emphasized that "a hearing on a motion before trial to suppress evidence is not a trial * * *." 433 U.S., at 394, * * * (Burger, C.J., concurring). Moreover, the Court did not decide whether the First and Fourteenth Amendments guarantee a right of the public to attend trials, id., at 392 and n. 24, * * *; nor did the dissenting opinion reach this issue. Id., at 447, 99 S.Ct., at 2940 (Blackmun, J., dissenting).

In prior cases the Court has treated questions involving conflicts between publicity and a defendant's right to a fair trial; as we observed in Nebraska Press Assn. v. Stuart, * * *, "[t]he problems presented by this [conflict] are almost as old as the Republic." * * * But here for the first time the Court is asked to decide whether a criminal trial itself may be closed to the public upon the unopposed request of a defendant, without any demonstration that closure is required to protect the defendant's superior right to a fair trial, or that some other overriding consideration requires closure.

A

The origins of the proceeding which has become the modern criminal trial in Anglo-American justice can be traced back beyond reliable historical records. We need not here review all details of its development, but a summary of that history is instructive. What is significant for present purposes is that throughout its evolution, the trial has been open to all who care to observe.

In the days before the Norman Conquest, cases in England were generally brought before moots, such as the local court of the hundred or the county court, which were attended by the freemen of the community. Pollock, English Law Before the Norman Conquest, in 1 Selected Essays in Anglo-American Legal History 89 (1907). Somewhat like modern jury duty, attendance at these early meetings was compulsory on the part of the freemen, who were called upon to render judgment. Id., at 89–90; see also 1 W. Holdsworth, A History of English Law 10, 12 (1927).

With the gradual evolution of the jury system in the years after the Norman Conquest, see, e.g., 1 Holdsworth, supra, at 316, the duty of all freemen to attend trials to render judgment was relaxed, but there is no indication that criminal trials did not remain public. When certain groups were excused from compelled attendance, see The Statute of Marleborough, 1267, 52 Hen. 3, c. 10; 1 Holdsworth, supra, at 79, and n. 4, the statutory exemption did not prevent them from attending; Lord Coke observed that those excused “are not compellable to come, but left to their own liberty.” 2 E. Coke, Institutes of the Laws of England 121 (6th ed. 1681).<sup>6</sup>

Although there appear to be a few contemporary statements on the subject, reports of the Eyre of Kent, a general court held in 1313–1314, evince a recognition of the importance of public attendance apart from the “jury duty” aspect. It was explained that:

the King’s will was that all evil doers should be punished after their deserts, and that justice should be ministered indifferently to rich as to poor; and for the better accomplishing of this, he prayed the community of the county by their attendance there to lend him their aid in the establishing of a happy and certain peace that should be both for the honour of the realm and for their own welfare. 1 Holdsworth, supra, at 268, quoting from the S.S. edition of the Eyre of Kent, vol. i., p. 2 (emphasis added).

From these early times, although great changes in courts and procedures took place, one thing remained constant: the public character of the trial at which guilt or innocence was decided. Sir Thomas Smith, writing in 1565 about “the definitive proceedings in causes criminall,” explained that, while the indictment was put in writing as in civil law countries:

All the rest is done openlie in the presence of the Judges, the Justices, the enquest, the prisoner, and so manie as will or can come so neare as to heare it, and all depositions and witnesses given aloud, that all men may heare from the mouth of the depositors and witnesses what is saide. T. Smith, De Republica Anglorum 101 (Alston ed. 1972) [emphasis added].

Three centuries later, Sir Frederick Pollock was able to state of the “rule of publicity” that, “[h]ere we have one tradition, at any rate, which has persisted through all changes.” F. Pollock, The Expansion of the Common Law 31–32 (1904). See also E. Jenks, The Book of English Law 73–74 (6th ed. 1967): “[O]ne of the most conspicious-

6. Coke interpreted certain language of an earlier chapter of the same statute as specifically indicating that court proceedings were to be public in nature: “These words [In curia Domini Regis] are of great importance, for all Causes ought to be heard, ordered, and determined before the Judges of the King’s Courts openly in the King’s Courts, wither all persons may resort. * * *” 2 E. Coke, Institutes of the Laws of England 103 (6th ed. 1681) [emphasis added].

uous features of English justice, that all judicial trials are held in open court, to which the public have free access, * * *," appears to have been the rule in England from time immemorial."

We have found nothing to suggest that the presumptive openness of the trial, which English courts were later to call "one of the essential qualities of a court of justice," Daubney v. Cooper, 10 B. & C. 237, 240, 109 Eng.Rep. 438, 440 (K.B.1829), was not also an attribute of the judicial systems of colonial America. In Virginia, for example, such records as there are of early criminal trials indicate that they were open, and nothing to the contrary has been cited. See A. Scott, Criminal Law in Colonial Virginia 128-129 (1930); Reinsch, The English Common Law in the Early American Colonies, in 1 Selected Essays in Anglo-American Legal History 405 (1907). Indeed, when in the mid-1600's the Virginia Assembly felt that the respect due the courts was "by the clamorous unmannerlynes of the people lost, and order, gravity and decoram which should manifest the authority of a court in the court it selfe neglected," the response was not to restrict the openness of the trials to the public, but instead to prescribe rules for the conduct of those attending them. See Scott, supra, at 132.

In some instances, the openness of trials was explicitly recognized as part of the fundamental law of the colony. The 1677 Concessions and Agreements of West New Jersey, for example, provided:

That in all publick courts of justice for tryals of causes, civil or criminal, any person or persons, inhabitants of the said Province may freely come into, and attend the said courts, and hear and be present, at all or any such tryals as shall be there had or passed, that justice may not be done in a corner nor in any covert manner. Reprinted in Sources of Our Liberties 188 (R. Perry ed. 1959). See also 1 B. Schwartz, The Bill of Rights: A Documentary History 129 (1971).

The Pennsylvania Frame of Government of 1682 also provided "[t]hat all courts shall be open * * *," Sources of Our Liberties, supra, at 217; 1 B. Schwartz, supra, at 140, and this declaration was reaffirmed in section 26 of the Constitution adopted by Pennsylvania in 1776. See 1 B. Schwartz, supra, at 271. See also §§ 12 and 76 of the Massachusetts Body of Liberties, 1641, reprinted in 1 Schwartz, supra, at 73, 80.

Other contemporary writings confirm the recognition that part of the very nature of a criminal trial was its openness to those who wished to attend. Perhaps the best indication of this is found in an address to the inhabitants of Quebec which was drafted by a committee consisting of Thomas Cushing, Richard Henry Lee, and John Dickinson and approved by the First Continental Congress on October 26, 1774. 1 Journals of the Continental Congress, 1774-1789, at 101, 105 (1904). This address, written to explain the position of the colonies and to gain the support of the people of Quebec, is an "exposition of the fundamental rights of the colonists, as they were understood by a representative assembly chosen from all the colonies." 1 Schwartz, supra, at 221. Because it was intended for the inhabitants of Quebec, who had been "educated under another form of government" and had only recently become English subjects, it was thought desirable for the Continental Congress to explain "the inestimable advantages of a free English constitution of government, which it is the privilege of all English subjects to enjoy." 1 Journals 106.

[One] great right is that of trial by jury. This provides, that neither life, liberty nor property, can be taken from the possessor, until twelve of his unexceptionable countrymen and peers of his vicinage, who from that neighbourhood may reasonably be supposed to be acquainted with his character, and the characters of the witnesses, upon a fair trial, and full enquiry, face to face, in open Court, before as many of the peo- *ple as chuse to attend, shall pass their sentence upon oath against him. * * * 1 Journals 107 [emphasis added].*

B

As we have shown, and as was shown in both the Court's opinion and the dissent in Gannett, * * * the historical evidence demonstrates conclusively that at the time when our organic laws were adopted, criminal trials both here and in England had long been presumptively open. This is no quirk of history; rather, it has long been recognized as an indispensable attribute of an Anglo-American trial. Both Hale in the 17th century and Blackstone in the 18th saw the importance of openness to the proper functioning of a trial; it gave assurance that the proceedings were conducted fairly to all concerned, and it discouraged perjury, the misconduct of participants, and decisions based on secret bias or partiality. See, e.g., M. Hale, The History of the Common Law of England 343-345 (6th ed. 1820); 3 W. Blackstone, Commentaries * 372-373. Jeremy Bentham not only recognized the therapeutic value of open justice but regarded it as the keystone:

Without publicity, all other checks are insufficient: in comparison of publicity, all other checks are of small account. Recordation, appeal, whatever other institutions might present themselves in the character of checks, would be found to operate rather as cloaks than checks; as cloaks in reality, as checks only in appearance. 1 J. Bentham, Rationale of Judicial Evidence 524 (1827).<sup>7</sup>

Panegyrics on the values of openness were by no means confined to self-praise by the English. Foreign observers of English criminal procedure in the 18th and early 19th centuries came away impressed by the very fact that they had been freely admitted to the courts, as many were not in their own homelands. See L. Radzinowicz, A History of English Criminal Law 715, and n. 96 (1948). They marveled that "the whole juridical procedure passes in public," 2 P.J. Grosley, A Tour to London; or New Observations on England 142 (Nugent trans. 1772), quoted in Radzinowicz, supra, at 717, and one commentator declared that:

The main excellence of the English judicature consists in publicity, in the free trial by jury, and in the extraordinary despatch with which business is transacted. The publicity of their proceedings is indeed astonishing. Free access to the courts is universally granted. C. Goede, A Foreigner's Opinion of England 214 (Horne trans. 1822). [Emphasis added.]

The nexus between openness, fairness, and the perception of fairness was not lost on them:

[T]he judge, the counsel, and the jury, are constantly exposed to public animadversion; and this greatly tends to augment the extraordinary confidence, which the English repose in the administration of justice. Goede, supra, at 215.

This observation raises the important point that "[t]he publicity of a judicial proceeding is a requirement of much broader bearing than its mere effect on the quality of testimony." 6 J. Wigmore, Evidence § 1834, at p. 435 (Chadbourn rev. 1976).<sup>8</sup> The early history of open trials in part reflects the widespread acknowledgment, long before there were behavioral scientists, that public trials had significant community therapeutic value. Even without such experts to frame the concept in words, people sensed from experience and observation that, especially in the administration of criminal justice, the means used to achieve justice must have the support derived from public acceptance of both the process and its results.

7. Bentham also emphasized that open proceedings enhanced the performance of all involved, protected the judge from imputations of dishonesty, and served to educate the public. Id., at 522-525.

8. A collateral aspect seen by Wigmore was the possibility that someone in attendance at the trial or who learns of the proceedings through publicity may be able to furnish evidence in chief or contradict "falsifiers." 6 Wigmore, supra, at 436. Wigmore gives examples of such occurrences. Id., at 436, and n. 2.

When a shocking crime occurs, a community reaction of outrage and public protest often follows. See H. Weihofen, The Urge to Punish 130–131 (1956). Thereafter the open processes of justice serve an important prophylactic purpose, providing an outlet for community concern, hostility, and emotion. Without an awareness that society's responses to criminal conduct are underway, natural human reactions of outrage and protest are frustrated and may manifest themselves in some form of vengeful "self-help," as indeed they did regularly in the activities of vigilante "committees" on our frontiers. "The accusation and conviction or acquittal, as much perhaps as the execution of punishment, operate[] to restore the imbalance which was created by the offense or public charge, to reaffirm the temporarily lost feeling of security, and, perhaps, to satisfy that latent 'urge to punish.'" Mueller, Problems Posed by Publicity to Crime and Criminal Proceedings, 110 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1, 6 (1961).

Civilized societies withdraw both from the victim and the vigilante the enforcement of criminal laws, but they cannot erase from people's consciousness the fundamental, natural yearning to see justice done—or even the urge for retribution. The crucial prophylactic aspects of the administration of justice cannot function in the dark; no community catharsis can occur if justice is "done in a corner [or] in any covert manner." * * * It is not enough to say that results alone will satiate the natural community desire for "satisfaction." A result considered untoward may undermine public confidence, and where the trial has been concealed from public view an unexpected outcome can cause a reaction that the system at best has failed and at worst has been corrupted. To work effectively, it is important that society's criminal process "satisfy the appearance of justice," Offutt v. United States, 348 U.S. 11, 14 (1954), and the appearance of justice can best be provided by allowing people to observe it.

Looking back, we see that when the ancient "town meeting" form of trial became too cumbersome, twelve members of the community were delegated to act as its surrogates, but the community did not surrender its right to observe the conduct of trials. The people retained a "right of visitation" which enabled them to satisfy themselves that justice was in fact being done.

People in an open society do not demand infallibility from their institutions, but it is difficult for them to accept what they are prohibited from observing. When a criminal trial is conducted in the open, there is at least an opportunity both for understanding the system in general and its workings in a particular case:

The educative effect of public attendance is a material advantage. Not only is respect for the law increased and intelligent acquaintance acquired with the methods of government, but a strong confidence in judicial remedies is secured which could never be inspired by a system of secrecy. 6 Wigmore, supra, at 438. See also 1 Bentham, supra, at 525.

In earlier times, both in England and America, attendance at court was a common mode of "passing the time." See, e.g., 6 Wigmore, supra, at 436; Mueller, supra, at 6. With the press, cinema, and electronic media now supplying the representations or reality of the real life drama once available only in the courtroom, attendance at court is no longer a widespread pastime. Yet "[i]t is not unrealistic even in this day to believe that public inclusion affords citizens a form of legal education and hopefully promotes confidence in the fair administration of justice." State v. Schmit * * * 139 N.W.2d 800, 807 (1966). Instead of acquiring information about trials by firsthand observation or by word of mouth from those who attended, people now acquire it chiefly through the print and electronic media. In a sense, this validates the media claim of functioning as surrogates for the public. While media representatives enjoy the same right of access as the public, they often are provided special seating and priority of entry so that they may report what people in attendance have seen and heard. This "contribute[s] to public understanding of the rule of law and to comprehension of the functioning of the entire criminal justice system * * *." Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539, 587, * * * (1976) (Brennan, J., concurring).

C

From this unbroken, uncontradicted history, supported by reasons as valid today as in centuries past, we are bound to conclude that a presumption of openness inheres in the very nature of a criminal trial under our system of justice. This conclusion is hardly novel; without a direct holding on the issue, the Court has voiced its recognition of it in a variety of contexts over the years.<sup>9</sup> Even while holding, in Levine v. United States, 362 U.S. 610 * * * (1960), that a criminal contempt proceeding was not a "criminal prosecution" within the meaning of the Sixth Amendment, the Court was careful to note that more than the Sixth Amendment was involved:

[W]hile the right to a 'public trial' is explicitly guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment only for 'criminal prosecutions,' that provision is a reflection of the notion, deeply rooted in the common law, that 'justice must satisfy the appearance of justice.' * * * [D]ue process demands appropriate regard for the requirements of a public proceeding in cases of criminal contempt * * * as it does for all adjudications through the exercise of the judicial power, barring narrowly limited categories of exceptions * * *. Id., at 616, [citations omitted].<sup>10</sup>

9. "Of course trials must be public and the public have a deep interest in trials." Pennekamp v. Florida, 328 U.S. 331, 361 * * * (1946) (Frankfurter, J., concurring).

"A trial is a public event. What transpires in the court room is public property." Craig v. Harney, 331 U.S. 367, 374 * * * (1947) (Douglas, J.).

"[W]e have been unable to find a single instance of a criminal trial conducted in camera in any federal, state, or municipal court during the history of this country. Nor have we found any record of even one such secret criminal trial in England since abolition of the Court of Star Chamber in 1641, and whether that court ever convicted people secretly is in dispute. * * * This nation's accepted practice of guaranteeing a public trial to an accused has its roots in our English common law heritage. The exact date of its origin is obscure, but it likely evolved long before the settlement of our land as an accompaniment of the ancient institution of jury trial." In re Oliver, 333 U.S. 257, 266, * * * (1948) (Black, J.) (footnotes omitted).

"One of the demands of a democratic society is that the public should know what goes on in courts by being told by the press what happens there, to the end that the public may judge whether our system of criminal justice is fair and right." Maryland v. Baltimore Radio Show, Inc., 338 U.S. 912, 920, * * * (1950) (Frankfurter, J., dissenting from denial of cert.).

"It is true that the public has the right to be informed as to what occurs in its courts, * * * reporters of all media, including television, are always present if they wish to be and are plainly free to report whatever occurs in open court * * *." Estes v. Texas, 381 U.S. 532, 541-542 * * * (1965) (Clark, J.); see also id., at 583-584, * * * (Warren, C.), concurring). (The Court ruled, however, that the televising of the criminal trial over the defendant's objections violated his due process right to a fair trial.)

"The principle that justice cannot survive behind walls of silence has long been reflected in the 'Anglo-American distrust for secret trials'" Sheppard v. Maxwell, 384 U.S. 333, 349 * * * (1966) (Clark, J.).

10. The Court went on to hold that, "on the particular circumstances of the case," 362 U.S., at 616 * * *, the accused could not complain on appeal of the "so-called 'secrecy' of the proceedings," id., at 617 * * *, because, with counsel present, he had failed to object or to request the judge to open the courtroom at the time.

And recently in Gannett Co., Inc. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368 * * * (1979), both the majority, 443 U.S., at 384, 386, n. 15 * * *, and dissenting opinions, 443 U.S., at 423 * * *, agreed that open trials were part of the common law tradition.

Despite the history of criminal trials being presumptively open since long before the Constitution, the State presses its contention that neither the Constitution nor the Bill of Rights contains any provision which by its terms guarantees to the public the right to attend criminal trials. Standing alone, this is correct, but there remains the question whether, absent an explicit provision, the Constitution affords protection against exclusion of the public from criminal trials.

III. A

The First Amendment, in conjunction with the Fourteenth, prohibits governments from "abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." These expressly guaranteed freedoms share a common core purpose of assuring freedom of communication on matters relating to the functioning of government. Plainly it would be difficult to single out any aspect of government of higher concern and importance to the people than the manner in which criminal trials are conducted; as we have shown, recognition of this pervades the centuries-old history of open trials and the opinions of this Court. * * *

The Bill of Rights was enacted against the backdrop of the long history of trials being presumptively open. Public access to trials was then regarded as an important aspect of the process itself; the conduct of trials "before as many of the people as chuse to attend" was regarded as one of "the inestimable advantages of a free English constitution of government." 1 Journals of the Continental Congress, * * * at 106, 107. In guaranteeing freedoms such as those of speech and press, the First Amendment can be read as protecting the right of everyone to attend trials so as to give meaning to those explicit guarantees. "[T]he First Amendment goes beyond protection of the press and the self-expression of individuals to prohibit government from limiting the stock of information from which members of the public may draw." First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 783 * * * (1978). Free speech carries with it some freedom to listen. "In a variety of contexts this Court has referred to a First Amendment right to 'receive information and ideas.'" Kleindienst v. Mandel, 408 U.S. 753, 762 * * * (1972). What this means in the context of trials is that the First Amendment guarantees of speech and press, standing alone, prohibit government from summarily closing courtroom doors which had long been open to the public at the time that amendment was adopted. "For the First Amendment does not speak equivocally. * * * It must be taken as a command of the broadest scope that explicit language, read in the context of a liberty-loving society, will allow." Bridges v. California, 314 U.S. 252, 263 * * * (1941).

It is not crucial whether we describe this right to attend criminal trials to hear, see, and communicate observations concerning them as a "right of access," cf. Gannett, supra, 443 U.S., at 397 * * * (Powell, J., concurring); Saxbe v. Washington Post Co., 417 U.S. 843 * * * (1974); Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817 * * * (1974),<sup>11</sup> or a "right to gather information,"

11. Procunier and Saxbe, supra, are distinguishable in the sense that they were concerned with penal institutions which, by definition, are not "open" or public places. Penal institutions do not share the long tradition of openness, although traditionally there have been visiting committees of citizens, and there is no doubt that legislative committees could exercise plenary oversight and "visitation rights." Saxbe, supra, 417 for we have recognized that "without some protection for seeking out the news, freedom of the press could be eviscerated." Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665, 681 * * * (1972). The explicit, guaranteed rights to speak and to publish concerning what takes place at a trial would lose much meaning if access to observe the trial could, as it was here, be foreclosed arbitrarily.<sup>12</sup>

B

The right of access to places traditionally open to the public, as criminal trials have long been, may be seen as assured by the amalgam of the First Amendment guarantees of speech and press; and their affinity to the right of assembly is not without relevance. From the outset, the right of assembly was regarded not only as an independent right but also as a catalyst to augment the free exercise of the other First Amendment rights with which it was deliberately linked by the draftsmen. "The right of peaceable assembly is a right cognate to those of free speech and free press and is equally fundamental." De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353, 364 * * * (1937). People assemble in public places not only to speak or to take action, but also to listen, observe, and learn; indeed, they may "assembl[e] for any lawful purpose," Hague v. CIO, 307 U.S. 496, 519 * * * (1939) (opinion of Stone, J.). Subject to the traditional time, place, and manner restrictions [see, e.g., Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U.S. 569, * * * (1941)], * * * a trial courtroom also is a public place where the people generally—and representatives of the media—have a right to be present, and where their presence historically has been thought to enhance the integrity and quality of what takes place.

C

The State argues that the Constitution nowhere spells out a guarantee for the right of the public to attend trials, and that accordingly no such right is protected. The possibility that such a contention could be made did not escape the notice of the Constitution's draftsmen; they were concerned that some important rights might be thought disparaged because not specifically guaranteed. It was even argued that because of this danger no Bill of Rights should be adopted. See, e.g., A. Hamilton, The Federalist no. 84. In a letter to Thomas Jefferson in October of 1788, James Madison explained why he, although "in favor of a bill of rights," had "not viewed it in an important light" up to that time: "I conceive that in a certain degree * * * the rights in question are reserved by the manner in which the federal powers are granted." He went on to state "there is great reason to fear that a positive declaration of some of the most essential rights could not be obtained in the requisite latitude." 5 Writings of James Madison 271 (Hunt ed. 1904).

But arguments such as the State makes have not precluded recognition of important rights not enumerated. Notwithstanding the appropriate caution against reading into the Constitution rights not explicitly defined, the Court has acknowledged that certain unarticulated rights are implicit in enumerated guarantees. For example, the rights of association and of privacy, the right to be presumed innocent and the right to be judged by a standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt in a criminal trial, as well as the right to travel, appear nowhere in the Constitution or Bill of Rights. Yet these important but unarticulated rights have nonetheless been found to share constitutional protection in common with explicit guarantees.<sup>16</sup> The concerns expressed by Madison and others have thus been resolved; fundamental rights, even though not expressly guaranteed, have been recognized by the Court as indispensable to the enjoyment of rights explicitly defined.

U.S., at 849. * * * noted that "limitation on visitations is justified by what the Court of Appeals acknowledged as 'the truism that prisons are institutions where public access is generally limited.' * * * [Washington Post Co. v. Kleindienst (D.C.Cir.) 494 F.2d [994], at 999. See Adderley v. Florida, 385 U.S. 39, 41 * * * (1966) [jails]." See also Greer v. Spock, 424 U.S. 828 * * * (1976) (military bases.)

12. That the right to attend may be exercised by people less frequently today when information as to trials generally reaches them by way of print and electronic media in no way alters the basic right. Instead of relying on personal observation or reports from neighbors as in the past, most people receive information concerning trials through the media whose representatives "are entitled to the same rights [to attend trials] as the general public." Estes v. Texas, supra, 381 U.S., at 540.

We hold that the right to attend criminal trials<sup>17</sup> is implicit in the guarantees of the First Amendment; without the freedom to attend such trials, which people have exercised for centuries, important aspects of freedom of speech and "of the press could be eviscerated." Branzburg, supra, 408 U.S., at 681. * * *

D

Having concluded there was a guaranteed right of the public under the First and Fourteenth Amendments to attend the trial of Stevenson's case, we return to the closure order challenged by appellants. The Court in Gannett * * * made clear that although the Sixth Amendment guarantees the accused a right to a public trial, it does not give a right to a private trial. 443 U.S., at 382. * * * Despite the fact that this was the fourth trial of the accused, the trial judge made no findings to support closure; no inquiry was made as to whether alternative solutions would have met the need to ensure fairness; there was no recognition of any right under the Constitution for the public or press to attend the trial. In contrast to the pretrial proceeding dealt with in Gannett, * * * there exist in the context of the trial itself various tested alternatives to satisfy the constitutional demands of fairness. See, e.g. Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart, 427 U.S., at 563-565, * * * Sheppard v. Maxwell, 384 U.S., at 357-362 * * *. There was no suggestion that any problems with witnesses could not have been dealt with by their exclusion from the courtroom or their sequestration during the trial. See Sheppard v. Maxwell, 384 U.S., at 359. * * * Nor is there anything to indicate that sequestration of the jurors would not have guarded against their being subjected to any improper information. All of the alternatives admittedly present difficulties for trial courts, but none of the factors relied on here was beyond the realm of the manageable. Absent an overriding interest articulated in findings, the trial of a criminal case must be open to the public.<sup>18</sup>

16. See, e.g., NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449 * * * (1958) (right of association); Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 * * * (1965), and Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 * * * (1969) (right to privacy); Estelle v. Williams, 425 U.S. 501, 503 * * * (1976), and Taylor v. Kentucky, 436 U.S. 478, 483-486 * * * (1978) (presumption of innocence); In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358 * * * (1970) (standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt); United States v. Guest, 383 U.S. 745, 757-759 * * * (1966), and Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618, 630 * * * (1969) (right to interstate travel).

17. Whether the public has a right to attend trials of civil cases is a question not raised by this case, but we note that historically both civil and criminal trials have been presumptively open.

18. We have no occasion here to define the circumstances in which all or parts of a criminal trial may be closed to the public, cf., e.g., 6 J. Wigmore, Evidence § 1835 (Chadbourn rev. 1876), but our holding today does not mean that the First Amendment rights of the public and representatives of the press are absolute. Just as a government may impose reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions upon the use of its streets in the interest of such objectives as the free flow of traffic [see, e.g., Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U.S. 569 * * * (1941)], so may a trial judge, in the interest of the fair administration of justice, impose reasonable limitations on access to a trial. "[T]he question in a particular case is whether that control is exerted so as not to deny or unwarrantedly abridge * * * the opportunities for the communication of thought and the discussion of public questions immemorially associated with resort to public places." Id., at 574. * * * It is far more important

Accordingly, the judgment under review is reversed.

Reversed.

* * *

Justice WHITE, concurring.

This case would have been unnecessary had Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368 * * * (1979), construed the Sixth Amendment to forbid excluding the public from criminal proceedings except in narrowly defined circumstances. But the Court there rejected the submission of four of us to this effect, thus requiring that the First Amendment issue involved here be addressed. On this issue, I concur in the opinion of The Chief Justice.

Justice STEVENS, concurring.

* * * Until today the Court has accorded virtually absolute protection to the dissemination of information or ideas, but never before has it squarely held that the acquisition of newsworthy matter is entitled to any constitutional protection whatsoever. An additional word of emphasis is therefore appropriate.

Twice before, the Court has implied that any governmental restriction on access to information, no matter how severe and no matter how unjustified, would be constitutionally acceptable so long as it did not single out the press for special disabilities not applicable to the public at large. In a dissent joined by Justice Brennan and Justice Marshall in Saxbe v. Washington Post Co., 417 U.S. 843, 850 * *, Justice Powell unequivocally rejected the conclusion "that any governmental restriction of press access to information, so long as it is nondiscriminatory, falls outside the purview of First Amendment concern." Id., at 857 * * * [emphasis in original]. And in Houchins v. KQED, Inc., 438 U.S. 1, 19-40 * * *, I explained, at length why Justice Brennan, Justice Powell, and I were convinced that "[a]n official prison policy of concealing * * * knowledge from the public by arbitrarily cutting off the flow of information at its source abridges the freedom of speech and of the press protected by the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution." Id., at 38, * * *. Since Justice Marshall and Justice Blackmun were unable to participate in that case, a majority of the Court neither accepted nor rejected that conclusion or the contrary conclusion expressed in the prevailing opinions.<sup>1</sup> Today, however, for the first time, the Court unequivocally holds that an arbitrary interference with access to important information is an abridgment of the freedoms of speech and of the press protected by the First Amendment.

It is somewhat ironic that the Court should find more reason to recognize a right of access today than it did in Houchins. For Houchins involved the plight of a segment of society least able to protect itself, an attack on a longstanding policy of concealment, and an absence of any legitimate justification for abridging public access to information about how government operates. In this case we are pro-that trials be conducted in a quiet and orderly setting than it is to preserve that atmosphere on city streets. Compare, e.g., Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77 * * * (1949), with Illinois v. Allen, 397 U.S. 337 * * * (1970), and Estes v. Texas, 381 U.S. 532 * * * (1965). Moreover, since courtrooms have limited capacity, there may be occasions when not every person who wishes to attend can be accommodated. In such situations, reasonable restrictions on general access are traditionally imposed, including preferential seating for media representatives. Cf. Gannett, 443 U.S., at 397-398 * * * (Powell, J., concurring); Houchins v. KQED, Inc., 438 U.S. 1, 17 * * * (1978) (Stewart, J., concurring); id., at 32, * * * (Stevens, J., dissenting).

---

1. "Neither the First Amendment nor the Fourteenth Amendment mandates a right of access to government information or sources of information within the government's control." 438 U.S., at 15, * * * (opinion of Burger, C.J.).

"The First and Fourteenth Amendments do not guarantee the public a right of access to information generated or controlled by government * * *. The Constitution does no more than assure the public and the press equal access once government has opened its doors." Id., at 16, * * * (Stewart, J., concurring).

protecting the interests of the most powerful voices in the community, we are concerned with an almost unique exception to an established tradition of openness in the conduct of criminal trials, and it is likely that the closure order was motivated by the judge's desire to protect the individual defendant from the burden of a fourth criminal trial.<sup>2</sup>

In any event, for the reasons stated in Part II of my Houchins opinion, 438 U.S., at 30-38, * * * as well as those stated by The Chief Justice today, I agree that the First Amendment protects the public and the press from abridgment of their rights of access to information about the operation of their government, including the Judicial Branch; given the total absence of any record justification for the closure order entered in this case, that order violated the First Amendment.

Justice BRENNAN, with whom Justice Marshall joins, concurring in the judgment.

Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368 * * * (1979), held that the Sixth Amendment right to a public trial was personal to the accused, conferring no right of access to pretrial proceedings that is separately enforceable by the public or the press. The instant case raises the question whether the First Amendment, of its own force and as applied to the States through the Fourteenth Amendment, secures the public an independent right of access to trial proceedings. Because I believe that the First Amendment—of itself and as applied to the States through the Fourteenth Amendment—secures such a public right of access, I agree with those of my Brethren who hold that, without more, agreement of the trial judge and the parties cannot constitutionally close a trial to the public.<sup>1</sup>

While freedom of expression is made inviolate by the First Amendment, and, with only rare and stringent exceptions, may not be suppressed, * * *, the First Amendment has not been viewed by the Court in all settings as providing an equally categorical assurance of the correlative freedom of access to information. * * * Yet the Court has not ruled out a public access component to the First Amendment in every circumstance. Read with care and in context, our decisions must therefore be understood as holding only that any privilege of access to governmental information is subject to a degree of restraint dictated by the nature of the information and countervailing interests in security or confidentiality. * * * These

2. Neither that likely motivation nor facts showing the risk that a fifth trial would have been necessary without closure of the fourth are disclosed in this record, however. The absence of any articulated reason for the closure order is a sufficient basis for distinguishing this case from Gannett v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368. * * * The decision today is in no way inconsistent with the perfectly unambiguous holding in Gannett that the rights guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment are rights that may be asserted by the accused rather than members of the general public. In my opinion the Framers quite properly identified the party who has the greatest interest in the right to a public trial. The language of the Sixth Amendment is worth emphasizing:

"In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defense." U.S. Const.Amdt. VI. (Emphasis added.)

1. Of course, the Sixth Amendment remains the source of the accused's own right to insist upon public judicial proceedings. Gannett Co. v. DePasquale. * * *

That the Sixth Amendment explicitly establishes a public trial right does not impliedly foreclose the derivation of such a right from other provisions of the Constitution. The Constitution was not framed as a work of carpentry, in which all joints must fit snugly without overlapping. Of necessity, a document that designs a form of government will address central political concerns from a variety of perspectives. Significantly, this Court has recognized the open trial right both as a matter of the Sixth Amendment and as an ingredient in Fifth Amendment due process. * * * cases neither comprehensively nor absolutely deny that public access to information may at times be implied by the First Amendment and the principles which animate it.

The Court's approach in right of access cases simply reflects the special nature of a claim of First Amendment right to gather information. Customarily, First Amendment guarantees are interposed to protect communication between speaker and listener. When so employed against prior restraints, free speech protections are almost insurmountable. * * *. But the First Amendment embodies more than a commitment to free expression and communicative interchange for their own sakes; it has a structural role to play in securing and fostering our republican system of self-government. * * *. Implicit in this structural role is not only "the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open," New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 270 * * * (1964), but the antecedent assumption that valuable public debate—as well as other civic behavior—must be informed. The structural model links the First Amendment to that process of communication necessary for a democracy to survive, and thus entails solicitude not only for communication itself, but for the indispensable conditions of meaningful communication.

However, because "the stretch of this protection is theoretically endless," * * *, it must be invoked with discrimination and temperance. For so far as the participating citizen's need for information is concerned, "[t]here are few restrictions on action which could not be clothed by ingenious argument in the garb of decreased data flow." Zemel v. Rusk, * * *, 381 U.S., at 16–17. * * * An assertion of the prerogative to gather information must accordingly be assayed by considering the information sought and the opposing interests invaded.

This judicial task is as much a matter of sensitivity to practical necessities as it is of abstract reasoning. But at least two helpful principles may be sketched. First, the case for a right of access has special force when drawn from an enduring and vital tradition of public entree to particular proceedings or information. * * * Such a tradition commands respect in part because the Constitution carries the gloss of history. More importantly, a tradition of accessibility implies the favorable judgment of experience. Second, the value of access must be measured in specifics. Analysis is not advanced by rhetorical statements that all information bears upon public issues; what is crucial in individual cases is whether access to a particular government process is important in terms of that very process.

To resolve the case before us, therefore, we must consult historical and current practice with respect to open trials, and weigh the importance of public access to the trial process itself. * * *

Tradition, contemporaneous state practice, and this Court's own decisions manifest a common understanding that "[a] trial is a public event. What transpires in the court room is public property." Craig v. Harney, 331 U.S. 367, 374 * * * (1947). As a matter of law and virtually immemorial custom, public trials have been the essentially unwavering rule in ancestral England and in our own Nation. See In re Oliver, supra, 333 U.S., at 266–268 * * *; Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, * * *, 443 U.S., at 386, n. 15, * * * at 418–432, and n. 11, * * * (Blackmun, J., concurring and dissenting). Such abiding adherence to the principle of open trials "reflect[s] a profound judgment about the way in which law should be enforced and justice administered." Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145, 155 * * * (1968).

Publicity serves to advance several of the particular purposes of the trial (and, indeed, the judicial) process. Open trials play a fundamental role in furthering the efforts of our judicial system to assure the criminal defendant a fair and accurate adjudication of guilt or innocence. * * * But, as a feature of our governing system of justice, the trial process serves other, broadly political, interests, and public access advances these objectives as well. To that extent, trial access possesses specific structural significance.

The trial is a means of meeting "the notion, deeply rooted in the common law, that 'justice must satisfy the appearance of justice.'" Levine v. United States, 362 U.S. 610, 616, * * * (1960), quoting Offutt v. United States, 348 U.S. 11, 14, * * * (1954); * * *. For a civilization founded upon principles of ordered liberty to survive and flourish, its members must share the conviction that they are governed equitably. That necessity underlies constitutional provisions as diverse as the rule against takings without just compensation * * * and the Equal Protection Clause. It also mandates a system of justice that demonstrates the fairness of the law to our citizens. One major function of the trial, hedged with procedural protections and conducted with conspicuous respect for the rule of law, is to make that demonstration. See In re Oliver, 333 U.S., at 270, n. 24. * * *

Secrecy is profoundly inimical to this demonstrative purpose of the trial process. Open trials assure the public that procedural rights are respected, and that justice is afforded equally. Closed trials breed suspicion of prejudice and arbitrariness, which in turn spawns disrespect for law. Public access is essential, therefore, if trial adjudication is to achieve the objective of maintaining public confidence in the administration of justice. See Gannett, supra, 443 U.S. at 428-429 * * * (Blackmun, J., concurring and dissenting).

But the trial is more than a demonstrably just method of adjudicating disputes and protecting rights. It plays a pivotal role in the entire judicial process, and, by extension, in our form of government. Under our system, judges are not mere umpires, but, in their own sphere, lawmakers—a coordinate branch of government. While individual cases turn upon the controversies between parties, or involve particular prosecutions, court rulings impose official and practical consequences upon members of society at large. Moreover, judges bear responsibility for the vitally important task of construing and securing constitutional rights. Thus, so far as the trial is the mechanism for judicial factfinding, as well as the initial forum for legal decisionmaking, it is a genuine governmental proceeding.

It follows that the conduct of the trial is preeminently a matter of public interest. * * * More importantly, public access to trials acts as an important check, akin in purpose to the other checks and balances that infuse our system of government.

* * *

Finally, with some limitations, a trial aims at true and accurate factfinding. Of course, proper factfinding is to the benefit of criminal defendants and of the parties in civil proceedings. But other, comparably urgent, interests are also often at stake. A miscarriage of justice that imprisons an innocent accused also leaves a guilty party at large, a continuing threat to society. Also, mistakes of fact in civil litigation may inflict costs upon others than the plaintiff and defendant. Facilitation of the trial factfinding process, therefore, is of concern to the public as well as to the parties.<sup>21</sup>

Publicizing trial proceedings aids accurate factfinding. "Public trials come to the attention of key witnesses unknown to the parties." In re Oliver, supra, at 270, n. 24.

21. Further, the interest in insuring that the innocent are not punished may be shared by the general public, in addition to the accused himself.

* * * Shrewd legal observers have averred that open examination of witnesses viva voce, in the presence of all mankind, is much more conducive to the clearing up of truth, than the private and secret examination * * * where a witness may frequently depose that in private, which he will be ashamed to testify in a public and solemn tribunal. 3 Blackstone, Commentaries, * 373. * * *. And experience has borne out these assertions about the truthfinding role of publicity. * * *

Popular attendance at trials, in sum, substantially furthers the particular public purposes of that critical judicial proceeding.<sup>22</sup> In that sense, public access is an indispensable element of the trial process itself. Trial access, therefore, assumes structural importance in our "government of laws," Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch 137, 163, 2 L.Ed. 60 (1803).

As previously noted, resolution of First Amendment public access claims in individual cases must be strongly influenced by the weight of historical practice and by an assessment of the specific structural value of public access in the circumstances. With regard to the case at hand, our ingrained tradition of public trials and the importance of public access to the broader purposes of the trial process, tip the balance strongly toward the rule that trials be open. What countervailing interests might be sufficiently compelling to reverse this presumption of openness need not concern us now,<sup>24</sup> for the statute at stake here authorizes trial closures at the unfettered discretion of the judge and parties.<sup>25</sup> Accordingly, Va.Code 19.2-266 violates the First and Fourteenth Amendments, and the decision of the Virginia Supreme Court to the contrary should be reversed.

Justice STEWART, concurring in the judgment.

In Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368, * * * the Court held that the Sixth Amendment, which guarantees "the accused" the right to a public trial, does not confer upon representatives of the press or members of the general public any right of access to a trial.<sup>1</sup> But the Court explicitly left open the question whether such a right of access may be guaranteed by other provisions of the Constitution, id., at 391-393. * * * Justice Powell expressed the view that the First and Fourteenth Amendments do extend at least a limited right of access even to pretrial suppression hearings in criminal cases, id., at 397-403, * * * (concurring opinion). Justice Rehnquist expressed a contrary view, id., at 403-406 * * * (concurring opinion). The remaining members of the Court were silent on the question.

Whatever the ultimate answer to that question may be with respect to pretrial suppression hearings in criminal cases, the

22. In advancing these purposes, the availability of a trial transcript is no substitute for a public presence at the trial itself. As any experienced appellate judge can attest, the "cold" record is a very imperfect reproduction of events that transpire in the courtroom. Indeed, to the extent that publicity serves as a check upon trial officials, "[r]ecordation * * * would be found to operate rather as a cloak[] than check[]; as cloak[] in reality, as check[] only in appearance." In re Oliver, supra, 333 U.S., at 271, * * *, quoting 1 Bentham, Rationale of Judicial Evidence 524 (1827); see Bentham, * * * at 577-578.

24. For example, national security concerns about confidentiality may sometimes warrant closures during sensitive portions of trial proceedings, such as testimony about state secrets. Cf. United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 714-716 * * * (1974).

25. Significantly, closing a trial lacks even the justification for barring the door to pretrial hearings: the necessity of preventing dissemination of suppressible prejudicial evidence to the public before the jury pool has become, in a practical sense, finite and subject to sequestration.

1. The Court also made clear that the Sixth Amendment does not give the accused the right to a private trial. 443 U.S., at 382 * * *. Compare Singer v. United States, 380 U.S. 24, * * * (Sixth Amendment right of trial by jury does not include right to be tried without a jury.)

First and Fourteenth Amendments clearly give the press and the public a right of access to trials themselves, civil as well as criminal. As has been abundantly demonstrated in Part II of the opinion of The Chief Justice, in Justice Brennan's concurring opinion, and in Justice Blackmun's dissenting opinion last Term in the Gannett case, 443 U.S., at 406, * * *, it has for centuries been a basic presupposition of the Anglo-American legal system that trials shall be public trials. The opinions referred to also convincingly explain the many good reasons why this is so. With us, a trial is by every definition a proceeding open to the press and to the public.

In conspicuous contrast to a military base, Greer v. Spock, 424 U.S. 828; * * * a jail, Adderley v. Florida, 385 U.S. 39; * * * or a prison, Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817, * * * a trial courtroom is a public place. Even more than city streets, sidewalks, and parks as areas of traditional First Amendment activity, e.g., Shuttlesworth v. Birmingham, 394 U.S. 147, * * *, a trial courtroom is a place where representatives of the press and of the public are not only free to be, but where their presence serves to assure the integrity of what goes on.

But this does not mean that the First Amendment right of members of the public and representatives of the press to attend civil and criminal trials is absolute. Just as a legislature may impose reasonable time, place and manner restrictions upon the exercise of First Amendment freedoms, so may a trial judge impose reasonable limitations upon the unrestricted occupation of a courtroom by representatives of the press and members of the public. * * *

Much more than a city street, a trial courtroom must be a quiet and orderly place. * * *. Moreover, every courtroom has a finite physical capacity, and there may be occasions when not all who wish to attend a trial may do so.<sup>3</sup> And while there exist many alternative ways to satisfy the constitutional demands of a fair trial,<sup>4</sup> those demands may also sometimes justify limitations upon the unrestricted presence of spectators in the courtroom.<sup>5</sup>

Since in the present case the trial judge appears to have given no recognition to the right of representatives of the press and members of the public to be present at the Virginia murder trial over which he was presiding, the judgment under review must be reversed.

It is upon the basis of these principles that I concur in the judgment.

Justice BLACKMUN, concurring in the judgment.

My opinion and vote in partial dissent last Term in Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, * * *, compels my vote to reverse the judgment of the Supreme Court of Virginia.

The decision in this case is gratifying for me for two reasons:

It is gratifying, first, to see the Court now looking to and relying upon legal history in determining the fundamental public character of the criminal trial. * * * The partial dissent in Gannett, * * * took great pains in assembling—I believe adequately—the historical material and in stressing its importance to this area of the law. * * * Although the Court in Gannett gave a modicum of lip service to legal history, * * * it denied its obvious application when the defense and the prosecution, with no resistance by the trial judge, agreed that the proceeding should be closed.

3. In such situations, representatives of the press must be assured access. Houchins v. KQED, Inc., 438 U.S. 1, 16 * * * (concurring opinion).

4. Such alternatives include sequestration of juries, continuances, and changes of venue.

5. This is not to say that only constitutional considerations can justify such restrictions. The preservation of trade secrets, for example, might justify the exclusion of the public from at least some segments of a civil trial. And the sensibilities of a youthful prosecution witness, for example, might justify similar exclusion in a criminal trial for rape, so long as the defendant's Sixth Amendment right to a public trial were not impaired. See, e.g., Stamicarbon, N.V. v. American Cyanamid Co., 506 F.2d 532, 539-542 (CA2 1974).

The court's return to history is a welcome change in direction.

It is gratifying, second, to see the Court wash away at least some of the graffiti that marred the prevailing opinions in Gannett. No less than 12 times in the primary opinion in that case, the Court (albeit in what seems now to have become clear dicta) observed that its Sixth Amendment closure ruling applied to the trial itself. The author of the first concurring opinion was fully aware of this and would have restricted the Court's observations and ruling to the suppression hearing. Id., at 394 * * *. Nonetheless, he joined the Court's opinion, ibid., with its multiple references to the trial itself; the opinion was not a mere concurrence in the Court's judgment. And Justice Rehnquist, in his separate concurring opinion, quite understandably observed, as a consequence, that the Court was holding "without qualification," that "'members of the public have no constitutional right under the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments to attend criminal trials,'" id., at 403, * * * quoting from the primary opinion, id., at 391 * * *. The resulting confusion among commentators<sup>1</sup> and journalists<sup>2</sup> was not surprising.

The Court's ultimate ruling in Gannett, with such clarification as is provided by the opinions in this case today, apparently is now to the effect that there is no Sixth Amendment right on the part of the public—or the press—to an open hearing on a motion to suppress. I, of course, continue to believe that Gannett was in error, both in its interpretation of the Sixth Amendment generally, and in its application to the suppression hearing, for I remain convinced that the right to a public trial is to be found where the Constitution explicitly placed it—in the Sixth Amendment.<sup>3</sup>

Having said all this, and with the Sixth Amendment set to one side in this case, I am driven to conclude, as a secondary position, that the First Amendment must provide some measure of protection for public access to the trial. The opinion in partial dissent in Gannett explained that the public has an intense need and a deserved right to know about the administration of justice in general; about the prosecution of local crimes in particular; about the conduct of the judge, the prosecutor, defense counsel, police officers, other public servants, and all the actors in the judicial arena; and about the trial itself. * * * It is clear and obvious to me, on the approach the Court has chosen to take, that, by closing this criminal trial, the trial judge abridged these First Amendment interests of the public.

1. See, e.g., Stephenson, Fair Trial-Free Press: Rights in Continuing Conflict, 46 Brooklyn L.Rev. 39, 63 (1979) ("intended reach of the majority opinion is unclear" [footnote omitted]); The Supreme Court, 1978 Term, 93 Harv.L.Rev. 60, 65 (1979) ("widespread uncertainty over what the Court held"); Note, 51 Colo.L.Rev. 425, 432-433 (1980) ("Gannett can be interpreted to sanction the closing of trials"; citing "the uncertainty of the language in Gannett," and its "ambiguous sixth amendment holding"); Note, 11 Tex.Tech.L.Rev. 159, 170-171 (1979) ("perhaps much of the present and imminent confusion lies in the Court's own statement of its holding"); Borow and Kruth, Closed Preliminary Hearings, 55 Calif.State Bar.J. 18, 23 (1980) ("Despite the public disclaimers * * *, the majority holding appears to embrace the right of access to trials as well as pretrial hearings"); Goodale, Gannett Means What it Says; But Who Knows What it Says?, Nat'l Law J., Oct. 15, 1979, at 20; see also Keefe, The Boner Called Gannett, 66 A.B.A.J. 227 (1980).

2. The press—perhaps the segment of society most profoundly affected by Gannett—has called the Court's decision "cloudy," Birmingham Post-Herald, Aug. 21, 1979, at A4; "confused," Chicago Sun-Times, Sept. 20, 1979, at 56 (cartoon); "incoherent," Baltimore Sun, Sept. 22, 1979, at A14; "mushy," Washington Post, Aug. 10, 1979, at A15; and a "muddle," Time, Sept. 17, 1979, at 82, and %Newsweek, Aug. 27, 1979, at 69.

3. I shall not again seek to demonstrate the errors of analysis in the Court's opinion in Gannett. I note, however, that the very existence of the present case illustrates the utter fallacy of thinking, in this context, that "the public interest is fully protected by the participants in the litigation." Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368, 384 * * * (1979). * * *

I also would reverse, and I join the judgment of the Court.

Justice REHNQUIST, dissenting.

In the Gilbert & Sullivan operetta Iolanthe, the Lord Chancellor recites:

The Law is the true embodiment of everything that's excellent,
It has no kind of fault or flaw,
And I, my lords, embody the law.

It is difficult not to derive more than a little of this flavor from the various opinions supporting the judgment in this case.

* * *

For the reasons stated in my separate concurrence in Gannett Co., Inc. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368, 403 * * * (1979), I do not believe that either the First or Sixth Amendments, as made applicable to the States by the Fourteenth, require that a State's reasons for denying public access to a trial, where both the prosecuting attorney and the defendant have consented to an order of closure approved by the judge, are subject to any additional constitutional review at our hands. And I most certainly do not believe that the Ninth Amendment confers upon us any such power to review orders of state trial judges closing trials in such situations. * *

We have at present 50 state judicial systems and one federal judicial system in the United States, and our authority to reverse a decision by the highest court of the State is limited to only those occasions when the state decision violates some provision of the United States Constitution. And that authority should be exercised with a full sense that the judges whose decisions we review are making the same effort as we to uphold the Constitution. As said by Justice Jackson, concurring in the result in Brown v. Allen, 344 U.S. 443, 540 * * * "We are not final because we are infallible, but we are infallible only because we are final."

The proper administration of justice in any nation is bound to be a matter of the highest concern to all thinking citizens. But to gradually rein in, as this Court has done over the past generation, all of the ultimate decisionmaking power over how justice shall be administered, not merely in the federal system but in each of the 50 States, is a task that no Court consisting of nine persons, however gifted, is equal to. Nor is it desirable that such authority be exercised by such a tiny numerical fragment of the 220 million people who compose the population of this country. In the same concurrence just quoted, Justice Jackson accurately observed that "[t]he generalities of the Fourteenth Amendment are so indeterminate as to what state actions are forbidden that this Court has found it a ready instrument, in one field or another, to magnify federal, and incidentally its own, authority over the states." Id., at 534. * * *

However, high minded the impulses which originally spawned this trend may have been, and which impulses have been accentuated since the time Justice Jackson wrote, it is basically unhealthy to have so much authority concentrated in a small group of lawyers who have been appointed to the Supreme Court and enjoy virtual life tenure. Nothing in the reasoning of Chief Justice Marshall in Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 2 L.Ed. 60 (1803) requires that this Court through ever broadening use of the Supremacy Clause smother a healthy pluralism which would ordinarily exist in a national government embracing 50 States.

* * *

---

THE POST-RICHMOND SCENE

1. While lawyers and courts have interpreted Richmond Newspapers as granting only a qualified news-gathering right, reporters, editors, and publishers, where their professional organizations have spoken for them, interpret the case as a generalized right of access to news.<sup>51</sup> These journalistic surrogates, who may not represent the rank and file in their optimism, are also prepared to balance a broad social value, free press, against the more personal and individual value of fair trial, an approach to balancing that jurists have faulted for its predetermined outcomes at least since Dean Roscoe Pound.<sup>52</sup>

This is not to underestimate journalism's commitment to and the public's need for open governmental processes. Given that more than 90 percent of all criminal prosecutions don't get past their pretrial phases, public attendance would seem to be crucial if indeed the public is to monitor, discuss, evaluate, and scrutinize its judicial institutions. Suppression hearings are decisive in the prosecution of crime.

It is difficult to assess the influence and the authority of Richmond. A 1981-82 survey of state standards for dealing with motions to clear the courtroom or seal records in order to avoid potential harm to defendants revealed the following tests in use: substantial probability of irreparable harm, the plurality standard of the Court in Richmond (California, Michigan, Missouri, North Dakota, and the Eighth Circuit); reasonable probability (New York); some showing of or likelihood of jeopardy (Washington); finding of facts clearly demonstrating jeopardy to fair trial (D.C. Circuit); substantial likelihood (Connecticut and U.S. Department of Justice Guidelines on Open Judicial Proceedings, Oct. 4, 1980); strong likelihood (New York); extreme likelihood (Florida); serious and imminent threat (Florida and Rhode Island); clear showing of a serious and imminent threat (New Jersey); irreparable injury (Third Circuit); strictly and inescapably necessary (Ninth Circuit); clear likelihood of irreparable damage (West Virginia); magnitude and imminence of threatened harm (First Circuit); clear and present danger (Wyoming, Colorado, and Kansas); and clear and convincing evidence of a clear and present danger (Georgia).<sup>53</sup> The Georgia test is more stringent than that of the Supreme Court and would be the test of choice of the press. But obviously there is no uniformity of standards among or within states, and state appellate courts may find their language in state constitutions, state statutes, and state common law.

The U.S. Judicial Conference's Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure at one time proposed amendments to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure that for purposes of prior restraint and closure would require only a "reasonable likelihood" test. (See Judicial Conference Guidelines, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1897, 1980.) It was later deleted.

News media should never expect any absolute right to attend all portions of trials and pretrial hearings. Judges are still a commanding presence in their courtrooms. Parts of trials have been closed in a number of states since Richmond, although it appears easier to defeat closure motions designed to protect trials or post-trial hearings than those aimed at pretrial or suppression on hearings.<sup>54</sup> For the lat-

51. American Society of Newspaper Editors & American Newspaper Publishers Association, Free Press & Fair Trial, Washington, D.C., 1982.

52. Pound, A Survey of Social Interest, 57 Harv.L.Rev. 2 (1943).

53. Page Corp. v. Lumpkin, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1824, 292 S.E.2d 815 (Ga.1982).

54. Indiana ex rel. Post-Tribune Publishing Co. v. Porter Superior Court, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2300, 412 N.E.2d 748 (Ind.1980). Upheld exclusion of press and public from pretrial bail hearing. But see, Ohio ex rel. Beacon Journal v. McMonagle, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1927 (Ohio 1982) where an Ohio appeals court held that a newspaper cannot be prohibited from publishing names of jurors, nor jurors prevented from discussing a trial.

ter, Gannett is still shown considerable respect. New York and California have been particularly discouraging arenas for press appeals against closure motions.

2. The public's right to inspect and copy official court records is well established at common law. Courts are divided, however, on whether the common law right extends to records (tapes included) not produced in evidence. In Nixon v. Warner Communications, Inc., 3 Med.L. Rptr. 2074, 435 U.S. 589 (1978),<sup>55</sup> the Supreme Court rejected claims of a First or Sixth Amendment right, or a common law right, to make copies of Nixon tapes that had been introduced into evidence in the criminal trials of his presidential aides. A common law right was rejected because the common law had been superseded by the Presidential Recordings and Materials Preservation Act. Under that act, reporters and other members of the public could hear the tapes in court, read them from a transcript, or come to where they were stored and listen to them.

In early 1982, General Services Administration regulations were issued pursuant to the act giving archivists authority to edit out personal material that might violate Nixon's Fourth Amendment privacy rights, his First Amendment right of associational privacy, and his presidential privilege of confidentiality. In Nixon v. Freeman, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1001, 670 F.2d 346 (D.C.Cir. 1982), those regulations were upheld by the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals. The U.S. Supreme Court declined to review the case.

These rulings cast a shadow on the usefulness of Richmond as a device for getting at judicial records. Since Richmond made much of the common law right of public scrutiny of judicial processes, the case ought to be construed as mandating more of a common law than a constitutional right of access to judicial records.

In the ABSCAM and BRILAB tapes cases, Second, Third, and D.C. Circuits found strong common law arguments for a right to make aural copies of tapes introduced in evidence. The Fifth Circuit, sticking to a literal interpretation of Nixon, upheld a trial judge's denial of access.<sup>56</sup>

In cases involving former Congressmen Myers and Jenrette, the Second Circuit recognized a common law right to copy both video and audio ABSCAM tapes admitted into evidence in open court proceedings. Copying, said the court, would advance the interest in open trials identified in Richmond. Only the strongest showing of prejudice would serve to deny.<sup>57</sup>

A federal district court in Pennsylvania denied broadcasters permission to copy ABSCAM audio and video tapes because of a pending appeal of defendant and the pending trials of others. Adhering to Nixon v. Warner Communications, the court said that showing the tapes would be tantamount to a televised trial, a practice forbidden in federal courts.<sup>58</sup> The Third Circuit reversed and remanded. The public, said the court, has a right to witness firsthand the impact of evidence, even when that impact extends beyond the trial arena. Media are surrogates of the public. Rejected were arguments that post-trial re-broadcasting of the tapes would constitute enhanced punishment and an invasion of privacy. Libelous and scurrilous statements about third parties could be excised at the discretion of the judge. The risk of prejudicing a retrial was potential not ac-

---

55. Reversing United States v. Mitchell, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1027, 551 F.2d 1252 (D.C.Cir. 1976) in which Chief Judge Bazelon made a stirring case for access.

56. Belo Broadcasting Corp. v. Clark, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1841, 654 F.2d 423 (5th Cir. 1981). See also, McNally v. Pulitzer Publishing Co., 532 F.2d 69 (8th Cir. 1976), cert. den. 429 U.S. 855 (1976).

57. In re Application of NBC (United States v. Myers), 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1961, 635 F.2d 945 (2d Cir. 1980).

58. United States v. Criden, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1779, 501 F.Supp. 854 (D.Pa.1980).

tual, said the court, and, as with the trial of codefendants, judicial remedies were available to protect defendants. In re Application of NBC (Criden) 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1153, 648 F.2d 814 (3d Cir. 1981).

Similarly in the Jenrette case, the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia held that, where a defendant had motions pending, damage from disclosure would outweigh any public benefit.<sup>59</sup> In a reversal, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ruled that the rights of parties must be weighed against a strong tradition of public access to trial records. The mere possibility of a second trial was insufficient to justify denying a broadcaster's request. Instructions were issued to the trial judge to exercise his discretion in excising specific portions of the tapes which might harm innocent third parties<sup>60</sup> a practice that does not comport with common law traditions.

The rule, then, appears to be that federal appeals courts will expect trial courts to consider remedies other than closure before access is denied and to weigh carefully public as against defendant rights before any decision is made.<sup>61</sup>

Grand jury proceedings, and all proceedings related to them, are not meant to be public, no matter how Richmond is interpreted.<sup>62</sup>

Since the Sixth Amendment makes no mention of civil proceedings, only access arguments based on the First Amendment and common law will apply to civil cases. Any many of these, those involving "trade secrets," for example, may be closed by statute. Recall that the Chief Justice in his Richmond footnote 17 tells us that "historically both civil and criminal trials have been presumptively open."

One may hazard a guess that Brennan, Marshall, and possibly Stevens would extend the access implied in Richmond to nonjudicial settings. But it may be slow in coming.

4. Did Richmond intend to govern more limited court closures such as those during testimony of minor rape victims? The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts thought not.<sup>63</sup> The United States Supreme Court said yes, in a case hailed by the press but reflecting continuing deep division in the Court on matters of access.

A Massachusetts trial court, relying on a state statute providing for exclusion of the general public from trials of specified sexual offenses involving victims under eighteen, ordered exclusion of press and public from the courtroom during the trial of a defendant charged with the rape of three minor girls. The Boston Globe challenged its exclusion, but the highest state court construed the Massachusetts law as requiring, under all circumstances, exclusion of press and public during the testimony of a minor victim in a sex-offense trial.

59. In re Application of NBC, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2265 (D.D.C.1980).

60. In re Application of NBC, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1193, 653 F.2d 609 (D.C.Cir. 1981). See also, United States v. Dean, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1405, 527 F.Supp. 413 (D.Ga.1981) in which a broadcaster's application to copy and telecast audio tapes introduced in evidence in a criminal trial was granted. The court held that defendant had failed to demonstrate that the possible prejudice which broadcasting the tapes might have on a retrial outweighed the public's common law right to copy and inspect judicial records.

And in United States v. Reiter, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1927 (D.Md.1981), a federal district court held that a newspaper has a right to copy video and audio tapes admitted into evidence in a criminal trial. Likewise in In re Griffin Television, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1947 (D.Okl.1981) a television station was granted access to all audio and video tapes admitted in evidence in a criminal trial.

61. In re U.S. ex rel. Pulitzer Publishing, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2232, 635 F.2d 676 (8th Cir. 1980). The case involved the question of attendance by press and public at voir dire examination proceedings.

62. In re Antitrust Grand Jury Investigation, 508 F.Supp. 397 (D.Va.1980).

63. Globe Newspaper v. Superior Court, 5 Med.L.Rptr. 2617, 401 N.E.2d 360 (Mass.1980).

A divided (6-3) United States Supreme Court, managing nevertheless to speak with a single majority voice, reversed.

---

GLOBE NEWSPAPER COMPANY
v. SUPERIOR COURT FOR THE COUNTY OF NORFOLK

457 U.S. 596, 102 S.C.T. 2613, 73 L.ED.2D 248 (1982).

Justice BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

Section 16A of Chapter 278 of Massachusetts General Laws, as construed by the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, requires trial judges, at trials for specified sexual offenses involving a victim under the age of 18, to exclude the press and general public from the courtroom during the testimony of that victim. The question presented is whether the statute thus construed violates the First Amendment as applied to the States through the Fourteenth Amendment.

* * *

The Court's recent decision in Richmond Newspapers firmly established for the first time that the press and general public have a constitutional right of access to criminal trials. Although there was no opinion of the Court in that case, seven Justices recognized that this right of access is embodied in the First Amendment, and applied to the States through the Fourteenth Amendment.

* * *

The state interests asserted to support § 16A, though articulated in various ways, are reducible to two: the protection of minor victims of sex crimes from further trauma and embarrassment; and the encouragement of such victims to come forward and testify in a truthful and credible manner. We consider these interests in turn.

We agree with respondent that the first interest—safeguarding the physical and psychological well-being of a minor—is a compelling one. But as compelling as that interest is, it does not justify a mandatory-closure rule, for it is clear that the circumstances of the particular case may affect the significance of the interest. A trial court can determine on a case-by-case basis whether closure is necessary to protect the welfare of a minor victim. Among the factors to be weighed are the minor victim's age, psychological maturity, and understanding, the nature of the crime, the desires of the victim, and the interests of parents and relatives. Section 16A, in contrast, requires closure even if the victim does not seek the exclusion of the press and general public, and would not suffer injury by their presence. In the case before us, for example, the names of the minor victims were already in the public record,<sup>23</sup> and the record indicates that the victims may have been willing to testify despite the presence of the press. If the trial court had been permitted to exercise its discretion, closure might well have been deemed unnecessary. In short, § 16A cannot be viewed as a narrowly tailored means of accommodating the State's asserted interest: That interest could be served just as well by requiring the trial court to determine on a case-by-case basis whether the State's legitimate concern for the well-being of the minor victim necessitates closure. Such an approach ensures that the constitutional right of the press and public to gain access to criminal trials will not be restricted except where necessary to protect the State's interest.<sup>25</sup>

---

23. The Court has held that the government may not impose sanctions for the publication of the names of rape victims lawfully obtained from the public record. Cox Broadcasting Corp. v. Cohn, 420 U.S. 469 * * * (1975). See also Smith v. Daily Mail Publishing Co., 443 U.S. 97 * * * (1979).

25. Of course, for a case-by-case approach to be meaningful, representatives of the press and general public "must be given an opportunity to be heard on the question of their exclusion." Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 443

Nor can § 16A be justified on the basis of the Commonwealth's second asserted interest—the encouragement of minor victims of sex crimes to come forward and provide accurate testimony. The Commonwealth has offered no empirical support for the claim that the rule of automatic closure contained in § 16A will lead to an increase in the number of minor sex victims coming forward and cooperating with state authorities. Not only is the claim speculative in empirical terms, but it is also open to serious question as a matter of logic and common sense. Although § 16A bars the press and general public from the courtroom during the testimony of minor sex victims, the press is not denied access to the transcript, court personnel, or any other possible source that could provide an account of the minor victim's testimony. Thus § 16A cannot prevent the press from publicizing the substance of a minor victim's testimony, as well as his or her identity. If the Commonwealth's interest in encouraging minor victims to come forward depends on keeping such matters secret, § 16A hardly advances that interest in an effective manner. And even if § 16A effectively advanced the State's interest, it is doubtful that the interest would be sufficient to overcome the constitutional attack, for that same interest could be relied on to support an array of mandatory-closure rules designed to encourage victims to come forward: Surely it cannot be suggested that minor victims of sex crimes are the only crime victims who, because of publicity attendant to criminal trials, are reluctant to come forward and testify. The State's argument based on this interest therefore proves too much, and runs contrary to the very foundation of the right of access recognized in Richmond Newspapers: namely, "that a presumption of openness inheres in the very nature of a criminal trial under our system of justice." 448 U.S., at 573 * * * (plurality opinion).

For the foregoing reasons, we hold that § 16A, as construed by the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, violates the First Amendment to the Constitution.<sup>27</sup> Accordingly, the judgment of the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court is Reversed.

Chief Justice BURGER, with whom Justice Rehnquist joins, dissenting.

* * *

The Court has tried to make its holding a narrow one by not disturbing the authority of state legislatures to enact more narrowly drawn statutes giving trial judges the discretion to exclude the public and the press from the courtroom during the minor victim's testimony. * * * I also do not read the Court's opinion as foreclosing a state statute which mandates closure except in cases where the victim agrees to testify in open court. But the Court's decision is nevertheless a gross invasion of state authority and a state's duty to protect its citizens—in this case minor victims

U.S. 368, 401, * * * (1979) (Powell, J., concurring). This does not mean, however, that for purposes of this inquiry the court cannot protect the minor victim by denying these representatives the opportunity to confront or cross-examine the victim, or by denying them access to sensitive details concerning the victim and the victim's future testimony. Such discretion is consistent with the traditional authority of trial judges to conduct in camera conferences. See Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S., at 598, n. 23 * * * (Brennan, J., concurring in the judgment). Without such trial court discretion, a State's interest in safeguarding the welfare of the minor victim determined in an individual case to merit some form of closure, would be defeated before it could ever be brought to bear.

27. We emphasize that our holding is a narrow one: that a rule of mandatory closure respecting the testimony of minor sex victims is constitutionally infirm. In individual cases, and under appropriate circumstances, the First Amendment does not necessarily stand as a bar to the exclusion from the courtroom of the press and general public during the testimony of minor sex-offense victims. But a mandatory rule, requiring no particularized determinations in individual cases, is unconstitutional.

of crime. I cannot agree with the Court's expansive interpretation of our decision in Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 * * * (1980), or its cavalier rejection of the serious interests supporting Massachusetts' mandatory closure rule. Accordingly, I dissent.

* * *

Today Justice Brennan ignores the weight of historical practice. There is clearly a long history of exclusion of the public from trials involving sexual assaults, particularly those against minors. * * *. Several states have longstanding provisions allowing closure of cases involving sexual assaults against minors.

* * *

Neither the purpose of the law nor its effect is primarily to deny the press or public access to information; the verbatim transcript is made available to the public and the media and may be used without limit. We therefore need only examine whether the restrictions imposed are reasonable and whether the interests of the Commonwealth override the very limited incidental effects of the law on First Amendment rights. * * *. Our obligation in this case is to balance the competing interests: the interests of the media for instant access, against the interest of the state in protecting child rape victims from the trauma of public testimony. In more than half the states, public testimony will include television coverage.

* * *

The law need not be precisely tailored so long as the state's interest overrides the law's impact on First Amendment rights and the restrictions imposed further that interest. Certainly this law, which excludes the press and public only during the actual testimony of the child victim of a sex crime, rationally serves the Commonwealth's overriding interest in protecting the child from the severe—possibly permanent—psychological damage. It is not disputed that such injury is a reality.<sup>5</sup>

The law also seems a rational response to the undisputed problem of the underreporting of rapes and other sexual offenses. The Court rejects the Commonwealth's argument that § 16A is justified by its interest in encouraging minors to report sex crimes, finding the claim "speculative in empirical terms [and] open to serious question as a matter of logic and common sense." * * *. There is no basis whatever for this cavalier disregard of the reality of human experience. It makes no sense to criticize the Commonwealth for its failure to offer empirical data in support of its rule; only by allowing state experimentation may such empirical evidence be produced. "It is one of the happy incidents of the federal system that a State may, if its citizens choose, serve as a laboratory, and try novel social and economic experiments without risk to the rest of the country." New State Ice Co. v. Liebmann, 285 U.S. 262, 311 * * * (1932) (Brandeis, J., dissenting). * * *

The Court also concludes that the Commonwealth's assertion that the law might reduce underreporting of sexual offenses fails "as a matter of logic and common sense." This conclusion is based on a misperception of the Commonwealth's argument and an overly narrow view of the protection the statute seeks to afford young victims. The Court apparently believes that the statute does not prevent any significant trauma, embarrassment or humiliation on the part of the victim simply because the press is not prevented from discovering and publicizing both the identity of the victim and the substance of the victim's testimony. * * * Section

5. For a discussion of the traumatic effect of court proceedings on minor rape victims, see E. Hilberman, The Rape Victim 53-54; S. Katz & M. Mazur, Understanding the Rape Victim: A Synthesis of Research Findings 198-200 (1979), and studies cited therein.

16A is intended not to preserve confidentiality, but to prevent the risk of severe psychological damage caused by having to relate the details of the crime in front of a crowd which inevitably will include voyeuristic strangers.<sup>6</sup> In most states, that crowd may be expanded to include a live television audience, with reruns on the evening news. That ordeal could be difficult for an adult; to a child, the experience can be devastating and leave permanent scars.<sup>7</sup>

* * *

Justice STEVENS, dissenting.

* * *

The question whether the Court should entertain a facial attack on a statute that bears on the right of access cannot be answered simply by noting that the right has its source in the First Amendment. See, e.g., Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350, 380-381; * * * Young v. American Mini Theatres, Inc., 427 U.S. 50, 61. * * For the right of access is plainly not coextensive with the right of expression that was vindicated in Nebraska Press Assn.<sup>1</sup> Because statutes that bear on this right of access do not deter protected activity in the way that other laws sometimes interfere with the right of expression, we should follow the norm of reviewing these statutes as applied rather than on their face.

* * *

COMMENT

1. The Court's rejection of a blanket rule excluding press and public from criminal trials involving youthful victims and defendants may not discourage the enforcement of more narrowly drawn statutes, or the recognition of compelling and overriding state interests—privacy in one of its myriad forms perhaps—in protecting the welfare of minors, when such interests can be documented. While the Court left open the possibility of closed juvenile criminal hearings, it rejected the limitations placed on judicial discretion by a "mandatory" act of the legislature.

Prior to Globe Newspaper, some state courts were quick to protect defendants against revelation of prior convictions,<sup>64</sup> or against embarrassment,<sup>65</sup> and to shield juvenile victims or witnesses.<sup>66</sup> Others preferred to keep hearings and records open at all costs on state common law or consti-

6. As one commentator put it, "Especially in cases involving minors, the courts stress the serious embarrassment and shame of the victim who is forced to testify to sexual acts or whose intimate life is revealed in detail before a crowd of the idly curious." Berger, Man's Trial, Woman's Tribulation: Rape Cases in the Courtroom, 77 Colum.L.Rev. 1, 88 (1977). The victim's interest in avoiding the humiliation of testifying in open court is thus quite separate from any interest in preventing the public from learning of the crime. It is ironic that the Court emphasizes the failure of the Commonwealth to seal the trial transcript and bar disclosure of the victim's identity. The Court implies that a state law more severely encroaching upon the interests of the press and public would be upheld.

7. See E. Hilberman, supra; L. Holmstrom & A. Burgess, The Victim of Rape: Institutional Reactions 222, 227 (1978); Berger, supra, at 88, 92-93; Libai, The Protection of a Child Victim of a Sexual Offense in the Criminal Justice System, 15 Wayne L.Rev. 977, 1021 (1969). Holmstrom and Burgess report that nearly half of all adult rape victims were disturbed by the public setting of their trials. Certainly the impact on children must be greater.

1. For example, even though a reporter may have no right of access to a judge's side-bar conference, it surely does not follow that the judge could enjoin publication of what a reporter might have learned about such a conference.

64. Capital Newspapers v. Clyne, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1536, 440 N.Y.S.2d 779 (1981).

65. New York v. Jones, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2096, 418 N.Y.S.2d 359, cert. den. 444 U.S. 946 (1981).

66. Connecticut v. McCloud, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1613, 422 A.2d 327 (Conn.1980); North Carolina v. Burney, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1411, 276 S.E.2d 693 (N.C.1981).

tutional grounds.<sup>67</sup> What is the impact of Globe Newspaper on closed divorce proceedings, which are closed in the interests of protecting children or the privacy rights of the parties?

While it will take time to measure the sweep and authority of Richmond and Globe in improving access to judicial hearings, trials, and records, lower federal courts were the first to take the cue. For example, in United States v. Brooklier<sup>68</sup> the Ninth Circuit used Brennan's "structural" argument in Richmond to keep voir dire hearings open. And in United States v. Dorfman<sup>69</sup> the Seventh Circuit used Blackmun's three-part Gannett test to assure that all phases of a suppression hearing would be accessible to the public: would access do irreparable damage to fair trial (this is sometimes referred to as the compelling or strict necessity test); would the judicial remedies not protect the defendant and make closure unnecessary; and, if imposed, would closure be effective? The court did hold in Dorfman that wiretap material would not be disclosable until admitted into evidence. In other words, for a time at least, privacy would outweigh newsworthiness.

One might infer from that case that courts generally intend trials to be more open than suppression hearings. It would also appear that suppression hearings are more open to public scrutiny than court records.

In the meantime, arguments for access could be based on the First Amendment, on the common law which apparently made no distinction between trial and pre-trial hearings, on other historical grounds, on state public policy or state constitution, or on whatever grounds seem appropriate.

The Swedberg Case

It will take time for the press to recover from a Washington state case that has dampened twenty years of dialogue by press, bar, and judiciary on the fair and ethical coverage of court proceedings. In late 1981 the Washington Supreme Court held that a trial court order allowing press access to pretrial proceedings only on the promise that reporters would abide by the voluntary bar-bench-press guidelines of Washington state was not a prior restraint but a reasonable limitation designed to accommodate the interests of both press and public. Federated Publications v. Swedberg, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1865, 633 P.2d 74 (Wash.1981). Justice Rosellini, who wrote the opinion for the court, had played a prominent role in drafting the original state guidelines. Tough-minded opponents of voluntary guidelines, in both press and bar, had warned that voluntary agreements might someday be interpreted as mandatory.

In spite of a major effort by press and broadcast organizations to get Supreme Court review for the case, review was denied on May 17, 1982. The press saw the Washington decision as sanctioning prior restraint, as imposing an unconstitutional condition on courtroom access. Moreover, excluding reporters who had refused to comply with "voluntary guidelines" was not a reasonable limitation on access, comparable to a time, place, and manner restriction. And excluding the press, but not the public, violated the First Amendment. Apparently only Justices Brennan and Marshall, who opposed the denial to grant review, accepted any of these arguments.

67. Seattle Times v. Ishikawa, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1041, 640 P.2d 716 (Wash.1982); Cowles Publishing v. Murphy, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2308, 637 P.2d 966 (Wash.1981). See also, Lexington Herald Leader v. Tackett, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1436 (Ky.1980) involving a sodomy prosecution.

68. 685 F.2d 1162 (9th Cir. 1982). See also, United States v. Criden, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1297, 675 F.2d 550 (3d Cir. 1982).

69. 690 F.2d 1230 (7th Cir. 1982).

The argument of the trial judge and his attorney in support of the Washington Supreme Court holding was that exclusion of the press was preferable to closing the courtroom altogether.

Amid predictions that voluntary guidelines would collapse in all thirty-four states that had adopted them, the ABA/ANPA joint task force on press/bar relations adopted a resolution "deploring the use of such voluntary guidelines to condition access or restrain news reporting."

On the same day, the Court also denied review in Sacramento Bee v. United States District Court, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1929, 656 F.2d 477 (9th Cir. 1981). There a federal district court order had excluded the press, but not the public, from two evidentiary hearings in a criminal trial. On appeal, the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit ruled that the federal district court's failure to consider alternatives to exclusion of the press did not constitute such clear error as to warrant issuance of a writ that would bar the court from issuing similar orders in the future. The federal appeals court was surprised that the press had not pushed hard for alternatives to exclusion. At the same time it recommended that courts favor voluntary agreements with the press about the timing and scope of coverage. Justice Brennan would have granted review in Sacramento Bee.

While Swedberg is applicable only to Washington state and any agreement made by the press not to publish would be a moral commitment only, legally unenforceable, the press cannot help but feel compromised and betrayed. If voluntary guidelines can be incorporated into court orders, they can be enforced by the contempt power, as Dickinson teaches. It has been suggested that perhaps the Washington court was simply testing the sincerity of journalist participation in the voluntary guidelines.

In the opinion in the Swedberg case which follows, one finds the ingredients of future tension between press and judiciary. The judge faults the judicial remedies for publicity. He sees no prior restraint in orders conditioning attendance at a public trial on a promise not to publish. He is backed by the Judicial Conference of the United States which would make such orders enforceable by contempt citations (October 1981). He distinguishes Nebraska Press and relies on Gannett.

---

FEDERATED PUBLICATIONS v. SWEDBERG

7 MED.L.RPTR. 1865, 633 P.2D 74 (WASH.1981).

ROSELLINI, J.:

* * *

While this court has found a right of the public to attend a pretrial hearing, under the language of Const. art. 1, § 10, that right is qualified by the court's right and duty to see that the defendant has a fair trial. The court may order closure, if the objectors fail to demonstrate the availability of some practical alternative.

Here the court found that the only alternatives which could conceivably be effective in protecting the defendant's rights were to either close the hearing or exact a commitment from the members of the media to abide by the Bench-Bar-Press Guidelines.

The Bench-Bar-Press Guidelines, insofar as they are relevant here, are set forth in the appendix to this opinion. They are, by definition, not a set of rules but rather principles which guide the courts, lawyers and court personnel, as well as the media, in protecting the rights of an accused and other litigants to a fair trial, while at the same time respecting and preserving the freedoms of speech and press guaranteed by the state and federal constitutions. Under their express provisions, they honor the right of the news media to report what occurs in the course of the judicial proceeding.

As was pointed out by Justice Finley in his concurring opinion in State ex rel. Superior Court v. Sperry, * * * 483 P.2d 608 (Wash.1971), responsible exercise of constitutional freedoms, with regard for the constitutional rights of accused persons and other litigants, is the essence of the guidelines.

It is true that these guidelines suggest the exercise of caution in reporting matters which may be damaging to the right of an accused to a fair trial, at a time when that risk is greatest—that is, prior to the trial. Ordinarily, members of the media who have declared their adherence to the guidelines do exercise restraint in such reporting, but it had been the experience of the trial judge here that mere oral commitment had not sufficed to produce that restraint. He recognized that by admitting members of the press to such a sensitive proceeding, even upon their written agreement to be guided by these standards, he was placing the defendant's interests in some jeopardy. Yet he was willing to try this method of securing compliance, as an experiment, to see if it would be effective in protecting the defendant while at the same time allowing the public, including the media, to attend the hearing. As we view this measure, it was a good faith attempt to accommodate the interests of both defendant and press which, hopefully, would prove both practical and effective as an alternative to closure.

The petitioner's objection to the ruling is grounded upon its fear that, should it publish reports of the hearing, it would be subject to contempt proceedings. Whether the contempt power of the court could in other circumstances properly extend to punishment for alleged violation of an agreement to adhere to a set of standards as nonobligatory as these is a question which has not been briefed and which we need not decide. It would, however, be contrary to the spirit and intent of the Bench-Bar-Press Guidelines to invoke such a remedy for their alleged violation, and the comments of the lower court in making its ruling indicate that the court was in agreement with that principle. It issued no orders prohibiting publication, nor did it threaten any sanctions, if a person signing an agreement to abide by the guidelines should thereafter ignore them. Its ruling was simply that any media member not willing to put his moral commitment in writing would be excluded from the hearing.

Inasmuch as the court had the authority, under our holding in Federated Publications, Inc. v. Kurtz, * * * 615 P.2d 440 (Wash.1980), to exclude all of the public, including the media, it had also the included power to impose reasonable conditions upon attendance. The exaction of an agreement to abide by standards which have gained the approval of all of the media of mass communications in this state was not unreasonable, particularly in view of the fact that the commitment is a moral one, even when expressed in writing, and not enforceable in a court of law.

The procedure may not prove effective, and it may be that in cases of this kind the rights of the defendant can be secured only by closing the suppression * * * hearings; but it would be a disservice to the public, as well as the media, to declare that a lesser measure, as innocuous as that employed here, is beyond the reach of a court attempting in good faith to accommodate the rights of all concerned.

That reasonable limitations may be imposed upon attendance at a judicial proceeding was recognized in Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 * * * (1980) (Justice White, concurring). In a footnote at page 581, he said:

Just as a government may impose reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions upon the use of its streets in the interest of such objectives as the free flow of traffic, see, e.g., Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U.S. 569 (1941), so may a trial judge, in the interest of the fair administration of justice, impose reasonable limitations on access to a trial.

Our conclusion is that the limitation imposed here was a reasonable one, and the petition is accordingly denied.

---

COMMENT

1. Justice Dolliver, joined by three colleagues, saw the trial court order as a prior restraint and dissented: "A review of the record in Federated Publications, Inc. v. Kurtz [cited in the majority opinion] shows that there were extensive and detailed findings of fact, plus attached exhibits which enabled the trial court to engage in the required 'weighing of the competing interests of the defendant and the public.'" Here the court had simply concluded that the "likelihood of jeopardy to a fair trial is overwhelmingly established" and that "the usual methods to protect a fair trial such as voir dire, peremptory challenges and others are not adequate safeguards."

"These statements and order by the trial court," the dissent added, "do not even come close to meeting our requirements in Federated Publications v. Kurtz for the closure of a courtroom in a suppression hearing. Much less do they meet the standards of the United States Supreme Court for prior restraint as articulated in the Nebraska Press Assn. case. This court should not allow the great freedoms of the First Amendment and Const. art. 1, § 10 [Washington Constitution] to be trampled in this manner."

2. Recall that in Gannett the Court took note of the fact that no timely objection to closure had been made by reporters present in the courtroom. It should be standard practice that reporters object promptly and strenuously to orders not to print or motions to close any part of the judicial process. Major news organizations have developed procedures and forms to deal with these problems.

THE STATUS OF BROADCAST COVERAGE: CAMERAS IN THE COURTROOM

1. In covering crime and the courts, electronic and photojournalism early became victim to its own youthful brashness, raucous commercialism, and intrusive equipment. Bench and bar tended to equate television's power to attract with its power to prejudice.

Policemen had posed suspects for the cameras and permitted them to announce their guilt to the world. In 1961 a jury reenacted its deliberations, theorized on the guilt or innocence of the defendant, and discussed the death penalty for a videotape rebroadcast the day before sentencing.<sup>70</sup> The Supreme Court finally took note of these practices in the case of Wilbur Rideau.

After his arrest on suspicion of bank robbery and murder, Rideau was interviewed in jail by a film crew. A cooperative sheriff stood by posing his prisoner. He confessed and his confession went out over the airwaves, not once but three times. A change of venue was denied; Rideau was tried, convicted, and sentenced to death.

When the case got to the U.S. Supreme Court, Justice Potter Stewart in his opinion for the Court reversed. "For anyone who has ever watched television," he said, "the conclusion cannot be avoided that this spectacle, to the tens of thousands of people who saw and heard it, in a very real sense was Rideau's trial—at which he pleaded guilty to murder. Any subsequent court proceedings in a community so per-vasively exposed to such a spectacle could be but a hollow formality." Rideau v. Louisiana, 373 U.S. 723 (1963).

---

70. United States v. Rees, 193 F.Supp. 864 (D.Md.1961).

There is a strong implication in the Court's opinion that no judicial remedies in either trial or pretrial period would have overcome the prejudicial effects of the broadcasts. Presumably the power of the camera outstrips the power of the pen—an assumption that may no longer be safe.<sup>71</sup>

2. The case of Billie Sol Estes came to the Court two years later in 1965. Estes, an erstwhile Texas financier, had come to trial in 1962 on charges of theft, swindling, and embezzlement. Over Estes's objections the trial judge permitted television coverage of the pretrial hearing and portions of the trial. Upon conviction Estes appealed partly on the grounds that the cameras had deprived him of due process of law. By a narrow margin the Supreme Court agreed, and courtroom doors closed to cameras with a clang.

Justice Clark, who dissented in Rideau because he could see no "substantial nexus between the televised 'interview' and petitioner's trial," spoke for the Court. After noting that there were twelve cameramen in the courtroom, a great snarl of equipment, and considerable disruption—and, after all, newspaper reporters didn't bring their typewriters and printing presses into the courtroom—Clark tried to come to grips with the issue.

---

ESTES v. STATE OF TEXAS

1 MED.LR.PTR. 1187, 381 U.S. 532,
85 S.C.T. 1628, 14 L.ED.2D 543 (1965).

Justice CLARK delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * *

As has been said, the chief function of our judicial machinery is to ascertain the truth. The use of television, however, cannot be said to contribute materially to this objective. Rather its use amounts to the injection of an irrelevant factor into court proceedings. In addition experience teaches that there are numerous situations in which it might cause actual unfairness—some so subtle as to defy detection by the accused or control by the judge. We enumerate some in summary:

1. The potential impact of television on the jurors is perhaps of the greatest significance. They are the nerve center of the fact-finding process. It is true that in States like Texas where they are required to be sequestered in trials of this nature the jurors will probably not see any of the proceedings as televised from the courtroom. But the inquiry cannot end there. From the moment the trial judge announces that a case will be televised it becomes a cause célèbre. The whole community, including prospective jurors, becomes interested in all the morbid details surrounding it. The approaching trial immediately assumes an important status in the public press and the accused is highly publicized along with the offense with which he is charged. Every juror carries with him into the jury box these solemn facts and thus increases the chance of prejudice that is present in every criminal case. And we must remember that realistically it is only the notorious trial which will be broadcast, because of the necessity for paid sponsorship. The conscious or unconscious effect that this may have on the juror's judgment cannot be evaluated, but experience indicates that it is not only possible but highly probable that it will have a direct bearing on his vote as to guilt or innocence. Where pretrial publicity of all kinds has created intense public feeling which is aggravated by the telecasting or picturing of the trial the televised jurors cannot help but feel the pressures of knowing that friends and neighbors have their eyes upon them. If the community be hostile to an accused, a televised juror, realizing that he must return to neighbors who saw the trial themselves, may well be led "not to hold the balance nice, clear and true between the State and the accused. * * *"

---

71. Shaw and McCombs, The Agenda-Setting Function of the Press (1977).

Moreover, while it is practically impossible to assess the effect of television on jury attentiveness, those of us who know juries realize the problem of jury "distraction." The State argues this is de minimis since the physical disturbances have been eliminated. But we know that distractions are not caused solely by the physical presence of the camera and its telltale red lights. It is the awareness of the fact of telecasting that is felt by the juror throughout the trial. We are all self-conscious and uneasy when being televised. Human nature being what it is, not only will a juror's eyes be fixed on the camera, but also his mind will be preoccupied with the telecasting rather than with the testimony.

Furthermore, in many States the jurors serving in the trial may see the broadcasts of the trial proceedings. Admittedly, the Texas sequestration rule would prevent this occurring there. In other States following no such practice jurors would return home and turn on the TV if only to see how they appeared upon it. They would also be subjected to reenactment and emphasis of the selected parts of the proceedings which the requirements of the broadcasters determined would be telecast and would be subconsciously influenced the more by that testimony. Moreover, they would be subjected to the broadest commentary and criticism and perhaps the well-meant advice of friends, relatives and inquiring strangers who recognized them on the streets.

Finally, new trials plainly would be jeopardized in that potential jurors will often have seen and heard the original trial when it was telecast. Yet viewers may later be called upon to sit in the jury box during the new trial. These very dangers are illustrated in this case where the court, due to the defendant's objections, permitted only the State's opening and closing arguments to be broadcast with sound to the public.

2. The quality of the testimony in criminal trials will often be impaired. The impact upon a witness of the knowledge that he is being viewed by a vast audience is simply incalculable. Some may be demoralized and frightened, some cocky and given to overstatement; memories may falter, as with anyone speaking publicly, and accuracy of statement may be severely undermined. Embarrassment may impede the search for the truth, as may a natural tendency toward overdramatization. Furthermore, inquisitive strangers and "cranks" might approach witnesses on the street with jibes, advice or demands for explanation of testimony. There is little wonder that the defendant cannot "prove" the existence of such factors. Yet we all know from experience that they exist.

In addition to invocation of the rule against witnesses is frustrated. In most instances witnesses would be able to go to their homes and view broadcasts of the day's trial proceedings, notwithstanding the fact that they had been admonished not to do so. They could view and hear the testimony of preceding witnesses, and so shape their own testimony as to make its impact crucial. And even in the absence of sound, the influences of such viewing on the attitude of the witness toward testifying, his frame of mind upon taking the stand or his apprehension of withering cross-examination defy objective assessment. Indeed, the mere fact that the trial is to be televised might render witnesses reluctant to appear and thereby impede the trial as well as the discovery of the truth.

While some of the dangers mentioned above are present as well in newspaper coverage of any important trial, the circumstances and extraneous influences intruding upon the solemn decorum of court procedure in the televised trial are far more serious than in cases involving only newspaper coverage.

3. A major aspect of the problem is the additional responsibilities the presence of television places on the trial judge. His job is to make certain that the accused receives a fair trial. This most difficult task requires his undivided attention. Still when television comes into the courtroom he must also supervise it. In this trial, for example, the judge on several different occasions—aside from the two days of pretrial—was obliged to have a hearing or enter an order made necessary solely because of the presence of television. Thus, where telecasting is restricted as it was here, and as even the State concedes it must be, his task is made more difficult and exacting. And, as happened here, such rulings may unfortunately militate against the fairness of the trial. In addition, laying physical interruptions aside, there is the ever-present distraction that the mere awareness of television's presence prompts. Judges are human beings also and are subject to the same psychological reactions as laymen. Telecasting is particularly bad where the judge is elected, as is the case in all save a half dozen of our States. The telecasting of a trial becomes a political weapon, which, along with other distractions inherent in broadcasting, diverts his attention from the task at hand—the fair trial of the accused.

* * *

4. Finally, we cannot ignore the impact of courtroom television on the defendant. Its presence is a form of mental—if not physical—harassment, resembling a police line-up or the third degree. The inevitable close-ups of his gestures and expressions during the ordeal of his trial might well transgress his personal sensibilities, his dignity, and his ability to concentrate on the proceedings before him—sometimes the difference between life and death—dispassionately, freely and without the distraction of wide public surveillance. A defendant on trial for a specific crime is entitled to his day in court, not in a stadium, or a city or nationwide arena. The heightened public clamor resulting from radio and television coverage will inevitably result in prejudice. Trial by television is, therefore, foreign to our system. Furthermore, telecasting may also deprive an accused of effective counsel. The distractions, intrusions into confidential attorney-client relationships and the temptation offered by television to play to the public audience might often have a direct effect not only upon the lawyers, but the judge, the jury and the witnesses. * * * The television camera is a powerful weapon. Intentionally or inadvertently it can destroy an accused and his case in the eyes of the public. While our telecasters are honorable men, they too are human. The necessity for sponsorship weighs heavily in favor of the televising of only notorious cases, such as this one, and invariably focuses the lens upon the unpopular or infamous accused. Such a selection is necessary in order to obtain a sponsor willing to pay a sufficient fee to cover the costs and return a profit. We have already examined the ways in which public sentiment can affect the trial participants. To the extent that television shapes that sentiment, it can strip the accused of a fair trial.

The State would dispose of all these observations with the simple statement that they are for psychologists because they are purely hypothetical. But we cannot afford the luxury of saying that, because these factors are difficult of ascertainment in particular cases, they must be ignored. * * *

The judgment is therefore reversed.

---

COMMENT

1. Chief Justice Earl Warren, joined by Justices Douglas and Goldberg, wrote an angry concurrence in which he—ironically—included seven photographs to convey and clarify his arguments. Drawing analogies between Estes's trial and Castro's "stadium trials" and the trial of Francis Gary Powers in the Soviet Union, Warren declared that the evil inherent in television coverage outraged the Sixth Amendment.

Television, said Warren, diverts the trial from its proper purpose in that it has an inevitable impact on all the trial participants; it gives the public the wrong impression about the purpose of trials, thereby detracting from the dignity of court proceedings and lessening the reliability of trials; and it singles out certain defendants and subjects them to trials under prejudicial conditions not experienced by others.

"On entering that hallowed sanctuary [the American courtroom]," Warren added, "where the lives, liberty and property of people are in jeopardy, television representatives have only the rights of the general public, namely to be present, to observe the proceedings, and thereafter, if they choose, to report them."

Four members of the Court dissented—Stewart, White, Brennan, and Black. Said Stewart:

We deal here with matters subject to continuous and unforeseeable change—the techniques of public communication. In an area where all the variables may be modified tomorrow, I cannot at this time rest my determination on hypothetical possibilities not present in the record of this case. There is no claim here based upon any right guaranteed by the First Amendment. But it is important to remember that we move in an area touching the realm of free communication, and for that reason, if for no other, I would be wary of imposing any per se rule which, in the light of future technology, might serve to stifle or abridge true First Amendment rights. * * * The suggestion that there are limits upon the public's right to know what goes on in the courts causes me deep concern.

The idea of imposing upon any medium of communications the burden of justifying its presence is contrary to where I had always thought the presumption must lie in the area of First Amendment freedoms. And the proposition that nonparticipants in a trial might get the "wrong impression" from unfettered reporting and commentary contains an invitation to censorship which I cannot accept. * * * I cannot say at this time that it is impossible to have a constitutional trial whenever any part of the proceedings is televised or recorded on television film.

"We know too little of the actual impact to reach a conclusion on the bare bones of the evidence before us," Justice White noted.

And Brennan drew attention to Justice Harlan's concurrence with the majority which, typical of Harlan, would give the states leeway for experimentation. It was Harlan who kept Estes from becoming a blanket constitutional prohibition against the televising of state criminal trials.

Although "mischievous potentialities" had been at work in the Estes case, "the day may come," said Harlan, "when television will have become so commonplace an affair in the daily life of the average person as to dissipate all reasonable likelihood that its use in courtrooms may disparage the judicial process." [Emphasis added.]

Add to these Justice Clark's own qualification—"When the advances in these arts permit reporting by printing press or by television without their present hazards to a fair trial we will have another case"—and you have almost an invitation for the camera to enter the courtroom.

2. Prior to the trial of Bruno Richard Hauptmann for the kidnaping of the Lindbergh baby, camera coverage depended on the presiding judge. Some welcomed it; some banned it. On balance, photographers acquitted themselves well in covering that notorious case, going so far as to pool their resources. Conventional history would have it otherwise. The transgressions of a newsreel crew are all that is remembered.<sup>72</sup>

After that confused and sensational case had concluded and the American Bar Association had time to think about it, the organization added Canon 35 to its statement of judicial ethics, recommending prohibition of all photographic and broadcast coverage of courtroom proceedings. In 1963 Canon 35 was amended to include television. In 1972 the Code of Judicial Conduct superseded the Canons of Judicial Ethics and Canon 3A(7) reaffirmed and replaced Canon 35. Rule 53 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure and strong admonitions from the Judicial Conference of the United States have kept cameras out of federal courtrooms since 1946.

In 1978 the ABA Committee on Fair Trial-Free Press proposed revised standards that would permit camera coverage at a trial judge's discretion. Its legislative body, the House of Delegates, turned down the proposal a year later. On August 11, 1982 the same body repealed its stand against broadcast coverage of judicial proceedings and called for adoption of a new Canon 3A(7) allowing broadcast coverage "under rules prescribed by a supervising [state] appellate court or other appropriate authority." There was vocal opposition. Erwin Griswold, former dean of the Harvard Law School, said that most television coverage is provided by a "motley crew" who present their material with an eye toward the spectacular.

Meanwhile the Conference of State Chief Justices, by a vote of 44 to 1, had in 1978 approved a resolution recommending that the highest court of each state promulgate standards and guidelines regulating radio, television, and other electronic coverage of court proceedings.

By 1983, at least forty states were permitting some kind of video or audio coverage on either a permanent or experimental basis. Nearly half of these required the consent of some or all of the parties to the proceeding. Thirty-three states permitted coverage of criminal and/or civil trials. Thirty-eight permitted coverage of appeals courts, and, for a time, eight states allowed coverage only of their appellate and/or supreme courts.

More than two-thirds of the experimenting states have so far adopted rules for permanent coverage. No experimenting state has yet decided to ban photographic coverage altogether, although some, Ohio and Iowa, for example, have adopted more restrictive permanent rules. The rules themselves are diverse as to civil and criminal proceedings, the photographing of juries, witnesses, attorneys, defendants, litigants, the range of discretion of the trial judge, regulations concerning permission or consent, and coverage of conferences outside hearing of the jury.

In the Wayne Williams case, a Georgia superior court denied requests for television coverage in view of the defendant's objections and possible harm to children and families of the murdered youths.<sup>73</sup> Georgia was among the first states to adopt rules for TV coverage.

Still nearly half the states, including those with some provision for coverage, keep trial court proceedings closed to the camera. New York's one-year experiment, which began January 1, 1981, included only civil and appellate court proceedings. Those states that would permit criminal trial coverage often exempt, either by court rule or prior statute, those portions of a case involving child custody, divorce, juvenile crime, police informants, relocated witnesses, undercover agents, 72. Kielbowicz, The Story Behind the Adoption of the Ban on Courtroom Cameras, 63 Judicature 14 (June-July 1979).

73. Georgia v. Williams, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1849 and 1852 (1981).

sex crimes, and motions to suppress evidence.

Utah is one of those states that will not budge to accommodate television cameras. It will permit still photos of judges, witnesses, counsel, spectators, and parties subject to their consent and approval of the judge.<sup>74</sup>

At the other pole, Colorado never adopted Canon 35, and as far back as 1956 permitted audio and film coverage of sensational murder trials—the 1956 case, the trial of an accused commercial airline dynamiter.<sup>75</sup> After the trial, the Colorado Supreme Court reviewed the situation and concluded that there was no reason to ban modern camera equipment from the courtroom.<sup>76</sup> After Estes, Colorado modified its rule to require defendant's consent as well as the permission of the trial judge, its stated reason being to avoid retrials. Texas and Oklahoma were also permissive regarding camera coverage until the Estes ruling.

With Alabama, Georgia, New Hampshire, Texas, Washington, and Colorado, Florida was among the first states to experiment anew with the camera. Its test run began in July 1977.<sup>77</sup> When the pilot program ended, the Florida Supreme Court received and reviewed briefs, reports, letters of comment, and studies. It conducted its own survey of attorneys, witnesses, jurors, and court personnel. A separate survey of judges was taken. The court studied the experience of other states allowing cameras and concluded that "on balance there [was] more to be gained than lost by permitting electronic media coverage of judicial proceedings subject to standards for such coverage."<sup>78</sup> The judge would be in control in the interests of the fair administration of justice, and limited quantities of equipment would be placed in fixed positions. Florida soon became the arena for testing the constitutionality of camera coverage.

The first challenge came when Jules Briklod, charged with conspiracy and grand larceny, contended that live camera coverage would deny him a fair and impartial jury, effective assistance of counsel, and due process of law under Fifth, Sixth, and Fourteenth Amendments. The state trial court overruled his objections, and he went to a U.S. district court. That court, taking a cue from Justice Harlan's concurring opinion in Estes, held that Florida's experiment was not "patently and flagrantly" unconstitutional. Injunctive relief was denied. Briklod v. Rivkind, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 2258 (D.Fla.1977).

Next came the murder trial of fifteen-year-old Ronny Zamora, an unfortunate test case perhaps. Zamora's defense of "television made me do it"—specifically an ultraviolent episode of "Kojak"—attracted more attention from an estimated international audience of 200 million than the televising of the trial. Television itself was on trial. As was the concept of media intoxication.

Similar charges of "incitement by television" were rejected in Olivia N. v. NBC, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2359, 178 Cal.Rptr. 888 (1981), the "Born Innocent" case, and in DeFilippo v. NBC, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1872, 446 A.2d 1036 (R.I.1982). In the first case a network program's fictional depiction of a broom-handle rape in a state-run home for girls was said to be responsible for a real-life copy of the crime. In the second case a youth hanged himself attempting to imitate a "hanging trick" he'd seen on the Johnny Carson show. For a discussion of 74. In re Canon 3A(7), 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1449 (Utah 1981).

75. Graham v. People, 302 P.2d 737 (Colo.1956).

76. In re Hearings Concerning Canon 35, 296 P.2d 465 (Colo.1956).

77. Petition of the Post-Newsweek Stations, Florida, Inc., 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1832, 347 So.2d 402 (Fla.1976).

78. Petition of the Post-Newsweek Stations, Florida, Inc., 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1039, 370 So.2d 764 (Fla.1979).

these cases and issues in the context of broadcast law, see text, p. 930.

The media restrained in their coverage of the Zamora case, agreed to use one "pool camera." Judge Paul Baker of Florida's Circuit Court was ever alert to reporter compulsions to "jazz it up." Although he had misgivings before trial, the judge thought the experiment a success. Cameras were "slightly distracting" to jurors but did not interfere with jurors' being able to concentrate on the arguments of counsel and the court's instructions. Baker thought that both First Amendment rights and the right of the defendant to a fair trial had been protected and that the problems of Sheppard and Estes had been avoided.

Judge Baker did suggest that the media be restrained from using cameras and lights in the corridors of the courthouse. "What transpires in the courtroom," said the judge, "is a factual account of the trial which is news, but what is elicited in the corridors takes on the color of editorial comment."

Zamora received a life sentence, twenty-five years of it mandatory, for the killing of an elderly neighbor. His attorney had no complaints about the edited camera coverage and, in fact, took notes on his own television performance. The prosecutor had doubts. Viewers were mostly favorable, for, as broadcast reporter Linda O'Bryon observed, they were looking into the "holy of holies" for the first time. Another observer wrote that the broadcasts would win no awards for technical quality, due largely to the use of a single camera and limited lighting, but a first step had been taken.<sup>79</sup>

Florida's Supreme Court next stipulated that requests to exclude electronic media be supported by evidence that coverage would have substantial and "qualitatively different" effects on the process than other types of coverage.<sup>80</sup> Of course, exclusions could be made where the evidence indicated that an otherwise competent criminal defendant would be rendered incompetent by camera coverage.<sup>81</sup>

But the grand test of constitutionality came when two Miami Beach policemen challenged their convictions on burglary charges because portions of their trials had been televised over their objections.

In a unanimous decision grounded in federalism, the Supreme Court rejected their claim and found no constitutional problem with regulated access for cameras in those states which so chose. But the ruling provided no right of camera access in those states which forbade it or in the federal courts.

The decision did not consider any First or Sixth Amendment issues, so threw no additional light on Gannett and Richmond. It did, however, vindicate the significance of Justice Harlan's concurrence in Estes that kept that case from creating a constitutional ban on camera coverage. Chief Justice Burger—who ironically has vowed that as long as he is in office no cameras will enter the Supreme Court chamber and, by implication, the federal courts generally—distinguished Estes in his opinion for the Court. Calling for further experimentation to evaluate the camera's psychological effects, he seemed to be saying that Chandler would not be the last word on broadcast coverage. Does this track with his Richmond opinion in which he makes no distinction between "print and electronic media"? Probably not.

Justices Stewart and White, who dissented in Estes, thought Chandler had "overruled," "eviscerated" the earlier case.

79. Knopf, Camera Coverage on Trial, Quill, November 1977.

80. Florida v. Palm Beach Newspapers, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1021, 395 So.2d 544 (Fla.1981).

81. Florida v. Green, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1025, 395 So.2d 532 (Fla.1981).

To be sure, difficult questions do remain unanswered. How will editing affect the perceptions of the audience? Less than three minutes of the Chandler trial were actually broadcast, all of it the prosecution side. How will commercials be handled? How will courtroom coverage be promoted? Can photojournalists function with quiet dignity? In our review of privacy law it was suggested that frequent lapses occur. How does the ruling affect sketch artists who do what the camera does better?<sup>82</sup>

By demonstrating their cool efficiency, photographers, so often victims of the self-inflicted wound, will wear away at judicial assumptions supporting camera bans. And it may be, as Justice Harlan prophesied in Estes, that television has become so commonplace an affair in the daily life of the average person as to dissipate all reasonable likelihood that its use in courtrooms may disparage the judicial process. Or the legislative process. Or the executive and administrative processes.

---

CHANDLER v. FLORIDA

449 U.S. 560, 101 S.Ct. 802, 66 L.Ed.2d 740 (1981).

Chief Justice BURGER delivered the opinion of the Court:

* * *

At the outset, it is important to note that in promulgating the revised Canon 3A(7), the Florida Supreme Court pointedly rejected any state or federal constitutional right of access on the part of photographers or the broadcast media to televise or electronically record and thereafter disseminate court proceedings. It carefully framed its holding as follows:

While we have concluded that the due process clause does not prohibit electronic media coverage of judicial proceedings per se, by the same token we reject the argument of the [Post-Newsweek stations] that the first and sixth amendments to the United States Constitution mandate entry of the electronic media into judicial proceedings. Petition of the Post-Newsweek Stations, Florida, Inc., 370 So.2d, at 774.

The Florida court relied on our holding in Nixon v. Warner Communications, Inc., 435 U.S. 589 * * * (1977), where we said:

In the first place, * * * there is no constitutional right to have [live witness] testimony recorded and broadcast. Second, while the guarantee of a public trial, in the words of Mr. Justice Black, is "a safeguard against any attempt to employ our courts as instruments of persecution," it confers no special benefit on the press. Nor does the Sixth Amendment require that the trial—or any part of it—be broadcast live or on tape to the public. The requirement of a public trial is satisfied by the opportunity of members of the public and the press to attend the trial and report what they have observed. Id., at 610 [citations and footnotes omitted].

The Florida Supreme Court predicated the revised Canon 3A(7) upon its supervisory authority over the Florida courts, and not upon any constitutional imperative. Hence, we have before us only the limited question of the Florida Supreme Court's authority to promulgate the canon for the trial of cases in Florida courts.

This Court has no supervisory jurisdiction over state courts and, in reviewing a state court judgment, we are confined to 82. In United States v. CBS, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1351, 497 F.2d 107 (1974), the Fifth Circuit applied a clear and present danger test to a trial judge's order evicting Aggie Whelan, a CBS artist, from the courtroom where the "Gainesville Eight" were being tried. She made her sketches from memory in the park across the street and was cited for contempt. The total ban, said the court, was overbroad where the sketching was neither "obtrusive" nor "disruptive." That is basically the test all states use in permitting sketching which, it has been claimed, can be more distracting than photography. Something to do with squeaky pens.

---

evaluating it in relation to the Federal Constitution.

Appellants rely chiefly on Estes v. Texas, 381 U.S. 532 * * * (1964), and Chief Justice Warren's separate concurring opinion in that case. They argue that the televising of criminal trials is inherently a denial of due process, and they read Estes as announcing a per se constitutional rule to that effect.

* * *

Parsing the six opinions in Estes, one is left with a sense of doubt as to precisely how much of Justice Clark's opinion was joined in, and supported by, Justice Harlan. In an area charged with constitutional nuances, perhaps more should not be expected. Nonetheless, it is fair to say that Justice Harlan viewed the holding as limited to the proposition that "what was done in this case infringed the fundamental right to a fair trial assured by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment."

* * *

Justice Harlan's opinion, upon which analysis of the constitutional holding of Estes turns, must be read as defining the scope of that holding; we conclude that Estes is not to be read as announcing a constitutional rule barring still photographic, radio and television coverage in all cases and under all circumstances. It does not stand as an absolute ban on state experimentation with an evolving technology, which, in terms of modes of mass communication, was in its relative infancy in 1964, and is, even now, in a state of continuing change.

Since we are satisfied that Estes did not announce a constitutional rule that all photographic or broadcast coverage of criminal trials is inherently a denial of due process, we turn to consideration, as a matter of first impression, of the petitioner's suggestion that we now promulgate such a per se rule.

Any criminal case that generates a great deal of publicity presents some risks that the publicity may compromise the right of the defendant to a fair trial. Trial courts must be especially vigilant to guard against any impairment of the defendant's right to a verdict based solely upon the evidence and the relevant law. Over the years, courts have developed a range of curative devices to prevent publicity about a trial from infecting jury deliberations. See, e.g., Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539, 563-565 * * * (1975).

An absolute constitutional ban on broadcast coverage of trials cannot be justified simply because there is a danger that, in some cases, prejudicial broadcast accounts of pretrial and trial events may impair the ability of jurors to decide the issue of guilt or innocence uninfluenced by extraneous matter. The risk of juror prejudice in some cases does not justify an absolute ban on news coverage of trials by the printed media; so also the risk of such prejudice does not warrant an absolute constitutional ban on all broadcast coverage. A case attracts a high level of public attention because of its intrinsic interest to the public and the manner of reporting the event. The risk of juror prejudice is present in any publication of a trial, but the appropriate safeguard against such prejudice is the defendant's right to demonstrate that the media's coverage of his case—be it printed or broadcast—compromised the ability of the particular jury that heard the case to adjudicate fairly. * * *

As we noted earlier, the concurring opinions in Estes expressed concern that the very presence of media cameras and recording devices at a trial inescapably give rise to an adverse psychological impact on the participants in the trial. This kind of general psychological prejudice, allegedly present whenever there is broadcast coverage of a trial, is different from the more particularized problem of prejudicial impact discussed earlier. If it could be demonstrated that the mere presence of photographic and recording equipment and the knowledge that the event would be broadcast invariably and uniformly affected the conduct of participants so as to impair fundamental fairness, our task would be simple; prohibition of broadcast coverage of trials would be required.

In confronting the difficult and sensitive question of the potential psychological prejudice associated with broadcast coverage of trials, we have been aided by amicus briefs submitted by various state officers involved in law enforcement, the Conference of Chief Justices, and the Attorney Generals of 17 states in support of continuing experimentation such as that embarked upon by Florida, and by the American Bar Association, the American College of Trial Lawyers, and various members of the defense bar representing essentially the views expressed by the concurring Justices in Estes.

Not unimportant to the position asserted by Florida and other states is the change in television technology since 1962, when Estes was tried. It is urged, and some empirical data are presented, that many of the negative factors found in Estes—cumbersome equipment, cables, distracting lighting, numerous camera technicians—are less substantial factors today than they were at that time.

It is also significant that safeguards have been built into the experimental programs in state courts, and into the Florida program, to avoid some of the most egregious problems envisioned by the six opinions in the Estes case. Florida admonishes its courts to take special pains to protect certain witnesses—for example, children, victims of sex crimes, some informants, and even the very timid witness or party—from the glare of publicity and the tensions of being “on camera.” Petition of Post-Newsweek Stations of Florida, Inc., 370 So.2d, at 779.

The Florida guidelines place on trial judges positive obligations to be on guard to protect the fundamental right of the accused to a fair trial. The Florida statute, being one of the few permitting broadcast coverage of criminal trials over the objection of the accused, raises problems not present in the statutes of other states. Inherent in electronic coverage of a trial is the risk that the very awareness by the accused of the coverage and the contemplated broadcast may adversely affect the conduct of the participants and the fairness of the trial, yet leave no evidence of how the conduct or the trial's fairness was affected. Given this danger, it is significant that Florida requires that objections of the accused to coverage be heard and considered on the record by the trial court. See, e.g., Green v. State, 377 So.2d 193, 201 * * * (Fla.1979). In addition to providing a record for appellate review, a pretrial hearing enables a defendant to advance the basis of his objection to broadcast coverage and allows the trial court to define the steps necessary to minimize or eliminate the risks of prejudice to the accused. Experiments such as the one presented here may well increase the number of appeals by adding a new basis for claims to reverse, but this is a risk Florida has chosen to take after preliminary experimentation. Here, the record does not indicate that appellants requested an evidentiary hearing to show adverse impact or injury. Nor does the record reveal anything more than generalized allegations of prejudice.

Nonetheless, it is clear that the general issue of the psychological impact of broadcast coverage upon the participants in a trial, and particularly upon the defendant, is still a subject of sharp debate—as the Amicus Briefs of the American Bar Association, the American College of Trial Lawyers, and others of the trial bar in opposition to Florida's experiment demonstrate. These amici state the view that the concerns expressed by the concurring opinions in Estes, * * * have been borne out by actual experience. Comprehensive empirical data is still not available—at least on some aspects of the problem. For example, the Amici Brief of the Attorneys General concedes:

The defendant's interest in not being harassed and in being able to concentrate on the proceedings and confer effectively with his attorney are crucial aspects of a fair trial. There is not much data on defendant's reactions to televised trials available now, but what there is indicates that it is possible to regulate the media so that their presence does not weigh heavily on the defendant. Particular attention should be paid to this area of concern as study of televised trials continues. * * *

The experimental status of electronic coverage of trials is also emphasized by the Amicus Brief of the Conference of Chief Justices:

Examination and reexamination by state courts of the in-court presence of the electronic news media, vel non, is an exercise of the authority reserved to the states under our federalism.

Whatever may be the "mischievous potentialities [of broadcast coverage] for intruding upon the detached atmosphere which should always surround the judicial process," Estes v. Texas, 381 U.S., at 587, at present no one has been able to present empirical data sufficient to establish that the mere presence of the broadcast media inherently has an adverse effect on that process. * * * The appellants have offered nothing to demonstrate that their trial was subtly tainted by broadcast coverage—let alone that all broadcast trials would be so tainted. * * *

Where, as here, we cannot say that a denial of due process automatically, results from activity authorized by a state, the admonition of Justice Brandeis, dissenting in New State Ice Co. v. Liebmann, 385 U.S. 262, 311 (1932), is relevant:

To stave experimentation in things social and economic is a grave responsibility. Denial of the right to experiment may be fraught with serious consequences to the Nation. It is one of the happy incidents of the federal system that a single courageous state may, if its citizens choose, serve as a laboratory; and try novel social and economic experiments without risk to the rest of the country. This Court has the power to prevent an experiment. We may strike down the statute which embodies it on the ground that, in our opinion, the measure is arbitrary, capricious, or unreasonable. * * * But in the exercise of this high power, we must be ever on our guard, lest we erect our prejudices into legal principles. If we would guide by the light of reason, we must let our minds be bold.

This concept of federalism, echoed by the states favoring Florida's experiment, must guide our decision. [Emphasis added.]

Amici members of the defense bar vigorously contend that displaying the accused on television is in itself a denial of due process. Amici Brief of the Public Defenders. This was a source of concern to Chief Justice Warren and Justice Harlan in Estes: that coverage of select cases "singles out certain defendants and subjects them to trials under prejudicial conditions not experienced by others." 381 U.S., at 565 (Warren, C.J., concurring). Selection of which trials, or parts of trials, to broadcast will inevitably be made not by judges but by the media, and will be governed by such factors as the nature of the crime and the status and position of the accused—or of the victim; the effect may be to titillate rather than to educate and inform. The unanswered question is whether electronic coverage will bring public humiliation upon the accused with such randomness that it will evoke due process concerns by being "unusual in the same way that being struck by lightning" is "unusual." Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238, 309 (1972). (Stewart, J., concurring). Societies and political systems, that, from time to time, have put on "Yankee Stadium" "show trials" tell more about the power of the state than about its concern for the decent administration of justice—with every citizen receiving the same kind of justice.

The concurring opinion of Chief Justice Warren joined by Justices Douglas and Goldberg in Estes can fairly be read as viewing the very broadcast of some trials as potentially a form of punishment in itself—a punishment before guilt. This concern is far from trivial. But, whether coverage of a few trials will, in practice, be the equivalent of a “Yankee Stadium” setting—which Justice Harlan likened to the public pillory long abandoned as a barbaric perversion of decent justice—must also await the continuing experimentation.

To say that the appellants have not demonstrated that broadcast coverage is inherently a denial of due process is not to say that the appellants were in fact accorded all of the protections of due process in their trial. As noted earlier, a defendant has the right on review to show that the media's coverage of his case—printed or broadcast—compromised the ability of the jury to judge him fairly. Alternatively, a defendant might show that broadcast coverage of his particular case had an adverse impact on the trial participants sufficient to constitute a denial of due process. Neither showing was made in this case.

To demonstrate prejudice in a specific case a defendant must show something more than juror awareness that the trial is such as to attract the attention of broadcasters. Murphy v. Florida, 421 U.S. 794, 800 (1975). No doubt the very presence of a camera in the courtroom made the jurors aware that the trial was thought to be of sufficient interest to the public to warrant coverage. Jurors, forbidden to watch all broadcasts, would have had no way of knowing that only fleeting seconds of the proceeding would be reproduced. But the appellants have not attempted to show with any specificity that the presence of cameras impaired the ability of the jurors to decide the case on only the evidence before them or that their trial was affected adversely by the impact on any of the participants of the presence of cameras and the prospect of broadcast.

Although not essential to our holding, we note that at voir dire, the jurors were asked if the presence of the camera would in any way compromise their ability to consider the case. Each answered that the camera would not prevent him from considering the case solely on the merits. * * * The trial court instructed the jurors not to watch television accounts of the trial, * * * and the appellants do not contend that any juror violated this instruction. The appellants have offered no evidence that any participant in this case was affected by the presence of cameras. In short, there is no showing that the trial was compromised by television coverage, as was the case in Estes.

It is not necessary either to ignore or to discount the potential danger to the fairness of a trial in a particular case in order to conclude that Florida may permit the electronic media to cover trials in its state courts. Dangers lurk in this, as in most, experiments, but unless we were to conclude that television coverage under all conditions is prohibited by the Constitution, the states must be free to experiment. We are not empowered by the Constitution to oversee or harness state procedural experimentation; only when the state action infringes fundamental guarantees are we authorized to intervene. We must assume state courts will be alert to any factors that impair the fundamental rights of the accused.

The Florida program is inherently evolutionary in nature; the initial project has provided guidance for the new canons which can be changed at will, and application of which is subject to control by the trial judge. The risk of prejudice to particular defendants is ever present and must be examined carefully as cases arise. Nothing of the “Roman circus” or “Yankee Stadium" atmosphere, as in Estes, prevailed here, however, nor have appellants attempted to show that the unsequestered jury was exposed to "sensational" coverage, in the sense of Estes or of Sheppard v. Maxwell, 384 U.S. 333 (1966). Absent a showing of prejudice of constitutional dimensions to these defendants, there is no reason for this Court either to endorse or to invalidate Florida's experiment.

In this setting, because this Court has no supervisory authority over state courts, our review is confined to whether there is a constitutional violation. We hold that the Constitution does not prohibit a state from experimenting with the program authorized by revised Canon 3A(7).

Justice STEWART, concurring in the result.

Although concurring in the judgment, I cannot join the opinion of the Court because I do not think the convictions in this case can be affirmed without overruling Estes v. Texas, 381 U.S.532.

* * *

Justice WHITE, concurring in the judgment.

* * *

For the reasons stated by Justice Stewart in his concurrence today, I think Estes is fairly read as establishing a per se constitutional rule against televising any criminal trial if the defendant objects. So understood, Estes must be overruled to affirm the judgment below.

* * *

Although the Court's opinion today contends that it is consistent with Estes, I believe that it effectively eviscerates Estes. The Florida rule has no exception for the sensational or widely publicized case. Absent a showing of specific prejudice, any kind of case may be televised as long as the rule is otherwise complied with. In re Petition of Post-Newsweek, 370 So.2d 764, 774 (Fla.1979). Thus, even if the present case is precisely the kind of case referred to in Justice Harlan's concurrence in Estes, the Florida rule overrides the defendant's objections. The majority opinion does not find it necessary to deal with appellants' contention that because their case attracted substantial publicity, specific prejudice need not be shown. By affirming the judgment below, which sustained the rule, the majority indicates that not even the narrower reading of Estes will any longer be authoritative.

Moreover, the Court now reads Estes as merely announcing that on the facts of that case there had been an unfair trial—i.e., it established no per se rule at all. Justice Clark's majority opinion, however, expressly recognized that no "isolatable" or "actual" prejudice had been or need be shown, 381 U.S., at 542-543, and Justice Harlan expressly rejected the necessity of showing "specific" prejudice in cases "like this one." 581 U.S., at 593. It is thus with telling effect that the Court now rules that "absent a showing of prejudice of constitutional dimensions to these defendants," there is no reason to overturn the Florida rule, to reverse the judgment of the Florida Supreme Court or to set aside the conviction of the appellants. * * *

By reducing Estes to an admonition to proceed with some caution, the majority does not underestimate or minimize the risks of televising criminal trials over a defendant's objections. I agree that those risks are real and should not be permitted to develop into the reality of an unfair trial. Nor does the decision today, as I understand it, suggest that any state is any less free than it was to avoid this hazard by not permitting a trial to be televised over the objection of the defendant or by forbidding cameras in its court rooms in any criminal case.

Accordingly, I concur in the judgment.

---

A MODEST PROPOSAL

Because courts may have created a publication/news-gathering dichotomy that may not exist in the real world of practical journalism,<sup>83</sup> journalists will continue to press for First Amendment recognition of access rights. But it is also urgent that reporters and editors attempt to conform to voluntary, nonenforceable, flexible press-bar-bench guidelines. They have been thoughtfully worked out over a long period of time and may be our last best hope for avoiding having to choose between free speech and fair trials—"two of the most cherished policies of our civilization."<sup>84</sup> Journalists should also participate in the development, application, and modification of these voluntary codes when called upon.<sup>85</sup>

When any judge attempts to make voluntary guidelines part of a judicial order, as happened in Nebraska and Washington, vigorous exception must be taken in the first instance by the reporter. Similarly, when a courtroom is closed or a record sealed, reporters should be equipped with objection cards and clear procedures to follow in arguing for a written transcript of the judge's order, postponement of the judicial proceeding, a hearing on the closure order, and, beyond that, opportunity for immediate appeal from an adverse ruling. In the meantime, obey the order even though you think it wrong and expect it to be overturned. Because First Amendment rights are involved, press attorneys may argue for an expedited appeal (see National Socialist Party of America v. Village of Skokie, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1704, 432 U.S. 43 (1977) and Richmond Newspapers). The party petitioning for closure bears the burden of proof.

Beyond the procedures of particular media, reporters and their attorneys may cite state voluntary guidelines, state law, alternatives such as postponing suppression hearings until a jury is empaneled and sequestered, state rules of criminal procedure, closure guidelines of the American Bar Association, the Department of Justice, and the U.S. Judicial Conference.

There are times, of course, when publication ought to be postponed. A federal district judge in Philadelphia asked reporters to suspend for a single day publication of the fact that murder charges were pending against a man being tried for perjury. When the request was ignored, the judge turned it into an oral order that was later held by an appeals court to be procedurally deficient.<sup>86</sup> Was the judge asking too much? Would compliance on the part of the press have shaken the foundations of our constitutional system? The right to publish inevitably carries with it the right to refrain from publishing. In the best of worlds, the press will have full access to all information about crime and the courts, and it will make its own editorial decisions on what to publish in the best interests of an informed public and unimpaired justice. The thoughtful course will sometimes be to postpone publication.

There are empirical questions left to answer. More must be learned about the real effect of publicity and photography on jury verdicts. Can fairness be predicated on juror ignorance, a question Mark Twain's prose raised at the beginning of this chapter? If we cannot trust jurors to be fair, can we cajole or deceive them into reaching fair verdicts? A close reading of the cases in this area suggests that the 83. Helle, The News-Gathering/Publication Dichotomy and Government Expression, 1982 Duke L.J. 1 (1982). This article is a most comprehensive examination of the Court's theoretical problems with access questions. It is also an appeal for a return to libertarian precepts.

84. Justice Hugo Black in Bridges v. California, 314 U.S. 252 (1941).

85. See, for example, the statement of the National News Council in Protecting Two Vital Freedoms: Fair Trial and Free Press (1980).

86. United States v. Frederick Schiavo, Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. 504 F.2d 1 (3d Cir. 1974).

Court may be placing greater emphasis on the findings of the behavioral sciences than has been its custom. And there remains the problem of choosing the proper scales in which to weigh individual against social values.

In the meantime, there is evidence that trilateral cooperation has worked. To ignore the sensible recommendations contained in voluntary press-bar-bench guidelines will in the 1980s be a mark of professional immaturity.

Public Access to The Print Media

A RIGHT OF ACCESS AND REPLY TO THE PRESS?

Access to the Press—A New First Amendment Right

Reprinted with permission of the publisher; copyright © 1967 by the Harvard Law Review Association. Jerome A. Barron, 80 Harv.Law Rev. 1641 (1967).

The press, long enshrined among our most highly cherished institutions, was thought a cornerstone of democracy when its name was boldly inscribed in the Bill of Rights. Freed from governmental restraint, initially by the first amendment and later by the fourteenth, the press was to stand majestically as the champion of new ideas and the watch dog against governmental abuse. Professor Barron finds this conception of the first amendment, perhaps realistic in the eighteenth century heyday of political pamphleteering, essentially romantic in an era marked by extraordinary technological developments in the communications industry. To make viable the time-honored "marketplace" theory, he argues for a twentieth century interpretation of the first amendment which will impose an affirmative responsibility on the monopoly newspaper to act as sounding board for new ideas and old grievances.

There is an anomaly in our constitutional law. While we protect expression once it has come to the fore, our law is indifferent to creating opportunities for expression. Our constitutional theory is in the grip of a romantic conception of free expression, a belief that the "marketplace of ideas" is freely accessible. But if ever there were a self-operating marketplace of ideas, it has long ceased to exist. The mass media's development of an antipathy to ideas requires legal intervention if novel and unpopular ideas are to be assured a forum—unorthodox points of view which have no claim on broadcast time and newspaper space as a matter of right are in poor position to compete with those aired as a matter of grace.

The free expression questions which now come before the courts involve individuals who have managed to speak or write in a manner that captures public attention and provokes legal reprisal. The conventional constitutional issue is whether expression already uttered should be given first amendment shelter or whether it may be subjected to sanction as speech beyond the constitutionally protected pale. To those who can obtain access to the media of mass communications first amendment case law furnishes considerable help. But what of those whose ideas are too unacceptable to secure access to the media? To them the mass communications industry replies: The first amendment guarantees our freedom to do as we choose with our media. Thus the constitutional imperative of free expression becomes a rationale for repressing competing ideas. First amendment theory must be reexamined, for only by responding to the present reality of the mass media's repression of ideas can the constitutional guarantee of free speech best serve its original purposes.

I. THE ROMANTIC VIEW OF THE FIRST AMENDMENT:

A RATIONALE FOR REPRESSION

* * * [A]n essentially romantic view of first amendment has perpetuated the lack of legal interest in the availability to various interest groups of access to means of communication. Symptomatic of this view is Mr. Justice Douglas' eloquent dissent in Dennis v. United States:

When ideas compete in the market for acceptance, full and free discussion exposes the false and they gain few adherents. Full and free discussion even of ideas we hate encourages the testing of our own prejudices and preconceptions. * * *

The assumption apparent in this excerpt is that, without government intervention, there is a free market mechanism for ideas. Justice Douglas's position expresses the faith that, if government can be kept away from "ideas," the self-operating and self-correcting force of "full and free discussion" will go about its eternal task of keeping us from "embracing what is cheap and false" to the end that victory will go to the doctrine which is "true to our genius."

* * *

The possibility of governmental repression is present so long as government endures, and the first amendment has served as an effective device to protect the flow of ideas from governmental censorship:

"Happily government censorship has put down few roots in this country. * * * We have in the United States no counterpart of the Lord Chamberlain who is censor over England's stage." But this is to place laurels before a phantom—our constitutional law has been singularly indifferent to the reality and implications of nongovernmental obstructions to the spread of political truth. This indifference becomes critical when a comparatively few private hands are in a position to determine not only the content of information but its very availability, when the soap box yields to radio and the political pamphlet to the monopoly newspaper.

II. OBSTACLES TO ACCESS: THE CHANGING TECHNOLOGY OF THE COMMUNICATIONS PROCESS

* * * Difficulties in securing access, unknown both to the draftsmen of the first amendment and to the early proponents of its "marketplace" interpretation, have been wrought by the changing technology of mass media.

* * *

Many American cities have become one newspaper towns. * * * The failures of existing media are revealed by the development of new media to convey unorthodox, unpopular, and new ideas. Sit-ins and demonstrations testify to the inadequacy of old media as instruments to afford full and effective hearing for all points of view. Demonstrations, it has been well said, are "the free press of the movement to win justice for Negroes. * * * But, like an inadequate underground press, it is a communications medium by default, a statement of the inability to secure access to the conventional means of reaching and changing public opinion. By the bizarre and unsettling nature of his technique the demonstrator hopes to arrest and divert attention long enough to compel the public to ponder his message. But attention-getting devices so abound in the modern world that new ones soon become tiresome. The dissenter must look for ever more unsettling assaults on the mass mind if he is to have continuing impact. Thus, as critics of protest are eager and in a sense correct to say, the prayer-singing student demonstration is the prelude to Watts. But the difficulty with this criticism is that it wishes to throttle protest rather than to recognize that protest has taken these forms because it has had nowhere else to go.

III. MAKING THE FIRST AMENDMENT WORK

The Justices of the United States Supreme Court are not innocently unaware of these contemporary social realities, but they have nevertheless failed to give the "marketplace of ideas" theory of the first amendment the burial it merits. Perhaps the interment of this theory has been denied for the understandable reason that the Court is at a loss to know with what to supplant it. But to put off inquiry under today's circumstances will only aggravate the need for it under tomorrow's.

There is inequality in the power to communicate ideas just as there is inequality in economic bargaining power; to recognize the latter and deny the former is quixotic. The "marketplace of ideas" view has rested on the assumption that protecting the right of expression is equivalent to providing for it. But changes in the communications industry have destroyed the equilibrium in that marketplace. While it may have been still possible in 1925 to believe with Justice Holmes that every idea is "acted on unless some other belief outweighs it or some failure of energy stifles the movement at its birth," it is impossible to believe that now. Yet the Holmesian theory is not abandoned, even though the advent of radio and television has made even more evident that philosophy's unreality. A realistic view of the first amendment requires recognition that a right of expression is somewhat thin if it can be exercised only at the sufferance of the managers of mass communications.

* * *

A corollary of the romantic view of the first amendment is the Court's unquestioned assumption that the amendment affords "equal" protection to the various media. According to this view new media of communication are assimilated into first amendment analysis without regard to the enormous differences in impact these media have in comparison with the traditional printed word. Radio and television are to be as free as newspapers and magazines, sound trucks as free as radio and television.

This extension of a simplistic egalitarianism to media whose comparative impacts are gravely disproportionate is wholly unrealistic. It results from confusing freedom of media content with freedom of the media to restrict access. The assumption in romantic first amendment analysis that the same postulates apply to different classes of people, situations, and means of communication obscures the fact, noted explicitly by Justice Jackson in Kovacs v. Cooper, that problems of access and impact vary significantly from medium to medium: "The moving picture screen, the radio, the newspaper, the handbill, the sound truck and the street corner orator have differing natures, values, abuses and dangers. Each, in my view, is a law unto itself, and all we are dealing with now is the sound truck."

* * *

An analysis of the first amendment must be tailored to the context in which ideas are or seek to be aired. This contextual approach requires an examination of the purposes served by and the impact of each particular medium. If a group seeking to present a particular side of a public issue is unable to get space in the only newspaper in town, is this inability compensated by the availability of the public park or the sound truck? Competitive media only constitute alternative means of access in a crude manner. If ideas are criticized in one forum the most adequate response is in the same forum since it is most likely to reach the same audience. Further, the various media serve different functions and create different reactions and expectations—criticism of an individual or a governmental policy over television may reach more people but criticism in print is more durable.

The test of a community's opportunities for free expression rests not so much in an abundance of alternative media but rather in an abundance of opportunities to secure expression in media with the largest impact. * * *

The late Professor Meiklejohn, who has articulated a view of the first amendment which assumes its justification to be political self-government, has wisely pointed out that "what is essential is not that everyone shall speak, but that everything worth saying shall be said"—that the point of ultimate interest is not the words of the speakers but the minds of the hearers. Can everything worth saying be effectively said? Constitutional opinions that are particularly solicitous of the interests of mass media—radio, television, and mass circulation newspaper—devote little thought to the difficulties of securing access to those media. If those media are unavailable, can the minds of "hearers" be reached effectively? Creating opportunities for expression is as important as ensuring the right to express ideas without fear of governmental reprisal.

* * *

Today ideas reach the millions largely to the extent they are permitted entry into the great metropolitan dailies, news magazines, and broadcasting networks. The soap box is no longer an adequate forum for public discussion. Only the new media of communication can lay sentiments before the public, and it is they rather than government who can most effectively abridge expression by nullifying the opportunity for an idea to win acceptance. As a constitutional theory for the communication of ideas, laissez faire is manifestly irrelevant.

The constitutional admonition against abridgment of speech and press is at present not applied to the very interests which have real power to effect such abridgment. Indeed, nongoverning minorities in control of the means of communication should perhaps be inhibited from restraining free speech (by the denial of access to their media) even more than governing majorities are restrained by the first amendment—minorities do not have the mandate which a legislative majority enjoys in a polity operating under a theory of representative government. What is required is an interpretation of the first amendment which focuses on the idea that restraining the hand of government is quite useless in assuring free speech if a restraint on access is effectively secured by private groups. A constitutional prohibition against governmental restrictions on expression is effective only if the Constitution ensures an adequate opportunity for discussion. Since this opportunity exists only in the mass media, the interests of those who control the means of communication must be accommodated with the interests of those who seek a forum in which to express their point of view.

IV. NEW WINDS OF CONSTITUTIONAL DOCTRINE: THE IMPLICATIONS FOR A RIGHT TO BE HEARD

* * *

The potential of existing law to support recognition of a right of access has gone largely unnoticed by the Supreme Court. Judicial blindness to the problem of securing access to the press is dramatically illustrated by New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, one of the latest chapters in the ro-

matic and rigid interpretation of the first amendment. * * *

The constitutional armor which Times now offers newspapers is predicated on the "principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open, and that it may well include vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials." But it is paradoxical that although the libel laws have been emasculated for the benefit of defendant newspapers where the plaintiff is a "public official," the Court shows no corresponding concern as to whether debate will in fact be assured. The irony of Times and its progeny lies in the unexamined assumption that reducing newspaper exposure to libel litigation will remove restraints on expression and lead to an "informed society." But in fact the decision creates a new imbalance in the communications process. Purporting to deepen the constitutional guarantee of full expression, the actual effect of the decision is to perpetuate the freedom of a few in a manner adverse to the public interest in uninhibited debate. Unless the Times doctrine is deepened to require opportunities for the public figure to reply to a defamatory attack, the Times decision will merely serve to equip the press with some new and rather heavy artillery which can crush as well as stimulate debate.

* * *

The law of libel is not the only threat to first amendment values; problems of equal moment are raised by judicial inattention to the fact that the newspaper publisher is not the only addressee of first amendment protection. Supreme Court efforts to remove the press from judicial as well as legislative control do not necessarily stimulate and preserve that "multitude of tongues" on which "we have staked * * our all." What the Court has done is to magnify the power of one of the participants in the communications process with apparently no thought of imposing on newspapers concomitant responsibilities to assure that the new protection will actually enlarge and protect opportunities for expression.

If financial immunization by the Supreme Court is necessary to ensure a courageous press, the public officials who fall prey to such judicially reinforced lions should at least have the right to respond or to demand retraction in the pages of the newspapers which have published charges against them. The opportunity for counterattack ought to be at the very heart of a constitutional theory which supposedly is concerned with providing an outlet for individuals "who wish to exercise their freedom of speech even though they are not members of the press." If no such right is afforded or even considered, it seems meaningless to talk about vigorous public debate.

By severely undercutting a public official's ability to recover damages when he had been defamed, the Times decision would seem to reduce the likelihood of retractions since the normal mitigation incentive to retract will be absent. For example, the Times failed to print a retraction as requested by Sullivan even though an Alabama statute provided that a retraction eliminates the jury's ability to award punitive damages. On the other hand, Times was a special case and the Court explicitly left open the question of a public official's ability to recover damages if there were a refusal to retract.<sup>43</sup>

43. 376 U.S. 254 at 286. Retraction statutes have some bearing on enforcing responsive dialogue. These statutes, common in this country, require the publisher to "take back" what has already been said if damages in a defamation suit are to be mitigated. If false statements have been made, and the complainant can convince the publisher to retract on the basis of correct information, such a procedure certainly serves a cleansing function for the information process. For a discussion of the status of retractions after the Times decision, see Note, Vindication of the Reputation of a Public Official, 80 Harv.L.Rev. 1730, 1740-43 (1967).

Whether or not a failure to retract may ever constitute such evidence [of "actual malice"], there are two reasons why it does not here. First, the letter written by the Times reflected a reasonable doubt on its part as to whether the advertisement could reasonably be taken to refer to respondent at all. Second, it was not a final refusal, since it asked for an explanation on this point—a request that respondent chose to ignore.

Although the Court did not foreclose the possibility of allowing public officials to recover damages for a newspaper's refusal to retract, its failure to impose such a responsibility represents a lost opportunity to work out a more relevant theory of the first amendment. Similarly, the Court's failure to require newspapers to print a public official's reply ignored a device which could further first amendment objectives by making debate meaningful and responsive. Abandonment of the romantic view of the first amendment would highlight the importance of giving constitutional status to these responsibilities of the press.

However, even these devices are no substitute for the development of a general right of access to the press. A group that is not being attacked but merely ignored will find them of little use. Indifference rather than hostility is the bane of new ideas and for that malaise only some device of more general application will suffice. It is true that Justice Brennan, writing for the Court in Times, did suggest that a rigorous test for libel in the public criticism area is particularly necessary where the offending publication is an "editorial advertisement," since this is an "important outlet for the promulgation of information and ideas by persons who do not themselves have access to publishing facilities—who wish to exercise their freedom of speech even though they are not members of the press." This statement leaves us at the threshold of the question of whether these individuals—the "non-press"—should have a right of access secured by the first amendment: should the newspaper have an obligation to take the editorial advertisement? As Justice Brennan appropriately noted, newspapers are an important outlet for ideas. But currently they are outlets entry to which is granted at the pleasure of their managers. The press having been given the Times immunity to promote public debate, there seems little justification for not enforcing coordinate responsibility to allocate space equitably among ideas competing for public attention. And, some quite recent shifts in constitutional doctrine may at last make feasible the articulation of a constitutionally based right of access to the media.

* * *

The Times decision operates on the assumption that newspapers are fortresses of vigorous public criticism, that assuring the press freedom over its content is the only prerequisite to open and robust debate. But if the raison d'être of the mass media is not to maximize discussion but to maximize profits, inquiry should be directed to the possible effect of such a fact on constitutional theory. The late Professor V.O. Key stressed the consequences which flow from the fact that communications is big business:<sup>46</sup>

[A]ttention to the economic aspects of the communications industries serves to emphasize the fact that they consist of commercial enterprises, not public service institutions. * * * They sell advertising in one form or another, and they bait it principally with entertainment. Only incidentally do they collect and disseminate political intelligence.

* * *

* * * The networks are in an unenviable economic position. They are not completely free to sell their product—air time. If they make their facilities available to those who advocate causes slightly off color politically, they may antagonize their major customers.

46. V.O. Key, Public Opinion and American Democracy, 378-79, 387 (1961).

The press suffers from the same pressures—"newspaper publishers are essentially people who sell white space on newsprint to advertisers"; in large part they are only processors of raw materials purchased from others.

Professor Key's conclusion—indifference to content follows from the structure of contemporary mass communications—compares well with Marshall McLuhan's view that the nature of the communications process compels a "strategy of neutrality." For McLuhan it is the technology or form of television itself, rather than the message, which attracts public attention. Hence the media owners are anxious that media content not get enmeshed with unpopular views which will undermine the attraction which the media enjoy by virtue of their form alone:<sup>49</sup>

Thus the commercial interests who think to render media universally acceptable, invariably settle for "entertainment" as a strategy of neutrality. A more spectacular mode of the ostrich-head-in-sand could not be devised, for it ensures maximum pervasiveness for any medium whatever.

Whether the mass media suffer from an institutional distaste for controversy because of technological or of economic factors, this antipathy to novel ideas must be viewed against a background of industry insistence on constitutional immunity from legally imposed responsibilities. A quiet truth emerges from such a study: industry opposition to legally imposed responsibilities does not represent a flight from censorship but rather a flight from points of view. Points of view suggest disagreement and angry customers are not good customers.

* * *

The mass communications industry should be viewed in constitutional litigation with the same candor with which it has been analyzed by industry members and scholars in communication. * * *

If the mass media are essentially business enterprises and their commercial nature makes it difficult to give a full and effective hearing to a wide spectrum of opinion, a theory of the first amendment is unrealistic if it prevents courts or legislatures from requiring the media to do that which, for commercial reasons, they would be otherwise unlikely to do. Such proposals only require that the opportunity for publication be broadened and do not involve restraint on publication or punishment after publication. * * * Justice Douglas remarked that the vice of censorship lies in the substitution it makes of "majority rule where minority tastes or viewpoints were to be tolerated." But what is suggested here is merely that legal steps be taken to provide for the airing and publication of "minority tastes or viewpoints," not that the mass media be prevented from publishing their views.

* * * When commercial considerations dominate, often leading the media to repress ideas, these media should not be allowed to resist controls designed to promote vigorous debate and expression by cynical reliance on the first amendment.

* * *

But can a valid distinction be drawn between newspapers and broadcasting stations, with only the latter subject to regulation? It is commonly said that because the number of possible radio and television licenses is limited, regulation is the natural regimen for broadcasting. Yet the number of daily newspapers is certainly not infinite and, in light of the fact that there are now three times as many radio stations as there are newspapers, the relevance of this distinction is dubious. Consolidation is the established pattern of the American press today, and the need to develop means of access to the press is not diminished because the limitation on the number of newspapers is caused by economic rather than technological factors. Nor is the argument that other newspapers can always spring into existence persuasive—the ability of individuals to publish pamphlets should not preclude regulation of mass circulation, monopoly newspapers any more than the availability of sound trucks precludes regulation of broadcasting stations.

49. H.M. McLuhan, Understanding Media, 305 (1964).

If a contextual approach is taken and a purposive view of the first amendment adopted, at some point the newspaper must be viewed as impressed with a public service stamp and hence under an obligation to provide space on a nondiscriminatory basis to representative groups in the community.<sup>66</sup> It is to be hoped that an awareness of the listener's interest in broadcasting will lead to an equivalent concern for the reader's stake in the press, and that first amendment recognition will be given to a right of access for the protection of the reader, the listener, and the viewer.

V. IMPLEMENTING A RIGHT OF ACCESS TO THE PRESS

The foregoing analysis has suggested the necessity of rethinking first amendment theory so that it will not only be effective in preventing governmental abridgment but will also produce meaningful expression despite the present or potential repressive effects of the mass media. If the first amendment can be so invoked, it is necessary to examine what machinery is available to enforce a right of access and what bounds limit that right.

* * *

One alternative is a judicial remedy affording individuals and groups desiring to voice views on public issues a right of nondiscriminatory access to the community newspaper. This right could be rooted most naturally in the letter-to-the-editor column<sup>67</sup> and the advertising section. That pressure to establish such a right exists in our law is suggested by a number of cases in which plaintiffs have contended, albeit unsuccessfully, that in certain circumstances newspaper publishers have a common law duty to publish advertisements. In these cases the advertiser sought nondiscriminatory access, subject to even-handed limitations imposed by rates and space.

Although in none of these cases did the newspaper publisher assert lack of space, the right of access has simply been denied.<sup>68</sup> The drift of the cases is that a

66. This is reminiscent of Professor Chafee's query as to whether the monopoly newspaper ought to be treated like a public utility. Contrary to my position, however, he concluded that a legally enforceable right of access would not be feasible. 2 Chafee, Government and Mass Communications 624-50 (1947).

67. In Wall v. World Publishing Co., 263 P.2d 1010 (Okla.1953), a reader of the Tulsa World contended that the newspaper's invitation to its readers to submit letters on matters of public importance was a contract offer from the newspaper which was accepted by submission of the letter. The plaintiff argued that, by refusal to publish, the newspaper had breached its contract. Despite the ingenuity of the argument, the court held for defendant. Note, however, that a first amendment argument was not made to the court.

68. Shuck v. Carrol Daily Herald, 247 N.W. 813 (Iowa 1933); J.J. Gordon, Inc. v. Worcester Telegram Publishing Co., 177 N.E.2d 586 (Mass.1961); Mack v. Costello, 143 N.W. 950 (S.D.1913). These cases do not consider legislative power to compel access to the press. Other cases have denied a common law right but have suggested that the area is a permissible one for legislation. Approved Personnel, Inc. v. Tribune Co., 177 So.2d 704 (Fla.1965); Friedenberg v. Times Publishing Co., 127 So. 345 (La.1930); In re Louis Wohl, Inc., 50 F.2d 254 (E.D.Mich.1931); Poughkeepsie Buying Service, Inc. v. Poughkeepsie Newspapers, Inc., 131 N.Y.S.2d 515 (1954).

newspaper is not a public utility and thus has freedom of action regardless of the objectives of the claimant seeking access. One case has the distinction of being the only American case which has recognized a right of access. In Uhlman v. Sherman<sup>69</sup> an Ohio lower court held that the dependence and interest of the public in the community newspaper, particularly when it is the only one, imposes the reasonable demand that the purchase of advertising should be open to members of the public on the same basis.

But none of these cases mentions first amendment considerations. What is encouraging for the future of an emergent right of access is that it has been resisted by relentless invocation of the freedom of contract notion that a newspaper publisher is as free as any merchant to deal with whom he chooses.<sup>70</sup> But the broad holding of these commercial advertising cases need not be authoritative for political advertisement.

* * *

The courts could provide for a right of access other than by reinterpreting the first amendment to provide for the emergence as well as the protection of expression. A right of access to the pages of a monopoly newspaper might be predicated on Justice Douglas's open-ended "public function" theory which carried a majority of the Court in Evans v. Newton, [382 U.S. 296 (1966).] Such a theory would demand a rather rabid conception of "state action," but if parks in private hands cannot escape the stigma of abiding "public character," it would seem that a newspaper, which is the common journal of printed communication in a community, could not escape the constitutional restrictions which quasi-public status invites. If monopoly newspapers are indeed quasi-public, their refusal of space to particular viewpoints is state action abridging expression in violation of even the romantic view of the first amendment.

* * *

Another, and perhaps more appropriate, approach would be to secure the right of access by legislation. A statute might impose the modest requirement, for example, that denial of access not be arbitrary but rather be based on rational grounds. Although some cases have involved a statutory duty to publish,<sup>76</sup> a constitutional basis for a right of access has never been considered. * * *

* * *

Constitutional power exists for both federal and state legislation in this area. Turning first to the constitutional basis for federal legislation, it has long been held that freedom of expression is protected by the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment. The now celebrated section five of the fourteenth amendment authorizing Congress to "enforce, by appropriate legislation" the provisions of the fourteenth amendment, appears to be as resilient and serviceable a tool for effectuating the freedom of expression guarantee of the fourteenth amendment as for implementing the equal protection guarantee. Professor Cox has noted that our recent experience in constitutional adjudication has revealed an untapped reservoir of federal legislative power to define and promote the constitutional rights of individuals in relation to state government. When the consequence of private conduct is to deny to individuals the enjoyment of a right owed by the state, legislation which assures public capacity to perform that duty should be legitimate. Alternatively, legislation implementing responsibility to provide access to the mass media may be justified on a theory that the nature of the communications process imposes quasi-public functions on these quasi-public instrumentalities.<sup>95</sup>

69. 22 Ohio N.P. (n.s.) 225, 31 Ohio Dec. 54 (C.P.1919).

70. See, e.g., Shuck v. Carroll Daily Herald, 247 N.W. 813 (Iowa 1933).

76. Belleville Advocate Printing Co., v. St. Clair County, 168 N.E. 312 (Ill.1929); Lake County v. Lake County Publishing & Printing Co., 117 N.E. 452 (Ill.1917) (dictum) (statute setting rates chargeable for official notices imposed no duty to publish); Wooster v. Mahaska County; 98 N.W. 103 (Iowa 1904) (dictum) (newspaper had no duty to publish and legislature could not impose one).

* * * However, it is not necessary to amend the first amendment to attain the goal of greater access to the mass media. I do not think it adventurous to suggest that, if Congress were to pass a federal right of access statute, a sympathetic court would not lack the constitutional text necessary to validate the statute. If the first amendment is read to state affirmative goals, Congress is empowered to realize them. My basic premise in these suggestions is that a provision preventing government from silencing or dominating opinion should not be confused with an absence of governmental power to require that opinion be voiced.

If public order and an informed citizenry are, as the Supreme Court has repeatedly said, the goals of the first amendment, these goals would appear to comport well with state attempts to implement a right of access under the rubric of its traditional police power. If a right of access is not constitutionally proscribed, it would seem well within the powers reserved to the states by the tenth amendment of the Constitution to enact such legislation. Of course, if there were conflict between federal and state legislation, the federal legislation would control. Yet, the whole concept of a right of access is so embryonic that it can scarcely be argued that congressional silence preempts the field.

The right of access might be an appropriate area for experimental, innovative legislation. The right to access problems of a small state dominated by a single city with a monopoly press will vary, for example, from those of a populous state with many cities nourished by many competing media. These differences may be more accurately reflected by state autonomy in this area, resulting in a cultural federalism such as that envisaged by Justice Harlan in the obscenity cases. * * *

Utilization of a contextual approach highlights the importance of the degree to which an idea is suppressed in determining whether the right to access should be enforced in a particular case. If all media in a community are held by the same ownership, the access claim has greater attractiveness. This is true although the various media, even when they do reach the same audience, serve different functions and create different reactions and expectations. The existence of competition within the same medium, on the other hand, probably weakens the access claim though competition within a medium is no assurance that significant opinions will have no difficulty in securing access to newspaper space or broadcast time. It is significant that the right of access cases that have been litigated almost invariably involve a monopoly newspaper in a community.

VI. CONCLUSION

The changing nature of the communications process has made it imperative that the law show concern for the public interest in effective utilization of media for the expression of diverse points of view. Confrontation of ideas, a topic of eloquent affection in contemporary decisions, demands some recognition of a right to be heard as a constitutional principle. It is the writer's position that it is open to the courts to fashion a remedy for a right of access, at least in the most arbitrary cases, independently of legislation. If such an innovation is judicially resisted, I suggest that our constitutional law authorizes a carefully framed right of access statute which would forbid an arbitrary denial of space, hence securing an effective forum for the expression of divergent opinions. With the development of private restraints on free expression, the idea of a free marketplace where ideas can compete on their merits has become just as unrealistic in the twentieth century as the economic theory of perfect competition. The world in which an essentially rationalist philosophy of the first amendment was born has vanished and what was rationalism is now romance.

95. Evans v. Newton, 382 U.S. 296 (1966); Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501 (1946). Both decisions find that private property may become quasi-public without a statute in extreme cases. The Court should surely defer to a congressional determination in an arguable case.

Access and Its Critics

1. Professor Edwin Baker has argued that access theory advocates really posit a "market failure" model of the First Amendment. Access theorists, in this view, basically support a marketplace of ideas rationale for the First Amendment and are really seeking to improve the functioning of that marketplace. As Professor Baker sees it, these marketplace of ideas dissidents are usually asking for government intervention to make the marketplace of ideas work better. Their heresy is not that a marketplace of ideas model for the First Amendment is mistaken, but rather that presently the marketplace of ideas does not work and should be improved. Professor Baker is critical of these melioristic efforts. See generally, Baker, Scope of the First Amendment Freedom of Speech, 25 U.C.L.A. L.Rev. 964 at 986-987 (1978):

The correction of market failures requires criteria to guide the state in its intervention. If provision of adequate access is the goal, the lack of criteria for "adequacy" undermines the legitimacy of government regulation. For the government to determine what access is adequate involves the government implicitly judging what is the correct resolution of the marketplace debates—or, more bluntly, allows the government to define truth. If a purpose of the first amendment is to protect unpopular ideas that may eventually triumph over the majority's established dogma, then allowing the government to determine adequacy of access stands the first amendment on its head. (In other versions, where equality of input provides the criterion, the parallel problem will be defining equality.)

Is it possible (or desirable) to have access without having equal access?

2. Recently, a distinction has been made for First Amendment purposes between message composers and media owners. The former, in this view, enjoy a greater measure of protection. This distinction and a consequent novel response to the problem of encouraging access to the media is found in Nadel, A Unified Theory of the First Amendment: Divorcing the Medium from the Message, 2 Fordham Urban L. Journ. at 183 (1983):

Although in its role as a seller of space or time, a media owner is protected only by the fifth amendment, it may assert a derivative first amendment right on behalf of its advertisers or syndicated columnists. Such a right can only be claimed in support of these individuals' right to speak, as in the cases of New York Times v. Sullivan and Bigelow v. Virginia.

Professor Nadel summarizes his thesis as follows:

The theory of the first amendment discussed above distinguishes between the rights of the two groups comprising our system of communication: "hardware" medium owners and "software" message producers. First amendment rights belong solely to the latter—those who edit software messages which are normally entitled to copyrights. The amendment absolutely protects their thinking and editing (inclusion and exclusion of messages). If the expression of their message does not conflict with some other constitutional value then the government may not impose unreasonable restrictions on their access to media.

The owners of the media are not entitled to any direct first amendment protection, although they may assert rights of inclusion on behalf of those who use their media. The owner's rights to include and exclude messages are solely economic property rights. These permit them to select which messages will gain access to their media. If, however, their economic power becomes great enough to enable them to censor messages and/or the advantages of permitting them to exercise discretion is minimal, then the government may regulate access and even impose common carrier obligations upon them.

Professor Nadel makes a case for greater protection for the editor of the copyrightable software message. If a newspaper were to publish an editorial reply, the reply would have been copyrightable. Why shouldn't this theory protect the access seeker as well as the editor? Why should there be special protection for editors as compared to other writers or speakers?

3. Some writers on access have been very careful to distinguish between access to the privately owned press, which they do not favor, and access to public facilities or to "privately owned facilities which can be considered quasi public in nature." Professor Thomas I. Emerson has insisted on the need to make distinctions of this nature:

Obviously, any general requirement that private owners make their facilities available to other persons or groups would curtail drastically the freedom of the owners to communicate, would entail an intolerable degree of governmental regulation, and soon would destroy the entire system of freedom of expression. Thus, as is clear from Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, there is no obligation on the part of a newspaper to accord any right to reply to a candidate for election who has been attacked in its columns; indeed, action by a state legislature to compel such access was held to violate the first amendment. On the other hand, if the government allocates scarce facilities or grants a monopoly to private owners, a different issue is presented. See Emerson, The Affirmative Side of the First Amendment, 15 Ga.L.Rev. 795 at 810 (1981).

Although Professor Emerson does not favor governmental intervention to establish a right of access to the print media, he is of a different mind with regard to electronic media. Thus, he writes approvingly of the efforts that have been made to establish some rights in those "other than the government's licensees" to use broadcasting's "scarce" facilities. Professor Emerson makes these observations on the features of the Federal Communications Act which provides the right of entry to nonlicensees: "The structure thus established for the use of radio and television facilities would seem to constitute the bare minimum demanded by the affirmative side of the first amendment. It falls far short of meeting the standards of a thriving, successful system of freedom of expression." See Emerson, The Affirmative Side of the First Amendment, 15 Ga.L. Rev. 795 at 826 (1981).

4. Other writers believe that the access concept is fundamentally at war with the First Amendment and believe that the defect in the existing law is precisely that it makes distinctions. In this view, Red Lion and Tornillo are inconsistent from a First Amendment point of view. Furthermore, in this view, the only way this inconsistency can be reconciled is to apply the rationale of the Tornillo case to broadcasting as well. In short, proponents of this view would ask the court to reverse Red Lion. See Red Lion v. FCC, text, p. 845:

The requirement that a licensee devote any portion of his broadcast time to issues or to subjects not of his own selection perforce restricts his own freedom of speech in a way that cannot be reconciled with Tornillo. The additional requirement that he ventilate views that would undermine the force of his own view, or such views as he alone prefers to present on his station, is a similar restriction equally repugnant to Tornillo. That he must yield his station for the presentation of such matters at his own expense and that he must also supply a free forum for personal replies by those whom he has permitted to be criticized, is more of the same: they all directly abridge the licensee's "editorial control and judgment," and are inconsistent with Tornillo. See Van Alstyne, The Mobius Strip Of The First Amendment: Perspectives on Red Lion, 29 S.C.L.Rev. 539 at 560-561 (1978).

Professor Van Alstyne disclaims any intention to say that Red Lion was "plainly wrong." But it is his basic theme to suggest that "Tornillo is a case that represents a fundamentally different and more confident view of the First Amendment."

5. Increasingly, however, as Professor T.M. Scanlon, Jr., has pointed out, a major task of a "philosophical theory of freedom of expression" is to resolve some "fundamental issues" about which there are basic disagreements. What are these issues? To some extent, they are issues that arise from concentrations of ownership in the media and the consequent impact on the concept of free expression in our society. See Scanlon, Freedom of Expression and Categories of Expression, 40 U. of Pittsburgh, L.Rev. 519 (1979).

THE LEGAL STATUS OF ACCESS FOR ADVERTISING TO THE PRIVATELY OWNED DAILY PRESS

1. What is the status of a First Amendment-based right of access to the advertising columns of the privately owned press?

Has the Tornillo case, text, p. 584, with its emphasis on unfettered editorial decision making, foreclosed all claims of access for advertising? Or is the advertising section of the paper more susceptible to access claims? See Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Pittsburgh Comm. on Human Relations, 413 U.S. 376 (1973), text, p. 579. Moreover, Tornillo dealt with a statute compelling a newspaper to publish a reply to editorial attack, i.e., with the essential editorial product of the paper rather than with the traditionally open "advertising" section. The First Amendment-based access for advertising cases which follow illustrate the range of issues which occur in this area. See also Chapter VIII, text, p. 609.

2. What is the significance of discrimination in deciding whether there is any legal duty to accept advertisements? In Bloss v. Federated Publications, 145 N.W.2d 800 (Mich.1966), the plaintiff, a theater owner, wanted the Battle Creek Enquirer and News, the only daily newspaper in Battle Creek, Michigan, to publish certain advertisements concerning adult movies in the city. The paper had informed the theater owner that it did not wish to "accept advertising for theaters concerning suggestive or prurient material." Although the Michigan Court of Appeals declared that a newspaper is "a business affected with a public interest," it was held that the plaintiff's case failed to survive a motion for summary judgment because the "essential element of discrimination is lacking."

On appeal to the Supreme Court of Michigan that court affirmed. Bloss v. Federated Publications, 157 N.W.2d 241 (Mich.1968).

The case of Uhlman v. Sherman, 22 Ohio N.P., N.S., 225, 31 Ohio Dec. 54 (1919), was discussed in the Bloss litigation. It was heavily relied on by the theater owner since it is the only American case which has recognized a right of access to the press. See Barron, Access to the Press—A New First Amendment Right, 80 Harv.Law Rev. 1641 at 1667 (1967), this text, p. 559. Uhlman concerned discrimination against one commercial advertiser but not against other commercial advertisers.

---

ASSOCIATES & ALDRICH
CO., INC. v. TIMES MIRROR CO.

440 F.2D 133 (9TH CIR. 1971).

WRIGHT, Circuit Judge:

This appeal presents the question: May a federal court compel the publisher of a daily newspaper to accept and print advertising in the exact form submitted? The district court, granting a motion to dismiss answered the question in the negative. We affirm.

Appellant, a motion picture producer, sought to enjoin the appellee, publisher of the Los Angeles Times, from screening, censoring or otherwise changing appellant's proffered advertising copy. Invoking the jurisdiction of the district court under 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 1331, 1343(3) and 42 U.S.C.A. § 1983, it sought particularly to restrain appellee from altering its advertisements for the motion picture, "The Killing of Sister George."

* * *

* * * Even if state action were present, as in an official publication of a state-supported university, there is still the freedom to exercise subjective editorial discretion in rejecting a proffered article.
* * *

Appellant has not convinced us that the courts or any other governmental agency should dictate the contents of a newspaper.

There is no difference between compelling publication of material that the newspaper wishes not to print and prohibiting a newspaper from printing news or other material.

Appellant strongly urges that this case is governed by Red Lion Broadcasting Co.

v. Federal Communications Comm., 395 U.S. 367 (1969). * * *

Unlike broadcasting, the publication of a newspaper is not a government conferred privilege. As we have said, the press and the government have had a history of disassociation.

We can find nothing in the United States Constitution, any federal statute, or any controlling precedent that allows us to compel a private newspaper to publish advertisements without editorial control of their content merely because such advertisements are not legally obscene or unlawful.

In evaluating appellant's claim we note that its commercial advertisement was printed by the appellee, save for the deletion of items not essential to appellant's sales message and not altering the fundamental characteristics of appellant's presentation. This type of commercial exploitation is subject to less protection than other types of speech. Valentine v. Chrestensen, 316 U.S. 52 (1942).

Affirmed.

---

COMMENT

1. Should the Ninth Circuit in Associates & Aldrich have distinguished between the exercise of editorial discretion in the news columns of newspapers and the exercise of editorial discretion in an "open" section of the paper such as the advertising columns?

2. See generally Barron, Freedom of the Press for Whom? pp. 270-87 (1973).

In the light of the new First Amendment status accorded to commercial advertising, don't "porno" movie houses have a new basis upon which to argue that an entire class of advertising cannot be suppressed? See Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748 (1976), text, p. 159. Or do private newspapers simply have no First Amendment obligation to open up their advertising columns? In the Virginia Pharmacy case, it was the state which had attempted to ban a class of advertising. Here it is private newspapers who wish to ban a class of advertising. In short, the movie exhibitors may get wrecked on the shoals of the state action doctrine.

3. Is there a relationship between obscenity law and a right of access to the press? Associates & Aldrich Co. v. Times-Mirror illustrates that the actual significance of legal victories restricting the definition of obscenity in the interests of expanding artistic freedom can be frustrated if a right of access to the press is denied. In such circumstances, the end result may be that censorship by the press is substituted for censorship by the state.

4. Efforts to compel a First Amendment-based right of access to the advertising pages of the privately owned daily press still continue, as the Wisconsin Association of Nursing Homes case which follows illustrates:

---

WISCONSIN ASSOCIATION OF NURSING HOMES, INC.
v. THE JOURNAL CO.

285 N.W.2D 891 (WISC.1979).

CANNON, Judge.

* * *

Plaintiffs allege in their complaint that the defendants published a series of "investigative reports" in The Milwaukee Journal which dealt with the quality of care and services in several nursing homes. Plaintiffs further characterize the conclusions of the article as being "false and erroneous." As a result, plaintiffs prepared a full page advertisement which purported to respond to, and refute the allegations set out in the abovementioned "reports." The defendant newspaper refused to publish the advertisement in the form presented, and referred the question of possibly libelous matter to the attention of plaintiffs' attorneys. The same advertisement was resubmitted to The Milwaukee Journal, and was again rejected. Plaintiffs then commenced an action seeking an order of the court directing and compelling publication.

* * *

The issue before us on appeal is whether a court can compel the publisher of a daily newspaper to accept and print an advertisement in the exact form submitted. The court below, granting the motion to dismiss, answered in the negative. We must affirm. The respondents have a right to expect that the courts will respect and protect their constitutional right to exercise their prerogative in accepting or rejecting proposed advertising material.

The existence of a free press as a condition precedent to a free society has, therefore, been a primary concern of our courts. While there have been many arguments advanced by proponents of enforced access to the press, courts have steadfastly refused to permit any erosion of first amendment privileges. The Court, in Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1, 20 n. 18, (1945) emphasized this in its holding that it would not compel "AP or its members to permit publication of anything which their 'reason' tells them should not be published." New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713, (1971), clearly established the principle that any government action which acted as prior restraint on freedom of the press was presumptively unconstitutional. The Court in Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Human Rel. Comm'n, 413 U.S. 376, 391, (1973) stated:

Nor, a fortiori, does our decision authorize any restriction whatever, whether of content or layout, on stories or commentary originated by Pittsburgh Press, its columnists, or its contributors. On the contrary, we reaffirm unequivocally the protection afforded to editorial judgment and to the free expression of views on these and other issues, however controversial.

Most recently, the Court in Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241, 258 (1974) reaffirmed that:

A newspaper is more than a passive receptacle or conduit for news, comment, and advertising. The choice of material to go into a newspaper, and the decisions made as to limitations on the size and content of the paper, and treatment of public issues and public officials—whether fair or unfair—constitute the exercise of editorial control and judgment. It has yet to be demonstrated how governmental regulation of this crucial process can be exercised consistent with First Amendment guarantees of a free press as they have evolved to this time.

Thus, the clear weight of authority has not sanctioned any enforceable right of access to the press. In sum, a court can no more dictate what a privately owned newspaper can print than what it cannot print. * * *

Absent contractual provisions, then, first amendment protections do not embody any obligation on the part of a privately owned newspaper to publish anything which conflicts with its internal policies or the reasoned judgment of its editors. Nor must such a newspaper accept any advertisement in the form presented. The degree of judgmental discretion which a newspaper has with regard to refusing advertisements is not distinguishable, for purposes of first amendment analysis, from the degree of discretion it has as to the content of any other editorial materials submitted for publication. * * *

Plaintiffs argue, however, that defendants have a “monopoly” over all newspapers of general coverage in the Milwaukee metropolitan area, and that without access to defendants’ newspapers, plaintiffs are deprived of any right to present their views to the public. Plaintiffs further contend that, as a result of this “monopoly,” defendants have assumed the status of a public institution or quasi-public corporation or utility, and thus have a responsibility to their readers, advertisers, and subscribers to print both sides of a story. Finally, plaintiffs claim that defendants should be compelled to print the advertisement at issue on the ground that New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, supra will protect the newspaper from liability even if the material engenders a libel action.

Presumably, the characterization of defendants as a quasi-public institution is to subject them to governmental regulation under the guise of state action inasmuch as fourteenth amendment prohibitions apply only to state actions, and do not affect private enterprise. Burton v. Wilmington Pkg. Auth., 365 U.S. 715, 721 (1961).

In support of their contention, plaintiffs rely primarily on one case, Uhlman v. Sherman, 22 Ohio N.P., N.S. 225, 31 Ohio Dec. 54 (1919). * * *

Plaintiffs’ arguments must fail, however, for several reasons:

Uhlman represents the minority rule, and stands alone in its holding that newspapers are amenable to governmental regulation.<sup>1</sup> We decline to accept it as controlling in this instance. We also note the qualifying language employed by the court in Uhlman which follows that quoted by plaintiffs:

1. It should be noted that a later unpublished Ohio case, Sky High Theatre, Inc. v. Garemer Publishing Co., No. 22820 of the Common Pleas Court of Champaign County, which was reported in Bloss v. Federated Publications, Inc., 5 Mich.App. 74, 83, 145 N.W.2d 800, 804 (1966) later refused to follow Uhlman:

Under the circumstances, is this court bound by the decision in the Uhlman Case? The judgment of the circuit court of one district is not conclusive authority upon the judges of another district though the view obtains that the decisions by one court should be followed in other circuits unless it clearly appears to the courts in the latter circuits that the decision is wrong. * * * It should be followed unless it clearly appears to this court that the decision is wrong—which is the case. (Emphasis supplied.) [Emphasis in original.]

We do not intend to hold that a newspaper company may not reject some class or classes of advertising entirely, or that it may not use reasonable discretion in determining whether or not an advertisement presented is a proper one.

Several courts have had occasion to rule on the issue of newspapers as quasi-public institutions. Our conclusion that defendants' conduct cannot be considered state action is in accord with these decisions. Associates & Aldrich Company v. Times Mirror Co., 440 F.2d 133 (9th Cir. 1971); Resident Participation of Denver, Inc. v. Love, 322 F.Supp. 1100 (D.Colo. 1971); Chicago Joint Bd., Amal. Cloth. Wkrs. v. Chicago Tribune Co., 435 F.2d 470 (7th Cir. 1970). In Chicago Tribune, a union sought injunctive relief to compel newspapers to publish an editorial advertisement. The Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the district court's determination that there was no state involvement in the conduct of the newspaper's business. The court of appeals quoted from the district court's memorandum opinion at 474:

Rather than regarded as an extension of the state exercising delegated powers of a governmental nature, the press has long and consistently been recognized as an independent check on governmental power. * * *

In sum, the function of the press from the days the Constitution was written to the present time has never been conceived as anything but a private enterprise, free and independent of government control and supervision. Rather than state power and participation pervading the operation of the press, the news media and the government have had a history of disassociation.

The issue of state control was raised by appellants in Times Mirror, supra. There the court at 136 noted:

Unlike broadcasting, the publication of a newspaper is not a government conferred privilege. As we have said, the press and the government have had a history of disassociation.

We can find nothing in the United States Constitution, any federal statute, or any controlling precedent that allows us to compel a private newspaper to publish advertisements without editorial control of their content merely because such advertisements are not legally obscene or unlawful.

Finally Justice White, in his concurring opinion in Tornillo, supra, 418 U.S. at 259, stated that: "A newspaper or magazine is not a public utility subject to 'reasonable' governmental regulation in matters affecting the exercise of journalistic judgment as to what shall be printed."

Plaintiffs' argument that defendants' "monopolistic" control over newspapers in the Milwaukee area is a sufficient basis for the injunctive relief sought is similarly misplaced. While the United States Supreme Court has qualified the right of a publisher to refuse advertising in certain instances involving a claim of monopoly, such a rule is not applicable under the instant fact situation.

In Lorain Journal Co. v. United States, 342 U.S. 143 (1951), a newspaper withheld the right to advertise from a subscriber who also utilized a competitor's radio station for advertising. The Court found that the publisher's conduct amounted to an attempt to use first amendment protections to destroy competition and reestablish a monopoly. Under these circumstances, the Court held the refusal of advertising to be illegal monopolization of interstate commerce. In arriving at its decision, the Court balanced the congressional policy of preventing monopoly against the right of publishers to refuse advertising, and determined that the right of refusal had to yield to the potential for violations of the Sherman Act.

Plaintiffs' allegations of defendants' business practices as a monopoly are, therefore, not pertinent to this appeal.

The complaint is devoid of any allegations which would establish the existence of any contracts, combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade on the part of defendants. * * * Plaintiffs reaffirmed this in their brief: "Again, we do not allege an effective monopoly of the newspaper field in Milwaukee to establish an action for damages, based upon such monopoly, or combination in restraint of trade." Finally, at oral argument, plaintiffs conceded that this was not a cause of action based on monopoly per se.

Plaintiffs' argument that defendants have a duty and obligation to print both sides of an issue to their readers must also fail. They urge that the right of the newspaper to reject advertising must be balanced against the public's right to be aware of all the facts surrounding an issue. In Chicago Tribune Co., supra, at 478 the same arguments were raised by amicus curiae and rejected by the court:

It is urged that the privilege of First Amendment protection afforded a newspaper carries with it a reciprocal obligation to serve as a public forum, and if a newspaper accepts any editorial advertising it must publish all lawful editorial advertisements tendered to it for publication at its established rates. We do not understand this to be the concept of freedom of the press recognized in the First Amendment. The First Amendment guarantees of free expression, oral or printed, exist for all—they need not be purchased at the price amici would exact. The Union's right to free speech does not give it the right to make use of the defendants' printing presses and distribution systems without defendants' consent.

Plaintiffs cite Fitzgerald v. National Rifle Ass'n of America, 383 F.Supp. 162 (D.N.J.1974) in support of their claim. While it is true that Fitzgerald balanced the fiduciary obligations of the National Rifle Association of America against a publisher's right to refuse advertising, the holding is inapplicable here. Fitzgerald dealt with an action by a member of a private organization to force publication of an advertisement regarding his candidacy for the association's board of directors. The publication involved was a private journal, and the court found that it was closer in form to a corporate newsletter than to a traditionally commercial publication. The court held that to allow the newspaper to refuse to print the advertisement created the potential for violation of a corporate trust.

Plaintiffs here cannot rely on any fiduciary obligation or corporate trust in their request for a mandatory injunction. We again reaffirm that there is no duty on the part of a private newspaper to print what it otherwise "chooses to leave on the newsroom floor." Tornillo, supra, 418 U.S. at 261.

The journalistic discretion utilized by defendants in rejecting plaintiffs' advertisement because it contained possibly libelous material must also be sustained. Editorial policy should not be the subject of judicial interference notwithstanding plaintiffs' contention that defendants are protected by the rule set out in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, supra. Plaintiffs argue that defendants would sustain no liability for publication of the allegedly libelous statement unless it is proved that the statement was made with actual malice. We reject this argument as the basis on which to compel publication of plaintiffs' advertisement. Such an argument begs the question and clouds the real issue. The question before us is not whether plaintiffs' advertisement is libelous, but whether they can compel its publication. It is well established that they cannot.

Order and judgment affirmed.

---

COMMENT

1. The overwhelming weight of authority is that there is no right of access to newspaper advertising space. Nevertheless, as Wisconsin Nursing Homes conceded, some cases have recognized a right of access to the press. One old chestnut, Uhlman v. Sherman, 22 Ohio N.P., N.S. 225, 31 Ohio, Dec. 54 (1919), a creaking pre-Tornillo precedent, is not very authoritative because it contained no discussion of the First Amendment implications of a right of access to the press.

Fitzgerald v. National Rifle Association, 383 F.Supp. 162 (D.N.J.1974), distinguished in Wisconsin Nursing Homes, is more significant. Fitzgerald, a candidate for the Board of Directors of the National Rifle Association, submitted an advertisement urging his candidacy to The American Rifleman, official journal of the National Rifle Association. Proper payment for the advertisement was proffered and was tendered. But the NRA refused to publish. The NRA states on its advertising rate card that it "reserves the right to reject or discontinue any advertisement and to edit all copy." Although recognizing the "general right of a newspaper or magazine to decide what advertisements it will and will not accept," the court cautioned that the rule was not "absolute in all circumstances," as prior cases demonstrated. For example, the publisher's right to refuse advertisement had been subordinated to the policies of the antitrust laws in Lorain Journal Co. v. United States, 342 U.S. 143 (1951), text, pp. 575, 660. Judge Whipple summarized Lorain Journal in Fitzgerald as follows: "The Court concluded that when balanced against the Congressional policy of preventing monopoly, the right of publishers to refuse advertisements must yield." See also Hodgson v. United Mine Workers of America, 344 F.Supp. 17 (D.D.C.1972).

The Fitzgerald case did not view the right not to publish as absolute. A familiar need to balance competing interests was the tack advocated in Fitzgerald:

"In the instant case, this Court must decide whether the publisher's right must give way when balanced against the fiduciary duty of corporate directors to insure fair and open corporate elections. This duty of course extends only to the association membership."

The American Rifleman, neither published nor circulated to the general public, was deemed a vital part of the electoral process of the National Rifle Association. The Nominating Committee's list of candidates for office is published in The Rifleman: "This special relationship between the NRA and The American Rifleman is closer in form to a corporate newsletter than to a traditionally commercial publication, such as Time or Newsweek."

In the light of these special facts, the extent to which Fitzgerald should be viewed as a precedent which requires a publisher to publish against his will is unclear: "Indeed, in the instant case, traditional distinctions between a publisher and an advertiser become blurred, since the plaintiffs may justifiably claim an ownership interest in the American Rifleman. Plaintiffs are members in good standing of the association which publishes the magazine and their dues go in part to meet the magazine's printing costs."

Does Fitzgerald resemble a quarrel among the publishers of a newspaper more closely than it does a quarrel between the publisher and a reader or member of the public seeking access? The court said the management of the NRA was bound to follow the mandates of New York's Not-For-Profit Corporation Law, § 101 (McKinney's Consol. Laws, c. 35, 1970) requiring "directors and officers" to "discharge the duties of their respective positions in good faith."

In Fitzgerald, it was held that "the traditional right of a magazine to refuse publication of an advertisement" had to yield for two reasons: 1) the equitable requirements of decency and fair dealing imposed on the NRA by state law, and 2) the unique relationship between The American Rifleman and the election process of the NRA. In short, the court ordered The American Rifleman to publish the advertisement originally submitted by the plaintiffs.

The fact that Fitzgerald involves a controversy between members of the same association rather than a controversy between the publisher or editor of a mass circulation newspaper and a member of the public is, of course, very important. The duty to publish in Fitzgerald is found in the state's nonprofit corporate laws rather than in a statute requiring the daily press to open their columns to those whom they would not otherwise publish. In Fitzgerald, the court observed: "Corporate elections become hollow mockeries if candidates are unable to bring their candidacies and platforms to the attention of the stockholders at large."

The right of access of a political candidate to a newspaper to reply to an editorial attack during a political campaign was the precise factual setting of Tornillo. It may be asked: Don't political elections particularly in cities or states dominated by one newspaper also become mockeries if candidates cannot reach the voters because coverage is denied them? The question is not far-fetched. Just such an argument by a political candidate was involved in Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974). Is the Fitzgerald decision in conflict with Tornillo? The Fitzgerald court's first response to this question is that the Tornillo facts were different: "This Court is not convinced that the Tornillo case is applicable whereas here a commercial advertisement, rather than a political editorial or article, is involved."

Tornillo can perhaps be distinguished from the Fitzgerald case on the ground it dealt with political speech. The subject matter of Fitzgerald was more akin to commercial speech, what the Supreme Court has described as possessing a greater hardihood. In other words, commercial speech is more susceptible to governmental regulation. See Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748 (1976), fn. 24. See Central Hudson Gas & Electric v. Public Service Commission, 447 U.S. 557 (1980). Political speech, on the other hand, is particularly fragile, and therefore attempts by government to regulate are particularly suspect.

Even if Tornillo was deemed to apply to commercial advertisements as well as political advertisements, it still was not considered to be a bar by the court to an order requiring publication of the proffered ad. Absolute First Amendment protection for the right to publish was rejected. The balancing test was employed. The obligations imposed on the NRA by the state's corporate law were found to be weightier than an untrammelled right to publish or not to publish, particularly where for the people involved the Rifleman was the only forum for reaching the NRA membership.

2. In Tornillo, it was argued by the losing side that the First Amendment, because of its interest in "vigorous and robust debate," see New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), authorized the enactment of right of reply legislation. Tornillo rejected that contention. Paradoxically, the antitrust laws rather than the First Amendment may turn out to be the breeding ground for a right of access to the press. In Wisconsin Nursing Homes, the court, referring to Lorain Journal Co. v. United States, 342 U.S. 143 (1951), observed that "the United States Supreme Court has qualified the right of a publisher to refuse advertising in certain instances involving a claim of monopoly." Similar comments were made in Fitzgerald. In the Fitzgerald case, the possibility that the antitrust laws might require a duty to publish advertising in some circumstances was also mentioned. Illustrative of this principle is Home Placement Service v. Providence Journal, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1881, 682 F.2d 274 (1st Cir. 1982), see text, pp. 611, 661, which held that the refusal of a newspaper to accept classified advertising from a rental referral service which charges a fee violates the antitrust laws. Such conduct constituted "strangulation of a competitor."

Currently, a not newspaper is free not to publish advertisements. But a newspaper was not free not to publish in circumstances where the rental referral business which seeks to place an ad is in competition with the newspaper. The newspaper's action was in violation of the Sherman Act. The newspaper was unlawfully using its control of the newspaper advertising market to preclude competition of the market seeking information about housing facts. The court of appeals in Home Placement Service remanded the case to the United States District Court for the District of Rhode Island for a determination of whether injunctive relief was appropriate and for an award of damages and attorney's fees.

Does the reward suggest some reluctance by the court of appeals to order a newspaper to accept an ad? Is the suggestion that the appropriate relief in lieu of an order to publish is monetary damages?

Home Placement Service should be contrasted with Homefinders of America v. Providence Journal, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1018, 621 F.2d 441 (1st Cir. 1980), see text, pp. 611, 661, where the First Circuit held that the Sherman Act was not violated by refusing to publish false and misleading advertisements which had been submitted by a rental referral firm which charged fees to prospective renters. Judge Aldrich said for the First Circuit in Homefinders:

Even when it might lack proof of actual fraud, we would hesitate long before holding that a newspaper, monopoly or not, armed with both the First Amendment and a reasonable business justification, can be ordered to publish advertising against its will. * * * In the present case, we see no question. The antitrust laws are not a shield for deceptive advertising.

Homefinders was distinguished from Home Placement Service on the ground that in Homefinders the advertisements were deceptive and misleading and, therefore, the refusal to publish them was reasonable. The contention by the newspaper in Home Placement Service that the public should not have to pay to find rental housing was rejected by the court as an unacceptable "paternal judgment."

3. Compulsory publication where the newspaper is directed by the state to publish is a form of compelled entry into newspapers which perhaps should be distinguished from compulsory publication when it is sought by members of the public. An example of such state-directed compulsory publication is found in Memphis Publishing Co. v. Leech, 539 F.Supp. 405 (W.D.1982), where a Tennessee statute required certain newspapers in the state to include a warning in alcoholic beverage advertisements setting forth the illegality and potential consequences of transporting alcoholic beverages into the state without a permit from the state Alcoholic Beverage Commission.

The Tennessee statute was ruled invalid because it intruded "impermissibly into the editorial discretion involved in accepting and preparing the copy for commercial advertising." In Memphis Publishing, as in other access-to-advertising cases, the party seeking to compel the publication of an advertisement sought to distinguish Tornillo by contending that its precedential force did not "extend to decisions regarding the acceptance of commercial advertising." As authority that newspaper advertising may be regulated, Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Pittsburgh Commission on Human Relations, 413 U.S. 376 (1973), was relied upon by the Attorney General of Tennessee. In Pittsburgh Press, a city ordinance, prohibiting newspapers from using sex-designated advertising columns for job opportunities, was upheld. Should we conclude from recent lower court cases and from Pittsburgh Press, text, p. 579, that Tornillo in fact has no force in access for advertising cases?

The Chicago Newspaper Case: A Union's Fight for Access to the Daily Press

A union was involved in a dispute with the large Chicago department store, Marshall Field and Company. The union objected to the sale by Marshall Field of imported clothing on the ground that the sale of imported clothing jeopardized the jobs of American clothing workers. The union said it would protest such sales until the countries of origin agreed to voluntary quotas on the amount of clothing to be sent into the United States. The union sought to place an ad explaining its position in each of the then four Chicago daily newspapers. None of the Chicago dailies would publish the ad. The union, the Chicago Joint Board, Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, AFL-CIO, sued the papers on an access theory to enjoin them to publish the ads and to pay compensatory and exemplary damages.

These were the circumstances in which the first major access case, based squarely on an affirmative view of the First Amendment, was born. The Chicago papers moved for summary judgment on the ground that newspapers had a right to reject advertisements and that the newspapers had not violated the First Amendment since that Amendment applied only to government. The latter argument, that there was no state action, in this situation was the winning argument for the press. Federal Judge Abraham Marovitz granted the newspaper defendants motion for summary judgment. Chicago Joint Board, Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, AFL-CIO v. Chicago Tribune Co., 307 F.Supp. 422 (N.D.Ill.1969).

In Judge Marovitz's view the First Amendment is sort of the obverse of the Eighteenth Amendment. Just as the Eighteenth Amendment tried to destroy the liquor industry forever in the United States, so the First Amendment is a constitutional attempt to protect permanently the newspaper industry. Justice Stewart, in an influential lecture, has given new force to a similar thesis. See text, pp. 150, 439.

If the plaintiffs had dwelled on the fact that some of the newspapers involved in the Chicago Joint Board case also owned television stations, might that have helped the plaintiffs to hurdle the state action barrier? Why?

The union appealed the district court determination only to stumble again on a familiar obstacle, the state action problem. The appeals decision reveals the efforts of the union to show the interdependence between the Chicago daily newspapers and government in the hope that newspaper restraints on expression would be seen as quasi public. Among the fascinating examples of state involvement in the Chicago daily press unearthed by union lawyers—particularly with regard to the newspaper defendants in the Chicago Joint Board case—was a Chicago ordinance which restricted newsstands on public streets to the sale of daily newspapers printed and published in the city of Chicago. Also, counsel for the union argued that legal imposition of a duty to publish was not the foreign conception represented by newspaper lawyers, since Illinois, like most states, requires newspaper publication of certain legal notices by the press. It was all to no avail; the appeals court affirmed the district court. The decision of the court of appeals, per Judge Castle, in Chicago Joint Board, unlike the celebrated Red Lion decision, text, p. 845, was a victory for the view that freedom of the press has as its primary focus the freedom of the publisher. See Chicago Joint Board, Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, AFL-CIO v. Chicago Tribune Co., 435 F.2d 470 (7th Cir. 1970).

Judge Castle in the Chicago Joint Board decision rejected the union argument that "monopoly power in an area of vital public concern" is the equivalent of governmental action: the Chicago daily newspaper market was not a monopoly. This, of course, is true, but wasn't the union position really that in access terms the Chicago newspapers were functionally monopolistic? Since none of the papers would print the union's ad, for First Amendment purposes it was irrelevant that there was more than one daily newspaper in Chicago.

The court of appeals decision in Chicago Joint Board is a good statement of the traditional laissez-faire approach to freedom of expression which has long dominated American law. Under this view, is the possession of property rights a precondition to the exercise of freedom of the press? Judge Castle states the laissez-faire view as follows:

The union's right to free speech does not give it the right to make use of the defendants' printing presses and distribution systems without defendants' consent.

The Seventh Circuit also decided one other important access case in 1970. In Lee v. Board of Regents, infra, text, p. 597, the court decided that spokesmen for differing political and social viewpoints on the campus of the Wisconsin State University at Whitewater had a right of access to the advertising pages of the campus newspaper the Royal Purple. The difference between the two cases? The Chicago newspapers are privately owned and therefore are not bound by a constitutional duty not to restrain expression. Wisconsin State University, on the other hand, is a public, tax-supported institution which is bound by constitutional limitations.

A RIGHT OF REPLY TO THE PRESS: A STUDY OF THE TORNILLO CASE

1. On June 7, 1971, the Supreme Court, in a further extension of the New York Times doctrine in Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, Inc., 403 U.S. 29 (1971), discussed in connection with the libel materials in this text, p. 221, justified further increasing the significant protection against libel newspapers already enjoyed by urging the establishment by the states of a right of access to the press. Justice William Brennan, speaking for the Court, said in an opinion joined by Chief Justice Burger and Justice Blackmun:

If the States fear that private citizens will not be able to respond adequately to publicity involving them, the solution lies in the direction of ensuring their ability to respond, rather than in a stifling public discussion of matters of public concern.

The Court, in footnote 15 of its opinion, accompanied this remark with a sympathetic discussion of the argument for the creation of a right of access to the press:

Some States have adopted retraction statutes or right of reply statutes. See Donnelly, The Right of Reply: An Alternative to an Action for Libel, 34 Va.L.Rev. 867 (1948); Note, Vindication of the Reputation of a Public Official, 80 Harv.L.Rev. 1730 (1967). Cf. Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969).

One writer, in arguing that the First Amendment itself should be read to guarantee a right of access to the media not limited to a right to respond to defamatory falsehoods, has suggested several ways the law might encourage public discussion. Barron, Access to the Press—A New First Amendment Right, 80 Harv.L.Rev. 1641, 1666-1678 (1967). It is important to recognize that the private individual often desires press exposure either for himself, his ideas, or his causes. Constitutional adjudication must take into account the individual's interest in access to the press as well as the individual's interest in preserving his reputation, even though libel actions by their nature encourage a narrow view of the individual's interest since they focus only on situations where the individual has been harmed by undesired press attention. A constitutional rule that deters the press from covering the ideas or activities of the private individual thus conceives the individual's interest too narrowly.

The Court's observations on access in Rosenbloom raised some intriguing questions. The Court said "constitutional adjudication" should take account of the individual's interest in access to the press. Was this an intimation that a right of access can be established initially as a matter of First Amendment interpretation contrary to Chicago Joint Board?

The Court's remarks in Rosenbloom appeared to assume the constitutionality of right to reply legislation which would have a much wider scope than merely to provide a response to defamation. Finally, the state action problem which has loomed so large in the lower courts is not mentioned at all.

In May 1973 in CBS v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. 94 (1973), the Supreme Court dealt a blow to the view that the force of the First Amendment was sufficient in itself to require the broadcast networks to abandon their policy of refusing to sell time to political groups and parties for the dissemination of views about ideas. See text, Chapter IX, p. 858. The Supreme Court took the position that so long as the FCC neither forbade nor required the networks to take any particular position with regard to the sale of political time, what the networks did was private action and therefore removed from the realm of constitutional obligation. Although the CBS case squarely endorsed the fairness doctrine and to that extent took an affirmative view of the First Amendment, the opinion was a defeat for the view that the First Amendment could support an access theory.

In the much-publicized Tornillo case the tantalizing question was squarely presented for consideration: Was it consistent, under the First Amendment, for a state to provide by statute in certain specified circumstances for compelled publication by a daily newspaper of general circulation?

A provision of the Florida Election Code, F.S. 104.38, enacted in 1913, provided that where the publisher of a newspaper assails the personal character of any political candidate or charges him with malfeasance or misfeasance in office, such newspaper shall upon request of the political candidate immediately publish free of cost any reply he may make thereto in as conspicuous a place and in the same kind of type as the matter that calls for the reply:

F.S. § 104.38—Newspaper assailing candidate in an election; space for reply. If any newspaper in its columns assails the personal character of any candidate for nomination or for election in any election, or charges said candidate with malfeasance or misfeasance in office, or otherwise attacks his official record, or gives to another free space for such purpose, such newspaper shall upon request of such candidate immediately publish free of cost any reply he may make thereto in as conspicuous a place and in the same kind of type as the matter that calls for such reply, provided such reply does not take up more space than the matter replied to. Any person or firm failing to comply with the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor of the first degree, punishable as provided in § 775.082 or § 775.083.

The statute had been slumbering in the Florida sun for more than half a century. The rise of the idea that the First Amendment might suggest positive duties for the press as well as new immunities had breathed new life into the statute in the late sixties, and at least three law suits involving this little-known provision of the Florida Election Code had been brought.

The most controversial came to involve a lawsuit by one Pat Tornillo, leader of the Dade County Classroom Teachers Association. In 1972, Tornillo ran as Democratic candidate for the Florida legislature.

In 1968, the Dade County Classroom Teachers Association had gone on strike. Under Florida law at the time, a strike by public school teachers was illegal. Tornillo had led the strike in Miami.

The Miami Herald on September 20, 1972, published an editorial calling Tornillo a "czar" and a law breaker. The Herald said in an editorial that "it would be inexcusable of the voters if they sent Pat Tornillo to the legislature."

Tornillo demanded an opportunity to reply to both these attacks under the Florida right of reply statute. The Herald refused to print the reply, and Tornillo filed a suit against the Herald and sought, on the strength of the statute, a mandatory injunction requiring the printing of his replies.

The Tornillo case required a direct judicial consideration of the validity of affirmative implementation of First Amendment values.

The Florida lower court in the Tornillo case held that the right of reply statute was unconstitutional. But the Supreme Court of Florida in a 6-1 decision reversed that court and, in the first test of the validity under the First Amendment of a newspaper right of reply statute, held it to be constitutional. Tornillo v. Miami Herald, 287 So.2d 78 (Fla.1973).

2. An enforceable right of reply in the press, although of relatively long standing in Germany and France, has been a fairly unusual phenomenon in the statutory patterns of American states. See Donnelly, The Right of Reply: An Alternative to An Action for Libel, 34 Va.L.Rev. 867 (1948). Yet interest in right of reply statutes had been considerable. It was generated by the increasingly noncompetitive and chain-dominated press and the Supreme Court's ground-breaking decision in New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 245 (1964), which so radically revised the American law of libel and provided a measure of relief from libel judgments hitherto unknown in American law.

3. The Supreme Court of Florida strongly relied on the endorsement of right of reply legislation contained in the opinion for the Court in Rosenbloom, see text, p. 221. The idea expressed in Rosenbloom and the state supreme court decision in Tornillo may be outlined as follows: If damages are not to be a remedy for libel, perhaps a right of reply can perform that task. Damages won in a libel action are perhaps a burden on the information process. But a right of reply statute aids the information process in the sense that it provides for access for the person attacked.

4. The circuit court for Dade County had held that the Florida right of reply statute was subject to the constitutional infirmity of vagueness. The lower court complained that no editor could know in advance exactly what words would offend the statute or the scope of the reply required.

The same vagueness charge was made concerning broadcasting's personal attack rules which provide for a right of reply "when during the presentation of views on a controversial issue of public importance, an attack is made upon the honesty, character, integrity, or like personal qualities of an identified person or group. * * *" The validity of the personal attack rules was upheld in Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969), where Justice Byron White dismissed the vagueness argument on the ground that the regulations were sufficiently precise. The Florida Supreme Court upheld the vagueness challenge to the Florida right of reply statute on the basis of the Red Lion decision.

5. The Florida right of reply law deprives a newspaper publisher, the Miami Herald argued, of property without compensation or due process of law in violation of § 9, Art. I of the Florida Constitution and the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution.

The newspaper argued that the Florida right of reply statute unconstitutionally takes property from the defendant newspaper and gives it to a plaintiff. In Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969), one of the issues that propelled that case to the Supreme Court was whether a person attacked by a radio station should be given free time to reply under the FCC's personal attack rules.

Yet the Supreme Court's opinion in Red Lion requiring such free reply time did suggest that the provision of free time under either the fairness doctrine or the personal attack rules was an invalid "taking."

Is a free space requirement less of a burden for a newspaper like the Miami Herald than the free time requirement was for a broadcaster like the Red Lion Broadcasting Co.? Broadcast time, unlike newspaper space, is finite. Is a newspaper expandable? If advertising business is up, can the paper always put out a larger edition? What of newsprint? A grant of free time appears to be a more costly matter to the station manager in broadcasting than is a grant of free space to the newspaper publisher. Yet the Court of Appeals in Red Lion considered the free time requirement as a reasonable burden.

6. After the decision of the Supreme Court of Florida was announced in the Tornillo case, the Miami Herald, joined by many other newspapers who filed amicus curiae briefs, filed a petition for rehearing with the Supreme Court of Florida. Appellant contended in its petition for rehearing that § 104.38 was a criminal statute and as such that it failed to meet the constitutional standards of precision required of such statutes. The Miami Herald argued on rehearing that the Supreme Court of Florida lacked constitutional power to furnish a saving gloss to a criminal statute. The Supreme Court of Florida denied the petition and pointed out that "no criminal penalty" was sought by Tornillo and that "the validity vel non of the criminal penalty is not here involved."

Pat L. Tornillo, Jr. v. The Miami Herald Publishing Co., 287 So.2d 78 (Fla.1973).

The Supreme Court of Florida denied the Miami Herald's petition for rehearing. See Tornillo v. The Miami Herald Publishing Co., 287 So.2d 78, 89 (Fla.1973).

The Miami Herald then appealed the decision of the Florida Supreme Court in Tornillo to the Supreme Court of the United States. On June 25, 1974, the Court unanimously reversed the Florida Supreme Court.

---

MIAMI HERALD PUB. CO. v. TORNILLO

418 U.S. 241, 94 S.CT. 2831, 41 L.ED.2D 730 (1974).

Chief Justice BURGER delivered the opinion of the Court.

The issue in this case is whether a state statute granting a political candidate a right to equal space to reply to criticism and attacks on his record by a newspaper, violates the guarantees of a free press.

In the fall of 1972, appellee, Executive Director of the Classroom Teachers Association, apparently a teachers' collective-bargaining agent, was a candidate for the Florida House of Representatives. On September 20, 1972, and again on September 29, 1972, appellant printed editorials critical of appellee's candidacy. In response to these editorials appellee demanded that appellant print verbatim his replies, defending the role of the Classroom Teachers Association and the organization's accomplishments for the citizens of Dade County. Appellant declined to print the appellee's replies, and appellee brought suit in Circuit Court, Dade County, seeking declaratory and injunctive relief and actual and punitive damages in excess of $5,000. The action was premised on Florida Statute § 104.38, a "right of reply" statute which provides that if a candidate for nomination or election is assailed regarding his personal character or official record by any newspaper, the candidate has the right to demand that the newspaper print, free of cost to the candidate, any reply the candidate may make to the newspaper's charges. The reply must appear in as conspicuous a place and in the same kind of type as the charges which prompted the reply, provided it does not take up more space than the charges. Failure to comply with the statute constitutes a first-degree misdemeanor.

Appellant sought a declaration that § 104.38 was unconstitutional. After an emergency hearing requested by the appellee, the Circuit Court denied injunctive relief because, absent special circumstances, no injunction could properly issue against the commission of a crime, and held that § 104.38 was unconstitutional as an infringement on the freedom of the press under the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution. Tornillo v. Miami Herald Pub. Co., 38 Fla.Supp. 80 (1972). The Circuit Court concluded that dictating what a newspaper must print was no different from dictating what it must not print. The Circuit Judge viewed the statute's vagueness as serving "to restrict and stifle protected expression." 38 Fla.Supp., at 83. Appellee's cause was dismissed with prejudice.

On direct appeal, the Florida Supreme Court reversed holding that § 104.38 did not violate constitutional guarantees. Tornillo v. Miami Herald Pub. Co., 287 So.2d 78 (1973).<sup>3</sup> It held that free speech was enhanced and not abridged by the Florida right of reply statute, which in that court's view, furthered the "broad societal interest in the free flow of information to the public." 287 So.2d, at 82. It also held that the statute was not impermissibly vague; the statute informs "those who are subject to it as to what conduct on their part will render them liable to its penalties." 287 So.2d, at 85.<sup>4</sup> Civil remedies, including damages, were held to be available under this statute; the case was remanded to the trial court for further proceedings not inconsistent with the Florida Supreme Court's opinion.

We postponed consideration of the question of jurisdiction to the hearing of the case on the merits. 414 U.S. 1142 (1974).

* * *

The challenged statute creates a right to reply to press criticism of a candidate for nomination or election. The statute was enacted in 1913 and this is only the second recorded case decided under its provisions.<sup>7</sup>

Appellant contends the statute is void on its face because it purports to regulate the content of a newspaper in violation of the First Amendment. Alternatively it is urged that the statute is void for vagueness since no editor could know exactly what words would call the statute into operation. It is also contended that the statute fails to distinguish between critical comment which is and is not defamatory.

The appellee and supporting advocates of an enforceable right of access to the press vigorously argue that Government has an obligation to ensure that a wide

3. The Supreme Court did not disturb the Circuit Court's holding that injunctive relief was not proper in this case even if the statute were constitutional. According to the Supreme Court neither side took issue with that part of the Circuit Court's decision. 287 So.2d, at 85.

4. The Supreme Court placed the following limiting construction on the statute:

"[W]e hold that the mandate of the statute refers to 'any reply' which is wholly responsive to the charge made in the editorial or other article in a newspaper being replied to and further that such reply will be neither libelous nor slanderous of the publication nor anyone else, nor vulgar nor profane." 287 So.2d, at 86.

7. In its first court test the statute was declared unconstitutional. State v. News-Journal Corp., 36 Fla.Supp. 164 (Volusia County J. Ct., Fla.1972). In neither of the two suits, the instant action and the 1972 action, has the Florida Attorney General defended the statute's constitutionality.

variety of views reach the public.<sup>8</sup> The contentions of access proponents will be set out in some detail.<sup>9</sup> It is urged that at the time the First Amendment to the Constitution was enacted in 1791 as part of our Bill of Rights the press was broadly representative of the people it was serving. While many of the newspapers were intensely partisan and narrow in their views, the press collectively presented a broad range of opinions to readers. Entry into publishing was inexpensive; pamphlets and books provided meaningful alternatives to the organized press for the expression of unpopular ideas and often treated events and expressed views not covered by conventional newspapers. A true marketplace of ideas existed in which there was relatively easy access to the channels of communication.

Access advocates submit that although newspapers of the present are superficially similar to those of 1791 the press of today is in reality very different from that known in the early years of our national existence. In the past half century a communications revolution has seen the introduction of radio and television into our lives, the promise of a global community through the use of communications satellites, and the spectre of a "wired" nation by means of an expanding cable television network with two-way capabilities. The printed press, it is said, has not escaped the effects of this revolution. Newspapers have become big business and there are far fewer of them to serve a larger literate population. Chains of newspapers, national newspapers, national wire and news services, and one-newspaper towns, are the dominant features of a press that has become noncompetitive and enormously powerful and influential in its capacity to manipulate popular opinion and change the course of events. Major metropolitan newspapers have collaborated to establish news services national in scope. Such national news organizations provide syndicated "interpretative reporting" as well as syndicated features and commentary, all of which can serve as part of the new school of "advocacy journalism."

The elimination of competing newspapers in most of our large cities, and the concentration of control of media that results from the only newspaper being owned by the same interests which own a television station and a radio station, are important components of this trend toward concentration of control of outlets to inform the public.

The result of these vast changes has been to place in a few hands the power to inform the American people and shape public opinion.<sup>15</sup> Much of the editorial opinion and commentary that is printed is that of syndicated columnists distributed nationwide and, as a result, we are told, on national and world issues there tends to be a homogeneity of editorial opinion, commentary, and interpretative analysis. The abuses of bias and manipulative reportage are, likewise, said to be the result of the vast accumulations of unreviewable power in the modern media empires. In effect, it is claimed, the public has lost any ability to respond or to contribute in a meaningful way to the debate on issues. The monopoly of the means of communi-

---

8. See generally Barron, Access to the Press—A New First Amendment Right, 80 Harv.L.Rev. 1641 (1967).

9. For a good overview of the position of access advocates see Lange, The Role of the Access Doctrine in the Regulation of the Mass Media: A Critical Review and Assessment, 52 N.C.L.Rev. 1, 8-9 (1973) (hereinafter "Lange").

15. "Local monopoly in printed news raises serious questions of diversity of information and opinion. What a local newspaper does not print about local affairs does not see general print at all. And, having the power to take initiative in reporting and enunciation of opinions, it has extraordinary power to set the atmosphere and determine the terms of local consideration of public issues." B. Bagdikian, The Information Machines 127 (1971).

cation allows for little or no critical analysis of the media except in professional journals of very limited readership.

This concentration of nationwide news organizations—like other large institutions—has grown increasingly remote from and unresponsive to the popular constituencies on which they depend and which depend on them. Report of the Task Force, The Twentieth Century Fund Task Force Report for a National News Council, A Free and Responsive Press 4 (1973).

Appellees cite the report of the Commission on Freedom of the Press, chaired by Robert M. Hutchins, in which it was stated, as long ago as 1947, that "The right of free public expression has * * * lost its earlier reality." Commission on Freedom of the Press, A Free and Responsible Press 15.

The obvious solution, which was available to dissidents at an earlier time when entry into publishing was relatively inexpensive, today would be to have additional newspapers. But the same economic factors which have caused the disappearance of vast numbers of metropolitan newspapers,<sup>16</sup> have made entry into the marketplace of ideas served by the print media almost impossible. It is urged that the claim of newspapers to be "surrogates for the public" carries with it a concomitant fiduciary obligation to account for that stewardship.<sup>17</sup> From this premise it is reasoned that the only effective way to insure fairness and accuracy and to provide for some accountability is for government to take affirmative action. The First Amendment interest of the public in being informed is said to be in peril because the "marketplace of ideas" is today a monopoly controlled by the owners of the market.

Proponents of enforced access to the press take comfort from language in several of this Court's decisions which suggests that the First Amendment acts as a sword as well as a shield, that it imposes obligations on the owners of the press in addition to protecting the press from government regulation. In Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1, 20 (1945), the Court, in rejecting the argument that the press is immune from the antitrust laws by virtue of the First Amendment, stated:

The First Amendment, far from providing an argument against application of the Sherman Act, here provides powerful reasons to the contrary. That amendment rests on the assumption that the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources is essential to the welfare of the public, that a free press is a condition of a free society. Surely a command that the government itself shall not impede the free flow of ideas does not afford non-governmental combinations a refuge if they impose restraints upon that constitutionally guaranteed freedom. Freedom to publish means freedom for all and not for some. Freedom to publish is guaranteed by the Constitution, but freedom to combine to keep others from publishing is not. Freedom of the press from governmental interference under the First Amendment does not sanction repression of that freedom by private interests. [Footnote omitted.]

In New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 270 (1964), the Court spoke of "a profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open." It is argued that the "uninhibited, robust" debate is not "wide-open" but open only to a monopoly in control of the press. Appellee cites the plurality opinion in Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, Inc., 403 U.S. 29, 47 & n. 15 (1971), which he suggests seemed to invite experimentation by the States in right to access regulation of the press.

16. The newspapers have persuaded Congress to grant them immunity from the antitrust laws in the case of "failing" newspapers for joint operations. 15 U.S.C.A. § 1801 et seq.

17. "Freedom of the press is a right belonging, like all rights in a democracy, to all the people. As a practical matter, however, it can be exercised only by those who have effective access to the press. Where the financial, economic, and technological conditions limit such access to a small minority, the exercise of that right by that minority takes on fiduciary or quasi-fiduciary characteristics." A. MacLeish in W. Hocking, Freedom of the Press, 99 n. 4 (1947).

Access advocates note that Justice Douglas a decade ago expressed his deep concern regarding the effects of newspaper monopolies:

Where one paper has a monopoly in an area, it seldom presents two sides of an issue. It too often hammers away on one ideological or political line using its monopoly position not to educate people, not to promote debate, but to inculcate its readers with one philosophy, one attitude—and to make money. * * * The newspapers that give a variety of views and news that is not slanted or contrived are few indeed. And the problem promises to get worse. * * * The Great Right (Ed. by E. Cahn) 124–125, 127 (1963).

They also claim the qualified support of Professor Thomas I. Emerson, who has written that "[a] limited right of access to the press can be safely enforced," although he believes that "[g]overnment measures to encourage a multiplicity of outlets, rather than compelling a few outlets to represent everybody, seems a preferable course of action." T. Emerson, The System of Freedom of Expression 671 (1970).

However much validity may be found in these arguments, at each point the implementation of a remedy such as an enforceable right of access necessarily calls for some mechanism, either governmental or consensual.<sup>19</sup> If it is governmental coercion, this at once brings about a confrontation with the express provisions of the First Amendment and the judicial gloss on that amendment developed over the years.<sup>20</sup>

The Court foresaw the problems relating to government enforced access as early as its decision in Associated Press v. United States, supra. There it carefully contrasted the private "compulsion to print" called for by the Association's By-laws with the provisions of the District Court decree against appellants which "does not compel AP or its members to permit publication of anything which their 'reason' tells them should not be published." 326 U.S., at 20 n. 18. In Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665, 681 (1972), we emphasized that the cases then before us "involve no intrusions upon speech and assembly, no prior restraint or restriction on what the press may publish, and no express or implied command that the press publish what it prefers to withhold." In Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. v. Democratic Nat. Comm., 412 U.S. 94, 117 (1973), the plurality opinion noted:

The power of a privately owned newspaper to advance its own political, social, and economic views is bounded by only two factors: first, the acceptance of a sufficient number of readers—and hence advertisers—to assure financial success; and, second, the journalistic integrity of its editors and publishers.

An attitude strongly adverse to any attempt to extend a right of access to news-

19. The National News Council, an independent and voluntary body concerned with press fairness, was created in 1973 to provide a means for neutral examination of claims of press inaccuracy. The Council was created following the publication of the Twentieth Century Fund's Task Force Report for a National News Council, A Free and Responsive Press. The Background Paper attached to the Report dealt in some detail with the British Press Council, seen by the author of the paper as having the most interest to the United States of the European press councils.

20. Because we hold that § 104.38 violates the First Amendment's guarantee of a free press we have no occasion to consider appellant's further argument that the statute is unconstitutionally vague.

papers was echoed by several Members of this Court in their separate opinions in that case. 412 U.S., at 145 (Stewart, J., concurring); 412 U.S. at 182 n. 12 (Brennan, J., dissenting). Recently, while approving a bar against employment advertising specifying "male" or "female" preference, the Court's opinion in Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Pittsburgh Comm. on Human Relations, 413 U.S. 376, 391 (1973), took pains to limit its holding within narrow bounds:

Nor, a fortiori, does our decision authorize any restriction whatever, whether of content or layout, on stories or commentary originated by Pittsburgh Press, its columnists, or its contributors. On the contrary, we reaffirm unequivocally the protection afforded to editorial judgment and to the free expression of views on these and other issues, however controversial.

Dissenting in Pittsburgh Press, Justice Stewart joined by Justice Douglas expressed the view that no "government agency—local, state or federal—can tell a newspaper in advance what it can print and what it cannot." Id., at 400. See Associates & Aldrich Co. v. Times Mirror Co., 440 F.2d 133, 135 (9th Cir. 1971).

We see that beginning with Associated Press, supra, the Court has expressed sensitivity as to whether a restriction or requirement constituted the compulsion exerted by government on a newspaper to print that which it would not otherwise print. The clear implication has been that any such a compulsion to publish that which "'reason' tells them should not be published" is unconstitutional. A responsible press is an undoubtedly desirable goal, but press responsibility is not mandated by the Constitution and like many other virtues it cannot be legislated.

Appellee's argument that the Florida statute does not amount to a restriction of appellant's right to speak because "the statute in question here has not prevented the Miami Herald from saying anything it wished" begs the core question. Compelling editors or publishers to publish that which "'reason' tells them should not be published" is what is at issue in this case. The Florida statute operates as a command in the same sense as a statute or regulation forbidding appellant from publishing specified matter. Governmental restraint on publishing need not fall into familiar or traditional patterns to be subject to constitutional limitations on governmental powers. Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233, 244–245 (1936). The Florida statute exacts a penalty on the basis of the content of a newspaper. The first phase of the penalty resulting from the compelled printing of a reply is exacted in terms of the cost in printing and composing time and materials and in taking up space that could be devoted to other material the newspaper may have preferred to print. It is correct, as appellee contends, that a newspaper is not subject to the finite technological limitations of time that confront a broadcaster but it is not correct to say that, as an economic reality, a newspaper can proceed to infinite expansion of its column space to accommodate the replies that a government agency determines or a statute commands the readers should have available.<sup>22</sup>

22. "However, since the amount of a space a newspaper can devote to 'live news' is finite,<sup>39</sup> if a newspaper is forced to publish a particular item, it must as a practical matter, omit something else.

39. "The number of column inches available for news is predetermined by a number of financial and physical factors, including circulation, the amount of advertising, and, increasingly, the availability of newsprint. * * *

Note, 48 Tulane L.Rev.433, 438 (1974) [footnote omitted].

Another factor operating against the "solution" of adding more pages to accommodate the access matter is that "increasingly subscribers complain of bulky, unwieldy papers." Bagdikian, Fat Newspapers and Slim Coverage, Columbia Journalism Review, Sept./Oct., 1973, at 19.

Faced with the penalties that would accrue to any newspaper that published news or commentary arguably within the reach of the right of access statute, editors might well conclude that the safe course is to avoid controversy and that, under the operation of the Florida statute, political and electoral coverage would be blunted or reduced.<sup>23</sup> Government enforced right of access inescapably "dampens the vigor and limits the variety of public debate," New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, supra, 376 U.S., at 279. The Court, in Mills v. Alabama, 384 U.S. 214, 218 (1966), stated that there is practically universal agreement that a major purpose of [the First] Amendment was to protect the free discussion of governmental affairs. This of course includes discussion of candidates. * * *

Even if a newspaper would face no additional costs to comply with a compulsory access law and would not be forced to forego publication of news or opinion by the inclusion of a reply, the Florida statute fails to clear the barriers of the First Amendment because of its intrusion into the function of editors. A newspaper is more than a passive receptacle or conduit for news, comment, and advertising.<sup>24</sup> The choice of material to go into a newspaper, and the decisions made as to limitations on the size of the paper, and content, and treatment of public issues and public officials—whether fair or unfair—constitutes the exercise of editorial control and judgment. It has yet to be demonstrated how governmental regulation of this crucial process can be exercised consistent with First Amendment guarantees of a free press as they have evolved to this time. Accordingly, the judgment of the Supreme Court of Florida is reversed.

It is so ordered.

Justice WHITE, concurring.

The Court today holds that the First Amendment bars a State from requiring a newspaper to print the reply of a candidate for public office whose personal character has been criticized by that newspaper's editorials. According to our accepted jurisprudence, the First Amendment erects a virtually insurmountable barrier between government and the print media so far as government tampering, in advance of publication, with news and editorial content is concerned. New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971). A newspaper or magazine is not a public utility subject to "reasonable" governmental regulation in matters affecting the exercise of journalistic judgment as to what shall be printed. Cf. Mills v. Alabama, 384 U.S. 214, 220 (1966). We have learned, and continue to learn, from what we view as the unhappy experiences of other nations where government has been allowed to meddle in the internal editorial affairs of newspapers. Regardless of how beneficent-sounding the purposes of controlling the press might be, we prefer "the power of reason as applied through public discussion" and remain intensely skeptical about those measures that would allow government to insinuate itself into the editorial rooms of this Nation's press.

* * *

Of course, the press is not always accurate, or even responsible, and may not

23. See the description of the likely effect of the Florida statute on publishers, in Lange, 52 N.C.L.Rev., at 70-71.

24. "[L]iberty of the press is in peril as soon as the government tries to compel what is to go into a newspaper. A journal does not merely print observed facts the way a cow is photographed through a plate glass window. As soon as the facts are set in their context, you have interpretation and you have selection, and editorial selection opens the way to editorial suppression. Then how can the state force abstention from discrimination in the news without dictating selection?" 2 Z. Chafee, Jr., Government and Mass Communications 633 (1947).

present full and fair debate on important public issues. But the balance struck by the First Amendment with respect to the press is that society must take the risk that occasionally debate on vital matters will not be comprehensive and that all viewpoints may not be expressed. The press would be unlicensed because, in Jefferson's words, "[w]here the press is free, and every man able to read, all is safe."<sup>2</sup> Any other accommodation—any other system that would supplant private control of the press with the heavy hand of government intrusion—would make the government the censor of what the people may read and know.

To justify this statute, Florida advances a concededly important interest of ensuring free and fair elections by means of an electorate informed about the issues. But prior compulsion by government in matters going to the very nerve center of a newspaper—the decision as to what copy will or will not be included in any given edition—collides with the First Amendment. Woven into the fabric of the First Amendment is the unexceptionable, but nonetheless timeless, sentiment that "liberty of the press is in peril as soon as the government tries to compel what is to go into a newspaper." 2 Z. Chafee, Jr., Government and Mass Communications 633 (1947).

The constitutionally obnoxious feature of § 104.38 is not that the Florida legislature may also have placed a high premium on the protection of individual reputational interests; for, government, certainly has "a pervasive and strong interest in preventing and redressing attacks upon reputation." Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75, 86 (1966). Quite the contrary, this law runs afoul of the elementary First Amendment proposition that government may not force a newspaper to print copy which, in its journalistic discretion, it chooses to leave on the newsroom floor. Whatever power may reside in government to influence the publishing of certain narrowly circumscribed categories of material, see e.g., Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Pittsburgh Comm. on Human Relations, 413 U.S. 376 (1973); New York Times Co. v. United States, supra, at 730 (concurring opinion), we have never thought that the First Amendment permitted public officials to dictate to the press the contents of its news columns or the slant of its editorials.

But though a newspaper may publish without government censorship, it has never been entirely free from liability for what it chooses to print. See New York Times Co. v. United States, supra, at 730 (concurring opinion). Among other things, the press has not been wholly at liberty to publish falsehoods damaging to individual reputation. At least until today, we have cherished the average citizen's reputation interest enough to afford him a fair chance to vindicate himself in an action for libel characteristically provided by state law. He has been unable to force the press to tell his side of the story or to print a retraction, but he has had at least the opportunity to win a judgment if he can prove the falsity of the damaging publication, as well as a fair chance to recover reasonable damages for his injury.

Reaffirming the rule that the press cannot be forced to print an answer to a personal attack made by it, however, throws into stark relief the consequences of the new balance forged by the Court in the companion case also announced today. Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., ante, goes far towards eviscerating the effectiveness of the ordinary libel action, which has long been the only potent response available to the private citizen libeled by the press. Under Gertz, the burden of proving liability is immeasurably increased, proving damages is made exceedingly more difficult, and vindicating reputation by merely proving falsehood and winning a judgment to that effect are wholly foreclosed. Needlessly, in my view, the Court trivializes and denigrates the interest in reputation by removing virtually all the protection the law has always afforded.

2. Letter to Col. Charles Yancey, in XIV The Writings of Thomas Jefferson 384 (Lipscomb ed. 1904).

Of course, these two decisions do not mean that because government may not dictate what the press is to print, neither can it afford a remedy for libel in any form. Gertz itself leaves a putative remedy for libel intact, albeit in severely emaciated form; and the press certainly remains liable for knowing or reckless falsehoods under New York Times and its progeny, however improper an injunction against publication might be.

One need not think less of the First Amendment to sustain reasonable methods for allowing the average citizen to redeem a falsely tarnished reputation. Nor does one have to doubt the genuine decency, integrity and good sense of the vast majority of professional journalists to support the right of any individual to have his day in court when he has been falsely maligned in the public press. The press is the servant, not the master, of the citizenry, and its freedom does not carry with it an unrestricted hunting license to prey on the ordinary citizen.

In plain English, freedom carries with it responsibility even for the press; freedom of the press is not a freedom from responsibility for its exercise. * * *

* * * Without * * * a lively sense of responsibility a free press may readily become a powerful instrument of injustice. Pennekamp v. Florida, 328 U.S. 331, 356, 365 (1946) (Frankfurter, J., concurring).

To me it is a near absurdity to so deprecate individual dignity, as the Court does in Gertz, and to leave the people at the complete mercy of the press, at least in this stage of our history when the press, as the majority in this case so well documents, is steadily becoming more powerful and much less likely to be deterred by threats of libel suits.

Justice BRENNAN, with whom Justice Rehnquist joins, concurring.

I join the Court's opinion which, as I understand it, addresses only "right of reply" statutes and implies no view upon the constitutionality of "retraction" statutes affording plaintiffs able to prove defamatory falsehoods a statutory action to require publication of a retraction. See generally Note, Vindication of the Reputation of a Public Official, 80 Harv.L.Rev. 1730, 1739-1747 (1967).

---

COMMENT

1. In the context of the public law of libel in Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, text, p. 221, Justice Brennan had expressed sympathy for the enactment of right to reply legislation. Yet he had joined in the opinion for the Court in Tornillo. Furthermore, in Gertz v. Welch, text, p. 236, decided the same day as Tornillo, Brennan dissented from the court's rejection of the Rosenbloom "public issue" approach to the public law of libel. If the Gertz Court was concerned that the "public issue" standard would make it too difficult for a libel plaintiff to vindicate his reputation by securing a judgment that the publication was false, Justice Brennan had just the remedy: "the possible enactment of statutes, not requiring proof of fault, which provide for an action for retraction or for publication of a court's determination of falsity if the plaintiff is able to demonstrate that false statements have been published concerning his activities."

But after the Tornillo decision, can a newspaper be compelled to publish a retraction against its will? Suppose a statute required a paper to publish the fact that a libel plaintiff had been vindicated in a suit against the paper in that the offending publication had been adjudicated as false? Wouldn't the newspaper challenge the statute and rely on the Tornillo case for the proposition that the "choice of material to go into the newspaper" is an editorial and not a legislative decision. Note that in Tornillo, Justice Brennan wrote a special concurrence to point out that the question of the constitutional validity of retraction statutes is not addressed by the decision of the Court in Tornillo. From a First Amendment point of view, how can the retraction statute be distinguished from the right of reply statute? Is it relevant that in the retraction situation the content of the retraction is composed by the newspaper, while in the reply situation it is the person attacked who dictates the contents of the reply?

2. Would a carefully drafted and limited state statute which provided a right of reply as a remedy for a proven defamatory falsehood be constitutional? Some advocates of the latter type of statute have not favored the more general right of reply statute considered in Tornillo. Thus, Justice Brennan appeared to endorse right of reply statutes in a libel context but not generally, as his concurrences in Rosenbloom and Tornillo illustrate. First Amendment scholar, Thomas I. Emerson, appears to take a similar position. In the Tornillo case, counsel for both Pat Tornillo and for the Miami Herald quoted Professor Emerson in their briefs to the United States Supreme Court as authority for their respective positions. Thus, counsel for the Miami Herald quoted Professor Emerson as follows:

[A]ny effort to solve the broadest problems of a monopoly press by forcing newspaper to cover all "newsworthy" events and print all viewpoints, under the watchful eyes of petty officials, is likely to undermine such independence as the press now shows without achieving any real diversity. See brief for appellant, Miami Herald Pub. Co. v. Tornillo, Supreme Court of the United States, No. 73-797, p. 13 quoting Emerson, The System of Free Expression 671 (1970).

In the same treatise, Professor Emerson wrote that a right of reply "would strengthen and vitalize" freedom of expression:

It is sufficient to note that a right of reply could be made available in most situations in which an individual claims that false assertions (and other forms of attack on him) have been made. It is particularly applicable in the case of the press, where abandonment of the libel action would be felt the most. Such a procedure is the most appropriate and probably the most effective way to deal with the problem. The person attacked would have an opportunity to get his position and his evidence quickly before the public. He would have a forum in which to continue the dialogue, rather than being forced to withdraw to the artificial arena of the courtroom. The discussion would thus be kept going in the marketplace, and the issues left up to the public, which must make the final decision anyway.

Furthermore, Professor Emerson assumes that the appropriate procedure for "allowing a right of reply would probably have to be established by legislation rather than judicial decision." Id. at 539.

Counsel for the appellee, Pat Tornillo, quoted from the above passage in their brief. See Brief for appellee, Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, No. 73-797, October Term, p. 11.

3. The Tornillo decision has been criticized for setting forth the access arguments but not really answering them. One commentator, in an influential work on access, suggested what might have proved to be a more reasoned and discriminating approach to the problem of access. See Schmidt, Freedom of the Press v. Public Access (1976).

Professor Schmidt said the access problem arises out of a conflict between a First Amendment historical tradition of editorial autonomy and an interpretation of the First Amendment which conceives as its function achievement of "the utilitarian goal of diversity of expression." Schmidt thought resolution of the access problem should involve reconciliation of the "values of autonomy and diversity."

How would such a resolution proceed? Professor Schmidt outlines the following mode of analysis:

The aim of analysis would be to determine which "publishers" should be protected from access so that the values of autonomy can be best preserved. And, conversely, analysis would have to determine which other "publishers" should be made accessible to serve the goals of diversity. Rights of access would have to be allocated to particular publishing units in such a way that the aim of diversity would be served to the maximum, but jeopardy to the values of autonomy would be kept to a minimum. See Schmidt, supra, p. 36.

For a more appreciative response to the Tornillo case, see Abrams, In Defense of Tornillo, 86 Yale L.J. 361 (1976). For a more critical commentary, see The Supreme Court, 1973 Term, 88 Harv.L.Rev. 174, 177 (1974).

4. For some, the declaration in Tornillo that mandating the press to print something is the same thing as mandating that the press not print something remains unconvincing: "Viewed from the vantage of the public, a 'right of reply' gives John Citizen two sides of a question while suppression or prohibitions give him none." See Lewin, What's Happening to Free Speech? The New Republic, July 27, 1974, p. 13.

5. From a legal point of view, the most remarkable aspect of the Tornillo decision is that it is innocent of any reference to the Red Lion decision. Is this a defensible omission? Perhaps the Court was reluctant to have to say that editorial decision-making was less protected in the electronic media than in the print media, and yet, at the same time, it was unwilling to alter the Red Lion decision.

6. On the whole, the reaction by the courts to the access concept has been unsympathetic. The Supreme Court invalidated the FCC's mandatory public access rules for cable. See FCC v. Midwest Video, 440 U.S. 689 (1979), text, p. 991. (It should be noted that the Court decided Midwest Video on statutory grounds and specifically refused to comment on the suggestion of the court that the FCC's public access rules "might violate the First Amendment rights of cable operators a-la-Tornillo.") Nevertheless, the Midwest Video case was a defeat for access in the cable field. On the other hand, Warner-Lambert v. FTC, text, p. 625, where the federal court of appeals approved an FTC mandatory corrective advertising order, illustrates that compelling expression by advertisers is permissible even though, under the Tornillo decision, compelling publication by publishers is not.

In Barron Public Rights and the Private Press (1981), the status of the access concept eight years after Tornillo is described. A major thesis of the book is that the Tornillo case did not foreclose access for advertising as distinguished from access for editorial replies. Warner-Lambert Co. v. FTC, 562 F.2d 749 (D.C. Cir. 1977), certiorari denied 435 U.S. 950 (1978), is relied on for this position: "If corrective information by advertisers is imperative for the protection of commercial consumers, such corrective information may be equally necessary in politics for political consumers, the voters. See, Barron, supra, p. 109. Professor Barton Carter, in a review of the book, 50 Geo.Wash.L.Rev. 501 at 507 (1982), observed that the Supreme Court is not likely to be persuaded by this argument:

Although it has accorded commercial speech some first amendment protection, the Court is far from equating commercial and political speech for the purpose of first amendment analysis. The Court views commercial speech as hardier and thus less likely to be inhibited by governmental restrictions. The fact that a limitation on commercial speech is held constitutional is far from a guarantee that the same limitation on political speech will be upheld.

7. In Chatzky and Robinson, A Constitutional Right of Access to Newspapers: Is There Life After Tornillo?, 16 Santa Clara L.Rev. 453 at 491 (1976), the suggestion is made that a narrowly circumscribed right of access to the press statute might be permissible even after Tornillo:

Congress may well conclude that the "scarcity of frequencies" consideration which prompted enactment of the Radio Act and the Communications Act are paralleled in the modern newspaper industry. Where the Newspaper Preservation Act has "licensed" the merger of publishing resources by exempting certain newspapers from federal antitrust laws, Congress may decide that at least these "licensees" should conform to some standard of public trusteeship. See generally, text, p. 647ff.

8. An important illustration that the access concept was not dead was evidenced by CBS v. FCC, 453 U.S. 367 (1981), text, p. 815. In that case, Chief Justice Burger made some very significant remarks with respect to the impact of Tornillo on the future of the access concept. Burger read Tornillo as constituting a disapproval of a general right of access to the media. However, the following observations of the Chief Justice for the Court in CBS v. FCC appear to imply that the limited rights of access are not foreclosed by Tornillo:

Petitioners are correct that the Court has never approved a general right of access to the media. See, e.g., FCC v. Midwest Video Corp., 440 U.S. 689 (1979); Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241, (1974); CBS, Inc. v. Democratic National Committee, supra. Nor do we do so today. Section 312(a)(7) created a limited right to "reasonable" access that pertains only to legally qualified federal candidates and may be invoked by them only for the purpose of advancing their candidacies once a campaign has commenced.

9. In a recent comment, the decision in CBS v. FCC is interpreted to provide a basis for the enactment of a statutory right of access to the newspaper press despite the Tornillo precedent. See, Shelledy, Note, Access to the Press: A Teleological Analysis of a Constitutional Double Standard, 50 Geo.Wash.L.Rev. 430 at 458-459 (1982):

The right of reply statute in Tornillo established a contingent right, limited to expression in response to an editorial attack on a candidate's character or official record. The right created by section 312(a)(7) is broader in its affirmative character: programmers cannot avoid causing the right of access to arise by refraining from editorializing on political candidates.

This distinction demonstrates that an affirmative right of access to the printed press can withstand a first amendment challenge stemming from Tornillo. The chilling effect that the Court found offensive in Tornillo is not present with an affirmative right of access to newspapers. An affirmative right is unlikely to blunt or reduce political and electoral coverage, as the Tornillo court feared the Florida right of reply might. Indeed, it is even less likely than section 312(a)(7) to impair editorial discretion since a newspaper can more easily expand its format to accommodate those seeking access while maintaining its planned coverage.

Is the difficulty with this proposed non-contingent access to the press statute that, although it may be less vulnerable to chilling effect objections, it poses an even greater danger to editorial autonomy since the degree to which parts of the paper would be subject to access obligations would be necessarily so imprecise? The George Washington Law Review Note also relies on PruneYard Shopping Center v. Robins, 447 U.S. 74 (1980), text, p. 179, as a basis for an affirmative statutory right of access to the newspaper press:

PruneYard lends logical and perhaps precedential support to applying a right of access to the print media. Even if publishers have a property right to exclude others' views from the columns of a newspaper, a reasonable restriction of that right would not violate either the taking clause or the due process clause of the fifth amendment. Like a right of access to shopping centers, reasonable access to newspapers is substantially related to the recognized state objective of expanding opportunities for expression and will not impair the value of newspapers.

A RIGHT OF ACCESS TO THE PUBLIC PRESS— THE CASE OF THE STATE-SUPPORTED CAMPUS PRESS

1. In Avins v. Rutgers, State University of New Jersey, 385 F.2d 151 (3d Cir. 1967), the plaintiff, Alfred Avins, alleged that he had submitted to the Rutgers Law Review an article which reviewed the legislative history of the Civil Rights Act of 1975 insofar as it was intended to affect school desegregation. The articles editor of the Rutgers Law Review rejected the article and stated that "approaching the problem from the point of view of legislative history alone is insufficient." Avins contended that a law review published by a state-supported university is a public instrumentality in whose columns all must be allowed to present their ideas: The editors are without discretion to reject an article because in their judgment its nature or ideological approach is not suitable for publication.

The federal district court had dismissed the suit, and the federal court of appeals affirmed. Judge Maris, for the court of appeals, rejected plaintiff's contentions:

[O]ne who claims that his constitutional right to freedom of speech has been abridged must show that he has a right to use the particular medium through which he seeks to speak. This the plaintiff has wholly failed to do. He says that he has published articles in other law reviews and will sooner or later be able to publish in a law review the article here involved. This is doubtless true. Also, no one doubts that he may freely at his own expense print his article and distribute it to all who wish to read it. However, he does not have the right, constitutional or otherwise, to commandeer the press and columns of the Rutgers Law Review for the publication of his article, at the expense of the subscribers to the Review and the New Jersey taxpayers, to the exclusion of other articles deemed by the editors to be more suitable for publication. On the contrary, the acceptance or rejection of articles submitted for publication in a law school law review necessarily involves the exercise of editorial judgment and this is in no wise lessened by the fact that the law review is supported, at least in part by the [s]tate.

2. Suppose that there were only two or three law journals in the whole country and that the professor in the Avins case had filed his court complaint with letters of rejection attached to each of the journals and further that each of these journals rejected plaintiff professor's articles on ideological rather than scholarly grounds? Same result?

Should it make a difference that the journals in question were published by state rather than privately sponsored universities?

3. The struggle for access to the press has met with the most success in the high school and college press, and for a reason: the party denying access was acting pursuant to public authority, and therefore a public restraint on expression was involved. The Wisconsin State University case, which follows, nevertheless, is significant for access theory generally because it recognizes, almost without comment, that which was formerly not recognized in American law at all: the First Amendment demands opportunity for expression. Prohibition against censorship does not, therefore, exhaust the meaning of the First Amendment; the Amendment has an affirmative dimension.

A ground-breaking case at the high school level was Zucker v. Panitz, 299 F.Supp. 102 (S.D.N.Y.1969), see text, p. 617ff, which upheld the right of high school students to publish a paid ad in their high school newspaper which opposed the war in Vietnam.

A similar case having to do with paid advertisements in college papers was decided in 1969 in a federal district court in Wisconsin. Lee v. Board of Regents of State Colleges, 306 F.Supp. 1097 (1969).

The United States Court of Appeals affirmed the lower court determination that the Board of Regents of the Wisconsin State Colleges had denied the freedom of speech of the plaintiffs who sought to publish editorial advertisements in the Royal Purple. Notice that the Seventh Circuit expressly avoided deciding "whether there is a constitutional right of access to the privately-owned press."

LEE v. BOARD OF REGENTS OF STATE COLLEGES

441 F.2D 1257 (7TH CIR. 1971).

FAIRCHILD, Circuit Judge.

It is conceded that the campus newspaper is a state facility. Thus the appeal does not present the question of whether there is a constitutional right of access to press under private ownership.

The substantive question is whether the defendants, having opened the campus newspaper to commercial and certain other types of advertising, could constitutionally reject plaintiffs' advertisements because of their editorial character. The case does not pose the question whether defendants could have excluded all advertising nor whether there are other conceivable limitations on advertising which could be properly imposed.

The student publications board had adopted the following policy:

"Types of Advertising Accepted

"The Royal Purple will accept advertising which has as its main objective the advertising of

1. A Commercial Product.
2. A Commercial Service.

3. A Meeting. The pitch of an advertisement of this type must clearly be 'come to the meeting'. The topic may be announced, but may not be the main feature of the ad.

4. A Political Candidate whose name will appear on a local ballot. Political advertising must deal solely with the platform of the advertised person. Such copy cannot attack directly opponents or incumbents. Such advertising must contain the following: This advertisement authorized and paid for by (name of person or organization.)

5. A Public Service. Advertising of a public service nature will be accepted if it is general in nature, in good taste, and does not attack specific groups, institutions, products, or persons.

"The Royal Purple has the right to refuse to publish any advertisement which it may deem objectionable."

Plaintiff Riley submitted an advertisement describing the purposes of a university employees' union and announcing a meeting on safety regulations. It was rejected under the policy because part of it dealt with the business of the meeting.

Plaintiff Scharmach's advertisement was entitled "An Appeal to Conscience." It was signed by nine ministers and proclaimed the immorality of discrimination on account of color or creed.

Plaintiff Lee submitted an advertisement to be signed by himself and stating as follows:

" 'You shall love your neighbor as yourself.' (Matthew 19:19)

"This verse should mean something to us all who are concerned with race relations and the Vietnam War."

The rejection stated in part, "Your ad could possibly come under the public service ad, but it deals with political issues, and is therefore not a public service."

Decisions cited by the district court support the proposition that a state public body which disseminates paid advertising of a commercial type may not reject other paid advertising on the basis that it is editorial in character. Other decisions condemn other facets of discrimination in affording the use of newspaper and other means of expression on public campuses.

* * *

Defendants point out that the campus newspaper is a facility of an educational institution and itself provides an academic exercise. They suggest that the advertising policy is a reasonable means of protecting the university from embarrassment and the staff from the difficulty of exercising judgment as to material which may be obscene, libelous, or subversive. In Tinker, the Supreme Court, albeit in a somewhat different context, balanced the right of free expression against legitimate considerations of school administration. Tinker demonstrates how palpable a threat must be present to outweigh the right to expression. The Court said, in part, "But, in our system, undifferentiated fear or apprehension of disturbance is not enough to overcome the right to freedom of expression." * * *

The problems which defendants foresee fall far short of fulfilling the Tinker standard.

* * *

The judgment is affirmed.

---

COMMENT

1. The Wisconsin State University case involved state-financed print media. Does this case and others like it have any significance for the privately owned mass circulation daily newspaper?

Denial of a right of access for political advertising to public facilities has been upheld. See Lehman v. City of Shaker Heights, text, p. 64.

2. Some major themes of successful access to the public press cases were gathered together in a case brought by the Radical Lawyers Caucus, an association whose members were also members of the Texas State Bar. The Radical Lawyers Caucus asked the Texas Bar Journal to accept an advertisement publicizing a caucus to be held during the annual bar convention. The Bar Journal contended that the Journal was an instrumentality of the state of Texas and therefore could not take political advertising. Ironically, that argument was the Texas Bar Journal's undoing.

In Radical Lawyers Caucus v. Pool, 324 F.Supp. 268 (W.D.Tex.1970), the federal district court held that since the official journal of the Texas state bar association, an agency of the state, had accepted commercial ads and published editorials and passed resolutions on political subjects, the journal could not decline to publish the advertisement submitted by an association of radical lawyers. Such a denial, the court ruled, constituted a denial of free speech and violated equal protection of the laws.

Suppose the Texas Bar Journal had not been a state instrumentality but a privately operated journal of a group of lawyers whose organization received no state support? Same result?

The Radical Lawyers Caucus case is one of the rare access-to-print-media cases which deals with a magazine. Suppose the Radical Lawyers Caucus had sought to place the same advertisement in magazines such as Newsweek or the National Review? Were there special circumstances, beside the fact that the bar journal was a state agency, which made access to the Texas Bar Journal for the Radical Lawyers Caucus imperative?

The Mississippi Gay Alliance Case—Access to the Public Press After *Tornillo

The foregoing cases dealing with access to the tax-supported, state university campus press or with some form of public press involve the only area where a right of access has been recognized. What is the status of cases like Zucker and Lee v. Board of Regents in light of the Supreme Court decision in Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo? A case arising after Tornillo and raising this issue is Mississippi Gay Alliance v. Goudelock, 536 F.2d 1073 (5th Cir. 1976). The controversy occurred when the chairwoman of the Mississippi Gay Alliance (MGA) submitted an ad to The Reflector, the student newspaper at Mississippi State University (MSU). The contents of the ad were as follows:

Gay Center—open 6:00 to 9:00 Monday, Wednesday and Friday nights.

We offer—counselling, Legal aid, and a library of homosexual literature.

Write to—The Mississippi Gay Alliance, P.O. Box 1328, Mississippi State University, Ms. 39762.

The editor of The Reflector refused to publish the ad even though it was a paid advertisement. MGA, alleging a First Amendment violation, then brought suit to compel the editor to publish the ad. The federal district court refused to order publication. The federal court of appeals affirmed and distinguished cases like Lee v. Board of Regents and Zucker by contending that in the MGA case there was no state action since university officials did not control publishing decisions. A student editor rather than a state university official had declined to publish the ad.

The court of appeals speculated that if a state university official had ordered the newspaper not to publish such an order it would still have been constitutionally impermissible. The reason for this conclusion, however, did not derive from the premise of Lee v. Board of Regents and Zucker that a state-sponsored press could not favor one idea and disfavor another. This conclusion derived instead from an idea purportedly set forth in Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo—the inviolability of editorial autonomy. Courts could not review editorial decision making undertaken under either private or public auspices. Protection of editorial autonomy, however, was only one component of the rationale of the decision in MGA. Since state law made sodomy a crime, the student editor was obliged not to publish an ad which had a connection, albeit peripheral, with such activity. Or as the court put it gingerly: “[S]pecial reasons were present for holding that there was no abuse of discretion by the editor of The Reflector.”

In a long and thoughtful dissent, Judge Goldberg denied that a state-sponsored newspaper could, for example, refuse to print a statement on the ground that “it expressed a political view contrary to that of the Governor.” Judge Goldberg hypothesized the following example:

[W]e might posit a newspaper paid for and published by the state—call it the “Open Forum”—in which all citizens are invited to express their views on any issue subject only to reasonable space limitations and a small fee to help offset printing costs. Could the “Open Forum” refuse to print a tendered statement on the ground that it expressed a political view contrary to that of the Governor, or on no state ground at all? Surely not. Conceivably, the state could place many non-content oriented restrictions on the form of the messages, but the state could not refuse tendered statements otherwise similar in form to those regularly accepted solely because the proffered ads were disagreeable in content.

Furthermore, Goldberg thought the principle of equal access to state student publications received implicit support from CBS v. Democratic National Commission, text, p. 858:

The Supreme Court has never passed on a claim of equal access to a state publication. The suggestion that the Court would recognize the rights found in Lee, Zucker, and Radical Lawyers is not undermined by, and indeed receives implicit support from Columbia Broadcasting System v. Democratic National Commission. * * *

Judge Goldberg reasoned that since a "state" newspaper could not publish ads on one side of a public issue and reject ads taking the opposite point of view, it should also be assumed that it would be unconstitutional for a state newspaper to take advertisements dealing with public issues generally but arbitrarily and selectively to exclude advertisements on certain public issues.

If The Reflector were "clearly a paper run by and for the state" and MGA's allegations that the "paper regularly accepted paid and unpaid messages and announcements from local groups" were true, then the conclusion followed that the "state would have denied the MGA equal access to a public forum." Judge Goldberg then stated:

If The Reflector were purely a private newspaper, there presumably would exist no such right of access. * * * See Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo * * * Clearly, then a federal court would have no power, under statutes requiring "state action," to prohibit a non-state newspaper from exercising selective content discrimination in its publication of advertisements.

The issue then became whether "The Reflector can be characterized as the state." The issue had been different in Lee and Zucker since in those cases it had been clear that "officials, not students, exercised ultimate responsibility for the censorship decision." In MGA, university officials argued that they could not reverse "specific editorial decisions of the student editor" and, therefore, that "the 'state action' required to trigger the public forum doctrine was lacking." Judge Goldberg contended, however, that the absence of "affirmative involvement by university officials" did not end the state action inquiry:

The stipulation included the fact that funds supporting The Reflector were derived from a non-waivable student fee charged to students at MSU.

The Reflector's funding is thus derived from what is in effect a tax charged by the state to the students. The allegations suggest that the imprimatur of the state is clearly stamped on the paper. In these circumstances, I have little doubt that this court would review a decision by the students to exclude blacks from participation on the newspaper staff as a decision imbued with state action. To my mind, the pure "state action" question should be the same in the First Amendment context.

Then Judge Goldberg turned to what he considered "the most significant question in this case: does the Constitution permit student editors at a state university to pursue a general policy of accepting from local groups advertisements dealing with matters of public interest, but at the same time to exclude, because of its content, a certain advertisement proffered by a similarly situated group?"

The trial judge in MGA had concluded "that the student editor of The Reflector was protected in his decision to reject the MGA advertisement by the same protections which, in Tornillo, shielded the Miami Herald's decision not to run a reply to its editorial." Relying on Bazaar v. Fortune, 476 F.2d 570 (5th Cir. 1973), affirmed as modified, 489 F.2d 225, (en banc) (5th Cir. 1974) and Joyner v. Whiting, 477 F.2d

456 (4th Cir. 1973), Judge Goldberg reached the following conclusions:

[S]tate school officials, having provided a forum for free expression by students, cannot censor the content of the messages that the students seek to disseminate. That rule, on its face, would not be inconsistent with a requirement that the columns of the state-sponsored paper be open to anyone with anything to say.

For Goldberg, student editorial autonomy, a student right to edit even a state-sponsored press had to be recognized. At the same time the principle of nondiscriminatory access to state publications also had to be recognized. Judge Goldberg suggested the following accommodation between the two competing interests involved:

In my opinion, however, a requirement of wide-open access to the pages of a student newspaper would sweep much too broadly. To the extent that the right of student editors to free expression is to be protected, that right must include the right to edit. * * *

I fully support the result in the Rutgers case and the implication it bears for a general right to edit on the part of student editors of state-supported publications. * * *

I think that the two interests discussed above can be accommodated through a doctrine which permits student editors of state newspapers unfettered discretion over what might be termed the "editorial product" of the newspaper, yet requires that when the newspaper devotes space to unedited advertisements or announcements from individuals outside the newspaper staff, access to such space must be made available to other similarly situated individuals on a nondiscriminatory basis.

As to the sections of the newspaper which would be subject to the requirement of nondiscriminatory access, I take the two sections of The Reflector at issue in this suit to be paradigmatic. According to the allegations of the MGA, the sections of The Reflector to which access was sought were regularly available to local organizations for announcements and messages of social, political and informative natures. * * *

I want to emphasize that the right of equal access I would invoke could for the purposes of this case, be carefully circumscribed. For example, the newspaper could perhaps provide access only to students or other members of the university community and not be guilty of content discrimination. * * *

Conceivably, other limitations on the envisioned right of equal access could arise in response to logistics and costs. A state newspaper which had provided a public forum for the publication of any message from anyone could in one week receive thousands of proposed messages on the same subject. * * * If the "public forum" is to remain that, some content neutral means of selection would become necessary—e.g., requiring payment of a reasonable fee, printing the first however many submissions, or selecting statements at random. Again, we need not reach these questions to decide this case. There is no indication that any other advertisements, or announcements in the "briefs" section had ever been refused by the newspaper, or that any other consideration of space limitations was relevant in the decision to exclude the MGA ad.

I mention these possible limitations on the right of equal access to a state student newspaper to illustrate how narrowly a decision in the instant case could be written and how careful a court should be in delineating the scope of such a right.

* * * I would hold that there exists in some situations a right to nondiscriminatory access to the advertising and announcement sections of state-supported newspapers. * * *

One reason for extreme caution in suggesting the sort of rules I have envisioned in my dissent is the danger that the state may provide "nondiscriminatory access" by providing no access, at least through the student newspapers under consideration here. * * * I am not so cynical as to suppose that state school officials and student editors of state school publications would uniformly choose to permit no outside views to be expressed in their publications rather than to permit, in a designated section of the publication, a free and open discussion of public issues.

* * *

The key to the reconciliation here is an emphasis in each situation of the powerful interests of speakers and listeners in free expression. In each context—officials attempting to censor students, and students attempting selectively to censor certain messages from the public on the basis of content—the court must balance the competing interest, but always with its thumb on the side of full and open discussion of public issues.

---

COMMENT

1. The "open" parts of the newspaper—the announcements, the briefs and unedited advertising sections—were not involved in Tornillo. Is it correct to conclude that Tornillo's recognition of a "right to edit" is not appropriate in these sections of a state-sponsored press? Others beside Judge Goldberg have made the same distinction between the propriety of a claim for access to the advertising section but not to the news and editorial columns of a public press. See Canby, The First Amendment and the State as Editor: Implications for Public Broadcasting, 52 Tex.L.Rev. 1123 at 1133-1134 (1974). A difficulty with Judge Goldberg's distinction between the "news and editorial columns" and advertising columns, for example, is that the distinction is not as precise as it should be if it is to be workable. Where would a tendered reply to an "editorial advertisement" fit in Judge Goldberg's scheme if the paper involved didn't wish to publish the reply?

2. The Supreme Court denied review in the MGA case. See Mississippi Gay Alliance v. Goudelock, 430 U.S. 982 (1977). As a result, the question of the Supreme Court's reaction to claims for a right of access to the advertising columns of the state-supported press remains an open one. What is the impact of Tornillo on the pre-existing cases recognizing a right of access to the public student press? It would appear that these cases are still intact and are unaffected by the Tornillo decision. In other words, in Zucker, Lee, and Radical Lawyers Caucus, state action was present, and, therefore, unlike the Miami Herald in Tornillo, the papers in the state publication cases were bound by the constitutional principle of equal access. The MGA case can be distinguished from these earlier public press cases because state action was not present as it was in the Lee case because in MGA a student editor and not a university official had rejected the tendered ad.

3. Whether or not the opinion for the court in MGA can be distinguished from the older access to the state campus press cases, the philosophy of the court in MGA clearly reflects the impact of the Tornillo decision. The implicit theme of the MGA decision—even though the court of appeals is careful to say that state action is not present—is that when an editor's decision not to publish comes into a conflict with a claim for entry from outside the publication, the claims of unfettered editorial decision making have First Amendment primacy even in a public or state-supported press. The case, in fact, suggests a final question: if editorial decision making is to be considered judicially unreviewable, isn't the presence or absence of state action irrelevant?

4. Besides MGA, a print media case, a significant case, Muir v. AETC, text, p. 1022ff, involving a public broadcasting station, has also taken the position that publicly owned media do and should engage in editorial decision making. Such editorial decision making is not impermissible censorship. In Muir, Judge Hill, speaking for the court, said, citing Avins v. Rutgers University, text, p. 596, " * * * the First Amendment does not preclude the government from exercising editorial control over its own medium of expression."

5. In discussing Mississippi Gay Alliance, Professor Nadel has emphasized the special facts of the case: "In upholding the refusal of the paper to print the Gay Alliance advertisement, however, the court may well have treated the restriction as a valid restriction of scope (or 'type') prohibiting advertisements of illegal activities." See Nadel, A Unified Theory of the First Amendment: Divorcing The Medium From The Message, 11 Fordham Urban Law Journal 163 at 203 (1983).

The implication in the above, perhaps, is that because of its facts, no large First Amendment generalization should be drawn from the MGA case. Nadel observed with respect to the publicly supported campus press: "It appears that courts can require editors to abide by the same standards of reasonable conduct (i.e., 'fairness doctrine') that presently govern the conduct of librarians and other school officials."

Further, he suggested, relying on Professor Karst's, Equality As A Central Principle in the First Amendment, 43 U. of Chicago L.Rev. 20, 43-52 (1975), that "'fair' access could be provided to all by forbidding the editor from excluding viewpoints in violation of the equal protection clause."

Selected Problems of Law and Journalism

THE LAW AND REGULATION OF ADVERTISING

Advertising and the First Amendment

1. Second-class status for commercial advertising under the First Amendment may have been given its first and firmest designation by a single sentence in a 1941 Judge Jerome Frank dissent. "Such men as Thomas Paine, John Milton and Thomas Jefferson," he said, "were not fighting for the right to peddle commercial advertising."<sup>1</sup>

That sentiment, to be affirmed in what has been called a "casual, almost off-hand"<sup>2</sup> ruling when the case reached the United States Supreme Court, gave birth to the commercial speech doctrine: speech touting goods and services is less deserving of constitutional protection than speech promoting other ideas, especially those having political connotation. Valentine v. Chrestensen, 316 U.S. 52 (1942).

Dissenting in a case in which the Court had upheld an ordinance banning door-to-door solicitation of magazine subscriptions, Justice Black said that, while it protected the press, the First Amendment did not apply to a "merchant" who goes from door-to-door "selling" pots.<sup>3</sup> And the Court in Pittsburgh Press,<sup>4</sup> a case marking the zenith of the commercial speech doctrine, upheld a city ordinance prohibiting sex-designated columns in help-wanted classifieds. In Hood v. Dun and Bradstreet<sup>5</sup> the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals said flatly that commercial reports lack the "general public interest" necessary for First Amendment protection. No protec-

---

1. Valentine v. Chrestensen, 122 F.2d 511 (2d Cir. 1941). Edited reports of Valentine and later commercial speech cases appear in Chapter I, text, p. 157ff, where the "commercial speech" doctrine is presented in a chapter which attempts to provide an overview of First Amendment theory.

2. The language is Justice Douglas's concurring in Cammarano v. United States, 358 U.S. 498, 514 (1959).

3. Breard v. City of Alexandria, 341 U.S. 622, 650 (1951).

4. Pittsburgh Press v. Pittsburgh Commission on Human Relations, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1908, 413 U.S. 376 (1973). See Publication Guidelines for Compliance with Title VIII of the Civil Rights Act of 1968, 37 Fed.Reg. 6700 (April 1, 1972). Now part of federal regulations, 45 Fed.Reg. 57102 (1980). Federal law governs real estate advertising. State and local laws sometimes prohibit discriminatory help-wanted ads. Federal laws do not.

5. 486 F.2d 25 (5th Cir. 1973). See also Deltec, Inc. v. Dun and Bradstreet, Inc., 187 F.Supp. 788 (D. Ohio 1960); Securities and Exchange Commission v. Wall St. Transcript, Corp., 422 F.2d 1371 (2d Cir. 1970); and Kansas Electric Supply Co. v. Dun and Bradstreet, Inc., 448 F.2d 647 (10th Cir. 1971), all supporting the proposition that commercial newspapers providing specialized information to selective audiences do not have full First Amendment protection.

tion, of course, extends to false advertising.<sup>6</sup> A city transportation official was able to deny advertising space in public vehicles to candidates for public office.<sup>7</sup> Ads for newspaper subscriptions may not be protected.<sup>8</sup>

In Bigelow v. Virginia, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1919, 421 U.S. 809 (1975), the commercial speech doctrine began to totter. The Court overturned, on First Amendment grounds, conviction of an editor for running an ad for a New York abortion referral agency at a time when abortions were illegal in Virginia. Virginians have a First Amendment right to receive information, a right to hear, declared Justice Blackmun for the Court. The state had not demonstrated any countervailing interest in prohibiting the ad. Speech, said Blackmun, is not to be stripped of First Amendment protection merely because it appears in commercial form. Pittsburgh Press was distinguished: there a particular form of advertising had been made illegal by a city ordinance; the New York abortion service was not illegal in New York at the time of the ad—although it was made so shortly thereafter. The Court may have been influenced by the fact that Bigelow was an editor first, an advertiser second.

While Bigelow was pending, the landmark abortion case, Roe v. Wade,<sup>9</sup> was decided, Justice Blackmun delivering the opinion of the Court.

It was again Blackmun speaking for the Court when in 1976 the commercial speech doctrine came to near collapse in a case involving the direct price advertising of prescription drugs. On the authority of that case, the New York City ordinance upheld by the Court in Valentine v. Chres- tensen thirty-five years earlier was to be declared unconstitutional.<sup>10</sup>

At this point Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumers Council, Inc., 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1930, 425 U.S. 748 (1976), because it is a focal case, ought to be reexamined in Chapter I, text, p. 159, or read in its entirety. Mark especially footnote 24 in which the Court declares that the greater hardihood of commercial speech makes it more durable and amenable to state regulation than other forms of speech.

Virginia State Board and the Public's Right to Receive Information. Some commentators would go far beyond Justice Blackmun in Virginia Pharmacy and the Court in protecting commercial speech. They consider his approval of state regulation of even false, misleading, and deceptive advertising a serious encroachment on First Amendment terrain.

"The determination by a government agency that a statement is false," says R.H. Coase of the University of Chicago Law School, "is completely alien to the doctrine of free speech and of freedom of the press. * * * The contrast between the philosophy which supports the First Amendment and that which gives authority to the Federal Trade Commission is even more striking when it has to decide, not whether a statement is false but whether it is misleading. This means that the commission has to enquire into the way in which information will be used before deciding whether it will allow it to be disseminated, the very kind of activity which the First Amendment is supposed to 6. Carpets by the Carload, Inc. v. Warren, 368 F.Supp. 1075 (D.Wis.1973).

7. Lehman v. City of Shaker Heights, 418 U.S. 298 (1974). See text, p. 64, for a discussion of the impact of Lehman on the public forum doctrine.

8. Rinaldi v. Village Voice, Inc., 365 N.Y.S.2d 199 (1975).

9. 410 U.S. 113 (1973).

10. People of New York v. Remeny, 387 N.Y.S.2d 415 (1976). The case involved distribution of handbills for a concert.

discourage the government from undertaking." 11

Conversely there are those who believe that pure product advertising ought to be regulated, not as speech, but as part of commerce, property, or contract. Ads with a meaning beyond a mere sales pitch—corporate image ads, ads promoting periodicals, lectures, concerts, and all kinds of social, cultural, and political policies, opinions, and activities—merit First Amendment protection, says Professor Kent Middleton.<sup>12</sup>

C. Edwin Baker of the University of Oregon Law School provides an example of this distinction by observing that "[w]hatever the personal views of employees, management, or owners about the hazards of cigarette smoking, the threat of bankruptcy forces cigarette companies to choose speech that sells cigarettes. Commercial speech thus lacks the individual liberty and self-realization aspects of speech that justify its constitutional protection. * * * Here then a clear constitutional distinction between the regulation of property rights and the imposition of limits on personal liberties. Baker, Press Rights and Government Power to Structure the Press, 34 U. of Miami L.Rev. 785, 822 (July 1980). See also, Emerson, Comments in Proceedings of the Symposium on Media Concentration 193, 194 (FTC 1978);

First Amendment and the Burger Court, 68 Calif.L.Rev. 422, 458-61 (1980).

The Third Circuit Court of Appeals ruled correctly, in Middleton's view, that a publisher could not be barred from distributing pamphlets—no matter how outlandish—claiming that aluminum cookware caused cancer.<sup>13</sup> But when a cookware competitor engaged in the same practice the Sixth Circuit upheld an FTC cease-and-desist order because the information was now part of trade, a competitive sales appeal.<sup>14</sup>

Middleton's concern is that Justice Blackmun's "half-hearted" First Amendment defense of commercial speech (see fn. 24 in Virginia Pharmacy, p. 162 this text) may eventually spill over to political, literary, and social speech. Governmental authority to deny protection to "false" advertising or false speech of any kind is contrary to the First Amendment doctrine of New York Times that protects at least the ignorantly false with the true:

Bringing advertising under the first amendment with an understanding that it does merit the same protections given to political and social expression establishes precedent for routine government review of truth and falsity of constitutionally protected speech that could have undesirable consequences in other more important areas of protected expression.<sup>15</sup>

11. Coase, Advertising and Free Speech (unpublished manuscript, 1976), pp. 43-45. See also, Coase, Advertising and Free Speech, 6 J.Legal Stud. 1 (1977); Reich, Consumer Protection and the First Amendment: A Dilemma for the FTC? 61 Minn.L.Rev. 705 (May 1977).

12. Middleton, Commercial Speech and the First Amendment (unpublished doctoral dissertation, University of Minnesota, December 1977). See also, Elman, Advertising and the First Amendment, 33 Food Drug Cosmetic L.J. 12 (January 1978).

A slightly more complex view is that of Daniel Farber: Advertising functions as part of the contractual arrangement between buyer and seller. Of course, in addition to serving this contractual function, ads also serve an informative function to which the First Amendment applies. "The critical factor seems to be whether a state rule is based on the informative function or the contractual function of the language." False ads are unfulfilled contractual promises. Farber, Commercial Speech and First Amendment Theory, 74 NW.U.L.Rev. 372, 387 (1979).

13. Scientific Manufacturing Co. v. FTC, 124 F.2d 640 (3d Cir. 1941).

14. Perma-Maid Co. v. FTC, 121 F.2d 282 (6th Cir. 1941).

15. Middleton, op.cit., p. 253.

While Coase would put bubble gum ads in the same protected category as an ad for a Picasso exhibit, Middleton would prefer to make a trade/speech distinction between them and in doing so embark upon a journey into that uncertain territory where the social value of or the public interest in a communication may have vague and subjective contours.

The Court's reluctance to go all the way with commercial speech was again demonstrated in the 1978 case Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Association, 436 U.S. 447 (1978). There a lawyer who was suspended from the practice of law for "ambulance chasing" claimed that his in-person solicitation, which he had surreptitiously recorded, was protected speech. The Court, adhering to the qualifications of Virginia Pharmacy's footnote 24, disagreed. Commercial speech, said Justice Powell, has "a limited measure of protection, commensurate with its subordinate position in the scale of First Amendment values."

A year later in Friedman v. Rogers, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 2213, 440 U.S. 1 (1979) the Court continued its post-Virginia Pharmacy tendency to show substantial deference to the judgment of legislatures and administrative agencies in balancing the regulation of commercial speech against First Amendment values. There it upheld provisions of the Texas Optometry Act prohibiting practice of that profession under an assumed, trade, or corporate name.

"Because of the special character of commercial speech and the relative novelty of First Amendment protection for such speech," said the Court in footnote 9 of that case, "we act with caution in confronting First Amendment challenges to economic regulation that serves legitimate regulatory interests. Our decision dealing with more traditional First Amendment problems do not extend automatically to this as yet uncharted area."

The uncharted state of commercial speech was reflected in Metromedia, Inc.

v. San Diego, 453 U.S. 490 (1981). The Court presented five opinions in striking down a city ordinance forbidding, with specified exceptions, all outdoor or billboard advertising. Justice William Rehnquist called the opinions "a virtual Tower of Babel," out of which no principles could be drawn. A fragmented Court might mean diminished protection for commercial speech.

Justice Rehnquist also dissented in the 1980 case upon which Metromedia had depended for its momentum. In Central Hudson Gas & Electric Corp. v. Public Service Commission, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1497, 447 U.S. 557 (1980), the Court invalidated a state regulation prohibiting advertising to promote the sale of electricity. Justice Powell for the Court suggested a four-part test, based in part upon earlier cases:

1. The commercial speech much concern a lawful activity, Pittsburgh Press (see also, Village of Hoffman Estates v. Flipside, Hoffman Estates, 452 U.S. 904 (1982), where the illegal activity advertised was drug use);

2. it must not be misleading (Warner-Lambert);

3. the state interest posed against advertising must be substantial and well beyond the mere proprieties of a profession (Virginia State Board, Bates v. Arizona); and

4. the state regulation applied must advance the governmental interest claimed and be no more extensive than necessary.

Conservation, the state interest claimed in Central Hudson, could have been achieved in other ways, short of an outright ban on advertising. The fourth part of the test had not been met by the New York regulation. Although the four-part test clearly implies a lower level of constitutional protection for commercial speech than for other forms, Rehnquist would have gone the Court one better in banning the speech of a state-created monopoly.

A mechanical application of the four-part test may be hazardous to the free flow of information because the first two steps in the test could get a court's analysis off the First Amendment track. An effort to rectify this was made in In re R.M.J., 455 U.S. 191 (1982). There the Court held that potentially misleading professional advertising might deserve some level of First Amendment protection after all.

Virginia Pharmacy's footnote 24 had also been cited by a New York court in upholding the principle that the First Amendment did not bar an injunction restraining an insurance company from advertising that personal injury awards were "assuming astronomical proportions, often unrelated to the actual extent of injury. * * *" Although the injunction was denied for other reasons, the court went so far as to suggest that footnote 24 language attesting to the "greater objectivity and hardihood of commercial speech" might also permit prior restraints. Quinn v. Aetna Life & Casualty Co., 4 Med.L.Rptr. 1049, 409 N.Y.S.2d 473 (1978). Although unresolved, state Blue Sky laws governing the advertising of securities probably do not offend the First Amendment.

And the Illinois Supreme Court in Talisky v. Department of Registration and Education, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1315, 370 N.E.2d 173

(Ill.1977), held that while a blanket statutory prohibition of advertising and solicitation by health care professionals "may operate in some cases to suppress commercial speech in violation of the First Amendment," a chiropractor's newspaper ad for "free chicken, free refreshments, and free spinal X-rays" was not protected under Virginia Pharmacy. Two dissenting justices objected to the decision's turning on the content of the ad.

Certainly these later cases can be interpreted as a return to at least a qualified commercial speech doctrine. Footnote 24 teaches that advertising is a "hardy" form of speech not easily discouraged or chilled by prior restraints or by overbroad statutes. See generally, Metromedia, Inc. v. San Diego, 435 U.S. 490 (1981).

Media Rights to Refuse and Control the Conditions of Advertising. Following Virginia Pharmacy, new forms of commercial speech nevertheless gained constitutional protection. An ordinance designed to prevent panic selling by prohibiting "for sale" signs on residential lawns was struck down in Linmark Associates, Inc. v. Township of Willingboro, 431 U.S. 85 (1977), although Metromedia may have overruled Linmark. Professional advertising by lawyers,<sup>16</sup> doctors,<sup>17</sup> and opticians<sup>18</sup> has received expanding constitutional approval under particular conditions. Contraceptive advertising,<sup>19</sup> the advertising of 16. Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 2097, 433 U.S. 350 (1977). See text, p. 164. See also, Consumers Union of United States, Inc. v. American Bar Association, 427 F.Supp. 506 (D.Va.1976); Jacoby v. The State Bar of California, 138 Cal.Rptr. 77, 562 P.2d 1326 (1977).

17. Health Systems Agency of Northern Virginia v. Virginia State Board of Medicine, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1107, 424 F.Supp. 267 (D.Va.1976). In 1979 the commission voted to require the American Medical Association to cease restricting physician advertising beyond "reasonable-ethical guidelines" applicable to deceptive advertising including unsubstantiated claims and solicitation of vulnerable patients. The commission was upheld with minor modifications. American Medical Association v. FTC, 638 F.2d 443 (2d Cir. 1980). A law prohibiting the advertising of prescription eyeglasses was held "patently unconstitutional," Wall & Ochs, Inc. v. Hicks, 469 F.Supp. 873 (D.N.C.1979). A city ordinance banning advertising by clinical laboratories was struck down in Metpath, Inc. v. Imperato, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 2284, 450 F.Supp. 115 (D.N.Y.1978) and Metpath, Inc. v. Meyers, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 1884, 462 F.Supp. 1104 (D.Cal.1978).

18. Horner-Rausch Optical Co. v. Ashley, 547 S.W.2d 577 (Tenn.1976).

19. Carey v. Population Services International, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1935, 431 U.S. 678 (1977).

proprietary drugs on television,<sup>20</sup> and the advertising of saccharin products<sup>21</sup> have withstood legal challenges.

In spite of First Amendment victories for commercial speech, the media have compromised none of their rights of control over access and display of advertising. They may refuse advertising and dictate the conditions of its sale.

In 1965 a Florida appeals court held that, "in the absence of any statutory provisions to the contrary, the law seems to be uniformly settled by the great weight of authority throughout the United States that the newspaper publishing business is a private enterprise and is neither a public utility nor affected with the public interest. The decisions appear to hold that even though a particular newspaper may enjoy a virtual monopoly in the area of its publication, this fact is neither unusual nor of important significance. The courts have consistently held that in the absence of statutory regulation on the subject, a newspaper may publish or reject commercial advertising tendered to it as its judgment best dictates without incurring liability for advertisements rejected by it." Approved Personnel, Inc. v. Tribune Co., 177 So.2d 704 (Fla.1965).<sup>22</sup>

An exception to the rule may be newspapers or periodicals which, because they can be defined as publicly supported channels, raise the issue of "state action." See Zucker v. Panitz, 299 F.Supp. 102 (D.N.

Y.1969). Portland Women's Health Center v. Portland Community College, ___ F.Supp. ___ (D.Or.1981). Lee v. Board of Regents of State Colleges, 306 F.Supp. 1097 (Wisc.1969), affirmed 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1947, 441 F.2d 1257 (7th Cir. 1971). See also, Radical Lawyers Caucus v. Pool, 324 F.Supp. 268 (D.Tex.1970). But see Mississippi Gay Alliance v. Goudelock, 536 F.2d 1073 (5th Cir. 1976), cert. den. 430 U.S. 982 (1977). The foregoing cases are discussed in the materials on access to the public press, text, p. 596.

Tornillo, text, p. 584, was relied on when a plaintiff whose "tombstone advertisements" announcing an offer of shares in a pending lawsuit were rejected by a newspaper and he was denied an injunction which would have required the newspaper either to publish the ad or to refrain from publishing all such ads in the future. Such a restraint, said the court, "runs squarely against the wall of freedom of the press. * * * That commercial advertising is involved makes no difference. * * [A]ny such compulsion to publish that which 'reason' tells [a newspaper] should not be published" is unconstitutional. Person v. New York Post, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1666, 427 F.Supp. 1297 (D.N.Y.1977), affirmed without opinion, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1784, 573 F.2d 1294 (1977).

Newspapers may allocate their advertising space as they see fit,<sup>23</sup> and statutory requirements to the contrary will have dif-

20. FCC memorandum and order (Dec. 8, 1976). Courts are divided on the constitutionality of laws restricting the advertising of drug paraphernalia. See Record Revolution No. Six, Inc. v. City of Parma, 638 F.2d 916 (6th Cir. 1980), cert. den., 451 U.S. 1013 (1981) and High Ol' Times, Inc. v. Busbee, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 1721, 456 F.Supp. 1035 (D.Ga.1978), affirmed 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1617, 621 F.2d 141 (5th Cir. 1980). Cf. Gasser v. Morgan, 498 F.Supp. 1154 (D.Ala.1980).

21. The Senate Commerce Committee struck a provision from the Saccharin Study Labeling and Advertising Act (S. 1750) on July 26, 1977 which would have prohibited broadcast advertising of saccharin and saccharin products during an eighteen-month study period.

22. The court relied on earlier rulings: Shuck v. Carroll Daily Herald, 247 N.W. 813 (Iowa 1933); Poughkeepsie Buying Service, Inc. v. Poughkeepsie Newspapers, Inc., 131 N.Y.S.2d 515 (1954); and Gordon v. Worcester Telegram Publishing Co., 177 N.E.2d 586 (Mass.1961). See also, Chicago Joint Boards, Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, AFL-CIO v. Chicago Tribune Co., 307 F.Supp. 422 (D.Ill.1969), affirmed 435 F.2d 470 (7th Cir. 1970), this text, p. 508.

23. National Tire Wholesale v. Washington Post, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1520, 441 F.Supp. 81 (D.D.C.1977).

ficulty passing constitutional muster. The Fifth Circuit affirmed a federal district court ruling in Florida that the First Amendment was violated by a provision of Florida's campaign financing law requiring newspapers to offer advertising to political candidates at the lowest available rate.<sup>24</sup>

And a Florida law that restricted candidates for public office from making any use of advertising media except in a specified "political season" was held by the Florida Supreme Court to violate the First Amendment since it was primarily designed to limit the quantity of political speech.<sup>25</sup>

If a refusal to accept advertising is in breach of contract or an attempt to monopolize interstate commerce, an injunction may issue. In Lorain Journal Co. v. United States, 342 U.S. 143 (1951), this text, p. 660, a publisher was prohibited from refusing to accept local advertisements from anyone who advertised in a competitive radio station.

The Sherman Act was not violated, the Second Circuit held in Homefinders v. Providence Journal, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1018, 621 F.2d 441 (1st Cir. 1980), by a newspaper's refusal to publish false and misleading advertisements submitted by a rental referral firm. Where the advertising was honest and aboveboard and the metropolitan daily, the only newspaper of its kind in town, was in direct competition with the advertiser, the result could be a Sherman Act violation. Home Placement Service, Inc. v. Providence Journal Co., 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1881, 682 F.2d 274 (1st Cir. 1982).

But once a newspaper signs a contract to publish an ad, it has given up the right not to publish unless that right is specifically reserved in the contract or some other equitable defense is available to it. Herald-Telephone v. Fatouros, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1230, 431 N.E.2d 171 (Ind.1982).

By the same token, advertisers may not conspire to withdraw advertising from a newspaper by waging an advertising boycott without violating federal antitrust laws. Mims v. Kemp, Civil Action No. 72-627 (D.S.C.1977). A conglomerate corporation under single ownership, however, may withdraw all its advertising from a newspaper, as Howard Hughes did with the Las Vegas Sun, without violating federal law.<sup>26</sup>

But a newspaper may not conspire with a segment of its advertisers to refuse space to a competitive advertiser.<sup>27</sup>

Generally courts have recognized that newspapers have a strong economic self-interest in limiting the kinds of advertising they will accept, since "in the minds of readers, a newspaper's advertising may be every bit as reflective of the policy of a newspaper as its editorial page." Adult Film Association of America v. Times Mirror Co., 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1865, 158 Cal.Rptr. 547 (1979).

Although the broadcast media are under much more direct and stringent governmental supervision than other media, the U.S. Supreme Court in CBS v. Democratic National Committee, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1855, 412 U.S. 94 (1973), was unwilling to grant a First Amendment right of access to editorial advertising on network television. A second group, Business Executives' Move for Vietnam Peace, had also been denied the opportunity to buy broadcast time.

"There is substantial risk," said Chief Justice Burger writing for the Court, "that such a system [a guaranteed right of ac-

24. Gore Newspapers v. Shevin, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 181, 397 F.Supp. 1253 (D.Fla.1975), affirmed 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1818, 550 F.2d 1057 (5th Cir. 1977).

25. Sadowski v. Shevin, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1822, 345 So.2d 330 (Fla.1977).

26. Las Vegas Sun v. Summa Corp., 5 Med.L.Rptr. 2073, 610 F.2d 614 (9th Cir. 1979).

27. Greenspun v. McCarran, 105 F.Supp. 662 (D.Nev.1952).

cess] would be monopolized by those who could and would pay the costs, that the effective operation of the Fairness Doctrine itself would be undermined, and that the public accountability which now rests with the broadcaster would be diluted."

Moreover, case-by-case determination by the FCC of who should be heard and when, the Court added, would enlarge the involvement of the government in broadcasting and limit journalistic discretion.

Ironically, it may be too late to worry about the network broadcast system's being monopolized by those able to pay the costs since at least 75 percent of all broadcast advertising is purchased by fewer than 100 firms, and no more than ten large firms account for a quarter of the total.

Commercial advertisers, Brennan argued, who seek to peddle their goods and services to the public—beer, soap, toothpaste—have instantaneous access in whatever format or time period they choose; but individuals seeking to discuss war, peace, pollution, or the suffering of the poor are denied a similar right to speak and instead are compelled to rely on the beneficence of a corporate "trustee" appointed by the government to argue their case for them. For a fuller discussion of the case, see p. 858, this text.

A year after CBS v. DNC the FCC issued its 1974 Fairness Report in which it divided advertising into three categories: editorial, institutional, and product. While continuing to allow the first two categories under some conditions to invoke fairness doctrine claims, the Commission in effect repudiated its Banzhaf ruling (WCBS-TV, 8 FCC 2d 381, 1967) which had permitted negative or counter replies to cigarette advertising.

"We believe," said the commission, "that standard product commercials, such as the old cigarette ads, make no meaningful contribution toward informing the public on any side of any issue." The proposition is, of course, eminently debatable.

For a discussion of the Fairness Report and related matters, see text, p. 867.

Taxes on Advertising. At least since the landmark case, Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233 (1936), see pp. 138–141 this text, discriminatory or punitive taxes on advertising have been constitutionally impermissible. Newspapers, and by implication other media, do not lose First Amendment protection because they are published for profit. Because general business taxes, if they are levied evenhandedly, can be imposed on the press, state legislatures frequently entertain bills that would tax advertising.

While most states exempt newspapers from sales or use taxes, the question has arisen whether advertising supplements inserted into newspapers enjoy similar exemption. In line with recent modifications in the commercial speech doctrine, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts made a First Amendment argument in favor of Sears's advertising supplements being exempt from state sales and use taxes. Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. State Tax Commission, 345 N.E.2d 893 (Mass.1976).

A year later, however, the Tennessee Supreme Court held that an advertising "give away" or shopper that resembled a tabloid newspaper in form but devoted itself entirely to ads and announcements of local social and sports events, was not a newspaper and did not qualify for tax exemptions normally granted to newspapers. "The tax in question," said the court, "is not upon the privilege of disseminating information to the public. It is a general tax applying to all persons, whatever their business, who fabricate tangible personal property." Shoppers Guide Publishing Co. v. Woods, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1825, 547 S.W.2d 561 (Tenn.1977). See also, Memphis Shoppers News, Inc. v. Woods, 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1445, 584 S.W.2d 196 (Tenn. 1979).

The Regulation of Advertising

1. The regulation of advertising grew out of a general assault at the turn of the century on the excesses of laissez-faire capitalism and the cynical doctrine of caveat emptor (let the buyer beware). Stimulated by the writing of the muckrakers, notably Samuel Hopkins Adams's 1906 Colliers series on patent medicines, "The Great American Fraud," the regulatory movement took root in passage of the Pure Food and Drug Act in 1906 and the creation in 1914 of the Federal Trade Commission.

Congress in 1914 was primarily concerned with reinforcing the antitrust provisions of the Sherman and Clayton Acts. The FTC Act declared unfair methods of competition in commerce unlawful. Its purpose was to promote "the preservation of an environment which would foster the liberty to compete." In its early years the act was used by the courts to protect competitors against false and deceptive advertising; the protection of consumers was incidental.

In 1922, for example, Justice Louis Brandeis, in an opinion for the United States Supreme Court, upheld the FTC in a ruling against a manufacturer who had mislabeled underwear as wool when in fact it contained as little as 10 percent wool.

Although Brandeis did recognize a public interest in prohibiting mislabeling, his main argument was that "the practice constitutes an unfair method of competition as against manufacturers of all wool knit underwear and as against those manufacturers of mixed wool and cotton underwear who brand their product truthfully. For when misbranded goods attract customers by means of the fraud which they perpetrate, trade is diverted from the producer of truthfully marked goods. * * *" FTC v. Winsted Hosiery Co., 258 U.S. 483 (1922). See also, FTC v. Beech-Nut, 257 U.S. 441 (1921).

In a similar case ten years later, Justice Benjamin Cardozo in an opinion for the Court upheld an FTC ruling ordering lumber dealers to discontinue selling "Western Yellow Pine" under the trade name of "California White Pine," the latter being a distinct and superior product.

Again the incidental right of the consumer to get what was ordered was acknowledged. But the Court emphasized that "Dealers and manufacturers are prejudiced when orders that would have come to them if the lumber had been rightly named are diverted to others whose methods are less scrupulous. * * *" FTC v. Algoma Lumber Co., 291 U.S. 67 (1933).

That consumer rights in this period were peripheral to the welfare of competitors is best illustrated by the 1931 Supreme Court ruling in the Raladam case. Here the Court declared flatly through Justice George Sutherland that the FTC Act would not protect consumers against the phony advertising of an "obesity cure" unless competitive businesses were being hurt. FTC v. Raladam Co., 283 U.S. 643 (1931).

Three years later, however, the Court repudiated Raladam in a case involving the deceptive use of a lottery in marketing candy to children (FTC v. R.F. Keppel & Brother, Inc., 291 U.S. 304, 1934); and after Keppel unfair competitive practices were not limited to those violative of the anti-trust laws. In 1937 Justice Hugo Black overruled an opinion by district court Judge Learned Hand which had struck down an FTC order against deceptive sales practices in selling encyclopediae. Black wrote, for the Court:

The fact that a false statement may be obviously false to those who are trained and experienced does not change its character nor take away its power to deceive others less experienced. There is no duty resting upon a citizen to suspect the honesty of those with whom he transacts business. Laws are made to protect the trusting as well as the suspicious. The best element of business has long since decided that honesty should govern competitive enterprises, and that the rule of caveat emptor should not be relied upon to reward fraud and deception. FTC v. Standard Education Society, 302 U.S. 112 (1937).

2. Congress legitimized this golden rule in 1938 by adding Section 5(b) to the FTC Act: "Unfair methods of competition in commerce, and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in commerce, are declared unlawful." 15 U.S.C.A. § 45. And to Section 12 was added language that declares false advertising of food, drugs, cosmetics, or devices to be an unfair or deceptive act and, as such, a violation of law.

Known as the Wheeler-Lea Amendments, these changes in the act made "false" and "deceptive" advertising the keystones of the FTC's authority to protect consumers as well as competitors.

"This amendment," said a House report on the legislation, "makes the consumer, who may be injured by an unfair trade practice, of equal concern before the law, with the merchant or manufacturer injured by the unfair methods of a dishonest competitor."<sup>28</sup>

3. There was disagreement in the late 70s as to the effect Virginia Pharmacy would have on the FTC's regulatory activities. Robert Pitofsky, a former director of the Commission's Bureau of Consumer Protection, doubted that the case would "appreciably circumscribe FTC regulation of advertising."<sup>29</sup> On the other hand, Robert Reich, then director of the agency's Office of Planning and Evaluation, believed that the case would cause the courts to assume they must scrutinize FTC actions more strictly to prevent unnecessary interference with constitutionally protected speech.<sup>30</sup>

In Beneficial Corp. v. FTC, 542 F.2d 611 (3d Cir. 1976), for example, the court, relying on Virginia Pharmacy, refused to enforce an FTC order on the ground that the First Amendment requires the commission to bear the burden of proof and to use the least restrictive remedy available. The court then recommended substitute language for an advertisement confusing an ordinary loan with a federal tax refund in lieu of litigation.

The goals of regulation remain fairness and efficiency in the marketplace and a lessening of competitor and consumer injury depending, in part, upon an increase in the flow of truthful information to the public. The goal of fairness, as shall be noted, came under a cloud in the early 80s.

The commission will issue formal opinions where there is a substantial question of law and no clear precedent, a proposed merger or acquisition is involved, or a matter of significant public interest is before it.

False, Deceptive, and Unfair Advertising. Public and private agencies since at least the early 1960s<sup>31</sup> have shown a resolute interest in consumer rights. Ralph Nader's incalculable contributions to the consumer movement have been accompanied by state and federal laws and regulations protecting buyers in such marketplaces as packaging and labeling, credit, land purchases, warranties, insulation, and a broad range of product safety areas including cigarettes and hair implantation processes.

28. H.R.Rep. No. 1613, 75th Cong., 1st Sess., 3 (1937).

29. Pitofsky, Beyond Nader: Consumer Protection and the Regulation of Advertising, 90 Harvard L.Rev. 661, 672 (Feb.1977).

30. Reich, Consumer Protection and the First Amendment, 61 Minn.L.Rev. 705, 706 (May 1977).

31. Cox, Fellmuth and Schulz, The Nader Report on the Federal Trade Commission, 1969; The Report of the American Bar Association Committee to Study the Federal Trade Commission, 1969; Howard and Hulbert, Advertising and the Public Interest, A Staff Report to the Federal Trade Commission, 1973.

False and deceptive advertising is regulated under Sections 5 and 12 of the Federal Trade Commission Act<sup>32</sup> and Section 43(a) of the Lanham Trademark Act.<sup>33</sup> The Federal Trade Commission also enforces ten or more consumer protection laws. Each permits consumers to sue for civil damages and attorney's fees.<sup>34</sup>

Congressional support of the FTC appears to be cyclical. Congressional action in the 80s has sought to make the agency, a creature of Congress, more sensitive to business and political trends and to the economic consequences of its rulings. Some businessmen would have the FTC avoid regulating low-cost consumer products and concentrate instead upon validated deception in health and safety fields. And, since the 1934 Keppel case, sellers and advertisers have thought the unfairness standard vague and amorphous. Much debate has focused on its meaning.

Unfair methods of competition, even when they do not violate antitrust laws directly and are not deceptive, were condemned in FTC v. The Sperry & Hutchinson Co., 405 U.S. 233 (1972).

"[L]egislative and judicial authorities alike convince us," said Justice Byron White for the Court, "that the Federal Trade Commission does not arrogate excessive power to itself if, in measuring a practice against the elusive but congressionally mandated standard of fairness, it, like a court of equity, considers public values beyond simply those enshrined in the letter or encompassed in the spirit of the antitrust laws."

In broadening the authority of the commission the Court spoke of practices which "offend public policy" because they are "immoral, unethical, oppressive or unscrupulous" and cause "substantial injury to consumers or competitors or other businessmen." The language is from "Statement of Basis and Purpose of Trade Regulation Rule 408, Unfair or Deceptive Advertising and Labeling of Cigarettes in Relation to the Health Hazards of Smoking," 29 Fed.Reg. 8355 (1964).

In 1978, the FTC extended the unfairness doctrine to include a cost-benefit analysis of social and economic factors to be considered in a rulemaking proceeding. See "Advertising and Ophthalmic Goods and Services, Statement of Basis and Purpose," 43 Fed.Reg. 23992, 24000-01 (1978).

Several FTC Magnuson-Moss rulemaking proceedings in the early 80s, for example, used car sales, insurance, and funeral home practices, were criticized by business as attempts to stretch the meaning of unfairness beyond the unconscionability limits of public policy. Perhaps the best example of this alleged overreach was the "Kid-Vid" rulemaking proceedings which examined, under the promise of a trade regulation rule, the effects of television advertising on presumably vulnerable children,<sup>35</sup> notably the advertising of sugared cereals and toys. The proceedings were abruptly terminated on September 30, 1981, and for two years Congress temporarily withdrew from the commission authority to base trade regulation rules on unfair as opposed to false and deceptive advertising, pending reauthorization hearings before the Senate Commerce Committee. In May 1982 that Committee voted 13-2 to support legislation forbidding the FTC to regulate unfair advertising.

32. 15 U.S.C. § 45; 15 U.S.C. § 52. Under Section 5(a)(1) it is unfair or deceptive to fail to disclose any safety risk in the use of a product for the purpose for which it is sold, which would not be immediately apparent to a casual purchaser or user. Particularly it is an unfair or deceptive act or practice to fail to disclose latent safety hazards relating to flammability. Where human safety is involved and the buyer must rely on a manufacturer's technical knowledge to assure the validity of its claims, it is an unfair and deceptive act or practice to make a specific advertising claim without supporting data from scientific tests. A scientific test is one in which persons with skill and expertise in the field conduct the test and evaluate its results in a disinterested manner using testing procedures generally accepted in the profession and which best insure accurate results. See Firestone Tire and Rubber Co., 81 F.T.C. 398, 451, 463 (1972), affirmed 481 F.2d 246 (6th Cir. 1973), cert. den. 414 U.S. 1112. Disclosures are to be made in ways that arrest the eye or attract the attention of an average purchaser or user of the product.

33. 15 U.S.C. § 1125(a).

34. For example, Truth in Lending Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1601-1667e; Fair Credit Reporting Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1681-1681i; Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 2301-2312; Energy Policy and Conservation Act, 42 U.S.C. §§ 6201-6422; Hobby Protection Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 2101-2106.

This action had been preceded by the 1980 FTC Improvements Act (Public Law 96-252) which required the agency to drop its "Kid-Vid" concerns and give business and industry advance notice of contemplated rulemaking, and thereby an opportunity to lean on regulators.

A former FTC chairman saw this development as a naked political sortie by affected industries to evade public accountability for commercial abuse and consumer injury. "This," he added, "from the Congress which, for more than a decade, had consistently urged the commission to undertake these very same initiatives, and in general had flogged the commission for its attention to trivia and lack of responsiveness to consumer interests."<sup>36</sup> The 1980 act also required the FTC to submit all final rules to Congress. Rules can be vetoed by concurrent resolutions of both Houses of Congress if they act within ninety days. Under these conditions does the FTC remain an independent regulatory agency?

It is well established that under FTCA Section 5 the commission can challenge practices that violate the Sherman and Clayton Acts. This has been construed as giving the agency unrestrained authority to define "unfair methods of competition" and to condemn any conduct believed to be potentially anticompetitive or economically objectionable. Recommendations have therefore been made to limit the FTC's remedial rulemaking and adjudicative powers in the antitrust field as well and to remind Congress of its oversight role.<sup>37</sup>

First Amendment issues are inherent in the regulatory process. Should the FTC apply a "reasonable" or "ignorant" person standard in evaluating advertising claims? In the absence of evidence of intentional deception, the "reasonable person" standard comports with the common law and tends to discourage broad assaults on the First Amendment. It also legitimizes puffery: the exaggerated use of superlatives and hyperbole to describe goods and services, a form of expression defying objective measurement. Courts and commission have held words like "stupendous" to be romantic characterizations not to be read literally. So while a toothpaste may be said to "beautify the smile,"<sup>38</sup> a ciga-

35. 46 FR 48710.1. See Summary and Recommendation: Federal Trade Commission Staff Report on TV Advertising to Children, summarized in Advertising Age, Feb. 27, 1978. The commission subsequently said that it could not resolve the factual issues and the remedies to be applied on legal and policy grounds in the "Kid-Vid" proceedings without an inordinate commitment of its resources.

36. Pertschuk, The FTC, Advertising Age, Dec. 14, 1981.

37. Report of the Section of Antitrust Law, American Bar Association, Concerning Federal Trade Commission Structure, Powers and Procedure (February 7, 1980); and Federal Trade Regulation Rulemaking Procedures Pursuant to the Magnuson-Moss Act (February 7, 1980).

38. Bristol-Meyers Co., 46 FTC 162 (1949), affirmed 185 F.2d 58 (4th Cir. 1950). But in Aronberg v. FTC, 132 F.2d 165, 167 (7th Cir. 1942), the court interpreted the commission's function as considering what impression an ad would make on the general public, including the "ignorant, the unthinking and the credulous, who in making purchases do not stop to analyze but too often are governed by appearances and general impression." And when an ad is subject to two possible interpretations, one of which is false, the advertisement is found deceptive and misleading (United States v. 95 Barrels of Vinegar, 265 U.S. 438 (1924)).

In Kirchner, 63 F.T.C. 1282 (1963) the commission based a finding of harmless hyperbole on the proposition that puffery can be harmless when the consumer does not expect documentation.

rette manufacturer may not safely say that his product is "less irritating."<sup>39</sup>

In Carlay v. FTC, 153 F.2d 493 (7th Cir. 1946), the court noted:

What was said [Ayds candy mints will make weight reducing easy] was clearly justifiable * * * under those cases recognizing that such words as "easy," "perfect," "amazing," "prime," "wonderful," "excellent," are regarded in law as mere puffing or dealer's talk upon which no charge of misrepresentation can be based.

The trick seems to be to avoid factual or material claims or misrepresentation, but the distinction is often vague and subjective. Puffery therefore has its articulate enemies.<sup>40</sup>

Neither the FTC Act nor its legislative history defines "unfair," "false," or "deceptive." Courts generally defer to the experience and expertise of the FTC. The commission requires no proof of actual deception; a capacity or tendency to deceive an average person, the general "buying public," or a significant percentage of that public may be sufficient, with the burden of proof on the government. Double digit percentages are generally too high. But the FTC will consider the consequences of the deception and the number of persons involved. If the general impression of an ad is, directly or by innuendo, to deceive or mislead so as to result in injury or prejudice to the public or to the irrationality of its buying decisions, the FTC may intervene.

Higher standards may be set for advertising to children (especially nutritional and toy performance claims)<sup>41</sup> and to other vulnerable groups.<sup>42</sup>

Courts and commission have been sensitive to misleading demonstrations, testimonials, and endorsements. The classic case began in 1959 when Colgate Palmolive and its advertising agency Ted Bates presented TV ads suggesting by means of a mock-up that a shaving cream product could shave sandpaper. Seeing its case as having preventive as well as punitive purposes, the FTC stuck by its claim that viewers would be misled into thinking they were seeing an actual experiment all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court. There, in an opinion written for the Court by Chief Justice Warren, it was upheld:

We agree with the [c]ommission that the undisclosed use of plexiglass in the present commercials, was a material deceptive practice, independent and separate from the other misrepresentation found. We find unpersuasive respondents' other objections to this conclusion. Respondents claim that it will be impractical to inform the viewing public that it is not seeing an actual test, experiment or demonstration, but we think it inconceivable that the ingenious advertising world will be unable, if it so desires, to conform to the [c]ommission's insistence that the public be not misinformed. If, however, it becomes impossible or impractical to show simulated demonstrations on television in a truthful manner, this indicates that television is not a medium that lends itself to this type of commercial, not that the commercial must survive at all costs. FTC v. Colgate-Palmolive Co., 380 U.S. 374 (1965).

Libbey-Owens-Ford Glass Co. and General Motors fared no better when they claimed minimum distortion for safety plate glass used in GM cars with pictures shot through an automobile window from which the glass had been removed. Lib-

39. Liggett & Myers Tobacco Co., 55 F.T.C. 354 (1958).

40. Preston, The Great American Blow-Up: Puffery in Advertising and Selling, 1975.

41. Topper, FTC C-2073, and Mattel, FTC C-2071, 1973 CCH Transfer Binder ¶ 19,735 (1971); Hudson Pharmaceutical Corp., 3 CCH Trade Reg.Rptr. ¶ 21,191 (1976), the "Spider Man" vitamins case.

42. Doris Savitch, 50 F.T.C. 828 (1954), Savitch v. FTC, affirmed per curiam 218 F.2d 817 (2d Cir. 1955), women who fear they may be pregnant; S.S.S. Co. v. FTC, 416 F.2d 226 (6th Cir. 1969), poor people.

bey-Owens-Ford Glass Co. v. FTC, 352 F.2d 415 (6th Cir. 1965).

There have been few mock-up complaints since Colgate-Palmolive, and the commission has indicated that it will not go after smaller priced items unless public health or safety is involved. In Bristol-Meyers Co., CCH 1973-76, Transfer Binder, ¶ 20,900, the 1975 "Dry Ban" case, the commission was perceived as being unwilling to pursue such supertechnical and inconsequential cases.

In United States v. Reader's Digest, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 2258, 464 F.Supp. 1037 (D.Del. 1978), the court proscribed "simulated checks" as a promotional device and found the governmental interest in preventing deception outweighing Reader's Digest's free speech rights because regulation affected only the form of the message, not its content. The court imposed a civil penalty of $1,750,000 on Reader's Digest. The Third Circuit affirmed in 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1921, 662 F.2d 955 (3d Cir.1981) and the Supreme Court let it stand, cert. den. 455 U.S. 908.

Claims of uniqueness have run afoul of the agency. When Wonder Bread implied in its advertising that it could cause dramatic growth in children, its makers were challenged. ITT Continental Baking, 3 Trade Reg.Rptr. 20,464 (1973).

Merck & Co. and its advertising agency were ordered to discontinue false germ-killing and pain-relieving claims for Sucrets in 1966. "A false impression can be made by words and sentences which are literally and technically true but framed in such a setting as to mislead or deceive," said the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals in affirming the commission's order, "and as one writer has pointed out 'The skillful advertiser can mislead the consumer without misstating a single fact. The shrewd use of exaggeration, innuendo, ambiguity and half-truth is more efficacious from the advertiser's standpoint than factual assertions.'" The court would not permit the advertising agency to pass the buck to Merck because, said the court, "This is an area in which the agency has expertise. Its responsibility for creating deceptive advertising cannot be shifted to the principal who is liable in any event." Merck & Co. v. FTC, 392 F.2d 921 (6th Cir. 1968).

Nearly ten years later in December 1977 the FTC had to file a civil penalty suit against Merck for violating its 1966 order. Regulators seemed unable to cope with misrepresentation, although this time the commission would ask the court for a permanent injunction against future violations.

The commission had Sperry & Hutchinson in mind when it decided its landmark substantiation case. Involved were advertisements for an ointment purporting to anesthetize nerves in sunburned skin on the basis of systematic scientific research, claims which were unsubstantiated. Affirming the decision of a hearing examiner that the commission's staff counsel had failed to establish with conclusive evidence that a cease-and-desist order should issue, FTC Chairman Miles Kirkpatrick nevertheless set the ground rules for future substantiation requirements:

Given the imbalance of knowledge and resources between a business enterprise and each of its customers, economically it is more rational and imposes far less cost on society, to require a manufacturer to confirm his affirmative product claims rather than impose a burden upon each individual consumer to test, investigate, or experiment for himself. The manufacturer has the ability, the knowhow, the equipment, the time and the resources to undertake such information by testing or otherwise—the consumer usually does not. * * * Absent a reasonable basis for a vendor's affirmative product claims, a consumer's ability to make an economically rational product choice, and a competitor's ability to compete on the basis of price, quality, service or convenience are materially impaired and impeded. * * * The consumer is entitled, as a matter of marketplace fairness, to rely upon the manufacturer to have a "reasonable basis" for making performance claims. A consumer should not be compelled to enter into an economic gamble to determine whether a product will or will not perform as represented. * * * A sale made as a result of unsupported advertising claims deprives competitors of the opportunity to have made that sale for themselves. Pfizer, Inc., 81 FTC 23 (1972). This ruling remains the regulatory standard in substantiation cases. The court held in Jay Norris, Inc. v. FTC, 598 F.2d 1244 (2d Cir. 1979), cert. den. 444 U.S. 980 (1979), that substantiation was "a reasonable remedy for past violations of the Act" and not an unconstitutional prior restraint. Affirmative disclosure remains central to FTC initiatives in rule making, although some regulators express a preference for self-regulation over affirmative disclosure and substantiation.

"Substantial scientific test data," then, are required to support a claim that "involves a matter of human safety * * * which consumers themselves cannot verify since they have neither the equipment nor the knowledge to undertake the complicated * * * tests required [and therefore] must rely on the technical expertise of the manufacturers to assure the validity of its claims." Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. v. FTC, 81 FTC 398, 451 (1972), affirmed 481 F.2d 246 (6th Cir. 1972), cert. den., 414 U.S. 1112 (1973).

A 1974 FTC order required not only competent scientific tests, but tests that would support an advertising claim of superior product performance at not less than the 95 percent confidence level. That is, nineteen of twenty copies of an advertised product would have to perform at the promised level. In re K Mart Enterprises, Inc., 3 Trade Reg.Rptr. ¶ 20,661 (1974). This expectation may be more urgent where a health claim is made. P. Lorrillard Co. v. FTC, 186 F.2d 52 (4th Cir. 1950).

The FTC obviously has broad powers to remedy false, misleading, and deceptive acts and practices, and the federal courts, deferring to its expertise, will usually sustain its orders. During the Reagan Administration those powers were questioned, and, as part of a program to make regulatory agencies more sensitive to business and political perspectives, Congress reined in its offspring and attempted to remove the presumption of validity of an agency's interpretation of the law when cases came before the federal courts.

The Regulatory Process. Rulemaking. Federal Trade Commission consumer protection rules are promulgated under Section 18 of the FTC Act (15 U.S.C. 57a), as amended by the Magnuson-Moss Warranty—FTC Improvement Act of 1975, authorizing the commission to issue rules which "define with specificity" unfair or deceptive acts or practices proscribed by the Act.

In a pre-rulemaking investigative phase, the FTC staff gathers data to assess the seriousness of the problem. A proposal to move on to a formal investigation which may lead to a rulemaking proceeding must be approved by an evaluation committee of the Bureau of Consumer Protection and by that Bureau's director. The investigation then fans out to seek information from industry, state and local government officials, and knowledgeable persons generally. The FTC's Bureau of Economics is consulted. Subpoenas, with commission approval, and investigatory hearings are available in this stage, but voluntary information is preferred.

These efforts result in an initial staff report which includes findings and recommendations concerning the form of any proposed rule. This must be accompanied by a cost projection, an environmental impact assessment where needed, and a proposed initial notice of rulemaking—all approved by the Bureau of Economics—before forwarding to the commission.<sup>43</sup>

An Initial Notice of proposed rulemaking includes (1) the terms or substance of the proposal or a description of the subjects and issues involved, (2) the legal authority under which the rule is proposed, (3) particular reasons for the rule, and (4) an invitation to all interested persons to propose issues within the framework of the proposal. A rulemaking proceeding begins with this invitation for comments and potential issues of disputed facts. These must be submitted within sixty days of the Initial Notice, and written comments are accepted until forty-five days before an informal hearing takes place.

A hearing officer then designates the disputed issues in a final notice, together with the hearing schedule, and deadlines for filing written comments and indications of interest to engage in examination, cross-examination, and rebuttal of witnesses. Ten days after publication of the final notice, interested persons may petition the commission for addition to, deletion, or modification of a designated issue. An additional ten days are set aside for more submissions.

Hearings are held. A final staff report and a report by the presiding officer, who may be an administrative law judge, and who has broad powers to make findings and conclusions, are forwarded to the commission. Both are open to public comment for a period of sixty days. After digesting these public comments, the commission may hold an open meeting at which interested parties are given a final limited opportunity to make oral presentations to the commission. Beyond this, the staff may add specialized memoranda, and counter proposals could come from the Bureau of Consumer Protection. The commission then deliberates and decides whether or not a rule shall issue. Both House and Senate Commerce Committees now review FTC rules before they are promulgated, providing Congress with what in effect is a legislative veto.

It should be noted that the United States Supreme Court in Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Chadha, 103 S.Ct. 2764 (1983) declared a resolution by one House of Congress invalidating an executive branch decision to be an unconstitutional legislative act. The Constitution requires legislation to be passed by both Houses of Congress and presented to the president. The single House legislative veto did apply to the FTC Improvement Act of 1980 (15 U.S.C. 57a-1), but FTC rules generally could only be disapproved by concurrent resolution.

Rule Violations. Federal Trade Commission actions against rule violations begin either with complaints from members of the public or, more frequently, out of a commission investigation. The agency has broad investigatory powers and authority to enforce its own subpoenas. At an early point, the FTC may waive its right to bring a court action against a violator in return for consumer redress provisions in a consent agreement, provisions that could go beyond the statutory authority of the courts. The commission has noted that voluntary compliance through a consent agreement does not constitute an admission by respondents that they have violated the law. When issued by the commission on a final basis, a consent order carries the force of law with respect to future actions. It has the same effect as an FTC adjudication. Violation of such an order could result in a civil penalty of up to $10,000 per violation per day. Each broadcast of an advertisement may constitute a separate violation.

Adverse publicity and high litigation costs assure that more than 75 percent of cases will end this way. Since 1977, however, the FTC has had the power to ask an advertiser or his agency, during the sixty-day comment period, for documentary material related to the published consent order if releasable under the Freedom of Information Act. This may make consent agreements less attractive to advertisers in the future.

43. Problems with this procedure are discussed in the ABA Report on the FTC. See fn. 37.

Consent Agreements. Consent agreements, incorporating refunds or other forms of equitable relief, are a major enforcement result of the Magnuson-Moss Act. Under the act, consumer protection rules can be vigorously enforced. Formerly, if the commission had reason to believe that the FTC Act or another federal consumer statute had been violated, a complaint would initiate a cease-and-desist order. The order might require of an advertiser an affirmative disclosure of what had been omitted from a prior claim.<sup>44</sup>

A respondent then had the right to appear before an administrative law judge and show cause why such an order should not be made. If unsuccessful, that party would have sixty days to challenge a commission order in a federal court of appeals. A cease-and-desist order would not become effective until all avenues of opinion had been exhausted. This could take a long time. It took the commission sixteen years to get the "Liver" out of Carter's Little Pills,<sup>45</sup> and in 1959, the year that case was concluded, the FTC began an investigation of Geritol. A complaint was issued in 1962, a cease-and-desist order in 1964; the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the commission in 1967,<sup>46</sup> but two years later, finding the company in noncompliance, the commission turned the case over to the Department of Justice. Justice filed a $1 million suit against the company and in 1973 fined it and its advertising agency $812,000. In the intervening fourteen years Geritol had spent an estimated $60 million on television advertising.

Under Magnuson-Moss, consumer protection rules can be more vigorously enforced. In lieu of cease-and-desist orders, rules are now directly enforceable in a United States district court with civil penalties of up to $10,000 per day per violation, and consumer redress. Industry-wide Trade Regulation Rules may be enforced in the same manner. Dishonest or fraudulent trade practices—more serious than those unfair or deceptive but less serious than those constituting criminal fraud—seem to require administrative proceedings leading to a final cease-and-desist order prior to court action. As well as consumers, persons, partnerships, and corporations may seek redress; individuals as well as companies may be required to give it. For this reason, the line between anticompetitive and consumer protection issues is not always distinct. Culpability depends on a showing that "a reasonable and prudent man under the circumstances would have known of the existence of the rule and that the act or practice was in violation of its provisions."

Violations of cease-and-desist orders or other final orders of the commission empower district courts to grant temporary restraining orders or preliminary injunctions. An administrative complaint must follow within twenty days. In some cases the commission may seek and, after proof, a court may issue a permanent injunction. Injunctions are more common in antitrust cases than in consumer protection cases.

Congress amended Section 13 of the FTC Act in 1973<sup>47</sup> to permit courts to grant 44. Keele Hair & Scalp Specialists, Inc. v. FTC, 275 F.2d 18 (5th Cir. 1960).

45. Carter Products, Inc. v. FTC, 268 F.2d 461 (9th Cir. 1959), cert. den. 361 U.S. 884.

46. J.B. Williams Co., Inc. v. FTC, 381 F.2d 884 (6th Cir. 1967).

47. The amendment to Section 13 was adopted as Section 408(f) of the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Authorization Act of 1973, 15 U.S.C.A. § 53(b).

temporary injunctions only "upon proper showing" by the commission that an action against an advertiser would be in the public interest and that the commission would likely succeed in such an undertaking. That standard for invoking the injunctive power was challenged in a federal district court in 1974. FTC v. National Commission on Egg Nutrition<sup>48</sup> held that advertising stating that "there is no evidence that eating eggs, even in quantity, increases the risk of heart attacks or heart disease" could continue during a cease-and-desist proceeding and that an injunction would restrict useful public debate on the cholesterol issue and damage the financial interests of respondents.

On the basis of an earlier ruling, FTC v. Rhodes Pharmacal Co., 191 F.2d 744 (7th Cir. 1951), a case approving the lesser standard of "reason to believe" that an ad is false or misleading, the court of appeals in Egg Nutrition reversed the district court and permitted the injunction to stand. (517 F.2d 485 (7th Cir. 1975)).

Two years later the same court decided that the advertisement's no-harm statement concerning cholesterol was a misrepresentation affecting the contract of sale, a breach of express warranty, and therefore regulatable commercial speech. The same statement made at a Food and Drug Administration hearing would not be commercial speech at all since contractual promises would be involved.

The Ninth Circuit, however, also citing an earlier case—FTC v. National Health Aids, Inc., 108 F.Supp. 340 (D.Md.1952)—but one requiring the higher standard of "falsity" in the exercise of the extraordinary remedy of injunction, affirmed the denial of an injunction in FTC v. Simeon Management Corp., 391 F.Supp. 697 (D.Cal. 1975), affirmed 532 F.2d 708 (9th Cir. 1976).

Clearly, appeals courts are divided on what Congress intended in amending Section 13. Is it the lesser standard of "reason to believe" or a higher standard requiring the court to make an independent judgment that the public interest demands an injunction against false advertising? While the former test may be more sensitive to the public interest, the latter may be more responsive to the First Amendment. The issue will remain open.

Both tests have their advocates.<sup>49</sup>

Injunctions and other FTC actions are more likely to be triggered when foods, drugs, medical devices, and cosmetics are involved and where a violation is clear and immediately harmful. The Food and Drug Administration has authority over the labeling of these kinds of products under the Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act of 1938 (21 U.S.C.A. 301-392).

In all, some twenty federal agencies regulate advertising in specifically defined areas. These include the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Alcohol and Tobacco Tax Division of the Internal Revenue Service, the Civil Aeronautics Board, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Federal Power Commission.

State Regulation. All states except Alabama and the District of Columbia, Guam, Puerto Rico, and the U.S. Virgin Islands have "Little FTC" acts, paralleling to some degree the federal statute's Section 5 proscription against unfair or deceptive trade practices. Some are as broad as Section 5 itself. Others reach unfair or deceptive acts or practices but not unfair methods of 48. 1975-1 Trade Cas. ¶ 60,246 (N.D.Ill.1974). See National Commission on Egg Nutrition v. FTC, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 2196, 570 F.2d 157 (7th Cir. 1977), cert. den., 439 U.S. 821 (1978).

49. See, for example, The FTC's Injunctive Authority Against False Advertising of Food and Drugs, 75 Michigan L.Rev. 745 (March 1977), and Yes, FTC, There is a Virginia: The Impact of Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council on the FTC's Regulation of Misleading Advertising, 57 Boston U.L.Rev. 833 (1977).

competition. Still others reach only a specific list of prohibited practices.

Remedies vary also. A number of states grant rulemaking power to a state official, often the attorney general, who may bring suit to stop violations of the state law. By this route, consumers may gain restitution in forty-nine jurisdictions, the state additional civil penalties in thirty-four.

The laws of fifty-three of these jurisdictions authorize the use of subpoenas in civil investigations and the use of cease-and-desist orders or court injunctions to halt anticompetitive, unfair, unconscionable, or deceptive practices. Class actions are permitted in seventeen jurisdictions, private actions by consumers in forty-four.

Private actions are generally not allowed under FTCA's Section 5. They nevertheless should be attempted as a complement to FTC actions and will undoubtedly be more frequent in federal litigation as FTC powers are curtailed. Most state laws have been influenced by federal law, and the demise of the "unfairness doctrine" in federal law will probably be reflected in state laws. In the meantime, the paucity of state court interpretations of these relatively recent state statutes insure that guidance will be sought from administrative and judicial decisions under the federal act. Twenty-one state laws specifically encourage this. For example, the intent to deceive is not a necessary element of proof under some state laws. Nor does a plaintiff actually have to have been deceived. It is enough that a defendant's conduct would have a capacity or a tendency to deceive. Together with the possibility of double or treble actual damages, punitive damages, and some attorney's fees and costs, there is an incentive to litigate under state laws. Expectations are that state courts will eventually adopt the standards of the FTC Trade Practice Rules, the Trade Regulation Rules, and the concepts of other federal protection statutes enforced by the FTC. At least thirty-five states use federal standards in enforcing state food and drug laws.<sup>50</sup>

Media are not liable for unlawful advertisements or injuries resulting from defective products,<sup>51</sup> and they have no duty to investigate each advertiser, even when placed on notice as to potential danger.<sup>52</sup> There can be a problem if a publication plays an active role in a false and deceptive ad or specifically endorses a product.<sup>53</sup> Indemnification clauses are now common in rate cards and advertising contracts, especially with regard to errors or omissions in ads, but they probably wouldn't protect a publication in the negligent preparation of an ad.

Corrective Advertising. Corrective advertising, a powerful regulatory device, first came to the attention of the FTC in May 1970 when a group called SOUP (Students Opposing Unfair Practices) intervened in an action against the Campbell Soup Company in a situation reminiscent of the Colgate-Palmolive sandpaper case. Campbell had used marbles in its video advertising to make its soup appear thicker than it was. No order requiring corrective advertising was issued for lack of a significant public interest, but the commission made its point. Campbell Soup, 3

---

50. Federal Trade Commission Fact Sheet, State Legislation to Combat Unfair Trade Practices (September 1979, Rev.), and Paul R. Peterson, "The Use of FTC Programs as a Basis for Suit Under State FTC Acts," (April 1, 1980), both reprinted, with a complete list of "Little FTC" state laws in Christopher Smith and Christian S. White, cochairmen, FTC Consumer Protection Law Institute, Vol. II, New York: Practising Law Institute, 1980.

51. Goldstein v. Garlick, 318 N.Y.S.2d 370 (1971); Suarez v. Underwood, 426 N.Y.S.2d 208 (1980).

52. Hernandez v. Underwood, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1535 (N.Y.Sup.Ct.1981); Pressler v. Dow Jones & Co., Inc., 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1680, 450 N.Y.S.2d 884 (1982).

53. Hanberry v. Hearst Corp., 81 Cal.Rptr. 519 (1969).

Trade Reg.Rptr. ¶ 19,261 (FTC May 25, 1970).

The FTC first sought corrective advertising in late 1970 in actions charging Coca-Cola with misrepresenting the nutritional value of Hi-C and Standard Oil of California with falsely claiming that its gasoline reduced air pollution.<sup>54</sup> Both complaints were later dropped.

In August 1971 the FTC issued its first final corrective advertising order against Profile Bread which was promoted as having fewer calories per slice. It did, but only because it was sliced thinner. The order required that ITT Continental Baking Co. and its advertising agency Ted Bates cease and desist for a period of one year from disseminating any advertisements for the product "unless not less than 25 percent of the expenditure (excluding production costs) for each medium in each market be devoted to advertising in a manner approved by authorized representatives of the Federal Trade Commission that Profile is not effective for weight reduction, contrary to possible interpretations of prior advertising." ITT Continental Baking Co., 1973 CCH Transfer Binder, ¶ 19,681 (1971).

The company agreed to devote 25 percent of its advertising expenditure for one year to FTC-approved corrective ads. Its only alternative was not to advertise the product at all.

The difference between a traditional order for affirmative disclosure and one for corrective advertising is that the corrective ad order refers to past rather than current advertising and is designed to dispel misconceptions the consumer may have gained from earlier ads. Although the commission may not impose criminal penalties or award compensatory damages for past acts, it does have a mandate to prevent illegal practices in the future.<sup>55</sup> A corrective order may remind consumers that a particular advertiser is a hard-core offender. Estimates of residual effects on consumers of past advertising require expert testimony.<sup>56</sup>

Profile corrective ads, read by actress Julia Mead, were so well received by the public that the company contemplated spending more than the required 25 percent of its ad budget on their presentation. But the ads, ignoring the fact that the FTC had found deception in earlier ads, gave the company a credibility it didn't deserve. Later corrective orders specified the wording more precisely.

Less than two weeks after the enforcement of its first corrective order against Profile, the FTC ordered seven of the largest foreign and domestic automobile manufacturers to submit to the Commission documentation to support advertising claims concerning the safety, performance, quality, and comparative prices of their advertised products. The order followed a June 1971 resolution requiring all advertisers to submit on demand documentation to support unique advertising claims.<sup>57</sup>

In a case involving a false claim that a brand of Firestone tires was capable of stopping a car 25 percent faster, the FTC staff asserted its authority to require corrective advertising, but the commission refused to issue the order because: 1) there had been a considerable time lapse since the ad had appeared; 2) the tires advertised with the unsubstantiated claim 54. Coca-Cola Co., 3 Trade Reg.Rptr. ¶ 19,351 (FTC 1970); Standard Oil Co. of California, 3 Trade Reg.Rptr. ¶ 19,352 (FTC 1970).

55. FTC v. Ruberoid Co., 343 U.S. 470 (1952).

56. See Notes, Corrective Advertising—the New Response to Consumer Deception, 72 Columbia L.Rev. 415 (February 1972); Corrective Advertising and the FTC, 70 Michigan L.Rev. 374 (December 1971).

57. Resolution Requiring Submission of Special Reports Relating to Advertising Claims and Disclosure Thereof by the Commission in Connection with a Public Investigation Adopted by the FTC on June 9, 1971, as amended July 7, 1971, 2 CCH Trade Reg.Rptr. 7573 (FTC 1971).

would by now be so old that no owner would believe them safe; 3) the residual effect of the advertising would have been slight by the end of the year; and 4) competitors making the same claim had avoided cease-and-desist orders. Firestone Tire and Rubber Co., 3 Trade Reg.Rptr. ¶ 19,773 (FTC 1971).

In a corrective advertising action against the Sun Oil Co., which had claimed that "cars will operate at maximum power and performance only with Sunoco gasolines," the company had to counter empirical evidence of the effects of its advertising on a sample of the mass audience.

After a flurry of cases a hiatus occurred in corrective advertising partly because the somewhat ponderous process could not keep up with the fluid and ingenious advertising industry: ads would be challenged long after they had served the purposes of advertisers. Then in 1975 an administrative law judge, in the first litigated corrective advertising case, was upheld by the full commission in forbidding Warner-Lambert, the makers of Listerine, to advertise unless each ad included the following language: "Contrary to prior advertising, Listerine will not help prevent colds or sore throats or lessen their severity." Warner-Lambert Co., 86 F.T.C. 1938 (1975). The corrective advertising was to continue until the company had spent $10 million on Listerine advertising, an amount roughly equal to the annual Listerine budget for 1962 to 1974. The D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the commission decision in the opinion which follows with the words "contrary to prior advertising" deleted.

---

WARNER-LAMBERT CO. v.
FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION

562 F.2D 749 (D.C.CIR. 1977), CERT. DEN.
435 U.S. 950 (1978).

J. Skelly WRIGHT, Circuit Judge:

* * *

The first issue on appeal is whether the Commission's conclusion that Listerine is not beneficial for colds or sore throats is supported by the evidence. The Commission's findings must be sustained if they are supported by substantial evidence on the record viewed as a whole. We conclude that they are.

Both the ALJ [Administrative Law Judge] and the Commission carefully analyzed the evidence. They gave full consideration to the studies submitted by petitioner. The ultimate conclusion that Listerine is not an effective cold remedy was based on six specific findings of fact.

* * *

Petitioner contends that even if its advertising claims in the past were false, the portion of the Commission's order requiring "corrective advertising" exceeds the Commission's statutory power. The argument is based upon a literal reading of Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, which authorizes the Commission to issue "cease and desist" orders against violators and does not expressly mention any other remedies. The Commission's position, on the other hand, is that the affirmative disclosure that Listerine will not prevent colds or lessen their severity is absolutely necessary to give effect to the prospective cease and desist order; a hundred years of false cold claims have built up a large reservoir of erroneous consumer belief which would persist, unless corrected, long after petitioner ceased making the claims.

The need for the corrective advertising remedy and its appropriateness in this case are important issues which we will explore. But the threshold question is whether the Commission has the authority to issue such an order. We hold that it does.

Petitioner's narrow reading of Section 5 was at one time shared by the Supreme Court. In FTC v. Eastman Kodak Co., 274

U.S. 619, 623 (1927), the Court held that the Commission's authority did not exceed that expressly conferred by statute. The Commission has not, the Court said, "been delegated the authority of a court of equity."

But the modern view is very different. In 1963 the Court ruled that the Civil Aeronautics Board has authority to order divestiture in addition to ordering cessation of unfair methods of competition by air carriers. Pan American World Airways, Inc. v. United States, 371 U.S. 296 (1963). The CAB statute, like Section 5, spoke only of the authority to issue cease and desist orders, but the Court said, "We do not read the Act so restrictively. * * * [W]here the problem lies within the purview of the Board, * * * Congress must have intended to give it authority that was ample to deal with the evil at hand." The Court continued, "Authority to mold administrative decrees is indeed like the authority of courts to frame injunctive decrees. * * * [The] power to order divestiture need not be explicitly included in the powers of an administrative agency to be part of its arsenal of authority. * * *"

Later, in FTC v. Dean Foods Co., 384 U.S. 597 (1966), the Court applied Pan American to the Federal Trade Commission. In upholding the Commission's power to seek a preliminary injunction against a proposed merger, the Court held that it was not necessary to find express statutory authority for the power. Rather, the Court concluded, "It would stultify congressional purpose to say that the Commission did not have the * * * power * * *. * * * Such ancillary powers have always been treated as essential to the effective discharge of the Commission's responsibilities."

Thus it is clear that the Commission has the power to shape remedies which go beyond the simple cease and desist order. Our next inquiry must be whether a corrective advertising order is for any reason outside the range of permissible remedies. Petitioner and amici curiae argue that it is because (1) legislative history precludes it, (2) it impinges on the First Amendment, and (3) it has never been approved by any court.

A. LEGISLATIVE HISTORY

Petitioner relies on the legislative history of the 1914 Federal Trade Commission Act and the Wheeler-Lea amendments to it in 1938 for the proposition that corrective advertising was not contemplated. In 1914 and in 1938 Congress chose not to authorize such remedies as criminal penalties, treble damages, or civil penalties, but that fact does not dispose of the question of corrective advertising.<sup>33</sup>

Petitioner's reliance on the legislative history of the 1975 amendments to the Act<sup>34</sup> is also misplaced. The amendments added a new Section 19 to the Act authorizing the Commission to bring suits in federal District Courts to redress injury to consumers resulting from a deceptive practice. The section authorizes the court to grant such relief as it "finds necessary to redress injury to consumers or other

33. It is true that one Court of Appeals has relied on this history in concluding that the Commission does not have power to order restitution of ill-gotten monies to the injured consumers. Heater v. FTC, 503 F.2d 321 (9th Cir. 1974). But restitution is not corrective advertising. Ordering refunds to past consumers is very different from ordering affirmative disclosure to correct misconceptions which future consumers may hold. Moreover, the Heater court itself recognized this distinction and expressly distinguished corrective advertising, which it said the Commission is authorized to order, from restitution. 503 F.2d at 323 n. 7 and 325 n. 13.

34. The Magnuson-Moss Warranty—Federal Trade Commission Improvement Act, 88 Stat. 2183 (1975).

Note: Under this Act it is the responsibility of one advertiser to know about a cease-and-desist order against another, if it is litigated [FTCA sec. 205]; the requirement does not apply to consent orders. Failure of the FTC to proceed against an advertiser's competitors is not valid ground to have an order against an advertiser set aside. Johnson Products v. FTC, 549 F.2d 35 (7th Cir. 1977).

persons, partnerships, and corporations resulting from the rule violation or the unfair or deceptive act or practice," including, but not limited to, rescission or reformation of contracts, the refund of money or return of property, the payment of damages, and public notification respecting the rule violation or the unfair or deceptive act or practice. * * * 15 U.S.C.A. § 576(b).

Petitioner and amici contend that this congressional grant to a court of power to order public notification of a violation establishes that the Commission by itself does not have that power.

We note first that "public notification" is not synonymous with corrective advertising; public notification is a much broader term and may take any one of many forms.<sup>36</sup> Second, the "public notification" contemplated by the amendment is directed at past consumers of the product ("to redress injury"), whereas the type of corrective advertising currently before us is directed at future consumers. Third, petitioner's construction of the section runs directly contrary to the congressional intent as expressed in a later subsection: "Nothing in this section shall be construed to affect any authority of the Commission under any other provision of law." Moreover, this intent is amplified by the conference committee's report:

The section * * * is not intended to modify or limit any existing power the Commission may have to itself issue orders designed to remedying [sic] violations of the law. That issue is now before the courts. It is not the intent of the Conferees to influence the outcome in any way.

We conclude that this legislative history cannot be said to remove corrective advertising from the class of permissible remedies.

B. THE FIRST AMENDMENT

Petitioner and amici further contend that corrective advertising is not a permissible remedy because it trenches on the First Amendment. Petitioner is correct that this triggers a special responsibility on the Commission to order corrective advertising only if the restriction inherent in its order is no greater than necessary to serve the interest involved. [Emphasis added.] But this goes to the appropriateness of the order in this case, an issue we reach [later in] this opinion. Amici curiae go further, arguing that, since the Supreme Court has recently extended First Amendment protection to commercial advertising, mandatory corrective advertising is unconstitutional.

A careful reading of Virginia State Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council compels rejection of this argument. For the Supreme Court expressly noted that the First Amendment presents "no obstacle" to government regulation of false or misleading advertising. The First Amendment, the Court said, as we construe it today, does not prohibit the State from insuring that the stream of commercial information flow[s] cleanly as well as freely.

In a footnote the Court went on to delineate several differences between commercial speech and other forms which may suggest "that a different degree of protection is necessary. * * *" For example, the Court said, they may make it appropriate to require that a commercial message appear in such a form, or include such additional information, warnings, and disclaimers, as are necessary to prevent its being deceptive.

36. For example, it might encompass requiring the defendant to run special advertisements reporting the FTC finding, advertisements advising consumers of the availability of a refund, or the posting of notices in the defendant's place of business.

The Supreme Court clearly foresaw the very question before us, and its statement is dispositive of amici's contention.

C. PRECEDENTS

According to petitioner, "The first reference to corrective advertising in Commission decisions occurred in 1970, nearly fifty years and untold numbers of false advertising cases after passage of the Act." In petitioner's view, the late emergence of this "newly discovered" remedy is itself evidence that it is beyond the Commission's authority. This argument fails on two counts. First the fact that an agency has not asserted a power over a period of years is not proof that the agency lacks such power. Second, and more importantly, we are not convinced that the corrective advertising remedy is really such an innovation. The label may be newly coined, but the concept is well established. It is simply that under certain circumstances an advertiser may be required to make affirmative disclosure of unfavorable facts.

One such circumstance is when an advertisement that did not contain the disclosure would be misleading. For example, the Commission has ordered the sellers of treatments for baldness to disclose that the vast majority of cases of thinning hair and baldness are attributable to heredity, age, and endocrine balance (so-called "male pattern baldness") and that their treatment would have no effect whatever on this type of baldness. It has ordered the promoters of a device for stopping bedwetting to disclose that the device would not be of value in cases caused by organic defects or diseases. And it has ordered the makers of Geritol, an iron supplement, to disclose that Geritol will relieve symptoms of tiredness only in persons who suffer from iron deficiency anemia, and that the vast majority of people who experience such symptoms do not have such a deficiency.

Each of these orders was approved on appeal over objections that it exceeded the Commission's statutory authority. The decisions reflect a recognition that, as the Supreme Court has stated,

If the Commission is to attain the objectives Congress envisioned, it cannot be required to confine its road block to the narrow lane the transgressor has traveled; it must be allowed effectively to close all roads to the prohibited goal, so that its order may not be bypassed with impunity. FTC v. Ruberoid Co., 343 U.S. 470, 473 (1952).

Affirmative disclosure has also been required when an advertisement, although not misleading if taken alone, becomes misleading considered in light of past advertisements. For example, for 60 years Royal Baking Powder Co. had stressed in its advertising that its product was superior because it was made with cream of tartar, not phosphate. But, faced with rising costs of cream of tartar, the time came when it changed its ingredients and became a phosphate baking powder. It carefully removed from all labels<sup>1</sup> and advertisements any reference to cream of tartar and corrected the list of ingredients. But the new labels used the familiar arrangement of lettering, coloration, and design, so that they looked exactly like the old ones. A new advertising campaign stressed the new low cost of the product and dropped all reference to cream of tartar. But the advertisements were also silent on the subject of phosphate and did not disclose the change in the product.

The Commission held, and the Second Circuit agreed, that the new advertisements were deceptive, since they did not advise consumers that their reasons for buying the powder in the past no longer applied. The court held that it was proper to require the company to take affirmative steps to advise the public. To continue to sell the new powder on the strength of the reputation attained through 60 years of its manufacture and sale and wide advertising of its superior powder, under an impression induced by its advertisements that the product purchased was the same in kind and as superior as that which had been so long manufactured by it, was unfair alike to the public and to the competitors in the baking powder business. Royal Baking Powder Co. v. FTC, 281 F. 744, 753 (2d Cir. 1922).

In another case the Waltham Watch Company of Massachusetts had become renowned for the manufacture of fine clocks since 1849. Soon after it stopped manufacturing clocks in the 1950's, it transferred its trademarks, good will, and the trade name "Waltham" to a successor corporation, which began importing clocks from Europe for resale in the United States. The imported clocks were advertised as "product of Waltham Watch Company since 1850," "a famous 150-year-old company."

The Commission found that the advertisements caused consumers to believe they were buying the same fine Massachusetts clocks of which they had heard for many years. To correct this impression the Commission ordered the company to disclose in all advertisements and on the product that the clock was not made by the old Waltham company and that it was imported. The Seventh Circuit affirmed, relying on "the well-established general principle that the Commission may require affirmative disclosure for the purpose of preventing future deception." Waltham Watch Co. v. FTC, 318 F.2d 28 (7th Cir. 1963), cert. den. 375 U.S. 944.

It appears to us that the orders in Royal and Waltham were the same kind of remedy the Commission has ordered here. Like Royal and Waltham, Listerine has built up over a period of many years a widespread reputation. When it was ascertained that that reputation no longer applied to the product, it was necessary to take action to correct it. Here, as in Roy- al and Waltham, it is the accumulated impact of past advertising that necessitates disclosure in future advertising. To allow consumers to continue to buy the product on the strength of the impression built up by prior advertising—an impression which is now known to be false—would be unfair and deceptive.

Having established that the Commission does have the power to order corrective advertising in appropriate cases, it remains to consider whether use of the remedy against Listerine is warranted and equitable. We have concluded that part 3 of the order should be modified to delete the phrase "Contrary to prior advertising." With that modification, we approve the order.

Our role in reviewing the remedy is limited. The Supreme Court has set forth the standard:

The Commission is the expert body to determine what remedy is necessary to eliminate the unfair or deceptive trade practices which have been disclosed. It has wide latitude for judgment and the courts will not interfere except where the remedy selected has no reasonable relation to the unlawful practices found to exist. Jacob Siegel Co. v. FTC, 327 U.S. 608, 612-613 (1946).

The Commission has adopted the following standard for the imposition of corrective advertising:

[I]f a deceptive advertisement has played a substantial role in creating or reinforcing in the public's mind a false and material belief which lives on after the false advertising ceases, there is clear and continuing injury to competition and to the consuming public as consumers continue to make purchasing decisions based on the false belief. Since this injury cannot be averted by merely requiring respondent to cease disseminating the advertisement, we may appropriately order respondent to take affirmative action designed to terminate the otherwise continuing ill effects of the advertisement.

We think this standard is entirely reasonable. It dictates two factual inquiries: (1) did Listerine's advertisements play a substantial role in creating or reinforcing in the public's mind a false belief about the product? and (2) would this belief linger on after the false advertising ceases? It strikes us that if the answer to both questions is not yes, companies everywhere may be wasting their massive advertising budgets. Indeed, it is more than a little peculiar to hear petitioner assert that its commercials really have no effect on consumer belief.

For these reasons it might be appropriate in some cases to presume the existence of the two factual predicates for corrective advertising. But we need not decide that question, or rely on presumptions here, because the Commission adduced survey evidence to support both propositions. We find that the "Product Q" survey data and the expert testimony interpreting them constitute substantial evidence in support of the need for corrective advertising in this case.

We turn next to the specific disclosure required: "Contrary to prior advertising, Listerine will not help prevent colds or sore throats or lessen their severity." Petitioner is ordered to include this statement in every future advertisement for Listerine for a defined period. In printed advertisements it must be displayed in type size at least as large as that in which the principal portion of the text of the advertisement appears and it must be separated from the text so that it can be readily noticed. In television commercials the disclosure must be presented simultaneously in both audio and visual portions. During the audio portion of the disclosure in television and radio advertisements, no other sounds, including music, may occur.

These specifications are well calculated to assure that the disclosure will reach the public. It will necessarily attract the notice of readers, viewers, and listeners, and be plainly conveyed. Given these safeguards, we believe the preamble "Contrary to prior advertising" is not necessary. It can serve only two purposes: either to attract attention that a correction follows or to humiliate the advertiser. The Commission claims only the first purpose for it, and this we think is obviated by the other terms of the order.<sup>68</sup> The second purpose, if it were intended, might be called for in an egregious case of deliberate deception, but this is not one. While we do not decide whether petitioner proffered its cold claims in good faith or bad, the record compiled could support a finding of good faith. On these facts, the confessional preamble to the disclosure is not warranted.

Finally, petitioner challenges the duration of the disclosure requirement. By its terms it continues until respondent has expended on Listerine advertising a sum equal to the average annual Listerine advertising budget for the period April 1962 to March 1972. That is approximately ten million dollars. Thus if petitioner continues to advertise normally the corrective advertising will be required for about one year. We cannot say that is an unreasonably long time in which to correct a hundred years of cold claims. But, to petitioner's distress, the requirement will not expire by mere passage of time. If petitioner cuts back its Listerine advertising, or ceases it altogether, it can only postpone the duty to disclose. The Commission concluded that correction was required and that a duration of a fixed period of time might not accomplish that task, since petitioner could evade the order by choosing

---

68. Cf. United States v. National Society of Professional Engineers, 555 F.2d 978 at 984 (D.C.Cir.1977) (order should not be more intrusive than necessary to achieve fulfillment of the governmental interest) [Editorial note: the decision was affirmed in part and remanded in part, 98 S.Ct. 1355 (1978)]; Beneficial Corp. v. FTC, 542 F.2d 611 at 618-620 (3d Cir. 1976), cert. den. 430 U.S. 983 (1977) (same).

not to advertise at all. The formula settled upon by the Commission is reasonably related to the violation it found.

Accordingly, the order, as modified, is Affirmed.

---

COMMENT

Judge Robb dissented because he believed the FTC had been conferred power only to prevent future deceptions or to impose a prospective remedy. Corrective advertising constituted a retrospective remedy, a remedy for past claims.

1. In a supplemental opinion denying a rehearing, the court of appeals elaborated on the First Amendment issue, focusing on its interpretation of Virginia Pharmacy. Since the Supreme Court had held that "untruthful speech, commercial or otherwise, has never been protected for its own sake," the commission was within its authority in viewing the case against a background of more than 100 years in which Listerine has been proclaimed—and purchased—as a remedy for colds.

"When viewed from this perspective," said the court of appeals, "advertising which fails to rebut the prior claims as to Listerine's efficacy inevitably builds upon those claims; continued advertising continues the deception, albeit implicitly rather than explicitly. It will induce people to continue to buy Listerine thinking it will cure colds. Thus the commission found on substantial evidence that the corrective order was necessary to 'dissipate the effects of respondent's deceptive representations.'"

As to a chilling effect on protected truthful speech, the court of appeals noted that the Court in Virginia Pharmacy had considered the truth of commercial speech "more easily verifiable by its disseminator" than other forms of speech, and

"since advertising is the sine qua non of commercial profits, there is little likelihood of its being chilled by proper regulation and forgone entirely." For discussion of Warner-Lambert in an access to the media context, see text, p. 594.

2. It has been urged that corrective orders not be confined to obvious cases such as Warner-Lambert where the proof presented to the commission of the success of a deceptive campaign is so striking. Noting the long history of a deceptive claim uniquely asserted for Listerine, the absence of consumer confusion as to which mouthwash was said to be effective against colds, and the persuasive evidence that this claim was believed by consumers after the false advertising had ceased, one commentator observed that "comparable proof of deception-perception-memory influence would be virtually impossible in most advertising cases. * * * If the commission is to do an effective job in regulating deceptive advertising, corrective advertising must apply to more than the one-in-a-million type of ad campaign present in Warner-Lambert."<sup>58</sup>

And in a memorandum in support of a petition for rulemaking, the Institute for Public Interest Representation, Georgetown University Law Center, went beyond the court of appeals in Warner-Lambert and argued that to require the level of proof justifying corrective advertising in the Listerine case would so tip "the burden of proof in favor of the wrongdoer at the expense of the consuming public as to frustrate the ability of the commission ever to issue such an order."<sup>59</sup> The petitioners foresaw a "war of experts and surveys" in every deceptive advertising litigation.

Given the length of time it takes to reach the day of final judgment in decep-

---

58. Pitofsky, Beyond Nader: Consumer Protection and the Regulation of Advertising, 90 Harv.L.Rev. 661, 698 (February 1977).

59. Kramer et al., Memorandum in Support of Petition for Rulemaking (March 7, 1977), p. 3.

tive advertising cases, the procedural impossibility of any kind of consumer restitution, and the mammoth task the FTC has in monitoring an industry as large and as powerful as advertising, these evidentiary shortcuts may seem reasonable. On the other hand, where speech is being hindered by an agency of government, the burden of proof is on the agency, and the standard of proof should be high. And careful judicial review must follow. Most theories of the First Amendment permit nothing less. There appears, therefore, to be an opportunity here for the FTC to make better and more frequent use of empirical evidence, a form of evidence which the courts are more and more coming to appreciate.

What evidence establishes whether false claims about product characteristics create persistent misimpressions or other continuing effects and of what strength and duration? And what forms of corrective advertising would correct misimpressions? Answers to these kinds of factual questions should precede legal and policy considerations. Too often they do not.

On April 4, 1978, the United States Supreme Court denied certiorari to Warner-Lambert Co. v. FTC.

3. In May 1978 the FTC for the first time was able to get a product endorser to be personally accountable for advertising claims. Using its injunctive, complaint, and consent powers to challenge the alleged unfair or deceptive marketing practices of an acne "treatment," the commission got celebrity Pat Boone to agree to pay part of any restitution to consumers that would be ordered in the case and to make a reasonable inquiry before endorsing products in the future.

"Unless the endorser is an expert on the subject," said Albert Kramer, then director of the FTC Bureau of Consumer Protection, "the endorser must look to independent reliable sources to validate claims, tests or studies supplied by the advertiser. * * * The endorser may profit from a false advertisement just as much as the manufacturer and thus it is not unreasonable to obligate him to ascertain the truthfulness of the claims he is being paid to make."<sup>60</sup>

Counter Advertising. In early 1972 the Federal Trade Commission in a unanimous brief filed with the Federal Communication Commission urged broadcast support for the concept of counter advertising or "counter commercials" as "a suitable approach to some of the present failings of advertising which are beyond the FTC's capacity." FTC Dkt. ¶ 19,260, Jan. 6, 1972.

Commercial time would be available to those who could pay, free to those who could not, to reply to ads 1) asserting performance and other explicit claims raising controversial issues of current public importance, for example, pollution or automobile safety; 2) stressing broad recurrent themes affecting purchasing decisions, for example, nutrition, drug, and detergent claims; 3) resting on controversial "scientific" statements; and 4) ads silent about possibly negative aspects of a product.

The proposal was undoubtedly influenced by the D.C. Circuit's ruling in the Banzhaf case which, for the first time, had applied the Fairness Doctrine to broadcast advertising, specifically cigarette advertising. Banzhaf v. FCC, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 2037, 405 F.2d 1082 (D.C.Cir.1968). See text, p. 855.

The FTC felt the counter ad would go well beyond the corrective ad or the affirmative disclosure because it would not be buried in the advertiser's own message but would come from vigorous advocates of converse points of view. It was suggested that the FCC would retain substantial discretion in deciding what commercials would raise Fairness Doctrine claims and what time frames would be suitable.

80. FTC News Summary, No. 20, May 19, 1978. See FTC Guidelines—Endorsements and Testimonials, 16 C.F.R. 255, and 45 Fed.Reg. 3870 (Jan. 18, 1980).

Miles Kirkpatrick, former director of an American Bar Association study of the FTC and later chairman of the Commission, said he was "deeply concerned by the notion that the majority of advertisers are able or willing to play the game only if the rules free them from disagreement. * * Why, in any event should an advertiser have the right to monopolize the consumer's attention by trumpeting the virtues of his product when a consumer who learned of an aspect undesirable to him might not buy it if the attention monopoly were ended. * * * The TV viewer is a member of the advertiser's captive audience. [And antitrust laws prohibit monopoly] of ideas or of goods."<sup>61</sup>

Advertisers, broadcasters, and the Nixon administration came down hard on the FTC proposal, partly on First Amendment grounds.<sup>62</sup> More important, perhaps, they predicted economic chaos, a bankrupt broadcast industry, and a public hopelessly confused by an "incredible babble of claim and counter claim."<sup>63</sup> Some even called the proposal un-American.<sup>64</sup>

Proponents, on the other hand, were surprised to learn that the broadcast industry was so fragile that counter advertising could destroy it, and they argued that public reply to advertising was more sensitive to First Amendment rights than government challenge, litigation, and penalty.<sup>65</sup> Advertising Age, a leading trade publication, agreed in its March 13, 1972 issue that counter advertising might curtail the FTC's intervention in advertising, and it saw no reason why ads were less appropriate subjects for discussion on television than other public matters.

The Consumer Federation of America urged the FCC to incorporate counter advertising in the Fairness Doctrine as a deterrent to exaggerated and untrue merchandising claims and as a stimulant to public dialogue on controversial issues. But the Television Bureau of Advertising came back with the argument that the scheme would shrink discussion of controversial public issues because no one would risk counterattack, an argument that has frequently been used to fault the Fairness Doctrine itself. The bureau sought to make Banzhaf a narrow precedent resting on legislative action which had made cigarette smoking an "official" health hazard and which eventually banned broadcast advertising of cigarettes altogether.

The D.C. Circuit, however, a year before the FTC proposal was issued, had already refused to extend the Banzhaf ruling to product advertising generally because, it said, to do so would undermine the present system which is based on product commercials, many of which have some adverse ecological effects. The case, Friends of the Earth v. FCC, 449 F.2d 1164 (D.C.Cir.1971), involved a complaint about the ecological effects of advertising big cars and high-test gasolines. On its facts, however, the case represented an expansion of Banzhaf. In remanding, the court declared that controversial issues of public importance might be involved in the commercial and held that the FCC would have to decide whether the licensee had afforded an opportunity for the presentation of contrasting views. See text, p. 855.

61. Broadcasting, March 6, 1972.

62. See Clay Whitehead in Advertising Age, Feb. 14, 1972, p. 19.

63. Elton Rule, president of ABC, in Advertising Age, May 1, 1972, p. 1.

64. Paul Warnke, former assistant secretary of defense and an attorney, in Advertising Age, March 6, 1972, p. 62.

65. Robert Pitofsky in Advertising Age, March 6, 1972, p. 3.

By 1974 the same court had decided that comparative efficiency of gasoline engines was not a controversial issue of public importance as long as commercials "made no attempt to glorify conduct or products which endangered public health or contributed to pollution." Neckritz v. FCC, 502 F.2d 411 (D.C.Cir.1974).

The demise of counter advertising seemed assured when in July 1974 the FCC rejected the FTC's proposal as "antithetical to this country's tradition of uninhibited dissemination of ideas."<sup>66</sup> At the same time the FCC issued a statement of policy concerning the Fairness Doctrine and advertising which essentially removed product advertising from the requirements of the Fairness Doctrine unless the advertising itself raised an important controversial issue.<sup>67</sup>

CBS v. Democratic Nat. Comm., see p. 858, by implication and Public Interest Research Group v. FCC, 522 F.2d 1060 (1st Cir. 1975), directly affirm this policy. Discretion in deciding how to meet Fairness Doctrine obligations remains with the broadcaster.<sup>68</sup>

Comparative Advertising. If there is anything that consumers deserve under either classical or contemporary theories of the First Amendment, it is fair and truthful comparative advertising.<sup>69</sup> Courts have held it to be "in harmony with the fundamental objectives of free speech and free enterprise in a free society."<sup>70</sup> The Federal Trade Commission has endorsed it.<sup>71</sup> Advertisers, assuming that comparative claims will inevitably become abusive, are not sure that in the long run comparative advertising won't reduce advertising's credibility.

The "aspirin war" is a case in point. Besides providing information of little use to the consumer, comparisons may slip into defamation, disparagement, or unfair competition, and thus into lawsuits.<sup>72</sup> If Tylenol, Anacin, and Bayer are what comparative advertising comes down to, consumers will have to look elsewhere for product information.

Self-Regulation. Spearhead of self-regulation in advertising is the National Advertising Review Board which acts on consumer and industry complaints about truth and accuracy in national advertising. Thirty national advertisers, ten delegates from advertising agencies, and ten representatives of the public comprise the Board's membership. It is sponsored by the American Advertising Federation, the American Association of Advertising Agencies, the Association of National Ad-

66. 671 ATRR A-16, July 9, 1974.

67. 39 Fed.Reg. 26372 (July 18, 1974). For an edited version of the FCC's 1974 Fairness Report and related discussion, see this text, p. 867.

68. For persuasive arguments in favor of the demise of counter advertising see, Simmons, Commercial Advertising and the Fairness Doctrine: The New F.C.C. Policy in Perspective, 75 Columbia L.Rev. 1083 (1975); and Simmons, The Fairness Doctrine and the Media, 1978.

69. Defined by Leonard Orkin, Practising Law Institute, Legal and Business Problems of the Advertising Industry 1978, p. 304 as "Advertisements which direct the prospective customer's attention to similarities or differences between the advertised product and one or more competitors either explicitly or implicitly."

See also, Sterk, The Law of Comparative Advertising: How Much Worse is "Better" Than "Great." 76 Columbia L.Rev. 80 (1976).

70. Triangle Publications v. Knight-Ridder, Newspapers, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 2086, 445 F.Supp. 875 (D.Fla.1978).

71. FTC recommended comparative advertising on Aug. 13, 1979 in 44 Fed.Reg. 4738. Note that Section 43(a) of the Lanham Trademark Act prohibits false disparagement of a competitor's product. See also FTC News Summary, Aug. 3, 1979.

72. American Home Products Corp. v. Johnson and Johnson, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1097, 436 F.Supp. 785 (D.N.Y.1977), affirmed 577 F.2d 160 (2d Cir. 1978).

vertisers, and the Council of Better Business Bureaus. Complaints are handled initially by an investigating staff of the BBB Council called the National Advertising Division. A query from NAD can lead major national advertisers to modify or discontinue unsubstantiated advertising claims. NAD monitors and advises and, in unresolved cases, carries appeals to the National Advertising Review Board. If an advertiser remains recalcitrant after an NARB panel reaches an adverse decision, NARB will notify the appropriate government agency.

Efforts at self-regulation are also made by the National Association of Broadcasters through its Television and Radio Codes. The success of these comprehensive statements can only be measured against one's own sensibilities and values. Supplemental guidelines have been issued on advertising to children, nonprescription drug advertising, and advertising substantiation.

Individual newspapers and broadcast stations and the three networks have their own advertising acceptability or broadcast standards departments. Network standards are generally said to be higher than those of the legal regulators.

Courts in the last decade have recommended greater use by the Federal Trade Commission of advisory opinions, binding upon advertisers until revoked or rescinded by the commission. Courts are also in favor of industry-wide Trade Practice Conferences and the use of Industry Guides or broad interpretations of the FTC Act. Conferences sometimes result in the promulgation of Trade Practice Rules for particular products or services. These do not have the force of law, and no penalties attach to their violation. The FTC itself may publish Trade Regulation Rules, formal statements as to what practices are considered unfair or deceptive.

Much of interest and importance to the student of advertising has been omitted from this brief account of some of adver-tising's legal problems. The Practising Law Institute's 1978 handbook, Legal and Business Problems of the Advertising Industry, is an invaluable reference. It includes: 1) Basic Copy Rules (the use of names, photographs, titles, and excerpts from literary materials, trademarks, testimonials, music, sweepstakes, and contests); 2) Industry Codes and Guidelines; 3) articles on "Agency Liability Under FTC Orders," "Advertising of Non-Prescription Drugs," and "Advertising litigation"; 4) application forms for advertisers' libel and slander, copyright, piracy, plagiarism, and privacy insurance policies; 5) endorsement and contract forms; and 6) a discussion of labor and agency operation problems affecting the advertising industry.

See also, Philip A. Garon (ed.), Advertising Law Anthology, Vol. III, Arlington, Va.: International Library, 1975; and Smith and White, FTC Consumer Protection Law Institute. PLI, 1980, see fn. 50. The FTC itself issues news summaries, an operating manual, and annual reports. FTC: Watch is an interesting "insiders' " report.

Legal or Public Notice Advertising

1. The major premise of public notice advertising is that citizens ought to have an opportunity to know what the laws are, to be notified when their rights or property are to be affected, and to be apprised of how the administration of their government is being conducted. State laws define the classifications of information requiring promulgation. These may include statutes and ordinances, governmental proceedings, articles of incorporation, registration of titles, probate matters, notices of election, appropriation of public funds, tax notices, bids for public works, and judicial orders—the list is by no means exhaustive.

State laws also define the qualifications a newspaper must possess to carry public notices and how legally qualified and/or "official" newspapers are to be selected. See New Jersey Suburbanite v. State, 384 A.2d 831 (N.J.1978). Here the state supreme court denied review when a free distribution shopper challenged a state law restricting legal advertising to newspapers with a paid circulation, average news content of 35 percent, and a second-class mailing permit in effect for at least two years. The number of times a public notice is to be published and how publication is to be certified and paid for are generally statutory matters.

"Official" and legally qualified newspapers are usually required to be stable publications of general and paid-for circulation, of general news coverage and general availability, printed in English, appearing frequently and regularly, and meeting specified minimum conditions of technical excellence. Close interpretation of state statutes has led to certain exceptions being made for specialized urban publications known as commercial newspapers designed to deal with the large volume of legal advertising which typical daily newspapers would find unprofitable. These interpretations have not gone unchallenged. See King County v. Superior Court in and for King County, 92 P.2d 694 (Wash.1939); In re Sterling Cleaners & Dyers, Inc., 81 F.2d 596 (7th Cir. 1936).

2. Another justification for the commercial newspaper has been the diversity of its subscribers rather than their number. Eisenberg v. Wabash, 189 N.E. 301 (Ill. 1934); Burak v. Ditson, 229 N.W. 227 (Iowa 1930). Can this also be challenged on the grounds that the law should require wider and more general publicity than can be provided by any newspaper, whatever its form?

In the landmark case, it was held by the United States Supreme Court that notice by publication of a pending settlement proceeding to known beneficiaries of a common trust fund was a denial of due process. Out of this case emerges the doctrine that notice is adequate only if it is reasonably calculated to apprise interested parties of their right to appear and be heard. Mullane v. Central Hanover Bank & Trust Co., Trustee, 339 U.S. 306 (1949).

Since Mullane, the Supreme Court has generally held that something more than notice by publication is required. In 1953, Justice Black wrote that notice by publication is a poor and sometimes hopeless substitute for actual service of notice. City of New York v. New York, N.H. & H.R. Co., 344 U.S. 293 (1953). And in 1956, the Court held invalid a condemnation proceeding based upon notice by publication. Walker v. City of Hutchinson, 352 U.S. 112 (1956). "[N]otice by publication," said the Court in 1962, "is not enough with respect to a person whose name and address are known or very easily ascertainable and whose legally protected interests are directly affected by the proceedings in question." Schroeder v. City of New York, 371 U.S. 211 (1962).

3. Mullane points out that notice need not be communicated to every possible interested person, but rather that notice is sufficient if it is "reasonably certain to reach most of those interested in objecting." Would this statement sustain publication of notice in a small town newspaper because, in that atmosphere, face-to-face communication may be quite highly developed and the community newspaper closely read? Jones v. Village of Farnam, 119 N.W.2d 157 (Neb.1963), discussed in Due Process—Sufficiency of Notice—Adequacy of Published Notice When Subsequent Proceeding Is To Be Held, 49 Iowa L.Rev. 185 (1963). Finally, a newspaper does not have to accept public notice advertising; Wooster v. Mahaska County, 98 N.W. 103 (Iowa 1904); Commonwealth v. Boston Transcript Co., 144 N.E. 400 (1924), but if it does, it must comply with the statutory requirements of publication.

Belleville Advocate Printing Co. v. St. Clair County, 168 N.E. 312 (Ill.1929).

Political Advertising

Political advertising is governed largely by First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1157, 435 U.S. 765 (1978) (this text, p. 151).<sup>73</sup> There the corporation was said to be constitutionally justified in engaging directly in political debate. The same right was later extended to indirect participation through donations to political committees.<sup>74</sup>

Campaign advertising is also governed by state and federal law.<sup>75</sup> Political ads in newspapers or other mass media for a federal candidate must state who or what organization paid for the ad and whether or not it was authorized by the candidate. If not authorized by the candidate, the ad should say so. The rate charged must not be higher than that charged for a comparable use of space for other purposes, that is, the highest rate charged for nonpolitical advertising. Of course, a newspaper is free to refuse a political ad. And when it accepts an ad, it can require advance cash payment. By the same token, it can extend credit to a candidate if the terms are substantially similar to those available to nonpolitical persons.

Under the Federal Election Campaign Laws, a newspaper may also sponsor a debate between or among candidates for federal office on condition that at least two candidates be present and that the setting or circumstances of the debate not favor one candidate over another. Fairness and equal time obligations applicable to broadcasters do not apply to newspapers.

State laws vary widely, but most would contain provisions for requiring identification of those paying for the ad and for equitable ad rates. State laws forbidding election-day advertising, corporate advertising, and use of the American flag in a campaign ad probably could no longer pass constitutional muster. It is generally considered unethical, though not illegal, for a newspaper to accommodate last-minute political attacks that leave no time for refutation or rebuttal.

ANTITRUST LAWS AND THE MEDIA

1. Since the beginning of the century there has been a steady decline in the number of cities with competing daily newspapers. An early 1980s' estimate of the number was thirty-three. That decline and trends toward group ownership (a steadily diminishing 541 independent dailies remained in 1983<sup>76</sup>), cross-media affiliation, and conglomerate absorption present dim prospects for an idealized, diverse pattern of media ownership.

73. See also, Consolidated Edison Co. of New York, Inc. v. Public Service Commission, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1518, 447 U.S. 530 (1980).

74. Citizens Against Rent Control/Coalition for Fair Housing v. Berkeley, 454 U.S. 290 (1982). See also, C & C Plywood v. Hanson, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 1954, 583 F.2d 421 (9th Cir. 1978); Let's Help Florida v. Smathers, 453 F.Supp. 1003 (D.Fla.1978), affirmed sub.nom. 621 F.2d 195 (1980); Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc. v. State, 408 So.2d 211 (Fla.1981).

75. Notably the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, Pub.L. No. 93-225, 86 Stat. 3, as amended, 1974, Pub.L. No. 93-443, 88 Stat. 1263, as construed by the U.S. Supreme Court in Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976).

76. Sources for the above figures are Morton Newspaper Research Newsletter, March 31, 1983, p. 3-6; American Newspaper Publishers Association, '83 Facts About Newspapers; Editor & Publisher, January 1, 1983, p. 34; and Compaine, Who Owns the Media? Concentration of Ownership in the Mass Communication Industry, 1979.

Of approximately 1,710 daily newspapers, 68 percent are chain or group owned, if a group is defined as two or more newspapers under single ownership. That means that more than 76 percent of national daily circulation is group controlled. The four largest of 160 chains alone account for 21 percent of daily circulation; they are, in order of size, Gannett Newspapers, Knight-Ridder Newspapers, Newhouse Newspapers, and Tribune Company. In 1983, Gannett owned 86 dailies, a national newspaper, USA Today, and 33 weeklies, semiweeklies, or monthlies, 7 television stations, 14 radio stations, its own news service, and a satellite information network.

On the brighter side, except for the motion picture industry, no segment of the mass media system is so concentrated as to violate existing antitrust laws. The total system remains relatively diverse, competitive, and pluralistic. There is a publication for almost every conceivable interest group. In ten years, the number of Sunday newspapers has increased by 182, and, despite the demise of many P.M. newspapers, the total number of dailies has remained remarkably stable.

But there are danger signs. Owners of independent newspapers seem unable to resist inflated offers from ever-expanding chains. Inheritance tax laws in large part account for the fact that between 1979 and 1982, for example, of 179 dailies that changed hands all but nineteen became part of groups. Book publishers are rapidly being absorbed by newspaper/magazine chains (e.g., Hearst and Newhouse), large entertainment conglomerates (e.g., CBS and Gulf + Western), and defense contractors (e.g., ITT, IBM, and Raytheon). Accelerated conglomeration is taking place among an estimated 6,000 cable systems. Record companies, movie theaters, newsprint plants, retail book stores, and commercial television stations have also been affected.

Three television networks still account for more than half the advertising sales in that field. Co-located newspaper/broadcast combinations remain an antitrust concern since the United States Supreme Court in FCC v. National Citizens Committee for Broadcasting, 436 U.S. 775 (1978), this text, p. 959, reversed a lower court's ruling that all such combinations be broken up. In 1983, it appeared possible that the Associated Press might soon be without competition as a U.S. world wire service.

While patterns of ownership may be changing, the total number of outlets remains fairly constant. Moreover, the figures on concentration are not meant to suggest that a systematic relationship has been established between type of ownership and the "quality" of information. The social and professional effects of media concentration are not understood. If we are to err, however, perhaps it ought to be in the direction of Judge Learned Hand's "multitude of tongues" thesis in his federal district court opinion in United States v. Associated Press, 52 F.Supp. 362 (S.D.N.Y.1943), an argument based on the proposition that the First Amendment does not contemplate monopolies in the realm of ideas and information.

The major weapons of antitrust enforcement are the Sherman and Clayton Acts. The former, enacted in 1890, is essentially an antimonopoly law. It governs contracts, combinations, trusts, or any conspiracies in restraint of trade. The 1914 Clayton Act includes among its categories of illegal activities corporate mergers, interlocking directorates, discriminatory pricing, and tying (the connecting of the sale of one product or service to the purchasing of a second product or service).

Section 7 of the Clayton Act is aimed at mergers:

No corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share of capital * * * of another corporation engaged also in commerce, where, in any line of commerce in any section of the country, the effect of such acquisition may be substantially to lessen competition or to tend to create a monopoly. (15 U.S.C. § 18)

Section 2 of the Sherman Act condemns monopolizing, the power to exclude competition, and can be applied to actions of a single enterprise:

Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several [s]tates or foreign nations, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

Few more than twenty antitrust suits have been brought against newspapers since 1890, most of those between 1940 and 1970. There is a reason. Antitrust laws as they exist are not readily adaptable to newspapers or newspaper groups. Most dailies already occupy a local monopoly position, a "natural monopoly," if you will, so that it is difficult, if not impossible, to demonstrate that chain acquisition of a local monopoly newspaper is going to have any effect on competition. In typical Section 7 litigation, the government defines the product and its geographical market, calculates the percentage of the market to be controlled by the merged firm, and decides whether that figure is sufficient to create a "reasonable probability" of lessened competition. Even a merger as large as that which was proposed between Gannett and Combined Communication fell below the maximum market gain of 2 percent permitted by the Justice Department. Gannett's 4.8 percent share of total daily circulation at that time and Combined Communication's 0.6 percent share would not have violated the rule. When Knight, the third largest chain in 1974, merged with Ridder, the ninth largest, Ridder had a 2.1 percent market share, just over the Antitrust Division's limit. The new firm was asked to divest some of its broadcast properties. Mergers between members of the top ten or so chains are therefore unlikely.

Courts, interpreting Section 7, have narrowly defined geographical markets. Newspapers do not compete strenuously for national advertisers and seldom for national subscribers. Obviously, newspapers within chains do not compete with one another, but chains themselves compete in their desire to add new members. Are Gannett, Newhouse, and Thomson, for example, rather than individual newspapers, "lines of commerce" that could initiate Section 7 actions to protect the owners of independent newspapers or small chains of newspapers? So far the courts have said no.

Arguments have been made that competition among newspapers is interlayer rather than intralayer. That is, similar sized newspapers do not compete, but categories of newspapers do—suburbans with metropolitans, for example. The Times-Mirror case, as shall be noted, was that kind of case in that it prevented a newspaper from one layer from acquiring a newspaper from another. But first the more basic question of whether the antitrust laws do indeed infringe upon the First Amendment rights of the press.

The Constitutionality of Antitrust Laws

ASSOCIATED PRESS ET AL. v. UNITED STATES

326 U.S. 1, 65 S.C.T. 1416, 89 L.ED. 2013 (1945).

[EDITORIAL NOTE

In the early forties, Marshall Field's Chicago Sun, founded to compete with the Chicago Tribune, was denied AP membership, a service thought necessary for survival. The government brought suit under the Sherman Act.

Judge Learned Hand, speaking for the district court in this case, United States v. Associated Press, 52 F.Supp. 362 (S.D.N.Y. 1943), stated that the objectives of the antitrust laws and the interests protected by the First Amendment come very close to converging. This is a radical observation that carries with it some rather innovative implications. To begin with, the First Amendment guarantee of freedom of the press is not to be read as creating an immunity from all government regulation. Second, the real addressees of the First Amendment protection may not be the newspaper industry but the American public and its stake in as free a flow of information as possible. Judge Hand treats the AP as performing a quasi-public function and relies on this status to justify government regulation to secure First Amendment objectives. The following passage from the district court opinion has been an oft-quoted source for authority and thought on the law of the American press:

However, neither exclusively, nor even primarily, are the interests of the newspaper industry conclusive; for that industry serves one of the most vital of all general interests: the dissemination of news from many different sources, with as many different facets and colors as is possible. That interest is closely akin to, if indeed it is not the same as, the interest protected by the First Amendment; it presupposes that right conclusions are more likely to be gathered out of a multitude of tongues, than any kind of authoritative selection. To many this is, and always will be folly; but we have staked upon it our all. [Emphasis added.]

What assumptions are made in this passage? One of Hand's major premises appears to be that the more newspapers, the more varied and untrammelled debate will be. But newspapers for all but local news rely heavily on wire services and feature syndicates. If the pressures that operate on editorial and news decisions presumably are the same commercial pressures that are found throughout the nation, does it matter much whether the newspapers are owned by a chain or individually? Whether a community has one newspaper or two or three?

In other words, does it follow that the antitrust policy of a "multitude of tongues" necessarily works toward First Amendment objectives?

There is an implication in Learned Hand's opinion that the government may act to guarantee access to divergent ideas that would otherwise be unexpressed. See Barron, Access to the Press—A New First Amendment Right, 80 Harv.L.Rev. 1641 at 1655 (1967). This acknowledgment that such governmental action is consistent with the First Amendment is of great importance.

Reflect on Judge Hand's statement of these issues as you read the opinion of the U.S. Supreme Court which follows.]

Justice BLACK delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * *

The United States filed a bill in a Federal District Court for an injunction against AP and other defendants charging that they had violated the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, 26 Stat. 209, 15 U.S.C.A. §§ 1-7, 15, in that their acts and conduct constituted (1) a combination and conspiracy in restraint of trade and commerce in news among the states, and (2) an attempt to monopolize a part of that trade.

The heart of the government's charge was that appellants had by concerted action set up a system of By-Laws which prohibited all AP members from selling news to non-members, and which granted each member powers to block its nonmember competitors from membership. These By-Laws to which all AP members had assented, were, in the context of the admitted facts charged to be in violation of the Sherman Act. A further charge related to a contract between AP and Canadian Press, (a news agency of Canada, similar to AP) under which the Canadian agency and AP obligated themselves to furnish news exclusively to each other. The District Court, composed of three judges, held that the By-Laws unlawfully restricted admission to AP membership, and violated the Sherman Act insofar as the By-Laws' provisions clothed a member with powers to impose or dispense with conditions upon the admission of his business competitor. Continued observance of these By-Laws was enjoined. The court further held that the Canadian contract was an integral part of the restrictive membership conditions, and enjoined its observance pending abandonment of the membership restrictions.

Member publishers of AP are engaged in business for profit exactly as are other business men who sell food, steel, aluminum, or anything else people need or want. All are alike covered by the Sherman Act. The fact that the publisher handles news while others handle food does not, as we shall later point out, afford the publisher a peculiar constitutional sanctuary in which he can with impunity violate laws regulating his business practices.

Nor is a publisher who engages in business practices made unlawful by the Sherman Act entitled to a partial immunity by reason of the "clear and present danger" doctrine which courts have used to protect freedom to speak, to print, and to worship. That doctrine, as related to this case, provides protection for utterances themselves, so that the printed or spoken word may not be the subject of previous restraint or punishment, unless their expression creates a clear and present danger of bringing about a substantial evil which the government has power to prohibit. Bridges v. California, 314 U.S. 252, 261. Formulated as it was to protect liberty of thought and of expression, it would degrade the clear and present danger doctrine to fashion from it a shield for business publishers who engage in business practices condemned by the Sherman Act. * * *

The District Court found that the By-Laws in and of themselves were contracts in restraint of commerce in that they contained provisions designed to stifle competition in the newspaper publishing field. The court also found that AP's restrictive By-Laws had hindered and impeded the growth of competing newspapers. This latter finding, as to the past effect of the restrictions, is challenged. We are inclined to think that it is supported by undisputed evidence, but we do not stop to labor the point. For the court below found, and we think correctly, that the By-Laws on their face, and without regard to their past effect, constitute restraints of trade. Combinations are no less unlawful because they have not as yet resulted in restraint. An agreement or combination to follow a course of conduct which will necessarily restrain or monopolize a part of trade or commerce may violate the Sherman Act, whether it be "wholly nascent or abortive on the one hand, or successful on the other." For these reasons the argument, repeated here in various forms, that AP had not yet achieved a complete monopoly is wholly irrelevant. Undisputed evidence did show, however, that its By-Laws had tied the hands of all of its numerous publishers, to the extent that they could not and did not sell any part of their news so that it could reach any of their non member competitors. In this respect the Court did find, and that finding cannot possibly be challenged, that AP's By-Laws had hindered and restrained the sale of interstate news to nonmembers who competed with members.

Inability to buy news from the largest news agency, or any one of its multitude of members, can have most serious effects on the publication of competitive newspapers, both those presently published and those which but for these restrictions, might be published in the future. This is illustrated by the District Court's finding that in 26 cities of the United States, existing newspapers already have contracts for AP news and the same newspapers have contracts with United Press and International News Service under which new newspapers would be required to pay the contract holders large sums to enter the field. The net effect is seriously to limit the opportunity of any new paper to enter these cities. Trade restraints of this character, aimed at the destruction of competition, tend to block the initiative which brings newcomers into a field of business and to frustrate the free enterprise system which it was the purpose of the Sherman Act to protect.

* * * It is true that the record shows that some competing papers have gotten along without AP news, but morning newspapers, which control 96% of the total circulation in the United States, have AP news service. And the District Court's unchallenged finding was that "AP is a vast, intricately reticulated organization, the largest of its kind, gathering news from all over the world, the chief single source of news for the American press, universally agreed to be of great consequence."

Nevertheless, we are asked to reverse these judgments on the ground that the evidence failed to show that AP reports, which might be attributable to their own "enterprise and sagacity," are clothed "in the robes of indispensability." The absence of "indispensability" is said to have been established under the following chain of reasoning: AP has made its news generally available to the people by supplying it to a limited and select group of publishers in the various cities; therefore, it is said, AP and its member publishers have not deprived the reading public of AP news; all local readers have an "adequate access" to AP news, since all they need to do in any city to get it is to buy, on whatever terms they can in a protected market, the particular newspaper selected for the public by AP and its members. We reject these contentions. The proposed "indispensability" test would fly in the face of the language of the Sherman Act and all of our previous interpretations of it. Moreover, it would make that law a dead letter in all fields of business, a law which Congress has consistently maintained to be an essential safeguard to the kind of private competitive business economy this country has sought to maintain.

* * *

Finally, the argument is made that to apply the Sherman Act to this association of publishers constitutes an abridgment of the freedom of the press guaranteed by the First Amendment. Perhaps it would be a sufficient answer to this contention to refer to the decisions of this Court in Associated Press v. N.L.R.B., and Indiana Farmer's Guide Pub. Co. v. Prairie Farmer Pub. Co., 293 U.S. 268. It would be strange indeed however if the grave concern for freedom of the press which prompted adoption of the First Amendment should be read as a command that the government was without power to protect that freedom. The First Amendment, far from providing an argument against application of the Sherman Act, here provides powerful reasons to the contrary. That Amendment rests on the assumption that the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources is essential to the welfare of the public, that a free press is a condition of a free society. Surely a command that the government itself shall not impede the free flow of ideas does not afford non-governmental combinations a refuge if they impose restraints upon that constitutionally guaranteed freedom. Freedom to publish means freedom for all and not for some. Freedom to publish is guaranteed by the Constitution, but freedom to combine to keep others from publishing is not. Freedom of the press from governmental interference under the First Amendment does not sanction repression of that freedom by private interests. [Emphasis added.] The First Amendment affords not the slightest support for the contention that a combination to restrain trade in news and views has any constitutional immunity.

* * *

Affirmed

COMMENT

1. Obviously the most significant aspect of the Associated Press case is the Supreme Court's determination that newspapers are subject to the antitrust laws. The newspaper industry relied on the theories that newspapers were not in interstate commerce, and therefore not covered by the Sherman Antitrust Act, and that the First Amendment guarantee of freedom of the press provided a constitutional exemption from the antitrust laws. The interstate commerce argument came rather late since many areas of economic life had been held to be in interstate commerce by 1946. But the argument that government application of the antitrust laws to the press abridged freedom of the press was a more serious one. What was the nature of the AP's argument on this point? How did Justice Black deal with it in his opinion?

2. Both Justice Roberts and Justice Murphy made the point in dissents that news, after all, is not hoarded by the AP, the news is there and the AP had the right to go and get it. If others envy their prowess at this endeavor and wish to do the same, they may. A short but still quite accurate statement by way of rebuttal to this position is found in Comment, Press Associations and Restraint of Trade, 55 Yale L.J. 428 at 430 (1946):

Pressures of time render it literally impossible for any newspaper singlehandedly to secure rapid, reliable and efficient coverage and transmission service from all parts of the world. Thus, unless possessed of a sizeable independent fortune an entrepreneur simply will not launch a newspaper without assurance of access to the requisite news-gathering facilities.

3. Note that Justice Black did not base his opinion for the Court in the AP case on the public interest in the news. He declined to view the press as performing the public or quasi-public function which Judge Learned Hand had ascribed to it in the district court. A later rejection of the view that private property should be considered quasipublic for First Amendment purposes was found in Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507 (1976), this text, p. 53.

Justice Frankfurter's concurrence, on the other hand, clearly recognized that the untrammelled flow of news may be frustrated by "private restraints no less than by public censorship." Since Justice Black wrote the opinion for the Court which applies the antitrust laws to the AP, should we conclude that he agreed that private restraints on freedom of expression are as destructive as public ones and as subject to regulatory control? Or is Justice Black's analysis that, absent discriminatory bylaws such as those struck down in AP, private restraints on or by the press are generally not subject to legal control?

As a result of the Supreme Court's directing the AP to frame new rules of admission, the membership of the AP considerably expanded.

Mergers and Concentration of Ownership in the Daily Press

UNITED STATES v. TIMES MIRROR CO.

274 F.SUPP. 606 (C.D.CAL.1967).

[EDITORIAL NOTE

A United States District Court in California held that the acquisition of The Sun Company by the Times Mirror Company was a violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act and Section 7 of the Clayton Act and issued an order of divestiture requiring the Times to sell The Sun Company. The Court ruled that the determinative issue of liability was whether the effect of the merger was to lessen substantially competition within the relevant geographic and product markets; competition between the two newspapers was not required. As another federal district court said in Union Leader v. Newspapers of New England, Inc., 180 F.Supp. 125 (D.Mass.1954), modified on other grounds, 284 F.2d 582 (1st Cir. 1960), cert. den. 365 U.S. 833 (1961), it is the purpose of the antitrust laws to protect competitors. There is nothing to prevent a publisher from competing, even if that competition leads to monopoly.

The Times Mirror Company publishes the morning Los Angeles Times, which has had the largest daily newspaper circulation in California since 1948. In 1964 the Times Mirror purchased The Sun Company, publishers of the morning Sun, the evening Telegram and the Sunday Sun-Telegram located in San Bernardino County which adjoins Los Angeles County to the east. The Sun Company dominated the daily newspaper business in San Bernardino County and was the largest independent publishing company in Southern California.

The U.S. Department of Justice challenged the acquisition in District Court, asserting that it constituted an unlawful control and combination which unreasonably restrains interstate trade and commerce, in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 1, and that the effect of the acquisition may be substantially to lessen competition in violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 18.]

FERGUSON, District Judge:

* * *

PURPOSE OF SECTION 7

* * *

The Supreme Court, in Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, (1962), pointed out in setting forth the legislative history of the 1950 amendment to § 7 of the Clayton Act that:

"The dominant theme pervading congressional consideration of the 1950 amendments was a fear of what was considered to be a rising tide of economic concentration in the American economy. * * * Other considerations cited in support of the bill were the desirability of retaining 'local control' over industry and the protection of small businesses. Throughout the recorded discussion may be found examples of Congress' fear not only of accelerated concentration of economic power on economic grounds, but also of the threat to other values a trend toward concentration was thought to pose." 370 U.S. at 315-16.

The Court declared:

1. Congress made it plain that § 7 applied not only to mergers between actual competitors, but also to vertical and conglomerate mergers whose effect may tend to lessen competition in any line of commerce in any section of the country. 370 U.S. at 317.

* * *

THE PRODUCT MARKET

In actions under § 7 of the Clayton Act, a finding of the appropriate "product market" is a necessary predicate to a determination of whether a merger has the requisite anticompetitive effects. In Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, supra, it is set forth:

"Thus, as we have previously noted, '[d]etermination of the relevant market is a necessary predicate to a finding of a violation of the Clayton Act. * * *'"

[EDITORIAL NOTE

The argument that the Times and the Sun did not compete with each other and for that reason there could not be an antitrust violation had lost all its validity since 1950 amendments to the Clayton Act. The fact that two merging companies presently compete or do not compete is not the significant issue. Congress had directed that the courts must look to the effect and impact of the merger. If its effect is anti-competitive, then there is a violation.]

* * *

In some of the services which they provide, daily newspapers compete with other media, such as radio and television, both for news and advertising. This does not mean, however, that all competitors of any service provided by a daily newspaper must be lumped into the same line of commerce with it. * * *

The defendant argues that each daily newspaper is so unique as to occupy a product market of its own. This argument stems more from pride of publication than from commercial reality. The contention is made that if a reader in Southern California wants depth in international, national and regional news, he buys the Times and if he wants depth in the local news of his own community, he buys his small local paper. In effect, it is claimed that the Times and the surrounding local daily newspapers are complementary toward each other. As set forth previously, the concept of two products being complementary toward each other is not a barrier to § 7 if the effect of the merger may have anticompetitive effects.

It is now firmly established that products need not be identical to be included in a § 7 analysis of the product market. Furthermore, in Union Leader Corp. v. Newspapers of New England, Inc., the court of appeals recognized that numerous papers published all over New England could comprise a relevant daily newspaper market for both Clayton and Sherman Act purposes.

Finally, when a merger such as here results in a share of from 10.6% to 54.8% of total weekday circulation, from 23.9% to 99.5% of total morning circulation and from 20.3% to 64.3% of total Sunday circulation in the relevant geographic market, the acquisition constitutes a prima facie violation of the Clayton Act. As set forth in United States v. Continental Can Co.:

"Where a merger is of such a size as to be inherently suspect, elaborate proof of market structure, market behavior and probable anticompetitive effects may be dispensed with in view of § 7's design to prevent undue concentration." 378 U.S. at 458.

COMPETITION FOR ADVERTISING

The Times competed with the Sun for advertising. The largest share of the revenue of a daily newspaper comes from its advertisements, and advertising is its lifeblood.

* * *

* * * After the acquisition, the advertising campaign that both papers waged against each other ceased.

THE GEOGRAPHIC MARKET

It is necessary after defining the product market to determine the geographic market (the "section of the country") in order to determine the anticompetitive effect of the merger.

In 1964, the year of the acquisition, the Times had a weekday daily circulation of 16,650 and a Sunday circulation of 31,993 within San Bernardino County. This amounted to 10.6% of the total weekday circulation for both morning and evening newspapers, 23.9% of total morning circulation and 20.3% of the total Sunday circulation.

The Sun had its entire circulation, except for a very few copies, within the limits of San Bernardino County. The county therefore encompasses virtually the entire area of circulation and home delivery overlap between the Times and the Sun. * * *

The defendant contends that the County of San Bernardino is not commercially realistic because county boundaries do not define the boundaries of a newspaper market. It claims that counties are political and administrative boundaries, not necessarily market boundaries. This contention may be true as a generalized statement. In each case the geographic market must be determined with sufficient precision to weigh the anticompetitive effects of the merger. The Times claims that the largest part of its circulation was in the west part of San Bernardino County, while the largest part of the circulation of the Sun was in the east part. However, as stated previously, the newspaper industry has recognized San Bernardino County as a daily newspaper market. Most important of all, the Times itself, in evaluating the acquisition, used the daily newspaper business in the entire San Bernardino County as the relevant market.

* * *

At the time of the acquisition, there was already a heavy concentration of daily newspaper ownership in the ten counties of Southern California. * * *

There has been a steady decline of independent ownership of newspapers in Southern California. A newspaper is independently owned when its owners do not publish another newspaper at another locality. In San Bernardino County as of January 1, 1952, six of the seven daily newspapers were independently owned. On December 31, 1966, only three of the eight dailies published there remained independent.

* * *

In the ten-county area of Southern California in the same period of time, the number of daily newspapers increased from 66 to 82, but the number independently owned decreased from 39 to 20. In 1952, 59% of Southern California dailies were independent; in 1966 only 24% were independent.

The acquisition of the Sun by the Times was particularly anticompetitive because it eliminated one of the few independent papers that had been able to operate successfully in the morning and Sunday fields. * * *

The acquisition has raised a barrier to entry of newspapers in the San Bernardino County market that is almost impossible to overcome. The evidence discloses the market has now been closed tight and no publisher will risk the expense of unilaterally starting a new daily newspaper there.

An acquisition which enhances existing barriers to entry in the market or increases the difficulties of smaller firms already in the market is particularly anticompetitive. * * *

The difficulty of entry anyplace within the Southern California daily newspaper market is illustrated best by the recent failure of one of the most powerful publishers in the United States, the New York Times, to successfully establish a West Coast edition.

* * *

CONCLUSION

The acquisition by The Times Mirror Company of The Sun Company on June 25, 1964, resulted in a violation of § 7 of the Clayton Act. It is an acquisition by one corporation (The Times Mirror Company) of all the stock of another corporation (The Sun Company), both corporations being engaged in interstate commerce, whereby in the daily newspaper business (the relevant product market) in San Bernardino County, California (the relevant geographic market), the effect is substantially to lessen competition.

FORM OF RELIEF

The government seeks an order of divestiture and an injunction prohibiting the defendant from acquiring any other daily newspaper in the relevant geographic market.

Divestiture has become the normal form of relief when acquisitions have been found to violate § 7 of the Clayton Act. * * *

Complete divestiture here is the practical solution to correct the § 7 violation.

However, the request for a perpetual injunction must be denied. * * *

While it is recognized that injunctive relief has been granted in antitrust cases, the court is not able to predict the future of the daily newspaper business in San Bernardino County. For example, on May 1, 1967, the Victorville Daily Press, a weekly, became a daily and the government admits "it is a bit early to predict what its fate will be." In the event that it should become a failing paper and the defendant acquired it, a study must be made of the effect of the acquisition. It may be anticompetitive, or it may come within the congressional exemption as expressed in Brown Shoe. Based upon the evidence before it, the court cannot pre-judge the newspaper business with sufficient certainty to grant the injunction. The dangers that could result from it outweigh any possible advantage that it may have.

* * *

---

COMMENT

1. The U.S. Supreme Court affirmed the district court's judgment in the Times Mirror case, 390 U.S. 712 (1968).

2. The court ordered the Times Mirror Company to divest itself of its stock in such a way that The Sun Company will "continue as a strong and viable company." What does divestiture really mean in this context? Was it clear that the Sun would reemerge as an independent newspaper, according to the court's definition of an independent newspaper (one whose owners "do not publish another newspaper at another locality")?

3. When the Pulitzers, owners of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, had earlier offered the owner of the San Bernardino Sun $15 million for his newspaper, the Californian decided that he would rather sell to the Chandlers of Los Angeles because both papers shared political views, Norman Chandler was a director of three of the largest corporations in San Bernardino, and the two were close friends.

4. Most cities provide their daily newspapers with a "natural monopoly." This is partly due to the economies of scale: fixed first issue costs diminish as circulation increases, especially for small or medium-sized dailies. This militates against more than one newspaper's serving similar audiences in a single community, unless that community is large enough to provide segmented audiences for both news and advertising—New York City and Chicago for example. Subscriber and advertiser demands are interdependent. When advertising sales drop, circulation drops, and the result is the beginning of what economist James Rosse calls a downward spiral.<sup>77</sup> As the spiral continues, the economies of scale dictate that single issues of the newspaper cost more. This leads to lower profitability which can only be dealt with by higher prices for both advertising space and subscriptions or by cutting back on costs and presumably quality as well. Either course accelerates the downward spiral.

The Newspaper Preservation Act and Joint Operating Agreements

1. Without private subsidy the few existing second daily newspapers are in delicate health in all but our three or four largest cities. One consequence has been merger in one form or another. In Union Leader v. Newspapers of New England, Inc., text p. 644, federal courts held that a newspaper might legally acquire its competitor if the geographic market could only support one newspaper. Similarly in United States v. Harte-Hanks Newspapers, Inc., 170 F.Supp. 227 (N.D.Tex.1959), a federal court said that it was not illegal to offer to buy out a competitor if there was no apparent intent to monopolize. As has been noted, daily newspapers increasingly appear to be "natural monopolies."

---

77. Rosse, The Evolution of One Newspaper Cities (a discussion draft prepared for the FTC Media Symposium, Washington, D.C., Dec. 14 and 15, 1978).

Group acquisition and conglomerate merger are partially protected by the "failing company" defense of the Newspaper Preservation Act of 1970, Pub.L. No. 91-353, 84 Stat. 466 (codified at 15 U.S.C. § 1801-04). The "failing company" doctrine originated with International Shoe Co. v. FTC, 280 U.S. 291 (1930), a holding that exempted firms facing bankruptcy from antitrust requirements.

Rarely do such mergers in the newspaper business threaten competition in a single market. Chains prefer to buy monopoly newspapers. And where there is a "natural monopoly," competitors are not usually lined up to enter that market. So that geographical markets will not overlap, chain management makes certain that newspaper acquisitions are some distance apart. Chain as well as conglomerate mergers raise social and political rather than economic questions given the present condition of the antitrust laws. The fact is that the statistics of concentration cited by media critics do not approach the thresholds of enforcement against vertical and horizontal merger applied to other industries, even though there are profound differences in intrinsic value between information and ideas on the one hand and garbage bags or bleaches on the other.

However ideal the image of two economically viable community newspapers locked in editorial combat, or of that hometown newspaper remaining forever home-and independently owned, the image is an exercise in nostalgia. Economic pressures toward group ownership are almost overwhelming. Tax laws stimulate the investment of accumulated reserves. Undistributed earnings are not taxed as personal or corporate income if used in the acquisition of additional newspaper properties. And those who already own newspapers generally know how to manage new ones. At the same time, estate taxes are such that few publishers can resist the grossly inflated prices offered by newspaper groups.

In addition there are in mergers the advantages of joint venture risk sharing in new technologies, centralized management, pooled editorial services, and higher standing in the financial market.

2. With newspaper competition more and more a rarity, diversity must be sought in cross-channel competition. And when cross-channel patterns of ownership threaten that remaining diversity, group and conglomerate mergers seem, in contrast, more attractive.<sup>78</sup>

The Newspaper Preservation Act assumes that there is social benefit (again the notion of editorial diversity) in permitting competitors in a natural monopoly setting to share rather than duplicate technical and business facilities.<sup>79</sup> A prior assumption is that one of the two competitors, if both remain independent, will fail anyway. A "failing company" defense therefore must demonstrate that 1) the resources of the acquiring or acquired firm are about to be depleted; 2) prospects of rehabilitation are remote; 3) after strenuous efforts have been made, no potential purchaser has come forward; and 4) reor-

78. Sullivan Handbook of the Law of Antitrust (1977), p. 598.

79. Bruce Owen in Economics and Freedom of Expression (1975) would expand access to production facilities to all prospective competitors, and such facilities would become a public utility.

ganization of the firm would make no difference to its survival. The act was an attempt in part to undo the work of the United States Supreme Court in Citizen Publishing Co. v. United States, 394 U.S. 131 (1969), infra, by allowing the conditions of the "failing company" defense to be circumvented with the written prior consent of the attorney general. Publishers entering into this kind of merger arrangement, a Joint Operating Agreement (JOA), were, in effect, exempted from the antitrust laws.

JOAs began in Albuquerque, New Mexico in 1933, and by 1966 twenty-two cities had them. The Antitrust Division overlooked their Sherman and Clayton Act implications until Citizen Publishing Co. was initiated in 1964. While the case was in progress, a Failing Newspaper Act was introduced in Congress in 1967. After the Court's 1969 holding in Citizen Publishing Co., the bill was refashioned and reintroduced as the euphemistic Newspaper Preservation Act. Despite opposition from many quarters, including community newspapers through their national organization, the National Newspaper Association, the bill passed both houses of Congress in 1970 by wide margins. The act grandfathered all existing JOAs.

Citizen Publishing Co. involved two newspapers in Tucson, Arizona that had entered into a JOA in 1940. Under the terms of their agreement, the news and editorial departments of the two newspapers remained separate while a new corporation operated the merged advertising, circulation, and printing departments. Profits were pooled, and it was agreed that the two would not compete in any other publishing venture.

When a buyer appeared for the dominant Star, its partner, the Citizen, quickly bought it and became publisher of both newspapers through a holding company. At this point the Department of Justice intervened charging that the JOA violated both Clayton and Sherman Acts. In Unit- ed States v. Citizen Publishing Co., 280 F.Supp. 978 (D.Ariz.1968), a federal district court agreed that the arrangement constituted price fixing, profit pooling, and a market allocation scheme, all illegal per se under the Sherman Act. With their news departments again separated, the two newspapers were allowed to continue to share their mechanical and advertising departments.

In Citizen Publishing Co. the U.S. Supreme Court affirmed that the kind of agreement entered into here was a violation of the antitrust laws. Moreover, the acquired company had not met the preconditions of the "failing company" defense, i.e., it was not on the brink of collapse. The Newspaper Preservation Act, with strong support from metropolitan publishers, sought to ameliorate the effects of the Supreme Court ruling.

3. A number of questions immediately come to mind. How long will the editorial policies of JOA newspapers remain different or competitive? And, if local competition is economically unfeasible or improbable anyway, are there alternatives to the kind of mergers condemned by the Court in Citizen Publishing Co. and condoned by Congress in the Newspaper Preservation Act? Where will buyers for "failing" newspapers be found? Why would a profitable newspaper want to merge with a company that is truly failing? Is a semblance of editorial competition, no matter how it is accomplished, preferable to a single daily newspaper voice in a community?

Twenty-three JOAs were in place in 1983. Three—Anchorage, Cincinnati, and Chattanooga—had been approved since passage of the Newspaper Preservation Act in 1970. The Anchorage Agreement, first to be signed in 1974 under the new act, was dissolved five years later after a three-year lawsuit in which the financially weaker of the two papers charged mismanagement. An earlier Chattanooga agreement was discontinued in 1966 but revived in 1980. The Cincinnati marriage was consummated in 1979. A Bristol, Tennessee—Franklin-Oil City, Pennsylvania merger ended when one paper died.

4. Meanwhile a merger proposal in Seattle had been hotly contested. The Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice and several ad hoc groups, notably the Committee for an Independent P-I, opposed the merger on grounds that the parent Hearst Corporation had not made a good faith effort to sell one of two Seattle newspapers, the Post-Intelligencer. Comprising the Committee were P-I employees, advertisers, and the publishers of smaller newspapers who feared the power of a metropolitan monopoly.

Nevertheless an Administrative Law Judge and the U.S. attorney general approved the merger. The ALJ argued that the financial health of the newspaper could be considered apart from the condition of the chain to which it belonged. In re Seattle Newspapers, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2173 (1981), 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1080 (1982). The attorney general whose prior consent must be procured for antitrust exemptions, agreed and added that under the Newspaper Preservation Act there was no requirement to prove the absence of qualified buyers before being designated a "failing newspaper." In re Seattle Newspapers, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1666 (1982).

Rejecting those decisions, the Committee and other groups filed suit against the attorney general, Hearst, and the second daily, the Seattle Times. A federal district judge vacated the attorney general's order on grounds that he had overlooked one of the Administrative Law Judge's findings of fact, to wit, the Post-Intelligencer had not been offered for sale and purchase inquiries had been rebuffed; the "correct definition of a 'failing newspaper' must include consideration of the existence of willing buyers," and the parent corporation must "carry the burden of demonstrating that none of those buyers could continue to operate the P-I as an independent daily."

At the same time, the trial court disagreed with plaintiffs that the Newspaper Preservation Act violated the First Amendment by jeopardizing the future of smaller newspapers in competition with the JOA. Citing City & County of Honolulu v. Hawaii Newspaper Agency, Inc., 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2495 (D.Hawaii 1981) and Bay Guardian Co. v. Chronicle Publishing Co., 344 F.Supp. 1155 (N.D.Cal.1972), the court denied a direct correlation between market structure and freedom of content. The act, said the Hawaii court, can only be said to offend the First Amendment if it in some way restrains the freedom of the press. In the California case, the court observed that, regardless of the economic or social wisdom of the act, it did not violate freedom of the press. Nor was the delegation of authority to the attorney general vague or overbroad. Committee for an Independent P-I v. Smith, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 2162, 549 F.Supp. 985 (W.D.Wash.1982).

All parties sought an expedited appeal before the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, and on April 21, 1983 that body reversed the Washington federal district court on the main issue and allowed the Joint Operating Agreement to proceed. The critical question in determining whether a newspaper is "failing," said the appeals court, is whether it is "suffering losses which more than likely cannot be reversed," despite reasonable management by either present or projected staff.

The court rejected Antitrust Division arguments that an "incremental analysis" would show net benefits to the parent Hearst Corporation, despite the P-I's weekly losses of $200,000. A similar challenge to a JOA in Cincinnati occurred when the Post, owned by E.W. Scripps, sought to merge with the Enquirer. Post employees contended that Scripps had purposely "maneuvered the Cincinnati Post into its present financial position to profit from the Newspaper Preservation Act." See text, p. 672.

Under the act, the appeals court held in the Seattle case, a JOA applicant should be analyzed as a "free-standing entity," although a "failing newspaper" achieved by "creative bookkeeping" would not be tolerated.

Finally, the appeals court agreed with the district court that no violation of the First Amendment right of smaller newspapers in the Seattle area was found, although the court found the allegation "imaginative."

---

COMMITTEE FOR AN INDEPENDENT P-I v. HEARST CORP.

9 MED.L.RPTR. 1489, 704 F.2D 467 (9TH CIR. 1983)

ANDERSON, J.:

This action presents issues of first impression concerning the scope and operation of the Newspaper Preservation Act. This act permits competing newspapers that meet certain qualifications to enter into joint arrangements which otherwise would be violative of the antitrust laws. In a memorandum opinion, the district court overturned the Attorney General's action approving a joint operating agreement proposed between the Seattle Post-Intelligencer and the Seattle Times. We reverse and reinstate the attorney general's decision.

* * *

There are four substantive issues presented by this action. First, what role, if any, is proof of interested third-party purchasers to play in the determination that a newspaper is in probable danger of financial failure? Second, must it be shown that the failing newspaper would probably close if the proposed joint operating agreement is not allowed? Third, must the Attorney General determine that the proposed JOA is not unnecessarily competitive and that it would not impair the editorial voices of smaller newspapers in the affected market? Fourth, is the Newspaper Preservation Act unconstitutional under the first amendment?

* * *

We agree with the district court to the extent it held that alternatives to a JOA are relevant to the determination that a newspaper qualifies under the Act. We find, however, that Hearst met its burden of showing that the alleged alternatives did not offer a solution to the P-I's difficulties.

We do not find the dispute concerning Finding of Fact 158 crucial to our resolution of the buyer issue. On the one hand, we agree with the Attorney General's argument that the evidence did not require him to adopt Finding of Fact 158.<sup>3</sup> While the evidence showed that six individuals or entities inquired into the possible sale of the P-I, it did not show that the P-I could in all probability be sold to a buyer who would continue its operation as an independent newspaper. The "inquiries" were just that: they were not offers. We recognize that Hearst responded to most of these inquiries with the simple statement that the "P-I was not for sale." Hearst's failure to offer the paper for sale and to favorably respond to such inquiries

---

3. Finding of fact 158 provides:

Considering that the Post-Intelligencer is not, and has not been for sale, and that all inquiries regarding possible purchase have been rebuffed by The Hearst Corporation with statements to that effect, and that responsible prospective purchasers nevertheless continue to appear and express an interest in buying the Post-Intelligencer, it must be concluded that the Post-Intelligencer could in all probability be sold at fair market value to a person or firm who could, and would, continue it in operation as an independent metropolitan daily.

does not, however, compel the conclusion made by the ALJ in Finding of Fact 158.<sup>6</sup>

Our affirmance of the Attorney General on the Finding of Fact 158 issue does not, as he and Hearst seem to argue, end our analysis. The facts are undisputed that purchase inquiries did occur and that Hearst did not cultivate these inquiries. See Findings of Fact 156 and 157. A close reading of the district court's decision shows that it was premised on these underlying facts and not simply on Finding of Fact 158. While we disagree with the district court's conclusion that an attempt to sell the paper is necessary to prove no reasonable alternatives to the JOA exist, we do agree that reasonable alternatives to a JOA are relevant to our analysis.

The starting point for our analysis must begin with the Congressional intent to repudiate Citizen Publishing's application of the failing company defense. We believe that Congress intended a total rejection of the failing company defense as used in Citizen Publishing, including the requirement that the applicant attempt to sell the newspaper. [Citations omitted.] The Federal Trade Commission opposed the Act because, among other reasons, it did not require the "search for an available purchaser." * * * Holding that there is no per se sale requirement does not mean, however, that proof of interested purchasers is irrelevant.

The district court agreed that Hearst need not have attempted to sell the paper. But the court held that without such an attempt, Hearst had failed to carry its burden of proving that no reasonable alternatives to the JOA were available. The court's determination that reasonable alternatives must be explored was based on the recommended decision of Administrative Law Judge Donald Moore in a prior application under the Newspaper Preservation Act involving the Cincinnati Post. Dept. of Justice Docket No. 4303244 (1979). * * * ALJ Moore recognized that the significance of evidence of prospective buyers was not clearly set forth in the Act's legislative history. * * * He believed, however, that Congress did intend the "probable danger of financial failure standard" to be interpreted with reference to the Bank Merger Act and the gloss put upon it by the Supreme Court in United States v. Third National Bank, 390 U.S. 171 (1967). * * *

Based on Third National Bank, ALJ Moore fashioned the following test to judge whether a newspaper qualifies as failing under the Act:

Accordingly, an applicant which has not sought or considered a noncompeting buyer must establish that it would be futile to require attempts to sell, either because of an unavailability of qualified purchasers or because it is unlikely that the paper's condition would be materially improved by the infusion of new ownership and new management.

* * *

Both the Attorney General and Hearst argue against Judge Moore's analysis. Specifically, they maintain that the Act utilizes a purely intrinsic economic test; alternatives in general and the presence of interested purchasers in particular are relevant, if at all, only to the extent they establish the newspaper operation is not probably failing. They contend primarily that ALJ Moore's analysis need not be considered because it was not expressly adopted by then Attorney General Civiletti. It is true that the Civiletti decision adopted only those conclusions of law necessary to the determination that the

6. Our review on this point is narrow: Was it proper to reject Finding of Fact 158? We will discuss in more detail below the ramifications of Hearst's failure to hold the paper up for sale and its rebuff of potential buyers. For now, we should note that the requirement of attempting to sell the financially distressed company was one of the Citizen Publishing requirements rejected by the Newspaper Preservation Act.

Cincinnati Post was a failing newspaper. Just what portions of Judge Moore's recommendations were necessary to his approval of the JOA is not easily answered. Nonetheless, Judge Moore presents a reasonable construction of the somewhat nebulous statements in the legislative history. While we do not adopt in whole the test he utilized, we nevertheless find that his analysis of the failing newspaper standard provides a sound foundation for our interpretation of the Act. And, as will be discussed below, our interpretation is not much different, if at all, than that proffered by the Attorney General.

* * *

The act should receive a commonsense construction. The probable danger standard is, by the plain meaning of its words, primarily an economic standard: Is the newspaper suffering losses which more than likely cannot be reversed? The existence of interested buyers may be relevant to this determination. Also, poor management practices such as concerned the Supreme Court in Third National Bank may show that, with managerial improvement, the paper's economic problems can be overcome. We noted earlier in this discussion that the Attorney General and Hearst conceded that interested purchasers may be relevant to the determination a newspaper is failing. In particular, the Attorney General does not argue strongly against either ALJ Moore's or the district court's analysis. Significantly, the Attorney General's order approving the JOA application stated that "evidence of purchaser offers or negotiations may be pertinent in assessing the financial conditions and prospects of the allegedly failing newspaper." * * * The pertinence of interested purchasers, as the Attorney General apparently concedes, may require a JOA applicant to prove that the "new ownership and management could not convert the [paper] into a profitable enterprise without resort to a joint operating arrangement." * * * The interpretation of the act is not burdensome. Its primary effect is to prevent newspapers from allowing or encouraging financial difficulties in the hope of reaping long-term financial gains through a JOA. A JOA applicant should not be allowed to engage in poor business practices or maintain inept personnel in anticipation that it may later qualify for an antitrust exemption in the future. * * * In this respect, "alternatives" to a JOA are relevant to both the causes of a newspaper's financial decline and its future prospects.

Our discussion is in substantial agreement with the district court's opinion. We do not agree, however, that the facts are insufficient to support the Attorney General's order. The critical question is whether it was shown that the P-I's financial condition was such that the new management might be successful in reversing the P-I's difficulties. There is sufficient evidence in the record supporting a negative answer.

ALJ Hanscom made detailed findings on the condition of the P-I and the Seattle newspaper market. He found the P-I had lost over $14,000,000 since 1969, * * * and that the P-I was in a "downward spiral." * * * The ALJ also rejected the argument that Hearst had mismanaged the P-I. Instead, he found the P-I management had acted competently and reasonably in an effort to return the newspaper to profitability. * * * Judge Hanscom also explored numerous positive prospects and possible remedial measures proposed by the intervenors in their effort to show the P-I can be returned to profitability. He rejects them as being "ungrounded in reality." * * * Based on these findings, we believe there is ample support in the record for the Attorney General's * * * [view]:

Although some of the witnesses in this proceeding were critical of the handling of the Post-Intelligencer, the evidence does not establish that new management would be any more successful than Hearst and current management of the Post-Intelligencer in returning it to profitability

Despite [this], the district court held that Hearst had not sustained its burden of proving new management could not succeed in turning the P-I around, apparently because Hearst did not respond favorably to purchase inquiries. In light of the existence of substantial evidence in support of [the Attorney General's view] this was in error. In the absence of a showing that there is a likelihood new management would succeed, Hearst's failure to consider purchase inquiries lost importance. We therefore reverse the district court's holding.

* * *

As an alternative ground for overturning the approval of the Post-Intelligencer/Times joint operating agreement, the Committee contends that the Attorney General failed to interpret the Act to require proof the P-I would be closed if the JOA application were disapproved. The district court held for defendants on this issue. It found it sufficient the Attorney General concluded that, but for the ownership of Hearst, the P-I would probably be closed. We agree.

For purposes of this issue, we accept the Committee's assertion that Hearst never considered closing the P-I, even should the joint operating agreement not be allowed. Our focus, however, is on other language in the failing newspaper definition not yet discussed. A newspaper is defined as failing if it is in probable danger of financial failure "regardless of its ownership or affiliations." 15 U.S.C. § 1802(5). This language supports the ALJ's and the Attorney General's conclusion that the financial strength of Hearst need not be considered in determining whether the P-I is failing. We therefore agree with the district court's resolution of this issue: substantial evidence establishes that the P-I is in dire financial trouble and, without the backing of Hearst, it would probably close.

We do not dispute the Committee's assertion that a primary intent of the Newspaper Preservation Act was to promote the diversity of editorial voices among newspapers. Congress was of the opinion that unique economic forces operate in the newspaper industry, forces which caused the decline and closure of numerous newspapers since the turn of the century. * * In order to maintain editorial diversity, it is beyond question that the purpose of the act is to prevent the closure of the ailing newspaper. * * * We note, however, that Congress was just as concerned with the loss of an independent editorial voice through a merger, as with an actual closure of a newspaper.

* * *

We do not accept Hearst's argument that requiring proof of probable closure is the same as requiring the paper be on the brink of collapse, an element of the "failing company" defense which was clearly repudiated by the Newspaper Preservation Act. We adhere to our belief that Congress intended the phrase "probable danger of failure" to mean a probability that the paper would be closed and an editorial voice lost. We do not agree, however, with the Committee's assertion that proof of probable closure is a per se rule applicable to all JOA applications. Our conclusion that Congress intended that there be a showing the newspaper will likely close must be interpreted in light of the language that a newspaper's failing status should be determined without regard to its ownership or affiliations.

We believe the intent of the "regardless of ownership" language is quite clear. It means simply that the ailing newspaper should be analyzed as a free-standing entity, as if it were not owned by a corporate parent. The legislative history does not contradict the plain meaning of this language. * * *

[G]enerally, ownership is not to be a factor in considering whether a newspaper is failing; an exception to the general rule is that ownership may be analyzed to ensure the owner has not created a failing company through creative bookkeeping. The Committee apparently does not dispute that the P-I as a separate entity is in financial trouble. It instead asserts that, based on an "incremental analysis," Hearst is receiving net benefits from the P-I's financial problems for tax and other reasons. As the Attorney General held, these arguable benefits to Hearst do not counter that the P-I, as a separate entity, is in severe financial trouble and would likely close if not owned by Hearst. We affirm the district court on this issue.

* * *

The Committee also argues that the order approving the JOA must be overturned because the Attorney General did not consider the potential injury to other newspapers in the market and did not limit the terms of the JOA to the least anticompetitive approach possible. The argument is that these conditions are implied in the requirement that the Attorney General find that the JOA "effectuate[s] the policy and purpose of the Act." The district court held against the Committee on this issue. For the following reasons, we affirm.

The policy of the act is stated in its first section. That policy is to maintain editorial and reportorial independence among newspapers through the preservation of newspaper publication in areas "where a joint operating agreement has been heretofore entered into because of economic distress or is hereafter effected in accordance with the provisions of this chapter." 15 U.S.C. § 1801. This declaration and the legislative history compel the conclusion that the act itself is a policy determination that the preservation of editorial diversity through joint operating agreements outweighs any potentially anticompetitive effects this antitrust exemption might cause. Congress struck the balance in favor of the act notwithstanding opposition that decried the potential harm to smaller, usually suburban newspapers competing in the market area. As stated in the House Report: "Although commercial competition may have been affected to some extent by these arrangements, they have achieved the more important objective of preserving separate editorial voices." * * *

The act itself contains an important safeguard which prevents the parties to a JOA from engaging in any conduct which would violate the antitrust laws if done by a single entity. 15 U.S.C. § 1803(c). As explained in the Senate Report, this section is designed "to protect the competitive position of newspapers which share the market with a joint operating arrangement." * * *

We conclude that the district court correctly rejected the Committee's claims on this issue. Congress recognized that the approval of a JOA may have anticompetitive ramifications. This was a national policy choice Congress was free to make. It believed those possibly harmful effects were outweighed by other considerations and sufficiently alleviated by the requirements of the act. The JOA is not inconsistent with the act.

* * *

The Committee also argues the Newspaper Preservation Act as a whole is invalid by virtue of the first amendment. The challenge is two-pronged: first, that the act is invalid as applied because approval of the JOA would impair the first amendment rights of smaller newspapers in the market; second, that the act is invalid on its face as an overbroad and vague delegation of power in an area affecting first amendment rights. Although these arguments are imaginative, they lack substantial merit.

The district court rejected the claim that the act is unconstitutional as applied, basing its decision largely on two district court decisions dealing with the same argument. Bay Guardian v. Chronicle Publishing Co., 344 F.Supp. 1155 (N.D.Cal. 1972); City and County of Honolulu v. Hawaii Newspaper Agency, Inc., 7 Media L.Rep. 2495 (D.Hawaii 1981). We agree with the district court's rejection of the Committee's assertion that these cases are distinguishable because the plaintiffs there were challenging preexisting joint operating agreements. In either situation, the courts are faced with the claim that this antitrust exemption may cause economic injury to smaller newspapers, which might lessen circulation, which in turn affects the "breadth" of one's freedom of press.

It is obvious that the Newspaper Preservation Act's antitrust exemption will not affect the content of speech of these smaller newspapers. The act is an economic regulation which has the intent of promoting and aiding the press. At most, the act may affect the number of "readers" a newspaper has. But that the act may have such an effect is not different, in our view, than any other economic regulation of the newspaper industry. Associated Press v. NLRB, 301 U.S. 103, * * * (1937); Mabee v. White Plains Publishing Co., 327 U.S. 178, 184 (1946); Oklahoma Press Publishing Co. v. Walling, 327 U.S. 186, * * * (1946). Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233 (1935). * * *

Whether or not the Newspaper Preservation Act's limited antitrust exemption should be considered a license, as the Committee argues, we do not find first amendment rights implicated. While we recognize the importance of the antitrust laws in our economic system, one cannot lose sight that these laws are the creation of Congress. They are not mandated by the first amendment or anywhere else in the Constitution. What Congress has passed, it may repeal. Apparently, the Committee's actual dissatisfaction with the act is based on its belief that certain newspapers are treated differently, i.e., preferentially. But there is no question that other newspapers in the Seattle area, large or small, may participate in a joint operating agreement if they qualify.

Finally, we see no "vague and overbroad" delegation of power to the Attorney General. First of all, as discussed above, we fail to see any clearly defined first amendment injury. Secondly, our interpretation of the Act rejects the argument that it is overly vague. The Attorney General must base his approval of a proposed JOA on the requirements in the act as we have interpreted them in this opinion. Nothing more definite is required. * *

* * *

We agree with the district court to the extent it held that the alternatives to a joint operating agreement, including sale to a capable noncompeting buyer, are relevant to the determination that a newspaper qualifies for an antitrust exemption under the Newspaper Preservation Act. It is evident, however, that the Times Company and Hearst sufficiently negated the possibility that any such alternatives were available in this case. We reverse the district court for that reason.

The other arguments in support of overturning the Attorney General's approval of the Post-Intelligencer's joint operating agreement are better placed before Congress. The Newspaper Preservation Act was not intended to create antitrust immunities for any newspapers which simply allege they are having difficulties. However, neither does it contain an array of implied conditions which in effect would reinstate the Citizen Publishing standards. Simply put, we will not emasculate the Act in the guise of narrowly construing it. We therefore affirm the district court on the issues raised by the Committee's cross-appeal.

* * *

The decision of the district court is affirmed in part and reversed in part.

---

COMMENT

Where mergers are concerned, no market may be too small or inconsequential to escape notice of the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice. In United States v. Tribune Co., No. 82-260 (M.D.Fla. 1982), the Department sued to block the acquisition of several shoppers and weekly newspapers by owners of the Orlando Sentinel because the merger would have reduced competition in the "local print advertising" submarket.

As in the Times-Mirror case, the competition in Orlando was between newspapers in different layers: in the above case, metropolitans v. shoppers. It could also be shoppers v. weeklies or suburbans, suburbans v. metropolitans, and in Times-Mirror, regionals v. locals. Interlayer competition may be the only kind of newspaper competition left to preserve. In the Seattle case the court saw no threat to weekly and suburban newspapers in keeping alive a metropolitan daily that was about to die from natural economic causes. Although courts have traditionally been hostile to mergers between competing newspapers, they may not have discerned as clearly as the Antitrust Division the competition for advertising between interlayer publications.

Local media markets obviously can be defined narrowly in terms of daily newspaper competition, as rare as that is becoming, or in terms of all print media, or broadly to include all modes of communication, newspapers, radio and television, cable, and electronic systems. In the Bay Guardian case, supra, it was argued that the JOA in San Francisco made it impossible for the competitive newspaper to get advertisers and therefore violated press freedom. The court disagreed, seeing the Newspaper Preservation Act as "a selective repeal of the antitrust laws" designed to preserve a particular daily newspaper voice.

Courts have not yet confronted the broader question of group ownership in a national arena, and it will be difficult for them to do so. Chains exert little influence over national advertisers because something like 85 percent of their advertising is local, and national advertisers have alternative media to go to anyway.

Antitrust Activities in Other Areas of Mass Communication

Motion Pictures

In spite of antitrust assaults on the motion picture business since the twenties, the industry remains highly oligopolistic. What it might have become without antitrust intervention can only be imagined. The Sherman Act was first applied to the movies in Binderup v. Pathe Exchange, Inc., 263 U.S. 291 (1923), in order to free theater owners from having to show pictures foisted on them by a conspiracy of distributors. And in Paramount Famous Lasky Corp. v. United States, 282 U.S. 30 (1930), a take-it-or-get-nothing contract was held anticompetitive.

Over the years, independent exhibitors were protected from various anticompetitive practices of distributors<sup>80</sup> and large theater circuits,<sup>81</sup> whether intentional or not.<sup>82</sup>

---

80. United States v. First National Pictures, Inc., 282 U.S. 44 (1930).

81. Interstate Circuit v. United States, 306 U.S. 208 (1939).

82. United States v. Griffith, 334 U.S. 100 (1948).

United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., 323 U.S. 173 (1944), was an important divestiture case. Crescent, a monopoly theater chain in many towns, pressured distributors to give it monopoly rights in communities where it had competition. The Supreme Court upheld an order to divest and required the company to demonstrate that it would not restrain trade with any of its future acquisitions. Theater chains and distributors were also prohibited from conspiring to concentrate the movie market in Schine Chain Theatres, Inc. v. United States, 334 U.S. 110 (1948). In yet another case, independent exhibitors were unable to show certain producers' films until they had been shown in studio-owned theaters. The Court in Bigelow v. RKO Radio Pictures, Inc., 327 U.S. 251 (1946), condemned such producer-distributor-exhibitor combines.

In a very significant case, United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., 334 U.S. 131 (1948), major film studios were required to divest their theaters, "the most significant change in the structure of a mass medium to be achieved to date under the antitrust laws."<sup>83</sup>

Finally in United States v. Loew's, Inc., 371 U.S. 38 (1962), the Court considered the legality of block booking copyrighted motion pictures for television use. No conspiracy was alleged among defendants, but the courts challenged the manner in which each defendant had marketed its product. Television stations were required to sign up for potboiler films in order to get the classics. Relying on Paramount Pictures, the Supreme Court held this form of tying to be violation of the Sherman Act.

Feature Syndicates

A federal district court in United States v. Chicago Tribune-New York News Syndi- cate, Inc., 309 F.Supp. 1301 (S.D.N.Y.1970), held "in unreasonable restraint of trade" feature syndicate contracts with newspapers that prohibited other newspapers within an area surrounding the contracting newspaper's city of publication from subscribing to the features.

Cable

Municipalities may be liable under the antitrust laws for their actions in granting cable television (CATV) franchises. In Community Communications Co., Inc. v. City of Boulder, 455 U.S. 40 (1982), the Court held that a Boulder, Colorado ordinance, prohibiting further expansion by an in-place cable company until a model CATV ordinance had been drafted, could not be exempt from antitrust scrutiny "unless it constitutes the action of the State of Colorado itself in its sovereign capacity, or unless it constitutes municipal action in furtherance or implementation of clearly articulated and affirmatively expressed state policy." States enjoy immunity from antitrust citations in the franchising process.

Boulder's "home-rule" status under Colorado law didn't save it. Citing Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341 (1943), the Court characterized the federal system as a "dual system" of government with no place for "sovereign cities." Colorado had not explicitly authorized Boulder to engage in what could be construed as an anticompetitive practice, i.e., the granting of an exclusive franchise at some future time. The Boulder case reinforced precedents holding municipalities to be significantly less well protected from antitrust laws than are states.

In Affiliated Capital Corp. v. City of Houston, 519 F.Supp. 991 (S.D.Tex.1981), 83. Lee, Antitrust Enforcement, Freedom of the Press, and the "Open Market": The Supreme Court on the Structure and Conduct of Mass Media, 32 Vanderbilt L.Rev. 1249 (1979).

five CATV companies met with the city to agree on territories for which each would bid. Plaintiff was dealt out of what it and a jury saw as a conspiracy. But because the court found no evidence of harm to Affiliated Capital, defendants were granted judgment notwithstanding the jury verdict.

Granting that CATV may be a natural monopoly and that the only competition may occur in the franchising process, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that "the conspiracy charged in this case is the classic horizontal territorial restraint for which the per se rule was designed." (1983-1 Trade Cas. ¶ 65,281.) Since territorial agreements constituted a Sherman Act violation, the appeals court reversed the lower court and reinstated the jury's verdict of $2,100,000 in damages to plaintiff.

In the future, cable systems will have to be alert to tying and price-fixing complaints, requests for access from program and advertising competitors, and to antitrust problems related to program distribution and pricing, especially that of distributors affiliated with multiple system operators.

Vertical integration of program suppliers and cable operators will trigger antitrust action, especially where the local cable company refuses to deal with unaffiliated programmers or suppliers.

When four movie producer/distributors, Columbia, Universal, Paramount, and Twentieth Century-Fox, backed by Getty Oil, and calling themselves "Premiere," proposed a pay movie program service, a federal district court held the plan to be an attempt at price fixing and an unlawful group boycott. Together the four controlled 50 percent of new, yet to be shown on television motion pictures for which they would have granted exclusive CATV rights after their movie theater runs. In the "Premiere" case, as it came to be called, United States v. Columbia Pictures Industries, Inc., 507 F.Supp. 412 (S.D.N.Y. 1980), the court found a reasonable likelihood that the plan would constitute price fixing and an unlawful boycott of other programming services, violations of the Sherman Act. The project was abandoned.

New Technologies

For all new technologies, cable included, market definitions for antitrust purposes are in flux. Geographic lines are particularly vague and flexible with regard to multipoint distribution services (MDS) and direct broadcast satellites (DBS). Michael Botein, writing in the New York Law School Law Review, contemplates tying agreements, e.g., DBS operators may attempt to tie use of their facilities to the purchase of their equipment and programs; exclusive dealing agreements, e.g., operators, exploiting a scarcity of channels, might require programmers to buy all of their transmission service from a single DBS source; and monopolist's refusal to deal, e.g., a DBS operator might refuse to sell time to a programmer who may also have purchased time from a subscription television (STV) station. Vertical integration and merger activities will inevitably stimulate Section 7 Clayton Act responses.<sup>84</sup>

Broadcasting

In the fifties, the Federal Communication Commission permitted the exchange of an NBC station in Cleveland for a Westinghouse station in Philadelphia. The Justice Department learned that NBC and its parent company RCA had conspired to force the exchange in order to upgrade their holdings. When the government sought review, a district court dismissed on grounds that FCC approval precluded government action. On appeal, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the FCC did not have authority to decide antitrust issues, although it could consider antitrust behavior relative to antitrust policy when measuring a broadcaster's conformance to the public interest.<sup>85</sup>

84. Botein, Jurisdictional and Antitrust Considerations in the Regulation of the New Communication Technologies, 25 NY Law School L.Rev. 863 (1980).

Other antitrust questions involving broadcasters are discussed in this text, Chapter IX.

Advertising

1. Forced Combination Rates and Refusals to Deal. A unit advertising rate compelling advertisers to use both a monopoly newspaper and an affiliated broadcast station was held unlawful in Kansas City Star Co. v. United States, 240 F.2d 643 (8th Cir. 1957), cert.den., 354 U.S. 923. Market dominance was blatantly evident in the fact that the Star, delivered to 96 percent of all homes in the Kansas City metropolitan area, accounted for 94 percent of all available advertising revenues. The newspaper used its dominance to discourage competition, or what was left of it. In addition to threatening advertisers with rejection of their ads if they advertised in competitive publications, or burying the ads of those who did, the Star, for example, threatened to drop news coverage of a baseball player whose partner in a florist shop advertised in a competitive paper. The Star owned WDAF-TV, the only television station in the city at that time. Advertisers could not buy television time unless they advertised in the Star. See also Syracuse Broadcasting Corp. v. Newhouse, 236 F.2d 522 (2d Cir. 1956).

The holding in the Star case was consistent with the Supreme Court's ruling in Lorain Journal Co. v. United States, 342 U.S. 143 (1951). A publisher's practice of refusing to accept advertising from local businesses which advertised in an independent radio station, WEOL, was held by Justice Harold Burton, writing for the Court, to constitute an attempt to monopolize interstate commerce in violation of the Sherman Act. The radio station derived 16 percent of its advertising income from outside of Ohio. The Lorain Journal, on the other hand, reached 99 percent of all families in the city and enjoyed a virtual monopoly in mass dissemination of news and advertising. Loss of local advertising jeopardized the very existence of the radio station. The publisher claimed the right as a private business to select its customers and refuse advertising.

"The right claimed by the publisher," said Burton, "is neither absolute nor exempt from regulation. Its exercise as a purposeful means of monopolizing interstate commerce is prohibited by the Sherman Act. The operator of the radio station, equally with the publisher of the newspaper, is entitled to the protection of the act." The antitrust laws did not violate freedom of the press because they applied to all.

Earlier, the Mansfield Journal, jointly owned with the Lorain Journal, was denied a license to construct AM and FM radio stations in Mansfield, Ohio, because it had engaged in the same illegal practice. The D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the Federal Communications Commission in Mansfield Journal Co. v. FCC, 180 F.2d 28 (D.C.Cir.1950).

Combination rates for morning and afternoon papers that simply reflect a reduced cost of publication in more than one edition were legally acceptable in The News, Inc. v. Lindsay Newspapers, Inc., 85. United States v. Radio Corp. of America, 358 U.S. 334 (1959).

1962 Trade Cas. (CCH) ¶ 70,398 (S.D.Fla. 1962).

An agreement between a newspaper and an advertiser not to sell space to that advertiser's competitor is a Sherman Act violation, although proof of such a conspiracy may be difficult.<sup>86</sup>

Unilateral refusals to deal, if they look like an attempt to maintain a monopoly, violate the Sherman Act, as well as Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, although courts are divided on whether the latter is germane.

In Homefinders of America, Inc. v. Providence Journal Co., 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1018, 621 F.2d 441 (1st Cir.1980), text, pp. 579, 611, a newspaper found it risky to refuse even misleading advertising, although the court concluded that not even a monopoly newspaper could be ordered to publish advertising against its will. And in Newspaper Printing v. Galbreath, 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1065, 580 S.W.2d 777 (Tenn.1979), it was held that a newspaper's refusal to publish an ad that contained abbreviations did not constitute "predatory pricing or practice." Nor did it violate the First Amendment since newspapers, even where they enjoy monopolies in their areas of publication, have a right either to refuse publication of ads or to condition them on compliance with stated company rules.

First Amendment questions were raised, however, when in Home Placement Service, Inc. v. Providence Journal Co., 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1881, 682 F.2d 274 (1st Cir. 1982), a court held that a newspaper could not reject advertising that had not been found deceptive. Was the court dictating a newspaper's content in conflict with Tornillo, see text, p. 584?<sup>87</sup> In conflict with the First Amendment? (Homefinders and Home Placement are discussed from an access point of view in this text, p. 578ff.)

2. Tying. Time-Picayune Publishing Co. v. United States, 345 U.S. 594 (1953), held that a unit ad rate for A.M. (Times-Picayune) and P.M. (States) newspapers did not constitute an unlawful tying arrangement because morning and afternoon papers were not separate and distinct products. An independent competitive newspaper, the New Orleans Item, was later purchased by Times-Picayune. Although that holding has not been expressly overruled, later cases cast doubt on it,<sup>88</sup> and at least one authority has called it defective.<sup>89</sup>

Noncoercive tie-ins are legal if two newspapers are separately available to an advertiser on a basis as favorable as the tie-in arrangement. In United States v. Wichita Eagle Publishing Co., 1959 Trade Cas. (CCH) ¶ 69,400 (D.Kan.1959), a newspaper was allowed to offer substantial discounts, if the combination was voluntary. Cost savings to an advertiser should reflect savings in production costs.

3. Volume Discounts. In Times Mirror Co., FTC Docket No. 9103 (1977), the Commission challenged the validity of annual volume discounts for retail display advertising under the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13 (1976) and Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, but courts have disagreed on this interpretation.<sup>90</sup> In 1981, however, the Times-Mirror and the FTC entered into a provisional consent

86. Oppenheim & Shields, Newspapers and the Antitrust Laws, § 38 (1981).

87. See also, Person v. New York Post Corp., 427 F.Supp. 1297 (E.D.N.Y.1977).

88. Paul v. Pulitzer Publishing Co., 1974-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) ¶ 75,116 (E.D.Mo.1974); Buffalo Courier-Express, Inc. v. Buffalo Evening News, Inc., 441 F.Supp. 628 (W.D.N.Y.1977), reversed on other grounds 601 F.2d 48 (2d Cir. 1979).

89. Areeda and Turner, Antitrust Law ¶ 733e, at 260, n. 9 (1978).

90. Times-Mirror Co. v. FTC, 1979-2 Trade Cas. ¶ 62,756 (C.D.Cal.1979).

decree. Small advertisers in public comments said that they were not hurt competitively by the volume discount rates and that they preferred to preserve their own pricing flexibility. On July 8, 1982, the FTC withdrew its provisional consent decree and dismissed complaints against the Times-Mirror.

4. Rate Differential for National and Retail Advertising. In Motors, Inc. v. Times-Mirror Co., 162 Cal.Rptr. 543 (1980), such a differential was challenged as an unfair business practice under the California Civil Code. The newspaper was required to justify the higher rate for national advertisers and their wholesalers.

5. Conscious Parallelism. In Ambook Enterprises v. Time, Inc., 612 F.2d 604 (2d Cir. 1979), cert. dismissed 448 U.S. 914 (1980), a court considered the 15 percent discount off the rate card that the media have traditionally allowed ad agencies. The alleged conspiracy appeared to be of no apparent benefit to the media but reflected a reluctance to depart from a tested way of selling advertising. An inference of an unlawful agreement between the New York Times and Time, Inc. and their ad agency can be drawn from the case.

6. Zoned Editions. Community newspapers and shoppers have used the antitrust laws to challenge the competitive response of daily newspapers through zoned editions, without definitive guidelines being set down by the courts. The intent of the dominant daily newspaper, however, will be carefully scrutinized, and tying arrangements of any kind ought to be avoided. Ad rates for zoned editions ought to pay the full costs of these special sections and in time show a profit.<sup>91</sup> Predatory pricing and tying must be avoided as well as anything suggesting a desire to damage a suburban competitor. Similarly, shoppers generated by the dominant newspaper ought to show a profit if they are to avoid suspicions of a predatory monopolistic intent. A court said in Greenville Publishing Co. v. Daily Reflector, Inc., 496 F.2d 391 (4th Cir. 1974): "Proof that the Shopper's Guide is not paying its own way would support an inference that the defendants' pricing policies were designed to drive the Advocate out of the market."<sup>91</sup>

7. Blanketing. Blanketing, or giving free copies to everyone, should not last longer than a good promotional campaign would dictate. Although firm rules have not been established, generally a newspaper with monopoly power may not be permitted to do things that a smaller and weaker competitor might do with impunity. Where the purpose and effect is to drive a weaker competitor out of the market, a dominant newspaper may be in trouble.<sup>92</sup>

A dominant newspaper must be very careful in its narrowly defined market not to show an intent, explicitly or implicitly, to monopolize, especially in the setting of its advertising rates. They must be high enough to deny an inference of anticompetitive pricing. Combination rates must avoid tying and monopolistic effects. Competitive necessities and cost saving should underlie ad rate differentials.

Distribution

Independent distributors who contract with a newspaper normally charge higher subscription prices than the price set by 91. Paul v. Pulitzer Publishing Co., 1974-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) ¶ 75,116 (E.D.Mo.1974).

92. Morning Pioneer, Inc. v. Bismarck Tribune, 342 F.Supp. 1138 (D.N.D.1972), affirmed 493 F.2d 383 (8th Cir. 1974), cert.den. 419 U.S. 836.

the newspaper itself. They operate in semimonopolistic circulation areas and have no newspaper incomes beyond their sales. Newspapers may persuade distributors to lower their prices in order to sustain advertising revenue and increase circulation, but they may not coerce by dictating the price at which independent contractors resell the paper. Such action would be vertical price fixing in violation of the Sherman Act.

In Albrecht v. The Herald Co., 390 U.S. 145 (1968), the Supreme Court held that newspapers could not compel distributors to sell at a suggested maximum resale price. That rule was reinforced in Auburn News Co. v. Providence Journal Co., 659 F.2d 273 (1st Cir. 1981). No threats, surveillance, or economic sanctions would be tolerated.

Newspapers may, however, within reason, impose territories or distribution monopolies on distributors, if, in doing so, they do not exercise control over prices.<sup>93</sup>

In Newberry v. Washington Post Co., 438 F.Supp. 470 (D.D.C.1977), newspaper dealers brought action against the Post under the Sherman Act, the Robinson-Patman Act, and the Clayton Act. The court held that: 1) territorial sales restrictions placed on home sales dealers did not violate the antitrust laws; 2) restrictions placed on home sale dealers against sales to single-copy outlets such as hotels, newsstands, and street vending machines did not violate antitrust laws; 3) evidence did not show that dealers were coerced into charging prices established by the Post; 4) differences in prices charged by the newspaper to various home sales and street sales dealers did not violate the Robinson-Patman Act; but 5) evidence that, when one dealer raised the price which he charged to his customers, the newspaper raised the price which it charged to that dealer by a corresponding amount did violate the antitrust laws.

Summary

Conrad Shumadine, commenting on his comprehensive review of antitrust law prepared for the Practising Law Institute,<sup>94</sup> noted that juries in antitrust cases seldom understand the issues, so they operate on the principle of "good guys v. bad guys." The question of intent being paramount in antitrust, media managers should avoid putting anything on paper that suggests an intent to monopolize. Zoned editions or shoppers should contain news. Forced combination rates are dangerous. And Antitrust Compliance Rules, that everyone in the organization understands and that will help managers recognize basic antitrust problems, are a business necessity.

Failure to comply with antitrust laws can have grievous consequences even for the small- or medium-sized broadcaster or publisher. Criminal or civil actions may be brought by the Justice Department and civil actions by the Federal Trade Commission. State civil actions under state antitrust laws are also possible.

THE MEDIA AND THE LABOR LAWS

A Free Press and the Journalist's Right to Collective Bargaining

93. See Continental TV v. GTE Sylvania, Inc., 433 U.S. 36 (1977).

94. Shumadine, Ives and Kelley, Antitrust and the Media, Communications Law 1982, New York: Practising Law Institute, pp. 287-448.

ASSOCIATED PRESS v.
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

301 U.S. 103, 57 S.Ct. 650,
81 L.ED. 953 (1937).

[EDITORIAL NOTE

The Supreme Court held that § 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, which gives employees the right to organize or join a labor organization to bargain collectively on their behalf, as applied to newspaper employees does not violate the First Amendment guarantee of freedom of the press or free speech. The regulation of union activity by the NLRB was found to have no relation to the impartial distribution of the news.

Morris Watson, an editorial writer for Associated Press, was fired for engaging in union activity. The American Newspaper Guild, a labor organization, filed a charge with the Board alleging that Watson's discharge was in violation of § 7 of the National Labor Relations Act (29 U.S.C.A. § 157) and that AP had engaged in unfair labor practices contrary to 29 U.S.C.A. § 158(1, 3).

At the outset the Court considered whether the particular labor dispute was in interstate commerce, permitting the application of federal regulation. The Court reasoned that the jurisdiction of the NLRB reached disputes involving editorial employees on the basis that, " * * * it is obvious that strikes or labor disputes amongst this class of employees would have as direct an effect upon the activities of [AP] as similar disturbances amongst those who operate the teletype machines or as a strike amongst the employees of telegraph lines over which [AP's] messages travel."

AP argued that its function was to report the news without bias and that in order to perform that function " * * * it must have absolute and unrestricted freedom to employ and to discharge those who, like Watson, edit the news, that there must not be the slightest opportunity for bias or prejudice personally entertained by an editorial employee to color or distort what he writes. * * * " And that " * * * any regulation protective of union activities, or the right collectively to bargain on the part of such employees, is necessarily an invalid invasion of the freedom of the press."

In rejecting AP's argument the Court noted that AP " * * * did not assert and does not now claim that he [Watson] had shown bias in the past. It does not claim that by reason of his connection with the union he will be likely, as [AP] honestly believes, to show bias in the future."

The Court, per Justice ROBERTS, went on to fashion a standard for judging an employer's performance under the act.]

* * * The act does not compel [AP] to employ any one; it does not require that [AP] retain in its employ an incompetent editor or one who fails faithfully to edit the news to reflect the facts without bias or prejudice. The act permits a discharge for any reason other than union activity or agitation for collective bargaining with employees. The restoration of Watson to his former position in no sense guarantees his continuance in petitioner's employ. The [AP] is at liberty, whenever occasion may arise, to exercise its undoubted right to sever his relationship for any cause that seems to it proper save only as a punishment for, or discouragement of, such activities as the act declares permissible.

The business of the Associated Press is not immune from regulation because it is an agency of the press. The publisher of a newspaper has no special immunity from the application of general laws. He has no special privilege to invade the rights and liberties of others. He must answer for libel. He may be punished for contempt of court. He is subject to the anti-trust laws. Like others he must pay equitable and nondiscriminatory taxes on his business. The regulation here in question has no relation whatever to the impartial distribution of news. The order of the Board in nowise circumscribes the full freedom and liberty of the [AP] to publish the news as it desires it published or to enforce policies of its own choosing with respect to the editing and rewriting of news for publication, and the [AP] is free at any time to discharge Watson or any editorial employee who fails to comply with the policies it might adopt.

Justice SUTHERLAND, dissenting.

Justice Van Devanter, Justice McReynolds, Justice Butler, and I think the judgment below should be reversed.

* * *

For many years there has been contention between labor and capital. * * * Such news is not only of great public interest; but an unbiased version of it is of the utmost public concern. To give a group of employers on the one hand, or a labor organization on the other, power of control over such a service is obviously to endanger the fairness and accuracy of the service. Strong sympathy for or strong prejudice against a given cause or the efforts made to advance it has too often led to suppression or coloration of unwelcome facts. It would seem to be an exercise of only reasonable prudence for an association engaged in part in supplying the public with fair and accurate factual information with respect to the contests between labor and capital, to see that those whose activities include that service are free from either extreme sympathy or extreme prejudice one way or the other.

* * *

---

COMMENT

1. AP v. NLRB is the fountainhead of any understanding of the relationship of labor law to the press. The case makes clear that the press is subject to the labor laws just as it is subject to the antitrust laws. For the Court, this is just a corollary of the major premise that the "publisher of a newspaper has no special immunity from the application of the general laws."

2. The continuing importance of Associated Press v. NLRB was stressed in the recent Minneapolis Star decision, text, p. 142, which invalidated a special Minnesota use tax imposed on the cost of paper and ink products consumed in the production of newspapers. Justice O'Connor declared that the AP decision suggested the following:

[A] regulation that singled out the press might place a heavier burden of justification on the [s]tate, and we now conclude that the special problems created by differential treatment do indeed impose such a burden.

Read the Minneapolis Star decision. Did Justice O'Connor make an appropriate interpretation of the AP v. NLRB decision?

3. Apparently it did not occur to the dissenters in AP v. NLRB that, while labor union members who work for AP may be partial to the claims of labor, the ownership of the AP might be equally susceptible to the point of view of capital.

The holding of AP v. NLRB, that journalists have a right to collective bargaining, has significant implications for the legal status of the press generally. AP v. NLRB made clear that freedom of the press is meant to reach other interests and values beyond the freedom of the publisher.

Note that the Court used AP v. NLRB for the proposition that the press is subject to regulation with the proviso that the regulation must not affect the impartial dissemination of news or place a special burden on the press. Do the duties of a rewrite editor and those of an editor with influence on editorial policy have a different effect on the impartial dissemination of the news? The Tenth Circuit said yes in Wichita Eagle & Beacon Publishing Co., Inc. v. NLRB, 480 F.2d 52 (10th Cir. 1973), cert.den. 416 U.S. 982 (1974). The court of appeals, reversing the NLRB, held that editorial writers have the essential characteristics of managerial and confidential employees and are properly excluded from the collective bargaining unit of news department employees:

To hold that a person who was involved in the formulation of editorial content of a newspaper is not aligned with the newspaper's management would come perilously close to infringing upon the newspaper's First Amendment guarantee of freedom of the press.

Referring to AP v. NLRB, the court noted that while including editorial writers in a collective bargaining unit "does not have any relation to the impartial distribution of the news, per se, nor to the newspaper's ability and freedom to publish the news as it desires it published, it does infringe upon the newspaper's freedom to determine the content of its editorial voice in an atmosphere of free discussion and exchange of ideas."

4. Morris Watson was fired for "incompetency" a short time after this case was decided. Do you think the Court invited that result?

The First Amendment and the Question of Whether a Journalist Can Be Required to Join a Union

1. In Buckley v. American Federation of Television and Radio Artists, 496 F.2d 305 (2d Cir. 1974), the court of appeals held that a union shop agreement requiring television commentators to pay union dues as a condition of employment is not an infringement of their First Amendment right of free speech. The court found that a restraint on the right of free speech was not a violation of the First Amendment where there is a proper governmental purpose for imposing that restraint and where the restraint is imposed so as not unwarrantedly to abridge acts normally comprehended within the First Amendment.

William F. Buckley, Jr., and M. Stanton Evans, television and radio commentators expressing a conservative point of view on public issues, brought suit in federal court for a declaratory judgment challenging the constitutionality of § 8(a)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act [29 U.S.C.A. § 158(a)(3)], as it applied to their relations with the American Federation of Television and Radio Artists (AFTRA). The main thrust of their complaint was that this provision of the act allowed AFTRA to require them to join in AFTRA strikes or work stoppages against the television and radio networks and to subject them to union discipline (fines or cancellation of membership) for continuing to broadcast their commentary in the face of AFTRA's orders to strike.

Both Buckley and Evans had joined AFTRA under protest and asserted that their continued membership under these conditions had a chilling effect on their exercise of the First Amendment rights of free press and free speech as commentators.

Against the constitutional rights asserted by plaintiffs, the Court balanced the legislative purpose underlying the "union shop" provision of the act:

* * * Nor is there any abridgement of first amendment rights arising from congressional authorization granting a union the power to collect dues from employees in a "union shop." The congressional purpose in authorizing mandatory union dues is surely a permissible one, for Congress was understandably concerned with minimizing industrial strife and thereby insuring the unimpeded flow of commerce. It was the legislative judgment that these goals are most easily realized if a suitable collective bargaining apparatus exists, and so the national labor laws provide for an exclusive bargaining agent to represent each discrete employee bargaining unit. To enable these agents to fulfill their statutory responsibility to represent all the employees while collectively bargaining with the employer, the statutes permit the levying of mandatory dues on all employees who will reap the benefits of the union's representation of them in the contract negotiations with the employer. * * *

Moreover, we find that the means adopted to achieve this proper purpose of reducing industrial strife are reasonable and do not "unwarrantedly abridge" free speech. The dues here are not flat fees imposed directly on the exercise of a federal right. To the contrary, assuming arguendo that government action is involved here, the dues more logically would constitute the employee's share of the expenses of operating a valid labor regulatory system which serves a substantial public purpose. If there is any burden on [plaintiffs'] free speech it would appear to be no more objectionable than a "nondiscriminatory [form] of general taxation" which can be constitutionally imposed on the communication media.

AFTRA argued that plaintiffs were seeking to be "free riders"—those who enjoy the benefits of the union's negotiating efforts without assuming a corresponding portion of the union's financial burden. The court of appeals specifically rejected AFTRA's reasoning:

The district judge * * * found that [although] the appellees derived some benefit from their memberships in union pension plans, he regarded this as not being substantial enough. We disagree with the district court. There is no rational basis for distinguishing between the degrees of benefit one enjoys as a result of a union's bargaining efforts on his behalf.

2. Buckley and Evans did not attack on constitutional grounds the general application of the National Labor Relations Act to the broadcast industry. The NLRB assumed jurisdiction over labor disputes in broadcasting at an early date. Los Angeles Broadcasting Co., 4 NLRB 443 (1937). The major problem the NLRB faced was in determining whether local stations were engaged in interstate commerce as defined in the act since the NLRB had no jurisdiction if the labor dispute did not involve interstate commerce. See AP v. NLRB, 301 U.S. 103 (1937).

The history of the NLRB's solutions to this problem reflects the growth and development of the broadcast industry. Early cases relied for their rulings on the fact that local stations were in interstate commerce depending upon electricity purchased out of state, FCC licensing, and the fact that the station's signals could be picked up in other states. Los Angeles Broadcasting, supra, KMOX Broadcasting, 10 NLRB 479 (1938). Later the board relied upon such factors as network affiliation subscription to the AP news service, advertising of nationally distributed products, and payment of copyright royalties to ASCAP or Broadcast Music, Inc. (BMI) in New York City or Chicago, all reflecting the national growth of broadcasting with its mostly recorded, rather than live, music. Instead of disputes with performers at the local level, the board was now considering disputes with engineers and technicians. WELL and WELL-FM, 74 NLRB 1054 (1947); Western Gateway Broadcasting, 77 NLRB 49 (1948); WBSR, Inc., 91 NLRB 63 (1950).

What is important to note about this history is that broadcasters fought the NLRB on jurisdictional grounds. Constitutional arguments, like those made in AP v. NLRB, were apparently rarely raised.

3. The AFTRA agreement with the networks originally covered only "entertainers and artists." Does this help to explain part of Buckley's and Evans's difficulties with union membership? Have broadcasters always considered themselves part of the press?

Could this case have been brought by the broadcast stations employing Buckley and Evans on a freedom of the press theory? Their argument would be that a news commentator's job is equivalent to that of the editorial writer in Wichita Eagle.

Could Buckley and Evans have argued the same theory on their own behalf?

4. The court in Buckley distinguished between the levying of mandatory dues which serve a substantial public interest and flat fees imposed directly on the exercise of free speech. See Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, text, p. 176. Is this distinction adequate? Is it immediately apparent when dues serve a substantial public interest?

Buckley and Evans found the imposition of union membership a burden, yet the court reasoned that the levying of union dues was not an unwarranted abridgement of free speech. Apparently the court is willing to permit a little abridgement of free speech, but what is "little" to the court may be major to Buckley and Evans.

A year later the Supreme Court denied review of Buckley v. AFTRA. Justice Douglas dissented from the denial of certiorari:

There is a substantial question whether the union dues requirement imposed upon these petitioners should be characterized as a prior restraint or inhibition upon their free speech rights. In some respects, the requirement to pay dues under compulsion can be viewed as the functional equivalent of a "license" to speak. 419 U.S. 1093 (1975).

5. AFTRA's disciplinary code allows disciplinary measures against a member who does not conform to orders. If expelled from the union, the employee can no longer be hired by a broadcaster with a union shop agreement. Fulton Lewis III, a radio commentator, asserted that he was threatened with discipline causing him to suspend broadcasts during a strike. The court of appeals of New York did not find an impermissible restraint on free speech since Lewis was free to resign from the union and seek another job where there was no union agreement. Is the court being realistic? Economic and family considerations may make it difficult for a person to change jobs.

The court noted that the union had not retaliated against other members who did not join the strike. Consider the unofficial pressure brought to bear by coworkers and union officials. See Lewis v. AFTRA, 357 N.Y.S.2d 419, 313 N.E.2d 735, cert.den. 419 U.S. 1093 (1974).

6. Isn't the rationale for union representation the need for equality of bargaining power? Do Dan Rather, Barbara Walters, or William F. Buckley, Jr., need a union to represent them? Perhaps the question misses the point. The rest of the AFTRA membership needed members like Buckley in order to have equality of bargaining power.

7. Are private labor agreements under the NLRA infused with sufficient "governmental action" to give rise to a cause of action under the First Amendment? Constitutional guarantees of free expression embrace only abridgements by the federal government. See CBS v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. 94 (1973), text, p. 858. Whether union shop agreements like that in Buckley actually constitute governmental rather than individual action is a matter of conflicting interpretation. In Buckley, the Second Circuit avoided this issue, holding only that "if there were a burden on free speech it would appear to be no more objectionable than a 'nondiscriminatory [form] of general taxation' which can constitutionally be imposed on the communications media." See Jensen v. Farrel Lines, Inc., 625 F.2d 379 (2d Cir. 1980).

A Note on Blacklisting

1. When a labor union forbids its members to accept employment from a specified list of employers, this practice is called "blacklisting," and it constitutes an unfair labor practice.

AFTRA has had some problems with what it calls its "unfair list." AFTRA went to LK Productions, Inc., producer of a syndicated television show in Houston, Texas, and requested that LK sign AFTRA's "letter of adherence" which set forth the terms and conditions for the appearance of artists on the "Larry Kane Show," produced by LK. When LK refused to sign, AFTRA placed it on the Unfair List. This list, explained an AFTRA publication, "represents employers who have refused to sign the AFTRA codes of fair practice. * * * Accepting employment from any producer on the Unfair List is a violation of AFTRA rules * * * and could result in disciplinary action by the local board, which could mean fines or other penalties." AFTRA also informed theatrical agents and recording companies who dealt with AFTRA artists, warning them that they would face AFTRA sanctions if they dealt with LK Productions.

Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. 158(b)(4)(i)(ii)(B) (1970), states that it is an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents "to threaten or coerce or restrain any person engaged in commerce or in an industry affected by commerce, * * * where the object thereof is—(B) forcing or requiring any person * * * to cease doing business with any other person." Courts have called this a prohibition against "secondary boycotts," action or threatened action taken against a neutral employer with whom the union has no dispute in order to bring pressure on the primary employer. Secondary boycotts are proscribed in order to prohibit pressure tactically directed at a neutral employer in a labor dispute not his own and to restrict the field of combat in labor disputes by declaring "off limits" to union pressure those employers who are powerless to solve the dispute.

An NLRB administrative law judge ruled that AFTRA's unfair list constituted a secondary boycott, in that agents and recording companies were being pressured into not dealing with LK, and that the unfair list was thus a clear violation of the National Labor Relations Act. American Federation of Television and Radio Artists (LK Productions, Inc.), before the NLRB Division of Judges, Judge Lloyd Buchanan, Case No. 23-CC-463, October 31, 1973.

2. One comment suggested that since there has only been one national strike by AFTRA, the national labor policy of allowing union shops has been effective in keeping the channels of electronic communications open; union security devices may thus further First Amendment values in the context of the national media. Do you agree? See Are Television and Radio Commentators Exempt from Union Membership?, 53 B.U.L.Rev. 745 (1973).

The Press and the Fair Labor Standards Act

Minimum Wages and Maximum Hours for Newspaper Employees

---

MABEE v. WHITE PLAINS PUBLISHING CO.

327 U.S. 178, 66 S.Ct. 511,
90 L.ED. 607 (1946).

[EDITORIAL NOTE

The Court held that discrimination on the basis of circulation is a permissible method of classification to determine whether a newspaper will be regulated under the Fair Labor Standards Act. A total of forty-five out-of-state subscribers was considered enough to place a newspaper in interstate commerce.

The Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 established a minimum wage and maximum number of hours for employees engaged in interstate commerce unless specifically exempted. [29 U.S.C.A. § 216(b) ]

The act specifically provided that weekly or semiweekly newspapers with circulations of less than 3,000 were not covered. Daily newspapers, no matter how small their out-of-state circulation, were apparently covered under the statute.

White Plains Publishing Co. contended that an out-of-state circulation of forty-five out of 9,000 to 11,000 copies published was too weak a foundation on which to support a conclusion that the newspaper was in interstate commerce. Moreover, White Plains Publishing Co. contended that the statutory exemption for small weekly newspapers was discriminatory. In Grosjean v. American Press, 297 U.S. 233 (1936), the Louisiana legislature, you will recall, text, p. 138, had placed a tax on large circulation papers but not on small circulation newspapers. A duty to comply with the Fair Labor Standards Act likewise was placed on some newspapers but not others. Therefore White Plains Publishing Co. argued that the statutory exemptions for small circulation newspapers (weekly and semiweekly) represented discriminatory regulation.]

Justice DOUGLAS delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * *

* * * Volume of circulation, frequency of issue, and area of distribution are said to be an improper basis of classification. Moreover, it is said that the Act lays a direct burden on the press in violation of the First Amendment. The Grosjean case is not in point here. There the press was singled out for special taxation and the tax was graduated in accordance with volume of circulation. No such vice inheres in this legislation. As the press has business aspects it has no special immunity from laws applicable to business in general. Associated Press v. NLRB, 301 U.S. 103, 132-133. And the exemption of small weeklies and semi-weeklies is not a "deliberate and calculated device" to penalize a certain group of newspapers. Grosjean

v. American Press Co. As we have seen, it was inserted to put those papers more on a parity with other small town enterprises. 83 Cong.Rec. 7445. The Fifth Amendment does not require full and uniform exercise of the commerce power. Congress may weigh relative needs and restrict the application of a legislative policy to less than the entire field. * * *

COMMENT

Prior to the decision in White Plains, a federal court had already considered the contention that the application of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 to newspaper publishers was unconstitutional because "the press is immune from Congressional regulation by virtue of the terms of the First Amendment. * * *" Sun Publishing Co. v. Walling, 140 F.2d 445 at 447 (6th Cir.1944).

AP v. NLRB had involved the application of the National Labor Relations Act to the news distributing business. But in the Sun Publishing Co. case the argument of the publishers was that enforcement of the minimum wage and maximum hour provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act might drive financially weak newspapers out of business entirely. The United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit rejected this argument and observed that the guarantee of freedom of the press was not "a guarantee to a publisher of economic security, or a sanction to free him from the business hazards to which others are subject."

OKLAHOMA PRESS PUBLISHING CO. v. WALLING

327 U.S. 186, 66 S.C.T. 494,
90 L.ED. 614 (1946).

EDITORIAL NOTE

The Court here held that provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act requiring submission of pertinent records pursuant to a court order do not violate the First and Fourth Amendment rights of a newspaper publisher.

In this companion case to Mabee, a Department of Labor Administrator sought judicial enforcement of subpoenas duces tecum issued in the course of investigations conducted pursuant to § 11(a) of the Fair Labor Standards Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 211(a). The subpoenas sought records to determine whether Oklahoma Press was violating the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The Court quickly rejected the arguments of Oklahoma Press that application of the act to the publishing business and the classification method (circulation) used to determine whether a newspaper may be regulated under the act was in violation of its First Amendment rights.

Instead, the Court examined the contention that enforcement of the subpoenas would permit a general fishing expedition into the newspaper's records, without a prior charge, in violation of the Fourth Amendment's search and seizure provisions.]

Justice RUTLEDGE:

What petitioners seek is not to prevent an unlawful search and seizure. It is rather a total immunity to the act's provisions, applicable to all others similarly situated, requiring them to submit their pertinent records for the Administrator's inspection under every judicial safeguard, after and only after an order of court made pursuant to and exact compliance with authority granted by Congress. This broad claim of immunity no doubt is induced by petitioners' First Amendment contentions. But beyond them it is rested also upon conceptions of the Fourth Amendment equally lacking in merit.

* * *

The matter of requiring the production of books and records to secure evidence is not as one-sided, in this kind of situation, as the most extreme expressions of either emphasis would indicate. With some obvious exceptions, there has always been a real problem of balancing the public interest against private security.

* * *

* * * Whatever limits there may be to congressional power to provide for the production of corporate or other business records, therefore, they are not to be found, in view of the course of prior decisions, in any such absolute or universal immunity as petitioners seek.

* * *

The only records or documents sought were corporate ones. No possible element of self-incrimination was therefore presented or in fact claimed. All the records sought were relevant to the authorized inquiry, the purpose of which was to determine two issues, whether petitioners were subject to the act and, if so, whether they were violating it. * * * It is not to be doubted that Congress could authorize investigation of these matters. * * *

On the other hand, [Oklahoma Press's] view if accepted would stop much if not all investigation in the public interest at the threshold of inquiry and, in the case of the Administrator, is designed avowedly to do so. This would render substantially impossible his effective discharge of the duties of investigation and enforcement which Congress has placed upon him. And if his functions could be thus blocked, so might many others of equal importance. * * *"

---

COMMENT

1. The Court in Oklahoma Press Publishing Co. pointed out that the case did not raise the issue of whether Congress could enforce a regulatory program including the press by excluding from commerce the newspaper circulation of a publisher refusing to conform. Suppose the Fair Labor Standards Act were amended to make such exclusion the penalty for a publisher who refused to meet the wages and hours requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act? Would such a penalty be valid?

2. By allowing administrative officials to subpoena the press for records, does a possibility arise that government may use the subpoena power as a means of reprisal against a hostile press? Should this possibility alter the Court's Fourth Amendment analysis? Are there any safeguards in Oklahoma Press Publishing Co. against the possibility of abuse of the subpoena power by government against the press?

Recent Problems of Labor-Management Relations in the Newspaper Industry

1. Technological advances in the production of a newspaper raise serious problems for labor unions. One problem has centered around maintaining the total number of jobs. "Setting bogus" and "overmanning" have represented two union attempts to cope with this problem. One study pointed out that the prospect of losing jobs is extremely serious, not because present workers would be put out of work, but because the union's pension funds are built almost entirely on payments from working members. Unions therefore cannot afford to dwindle away and die because their union funds would die with them.

A solution to this problem might be to allow newspaper managements to stop replacing workers as they retire or quit (by "attrition"), upon the condition that management make payments to the union pension fund equivalent to the payments that would have been made by replacements. See generally H. Kelber & C. Schlesinger, Union Printers and Controlled Automation (1967).

Technological advances have also posed the problem of union jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of the newspaper union is generally based upon the type of work done by the newspaper employees of fifty years ago when the unions were first organized. The jurisdictional lines of the unions are becoming increasingly anachronistic under the impact of new technologies. See K. Roberts, Antitrust Problems in the Newspaper Industry, 82 Harv. L.Rev. 319 at 364, fn. 214 (1968).

2. For a case discussing a newspaper union's concern about the effect of new technology "on the bargaining unit, the extent of potential job displacement, and the result of new unit employees to operate the new equipment," see Newspaper Printing Corp. v. NLRB, 625 F.2d 956 at 959 (10th Cir.1980). The case also discusses the rise of the video display terminal in the newsroom. See Jaske, Collective Bargaining Issues in Newspapers, 4 Comm/Ent 595 at 596 (1982). See generally, Ganzglass, Impact of New Technology on Existing Bargaining Units in the Newspaper Industry, 4 Comm/Ent 605 (1982).

3. Among causes for the decline in the total number of daily newspapers in the United States are labor problems in the newspaper industry. In 1962 New York City had seven citywide dailies. Today there are three. Strike days between 1948 and 1978 totalled more than 335, with more than 300 led by the Newspaper Guild and some 30 led by the Deliverers' Union. See History of New York City Strikes, Editor and Publisher, August 26, 1978, p. 9, and "Newspaper Busting," editorial, September 2, 1978, p. 4. A strike in 1963 resulted in the closing of the New York Mirror. The World Journal Tribune, the result of a merger of three newspapers, closed after being struck by the Guild for 140 days in 1966.

4. The Cincinnati Post arranged to combine operations with the Cincinnati Enquirer on the ground that the Post was "a failing newspaper" under the provisions of the Newspaper Preservation Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1801 (1976). After the joint operating agreement was approved and the agreement between the Cincinnati newspapers was deemed to be exempt from the antitrust laws under the act, the Cincinnati Post closed its composing room and fired all the printers. However, these printers earlier had been guaranteed that they would be continuously employed for the remainder of their working lives by the Post. The Post, however, sought, after the approval of the joint operating agreement, to abrogate the lifetime job guarantee. Is the agreement still enforceable? In Heheman v. Scripps, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2089, 661 F.2d 1115 (6th Cir.1981), Judge Merritt ruled as follows:

In this case we are called upon to decide what effect should be given to an agreement in the newspaper industry guaranteeing lifetime job security for printers. The newspaper terminated the workers covered by the agreement following a partial reorganization and merger. We reverse the decision of the District Court which declined to give full effect to the job security agreement.

In a recent analysis of the case it was pointed out that the question of whether a lifetime job guarantee specifies "a particular rate of pay" was left unresolved by the court. Could Scripps, the publisher of the Cincinnati Post, take the position that although it would adhere to its job guarantee, "its wage proposal would be minimum wage or even zero." See, Jaske, Collective Bargaining Issues in Newspapers, 4 Comm/Ent 595 at 599 (1982). Jaske, Vice President for Labor Relations of the Gannett Company, made the following general observations about the issues presented by Scripps:

It is not believed that the union's victory in Scripps will necessarily preclude management, which is desperate for relief from overstaffing, from negotiating changes or attempting to eliminate "lifetime" job guarantees. The outcome of such a challenge will undoubtedly turn on the wording of the guarantee. These questions will continue to dominate negotiations between newspapers and the ITU.

5. From 1970 to 1982, more than 200 daily newspapers have disappeared in this country. In the same period, 189 new dailies have begun publication. However, these papers tend to be too small to organize economically. One significant development that is apparent from the recent wave of newspaper closings is the failure of the large afternoon daily. The demise of these papers have causes independent of labor difficulties. The afternoon dailies in particular have suffered from the availability of local TV news and the flight of urban subscribers to the suburbs. The problems of the Philadelphia Bulletin, a well-known afternoon daily which finally closed, are illustrative. The Bulletin was forced to extend its distribution routes to keep pace with migration to the suburbs. The greater traveling distances and the problems of heavy daytime city traffic caused the Bulletin to have earlier press runs which in turn meant that the paper was less capable of reporting late-breaking news. As a result, an increasing number of subscribers turned away from the Bulletin and toward the evening TV news to learn more about late developments. The same problems plagued the now-defunct Washington Star and are at least partially responsible for its demise. See New York Times, August 16, 1981, at 27, Col. 1; New York Times, August 17, 1981, at Col. 1.

6. The National Labor Relations Act defines unfair labor practices by union and management which constitute a violation of the act and authorizes the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) to act as the tribunal of first instance with respect to their resolution. In The Capital Times Co. and Newspaper Guild of Madison, Local 64, 223 NLRB No. 87 (1976), the NLRB found that the newspaper's refusal to bargain over penalty provisions to enforce a code of ethics, designed chiefly to cut back on favors and freebies its reporters received from news sources and other third persons, constituted an unfair labor practice. However, the unilateral institution by the newspaper of the ethics code itself was not deemed to be a labor violation. The board said that the motivation to institute the code was to enhance the credibility of the newspaper by setting forth a high ethical standard for its employees and thus was not an economic decision which required discussion through the collective bargaining process. On the other hand, the Board considered "penalties to be mandatory bargaining subjects, since they directly affected job security."

7. In Newspaper Guild of Greater Philadelphia, Local 10 v. NLRB, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2089, 636 F.2d 550 (D.C.Cir.1980), the Pottstown Mercury (Pottstown, Pennsylvania) unilaterally instituted a "code of ethics" which operated to discipline or discharge employees whom the newspaper thought might pose a threat to its editorial integrity. The Mercury's ethics code restricted its employees from receiving gifts from protected news sources or from participating in certain community or political activities. The code's purpose was to spell out a standard of integrity, objectivity, and fairness for the paper.

The guild objected to the posting of the Mercury's code, claiming that it was a unilateral change in the terms and conditions of employment and that it therefore constituted an unfair labor practice under § 8(a)(5) of the NLRA, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(5). The guild requested that the Mercury engage in collective bargaining concerning the matter. That request was refused, as the Mercury considered its code to be a discretionary management prerogative which was part and parcel of its editorial process. The matter went to the NLRB which held that the newspaper was not required to bargain collectively concerning the substantive rules of the Mercury's ethics code but was obliged to bargain collectively with respect to the code's penalty provisions.

On appeal, Judge Greene said the case posed this question: may a publisher of a newspaper, consistent with the National Labor Relations Act, refuse to bargain collectively regarding a code of ethics he has unilaterally adopted for his employees?

Greene answered the question for the federal court of appeals in Washington, D.C.:

We agree with the conclusion reached by the [National Labor Relations] Board in this case and in Capital Times, supra, that protection of the editorial integrity of a newspaper lies at the core of publishing control. * * * [E]ditorial control and the ability to shield that control from outside influences are within the First Amendment's zone of protection and therefore entitled to special consideration.

In order to preserve these qualities, a news publication must be free to establish, without interference, reasonable rules designed to prevent its employees from engaging in activities which may directly compromise their standing as responsible journalists and that of the publication for which they work as a medium of integrity.

On this basis, we reject the [guild's] position that collective bargaining is mandatory on all aspects of the Newspaper's Ethics Code and its Office Rules.

On the other hand, Judge Greene's opinion was not entirely adverse to the newspaper guild's position. Although the court thought that "reasonable rules" could be devised which would protect the newspaper's editorial integrity without being subject to mandatory collective bargaining, Greene remanded the case to the NLRB:

Upon remand, the [board] will be expected to make substantive determinations with respect to the various provisions of the Code of Ethics and the Office Rules and come to a decision whether, in light of the principles laid down herein, any particular subject matter is or is not within the mandatory bargaining category. To the extent that it is, any penalty attaching to a substantive rule must be regarded as being likewise mandatorily bargainable; to the extent that it is not, the related penalty provisions will also have to be regarded as exempt from the bargaining requirement.

The journalist should note that in the Newspaper Guild case, Judge Greene made the following statement about the significance of the Associated Press v. NLRB precedent. See text, p. 664.

The Mercury's reliance on the First Amendment is plainly foreclosed by long-standing precedent. It is firmly established that a newspaper is not immune from the coverage of the National Labor Relations Act merely because it is an agency of the press. See, e.g., Associated Press v. NLRB.

However, as we have seen, Judge Greene also observed that "editorial control and the ability to shield that control from outside influences are within the First Amendment's zone of protection and therefore entitled to special consideration." Are these two observations in conflict?

8. Union jurisdictional disputes resulting in labor strife such as strikes and picketing occur in the electronic as well as the print media. Illustrative is American Broadcasting Companies, Inc. v. Writers Guild of America, West, Inc., 437 U.S. 411 (1978), involving three cases decided together by the Supreme Court. Among the antagonists were the Motion Picture and Television Producers, Inc., and the three television networks, NBC, CBS, and ABC versus the Writers Guild.

Some employees perform various tasks which come within the jurisdiction of more than one union. The employee can be caught in a conflict between pressures from different unions and managements. When one union goes on strike, the other labor organizations may require that employees honor no-strike pledges in their contracts, and management may demand that employees perform duties which are not within the jurisdiction of the striking union. American Broadcasting Companies involved disciplinary proceedings brought by the writers guild against a union member, who was a supervisory employee with limited writing duties, for crossing the union's picket line during a strike and performing only his regular supervisory duties which included acting as the employer's grievance representative.

The Supreme Court held that union action in issuing rules prohibiting producers, directors, and story editors from performing their supervisory duties during the course of the strike and imposing sanctions on those who did perform such duties was unlawful. The union violated the National Labor Relations Act which prohibits union attempts to coerce employers in the selection of their representatives for grievance adjustment purposes.

Four justices dissented contending that "The Court holds today that a labor union locked in a direct economic confrontation with an employer is powerless to impose sanctions on its own members who choose to pledge their loyalty to the adversary."

Mergers of Newspaper Unions

The larger newspaper unions are considering an industrywide merger which could give reporters and production workers sufficient clout to challenge the growing newspaper chains and conglomerates. This move has been prompted primarily by the acceleration in automated printing, and has been fueled by recent closings of large well-known daily papers. See, A Push to Unify the News Unions, Bus.Wk., November 22, 1982, p. 93.

Mergers are expected between the 107,000 member International Printing and Graphic Communications Union and the 105,000 member Graphic Arts International Union. Also, plans are pending for a merger between the 29,000 reporters and other white-collar workers of the Newspaper Guild and the 43,000 printers and mailers of the International Typographical Union. Business Week suggests an ultimate marriage of the Guild and ITU with the 600,000 members of the Communications Workers of America.

Industrywide unions could exert substantial bargaining leverage by striking an entire chain of newspapers rather than focusing on a single daily as is presently done. Mergers might end wasteful jurisdictional disputes that have been partially responsible for the failures of several dailies. An end to jurisdictional disputes would conserve scarce union resources. Similar merger discussions are now occurring among unions in the electronic media. See Segal, Labor and The Media In the Eighties, 4 Comm/Ent 579 at 587 (1982).

COPYRIGHT, UNFAIR COMPETITION, AND THE PRINT AND FILM MEDIA

Copyright

1. Article 1, Section 8(8) of the United States Constitution stipulates that "The Congress shall have Power * * * To promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts, by securing for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries. * * *"

Its purpose is akin to that of the First Amendment: protect the property rights of authors in their creations and in the end you will enhance the flow of information to the people.

The first copyright law was enacted in 1790. The most recent became law on January 1, 1978,<sup>95</sup> and it superseded the copyright law of 1909 and its patchwork amendments. In general terms the new law makes the author, the creative person, the focal point of protection.

a. Duration of a copyright is now the author's life plus 50 years. If a copyright is in its first twenty-eight-year term under the old law, it may be renewed in the twenty-eighth year for an additional forty-seven years or a total copyright term of seventy-five years. Works in their second twenty-eight-year term are automatically extended to seventy-five years from date of original copyright. Joint or co-authored works are protected for fifty years after the last author dies. For works made for hire the new term is seventy-five years from publication or 100 years from creation, whichever is shorter. In such cases the employer becomes the "author."

b. A work is now protected from the moment of its creation, in a "fixed" or tangible form, the author being the first owner of all rights of copyright in every case.

c. An author need not sell all of his or her rights to a single publisher in order to obtain a copyright; under the new law any rights not specifically transferred in writing remain with the author. Copyright is now divisible. What may be copyrighted for newspaper or magazine purposes may be recopyrighted for book publishing or movie adaptation purposes.

d. A transfer of rights to a publisher may be terminated and renegotiated after thirty-five years, and the right to terminate may not be waived in advance. Any transfer of an author's rights must be validated by a signed contract. Without a written agreement, copyright remains with the creator.

95. Copyrights, 17 U.S.C.A. § 101 et seq. (Oct. 19, 1976).

A subsisting copyright may be reclaimed and renegotiated after fifty-six years for an additional nineteen years.

e. Magazine publishers, or other publishers of collected works, acquire only first serial and limited reprint rights to articles or photographs. All other rights are retained by the author.

f. Sound recordings, including those played through jukeboxes, are protected, as are nondramatic literary works such as works of nonfiction, works of the performing arts such as musical compositions, television programs, and motion pictures, and works of the visual arts such as photographs and advertisements. Public broadcasters must pay for noncommercial transmissions of published musical and graphic works. Cablecasters must also pay for transmission of copyrighted works. See text, p. 694.

2. To apply for a copyright. One fills out a form supplied by the Copyright Office, Library of Congress, Washington, D.C. 20559. For a nominal ($10) fee and a specified number of copies of each separate work (usually one copy of unpublished and two copies of published works), you receive a certificate of registration valid from the day on which your application, your copies to be deposited, and your fee reach and are found acceptable by the Copyright Office. There are criminal penalties for failing to deposit copies, but no loss of copyright.

A notice of copyright may then confidently be placed on all publicly distributed copies of the work in one of the following forms: the symbol © (the letter c in a circle), or the word "Copyright," or the abbreviation "Copr.,"; the year of first publication of the work; and the name of the owner of the copyright: for example, © 1984 Peter Reiter. Consult the act for differences in symbolization dictated by the form of the work for which copyright is sought and for other details of the registration procedure. Mistakes made during registration and even an omission of notice can be corrected within time limits. Negligence by author or publisher does not necessarily forfeit copyright, but publication without notice may provide a defense to an innocent infringer. Registration is no longer a condition of copyright protection, nor of placing a notice of copyright on published or unpublished works, but it is prerequisite to a copyright infringement suit seeking damages and attorney fees, and is therefore encouraged. Notice is particularly important for pre-1978 works, and any work without notice may be presumed to have found its way into the public domain.

All works now receive federal statutory protection from the moment of creation (the act of an author), without regard to whether or not they are published. All common law or state copyright protection is preempted by the new uniform federal system,<sup>96</sup> unless the right in intellectual property at stake is not covered by the federal statute. But the new law is not retroactive. Works already in the public domain remain there, including anything published before September 19, 1906.

3. Works made for hire are works created at the behest of an employer. The new Copyright Act specifies two made-for-hire situations:

1. works "prepared by an employee within the scope of his or her employment," and

2. works "specially ordered or commissioned" and agreed to in writing to be works made for hire. In these circumstances the publisher may be considered the "author" and first copyright owner. These rights are nevertheless limited and divisible: an author may transfer part of a copyright to a publisher while retaining other parts.

96. Ringer, Finding Your Way Around in the New Copyright Law, Practising Law Institute, Communications Law 1977, p. 114. And in 22 New York Law School L.Rev. 477-495 (1976).

Under the definition of works made for hire in § 101 of the 1976 act, a newspaper publisher would be "author" of everything copyrightable in each issue of the newspaper; only by special agreement would a news reporter or a columnist retain rights in his or her copyrightable work. A columnist, for example, would have to make an agreement with a publisher in advance that future book publication rights were to remain with the column writer.

When such questions are litigated, courts consider the creative role played by the employer in guiding, supervising, or directing the work of an employee or an independent contractor—writers, filmmakers, translators, text and test makers. A court ruled for example, that a university professor holds copyright to his own lecture notes since the institution employing him played only an indirect role in their creation.<sup>97</sup> Likewise, Admiral Rickover, not the Navy, owned the copyright in his speeches on public education because the Admiral had not "mortgaged all the products of his brain to his employer."<sup>98</sup> And a local merchant, not the newspaper in which his ad appeared, owned the copyright to an advertisement because the merchant had directed what the ad should contain.<sup>99</sup> On the other hand, a pamphlet written by a company chemist was clearly a project within the scope of his employment, and so the copyright remained with the company.<sup>100</sup>

There is a distinction between employees and independent contractors: employees own the work of their employees unless there is a written agreement to the contrary; but the presumption of authorship remains with independent contractors or freelancers because it takes a written contract in the first place to convert their creative output to "works made for hire." Absent a written agreement, copyright generally resides in the person at whose insistence and expense the work is done—the creative initiator. Reason may dictate exceptions. Work related to one's employment but done after business hours and for purposes outside the scope of that employment may be excepted.<sup>101</sup> For independent contractors, such as illustrators, songwriters, free lancers, textbook authors, the fine print of the initial agreement or contract is important.

4. What some have called the "artistic-effort-invested" philosophy of copyright is reflected in cases decided both before and after passage of the 1976 Act. Anything authored, created, performed, or produced and fixed or transcribed in a tangible or permanent way, rather than improvised, with a few exceptions, is copyrightable. Print, videotape, audiotape, film, television when taped at the time of transmission, computer programs, data bases, art works, choreographies, musical compositions, maps, news programs, compilations like annotated bibliographies, newsletters, singly or in single-year groups are included. Sedition, some classifications of pornography, names, titles, slogans, standard symbols and emblems (although these may be protected as trademarks), and official works, both published and unpublished, of the United States and state governments cannot be copyrighted, although the government may protect its "physical" property. On December 31, 2002, archives existing now will go into the public domain.

97. Williams v. Weisser, 78 Cal.Rptr. 542 (1969).

98. Public Affairs Associates v. Rickover, 268 F.Supp. 444 (D.D.C.1967).

99. Brattleboro Publishing Co. v. Winmill Publishing Corp., 369 F.2d 565 (2d Cir.1966).

100. U.S. Ozone Co. v. United States Ozone Co. of America, 62 F.2d 881 (7th Cir.1932).

101. Franklin Mint v. National Wildlife Art Exchange, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 2169, 575 F.2d 62 (3d Cir.1978).

5. There has been an interesting debate for some time as to whether the copyright law ought to have anything to say about content, for example sedition or pornography. The prevailing view appears to be that it should not and does not.

"There is nothing in the Copyright Act," said the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in Belcher v. Tarbox, 486 F.2d 1087 (9th Cir.1973), "to suggest that the courts are to pass upon the truth or falsity, the soundness or unsoundness, of the views embodied in a copyrighted work. The gravity and immensity of the problems, theological, philosophical, economic and scientific that would confront a court if this view were adopted are staggering to contemplate."

The Ninth Circuit relied on Belcher when in 1982 it held that the obscenity of a copyrighted film was not a valid defense against a claim of copyright infringement. Since Miller v. California (this text, p. —) made obscenity a matter of community definition, acceptance of an obscenity defense, said the court in Clancy v. Jartech, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1404, 666 F.2d 403 (9th Cir. 1982), would fragment copyright enforcement, protecting registered material in a certain community while, in effect, authorizing pirating in another locale.

The Clancy court also cited an important Fifth Circuit ruling, involving the same plaintiffs, for the proposition that both old and new copyright laws, using the inclusive language "all writings of an author" and "original works of authorship" respectively, were intended to be content-free. The case, Mitchell Brothers v. Cinema Adult Theater, 5 Med.L.Rptr. 2133, 604 F.2d 852 (5th Cir.1979), cert. den. 445 U.S. 917 (1980), has been called "the most thoughtful and comprehensive analysis of the issue."<sup>102</sup>

By contrast, the Lanham Act prohibits registration of any trademark that "consists of or comprises immoral, deceptive or scandalous matter," 15 U.S.C. § 1052(a), and inventions must be shown to be "useful" before a patent is issued, 35 U.S.C. § 101. No such language occurs in 1909 or 1976 copyright laws.

A score of works that are today held in high esteem were listed by the Fifth Circuit as having been adjudged obscene in earlier times. On the question of the copyrightability of allegedly obscene creations, the court made the following points.

---

MITCHELL BROTHERS v. CINEMA ADULT THEATER

604 F.2D 852 (5th CIR.1979).
5 MED.L.RPTR. 2133.

GODBOLD, Circuit Judge:

* * *

Some courts have denied legal redress in infringement suits to holders of copyrights on immoral or obscene works by applying judicially-created doctrines. Two of these doctrines are largely vestiges of a bygone era and need be addressed only briefly. The theory that judges should act as conservators of the public morality was succinctly summarized by the court in Shook v. Daly, 49 How.Pr. 366, 368 (N.Y.Sup.Ct.1895): "The rights of the writer are secondary to the rights of the public to be protected from what is subversive of good morals." Application of this theory by the English courts in the nineteenth century led to the suppression of works because they were inconsistent with Biblical teachings or because they were seditious. See 46 Fordham L.Rev. 1037, 1038-39 (1978); Schneider, [51 Chi.-Kent L.Rev.], at 694-96. Although this theory has been relied on as recently as 1963, see Dane v. M. & H. Co., 136 U.S.P.Q. (BNA) 426, 429 (N.Y.Sup.Ct.1963) (common law copyright protection denied striptease because it did not "elevate, cultivate, inform, or improve the moral or intellectual natures of the audience"), it is evident to us that it is inappropriate for a court, in the absence of some guidance or authorization from the legislature, to interpose its moral views between an author and his willing audience.

---

102. Nimmer on Copyright § 2.17, p. 2-194.2, 1980.

A second judicially-created doctrine, the theory that a person can have no property in obscene works, merely expresses by means of a legal fiction the underlying judicial moral conclusion that the work is not worthy of protection. The doctrine has not been adopted in this country, * * and should not be. Cf. Board of Trade v. Christie Grain & Stock Co., 198 U.S. 236 * * * (1905): "If, then, the plaintiffs' collection of information is otherwise entitled to protection, it does not cease to be so, even if it is information concerning illegal acts. The statistics of crime are property to the same extent as any other statistics, even if collected by a criminal who furnishes some of the data."

The third judicially created doctrine, that of unclean hands, has seldom been relied upon by courts that have denied copyright to obscene or immoral works. For the most part, only English courts have relied on this theory. See generally Chafee, [Coming into Equity with Clean Hands 47 Mich.L.Rev. 1065-70 (1947)]. Of the various American cases allowing obscenity as a defense to a copyright infringement action, few even mention the doctrine of unclean hands. * * * Nevertheless, since the district court permitted obscenity to be asserted as a defense through the medium of the unclean hands rubric, the concept of unclean hands requires more extended discussion.

Assuming for the moment that the equitable doctrine of unclean hands has any field of application in this case, it should not be used as a conduit for asserting obscenity as a limit upon copyright protection. Creating a defense of obscenity—in the name of unclean hands or through any other vehicle—adds a defense not authorized by Congress that may, as discussed above, actually frustrate the congressional purpose underlying an all-inclusive copyright statute. It will discourage creativity by freighting it with a requirement of judicial approval. Requiring authors of controversial, unpopular, or new material to go through judicial proceedings to validate the content of their writings is antithetical to the aim of copyrights. If the copyright holder cannot obtain financial protection for his work because of actual or possible judicial objections to the subject matter, the procreativity purpose of the copyright laws will be undercut.

The Supreme Court and this court have held that equitable doctrines should not be applied where their application will defeat the purpose of a statute. * * * Because the private suit of the plaintiff in a copyright infringement action furthers the congressional goal of promoting creativity, the courts should not concern themselves with the moral worth of the plaintiff.

Furthermore, the need for an additional check on obscenity is not apparent. Most if not all states have statutes regulating the dissemination of obscene materials, and there is an array of federal statutes dealing with this subject, as well. * * * As Professor Chafee concluded, the difficulty inherent in formulating a workable obscenity defense to copyright is sufficient reason not to allow such a defense unless the other criminal and civil statutes dealing with the obscenity problem are shown to be plainly ineffective:

Sometimes the legislature has expressly entrusted questions of obscenity to the courts, as in criminal statutes, and then judges have to do the best they can, but the results have been quite erratic. This should be a warning against rushing into new obscenity jobs which no legislature has told them to undertake.

The penalties for obscenity are defined by statute. Why should the courts add a new penalty out of their own heads by denying protection to a registered copyright which complies with every provision of the copyright act? * * * I think that the added penalty is justifiable only if there is a serious need for extra pressure to induce obedience to the criminal law. In the obscenity situation, this need is not obvious. Chafee, supra, at 1068-69.

The effectiveness of controlling obscenity by denying copyright protection is open to question. The district court thought that on the whole the long-term discouragement of the creation of obscene works would outweigh the short-term increase in the dissemination of obscene works caused by the refusal of an injunction. This theory, reached without empirical evidence or expert opinion, is at least doubtful. Many commentators disagree and are of the view that denial of injunctions against infringers of obscene materials will only increase the distribution of such works. The existence of this difference of view, which we need not resolve, makes clear that the question of how to deal with the relationship between copyrights and obscenity is not best suited for case-by-case judicial resolution but is instead most appropriately resolved by legislatures. Congress has not chosen to refuse copyrights on obscene materials, and we should be cautious in overriding the legislative judgment on this issue.

Finally, permitting obscenity as a defense would introduce an unmanageable array of issues into routine copyright infringement actions. It was for this reason that the Ninth Circuit rejected the defense of fraudulent content in copyright infringement cases. See Belcher v. Tarbox, 486 F.2d 1087, 1088 (CA9, 1973), accord 2 M. Nimmer, On Copyright § 2.17, at 2-194. Cf. Coca-Cola Co. v. Howard Johnson Co., 386 F.Supp. 330, 337 (D.Ga.1974) * * * (rejecting violation of antitrust law as defense in trademark infringement suit because it would convert courts into "a battleground for extensive antitrust litigation whenever a trademark holder seeks any, totally unrelated, equitable relief").

Now, we turn to examine our momentary assumption that the unclean hands doctrine can be invoked at all in this case. For reasons that we have set out, obscenity is not an appropriate defense in an infringement action, whether piggybacked on the unclean hands rubric or introduced in some other manner. But even if obscenity were not objectionable as a defense, the unclean hands doctrine could not properly be used as the vehicle for that defense.

The maxim of unclean hands is not applied where plaintiff's misconduct is not directly related to the merits of the controversy between the parties, but only where the wrongful acts "in some measure affect the equitable relations between the parties in respect of something brought before the court for adjudication." Keystone Driller Co. v. General Excavator Co., 290 U.S. 240, 245 * * * (1933). The alleged wrongdoing of the plaintiff does not bar relief unless the defendant can show that he has personally been injured by the plaintiff's conduct. Lawler v. Gillam, 569 F.2d 1283, 1294 (4th Cir.1978). The doctrine of unclean hands "does not purport to search out or deal with the general moral attributes or standing of a litigant." NLRB v. Fickett-Brown Mfg. Co., 140 F.2d 883, 884 (CA5, 1944). Here it is clear that plaintiffs' alleged wrongful conduct has not changed the equitable relationship between plaintiffs and defendants and has not injured the defendants in any way.

* * *

Reversed and Remanded.

---

COMMENT

6. The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals also made it clear in Miller v. Universal City Studios, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1785, 650 F.2d 1365 (5th Cir.1981), that copyright protection extends only to the expression of facts or ideas and not to facts themselves or to the research involved in obtaining them. A Miami Herald reporter who covered the kidnapping of a wealthy businessman's daughter and her being buried alive and rescued after five days collaborated with the victim to write a book about that terrifying experience. Titled 83 Hours Till Dawn, the work was copyrighted, as was a condensed version of it in Reader's Digest and a serialization in Ladies Home Journal. Without the author's agreement, the book was turned into a television script, The Longest Night, and sold to ABC. A jury found infringement and awarded the reporter $200,000 in damages and profits.

"Obviously," said the appeals court in reversing and remanding, "a fact does not originate with the author of a book describing the fact. Neither does it originate with one who 'discovers' the fact. 'The discoverer merely finds and records. He may not claim that the facts are "original" with him although there may be originality and hence authorship in the manner of reporting, i.e., the "expression," of the facts.' Nimmer, Nimmer on Copyright § 2.03(E), at 2-34 (1980). Thus, since facts do not owe their origin to any individual, they may not be copyrighted and are part of the public domain available to every person." The distinction between facts and copyrightable forms of expressing them is not always as clear as the foregoing statements would suggest.

Nor is historical research copyrightable. In Rosemont Enterprises, Inc. v. Random House, Inc., 366 F.2d 303 (2d Cir.1966), cert. den., 385 U.S. 1009 (1967), the court said that it could not "subscribe to the view that an author is absolutely precluded from saving time and effort by referring to and relying upon prior published material. * * * It is just such wasted effort that the proscription against the copyright of ideas and facts, and to a lesser extent the privilege of fair use, are designed to prevent." Defendant's biography was said to infringe the copyright on a series of Look magazine articles about Howard Hughes.

Similar litigation arose over books and films about the mysterious disaster involving the German dirigible Hindenburg with similar results. Interpretations of historical fact were not copyrightable. Nor were specific facts or the personal research behind them.<sup>103</sup> Said the court:

The copyright provides a financial incentive to those who would add to the corpus of existing knowledge by creating original works. Nevertheless, the protection afforded the copyright holder has never extended to history, be it documented fact or explanatory hypothesis. The rationale for this doctrine is that the cause of knowledge is best served when history is the common property of all, and each generation remains free to draw upon the discoveries and insights of the past. Accordingly, the scope of copyright in historical accounts is narrowed indeed, embracing no more than the author's original expression of particular facts and theories already in the public domain.

7. An allegation that a copyright owner has generally been exploiting his copyright in a manner violative of the antitrust laws does not affect the owner's claim for relief against an infringement.

8. Works that become part of a federal agency's records, however, even though copyrighted by a third person, are public records under the Freedom of Information Act and cannot be withheld simply because they are copyrighted, said the D.C. Circuit in Weisberg v. United States Department of Justice, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1401, 543 F.2d 308 (D.C.Cir.1980). The case involved photographs in the government's possession that were taken at the scene of the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King.

103. Hoehling v. Universal City Studios, Inc., 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1053, 618 F.2d 972 (2d Cir.1979).

Time, Inc., the copyright holder, would permit the photos to be viewed but not copied.

9. While authorship and a modicum of originality is assumed, there are no tests of quality or merit for copyright purposes. The owner of a copyright has the exclusive right to reproduce, to develop derivative works from that which is copyrighted, to distribute, to record, to perform, and to display. Limitations on these rights are twofold: 1) only the expression of an idea, for example, a particular pattern of words or prose elements, is copyrightable—the idea itself is not; and 2) copyright is limited by the doctrine of fair use or, conversely, by the law of unfair competition.

Unfair Competition

1. Fair use is another dimension of the effort to balance the encouragement of creativity with the flow of information to the public. Reproduction of someone else's work for purposes of criticism, comment, news reporting, scholarship, teaching, and research is permitted within limits: a. the purpose of the copier must not be purely commercial (some leeway is allowed educators); b. the amount used (with proper attribution, of course) is limited to 200 words of prose scattered or clustered. Poetry is not included, nor are complete articles of less than 200 words; c. the effect of such use on the potential market of a copyrighted work must be considered. If the copyright owner is hurt financially and can carry the burden of proof, damages may be awarded.

The doctrine of fair use was substantiated by an equally divided Supreme Court in Williams & Wilkins Co. v. United States, a case involving the making of unauthorized copies of medical journal articles by HEW and the National Library of Medicine for research purposes. Said the Court of Claims:

Precisely because a determination that a use is "fair" or "unfair" depends on an evaluation of the complex of individual and varying factors bearing upon a particular use, there has been no exact or detailed definition of the doctrine. The courts, congressional committees, and scholars have had to be content with a general listing of the main considerations—together with the example of specific instances ruled "fair" or "unfair." These overall factors are now said to be: (a) the purpose and character of the use, (b) the nature of the copyrighted work, (c) the amount and substantiality of the material used in relation to the copyrighted work as a whole, and (d) the effect of the use on the copyright owner's potential market for a value of his work. 203 Ct.Cl. 74, 487 F.2d 1345, 1352 (1973), aff'd w/o opinion, 420 U.S. 376 (1975).

What the Court of Claims called a "fair use," the trial judge had termed "wholesale copying" (many thousands of copies had been made). Where the trial judge found that copying practices in this instance had supplanted the need for original journals, thus decreasing the value of copyrighted works, the Court of Claims found that the practices were in lieu of library loan and did not represent a threat to subscription or reprint sales. In addition, the Court of Claims felt that a "flat proscription" on library copying would harm scientific and medical research; the trial judge thought an award of damages would be a small price for protection of the rights of the copyright owner.

Using the basic fair use test of Williams & Wilkins, the 1976 statute attempted to deal with the new technology of photocopying by regulating the reproduction of copyrighted material by libraries and archives. Copying is permitted when it does not substitute for purchase of a copyrighted work or provide profit for the copier.

2. Earlier cases elaborated the concept of fair use. It was not fair use for the Chicago Record-Herald to reprint an almost identical version of a story on submarine warfare which had appeared in the rival Chicago Tribune after turning down an offer to buy it. The Tribune's story bore the mark of individual enterprise and literary style. Giving the Tribune a credit line simply compounded the damage by presenting the plaintiff in a false light.<sup>104</sup>

It was not fair use for a school of modeling to benefit from Vogue magazine's prestige by using the magazine's covers in its advertising brochures. Vogue's covers were included in its overall copyright protection. "No one," said a federal district court, "is entitled to save time, trouble, and expense by availing himself to another's copyrighted work for the sake of making an unearned profit."<sup>105</sup>

A different result was reached, however, when the Miami Herald in promoting a new television supplement used the cover of TV Guide in comparative advertising for its new service. Relying on the Vogue case and Nimmer on Copyright § 14.4 at 62, a federal district court in Florida concluded that the cover of TV Guide "was encompassed within the protections afforded by the copyright registered for that magazine." Moreover there was no "fair use" justification in using the plaintiff's cover for promotional purposes. But a First Amendment purpose was being served in light of judicial recognition of increased constitutional protection for commercial speech.

"Such comparative advertising, when undertaken in the serious manner that defendant did herein," said the court, "represents an important source of information for the education of consumers in a free enterprise system." Since TV Guide had not demonstrated irreparable injury and since the First Amendment outweighs any act of Congress, the magazine was denied an injunction against the Herald's competitive promotional activities.<sup>106</sup>

Similarly, when Time magazine refused an author the use of certain frames of its copyrighted Zapruder film for a scholarly book on the Kennedy assassination and the author used sketches of the frames instead, Time failed in a copyright suit because, said the court, there was a public interest in the subject and the book would be purchased, not alone for its pictures, but for the author's "theories."<sup>107</sup> Balancing First Amendment and copyright values, Judge Kaufman for the Second Circuit chose the public's right to news contained in former President Ford's memoirs. Editor Victor Navasky's excerpt, said the court, was fair use of information of a public nature, i.e., news reporting.<sup>107a</sup>

There was no fair use, however, when a religious group presented what it called a "nonperverted" version of "Jesus Christ Superstar" using, with sanctimonious modification, the plaintiff's original music and libretto. An argument that the presentation served a "critical" function was rejected because 1) the original was copied exactly and was a substitute for the original, 2) it injured the plaintiff financially, 3) it was in competition with the plaintiff, and 4) it did not serve or advance greater public interest in the development of news, art, science, or industry.<sup>108</sup>

A case that reflects the "artistic-effort-invested" philosophy of the new act is Gilliam v. American Broadcasting Companies, Inc., 538 F.2d 14 (2d Cir.1976). Interesting in part because it involved the irre-

104. Chicago Record-Herald v. Tribune Association, 275 F. 797 (7th Cir.1921).

105. Conde Nast Publications, Inc. v. Vogue School of Fashion Modeling, Inc., 105 F.Supp. 325 (D.N.Y.1952).

106. Triangle Publications v. Knight-Ridder, Newspapers, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 2086, 445 F.Supp. 875 (D.Fla.1978), affirmed 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1734, 626 F.2d 1171 (5th Cir.1980).

107. Time, Inc. v. Bernard Geis Associates, 293 F.Supp. 130 (D.N.Y.1968).

107a. Harper and Row and Reader's Digest v. The Nation, — F.2d — (2d Cir., Nov. 18, 1983).

108. Robert Stigwood Group Ltd. v. O'Reilly, 346 F.Supp. 376 (D.Conn.1972).

pressible "Monty Python's Flying Circus," the case began when ABC bought from the BBC the right to show six Python episodes, then cut them to fit the commercial television format in an apparently prudish manner. The Pythons sued for copyright infringement and unfair competition, asking for a permanent injunction against ABC.

In what was by all accounts an entertaining trial,<sup>109</sup> a federal district court, while recognizing a plaintiff's right to protect the artistic integrity of his creation (the film here had lost its "iconoclastic verve," said the judge), denied the injunction on grounds that it was not clear who owned the copyright. Also there was a question as to whether the BBC and Time-Life—the latter had purchased the rights—should have been parties to the litigation. Further, ABC might suffer irreparable harm in its relationships with affiliates, public, and government if it were to withdraw the programs.

The trial judge suggested a disclaimer instead: "The members of Monty Python wish to disassociate themselves from this program, which is a compilation of their shows edited by ABC without their approval." ABC thought this distasteful, a dangerous precedent with respect to other artists and technicians, and a violation of its First Amendment rights. The best Monty Python could get was "Edited for Television by ABC."

A Second Circuit Court of Appeals panel subsequently reversed and remanded the lower court's denial of a preliminary injunction. Seeing Monty Python rather than ABC the greater loser, the court held that "unauthorized editing of the underlying work, if proven, would constitute an infringement of copyright in that work similar to any other use of a work that exceeded the license granted by the proprietor of the copyright." Since BBC itself had no right to make unilateral changes in the script, it could not grant such rights to Time-Life or ABC.

"Our resolution of these technical arguments," said the court somewhat in anticipation of the 1976 Copyright Act, "serves to reinforce our initial inclination that the copyright law should be used to recognize the important role of the artist in our society and the need to encourage production and dissemination of artistic works by providing adequate legal protection for one who submits his work to the public. * * * To deform his work is to present him to the public as the creator of a work not his own, and thus makes him subject to criticism for work he has not done. In such a case, it is the writer or performer, rather than the network, who suffers the consequences of the mutilation, for the public will have only the final product by which to evaluate his work."

Sometimes the question is simply how much is too much use of a copyrighted work. When the Board of Cooperative Educational Services began making 10,000 videotapes a year of copyrighted motion pictures, a federal district court said that was too much. Applying Williams & Wilkins the court held that, while the purpose was educational and noncommercial, the effect on the copyright holder's market would be devastating. Entire films were reproduced, and the reproductions were interchangeable with the originals. Since this was not a fair use, an injunction against further copying was made permanent.<sup>110</sup>

A second case illustrates the delicate balance between quantity and commercialism. Here a television network had copied only 8 percent of a copyrighted film, but it had done so for purely commercial purposes. Such was not fair use because it foreclosed plaintiff's potential market.<sup>111</sup>

109. Hertzberg, Onward and Upward With the Arts: Naughty Bits, New Yorker, March 29, 1976, p. 69. See also, Protection of Artistic Integrity: Gilliam v. American Broadcasting Companies, 90 Harv.L.Rev. 473 (December 1976).

110. Encyclopedia Britannica v. Crooks, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1945, 447 F.Supp. 243 (D.N.Y.1978).

In Elsmere Music, Inc. v. NBC,<sup>112</sup> "Saturday Night Live's" use of New York's public relations song "I Love New York" did not violate fair use because it was used as parody.

When Screw magazine portrayed the trade characters, "Poppin Fresh" and "Poppie Fresh" in a compromising pose, the Pillsbury Company was understandably upset. A federal district court ruled, however, that the magazine's use of the copyrighted trade characters, while more pornographic than it needed to be, was intended as a social commentary and thereby protected. Since it did not cause significant economic harm to the company, the portrayal was fair use.<sup>113</sup>

3. Copyright protection was first extended to advertising in Bleistein v. Donaldson Lithographing Co., 188 U.S. 239 (1902), a case involving a copyrighted circus poster. In Ansehl v. Puritan Pharmaceutical Co., 61 F.2d 131 (8th Cir. 1932), the court, granting relief to the creator of a cosmetic ad, recognized protected property rights in the particular wording used and in the arrangement of the elements of the advertisement, beyond the more general consideration of artistic value.

"The defendants," said the court, "might appropriate the ideas and express them in their own pictures and in their own language, but they could not appropriate the plaintiff's advertisement by copying his arrangement of material, his illustrations and language, and thereby create substantially the same composition in substantially the same manner without subjecting themselves to liability for infringement."

Advertising created and composed solely by the newspaper or its employees is included in copyright protection for the entire newspaper. Where advertising is created partly by the newspaper and partly by the advertiser or his agent, the newspaper may secure copyright interest by written contract. Otherwise the advertisements remain the property of the advertiser.

4. What is not fair use under copyright, either because something cannot or has not been copyrighted, may be unfair competition or misrepresentation under state law or its federal counterpart, the Lanham Act. The protection of news as "quasi property" against unfair competition was recognized in a broad and influential ruling by the United States Supreme Court in 1918. International News Service was alleged to have "pirated" news from the Associated Press for redistribution to its own customers. No direct question of fraud was raised, and the misappropriated material had not been copyrighted. In the absence of statutory protection, AP relied on the common law doctrine of unfair competition.

The Court considered three major legal issues: 1) whether there is any property in news; 2) whether, if there be property in news collected for the purpose of being published, it survives the instant of its publication in the first newspaper to which it is communicated by the news gatherer; and 3) whether INS's admitted course of conduct in appropriating for commercial use material taken from bulletins or earlier editions of Associated Press newspapers constitutes unfair competition in trade. Each question was answered in favor of the Associated Press. International News Service v. Associated Press, 248 U.S. 215 (1918).<sup>114</sup>

111. Iowa State Research Foundation, Inc. v. ABC, 463 F.Supp. 902 (D.N.Y.1978), affirmed 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1855, 621 F.2d 57 (2d Cir.1980).

112. 5 Med.L.Rptr. 2455, 482 F.Supp. 741 (D.N.Y.1980), affirmed 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1457, 623 F.2d 252 (2d Cir.1980).

113. The Pillsbury Company v. Milky Way Productions, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1016 (D.Ca.1981).

News, being part of the public domain and like ideas "as free as the air,"<sup>115</sup> is excluded from specific copyright protection, but the doctrine of INS v. AP does apply to news gathering and news presentation activities. Using one's competitor for news "tips" is an acceptable practice, but bodily appropriation of another's news copy is unfair competition subject to injunctive relief.

In Associated Press v. KVOB, 80 F.2d 575 (9th Cir. 1935), reversed on other grounds 299 U.S. 269 (1936), the appeals court ruled that appropriation for broadcast of the AP wire before neighboring AP newspapers could reach their subscribers—while the news was still "hot"—was enjoined. An injunction was also granted to a Sitka, Alaska newspaper whose AP stories were being read verbatim by a radio station even before the newspaper hit the streets. Instead of joining its member newspaper in the suit, AP sold the offending radio station an associate membership. Still preferring to read the newspaper's edited AP copy, the broadcaster found himself in a second suit. Nominal damages were awarded, and the radio station agreed to cease pirating news.<sup>116</sup>

In an unreported case, a Kentucky circuit court ruled that a defendant, who had without permission used plaintiff's news stories sixteen to eighteen hours before the newspaper could be delivered to all its subscribers, would in future have to wait twenty hours after publication before engaging in his piracy.<sup>117</sup>

In 1963 the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania left no doubt that the broadcasting of news stories from a newspaper in a competitive situation was unfair competition and an invasion of a property right in uncopyrighted news. The court articulated a doctrine that had been expressed in earlier cases:

Competition in business is jealously protected by the law and the law abhors that which tends to diminish or stifle competition. While a competitor may, subject to patent, copyright and trademark laws, imitate his rival's business practices, process and methods, yet the protection which the law affords to competition does not and should not countenance the usurpation of a competitor's investment and toil. Pottstown Daily News Publishing Co. v. Pottstown Broadcasting Co., 192 A.2d 657, 663 (Pa.1963).

In a 1966 case involving two business publications, defendant had appropriated information from the plaintiff's wire service in order to publish bond market news contemporaneously with his competitor and without expense or effort.

"It is no longer subject to question," said a New York appeals court, "that there is a property in the gathering of news which may not be pirated. Plaintiff's rights do not depend on copyright; they lie rather in the fact that the information has been acquired through an expenditure of labor, skill and money."<sup>118</sup>

Where plaintiff's rights do depend on copyright, there may be a suit for copyright infringement. So there was when a business newspaper appropriated almost verbatim the most creative and original

114. For a discussion of this case and the whole question of news piracy, unfair competition, and misappropriation, see Sullivan, News Piracy: Unfair Competition and the Misappropriation Doctrine, 56 Journalism Monographs, May, 1978.

115. Desney v. Wilder, 46 Cal.2d 715, 299 P.2d 257 (1956), a case dealing with the writing of a play from news stories and quoting Justice Brandeis.

116. Veatch v. Wagner, 109 F.Supp. 537 (Alaska 1953) and 116 F.Supp. 904 (Alaska 1953).

117. Madison Publishing Co., Inc. v. Sound Broadcasters, Inc. (unreported 1966). In a 1956 case involving the Toledo Blade and radio station WOHO, the time period was set at twenty-four hours.

118. Bond Buyer v. Dealers Digest Publishing Co., 267 N.Y.2d 944 (1966).

elements of copyrighted research reports on financial and industrial matters. Rejecting defendant's fair use arguments and finding the tantalizing question of whether copyright laws violate the First Amendment<sup>119</sup> absent from the case, the court nevertheless clarified the relationship between copyright and factual news reports:

But in considering the copyright protections due a report of news events or factual developments, it is important to differentiate between the substance of the information contained in the report, i.e., the event itself, and "the particular form of collocation of words in which the writer has communicated it." [Citing INS v. AP and Chicago Record-Herald.] What is protected is the manner of expression, the author's analysis or interpretation of events, the way he structures his material and marshals facts, his choice of words, and the emphasis he gives to particular developments. Thus, the essence of infringement lies not in taking a general theme or in coverage of the reports as events, but in appropriating the "particular expression through similarities of treatment, details, scenes, events and characterization." [Citing Reyher v. Children's Television Workshop, 533 F.2d 87, 91 (2d Cir. 1976).] In a parallel manner, the essence or purpose of legitimate journalism is the reporting of objective facts or developments, not the appropriation of the form of expression used by the news source. Wainwright Securities Inc. v. Wall Street Transcript Corp., 2 Med.L.Rptr. 2153, 558 F.2d 91, 95-96 (2d Cir.1977).

5. After a period of some uncertainty, INS v. AP was reaffirmed by the 1973 ruling of the U.S. Supreme Court in Goldstein v. California, 412 U.S. 546 (1973). The case, involving record piracy, assures the validity of the misappropriation doctrine and the use of state unfair competition laws. "Running a newsroom with scissors and a paste pot, then," says Paul Sullivan, "is not only unimaginative and unethical, but also quite probably illegal. The newsroom is no place for a plagiarist. Based on historical analysis, it appears that news piracy will be punished."<sup>120</sup>

6. A case with important implications for source-reporter relations is Sinatra v. Wilson, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 2008 (D.N.Y.1977). There a federal district court held that what a celebrity says to a columnist in an interview may be protected by common law copyright. Frank Sinatra said that he planned to publish an autobiography, but columnist Earl Wilson "scooped" him with a "boring" and unauthorized biography alleged to contain Sinatra's "private thoughts, statements, impressions and emotions." Action for a false-light invasion of privacy was also permitted on the basis of what plaintiff alleged to be false and fabricated statements. The issues could only be decided, said the court, after discovery and trial. In 1983 Sinatra sought $2 million in damages and an injunction against publication of another unauthorized biography, this one by Kitty Kelly.

7. A newspaper has the protection of common law trademark in its name. But after eight years of nonpublication and in the absence of a trademark registration for its name, a newspaper plaintiff was said to have no business, property, or goodwill interest which could be damaged by another.<sup>121</sup>

Ten years after it folded, the New York Herald Tribune's successor corporation failed to block the fledgling and now defunct New York daily, The Trib, from using that nameplate in a suit for common law trademark infringement, unfair competition, and misappropriation. The original Tribune was denied a preliminary injunction absent a showing of irreparable injury. Only 550 copies of the International Herald Tribune circulated in New York City, and there appeared to be no direct competition for advertising. There were also doubts as to whether the original trademark represented goods or services still in use in commerce and as to whether the mark had not been abandoned. The court noted that there were 250 "Tribunes" in the United States and at least two—Chicago and Oakland—were commonly referred to as the "Trib."<sup>122</sup>

119. Nimmer, Does Copyright Abridge the First Amendment Guarantees of Free Speech and Press? 17 UCLA L.Rev. 1180 (1970); Patterson, Private Copyright and Public Communication: Free Speech Endangered, 28 Vand. L.Rev. 1161 (1975).

120. Sullivan, op. cit., p. 28.

121. Duff v. Kansas City Star Co., 299 F.2d 320 (8th Cir. 1962).

8. Many difficult questions about the new copyright act will eventually be answered in litigation. In the meantime, arm yourself with a copy of the sixty-one-page statute and the address of the Copyright Office. The latter will furnish information about methods of securing copyright and the procedures for making registration, will attempt to explain the operations and practices of the Copyright Office, and will relinquish facts filed in the public records of the office.

The Copyright Office, however, will not give legal advice or comment upon the merits, status, or ownership of particular works or upon the extent of protection afforded to particular works by the copyright law.

COPYRIGHT AND THE ELECTRONIC MEDIA

The 1976 Cable Television Copyright Legislation

The Background of the Cable Copyright Problem

One of the most significant new extensions of copyright protection is in the area of cable television. Cable television systems pick up broadcasts of programs originated by others and retransmit them to paying subscribers. A minimum cable system consists of a central antenna system, which receives and amplifies television signals, and a network of cable through which the signals are carried to the television sets of individual subscribers.

In its early period, cable television was often known by the acronym CATV, which originally referred to "Community Antenna Television," but today the term "cable television" is usually used. At its inception, community antenna television systems facilitated the reception of local television broadcasts which subscribers could not satisfactorily receive directly from the local station because of mountainous terrain, tall buildings, or other physical conditions. Recently, cable television has made use of sophisticated technology to retransmit signals from broadcasters in distant communities by use of microwave relay or space satellite which subscribers could not otherwise receive.

Until January 1, 1978, the liability of cable television operators for the retransmission of copyrighted programs was governed by the 1909 Copyright Act. Section 1(e) of the act indicates that it is an infringement of the owner's copyright "to perform the copyrighted work publicly for profit if it be a musical composition. * * * 17 U.S.C.A. § 1(e).

What was the relationship of the federal copyright statute to cable television? Did CATV as it operated constitute a copyright infringement? These questions were raised and decided in a Supreme Court case, Fortnightly Corp. v. United Artists. Prior to Fortnightly, a bill had been introduced in the Senate which would have immunized CATV from copyright coverage in some areas and exposed it to coverage in others. Despite the pendency of proposals for congressional legislation, the Court decided to resolve the issue of the copyright statute's applicability to CATV judicially.

122. I.H.T. Corp. v. Saffir Publishing Corp. v. International Herald Tribune, 3 Med.L.Rptr.1907, 444 F.Supp. 185 (D.N.Y.1978).

The advent of cable technology is not the first occasion where the application of the 1909 Act to the new electronic media had arisen. The question of whether retransmission of a radio broadcast constitutes a "performance" of the copyrighted work had been considered in Buck v. Jewell-LaSalle Realty Co., 283 U.S. 191 (1931). In Jewell-LaSalle, the owner of a copyrighted song sued the management of a Kansas City hotel for distributing a program from a central radio to all public and private rooms by means of a wire distribution system. The federal district court dismissed the case, a result which was affirmed by the federal court of appeals. The Supreme Court reversed and held that the hotel was liable under the Copyright Act on a "multiple performance" theory: "[A] single rendition of a copyrighted selection [can result] in more than one public performance for profit."

When broadcasters sought to challenge the cable industry's asserted exemption from copyright liability, broadcasters not surprisingly contended that cable systems were in the same relationship to broadcasters as the hotel had been in the Jewell-LaSalle case. Accordingly, broadcasters argued that when cable operators re-transmitted their signals without permission, they infringed the Copyright Act.

In Fortnightly Corp. v. United Artists Television, Inc., 392 U.S. 390 (1968), the first Supreme Court case specifically examining the question of copyright liability of cable systems, United Artists Television brought suit against Fortnightly, an owner and operator of cable television systems in two West Virginia towns, for copyright infringement based on the retransmission of several motion pictures to which plaintiff owned the copyrights.<sup>123</sup> The federal district court applied the Jewell-LaSalle "multiple performance" doctrine and found the cable systems liable under the Copyright Act. The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit affirmed.

The Supreme Court reversed and held that the functions of a cable television system did not constitute a "performance" within the meaning of the 1909 Act. The Fortnightly decision has been justly described as a "surprisingly unsophisticated analysis of the functions of the cable television system."<sup>124</sup> The Court's analysis turned on the question of whether cable television acted as "broadcasters" or "viewers." At a time when cable systems mainly performed the functions of a community antenna, the Court reasoned as follows: "Essentially, a CATV system no more than enhances the viewer's capacity to receive the broadcaster's signals; it provides a well-located antenna with an efficient connection to the viewer's television set." For the Court the copyright issue was easily resolved: "Broadcasters perform. Viewers do not perform." The Jewell-LaSalle precedent was referred to as "a questionable 35-year-old decision that in actual practice has not been applied outside its own factual context. * * *"

123. It should be recognized that a considerable measure of protection had been extended to television copyright proprietors prior to the Fortnightly case, and this protection was unaffected by the Fortnightly case. To be sure, this protection flowed from regulatory action by the FCC rather than by an extended interpretation of the old federal copyright statute. In order to minimize the loss of potential royalties by television copyright holders as a result of CATV operations in "an unexploited market," the FCC in 1966 issued a regulation preventing CATV from extending distant signals in the top hundred television markets. These markets constitute 90 percent of the total television audience. See Note, 36 Geo.Wash.L.Rev. 672 at 677 (1968); Second Report and Order, Community Antenna Television Systems, 2 FCC2d 725 (1966). For more recent developments, see text, pp. 694, 1007.

124. See S.C. Greene, The Cable Provisions of the Revised Copyright Act, 27 Cath.Univ.L.Rev. 263 at 270 (1978).

The Fortnightly case concerned cable television retransmission of local broadcast signals and left open the question of copyright liability when the cable systems imported distant signals to viewers who could not otherwise have received them.

The question of copyright liability for cable television continued to simmer, and the failure to resolve it satisfactorily for all the parties concerned undoubtedly served to retard the development of the full potential of cable. But the continued exploitation of valuable copyrighted programming properties by cable operators, permitted by Fortnightly, provoked a new legal fight to reconsider the copyright question in cable.

In CBS v. Teleprompter, the creators and producers of various television programs brought suit in the federal district court for copyright infringement against owners and operators of cable television systems for retransmitting the programs. Relying on Fortnightly, the federal district court dismissed. See CBS, Inc. v. Teleprompter, 355 F.Supp. 618 (S.D.N.Y.1972).

On appeal, the federal appeals court discerned two distinct categories of viewers and determined that a cable system that distributes distant signals which are beyond the capabilities of any local antenna should be held to have "performed" the copyrighted works within the meaning of the 1909 Copyright Act, but that Fortnightly was controlling with regard to local signals which could be received by either a community antenna or standard rooftop antenna belonging to the owners of the television sets. CBS v. Teleprompter Corp., 476 F.2d 338 (2d Cir.1973), distinguished Fortnightly as follows:

[I]n this case, the new audience is one that would not have been able to view the programs even if there had been available in its community an advanced antenna such as that used by a CATV system. The added factor in such a case is the signal transmitting equipment, such as microwave links, that is used to bring the programs from the community where the system receives them into the community in which the new audience views them.

The Supreme Court rejected this reasoning and held that the distance between the broadcast station and the ultimate viewer is irrelevant to the determination of whether the retransmission is a broadcaster or viewer function. Teleprompter Corp. v. CBS, 415 U.S. 394 (1974).

Speaking for the Court, Justice Stewart declared:

By importing signals that could not normally be received with current technology in the community it serves, a CATV system does not, for copyright purposes, alter the function it performs for its subscribers. When a television broadcaster transmits a program, it has made public for simultaneous viewing and hearing the contents of that program. The privilege of receiving the broadcast electronic signals and of converting them into the sights and sounds of the program inheres in all members of the public who have the means of doing so. The reception and rechanneling of these signals for simultaneous viewing is essentially a viewer function, irrespective of the distance between the broadcasting station and the ultimate viewer.

In a 6-3 decision, the Supreme Court affirmed in part and reversed in part the judgment of the court of appeals in Teleprompter. The Court agreed with the court of appeals that use of new developments in cable such as program origination, sale of commercials, and interconnection, did not convert the entire cable operation, regardless of distance from the broadcasting station, into a "broadcast function." Such new uses of cable did not subject the cable system to copyright infringement liability.

The Supreme Court further held that the court of appeals in Teleprompter was incorrect in holding that importation of "distant" signals from one community into another constitutes a "performance" under the Copyright Act. On this latter point, the Court said:

By importing signals that could not normally be received with current technology in the community it serves, a CATV system does not, for copyright purposes, alter the function it performs for its subscribers. * * * The reception and rechanneling of these signals for simultaneous viewing is essentially a viewer function, irrespective of the distance between the broadcasting station and the ultimate viewer.

Congress began consideration of copyright law revision in 1955, but it was not until 1967 that the first revision bill was introduced. Barbara A. Ringer, Register of Copyrights, told the House Judiciary Committee that the Supreme Court decision in Teleprompter gave new impetus to the need for final congressional resolution of the cable television copyright issue:

Meanwhile, as the 1967 legislative momentum began to slow more and more, it was increasingly apparent that cable television had become the make-or-break issue for copyright revision. * * * By 1971, it was apparent that the bill was completely stymied over the CATV issue, and even the issuance of comprehensive FCC rules in 1972, governing the carriage of signals and programming by cable systems, failed to break the impasse. * * * There may have been other reasons, but certainly the most immediate cause of the new momentum for the proposed copyright provision was the Supreme Court's decision in Teleprompter v. CBS, in March 1974, holding that under the 1909 statute, cable systems are not liable for copyright infringement when they import distant signals.

The decision was followed quickly by favorable actions in the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee and full committee, and after a brief referral to the Commerce Committee by passage in the Senate on September 9, 1975, by a vote of 70 to 1.<sup>125</sup>

The Copyright Act of 1976

In 1976, after more than twenty years of legislative effort, Congress passed the first complete revision of the federal copyright law since 1909. The new law, which became effective on January 1, 1978, sought to accommodate the technological changes which had taken place since the 1909 act. For the first time, photocopying, computer and information systems, tape and video recording, and cable television systems were brought within the ambit of intellectual property rights afforded protection.

Rather than place cable system owners in the impractical and burdensome position of negotiating with the copyright holder of each retransmitted program, Congress established a "compulsory license" mechanism under which each cable operation could avoid copyright liability by paying royalties set by statute to the Register of Copyrights. 17 U.S.C.A. § 111(c) (d). In addition, a Copyright Royalty Tribunal was established to distribute the royalties, periodically review and adjust the statutory royalty rates, and resolve disputes over the distribution of royalties. 17 U.S.C.A. § 801. Cable system royalties are computed on the basis of specified percentages of the system's gross receipts for each distant signal non-network program. 17 U.S.C.A. § 111(d)(2)(B). A value referred to as a "distant signal equivalent" is assigned to each distant signal television station carried by a cable system. 17 U.S.C.A. § 111(f); House Comm. on the Judiciary, Report on Copyright Law Revision, H.R.

125. Testimony of Hon. Barbara A. Ringer, Register of Copyrights, May 7, 1975, House Comm. on the Judiciary, Copyright Law Revision, H.R.Rep.No.2223, 94th Cong., 1st Sess. 105 (1976).

Rep. No. 1476, 94th Cong. 2d Sess. 100 (1976). A value of one is given to each independent (non-network) station, and a value of one-quarter is assigned to each network and noncommercial educational station for any non-network programming retransmitted by the cable system. The number of distant signal equivalents are totaled and multiplied by declining percentages of the cable system's gross receipts during the six-month reporting period to determine the amount due to the Register of Copyrights. 17 U.S.C.A. § 111(d)(2)(B)(i)-(iv). A minimum compulsory license fee is required whether or not distant signal non-network programming is retransmitted. 17 U.S.C.A. § 111(d)(2)(C, D). In order to lighten the burden on small cable systems, a reduced royalty fee is computed. 17 U.S.C.A. § 111(d)(2)(C)(D).

In sum, the relationship between copyright owners and users of copyrighted material has been radically changed by the 1976 Copyright Act. The copyright holder of a retransmitted distant signal non-network program has no control over its use by a cable system or the royalty fee he receives. Material carried on local or network programs can be retransmitted without liability for the most part. In addition, the burden is placed on the copyright holder to apply to the Copyright Royalty Tribunal for the distribution of royalties. 17 U.S.C.A. § 111(d)(4)(5).

The Copyright Royalty Tribunal and the Courts

The Copyright Royalty Tribunal's distributions of cable royalty fees have occasioned some litigation. NAB v. Copyright Royalty Tribunal, 675 F.2d 367, 8 Med.L. Rptr. 1433 (D.C.Cir. 1982), provided a helpful insight into the workings of the new Copyright Royalty Tribunal. Judge Mikva explained the court's decision to affirm the Tribunal's allocation of cable royalty fees:

These consolidated cases present challenges to the first distribution of cable royalty fees under the 1976 Copyright Act, 17 USC 101 et seq. Section 111 of the act requires cable operators to pay royalties to the creators of copyrighted program material that is used by the cable systems. Recognizing the impracticability of requiring every cable operator to negotiate directly with every copyright owner, the act sets up a two step process. First, cable operators are required to obtain a copyright license and periodically pay royalty fees into a central fund. Second, the Copyright Royalty Tribunal distributes those fees among claimants. The tribunal's first royalty distribution concerned royalties paid for 1978. The distribution was broken down into two phases, with phase one determining the allocation of cable royalties to specific groups of claimants, and phase two allocating royalties to individual claimants within each group. Under phase one, the $15 million fund was distributed in the following manner: programs syndicators and movie producers, 75 percent; sports leagues, 12 percent; television broadcasters, 3.25 percent; public television, 5.25 percent; and music claimants, 4.5 percent. Radio claimants were denied any award. The tribunal observed that movies, syndicated programs, and sports events constitute the largest and most profitable segment of programming transmitted by cable systems, and therefore deserved commensurate compensation.

The challenges to the tribunal's distribution seem motivated essentially by each petitioner's feeling that it deserved a larger share of the fund. Such reactions flow naturally from the not insignificant consequences of changing one or two percentage points in the distribution of $15 million, and the size of the fund is expected to grow enormously in future years as cable systems become more widespread. Claims of this sort are generally well beyond the expertise or authority of courts, however, and review is limited to determining whether the tribunal's actions were arbitrary or capricious, and whether they are supported by substantial evidence.

* * *

It may be observed that agitation over the tribunal's initial apportionment has been somewhat overstated. The allocation of the 1978 fund will not displace the operation of relevant market forces in the future. Now that the tribunal's methods are known, for example, broadcasters will bargain more knowledgeably with sports teams about telecasts of sports events, and representatives of music, programs, and movies may contract accordingly with television broadcasters. In any event, as the size of the fund grows, the dispute over how to slice the pie may be more vigorous but it will also be more structured. The umpire has established precedents on which the players may rely in submitting their claims. The tribunal's decision has achieved an initial allocation of the fund that is well within the metes prescribed by Congress.

Students should note in Judge Mikva's ruling that judicial review of the allocation of cable royalty fees by the Copyright Royalty Tribunal is limited to determining whether "the tribunal's actions were arbitrary or capricious, and whether they are supported by substantial evidence."

This is a somewhat ambiguous statement because in administrative law the "arbitrary and capricious" standard of review and the "substantial evidence" standard are considered to be separate and distinct standards of review. Generally, an administrative agency will have an easier time showing that its action was not arbitrary or capricious than it will have in showing that its findings were supported by substantial evidence.

Amusement and Music Operators v. Copyright Royalty Tribunal, 676 F.2d 1144, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1435 (7th Cir. 1982), involved a review of the CRT's petition for decision to raise the compulsory licensing fees for the use by jukebox operators of copyrighted music from the initial fee of $8 set forth in the 1976 Copyright Act. The act directed the CRT to determine "commencing in January 1980 whether an adjustment of the fee" was necessary. Judge Cudahy, speaking for the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, in Amusement and Music Operators stated that the appropriate standard for judicial review of CRT determinations was the arbitrary and capricious standard of review:

The tribunal ruled that royalties should be set at a level of $50 per year per jukebox. In order to avoid disruption of the jukebox industry, the tribunal provided for implementation of this fee in two stages, with a $25 fee being imposed for 1982 and 1983, and the full $50 fee being assessed thereafter. The tribunal also determined to subject the royalty fee to a cost-of-living adjustment in 1987. The first issue is what standard of review should be applied to the tribunal's ruling. The tribunal urges that an "arbitrary and capricious" standard applies, but petitioners argue that the proper standard is to require the tribunal's decisions to be supported by substantial evidence. A close reading of the Administrative Procedure Act indicates that the most appropriate standard is the "arbitrary and capricious" standard. Application of this standard to the instant case will not, however, produce a significantly different result than attempting to determine whether there is substantial evidence in the record to support the tribunal's findings.

* * *

Its reliance on the marketplace evidence together with the statutory criteria and the entire record in arriving at the $50 figure is not arbitrary and capricious.

Rate-making is an art, not a science. We believe that the tribunal did not act either unreasonably or unlawfully by establishing a $50 royalty fee which would be implemented in stages and be subject to future inflationary adjustments.

Sanctions in the New Cable Copyright Law

What are the sanctions of the new cable provision of the revised copyright law? If the terms of the compulsory license<sup>126</sup> are violated, the injured local radio and television broadcaster, as well as the copyright holder, may sue offending cable systems. 17 U.S.C.A. §§ 501-505. One commentator has analyzed these provisions as follows:

The broadcasters need not show direct injury from the cable system's alteration of their signals. Thus, copyright provides a device through which broadcasters can protect themselves and stem illegal importations by acting as "private attorneys general."<sup>127</sup>

The compulsory licensing scheme, it should be emphasized, is only applicable if the programming of television stations which is retransmitted by cable systems has been authorized by the FCC in the first place. See § 111(c)(1). If a cable system undertakes a retransmission which is not authorized by the FCC regulations, the cable system is subject to an action for infringement of copyright. The ability of a broadcaster to invoke the sanctions of the new copyright act against a cable operator who is violating FCC cable regulations thus gives a new enforcement dimension to those regulations.

For a discussion of the relationship between the new cable copyright legislation and the deregulation of cable (in the context of FCC regulations), see this text, pp. 1002ff, 1007. See also Malrite TV v. FCC, 652 F.2d 1140, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1649 (2d Cir. 1981), text, p. 1003.

Cable System Liability Under § 111

Formerly, under the Fortnightly and Teleprompter interpretations of the 1909 Copyright Act, cable system operators had usually been able to avoid royalty payments to broadcasters based on cable's retransmission of broadcast signals. The 1976 Copyright Act adopted the reasoning of the federal court of appeals in Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. v. Teleprompter Corp., 476 F.2d 338 (2d Cir.1973), and generally made cable systems subject to copyright liability for the retransmission of distant signal non-network programming. 17 U.S.C.A. § 111(d)(2)(B). Thus, those who hold local and network program copyrights do not benefit from the royalties which flow from the compulsory licensing features of the new act.

Specifically, it is § 111 of the Copyright Act which focuses on cable system liability for the retransmission of copyrighted works. House Report, supra, p. 88. Bear in mind that the pertinent words of art are in § 111 "primary transmission" and "secondary transmission." The "primary" transmitter is the one whose signals are being picked up and further transmitted by a "secondary" transmitter which must be someone engaged in "the further transmitting of a primary transmission simultaneously with the primary transmission." § 111(f); House Report, p. 98. "Under section 111, secondary transmissions may be of three kinds. They may be completely 126. For a helpful explanation of how the new compulsory licensee fees are to be computed, see Nimmer on Copyright, 1978 ed., § 8.18, p. 212, et seq.

127. E. Noreika, Communications Law, 1977 Annual Survey of American Law 577, at 583 (This material as well as other passages from the article referred to in this section is reprinted with permission of the 1977 Annual Survey of American Law and New York University). 17 U.S.C.A. §§ 501-505; see also House Report, supra, p. 159. Injunction, impoundment of illegal copies, actual or statutory damages as well as allowance of costs and reasonable attorney's fees are among the panoply of remedies afforded the legal or beneficial holder of a copyright under the new act. See §§ 502-505. Criminal penalties of a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both, are also provided for a willful act of infringement, whether for purposes of commercial advantage or private financial gain. 17 U.S.C.A. § 506. In addition, any willful alteration of the retransmitted program by a cable system can subject the cable system to being deprived by the court of its compulsory license for one or more distant signals for up to thirty days. 17 U.S.C.A. § 510(b).

exempt from any liability under the copyright law [§ 111(a)], subject to a compulsory license [§ 111(c)(1), (d)] or fully subject to copyright liability [§ 111(b), (c)(2)-(4), (e)(1)(2)] and, in this latter case, if unauthorized by the copyright owner, actionable as an infringement." G. Meyer, The Feat of Houdini or How the New Act Disentangles the CATV Copyright Knot 22 N.Y.L.Sch.L.Rev. 545, at 553.

Congress determined that the retransmission of local broadcast signals or network programming does not injure the copyright owner, while the "transmission of distant non-network programming by cable systems causes damage to the copyright owner by distributing the program in an area beyond which it has been licensed." House Report, supra, p. 90. The philosophy of the new act in this regard has been very clearly stated by one commentator:

The basic principle adopted by the statute is that royalties under the compulsory licenses are payable only for the retransmission of distant signals, not for the retransmission of any local signals or any network programs whether local or distant. The retransmissions which give rise to the payment of royalties are therefore those which pertain to the programs of distant independent stations and of non-network programs telecast by distant network affiliated stations which beside network programs also telecast programs originated in their studios.<sup>128</sup>

A "network station" is considered to be "one or more of the television networks in the United States providing nationwide transmissions." 17 U.S.C.A. § 111(f). A network affiliated station which mainly transmits network programming comes within the definition, which is intended to be strictly construed.<sup>129</sup> Since network station broadcasts are nationwide, the copyright holder's royalty fee has already been calculated on a nationwide basis. Therefore, no payment is required for the retransmission of network programs by a cable system. What is the reason for this? The following rationale has been offered:

Cable retransmission of a purely local signal is similar to the distant network programming. If the cable retransmission is to the same market audience for which the copyright owner is compensated by the primary transmitter, there is no economic injury to the copyright owner. C.S. Greene, 27 Cath.L.R. 263, at 289.<sup>130</sup>

Certain Secondary Transmissions Exempted. Cable television transmissions which do not qualify for the exemptions within § 111(a) are subject to full copyright liability, which can only be avoided by obtaining a compulsory license. For the exemptions to apply, the primary transmission must have been made to be viewed by the general public. § 111(b); House Report, supra, p. 92. Clause (1) of subsection (a) exempts from copyright liability an antenna system constructed "by the management of a hotel, apartment house or similar establishment," for the purpose of relaying a transmission to rooms used as living quarters or for private parties, and does not include such meeting places as dining rooms and ballrooms. House Report supra, p. 91; See generally Nimmer on Copyright, 1978 ed., § 8.18, p. 198 et seq. Although this exemption is inapplicable if the secondary transmission is made by a cable system, or if there is a direct charge for the transmission, this clause is important as it overrules the Buck v. Jewell-LaSalle holding insofar as private rooms are concerned.

128. See Meyer, supra, at 558.

129. See House Report, p. 98.

130. (This material as well as other passages from the article referred to in this section is reprinted with permission from the Catholic University Law Review). See also Meyer, Note 128, supra, at 558-559, fn. 63.

An exemption for the use of an ordinary radio or television set in a public room is contained in § 110(5). It has been perceptively observed that the "distinction between this exemption [§ 110(5)] and the liability provided in section 111(a)(1) appears to be principally predicated on the sophistication of the receiving equipment. * * *". Greene, supra, at 284.<sup>131</sup> Thus, a retransmission to a public room in a hotel by a cable system or a radio system as described in Jewell-LaSalle is still considered an infringing act.

Clause (2) exempts any systematic instructional programming of "a governmental body or a nonprofit educational institution * * *" as described in § 110(2): "On the other hand, the exemption does not cover the secondary transmission of a performance on educational television or radio of a dramatic work or a dramatic musical work such as an opera or musical comedy, or of a motion picture."<sup>132</sup> Clause (3) exempts secondary transmissions made by a passive carrier who has no direct or indirect control over the content or selection of the primary transmission.<sup>133</sup> Clause (4) exempts secondary transmitters which operate on a nonprofit basis.<sup>134</sup>

Exempt Secondary Transmissions and § 111(a)(3)

A case involving a significant interpretation of what constitutes a secondary transmission made by a passive carrier which is exempt from copyright liability under 17 U.S.C. § 111(a)(3) was Eastern Microwave v. Doubleday Sports, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 2353

(2d Cir. 1982). Eastern Microwave, a common carrier, had been retransmitting the original signals of WOR-TV, a New York City television station, to cable television systems outside WOR's service area.

Judge Markey described the retransmission process in his opinion for the Second Circuit:

Retransmission is accomplished by converting broadcast signals into microwave signals and relaying the microwave signals via satellite or a string of line-of-sight terrestrial microwave repeater stations. Retransmitted signals are delivered by EMI to the head-ends of the customers of its transmitting services, cable television (CATV) systems, which then reconvert the microwave signals to television signals for distribution to and viewing by the CATV system's subscribers.

Eastern Microwave, Inc. (EMI) exercised no control over content or the selection of the transmissions. Doubleday Sports, Inc., owner of the New York Mets, contracted with WOR-TV to broadcast approximately 100 Mets games each season. The Mets "owns the copyright in the audiovisual work represented by the Mets games."

EMI did not ask permission of Doubleday to retransmit WOR-TV's signals. In March 1981, Doubleday notified EMI that it considered retransmission of WOR-TV Mets game broadcasts to constitute an infringement of Doubleday's copyright. EMI then sought relief in the federal courts for a "declaratory judgment that it was a passive carrier exempt from copyright liability

131. One commentator interprets § 110(5) and 111(a)(1) to mean that " * * * a single television set or even several loudspeakers placed in a lobby, bar or restaurant of a hotel, apartment house or similar establishment would be exempt * * * if they transmit local broadcasts of copyrighted works. * * *" Meyer, supra, at 555. But the House Report, p. 87, notes that "The Committee * * * accepts the traditional * * * interpretation of the Jewell-LaSalle decision, under which public communication by means other than a home receiving set, or further transmission of a broadcast to the public is considered an infringing act."

132. Meyer, supra, at 555-6.

133. House Report, p. 92.

134. See Greene, supra, at 285.

under 17 U.S.C. § 111(a)(3)." The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit ruled that "EMI is not in law infringing Doubleday's exclusive right to display its copyrighted work by passively retransmitting the entirety of its customer WOR-TV's broadcast signal to the head-ends of its customer CATV systems."

Important portions of Judge Markey's opinion in Eastern Microwave are set forth below:

To remain exempt, a carrier-retransmitter must avoid content control by retransmitting exactly what and all of what it receives, as EMI does here. To do otherwise could be perceived as the carrier's making the transmission its own. That EMI serves customers at one end of the communications chain, and telephone companies serve customers at the other, is not controlling, so long as neither injects its own communications into that chain. If WOR-TV had requested and paid EMI to transmit its broadcast signal, for example, the traditional common carrier context would have been created. That EMI serves numerous receiving CATV systems, with the one available set of signals those customers prefer, rather than serving numerous sending broadcasters, is a difference insufficient to deny EMI the statutory carrier exemption on the ground that it is controlling the content or selection of that set of signals.

The second requirement, an absence of direct or indirect control over the particular recipients of its retransmission, is fully satisfied by EMI. It is undisputed that the "particular recipients" of EMI's retransmissions are the many CATV systems which it serves under contract. That it renders its service to certain CATV systems and not others does not itself constitute, however, any control direct or indirect, over particular recipients.

* * *

EMI also meets the third requirement, that it merely provide wires, cables, or other communications channels for the use of others. As above indicated, the "others" here are the receiving CATV systems which cannot afford their own wires, cables, and channels, rather than the originating senders who use (and cannot afford their own) wires, cables, and channels of more traditional common carriers like a telephone company. EMI provides the wires and cables of its repeater stations for use of its CATV customers in acquiring the signals of WOR-TV and those of many other originators. It provides its single satellite transponder for use of its CATV customers in acquiring the signals of necessarily one originator, i.e., WOR-TV.

* * *

Congress drew a careful balance between the rights of copyright owners and those of CATV systems, providing for payments to the former and a compulsory licensing program to insure that the latter could continue bringing a diversity of broadcasted signals to their subscribers. The public interest thus lies in a continuing supply of varied programming to viewers. Because CATV systems served by intermediate carriers cannot provide their full current programming to their subscribers without the services of those carriers, imposition of individual copyright owner negotiations on intermediate carriers would strangle CATV systems by choking off their lifeline to their supply of programs, would effectively restore the "freeze" on cable growth described above, and, most importantly, would frustrate the congressional intent reflected in the [a]ct by denying CATV systems the opportunity to participate in the compulsory licensing program. After years of consideration and debate, Congress could not have intended that its work be so easily undone by the interposition of copyright owners to block exercise of the licensing program by cable systems.

EMI is, like all common carriers, compensated for its transmission services as such. In accord with its FCC-approved tariff, and as above indicated, EMI is paid by each CATV system in relation to the number of its subscribers up to a maximum of $4,000. The fee does not increase thereafter, regardless of the number of a CATV system's subscribers. In contrast, the royalty fee paid by each CATV system under the [a]ct is limited to no maximum, but is entirely based on percentages of gross receipts from subscribers to the CATV service in accord with 17 U.S.C. § 111.

It is undisputed that if each CATV system had its own string of microwave repeaters or satellite transponders it would be liable through the Tribunal to a copyright owner for only the one established royalty fee when and if it publicly performed the copyrighted work by making it available to its subscribers; and that such an integrated CATV system would not be liable for a second royalty fee for having itself retransmitted the original broadcast signal to its headend. We are unpersuaded by counsel's urging that a different result should obtain when a separate entity, e.g., EMI, supplies the retransmission service. That EMI is a separate entity supplies no justification for subjecting EMI to copyright liability when those same activities would not result in copyright liability if carried out by the CATV systems served by EMI. In the Act, Congress established a specific scheme for recognition of the rights of copyright owners. Under that scheme those rights are not unlimited. Neither are they rendered superior to the rights of viewers. If this court were to impose here a requirement that intermediate carriers negotiate with and pay all copyright owners for the right to retransmit their works, assuming such requirement were not impossible to meet, such action would produce a result never intended by Congress, namely a substantially increased royalty payment to copyright owners with no increase in number of viewers.<sup>135</sup>

The Compulsory License. Compulsory copyright licensing is the most controversial aspect of the new Copyright Act because the copyright owner loses control over the use and price of his product. While all cable systems which retransmit primary transmissions made by an FCC-licensed broadcast station are subject to compulsory licensing [§ 111(c)], royalties are only paid for distant signal non-network programming [§ 111(d)(2)(B)].

Transmissions Fully Liable Under the Copyright Act. The compulsory license does not protect the cable system operator in all instances. A cable operator exposes himself to liability for copyright infringement if he retransmits a program originally transmitted to a limited audience rather than the public at large. § 111(b). This provision applies to the retransmission of "MUZAK," closed circuit broadcasts to theaters, pay television or pay-cable. House Report, p. 92. Full copyright liability also results from the "willful or repeated" retransmission of signals not permissible under the rules and regulations of the FCC § 111(c)(2)(A). The House Report points out that the "words 'willful or repeated' are used to prevent a cable system from being subjected to severe penalties for innocent or casual acts." See House Report, supra, p. 93.

Further, the cable system is liable if it has not recorded the compulsory license notice, deposited the statement of account or paid the royalty fee. § 111(c)(2)(B). Cable system operators must be careful not to alter the primary transmission in any way in order to avoid copyright liability. Any willful change whatsoever in the program content or commercial advertising messages "significantly alters the basic nature of the cable retransmission service, and makes its function similar to that of a broadcaster." House Report, p. 93; § 111(c)(3).

Copyright, Television, and the Advent of the Home Video Recorder

Just as the emergence of cable has changed the existing structure of commercial television, so the advent of the home video recorder is changing commercial VHF television and cable television. The average householder can now thwart the scheduling schemes of the wizards of Madison Avenue. With the development of the home video recorder, finely tuned calculations about audience flow may all go for naught. But if a viewer in his home decides to videorecord off his home TV screen, does he violate the copyright laws?

135. For an example of a case where an exemption under § 111(a)(3) was denied, see WGN v. United Video, 685 F.2d 218, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 2170 (7th Cir. 1982).

In Universal City Studios v. Sony, 659 F.2d 963, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2065, (9th Cir. 1981), the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit ruled, reversing an earlier federal district court decision, Universal City Studios, Inc. v. Sony Corp. of America, 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1737, 480 F.Supp. 429 (C.D.Calif.1979), that off-the-air copying of copyrighted visual materials by owners of home video recorders was not a fair use but was a copyright infringement for which the manufacturers, distributors, and sellers of home video recorders were liable. (Why weren't the homeowners liable? Did problems of privacy and enforcement make relief against the homeowner with the video recorder impossible or impractical?) The United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit ruled that the district court was in error in finding an implied video recording exception in the 1976 Copyright Act. Judge Kilkenny observed:

There is no clear legislative language indicating that home video recording is not within the exclusive rights granted by § 106. The statute itself and the House and Senate Reports accompanying the 1976 Act do not provide for a broad based home use exception. There was never a considered review of the home video recording problem. The statements supporting the district court's conclusion hardly represent—when considered in the context in which they were made and in the context of the 20 year copyright revision process—a firm expression of Congressional intent to carve out a major exception to the copyright scheme.

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals also ruled that home video recording for private, noncommercial use was not a fair use.<sup>136</sup>

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals then added:

New technology, which makes possible the mass reproduction of copyrighted material (effectively taking control of access from the author), places a strain upon the fair use doctrine. A court, if it decides that fair use is applicable, is required to weigh—in "balancing the equities"—the "benefit" of an extremely popular increase in access with the "harm" to a plaintiff. The harm to a copyright plaintiff is inherently speculative, and as Williams & Wilkins Co. and the district court decision indicate, a plaintiff is faced with the unenviable task of proving the nonexistence of fair use, which has typically been viewed as a defense.

* * *

It is our conviction that the fair use doctrine does not sanction home videorecording. Without a "productive use", i.e. when copyrighted material is reproduced for its intrinsic use, the mass copying of the sort involved in this case precludes an application of fair use. An analysis of the four factors listed in § 107 does not dictate a contrary result.

136. In Gordon, Fair Use As Market Failure: A Structural and Economic Analysis of the Betamax Case and Its Predecessors, 82 Col.L.Rev. 1600 at 1614 (1982), the "fair use" analysis used by the Ninth Circuit in Sony is criticized and rejected. Instead, a three-part test is advocated:

Fair use should be awarded to the defendant in a copyright infringement action when (1) market failure is present; (2) transfer of the use to defendant is socially desirable; and (3) an award of fair use would not cause substantial injury to the incentives of the plaintiff copyright owner. The first element of this test ensures that market bypass will not be approved without good cause. The second element of the test ensures that the transfer of a license to use from the copyright holder to the unauthorized user effects a net gain in social value. The third element ensures that the grant of fair use will not undermine the incentive-creating purpose of the copyright law.

A consideration of the first factor—"the purpose and character of the use, including whether such use is of a commercial nature or is for nonprofit educational purposes"—does not aid appellees' case. * * * The district court, however, emphasized the non-commercial and home use of the copyrighted material. The statute does not, however, draw a simple commercial/noncommercial distinction. The statute contrasts commercial and nonprofit educational purposes, and there is no question that the copying of entertainment works for convenience does not fall within the latter category. The fact that the "infringing" activity takes place in the homes does not warrant a blanket exemption from any liability. It seems more appropriate to address the privacy concerns raised by the district court in fashioning the appropriate relief. The suggestion that First Amendment concerns support the purpose of Betamax users to increase the access to copyrighted materials is wholly without merit. "The first amendment is not a license to trammel on legally recognized rights in intellectual property." * * *

The second factor—"the nature of the copyrighted work"—does not support a finding of fair use. * * * The courts inquire whether the nature of the material is such that additional access "would serve the public interest in the free dissemination of information." * * * If a work is more appropriately characterized as entertainment, it is less likely that a claim of fair use will be accepted. The district court, however, found it significant that "This case involves only that copyrighted material which plaintiffs voluntarily choose to have telecast over public airwaves to individual homes free of charge." 480 F.Supp. at 453. We fail to see how the method by which appellants have chosen to distribute their works is relevant to this factor of the fair use analysis. * * *

The third factor—"the amount and substantiality of the portions used in relation to the copyrighted work as a whole"—clearly weighs against a finding of fair use. The district court acknowledged that "Home use recording off-the-air usually involves copying the entire work," 480 F.Supp. at 454, and that this typically precludes a finding of fair use. The court concluded, however, that the courts have only been concerned about the "substantiality" of the copying when it produced harm, and that "this taking of the whole still constitutes fair use, because there is no accompanying reduction in the market for 'plaintiff's original work.'" We believe that this view of the case law is completely wrong.

In Walt Disney Productions v. Air Pirates, [581 F.2d 751, 759 (9th Cir.1978), cert. den., 439 U.S. 1132 (1979)], We stated "While other factors in the fair use calculus may not be sufficient by themselves to preclude the fair use defense, this and other courts have accepted the traditional American rule that excessive copying precludes fair use." Id. at 758. In addition, the district court in Loew's Inc. v. Columbia Broadcasting System, 131 F.Supp. 165 (S.D.Cal.1955), stated "The mere absence of competition or injurious effect upon the copyrighted work will not make a use fair. The right of a copyright proprietor to exclude others is absolute and if it has been violated the fact that the infringement will not affect the sale or exploitation of the work or pecuniarily damage him is immaterial." * * * These cases clearly did not limit their discussion of "substantiality" to cases in which the plaintiff had been harmed. It seems clear that these cases are based, in part, on the notion that copyright is a property interest and that it is impermissible, in the vast majority of cases, to "appropriate" the copyrighted material without the owner's consent. The copyright laws afford the author the right to control access to his work, and, absent compelling justifications, this right should not be abridged.

* * *

The fourth factor—"the effect of the use upon the potential market for or value of the copyrighted work"—does not support a contrary result. In light of the preceding discussion, we do not believe that it is necessary to address the harm issue with respect to the liability question. We feel compelled, however, to express our disagreement with the district court's approach on this issue.

First, it seems apparent that the district court was much too strict in requiring appellants to establish its degree of harm. * * *

Nimmer has suggested that the central question in the determination of fair use is whether the infringing work tends to diminish or prejudice the potential sale of plaintiff's work." 3 Nimmer, supra, § 13.05(E)(4)(c) at 13-84. Under this sort of standard, it seems clear that appellants should have prevailed. Since the copies made by home videorecording are used for the same purpose as the original, a finding of fair use is not justified. The district court seems to recognize, on several occasions, that appellants will have to take affirmative steps to compete with the appropriated versions of their work. That such competition is necessary supports appellants' allegations of harm; at the least, it makes clear that the "infringing" activity tends to prejudice the potential sale of appellants' work. It is clear that home users assign economic value to their ability to have control over access to copyrighted works. The copyright laws would seem to require that the copyright owner be given the opportunity to exploit this market.

Second, we do not believe that the district court paid sufficient attention to the fact that it is extremely difficult for a copyright plaintiff to prove harm from the activities of specific defendants. 3 Nimmer, supra, § 13.05(E)(4)(c). * * *

The court, in analyzing the fourth fair use factor, did not pay sufficient attention to the cumulative effect of mass reproduction of copyrighted works made possible by videorecorders. It seems clear that absent an inquiry which takes into consideration the full scope of the "infringing" practice, copyright plaintiffs, in cases of this sort, would face insuperable obstacles to the protection of their rights. And, where one looks at the full scope of the activity in question, it seems clear that it tends to diminish the potential market for appellants' works.

Editorial Note

A very complex issue in the Sony or Betamax case was the issue of appropriate relief. Assuming off-the-air copyright of copyrighted audiovisual material from the home television screen was a copyright infringement, how could meaningful relief be provided to the copyright owners? The court of appeals responded to this question as follows:

Because we have found that home videorecording constitutes copyright infringement and that appellees are liable for such use, the district court's judgment must be reversed and the case remanded for a consideration of the appropriate relief. The relief question is exceedingly complex, and the difficulty in fashioning relief may well have influenced the district court's evaluation of the liability issue. The difficulty of fashioning relief cannot, however, dissuade the federal courts from affording appropriate relief to those whose rights have been infringed.

Appellants stated at oral argument that they were seeking a remand to the district court so that the district court could fashion the appropriate relief. This approach makes a good deal of sense; a district court is in a better position to resolve, in an appropriate fashion, the relief question.

There are a number of possibilities that the district court may want to consider. Because of the difficulty of proving the precise nature of the harm to appellants, statutory damages may be appropriate, 17 U.S.C. § 504(c). The district court also has a broad range of equitable remedies from which to choose. Section 502(a) provides that the court "may * * * grant temporary and final injunctions on such terms as it may deem reasonable to prevent or restrain infringement of a copyright." The district court determined that an injunction would not be an appropriate remedy. 480 F.Supp. 463-69. The court should reconsider this action.

We note that, as a general rule, a copyright plaintiff is entitled to a permanent injunction when liability has been established and there is a threat of continuing violations. * * * In discussing the analogous photocopying area, Nimmer suggests that when great public injury would result from an injunction, a court could award damages or a continuing royalty. This may very well be an acceptable resolution in this context.

In fashioning relief, the district court should not be overly concerned with the prospective harm to appellees. A defendant has no right to expect a return on investment from activities which violate the copyright laws. Once a determination has been made that an infringement is involved, the continued profitability of appellees' businesses is of secondary concern.

The United States Supreme Court agreed to review the decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in the Sony case, but it postponed any decision in the case in the 1983 term so as to hear more evidence on this complex question.

LOBBYING AND POLITICAL CAMPAIGN REGULATION

Lobbying: Problems of Definition

1. In United States v. Harriss, 347 U.S. 612 (1954), the Court in a complex interpretation, which the dissenting justices thought was a rewriting of the law, upheld the constitutionality of provisions of the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act, 60 Stat. 812, 839, 2 U.S.C.A. §§ 261-270, which require designated reports to Congress from every person "receiving any contributions or expending any money" 2 U.S.C.A. § 264 for the purpose of influencing the passage or defeat of any legislation by Congress; and which require any person "who shall engage himself for pay or for any consideration for the purpose of attempting to influence the passage or defeat of any legislation" to register with Congress and to make specified disclosures. 2 U.S.C.A. § 267.

The Court noted in Harriss that many states had enacted legislation regulating lobbying. But the most important aspect of the Harriss case was that it made clear that some government regulation of lobbying was permissible. See United States v. Rumely, 345 U.S. 41 (1953). As construed, the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act was constitutional.

Arguably, the guidance which journalists, speakers, publicists, pressure groups, and organizations needed was provided by a very precise definition which the Court gave of what could be regulated under the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act in Harriss.

The effort of the Court in Harriss to rewrite the Lobbying Act received academic as well as judicial criticism. For example, the Court in Harriss took the position that the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act did not apply to persons or organizations which spent their own funds to help defeat or support proposed legislation. Similarly, the Court held that the act did not "affect persons soliciting or expending money unless the principal purpose thereof is to influence legislation."

What relationship does removing from the scope of regulation organizations which spend their own funds, or fund expenditures for purposes not principally designed to influence legislation, have to safeguarding the "right to petition"? What difference does it make whether the organization spends its own or other people's funds to support or defeat legislation? See United States v. International Union, United Automobile Aircraft and Agricul- tural Implement Workers of America, 352 U.S. 567 (1957), where the Court upheld an indictment charging a union with having used union dues to sponsor commercial television broadcasts designed to promote the election of certain candidates. That case involved consideration of the Federal Corrupt Practices Act. See generally, Comment The Regulation of Union Political Activity: Majority and Minority Rights and Remedies, 126 U.Pa.L.Rev. 386 (1977).

2. A landmark case holding that lobbying is protected by the First Amendment is Eastern Railroad President's Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127 (1961). However, the student should not conclude that because lobbying is protected by the First Amendment, government is obliged to encourage this protected activity. An important case illustrating that Congress may make distinctions among lobbying organizations vis-à-vis subsidies—as long as the distinctions are not ideological in origin—is Regan v. Taxation With Representation of Washington, 103 S.Ct. 1997 (1983). In this case Taxation With Representation (TWR) applied for tax exempt status under 26 U.S.C. § 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code. The Internal Revenue Service denied the application on the ground that a substantial portion of TWR's activities would involve legislative lobbying—attempting to influence legislation. Such activity is specifically not permitted by § 501(c)(3). TWR contended that the congressional decision reflected in § 501(c)(3) not to “subsidize its lobbying violates the First Amendment.” See Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513 (1958), where the Court observed: “[T]o deny an exemption to claimants who engage in speech is in effect to penalize them for the same speech.” The Regan Court ruled that § 501(c) did not violate the First Amendment. Justice Rehnquist ruled for the Court:

The Code does not deny TWR the right to receive deductible contributions to support its non-lobbying activity, nor does it deny TWR any independent benefit on account of its intention to lobby. Congress has merely refused to pay for the lobbying out of public monies. This Court has never held that the Court must grant a benefit such as TWR claims here to a person who wishes to exercise a constitutional right.

This aspect of the case is controlled by Cammarano v. United States, 358 U.S. 498 (1959), in which we upheld a Treasury Regulation that denied business expense deductions for lobbying activities. We held that Congress is not required by the First Amendment to subsidize lobbying. Id., at 513. In this case, like in Cammarano, Congress has not infringed any First Amendment rights or regulated any First Amendment activity. Congress has simply chosen not to pay for TWR's lobbying. We again reject the “notion that First Amendment rights are somehow not fully realized unless they are subsidized by the [s]tate.”

TWR objected that a specific provision of the Internal Revenue Code, § 170(c)(3), permitted taxpayers “to deduct contributions to veterans' organizations that qualify for tax exemption under § 501(c)(19).” TWR argued that it was an equal protection violation to permit veterans' organizations to lobby but to refuse to “subsidize the lobbying of § 501(c)(3) organizations.” The Court, per Justice Rehnquist, rejected this contention:

The case would be different if Congress were to discriminate invidiously in its subsidies in such a way as to “aim[ ] at the suppression of dangerous ideas.” Cammarano, supra, at 513, quoting Speiser, supra, at 519. But the veterans' organizations that qualify under § 501(c)(19) are entitled to receive tax-deductible contributions regardless of the content of any speech they may use, including lobbying. We find no indication that the statute was intended to suppress any ideas or any demonstration that it has had that effect.

The sections of the Internal Revenue Code here at issue do not employ any suspect classification. The distinction between veterans' organizations and other charitable organizations is not at all like distinctions based on race or national origin.

* * *

Congressional selection of particular entities or persons for entitlement to this sort of largesse "is obviously a matter of policy and discretion not open to judicial review unless in circumstances which here we are not able to find."

* * *

We have held in several contexts that a legislature's decision not to subsidize the exercise of a fundamental right does not infringe the right, and thus is not subject to strict scrutiny. Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976), upheld a statute that provides federal funds for candidates for public office who enter primary campaigns, but does not provide funds for candidates who do not run in party primaries. We rejected First Amendment and equal protection challenges to this provision without applying strict scrutiny. Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980), and Maier v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977), considered legislative decisions not to subsidize abortions, even though other medical procedures were subsidized. We declined to apply strict scrutiny and rejected equal protection challenges to the statutes.

The reasoning of these decisions is simple: "although government may not place obstacles in the path of a [person's] exercise of * * * freedom of [speech], it need not remove those not of its own creation." Harris, supra. Although TWR does not have as much money as it wants, and thus cannot exercise its freedom of speech as much as it would like, the Constitution "does not confer an entitlement to such funds as may be necessary to realize all the advantages of that freedom." Id., at 318. As we said in Maier, "[c]onstitutional concerns are greatest when the [s]tate attempts to impose its will by force of law. * * *" Where governmental provision of subsidies is not "aimed at the suppression of dangerous ideas," Cammarano, supra, its "power to encourage actions deemed to be in the public interest is necessarily far broader." Maier supra at 476.

We have no doubt but that this statute is within Congress' broad power in this area. TWR contends that § 501(c)(3) organizations could better advance their charitable purposes if they were permitted to engage in substantial lobbying. This may well be true. But Congress—not TWR or this Court—has the authority to determine whether the advantage the public would receive from additional lobbying by charities is worth the money the public would pay to subsidize that lobbying, and other disadvantages that might accompany that lobbying. It appears that Congress was concerned that exempt organizations might use tax-deductible contributions to lobby to promote the private interests of their members. See 78 Cong.Rec. 5861 (1934) (remarks of Senator Reed); Id., at 5959 (remarks of Senator La Follette). It is not irrational for Congress to decide that tax exempt charities such as TWR should not further benefit at the expense of taxpayers at large by obtaining a further subsidy for lobbying.

It is also not irrational for Congress to decide that, even though it will not subsidize substantial lobbying by charities generally, it will subsidize lobbying by veterans' organizations. Veterans have "been obliged to drop their own affairs and take up the burdens of the nation * * * subjecting themselves to the mental and physical hazards as well as the economic and family detriments which are peculiar to military service and which do not exist in normal civil life." Johnson v. Robison, 415 U.S. 361, 380 (1974). Our country has a long standing policy of compensating veterans for their past contributions by providing them with numerous advantages. This policy has "always been deemed to be legitimate." Personnel Administrator v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256, 279, n. 25 (1979).

The issue in this case is not whether TWR must be permitted to lobby, but whether Congress is required to provide it with public money with which to lobby. For the reasons stated above, we hold that it is not. Accordingly, the judgment of the [c]ourt of [a]ppeals is reversed.

State Regulation of Political Campaigns and the Press

MILLS v. ALABAMA

384 U.S. 214, 86 S.Ct. 1434, 16 L.Ed.2D 484 (1966).

Justice BLACK delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question squarely presented here is whether a State, consistently with the United States Constitution, can make it a crime for the editor of a daily newspaper to write and publish an editorial on election day urging people to vote a certain way on issues submitted to them.

On November 6, 1962, Birmingham, Alabama, held an election for the people to decide whether they preferred to keep their existing city commission form of government or replace it with a mayor-council government. On election day the Birmingham, Post-Herald, a daily newspaper, carried an editorial written by its editor, appellant, James E. Mills, which strongly urged the people to adopt the mayor-council form of government. Mills was later arrested on a complaint charging that by publishing the editorial on election day he had violated § 285 of the Alabama Corrupt Practices Act, Ala.Code, 1940, Tit. 17, §§ 268-286, which makes it a crime "to do any electioneering or to solicit any votes * * * in support of or in opposition to any proposition that is being voted on on the day on which the election affecting such candidates or propositions is being held." * * *

We come now to the merits. * * * The question here is whether it abridges freedom of the press for a State to punish a newspaper editor for doing no more than publishing an editorial on election day urging people to vote a particular way in the election. We should point out at once that this question in no way involves the extent of a State's power to regulate conduct in and around the polls in order to maintain peace, order and decorum there. The sole reason for the charge that Mills violated the law is that he wrote and published an editorial on election day urging Birmingham voters to cast their votes in favor of changing their form of government.

Whatever differences may exist about interpretations of the First Amendment there is practically universal agreement that a major purpose of that Amendment was to protect the free discussion of governmental affairs. This of course includes discussions of candidates, structures and forms of government, the manner in which government is operated or should be operated, and all such matters relating to political processes. The Constitution specifically selected the press, which includes not only newspapers, books, and magazines, but also humble leaflets and circulars, see Lovell v. City of Griffin, 303 U.S. 444, to play an important role in the discussion of public affairs. Thus the press serves and was designed to serve as a powerful antidote to any abuses of power by governmental officials and as a constitutionally chosen means for keeping officials elected by the people responsible to all the people whom they were selected to serve. Suppression of the right of the press to praise or criticize governmental agents and to clamor and contend for or against change, which is all that this editorial did, muzzles one of the very agencies the Framers of our Constitution thoughtfully and deliberately selected to improve our society and keep it free. The Alabama Corrupt Practices Act by providing criminal penalties for publishing editorials such as the one here silences the press at a time when it can be most effective. It is difficult to conceive a more obvious and flagrant abridgment of the constitutionally guaranteed freedom of the press.

Admitting that the state law restricted a newspaper editor's freedom to publish editorials on election day, the Alabama Supreme Court nevertheless sustained the constitutionality of the law on the ground that the restrictions on the press were only "reasonable restrictions" or at least "within the field of reasonableness." The court reached this conclusion because it thought the law imposed only a minor limitation on the press—restricting it only on election days—and because the court thought the law served a good purpose. * * *

This argument, even if it were relevant to the constitutionality of the law, has a fatal flaw. The state statute leaves people free to hurl their campaign charges up to the last minute of the day before election. The law held valid by the Alabama Supreme Court then goes on to make it a crime to answer those "last-minute" charges on election day, the only time they can be effectively answered. Because the law prevents any adequate reply to these charges, it is wholly ineffective in protecting the electorate "from confusing last-minute charges and countercharges." We hold that no test of reasonableness can save a state law from invalidation as a violation of the First Amendment when that law makes it a crime for a newspaper editor to do no more than urge people to vote one way or another in a publicly held election.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Alabama is reversed and the case is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

Judgment reversed and case remanded.

Justice Douglas, with whom Justice Brennan joins, concurring.

* * *

---

COMMENT

1. Assume that the Alabama Corrupt Practices Act were amended to provide an exception for "last minute charges" made just prior to an election so that charges could be answered in the press even on election day. The purpose of the amendment would be to render the Alabama Corrupt Practices Act a reasonable restriction of the press. Would even Justice Black have acquiesced if the Alabama Corrupt Practices Act provided for a two-week moratorium on electioneering or vote solicitation preceding all state elections?

2. In Mills, the Alabama Corrupt Practices Act case, the argument was pressed on the Court which, if accepted, would have deferred decision of First Amendment issues: it was contended that the judgment before the Court was not sufficiently final to be reviewed by the Supreme Court. Justice Douglas concurred in the result in Mills and gave emphatic approval to the Court's decision to face the constitutional issues in view of what he considered to be the consequences of lack of resolution by the United States Supreme Court. (The Alabama Corrupt Practices Act provision at issue had been upheld as constitutional by the Alabama Supreme Court.) The "chilling" effect on the Alabama press was described as follows:

"The threat of penal sanctions has, we were told, already taken its toll in Alabama: the Alabama Press Association and the Southern Newspaper Publishers Association, as amicus curiae, tell us that since November 1962 editorial comment on election day has been nonexistent in Alabama."

3. Narrow construction of the term "lobbying" in Rumely and Harriss minimized the investigative scope of the legislative investigation in Rumely and the regulatory scope of the Act in Harriss. Would a limited construction technique have sufficed in Mills? Suppose electioneering and vote solicitation were read by the Court as simply not meant to apply to the press?

4. See Mills v. Alabama, supra, with the decision of the Supreme Court of Florida sustaining a right of reply to political candidates during campaigns, Miami Her- ald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo this text, pp. 581-584.

State Regulation of Corporate "Speech" and the Opinion Process

A case which intersected with problems of law and journalism on a number of critical issues was the 5-4 decision of the Supreme Court in First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765 (1978) text, p. 151. Massachusetts had attempted by a criminal statute to prohibit the efforts of banks and business corporations to make expenditures for the purpose of influencing state elections on referendum proposals. The Supreme Court invalidated the Massachusetts statute in an opinion that was widely publicized as extending free speech rights to business corporations. Just as media corporations were able to claim free press rights under the First Amendment, said the Court, so ordinary business corporations should be able to assert free speech rights under the First Amendment as well.

Is the thrust of the Bellotti case an effort by the Court to accord equivalent First Amendment clout to business corporations to make them sufficiently effective contenders with media corporations for purposes of influencing the political process?

At least impliedly, the answer to this question appears to be yes. Thus, when Massachusetts argued to the United States Supreme Court that "communication by corporate members of the institutional press is entitled to greater constitutional protection than the same communication" undertaken by the business corporations in Bellotti, Justice Powell rejected the argument:

Certainly there are voters in Massachusetts, concerned with such economic issues as the tax rate, employment opportunities, and the ability to attract new business into the State and to prevent established businesses from leaving, who would be as interested in hearing [the] view [of the business corporations] on a graduated tax as the views of media corporations that might be less knowledgeable on the subject.

Powell's opinion appears to encourage pluralism in the opinion process among various power aggregates but not between individuals and the same power aggregates. Note that the old Warren Court liberals, Marshall and Brennan, were allied in dissent with Justice White.

Professor Bezanson, defending current trends of concentration and monopoly in the media, has argued that these developments equip the media more adequately to contend with government: "Centralization of power may equip the press to scrutinize and counterbalance the increasingly pervasive influence of expanding government." Bezanson added that the "very attributes of monopolistic power and lack of response to competing views * * * may be positive characteristics of the press under the Burger view." See Bezanson, The New Free Press Guarantee, 63 Virginia L.Rev. 731 at 774-775 (1977). The Burger view of the press, as expressed in his Bellotti concurrence, appears somewhat less enchanted. See the Chief Justice's concurring opinion in Bellotti, text, p. 151. The result and rationale reached by Justice Powell for the Court accords a full measure of First Amendment protection to business corporations. Thus, part of the reason for this holding appears to be designed to allow business corporations the same freedom from restrictive state election campaign regulation which media corporations enjoy. See Mills v. Alabama, supra.

Justice White attempted to sketch a different kind of First Amendment hierarchy—between individuals and corporations (whether the corporation is a media or nonmedia corporation is irrelevant in this theory). In this hierarchy, ideas that are the product of "individual choice" have the higher claim to First Amendment protection. Justice Powell rejected this hierarchy because "it would apply to newspaper editorials and every other form of speech created under the auspices of a corporate body."

Justice White sympathized with state efforts to make the opinion process more egalitarian. In his view, the Massachusetts legislation was designed to prevent dislocations in the marketplace of ideas engendered by the corporate form. Justice White ascribed the following objective to the Massachusetts legislation under review in Bellotti: "preventing institutions which have been permitted to amass wealth as a result of special advantages extended by the state for certain economic purposes from using that wealth to acquire an unfair advantage in the political process."

Federal Regulation of Campaign Financing—Securing Equality in the Opinion Process

1. In the aftermath of Watergate with its disclosures of misbehavior in the financing of political campaigns, new interest was directed to legislative efforts to clean up the whole process of campaign financing. Accordingly, in 1974 Congress enacted some significant amendments to the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971. The amendments set forth complex provisions requiring the reporting and disclosure of political contributions to Congress. Further, in an innovative step, Congress set up a scheme for allocating subsidies to candidates in presidential elections. Congress also set forth new and stringent limitations on contributions to candidates and on expenditures by or on behalf of candidates.

The new legislation soon became the subject of major constitutional litigation. In 1976, the Supreme Court in Buckley v.

Valeo, a 200-page per curiam decision, took something of a middle road with respect to the massive congressional intervention into the federal election process represented by the new legislation. The Court ruled that the limitations on political contributions to candidates in federal elections were constitutional. But the new legislation's limitations on expenditures by contributors or by groups in behalf of a clearly identified candidate were not valid. The Court said that the legislation's limitation on political contributions could be justified on the basis of its underlying purpose—prevention of the actuality and appearance of corruption which resulted from large individual financial contributions. The governmental interest in the integrity of the political process in this regard justified the incidental infringement on political association which accompanied the limitation on political contributions. The expenditure limitations, however, were deemed to fall into a different category and were hence invalid. The expenditure limitations were held to constitute a direct and substantial infringement on the ability of individuals, candidates, and organizations not under a candidate's control to conduct political activities.

2. In Justice Marshall's dissent in part and concurrence in part in Buckley, he commented on the Court's emphasis on "promoting the reality and appearance of equal access to the public arena." Marshall was indignant because, although the Court permits Congress to limit contributions to political candidates, the Court, by invalidating the expenditure provisions, safeguards against the express wish of Congress, "the wealthy candidate's immediate access to substantial sums of money," even though that access may obtain for the affluent candidate a headstart his opponent will be unable to overtake. In the view of the Buckley Court, imbalances in the communications process did not constitute First Amendment violations.

On the contrary, the Court remarked that in Tornillo the more "modest burden" of printing a reply was deemed to be constitutionally impermissible. The suggestion in Buckley v. Valeo appeared to be that government-imposed equality in the opinion process is apparently not ordained by the First Amendment and indeed may be forbidden by it.

3. In a masterful analysis of Buckley v. Valeo, Professor Lawrence Tribe argued that if the case is seen in context, it is just another in a series of cases issued by the Supreme Court in the 1970s in which the Court attempts "to secure for the wealthy the advantages of their position" even in the face of legislative efforts "to move in a more egalitarian direction." Professor Tribe commented on the Court's reaction to the expenditure and contribution provisions of the 1974 amendments to the Federal Campaign Election Act of 1971:

Whether or not one regards government as responsible for the distribution of wealth underlying this distortion, it is hard to deny that the contribution and expenditure limitations redress it and to that extent increase freedom of speech. If the net effect of the legislation is to enhance freedom of speech, the exacting review reserved for abridgements of free speech is inappropriate.

See Tribe, American Constitutional Law 803-805 (1978).

4. With respect to the disclosure provisions, note that the Court did not give them an indefinite constitutional bill of health. While the Court validated the disclosure requirements for the moment even as to minor parties, it did leave open the possibility that proof of injury by minor parties in a concrete case might cause the invalidation of the disclosure provisions as to them. Here the concern was that disclosure of one's support for an unpopular political party might fatally sap that party's potential for growth. Minor parties are presumably more likely to stand for unpopular causes, and, therefore, compelled exposure of an individual's support for such a party may well raise First Amendment issues of governmental infringement on associational freedom. Similar issues were considered by the Court when it reflected on the issue of whether there was a right to anonymous speech. See Talley v. California, text, p. 155.

Disclosure provisions relating to federal elections, although less encompassing than those considered in Buckley v. Valeo, had been upheld by the Court when it reviewed the Federal Corrupt Practices Act of 1925 in Burroughs v. United States, 290 U.S. 534 (1934).

5. The Court in Buckley v. Valeo upheld legislation providing for funding presidential elections on the ground that these provisions facilitated and enlarged public discussion and participation in the political process and did not abridge or restrict speech. But a governmental apparatus to subsidize candidates would appear to involve enhancing "the relative voice of others" in the sense that such subsidies benefit the less wealthy candidates. The first part of the Buckley decision, it will be recalled, had declared that enhancement of the "relative voice of others" is "foreign to the First Amendment."

It was argued to the Court in Buckley "by analogy" to the "no-establishment clause" of the First Amendment that "public financing of election campaigns, however meritorious, violates the First Amendment." The Court rejected the analogy and ruled that the subsidy provisions furthered First Amendment values:

Legislation to enhance these First Amendment values is the rule, not the exception. Our statute books are replete with laws providing financial assistance to the exercise of free speech, such as aid to public broadcasting and other forms of educational media, 47 U.S.C. §§ 390-399, and preferential postal rates and antitrust exemptions for newspapers, 39 CFR 132.2 (1975); 15 U.S.C. §§ 1801-1804.

6. The subsidy provisions of the Federal Campaign Finance Act withheld public funding from candidates without significant public support. The Court ruled that Congress could legitimately require that a candidate be able to make an initial showing "of a significant modicum of support" as a requirement for eligibility for subsidy. Such a requirement, said the Court, furthers the goal and "serves the important public interest against providing artificial incentives to 'splintered parties and unrestrained factionalism'." How do these remarks affect the question of whether it is a First Amendment mandate that government be careful to maintain ideological neutrality? See Wooley v. Maynard, text, p. 177. Do the foregoing remarks of the Court in Buckley, with their evident disdain for splinter parties, suggest that a revision of the "equal time" rule allocating broadcast time to a candidate on the basis, say, of the past voting strength of the candidate's party might be constitutional? See text, p. 805ff.

7. In Justice Powell's opinion for the Court in Bellotti, he observed that, although it was doubtless true that corporate advertising might influence the outcome of an election, that was no argument for its prohibition: "But the fact that advocacy may persuade the electorate is hardly a reason to suppress it." Justice Powell then buttressed this argument with the quotation from Buckley v. Valeo which declares that the notion that government may enhance the voice of some by restricting the voices of others "is wholly foreign to the First Amendment." But restrictions on political contributions constitute, in effect, the enhancement of the voice of some and the restriction on the voice of others. Perhaps, the explanation is that the Court doesn't consider "money" to be speech. In short, speech cannot be regulated in the same way monetary contributions can be.

See Politics and the Constitution: Is Money Speech? 85 Yale L.J. 1001 (1976).

8. California Medical Association v. Federal Election Commission (CALPAC), 453 U.S. 182 (1981), rejected a constitutional assault on the validity of 2 U.S.C. § 441a(1)(c) which prohibits individuals and unincorporated associations from contributing more than $5,000 per year to any multicandidate political committee. A plurality opinion by Justice Marshall, joined by Justices Brennan, White, and Stevens, accepted the notion that "proxy speech," or speech emanating from a political committee rather than the contributor himself, was different from direct political speech and deserving of less First Amendment protections. The plurality followed the contribution/spending dichotomy of Buckley holding that limitations on contributions to multicandidate political committees was a valid exercise of government authority. Justice Blackmun provided the vital fifth vote in CALPAC. He disagreed with the "proxy" ruling of the plurality but nonetheless concurred, finding that the contribution provisions satisfied a strict scrutiny test.

Professor Powe has observed: "An individual choice to have a message with which he agrees prepared by professionals is no less speech. Proxy speech is simply a pejorative name for a political commercial. It is still speech." See Powe, Mass Speech And The Newer First Amendment, 1982 Sup.Ct.Rev. 243 at 258-259.

9. Citizens Against Rent Control v. Berkeley, 454 U.S. 290 (1982), dealt with a local California ordinance that limited contributions to political referenda committees to $250 while imposing no restrictions on personal spending on the same issue. The ordinance also afforded similar treatment to corporations and individuals. Although the ordinance appeared to be consistent with the mandates of Buckley and Bellotti, the Court invalidated the ordinance under NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449 (1958), as an impermissible restraint on the "freedom of association." The Court reasoned that "[t]o place a spartan limit—or indeed any limit—on individuals wishing to band together to advance their views on a ballot measure, while placing none on individuals acting alone, is clearly a restraint on the right of association."

10. Common Cause v. Schmitt, 455 U.S. 129 (1982), involved the legality of expenditures by several conservative groups which were allied to further the election of Ronald Reagan. Under 26 U.S.C. § 9001-13, a candidate who accepts public financing for his campaign may not accept any form of private financing to augment the public monies other than to compensate for any deficiencies in the federal fund. 26 U.S.C. § 9002 requires that any expenditures on behalf of a political candidate must be made through an "authorized committee." To abide by these regulations, the conservative groups in Common Cause maintained an arm's length relationship with the campaign committee of Ronald Reagan. But, in doing so, the groups violated another provision of the Presidential Election Campaign Fund Act, 26 U.S.C. § 9012(f). That provision prohibits any unauthorized group from making independent expenditures of over $1,000 if the expenditures would "further the election" of a candidate receiving public financing. To dramatize the issue presented in Common Cause, the conservative groups had collectively spent $7.75 million, making § 9012(f)'s $1,000 limit look like petty cash.

A major purpose behind § 9012(f) was to eliminate the actual or apparent quid pro quo which results when individuals or interest groups spend vast sums of money to support a candidate.

Another argument in support of § 9012(f) is that the provision only regulates proxy speech. As such, the provision is not regulating the free speech rights of contributors since they are not engaging in communication. This argument rests on

Buckley and CALPAC. (After Citizens Against Rent Control v. Berkeley, is this argument outdated? Doesn't § 9012(f) intrude upon the right of association?)

At the district court level, the arguments in Common Cause were scrutinized in the light of Buckley v. Valeo. The district court found § 9012(f) invalid on the ground that it regulated expenditures and thus fell on the spending side of the spending/contribution dichotomy:

[B]uckley held that governmental interference in cleansing the electoral process of possible corruption was not enough to validate restrictions on expenditures. A "contribution" case, on the other hand, is entitled to less-exacting judicial scrutiny because the "transformation of contributions into political debate involves speech by someone other than the contributor." The case before this court is an "expenditure" case because it is precisely the speech of individual contributors which is hampered by statutory restriction. Common Cause v. Schmitt, 512 F.Supp. 489 (1980).

More specifically, the court ruled that:

[T]he communication sponsored by the political committees is the language of their members and contributors because the contributions are made based on an understanding and community of political interest among all of the political contributors. The contributors do have power over the speech disseminated by the political committees. Political speech like this is possible in the first instance only because the contributors contribute to one particular committee or another. Contributors associate in a particular political committee because the committee will express their own thoughts which benefit thereby from amplitude in numbers and professionalism. If a committee disappoints its membership, contributions will dry up.

Proceeding from this reasoning, it was an easy step to rule as Buckley did that the government interest behind expenditure ceilings could not justify this intrusion into political speech.

In summarily affirming the district court's decision with a four to four vote, the Supreme Court in Common Cause provided no guidance in dealing with the contribution/expenditure question or any suggestion as to the continued vitality of enhancement.

Professor Powe has made the following critique of the issues in Common Cause:

[I]f one candidate has no (or few) groups spending independently on his behalf while the other has such supporting groups, then the latter will have the potentiality (and in all probability the likelihood) of more media exposure. Since media exposure is deemed an essential element of a successful campaign, and more is typically better, independent expenditures may give an advantage to one side. Because the goal of public financing is to create a fair and equal campaign, the independent expenditures as such detract from the goal. See Powe, Mass Speech And The Newer First Amendment, 1982 Sup. Ct.Rev. 243 at 262.

LOTTERIES

1. A lottery, or what is sometimes called a gift enterprise, is a scheme in which there is distribution of a prize by chance for a consideration or a "price." All three elements must be present; absent any one, and there is no lottery.

Prize has been defined as anything of value.

Chance is a condition of winning over which the participant has no control, as when winning entries are drawn randomly or contestants must guess the outcome or the sum of the scores of a sports event.

Under federal law, chance is present even when the lottery is only partly based on chance, as in word games or "expert" predictions of sports results. Chance is clearly present in raffles, bingo, punch boards, and football pools, for example.

Consideration generally means that an expenditure in time, effort, or money must be made by the participant. Often there is a monetary price: something has to be purchased or done to make one eligible for the prize—a ticket, a box top, registration, or attendance.

Courts have differed on the degree of effort, financial or otherwise, that must be expended to constitute consideration. Submission of a coupon from a newspaper ad may not be consideration. Playing a punch card game at a service station as an adjunct to buying gasoline was sufficient consideration in Missouri<sup>137</sup> at one time but not in Oregon.<sup>138</sup> Oregon's Supreme Court said that consideration had to be pecuniary. Missouri's Supreme Court, representing a traditionally antilottery state, thought schemes "which appear even superficially to constitute a lottery" ought to be banned. One had to go to a Mobil Oil station to play the game, and the station owner was thereby benefitted.

A Washington state court ruled similarly in 1972 that football forecasting contests run by newspapers were prohibited lotteries under both state law and the state constitution. Consideration was found in the time and attention one would have to devote to the game and in the fact that someone would have to purchase at least one copy of the newspaper. Although some skill was involved in assessing the merits of football teams, chance was the dominant factor in picking correct outcomes for fifteen teams against 900 to 1 odds.<sup>139</sup>

137. Mobil Oil Corp. v. Danforth, 455 S.W.2d 505 (Mo.1970).

138. Cudd v. Aschenbrenner, 377 P.2d 150 (Or.1963).

139. Seattle Times Co. v. Tielsch, 495 P.2d 1366 (Wash.1972).

Missouri, in keeping with increasing permissiveness and an air of resignation toward gambling in America, amended its constitution in 1978 and 1980 to liberalize the definition of consideration and to allow charities and nonprofit organizations to operate bingo games. There is now about the land a rash of business promotional games, especially pyramid sales schemes, which flourish in spite of their illegality in Missouri and elsewhere. Promotional contests, drawings, and games are now permitted in a majority of states including Alabama, Arizona, California, Colorado, Illinois, Indiana, Maine, Minnesota, Michigan, Montana, New Hampshire, New York, Ohio, Oregon, Rhode Island, and Texas. In the early eighties they were prohibited in Delaware, Florida, Iowa, Nebraska, and Oklahoma, although the "permitted" list of states will continue to grow.

The Supreme Court of Utah, a holdout state, refused in 1979 to include in its interpretation of consideration in its state law incidental benefits accruing to a game promoter. The meaning of consideration was limited to what the player gives specifically to obtain a chance to win.<sup>140</sup>

At the federal level, games of chance in the retail food and gasoline industries are regulated to prohibit the misrepresentation of the odds of winning and any form of rigging, but they are not prohibited.<sup>141</sup>

Earlier, however, the United States Supreme Court in an important ruling held that consideration was absent from the radio-TV name-the-tune shows in which the only effort required for participation was listening and answering one's telephone in the remote possibility that it should ring. In reversing a ruling by the Federal Communications Commission, the Court noted that, "To be eligible for a prize on the 'give-away' programs involved here ['Stop the Music,' 'What's My Name,' and 'Sing It Again'], not a single home contestant is required to purchase anything or pay an admission price or leave his home to visit the promoter's place of business; the only effort required for participation is listening." FCC v. ABC, NBC and CBS, 347 U.S. 284 (1954). Chance also might have been absent had any of the shows required a listener to recall the name of a tune, although the issue did not arise in this case.

2. The fact of gambling in America has far outdistanced any Puritan proclivities against it. A 1976 federal commission report on gambling concluded that Americans gamble in massive numbers and that "legalized gambling is a healthy recognition of reality."<sup>142</sup> Nevertheless there has been ambivalence from the beginning. While the thirteen original colonies and some of our most renowned universities were largely financed by lotteries and Thomas Jefferson endorsed the lottery as "a salutary instrument wherein the tax is laid on the willing only,"<sup>143</sup> the Supreme Court in 1850 saw lotteries as a "widespread pestilence" * * * "infesting the whole community," * * * praying "upon the hard earnings of the poor," plundering "the ignorant and simple."<sup>144</sup>

Today, gambling is considered by most to be less a moral deficiency than a self-inflicted wound, a victimless crime that harms only the participant.

In 1982 there were fifteen state lotteries, if the District of Columbia were included. Parimutuel betting was either op-

140. Albertson's Inc. v. Hansen, 600 P.2d 982 (Utah 1979).

141. Marco Sales Co. v. FTC, 453 F.2d 1, 5 (2d Cir. 1971), 16 C.F.R. § 419.1 (1980).

142. "Gambling in America: Final Report of the Commission on the Review of the National Policy Toward Gambling", 1976, discussed in "Gambling Goes Legit", Time (Dec. 6, 1976), pp. 54-64.

143. Ibid., p. 56.

144. Phalen v. Commonwealth of Virginia, 12 L.D. 1030 (1850).

erational or permissible in thirty-two states, and gambling in one form or another was going on in all fifty states. Neal Peirce, a student of state and local government, called state lotteries "one of the most oversold, misguided and morally reprehensible innovations in state policy this century."<sup>145</sup> Eliot Marshall referred to them as "fraud by governments."<sup>146</sup> Many see lotteries as a most regressive and inefficient form of taxation. Moreover, the tremendous odds against winning are never fully communicated to the public.

3. Although the FCC, FTC, and Postal Service have done much over the years to discourage lotteries, the feds have been quite unsuccessful in influencing the states. And federal laws which had stood a great deal of pressure since the late nineteenth century and before began to crumble in the mid-seventies.

Sections 1302-1306 of Title 18 of the U.S. Code, first passed by Congress in 1868, prohibited use of the mails to promote or advertise lotteries. Later statutes prohibited broadcasting of lottery information or advertising. In 1969 the FCC demonstrated its resolve in enforcing these laws by taking a broadcaster challenge to them to the Second Circuit Court of Appeals. Upholding the FCC, the court ruled that broadcast announcements of New York state lottery winners was prohibited by federal law as enforced by the Commission. Exceptions would be "ordinary news reports concerning legislation authorizing the institution of a state lottery, or of public debate on the course state policy should take"—for example, an editorial for or against the continuation of the lottery or a news story specifying the number of schools that had been built with lottery funds. Although such information might "encourage" the conduct of a lottery, it would not promote it directly as would a plea to buy tickets or information on where to buy them.

It must be emphasized that newsworthiness has always been a defense against application of antilottery laws, even though the distinction between "news" and "promotion" is sometimes fine. Broadcasting the names of a list of winners would be "promotion," said the court: an interview with an excited winner would be "news." New York State Broadcasters Association v. United States, 414 F.2d 990 (2d Cir. 1969).

When the Third Circuit in New Jersey State Lottery Commission v. United States, 491 F.2d 219 (D.C. Cir. 1974), disagreed that announcing winning numbers in the state lottery in a newscast offended the law, the FCC petitioned the Supreme Court.

Before the Court could act, Congress intervened to rewrite the law. In January 1975 the new law exempted from earlier prohibitions all information concerning a state lottery 1) contained in a newspaper published in that state, and 2) broadcast by a radio or television station licensed in that state or an adjacent state which conducts such a lottery. 18 U.S.C.A. § 1307. The law favored broadcasters because newspapers were permitted to carry lottery information only if they were published in a state conducting a state lottery. The New York Times, for example, could not publish the results of the New Jersey or Pennsylvania state lotteries, although it could report the results of the New York state lottery.

In October 1976, § 1307 was amended to allow newspapers, as well as broadcasters, in lottery states to publish information about state lotteries in adjacent states. P.L. 94-525; 90 Stat. 2478. The statute was further amended in 1979 when mailings to foreign countries of lottery information were permitted so long as the foreign countries permitted it. P.L. 96-90, 93 Stat. 698 (1979).

Federal law still prohibits the mailing of information promoting or advertising a 145. Peirce, State Lotteries: Sport or Consumer Swindle? Minneapolis Tribune, June 12, 1977.

146. Marshall, State Lottery, New Republic (June 24, 1978), p. 20.

lottery, although efforts have been made to exempt lotteries conducted by nonprofit and charitable organizations in accordance with state law. Questions as to the status of the law ought to be addressed to the Office of the General Counsel, Mailability Division, Postal Service, Washington, D.C.

State laws vary, as has been noted, especially on the definition of consideration, the element of bargained-for exchange deemed essential to contractual validity. Where a nationwide scheme, for example a magazine sweepstakes, was legal under federal law but illegal under state law ("void where prohibited by law"), a Missouri trial court ruled that federal law prevails. The Missouri Supreme Court reversed under a long-arm statute, on condition that its judgment would have no deleterious effect on the operations of the U.S. Postal Service.

While there was no consideration in this case under federal lottery definitions, there was consideration under the then stricter Missouri statute.<sup>147</sup>

State banking commissions, liquor authorities, insurance departments, consumer protection agencies, and other state organs generally supervise sweepstakes, contests, and lotteries in the states.

STUDENTS AND THE FIRST AMENDMENT

1. Black armbands worn by school children on behalf of their parents' opposition to the Vietnam War led in 1969 to a Supreme Court ruling that became the cornerstone of freedom of speech and press on high school and college campuses.

The rule set forth in Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969), was that student First Amendment rights may not be abridged unless school authorities can convince the courts that expression would "materially and substantially interfere with the requirements of appropriate discipline in the operation of the school."<sup>148</sup>

"It can hardly be argued," the Court went on to say, "that either students or teachers shed their constitutional rights to freedom of speech or expression at the schoolhouse gate." And, citing a reference to boards of education in the landmark flag salute case, the Court reaffirmed what may be the foundational concept in this line of cases:

"That they are educating the young for citizenship is reason for scrupulous protection of Constitutional freedoms of the individual, if we are not to strangle the free mind at its source and teach youth to discount important principles of our government as mere platitudes."<sup>149</sup>

2. The Tinker Court used the words "enclaves of totalitarianism" to characterize the public schools. While overly harsh perhaps, surveys of scholastic journalism do indicate that censorship and punishment for constitutionally protected student expression are not uncommon and that some school administrators are not sensi-

147. State Ex. Inf. Danforth v. Reader's Digest, 527 S.W.2d 355 (Mo.1975).

148. The language is from Burnside v. Byars, 363 F.2d 744 (5th Cir. 1966), a case in which school authorities were enjoined from enforcing a regulation forbidding students to wear "freedom buttons."

A year later, a federal district court in Dickey v. Alabama State Board of Education, 273 F.Supp. 613 (D.Ala.1967), recognized the constitutional rights of the student press when a student editor's suspension for writing an editorial critical of Alabama's governor was reversed. The court relied on the "material and substantial interference" rule of Burnside v. Byars.

149. West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 637 (1943).

tive to constitutional values.<sup>150</sup> It is not uncommon for college editors to be required to submit copy for review to a faculty adviser. In high schools, administrators are often the censors.

"Censorship is the fundamental cause of the triviality, innocuousness, and uniformity that characterize the high school press," a national study by the Robert F. Kennedy Memorial concluded. "It has created a high school press that in most places is no more than a house organ for the school administration."<sup>151</sup>

Although only a miniscule number of cases of censorship and punitive action reach the courts, even a brief look at Student Press Law Center Reports documents the problem. In Torrance, California, the high school newspaper adviser was required to adhere to the standards of Rotary International rather than the standards of the First Amendment or appropriate state law in passing upon news and editorial and material—assurance of a pollyanna publication. And an adviser who refused to submit articles to the administration for prior review was fired. A Linden, New Jersey principal ordered the entire edition of a high school newspaper burned because he feared the consequences of an innocuous editorial on community affairs. Wisconsin administrators confiscated an entire monthly issue of a student newspaper because it contained a harmless report on a school board meeting.

Little wonder that the Kennedy study could add to its conclusions that "self-censorship, the result of years of unconstitutional administration and faculty censorship, has created passivity among students and made them cynical about the guarantee of free press under the First Amendment."

The Student Press Law Center estimates that at least 300 cases of censorship and constitutionally suspect punishment for publication occur each year on high school and college campuses. Recently they have taken second place to book-banning cases. In Board of Education Island Trees Union Free School District No. 26 v. Pico, 102 S.Ct. 2799 (1982), a divided Supreme Court upheld the Second Circuit Court of Appeals<sup>152</sup> in remanding for trial a lawsuit challenging the right of a school board to remove books from high school libraries. In a plurality opinion for the Court, Justice Brennan, joined by Justices Marshall and Stevens declared that books cannot be removed simply because school authorities object to their philosophical perspectives. The plurality would extend to students a First Amendment right to receive information, especially in the context of a school library. Chief Justice Burger, joined by Justices Powell, Rehnquist, and O'Connor, dissented because they didn't wish to interfere with the authority of school officials. Justice Blackmun concurred in part and concurred in the judgment. Justice White also wrote a concurrence. Although the Court provided no constitutional guidelines for school actions of this kind, the case may have a deterrent effect on book banning. The Island Trees school board chose to drop the case rather than go back to trial.

Illustrative of a portion of the case law is a ruling that the First Amendment was violated by a school board decision to remove all issues of MS magazine from a high school library without any showing of a countervailing and legitimate governmental interest, except the political and social views of individual board members. Salvail v. Nashua Board of Education, 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1096, 469 F.Supp. 1269 (N.H. 1979). See also, Right to Read Committee v. Chelsea, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 1113, 454 F.Supp. 703 (D.Mass.1978).

150. Inglehart, The College and University Student Press, 1973; Stevens and Webster, Law and the Student Press, 1973; Trager, Student Press Rights, 1974; Trager and Dickerson, College Student Press Law, 1976; Arnold and Kriehbaum, Handbook for Student Journalists, 1976; and Nat Hentoff, The First Freedom, 1980, chapters 1-4.

151. Jack Nelson ed., Captive Voices: The Report of the Commission of Inquiry into High School Journalism, 1974.

152. Pico v. Board of Education, 638 F.2d 404 (2d Cir. 1980).

But the problem of scholastic press censorship endures. Indeed, after the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals held that a Chicago public school rule limiting distribution of any publication on school premises without prior approval of the General Superintendent of Schools was unconstitutional,<sup>153</sup> researchers at Southern Illinois University surveyed public schools in the Seventh Circuit: the court ruling, they found, had little effect on the prior-review practices of school administrators.<sup>154</sup>

Circuit courts generally have been willing to permit the regulation of campus speech where there appears to be a clear and present threat of violence or disruption. An example of the latter was the distribution of fraudulent notices announcing the closing of the university.<sup>155</sup>

Where libel, invasion of privacy, obscenity, or fighting words are claimed to have disruptive potential, their existence ought to depend upon constitutionally acceptable definitions. And an extension of any fair procedure for deciding such questions could be delay of publication pending immediate judicial determination. Federal appellate courts, however, will be exceedingly wary of any procedure that condones prior restraint.<sup>156</sup>

Other state and federal court standards have begun to emerge in case law:

a. Where courts have allowed prior restraints or a denial of the use of college facilities, they have insisted upon due process—clear, unequivocal, and publicized rules as to what is restricted and under what conditions of time, manner, and place of distribution. And to whom is material submitted for review, and how long should a review take? In addition, federal appellate courts will look for precise and intelligible definitions of “disruption” and criteria for predicting it, with the burden of proof on school authorities, and for timely opportunities for appeal.

A leading case in this field is Healy v. James, 408 U.S. 169 (1972), in which a unanimous Court saw no facts supporting contentions of a Connecticut college president that “disruption” would be caused by recognizing an SDS (Students for a Democratic Society) chapter on the campus. The First Circuit Court of Appeals relied on Healy when it ruled in Gay Students of University of New Hampshire v. Bonner, 509 F.2d 652 (1st Cir. 1974), that although a topic may infuriate the community, it is nevertheless protected by the First Amendment. Even indirect restrictions, said the court, may be constitutionally impermissible if they impinge upon basic First Amendment guarantees. “Freedoms such as these are protected not only against heavy-handed frontal attack, but also from being stifled by more subtle governmental interference.”

And specifically on the point was Nitzberg v. Parks, 525 F.2d 378 (4th Cir. 1975), in which the court held that, even after four rewrites, a school board’s prior review policy was still vague and overbroad

153. Fujishima v. Board of Education, 460 F.2d 1355 (7th Cir. 1972). Students may be punished after distribution, said the Seventh Circuit, but there shall be no prior restraints.

154. Trager, Dickerson and Jarvis, an article in Student Press Law Center Report, No. 4 (Spring 1977), p. 1.

155. Speake v. Grantham, 317 F.Supp. 1253 (D.Miss.1970), affirmed without opinion, 440 F.2d 1351 (5th Cir. 1971). And in Jones v. State Board of Education, 407 F.2d 834 (6th Cir. 1969), the court upheld the suspension of students for distributing leaflets calling for a boycott of registration and for disrupting of campus meetings. The latter was seen by the court as conduct rather than speech.

156. Nichols, The Tinker Case and its Interpretation, 52 Journalism Monographs, 25–29, fn. 8, December 1977.

as to the meaning of "disruption." A prediction of disruption and nothing more is not enough to warrant prior restraint, said the Second Circuit in Trachtman v. Anker, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1041, 563 F.2d 512 (2d Cir. 1977).

b. In accordance with Justice Stewart's Tinker statement that the "First Amendment rights of children are not co-extensive with those of adults," courts have distinguished the First Amendment rights of college and high school students and of higher and lower grades in secondary schools. The Second Circuit upheld school authorities who refused to allow a school newspaper to distribute a sex survey questionnaire to students in grades nine through twelve.<sup>157</sup>

c. If school administrators take away a publication's subsidy or fire or suspend its editor, it must not be for First Amendment reasons. Although a college president may have authority to distribute student fees, he or she is not the ultimate authority of what is printed in the campus newspaper. "We are well beyond the belief," said a federal district court in Antonelli v. Hammond, 308 F.Supp. 1329 (D.Mass.1970), "that any manner of state regulation is permissible simply because it involves an activity which is part of the university structure and is financed with funds controlled by the administration."

"The state is not necessarily the unrestrained master of that which it creates and fosters," said the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals in Joyner v. Whiting, 477 F.2d 456 (4th Cir. 1973). "It may well be that a college need not establish a campus newspaper, or, if a paper has been established, the college may permanently discontinue publication for reasons wholly unrelated to the First Amendment. But if a college has a student newspaper, its publication cannot be suppressed because college officials dislike its editorial comment. * * * Censorship of constitutionally protected expression cannot be imposed by * * * withdrawing financial support, or asserting any other form of censorial oversight based on the institution's power of the purse."<sup>158</sup>

d. Punitive actions by school administrators against scholastic publications ought to be content free, except in those areas such as libel, obscenity, and disruptive speech (fighting words?) where clear and constitutionally acceptable guidelines have been set down. Campuses may be thought of as speech forums. "[O]nce having established such a forum," said a New York court, "the authorities may not then place limitations upon its use which infringe upon the right of the students to free expression as protected by the First Amendment unless it can be shown that the restrictions are necessary to avoid material and substantial interference with the requirements of appropriate discipline on the operation of the school."<sup>159</sup> An attack on religion had jeopardized the newspaper's mandatory subscription fee.

And in a case originating on the campus of the University of North Carolina, the Daily Tar Heel's liberal editorial policy was made the basis for an assault on its university subsidy. A federal district court pointed out that the paper served as a forum for the entire academic community and that its subsidy was not intended and had not been used to accommodate 157. Eisner v. Stamford Board of Education, 440 F.2d 803 (2d Cir. 1971); Quarterman v. Byrd, 453 F.2d 54 (4th Cir. 1971).

158. See also, Thomas v. Board of Education, Granville Central School District, 607 F.2d 1043 (2d Cir. 1979). Note that in Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980) the Court said that refusal to fund a constitutionally protected activity, without more, could not be equated with imposition of a "penalty" on that activity.

159. Panarella v. Birenbaum, 327 N.Y.S.2d 755 (1971). See also Stanley v. Magrath, 9 Med.L.Rptr. 2352 (8th Cir. 1983).

the propagation of a particular point of view.<sup>160</sup>

A denial of or modification in funding aimed at content considered offensive would be unconstitutionally punitive and discriminatory under Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233 (1936), this text, p. 138.

"Mere dissemination of ideas, no matter how offensive to good taste on a state university campus may not be shut off in the name alone of the 'conventions of decency'."<sup>161</sup>

And in Police Department of City of Chicago v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92 (1972), the Court warned that regulation which "slip[s] from the neutrality of time, place and circumstance into a concern about content * * * is never permitted."

"Government may be deemed to have abridged speech * * *," says Professor Laurence Tribe, "if on its face a governmental action is targeted at ideas or information that government seeks to suppress, or if a governmental action neutral on its face was motivated by (i.e., would not have occurred but for) an intent to single out constitutionally protected speech for control or penalty."<sup>162</sup>

e. All disciplinary proceedings, of course, must comport with the minimum standards of due process,<sup>163</sup> and this includes a mechanism for appeal.

f. "Unofficial" publications and all less conventional forms of expression such as pamphlets, buttons, signs, or surveys enjoy First Amendment protection under the same rules that govern more traditional publications.<sup>164</sup>

g. School officials will be scrutinized when they declare student publications part of the curriculum, mere instructional tools, and therefore exempt from constitutional scrutiny. Courts, as has been noted, prefer to define school newspapers as public forums for at least student expression.<sup>165</sup>

A federal district court in Virginia vindicated this public forum precept vis-à-vis a principal, an advisory board on student expression, a superintendent and a school board all of whom had successfully prohibited publication of what the court called an innocuous article on contraception in the school newspaper. Defendants argued unsuccessfully that the paper was not a public forum entitled to First Amendment protection, but an "in-house" organ of the school system and its student readers a captive audience.<sup>166</sup>

In California, the state supreme court rejected the contention of school officials that because California law exempts "obscene," "libelous," or "slanderous" utterances from students' rights of free expression, these officials were authorized to set up systems of prior restraint. The case involved an off-campus student newspaper which, because it had challenged a statement of the principal having to do with the school's dress code, was denied distribution rights by school authorities. A tenth-grade writer for the paper challenged the action on grounds of legislative intent and constitutionality.

160. Arrington v. Taylor, 380 F.Supp. 1348 (D.N.C.1974), affirmed 526 F.2d 587 (4th Cir. 1975), cert. den. 424 U.S. 913 (1976).

161. Papish v. Board of Curators, University of Missouri, 410 U.S. 667 (1973); Gay Lib v. University of Missouri, 558 F.2d 848 (8th Cir. 1977), cert. den., 437 U.S. 1080 (1978).

162. Tribe, American Constitutional Law (1978), pp. 584-85.

163. Dixon v. Alabama State Board of Education, 294 F.2d 150 (5th Cir. 1961), cert. den., 368 U.S. 930.

164. Sullivan v. Houston Independent High School District, 307 F.Supp. 1328 (D.Tex.1969).

165. Trujillo v. Love, 322 F.Supp. 1266 (D.Colo.1971).

166. Gambino v. Fairfax County School Board, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1442, 429 F.Supp. 731 (D.Va.1977), affirmed 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1238, 564 F.2d 157 (4th Cir. 1977).

Basing its arguments broadly on Tinker and specifically on a Fourth Circuit case dealing with an "underground" newspaper,<sup>167</sup> the California court said of the federal case:

Baughman dealt with a challenge to a regulation requiring students to submit any "underground" newspaper to the principal for review and authorizing the principal to bar distribution of the paper if in his opinion it contained libelous language. The court held the regulation unconstitutional on three bases: 1) that it was procedurally defective in that it failed to specify a reasonably short time for the principal's action and to provide for an expeditious review of his decision; 2) that the term "distribution" was unconstitutionally vague, stating that "there may be no prior restraint" unless there is "a substantial distribution"; and 3) that "the use of terms of art such as libelous and obscene are not sufficiently precise and understandable by high school students and administrators untutored in the law to be acceptable criteria [in the context of prior restraint]. * * *". Thus, while school authorities may ban obscenity and unprivileged libelous material, there is an intolerable danger, in the context of prior restraint, that under the guise of such vague labels they may unconstitutionally choke off criticism, either of themselves, or of school policies, which they find disrespectful, tasteless, or offensive.<sup>168</sup>

h. In a few cases, courts have held that where campus speech leads to a disturbance, the first duty of administration and law enforcement is to protect the speaker from the audience rather than the audience from the speaker.<sup>169</sup>

i. While public school boards and officials are agents of the state and their rules, regulations, and responses constitute state action under First and Fourteenth Amendments, private school officials do not function under constitutional limitations. Grievances within the confines of a private school do not appear to raise constitutional issues, and remedies for stifled expression have to be sought elsewhere.

A number of commentators have explored the possibility of using contract law to protect the speech and press rights of private school students. The results have not been promising.<sup>170</sup> A more hopeful approach may be the application of state constitutions. The more detailed language of state charter guarantees of freedom of expression allows interpretations more expansive than those permitted by the First Amendment.<sup>171</sup> There are few cases in point, however, and the usefulness of this tactic will depend on future litigation.

j. Who is the publisher of a school newspaper? Who is ultimately responsible for what it contains? Who will be the 167. Baughman v. Freienmuth, 478 F.2d 1345 (4th Cir. 1973).

168. The California case is Bright v. Los Angeles Unified School Dist., 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1175, 134 Cal.Rptr. 639, 556 P.2d 1090 (1976). It is widely recognized, said the court, that school officials cannot use the labels of poor taste or vulgarity to punish views "they find disrespectful, tasteless, or offensive."

169. While not a school case and puzzling in some of its reasoning, the leading precedent is Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U.S. 1 (1949), a case in which both "fighting words" and "hostile audience" doctrines were in play and a race riot appeared imminent. The rule of Terminiello was followed in Jones v. Board of Regents of University of Arizona, 436 F.2d 618 (9th Cir. 1970) and Shanley v. Northeast Independent School District, 462 F.2d 960 (5th Cir. 1972). Riot and disruption were much less a threat in the two lower court cases.

170. Comment, Wanted: A Strict Contractual Approach to the Private University/Student Relationship, 68 Ky.L.J. 439 (1979-80); Note, Contract Law and the Student-University Relationship, 48 Ind.L.J. 253 (1973); Note, Legal Relationship Between the Student and the Private College or University, 7 San Diego L.R. 244 (1970). See, also, Wisch v. Sanford School, Inc., 420 F.Supp. 1310 (D.Del.1976).

171. Stevens, Contract Law, State Constitutions and Freedom of Expression in Private Schools, 58 Journal Quarterly, 613 (Winter 1981).

defendant in a libel or privacy suit? Where public school administrators have asserted the rights of commercial publishers, they have been rebuffed by the courts.<sup>172</sup> If a school administrator cannot control content like a private publisher, should that person be liable for damages? There is no sure answer. In some states, under the protective umbrella of "sovereign immunity," the state and its agents cannot be sued.<sup>173</sup> Another problem for plaintiffs in cases involving school publications is that students who may be liable for damages don't have any money. And a democratically oriented principal who encourages editorial freedom may not be aware of an offending article until the damage has been done.

k. Another protection for student expression may be the evolving concept of academic freedom, a freedom assumed to be inherent in academic communities.<sup>174</sup> In the closing words of its opinion in Shanley,<sup>175</sup> the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals gave support to this assumption when it said, "Our eighteen-year-olds can now vote, serve on juries, and be drafted; yet the board fears the 'awakening' of their intellects without reasoned concern for its effect upon school discipline. The First Amendment cannot tolerate such intolerance."

l. Campus newspapers are just beginning to inquire as to whether or not state open meeting and record laws apply to state institutions of learning and their governing bodies. There have been a few modest victories as of this writing in Gainesville, Florida, Huntington, West Virginia, Boston, and Oklahoma.

Increasingly, school board members, administrators, teachers, and advisers must reckon with the constitutional rights of students and student publications.

Assistance in protecting the First Amendment rights of college and high school students may be obtained from the Student Press Law Center in Washington, D.C.

THE PUZZLE OF PORNOGRAPHY

The Making of a Bog

1. Obscenity is not normally a concern of the professional journalist. Its control or prohibition does engage the First Amendment and the constitutional notion of free and open channels of communication. Cultural schizophrenia about sex will inexorably manifest bizarre symptoms in the body politic. Lawmaking and judicial rulings in the realm of sex expression reflect this social malaise.

In Western civilization, morality early came to have sexual significance, and erotic indecencies and indiscretions were interpreted as outrages against religion. When the Decameron came under Papal ban in 1559, it was not for its sex but for its spoofing of the clergy. The index of banned books lasted until 1966.

Louis Henkin has argued that obscenity is forbidden not because it incites sexual misconduct but because it offends notions of holiness and moral propriety. Thomas Bowdler expurgated Shakespeare and Gib-

172. Bazaar v. Fortune, 476 F.2d 570 (5th Cir.1973). "[S]peech cannot be stifled by the state merely because it would perhaps draw an adverse reaction from the majority of people * * *" (at 579).

173. Tort Liability of a University for Libelous Material in Student Publications, 71 Michigan L.R. 1061 (1973).

174. Trager, The College President Is Not Eugene C. Pulliam: Student Publications in a New Light, 14 College Press Rev. 2 (1975).

175. Op. cit., fn. 169 at 978.

bon's History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire to conform to his own peculiar religious convictions. In our own time the Church's National Office for Decent Literature used criteria for objectionable literature so expansive that they constituted a means for the prevention of literature rather than for its discriminating evaluation. Hemingway, Faulkner, Dos Passos, Orwell, O'Hara, Zola, Koestler, Mailer, Farrell, Edmund Wilson, and scores of others fit one or more of NODL's categories of crime, violence, sex, disrespect for authority, suggestive illustration, blasphemy, and ridicule of racial or religious groups.

Community standards of morality have compelled school boards, acting under the imprimatur of the state, to consign the works of Mark Twain, Aldous Huxley, Steinbeck, Salinger, Heller, Vonnegut, Malamud, Harper Lee, James Dickey, Eldridge Cleaver, and Langston Hughes to the tender mercies of high school furnace rooms; and good teachers have lost their jobs.

Henkin is justified in asking whether the state can legislate merely to preserve a traditional or transitory view of private morality based upon untested hypotheses about character and its corruption. Is not morals legislation an establishment of religion in violation of the First and Fourteenth Amendment?<sup>176</sup> Massachusetts failed in 1977 to repeal its 1697 law outlawing blasphemy: profane comments involving God and things divine there can result in a year in jail and a $300 fine.

What resource has government for determining what is impure? And is what is impure also that which is enjoyed, that which evokes joy, liveliness, love, and even the stirring of lustful thoughts and impulses? Are libidinous thoughts destructive of the social order? Are attempts to repress such works as Kazantzakis's The Last Temptation of Christ and Baldwin's Another Country essentially efforts to preserve the status quo ante of church and state?

Some federal prosecutors seek religiously conservative juries to try their cases against sex publishers. Publisher Al Goldstein faced a federal jury, not in New York where his Screw magazine originates, but in Wichita, Kansas. Relevant to the issue of entrapment was the fact that Screw had no newsstand sales in Kansas and only fourteen subscribers in the whole state, four of whom turned out to be postal inspectors. Nevertheless the prosecutor pictured Kansas becoming "a Sodom and Gomorrah like Times Square," and the jury bought it. Indeed the grand jury, which returned a thirteen-count indictment against Goldstein, began its deliberations each day with a prayer. Goldstein's chief defense attorney was convinced that religious lampoons in the magazine did more than anything else to damage his client's case before the trial jury.<sup>177</sup>

To be sure, religious convictions alone do not account for sex censorship. Its suppression is pervaded by poorly disguised efforts to regulate human behavior through the political and ideological control of imagery. Educational Research Analysts, an organization certified and supported by the Right, has developed sixty-seven categories under which a textbook may be banned. They include "trash," "books with suggestive titles," and "works of questionable writers."

Groups normally more comfortable on the Left also support censorship, albeit less vociferously. Feminists see Hustler, Penthouse, and Playboy as exuding a pe-

176. Henkin, Morals and the Constitution: The Sin of Obscenity, 63 Colum.L.Rev. 402 (1963).

177. Yoakum, An Obscene, Lewd, Lascivious, Indecent, Filthy, and Vile Tabloid Entitled SCREW, Colum.J. Rev. (March/April 1977).

cularly virulent kind of woman hatred<sup>178</sup>; blacks protest their depiction in film, fiction, and history; homosexuals have been sensitive to their portrayal on television; and concerns about violence cut across social strata. Textbook publishers are ever alert to the educational proclamations of the Moral Majority, the Gablers of Texas, Phyllis Schlafly's Eagle Forum, and the rest.<sup>179</sup>

While America may be afflicted with a plague of pornography (obscenity to a higher power), its treatment seems to depend on a conflagration of censorship. Conservatives condone it. Liberals legitimize it. And extremists on both sides demand it for their special causes.

Prodigious problems of definition result. Most attempts to distinguish good erotica from bad pornography have failed, due in large part to the incredible diversity in human response to infinitely replaceable sexual stimuli.<sup>180</sup> There is a neat contradiction in a capitalist economic system depending on sexual exploitation to sell its products at the same time as its governmental orders pass and enforce laws to punish slightly more vulgar versions of identical themes. One is reminded of the proper Victorians who, while considering sex a topic unfit for polite conversation, kept vast repositories of pornography in the libraries of their mansions.<sup>181</sup>

Censors traditionally have never feared for their own moral demise. Only their peers seem vulnerable to corruption. Time makes a fool of the censor. The obscenities of today have a perverse proclivity for becoming the irrelevancies—or the classics—of tomorrow.

2. Obscenity came into the common law in Curl's case<sup>182</sup> in eighteenth century-England when a tasteless tract titled, in part, "Venus in the Cloister or the Nun in Her Smock," was held by a court to jeopardize the general morality. The time was ripe. Obscenity, and vice societies bent on stamping it out, were both gaining momentum. By the beginning of the nineteenth century, England was entering its most pornographic period.

In a vain attempt to suppress sexual material, Lord Campbell's Act of 1857 made the sale and distribution of obscene libel a crime. A decade later, an anti-Catholic diatribe, "The Confessional Unmasked * * *," came to the Court of Queen's Bench on appeal in the landmark case R. v. Hicklin, L.R. 3 Q.B. 360 (1868).

Lord Chief Justice Cockburn announced, in deference to the most feeble-minded and susceptible persons in the community, the following influential test for obscenity: "Whether the tendency of the matter charged as obscenity is to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influence and into whose hands a publication of this sort may fall." The book at issue was held obscene on the basis of the effect isolated passages would have on the most intellectually and emotionally defenseless readers.

178. Feminists are divided on the level of risk that should be taken in qualifying the First Amendment to combat pornography. There is much more agreement on the destructive effects of pornographic material. For example, see Lederer (ed.), Take Back the Night: Women on Pornography, 1980; and Brownmiller, Against Our Will: Men, Women and Rape, 1975. See especially, Kaminer, "Pornography and the First Amendment" in Lederer.

179. Noah, Censors Left and Right, The New Republic, Feb. 28, 1981, p. 12. For a more tempered view of book-banners see, Nocera, The Big Book-Banning Brawl, The New Republic, Sept. 13, 1982, p. 20. See also, Craig, Suppressed Books, 1963.

180. Sontag, See the concept of "The Pornographic Imagination," an excerpt from Styles of Radical Will in D.A. Hughes (ed.) Perspectives On Pornography, 1970.

181. Marcus, The Other Victorians, 1966.

182. 2 Strange 788, 93 Eng.Rep. 849 (K.B.1727).

America imported Hicklin. It seemed consistent with the Tariff Act of 1842, our first obscenity law, prohibiting importation into the United States of obscene literature and with other laws that were defining freedom of speech as freedom for "clean" speech only.

America's first reported obscenity case may have involved John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure, better known as Fanny Hill, a novel written in England about 1750. The fictitious Fanny Hill would become a constitutional celebrity in 1966.

3. In 1873, a quite peculiar grocer's clerk named Anthony Comstock somehow managed an omnibus anti-obscenity bill through Congress with help from his lobby, the Committee (later Society) for the Suppression of Vice, an offspring of the YMCA. Substantial portions of that federal law are still in effect. State legislatures have mimicked it.

Congress revised the Comstock Act in 1876 to make obscene publications non-mailable. The Post Office, with the grocer's clerk serving as its special agent, gradually developed a system of administrative censorship and confiscation so formidable that the courts seemed reluctant to intervene.

Using the Hicklin test, the federal obscenity statute survived constitutional challenge in a number of early cases.<sup>183</sup> Not until 1913 was its validity questioned by Judge Learned Hand in the case of a publisher charged with selling Daniel Goodman's creditable novel of economic blight and social degradation, Hagar Revelly.<sup>184</sup> Another crack appeared in Hicklin in 1920 when a New York appellate court ruled in favor of a bookstore clerk who had been arrested for selling a copy of Mademoiselle de Maupin by Theophile Gautier. The court held that a book must be judged as a whole and that the opinions of qualified critics as to its merits are important in reaching a decision.<sup>185</sup>

But Hicklin was still the governing rule in 1929 when a New York City court declared Radclyffe Hall's sophisticated story of lesbian love, The Well of Loneliness, obscene.<sup>186</sup> A year later Theodore Dreiser's An American Tragedy was banned in Boston under a Hicklin test.<sup>187</sup>

There were counter currents. Federal Appeals Judge Augustus Hand wrote an opinion in 1930 reversing the conviction of Mary Ware Dennett for publication of her pamphlet, The Sex Side of Life, a sensitive piece written primarily for her own children, not obscene, but a serious presentation of an important topic.<sup>188</sup>

The world hadn't changed much by 1977. In November of that year New York officials were enjoined by a U.S. district court from enforcing the state's new child pornography law against the publisher and sellers of Show Me, a book designed for use by parents in educating their children about sex.<sup>189</sup>

4. Hicklin finally crumbled in 1933 when Judge John M. Woolsey delivered his elegantly literate decision in United States v. One Book Called "Ulysses", 5 F.Supp. 182 (D.N.Y.1933). A better test than Hicklin, said Woolsey, would be the impact or dominant effect of the whole book on the average reader of normal sensual respons-

183. Ex parte Jackson, 96 U.S. 727 (1878); United States v. Bennett, 24 Fed.Cas. 1093 (S.D.N.Y.1879); United States v. Harmon, 45 F. 414 (D.C.Kan.1891), reversed 50 F. 921 (C.C.).

184. United States v. Kennerley, 209 F. 119 (D.N.Y.1913).

185. Halsey v. New York Society for the Suppression of Vice, 180 N.Y.S. 836 (1920).

186. People v. Friede, 233 N.Y.S. 565 (1929).

187. Commonwealth v. Friede, 171 N.E. 472 (Mass.1930).

188. United States v. Dennett, 39 F.2d 564 (2d Cir. 1930).

189. St. Martin's Press v. Carey, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1598, 440 F.Supp. 1196 (D.N.Y.1977).

es, and an evaluation of the author's intent—which this Judge had taken intellectual pains to determine. Woolsey's opinion, remarkable for its time, was upheld by Augustus Hand in the United States Court of Appeals. 72 F.2d 705 (2d Cir. 1934). By 1936, Judge Learned Hand, cousin of Augustus, could say bluntly in United States v. Levine, 83 F.2d 156 (2d Cir. 1936), that Hicklin was out and that an accused book must be taken as a whole. If old, its accepted place in the arts must be regarded. If new, the opinions of competent critics must be taken into account. And what matters, said the judge, is the book's effects upon all whom it is likely to reach.

5. The Post Office and Customs Bureau, federal censors since 1865 and 1842 respectively, began applying a Ulysses test, or what came to be known as the "community standards" test, to a wide range of books, pamphlets, and photographs. Because they could effectively block the movement of such material, these government officials became the nation's chief censors, the arbiters of community tastes. The expense and time requirements of litigation generally meant that the courts were avoided.

In 1943 Postmaster General Frank C. Walker revoked Esquire's second-class mailing privilege—and the privilege of scores of other periodicals—because the magazine did not appear to be making "the special contribution to the public welfare" that the Postmaster presumed Congress intended. The District of Columbia Court of Appeals reversed a district court ruling in favor of Walker in Esquire, Inc. v. Walker, 151 F.2d 49 (D.C. Cir. 1945), and a unanimous Supreme Court affirmed. Justice Douglas wrote for the Court:

It is plain * * * that the favorable second-class rates were granted periodicals meeting the requirements of the Fourth condition, so that the public good might be served through a dissemination of the class of periodicals described. But that is a far cry from assuming that Congress had any idea that each applicant for the second-class rate must convince the Postmaster General that his publication positively contributes to the public good or public welfare. Under our system of government there is an accommodation for the widest varieties of tastes and ideas. What is good literature, what has educational value, what is refined public information, what is good art, varies with individuals as it does from one generation to another. * * * The validity of the obscenity laws is recognition that the mails may not be used to satisfy all tastes, no matter how perverted. But Congress has left the Postmaster General with no power to prescribe standards for the literature or the art which a mailable periodical disseminates. * * * Hannegan v. Esquire, Inc., 327 U.S. 146 (1946). See also this text, p. 131.

After Esquire, the revocation power was almost abandoned as an anti-obscenity sanction. By 1945 the entire Post Office procedure had been branded illegal by the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals in a ruling that Dr. Paul Popenoe's booklet, "Preparing for Marriage," was not unmailable obscenity. Judge Thurman Arnold, who had spoken for the appeals court in Esquire, condemned summary seizure of mail as an interference with both liberty and property without due process of law as required by the Fifth Amendment. Walker v. Popenoe, 149 F.2d 511 (D.C. Cir. 1945).

The Post Office was prepared to ignore the decision, but a year later, in the Administrative Procedures Act, Congress moved to require a hearing and the use of established legal procedures in all such cases. The courts subsequently held that interim mail blocks prior to a hearing were illegal. The act also prohibited the government from being judge in its own case, that is, a case which it had investigated and prosecuted.

The power of the Post Office to censor the mails in the application of its particular definitions of obscenity would be challenged again. In 1962, for example, Justice

John Marshall Harlan, in an opinion for the Supreme Court, ruled that the Post Office could not bar a magazine from the mails without proof of the publishers's knowledge that the advertisements in it promoted obscene merchandise. The "merchandise" here was pictures of near-nude male models. Manual Enterprises, Inc. v. Day, 370 U.S. 478 (1962).

In spite of procedural improvements, the postmaster general to this day is able to exercise capricious and ill-defined powers with respect to content, and there are ambiguities as to what court procedures are to be followed in particular cases.

The Customs Bureau has been slightly more permissive than the Post Office and once employed Huntington Cairns of the National Gallery of Art to help it make decisions about the esthetic qualities of foreign art. But in theory the bureau exercises plenary power over the right of adult Americans to import foreign publications and films.

It has been suggested that since these federal agencies are not primarily regulatory in function, their assumption of censorship authority has evolved as a result of agency assertions of power confirmed far more by congressional silence than by any express consent.<sup>190</sup> Congress, of course, is not always loathe to assert itself.

In 1968, for example, it passed the Pandering Advertisement Act<sup>191</sup> which permitted individual householders to define obscenity for themselves. If a person swears that he or she has been sexually aroused by unsolicited mail, the Post Office orders the sender to strike the name from his mailing lists. Penalties for not doing so are substantial. The problem is that the Post Office has received as many as 300,- 000 complaints in a single year based on the sexually stimulating effects of advertisements for the Christian Herald, automobile seat covers, and electronic magazines—to suggest only a minute number of the complained about "turn ons."

The constitutionality of the act was upheld in Rowan v. United States Post Office Department, 397 U.S. 728 (1970). Chief Justice Warren Burger, in an opinion for the Court that emphasized privacy as a right to be protected against obscenity, said that "the mailer's right to communicate is circumscribed only by an affirmative act of the addressee giving notice that he wishes no further mailing from that mailer."

"Nothing in the Constitution," Burger added, "compels us to listen to or view any unwanted communication, whatever its merit. * * * Congress provided this sweeping power not only to protect privacy but to avoid possible constitutional questions that might arise from vesting the power to make any discretionary evaluation of the material in a governmental official."

Not all federal laws designed to interfere with the distribution of obscene materials have fared as well with the Supreme court as the Pandering Advertisement Act. Lower federal courts in California and Georgia ruled in 1970 that sections of the Postal Reorganization Act, authorizing the Postmaster General to halt use of the mails for commerce in allegedly obscene materials and permitting detention of incoming mail, were unconstitutional.

The Supreme Court agreed, holding that the administrative censorship scheme created by the act that permitted the Postmaster General, following hearings, to close the mails to postal money orders, to 190. Paul and Schwartz, Federal Censorship (1962), p. 317.

191. 39 U.S.C.A. § 3008. Section 3010 of the same title allows one to tell the Post Office that no sexually oriented advertising is wanted. Mailers must buy lists of such names from the Post Office so as to be forewarned. Section 3010 defines sexually oriented material somewhat in line with Court definitions in Miller. Its constitutionality was upheld in Pent-R-Books v. United States Postal Service, 328 F.Supp. 297 (D.N.Y.1971).

block distribution, and to detain a defendant's mail with a court order, pending the outcome of proceedings against him, a violation of the First Amendment. The Court saw inadequate safeguards against the undue inhibition of protected expression. The scheme failed to require governmentally initiated judicial participation in the procedure barring materials from the mails, failed to assure prompt judicial review, and failed to provide that any restraint preceding final judicial determination should be limited to preservation of the status quo for the shortest fixed period compatible with sound judicial resolution. Blount v. Rizzi, 400 U.S. 410 (1970).

ROTH: A Landmark Case

ROTH v. UNITED STATES

354 U.S. 476, 77 S.Ct. 1304.

1 L.ED.2D 1498 (1957).

EDITORIAL NOTE

The landmark Supreme Court decision in this vexing area came in 1957 with the Roth case. Roth, a purveyor of decidedly distasteful material, had been convicted under federal law. The court of appeals had affirmed. Judge Jerome Frank concurred in a remarkable opinion which asked the Supreme Court to resolve the long-standing confusion. See United States v. Roth, 237 F.2d 796, 801, 804 (2d Cir. 1956). Judge Frank also attempted a summary of relevant socio-psychological data bearing on the relationship between obscenity and antisocial behavior.

Roth came to the Supreme Court supported by four major arguments: 1) the federal obscenity statute (Comstock Act) violated the First Amendment; 2) the statute was too vague to meet the requirements of the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment; 3) it improperly invaded the powers reserved to the states and the people by the First, Ninth, and Tenth Amendments; and 4) it did not consider whether the publications as a whole were obscene.

The Court addressed itself to the first three questions, and in a 5-4 decision upheld the conviction of Roth, but reached a more sensible level of argument in doing so. In upholding the constitutionality of the Comstock Acts for the majority, Justice Brennan enunciated a revised legal test of obscenity based on the American Law Institute's model statute:

Whether to the average person, applying contemporary community standards, the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to prurient interest. [Emphasis added.]

The test, as Brennan would recognize in a landmark 1973 case,<sup>192</sup> put the Court on the path to the quagmire. But for the moment, at least, sex and obscenity were no longer to be synonymous.

The elusiveness of a term like "prurient interest" was revealed by a Manhattan jury in 1977. It acquitted a wholesaler of films depicting bestiality because his wares were too disgusting to appeal to normal sexual urges. Going back to Roth for a definition, the Court said prurient interest meant "lustful thoughts * * * itching * * * longing * * * lascivious desire." So to be obscene, films would have to arouse healthy sexual responses in average ordinary jurors. Since "Man's Best Friend" and "Every Dog Has His Day" didn't do that, they were not obscene. Were normal sex and obscenity again synonymous?<sup>193</sup>

Decided with Roth in 1957 was the case of David Alberts who had been convicted by a Beverly Hills judge of selling and promoting obscene and indecent 192. Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 49 (1973), dissenting opinion.

193. Bestiality Found of Little Appeal, Jury Acquits Movie Wholesaler, New York Times, Dec. 18, 1977.

books, a misdemeanor under the California Penal Code.]

Justice BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

The dispositive question is whether obscenity is utterance within the area of protected speech and press. Although this is the first time the question has been squarely presented to this Court, either under the First Amendment or under the Fourteenth Amendment, expressions found in numerous opinions indicate that this Court has always assumed that obscenity is not protected by the freedoms of speech and press. * * *

In light of * * * history, it is apparent that the unconditional phrasing of the First Amendment was not intended to protect every utterance. This phrasing did not prevent this Court from concluding that libelous utterances are not within the area of constitutionally protected speech. At the time of the adoption of the First Amendment, obscenity law was not as fully developed as libel law, but there is sufficiently contemporaneous evidence to show that obscenity, too, was outside the protection intended for speech and press.

The protection given speech and press was fashioned to assure unfettered interchange of ideas for the bringing about of political and social changes desired by the people. * * *

All ideas having even the slightest redeeming social importance—unorthodox ideas, controversial ideas, even ideas hateful to the prevailing climate of opinion—have the full protection of the guaranties, unless excludable because they encroach upon the limited area of more important interests. But implicit in the history of the First Amendment is the rejection of obscenity as utterly without redeeming social importance. This rejection for that reason is mirrored in the universal judgment that obscenity should be restrained, reflected in the international agreement of over 50 nations, in the obscenity laws of all of the 48 States, and in the 20 obscenity laws enacted by the Congress from 1842 to 1956. * * * We hold that obscenity is not within the area of constitutionally protected speech or press. [Emphasis added.]

It is strenuously urged that these obscenity statutes offend the constitutional guaranties because they punish incitation to impure sexual thoughts, not shown to be related to any overt antisocial conduct which is or may be incited in the persons stimulated to such thoughts. In Roth, the trial judge instructed the jury: "The words 'obscene, lewd and lascivious' as used in the law, signify that form of immorality which has relation to sexual impurity and has a tendency to excite lustful thoughts." [Emphasis added.] In Alberts, the trial judge applied the test * * * whether the material has "a substantial tendency to deprave or corrupt its readers by inciting lascivious thoughts or arousing lustful desires." [Emphasis added.] It is insisted that the constitutional guaranties are violated because convictions may be had without proof either that obscene material will perceptibly create a clear and present danger of antisocial conduct, or will probably induce its recipients to such conduct. But, in light of our holding that obscenity is not protected speech, the complete answer to this argument is in the holding of this Court in Beauharnais v. People of State of Illinois, 343 U.S. at page 266:

"Libelous utterances not being within the area of constitutionally protected speech, it is unnecessary, either for us or for the State courts, to consider the issues behind the phrase 'clear and present danger.' Certainly no one would contend that obscene speech, for example, may be punished only upon a showing of such circumstances. Libel, as we have seen, is in the same class."

However, sex and obscenity are not synonymous. [Emphasis added.] Obscene material is material which deals with sex in a manner appealing to prurient interest. The portrayal of sex, e.g., in art, literature and scientific works, is not itself sufficient reason to deny material the constitutional protection of freedom of speech and press. Sex, a great and mysterious motive force in human life, has indisputably been a subject of absorbing interest to mankind through the ages; it is one of the vital problems of human interest and public concern.

* * *

The fundamental freedoms of speech and press have contributed greatly to the development and well-being of our free society and are indispensable to its continued growth. Ceaseless vigilance is the watchword to prevent their erosion by Congress or by the States. The door barring federal and state intrusion into this area cannot be left ajar; it must be kept tightly closed and opened only the slightest crack necessary to prevent encroachment upon more important interests. It is therefore vital that the standards for judging obscenity safeguard the protection of freedom of speech and press for material which does not treat sex in a manner appealing to prurient interest.

The early leading standard of obscenity allowed material to be judged merely by the effect of an isolated excerpt upon particularly susceptible persons. Regina v. Hicklin, [1868] L.R. 3 Q.B. 360. Some American courts adopted this standard but later decisions have rejected it and substituted this test: whether to the average person, applying contemporary community standards, the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to prurient interest. The Hicklin test, judging obscenity by the effect of isolated passages upon the most susceptible persons, might well encompass material legitimately treating with sex, and so it must be rejected as unconstitutionally restrictive of the freedoms of speech and press. On the other hand, the substituted standard provides safeguards adequate to withstand the charge of constitutional infirmity.

Both trial courts below sufficiently followed the proper standard. Both courts used the proper definition of obscenity.

* * *

It is argued that the statutes do not provide reasonably ascertainable standards of guilt and therefore violate the constitutional requirements of due process. * * * The federal obscenity statute makes punishable the mailing of material that is "obscene, lewd, lascivious, or filthy * * * or other publication of an indecent character." The California statute makes punishable, inter alia, the keeping for sale or advertising material that is "obscene or indecent." The thrust of the argument is that these words are not sufficiently precise because they do not mean the same thing to all people, all the time, everywhere.

Many decisions have recognized that these terms of obscenity statutes are not precise. This Court, however, has consistently held that lack of precision is not itself offensive to the requirements of due process. * * *

In summary, then, we hold that these statutes, applied according to the proper standard for judging obscenity, do not offend constitutional safeguards against convictions based upon protected material, or fail to give men in acting adequate notice of what is prohibited.

* * *

Affirmed.

Chief Justice WARREN, concurring in the result. * * * The line dividing the salacious or pornographic from literature or science is not straight and unwavering. Present laws depend largely upon the effect that the materials may have upon those who receive them. It is manifest that the same object may have a different impact, varying according to the part of the community it reached. But there is more to these cases. It is not the book that is on trial; it is a person. The conduct of the defendant is the central issue, not the obscenity of a book or picture. [Emphasis added.] The nature of the materials is, of course, relevant as an attribute of the defendant's conduct, but the materials are thus placed in context from which they draw color and character. A wholly different result might be reached in a different setting.

The personal element in these cases is seen most strongly in the requirement of scienter. Under the California law, the prohibited activity must be done "wilfully and lewdly." The federal statute limits the crime to acts done "knowingly." In his charge to the jury, the district judge stated that the matter must be "calculated" to corrupt or debauch. The defendants in both these cases were engaged in the business of purveying textual or graphic matter openly advertised to appeal to the erotic interest of their customers. They were plainly engaged in the commercial exploitation of the morbid and shameful craving for materials with prurient effect. I believe that the State and Federal Governments can constitutionally punish such conduct. That is all that these cases present to us, and that is all we need to decide.

I agree with the Court's decision in its rejection of the other contentions raised by these defendants.

Justice HARLAN, concurring in the result in [Alberts] and dissenting in [Roth]. * * * In short, I do not understand how the Court can resolve the constitutional problems now before it without making its own independent judgment upon the character of the material upon which these convictions were based. I am very much afraid that the broad manner in which the Court has decided these cases will tend to obscure the peculiar responsibilities resting on state and federal courts in this field and encourage them to rely on easy labeling and jury verdicts as a substitute for facing up to the tough individual problems of constitutional judgment involved in every obscenity case.

My second reason for dissatisfaction with the Court's opinion is that the broad strides with which the Court has proceeded has led it to brush aside with perfunctory ease the vital constitutional considerations which, in my opinion, differentiate these two cases. It does not seem to matter to the Court that in one case we balance the power of a State in this field against the restrictions of the Fourteenth Amendment, and in the other the power of the Federal Government against the limitations of the First Amendment.

* * *

I dissent in * * * Roth v. United States.

We are faced here with the question whether the federal obscenity statute, as construed and applied in this case, violates the First Amendment to the Constitution. To me, this question is of quite a different order than one where we are dealing with state legislation under the Fourteenth Amendment. I do not think it follows that state and federal powers in this area are the same, and that just because the State may suppress a particular utterance, it is automatically permissible for the Federal Government to do the same. [Emphasis added] * * *

The Constitution differentiates between those areas of human conduct subject to the regulation of the States and those subject to the powers of the Federal Government. The substantive powers of the two governments, in many instances, are distinct. And in every case where we are called upon to balance the interest in free expression against other interests, it seems to me important that we should keep in the forefront the question of whether those other interests are state or federal. Since under our constitutional scheme the two are not necessarily equivalent, the balancing process must needs often produce different results. Whether a particular limitation on speech or press is to be upheld because it subserves a paramount governmental interest must, to a large extent, I think, depend on whether that government has, under the Constitution, a direct substantive interest, that is, the power to act, in the particular area involved.

The Federal Government has, for example, power to restrict seditious speech directed against it, because that Government certainly has the substantive authority to protect itself against revolution. * * But in dealing with obscenity we are faced with the converse situation, for the interests which obscenity statutes purportedly protect are primarily entrusted to the care, not of the Federal Government, but of the States. Congress has no substantive power over sexual morality. Such powers as the Federal Government has in this field are but incidental to its other powers, here the postal power, and are not of the same nature as those possessed by the States, which bear direct responsibility for the protection of the local moral fabric. * * *

Justice DOUGLAS, with whom Justice Black concurs, dissenting.

When we sustain these convictions, we make the legality of a publication turn on the purity of thought which a book or tract instills in the mind of the reader. I do not think we can approve that standard and be faithful to the command of the First Amendment, which by its terms is a restraint on Congress and which by the Fourteenth is a restraint on the States.

* * *

By these standards punishment is inflicted for thoughts provoked, not for overt acts nor antisocial conduct. This test cannot be squared with our decisions under the First Amendment. * * * This issue cannot be avoided by saying that obscenity is not protected by the First Amendment. The question remains, what is the constitutional test of obscenity?

The tests by which these convictions were obtained require only the arousing of sexual thoughts. Yet the arousing of sexual thoughts and desires happens every day in normal life in dozens of ways. Nearly 30 years ago a questionnaire sent to college and normal school women graduates asked what things were most stimulating sexually. Of 409 replies, 9 said "music"; 18 said "pictures"; 29 said "dancing"; 40 said "drama"; 95 said "books"; and 218 said "man." Alpert, Judicial Censorship of Obscene Literature, 52 Harv.L.Rev. 40, 73.

The test of obscenity the Court endorses today gives the censor free range over a vast domain. To allow the State to step in and punish mere speech or publication that the judge or the jury thinks has an undesirable impact on thoughts but that is not shown to be a part of unlawful action is drastically to curtail the First Amendment. As recently stated by two of our outstanding authorities on obscenity, "The danger of influencing a change in the current moral standards of the community, or of shocking or offending readers, or of stimulating sex thoughts or desires apart from objective conduct, can never justify the losses to society that result from interference with literary freedom." Lockhart & McClure, Literature, The Law of Obscenity and the Constitution, 38 Minn.L.Rev. 295, 387.

If we were certain that impurity of sexual thoughts impelled to action, we would be on less dangerous ground in punishing the distributors of this sex literature. But it is by no means clear that obscene literature, as so defined, is a significant factor in influencing substantial deviations from the community standards. * * * The absence of dependable information on the effect of obscene literature on human conduct should make us wary. It should put us on the side of protecting society's interest in literature, except and unless it can be said that the particular publication has an impact on action that the government can control.

As noted, the trial judge in the Roth case charged the jury in the alternative that the federal obscenity statute outlaws literature dealing with sex which offends "the common conscience of the community." That standard is, in my view, more inimical still to freedom of expression.

*The standard of what offends "the common conscience of the community" conflicts, in my judgment, with the command of the First Amendment that "Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press." Certainly that standard would not be an acceptable one if religion, economics, politics or philosophy were involved. How does it become a constitutional standard when literature treating with sex is concerned? [Emphasis added.]*

COMMENT

1. Justice Brennan would regret his Roth opinion. The ambiguities raised by the decision were never resolved. Who is this average person? The contemporary standards of what community? And who will testify to being sexually aroused so that a jury can measure prurient interest? Although these difficult questions were never to be answered satisfactorily, the case would provide the elements of a futile but sometimes stimulating debate for the next twenty years.

Chief Justice Warren was bothered by commercial exploitation or the conduct of the purveyor. Justice Harlan foretold a preoccupation with local community standards. Black and Douglas never wavered from their near absolute protection for speech and press in any form.

2. For its time Roth did have some progressive results. A unanimous Court in 1957 struck down a Michigan statute that prohibited distribution to the general reading public of material "containing obscene, immoral, lewd or lascivious language * * * tending to incite minors to violent or depraved or immoral acts [or] manifestly tending to the corruption of the morals of youth. * * *"

"The incidence of this enactment," said Justice Frankfurter, "is to reduce the adult population of Michigan to reading only what is fit for children." Butler v. Michigan, 352 U.S. 380 (1957).

Also in the 1957 term, the Court in per curiam opinions overruled four U.S. Courts of Appeals decisions that had upheld obscenity convictions of a French motion picture,<sup>194</sup> imported collections of student art,<sup>195</sup> a homosexual magazine,<sup>196</sup> and two nudist magazines.<sup>197</sup>

Two years later, in Kingsley International Pictures Corp. v. Regents, 360 U.S. 684 (1959), the Court considered "ideological obscenity"—depictions in conflict with social norms—in a French movie based on D.H. Lawrence's Lady Chatterley's Lover. Conviction of the film distributor was reversed because, said the Court, the applicable state statute violated the First Amendment's basic guarantee of freedom to advocate ideas, even ideas as hateful and as immoral to some as adultery.

Guilty knowledge was made a precondition of punishment for the crime of selling obscene books in Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147 (1959), and for dispensing twenty-five cent pieces for peep-show machines in Commonwealth v. Thureson, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1351, 357 N.E.2d 750 (Mass. 1977). The Court in Smith reasoned that if the bookseller is criminally liable whether or not he knows what is in the books on his shelves, he will restrict the books he sells to those he has inspected, and the public will end up with a limited choice.

194. Times Film Corp. v. City of Chicago, 355 U.S. 35 (1957).

195. Mounce v. United States, 355 U.S. 180 (1957).

196. One, Inc. v. Olesen, 355 U.S. 371 (1958).

197. Sunshine Book Co. v. Summerfield, 355 U.S. 372 (1958).

In an important 1962 case, Manual Enterprises, Inc. v. Day, 370 U.S. 478 (1962), referred to earlier, the Court reached for a definition of "hard-core" pornography. "Patent offensiveness," "self-demonstrating indecency," and "obnoxiously debasing portrayals of sex" were the best the Court could do. What was "patently offensive," of course, would by definition appeal to "prurient interest." Although Justice Harlan, in his opinion for the Court found the male-model magazines "dismally unpleasant, uncouth and tawdry" and appealing only "to the unfortunate persons whose patronage they were aimed at capturing," he could not label them "obscene."

Bantam Books v. Sullivan, 372 U.S. 58 (1963), a landmark prior restraint case, came as a result of Rhode Island's creation of a Commission to Encourage Morality in Youth to educate the public on literature tending to corrupt the young. Without public hearings, lists of objectionable books were prepared, and distributors were threatened with prosecution. "Under the Fourteenth Amendment," said the Court, "a state is not free to adopt whatever procedure it pleases for dealing with obscenity. * * * without regard to the possible consequences for constitutionally protected speech." Clearly this was a system of prior censorship depending upon extralegal sanctions.

It is important to note that the language of Bantam Books formed the central proposition of the ruling of the Court in the Pentagon Papers case: "Any system of prior restraints of expression comes to this Court bearing a heavy presumption against its constitutional validity."

An analogous case came to Court in Southeastern Promotions, Limited v. Conrad, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1140, 420 U.S. 546 (1975). There the Court held that a Chattanooga municipal board's refusal to permit the rock musical "Hair" to use a city auditorium because of what board members had heard about the presentation constituted a prior restraint under a system lacking in constitutionally required minimal procedural safeguards.

3. Laws having substantially the same effects in Kansas [A Quantity of Copies of Books v. Kansas, 378 U.S. 205 (1964)] and in Missouri [Marcus v. Search Warrant, 367 U.S. 717 (1961)] had been struck down for interfering with distribution prior to an adversary hearing on the issue of obscenity.

By 1964 Henry Miller's Tropic of Cancer—tame by contemporary standards—had become the most litigated book in the history of literature. It had faced as many as sixty criminal actions in at least nine states. Some courts found it obscene; others did not.<sup>198</sup> In 1964, Tropic of Cancer finally found constitutional protection when five members of the United States Supreme Court voted to reverse a Florida's court's conviction of the book. Grove Press v. Gerstein, 378 U.S. 577 (1964).

The Court's grounds for reversal are found in a companion case, Jacobellis v. State of Ohio, 378 U.S. 184 (1964), decided on the same day but involving a motion picture rather than a book. Writing for Court, Justice Brennan expanded upon his Roth ruling.

Obscenity is excluded from constitutional protection, said Brennan, only because it is "utterly without redeeming social importance." Sex could be portrayed in art, literature, or scientific works without fear of punishment. Whatever the material, Brennan added, it must go "substantially beyond customary limits of candor," that is, "beyond society's standards of decency."

Are the "contemporary community standards" of Roth, then, local or national? Relying on Learned Hand's 1913 Kennerley ruling (see fn. 184) in which the judge spoke of "general notions about what is decent," Brennan concluded in Jacobellis that "society at large * * * the public or people in general" would define community standards. The federal Constitution would not permit the concept of obscenity to have a varying meaning from county to county or town to town.

198. Hutchison, Tropic of Cancer on Trial (1968).

"It would be a hardy person," wrote Brennan, "who would sell a book or exhibit a film anywhere in the land after this Court had sustained the judgment of one 'community' holding it to be outside the constitutional protection. * * * We thus reaffirm the position taken in Roth to the effect that the constitutional status of an allegedly obscene work must be determined on the basis of a national standard. It is, after all, a national Constitution we are expounding." [Emphasis added.]

Chief Justice Warren emphatically disagreed, and it is his view that has prevailed. He said:

It is my belief that when the Court said in Roth that obscenity is to be defined by reference to "community standards," it meant community standards—not a national standard, as is sometimes argued. I believe that there is no provable "national standard" and perhaps there should be none. At all events, this Court has not been able to enunciate one, and it would be unreasonable to expect local courts to divine one. It is said that such a "community" approach may well result in material being proscribed as obscene in one community but not in another, and, in all probability, that is true. But communities throughout the (n)ation are in fact diverse, and it must be remembered that, in cases such as this one, the Court is confronted with the task of reconciling conflicting rights of the diverse communities within our society and of individuals.

Jacobellis is also remembered for Justice Stewart's plunge into pragmatic logic. In a concurring opinion, he declared that, although he couldn't define obscenity, "I know it when I see it."

Film Censorship

1. Although no distinctions have been made so far between print and film, it should be noted that not until 1952 was film brought under the protective custody of the First Amendment—and then equivocally. In what came to be known as the Miracle case a sensitive and quite respectful Italian film was banned as sacrilegious by the New York Board of Regents, until 1966 the state's censorship agency.

A unanimous United States Supreme Court held that the New York law, under which the ban was permitted, was an unconstitutional abridgement of free speech and press of which film communication was a legitimate part. But it was the vagueness of the term "sacrilegious" that bothered the Court; a clear implication of the Court's ruling was that censorship would be allowable for other reasons. Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495 (1952). See also, de Grazia and Newman, Banned Films: Movies, Censors and the First Amendment, 1983.

Many states and local communities have had film censorship boards. By 1965 state agencies had survived only in New York, Virginia, Kansas, and Maryland. Maryland for a time the lone hold out, abolished its film censorship board in 1981. Two dozen communities, including Chicago, Dallas, Detroit, Memphis, and Atlanta, had from time to time, been strict about the distribution of films. Dallas still had a Motion Picture Classification Board in 1983.

A 1965 challenge to Maryland's motion picture censorship statute had left its law intact, but the U.S. Supreme Court set down strict procedural guidelines for film review. That important ruling may have hastened the demise of all state and local film censorship bodies.

FREEDMAN v. STATE OF MARYLAND

380 U.S. 51, 85 S.Ct. 734.
13 L.Ed.2d 649 (1965).

Justice BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

Appellant sought to challenge the constitutionality of the Maryland motion picture censorship statute, Md. Ann. Code, 1957, Art. 66A, and exhibited the film "Revenge at Daybreak" at his Baltimore theatre without first submitting the picture to the State Board of Censors. * * * The State concedes that the picture does not violate the statutory standards and would have received a license if properly submitted, but the appellant was convicted of a * * * violation despite his contention that the statute in its entirety unconstitutional impaired freedom of expression. The Court of Appeals of Maryland affirmed, 197 A.2d 232 (Md.1964). * * * We reverse.

* * *

[A]ppellant argues that [the law] constitutes an invalid prior restraint because, in the context of the remainder of the statute, it presents a danger of unduly suppressing protected expression. He focuses particularly on the procedure for an initial decision by the censorship board, which, without any judicial participation, effectively bars exhibition of any disapproved film, unless and until the exhibitor undertakes a time-consuming appeal to the Maryland courts and succeeds in having the Board's decision reversed. Under the statute, the exhibitor is required to submit the film to the Board for examination, but no time limit is imposed for completion of Board action. If the film is disapproved, or any elimination ordered [the law] provides that "the person submitting such film or view for examination will receive immediate notice of such elimination or disapproval, and if appealed from, such film or view will be promptly reexamined, in the presence of such person by two or more members of the Board, and the same finally approved or disapproved promptly after such re-examination, with the right of appeal from the decision of the Board to the Baltimore City Court of Baltimore City. There shall be a further right of appeal from the decision of the Baltimore City Court to the Court of Appeals of Maryland, subject generally to the time and manner provided for taking appeal to the Court of Appeals."

Thus there is no statutory provision for judicial participation in the procedure which bars a film, nor even assurance of prompt judicial review. Risk of delay is built into the Maryland procedure, as is borne out by experience; in the only reported case indicating the length of time required to complete an appeal, the initial judicial determination has taken four months and final vindication of the film on appellate review, six months.

* * *

Although the Court has said that motion pictures are not "necessarily subject to the precise rules governing any other particular method of expression," Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, it is as true here as of other forms of expression that "[a]ny system of prior restraints of expression comes to this Court bearing a heavy presumption against its constitutional validity." Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan. " * * * [U]nder the Fourteenth Amendment, a State is not free to adopt whatever procedures it pleases for dealing with obscenity * * * without regard to the possible consequences for constitutionally protected speech." Marcus v. Search Warrant, 367 U.S. 717, 731. The administration of a censorship system for motion pictures presents peculiar dangers to constitutionally protected speech. Unlike a prosecution for obscenity, a censorship proceeding puts the initial burden on the exhibitor or distributor. Because the censor's business is to censor, there inheres the danger that he may well be less responsive than a court—part of an independent branch of government—to the constitutionally protected interests in free expression. And if it is made unduly onerous, by reason of delay or otherwise, to seek judicial review, the censor's determination may in practice be final.

Applying the settled rule of our cases, we hold that a noncriminal process which requires the prior submission of a film to a censor avoids constitutional infirmity only if it takes place under procedural safeguards designed to obviate the dangers of a censorship system. First, the burden of proving that the film is unprotected expression must rest on the censor. As we said in Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513, 526, "Where the transcendent value of speech is involved, due process certainly requires * * * that the State bear the burden of persuasion to show that the appellants engaged in criminal speech." Second, while the State may require advance submission of all films, in order to proceed effectively to bar all showings of unprotected films, the requirement cannot be administered in a manner which would lend an effect of finality to the censor's determination whether a film constitutes protected expression. The teaching of our cases is that, because only a judicial determination in an adversary proceeding ensures the necessary sensitivity to freedom of expression, only a procedure requiring a judicial determination suffices to impose a valid final restraint. * * * To this end, the exhibitor must be assured, by statute or authoritative judicial construction, that the censor will, within a specified brief period, either issue a license or go to court to restrain showing the film. Any restraint imposed in advance of a final judicial determination on the merits must similarly be limited to preservation of the status quo for the shortest fixed period compatible with sound judicial resolution. [Emphasis added.] Moreover, we are well aware that, even after expiration of a temporary restraint, an administrative refusal to license, signifying the censor's view that the film is unprotected, may have a discouraging effect on the exhibitor. Therefore, the procedure must also assure a prompt final judicial decision, to minimize the deterrent effect of an interim and possibly erroneous denial of a license.

* * *

It is readily apparent that the Maryland procedural scheme does not satisfy these criteria. First, once the censor disapproves the film, the exhibitor must assume the burden of instituting judicial proceedings and of persuading the courts that the film is protected expression. Second, once the Board has acted against a film, exhibition is prohibited pending judicial review, however protracted. Under the statute, appellant could have been convicted if he had shown the film after unsuccessfully seeking a license, even though no court had ever ruled on the obscenity of the film. Third, it is abundantly clear that the Maryland statute provides no assurance of prompt judicial determination. We hold, therefore, that appellant's conviction must be reversed. The Maryland scheme fails to provide adequate safeguards against undue inhibition of protected expression, and this renders the requirement of prior submission of films to the Board an invalid previous restraint.

---

COMMENT

1. Since 1973 [Heller v. New York, 413 U.S. 483 (1973)], police with a warrant signed by a judge who has viewed a film can seize that film. Pending the results of an adversary hearing, the film may be shown, but the exhibitor may have to pay the costs of making a copy.

2. Freedman's insistence upon procedural due process was reflected in a 1976 case, McKinney v. Alabama, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1516, 424 U.S. 669 (1976), in which the Court held that failure to present the jury with the factual question of obscenity was a denial of due process. The trial court had relied on the ex parte, unilateral determination of a state censorship authority. Proscribing distribution, said the High Court, "without any provision for subsequent re-examination of the determination of the censor would be constitutionally infirm." See also Brockett v. Spokane Arcades, 454 U.S. 1022 (1981), affirming 631 F.2d 135 (9th Cir. 1980) and Vance v. Universal Amusement Co., 445 U.S. 308 (1980).

Chicago's censorship ordinance was upheld by the U.S. Supreme Court in the notable 1961 case Times Film Corp. v. City of Chicago, 365 U.S. 43 (1961). That case, according to facts revealed in Chief Justice Warren's dissent, illustrated the tendency of censorship to engulf everything in its spreading ooze. Chicago licensors had banned newsreels of Chicago policeman shooting at labor pickets, films criticizing Nazi Germany, motion pictures containing the words "rape" and "contraceptive," and a scene from Walt Disney's Vanishing Prairie depicting the birth of a buffalo.

A member of the Chicago censor board reinforced an earlier contention of this chapter when she explained that she rejected a film because "it was immoral, corrupt, indecent, against my religious principles." A police sergeant attached to the censor board said, "Coarse language or anything that would be derogatory to the government—propaganda" is ruled out of foreign films. "Nothing pink or red is allowed." Chicago's law fell into disuse when it was found to be incompatible with Freedman.

For a long time censorship in Memphis was a one-man affair. All of Ingrid Bergman's movies were banned because Lloyd Binford judged her soul "black as the soot of hell." She'd had a child out of wedlock. There as in Dallas, Pennsylvania, Oklahoma, Providence, R.I., Kenosha, Wisc., Milwaukee, North Carolina, Tennessee, Ohio, and Georgia censorship laws and ordinances fizzled out after court challenges.

Most censors were simply not prepared to comply with the due process standards of Freedman.

3. The Motion Picture Association of America and individual states, cities, and theater owners have over the years developed classification systems to warn adults and to protect children. The X designation has often served as free advertising for the shabby producer whose numbers are now legion.

The grand climax may have been the film Deep Throat which provoked a great deal of pseudo-sophisticated legal, scientific, and artistic debate—and at least $20 million for its producers. A New York Criminal Court judge, Joel Tyler, tried to transform the film into words and, in the process, told us more about himself than about the film:

The camera angle, emphasis and close-up zooms were directed * * * toward a maximum exposure in detail of the genitalia during the gymnastics, gyrations, bobbing, trundling, surging, ebb and flowing, eddying, moaning, groaning and sighing, all with ebullience and gusto. * * * Such concentration upon the acts of fellatio and cunnilingus overlooked the numerous clear, clinical acts of sexual intercourse, anal sodomy, female masturbation, clear depiction of seminal fluid ejaculation and an orgy scene—a Sodom and Gomorrah gone wild before the fire—all of which is enlivened with the now famous "four letter words" and finally with bells ringing and rockets bursting in climactic ecstasy.

Anthony Burgess suggested that the ebullience and gusto lie in the judge and not in the film. "If only 'Deep Throat' were as Rabelaisian as he makes it seem to be," Burgess lamented. "Our aesthetic condemnation of pornography rests on the fact that it is not Rabelaisian—that there is no wit, no belly-humor, no learning, no Holy Bottle and no Abbey or Thelema. In other words, no life and no art. The moral question is, of course, a lot of nonsense."<sup>199</sup>

Since Deep Throat was, in the judge's words, "unmistakably hard-core pornography * * * with a vengeance," "a nadir of decadence," and "indisputably obscene by any legal measurement," the film's promoters were convicted of a misdemeanor and fined $100,000 according to a formula not to exceed double the corporation's gain from the offence.<sup>200</sup>

4. Courts have shown a determination to protect children from viewing pornography or from being involved in its manufacture. That determination was underscored in a 1968 U.S. Supreme Court decision upholding the constitutionality of a New York statute prohibiting the sale of "girlie" magazines or anything else alleged to be obscene to anyone under seventeen.

Typical of self-conscious obscenity legislation, the New York law prohibited the sale to a minor of any depiction of nudity that included "the showing of * * * female buttocks with less than a full opaque covering, or the showing of the female breast with less than a fully opaque covering of any portion thereof below the top of the nipple. * * *"

Speaking for the Court, Justice Brennan, citing a 1944 case that held that children selling religious pamphlets on street corners violated a state child's labor laws,<sup>201</sup> ruled that the power of the state to control the conduct of children reaches beyond the scope of its authority over adults. There was, moreover, a strong presumption that parents supported the law. Ginsberg v. State of New York, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1424, 390 U.S. 629 (1968).

Two aspects of Ginsberg should be stressed. First, it illustrated the constitutional validity of the concept of variable obscenity since material that would not have been obscene if sold to an adult was held obscene when sold to a juvenile. Second, the case showed that the First Amendment rights of children are more attenuated than those of adults. The state's claims to regulate in the interests of children in the area of obscenity are accorded particular force in the courts. This view still commanded the support of Justice Brennan, as his broad libertarian dissent in Paris Adult Theatres in 1973 (this text, p. 757) and his 1982 concurrence in New York v. Ferber reflected.

The latter case presented a constitutional dilemma because of its support for an outright ban on the exhibition of films that visually depict sexual conduct by children under sixteen, regardless of whether such presentations are obscene under the Miller guidelines (see this text, p. 752). No distinction was made between conduct and publication.

A New York statute<sup>202</sup> defines "sexual performance" as any performance that includes sexual conduct by a child and "sexual conduct" as actual or simulated sexual intercourse, deviate sexual intercourse, sexual bestiality, masturbation, sado-masochistic abuse, or lewd exhibition of the genitals.

Ferber was convicted under the statute, and the Appellate Division of the New York Supreme Court affirmed. The New York Court of Appeals reversed, holding that the statute violated the First Amendment by being both underinclusive and overbroad. The U.S. Supreme Court in effect placed child pornography in a special category outside the complex and imprecise rules that had already been fash-

199. Burgess, For Permissiveness, With Misgivings, The New York Times Magazine, July 1, 1973.

200. People v. Mature Enterprises, Inc., 343 N.Y.S.2d 934 (1973).

201. Prince v. Commonwealth of Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158 (1944).

202. Penal Law, Article 263, § 263.05ff (1977). A similar statute, but applying to children under eighteen (Code § 18.2-374.1), was upheld by Virginia's Supreme Court in Freeman v. Virginia, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1340, 288 S.E.2d 461 (Va.1982).

ioned for adults, thus removing child pornography from First Amendment protection altogether—at least where the state statute is sufficiently precise.

The Court noted that forty-seven states and the federal government had passed laws specifically directed at child pornography, and at least half of those did not require that the material presented be legally obscene.

While admitting its own struggle with "the intractable obscenity problem," notably the vacillation over a definition of obscenity, the Court remained firm in the position that "the States have a legitimate interest in prohibiting dissemination or exhibition of obscene material when the mode of dissemination carries with it a significant danger of offending the sensibilities of unwilling recipients or of exposure to juveniles."<sup>203</sup> The essentials of the Court's opinion follow.

---

NEW YORK v. FERBER

— U.S. —, 102 S.Ct. 3348,
73 L.ED.2D 1113 (1982).

* * *

Justice WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * *

First. It is evident beyond the need for elaboration that a state's interest in "safeguarding the physical and psychological well being of a minor" is "compelling." Globe Newspapers v. Superior Court, — U.S. — (1982). "A democratic society rests, for its continuance, upon the healthy well-rounded growth of young people into full maturity as citizens." Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158, 168 (1944). Accordingly, we have sustained legislation aimed at protecting the physical and emotional well-being of youth even when the laws have operated in the sensitive area of constitutionally protected rights. In Prince v. Massachusetts, supra, the Court held that a statute prohibiting use of a child to distribute literature on the street was valid notwithstanding the statute's effect on a First Amendment activity. In Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629 (1968), we sustained a New York law protecting children from exposure to nonobscene literature. Most recently, we held that the government's interest in the "well-being of its youth" justified special treatment of indecent broadcasting received by adults as well as children. FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978).

The prevention of sexual exploitation and abuse of children constitutes a government objective of surpassing importance. The legislative findings accompanying passage of the New York laws reflect this concern:

"There has been a proliferation of children as subjects in sexual performances. The care of children is a sacred trust and should not be abused by those who seek to profit through a commercial network based on the exploitation of children. The public policy of the state demands the protection of children from exploitation through sexual performances." Laws of N.Y., 1977, ch. 910, § 1.

We shall not second-guess this legislative judgment. Respondent has not intimated that we do so. Suffice it to say that virtually all of the States and the United States have passed legislation proscribing the production of or otherwise combatting "child pornography." The legislative judgment, as well as the judgment found in the relevant literature, is that the use of children as subjects of pornographic materials is harmful to the physiological, emotional, and mental health of the child. [There follows a substantial list of social science authority for the foregoing statement.]

---

203. New York v. Ferber, — U.S. — (1982).

That judgment, we think, easily passes muster under the First Amendment.

Second. The distribution of photographs and films depicting sexual activity by juveniles is intrinsically related to the sexual abuse of children in at least two ways. First, the materials produced are a permanent record of the children's participation and the harm to the child is exacerbated by their circulation. Second, the distribution network for child pornography must be closed if the production of material which requires the sexual exploitation of children is to be effectively controlled. Indeed, there is no serious contention that the legislature was unjustified in believing that it is difficult, if not impossible, to halt the exploitation of children by pursuing only those who produce the photographs and movies. While the production of pornographic materials is a low-profile, clandestine industry, the need to market the resulting products requires a visible apparatus of distribution. The most expeditious if not the only practical method of law enforcement may be to dry up the market for this material by imposing severe criminal penalties on persons selling, advertising, or otherwise promoting the product. Thirty-five States and Congress have concluded that restraints on the distribution of pornographic materials are required in order to effectively combat the problem, and there is a body of literature and testimony to support these legislative conclusions. * * *

Respondent does not contend that the State is unjustified in pursuing those who distribute child pornography. Rather, he argues that it is enough for the State to prohibit the distribution of materials that are legally obscene under the Miller test. While some States may find that this approach properly accommodates its interests, it does not follow that the First Amendment prohibits a State from going further. The Miller standard, like all general definitions of what may be banned as obscene, does not reflect the State's particular and more compelling interest in prosecuting those who promote the sexual exploitation of children. Thus, the question under the Miller test of whether a work, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient interest of the average person bears no connection to the issue of whether a child has been physically or psychologically harmed in the production of the work. Similarly, a sexually explicit depiction need not be "patently offensive" in order to have required the sexual exploitation of a child for its production. In addition, a work which, taken on the whole, contains serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value may nevertheless embody the hardest core of child pornography. "It is irrelevant to the child [who has been abused] whether or not the material * * * has a literary, artistic, political, or social value." * * * We therefore cannot conclude that the Miller standard is a satisfactory solution to the child pornography problem.

Third. The advertising and selling of child pornography provides an economic motive for and is thus an integral part of the production of such materials, an activity illegal throughout the nation. "It rarely has been suggested that the constitutional freedom for speech and press extends its immunity to speech or writing used as an integral part of conduct in violation of a valid criminal statute." Giboney v. Empire Storage & Ice Co., 336 U.S. 490, 498 (1949). We note that were the statutes outlawing the employment of children in these films and photographs fully effective, and the constitutionality of these laws have not been questioned, the First Amendment implications would be no greater than that presented by laws against distribution: enforceable production laws would leave no child pornography to be marketed.

Fourth. The value of permitting live performances and photographic reproductions of children engaged in lewd sexual conduct is exceedingly modest, if not de minimis. We consider it unlikely that visual depictions of children performing sexual acts or lewdly exhibiting their genitals would often constitute an important and necessary part of a literary performance or scientific or educational work. As the trial court in this case observed, if it were necessary for literary or artistic value, a person over the statutory age who perhaps looked younger could be utilized. Simulation outside of the prohibition of the statute could provide another alternative. Nor is there is any question here of censoring a particular literary theme or portrayal of sexual activity. The First Amendment interest is limited to that of rendering the portrayal somewhat more "realistic" by utilizing or photographing children.

Fifth. Recognizing and classifying child pornography as a category of material outside the protection of the First Amendment is not incompatible with our earlier decisions. "The question whether speech is, or is not protected by the First Amendment often depends on the content of the speech. * * * It is the content of an utterance that determines whether it is a protected epithet or an unprotected 'fighting comment.'" Young v. American Mini Theatres, [427 U.S. 50,] at 66. * * * Leaving aside the special considerations when public officials are the target, New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), a libelous publication is not protected by the Constitution. Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U.S. 250 (1952). Thus, it is not rare that a content-based classification of speech has been accepted because it may be appropriately generalized that within the confines of the given classification, the evil to be restricted so overwhelmingly outweighs the expressive interests, if any, at stake, that no process of case-by-case adjudication is required. When a definable class of material, such as that covered by § 263.15, bears so heavily and pervasively on the welfare of children engaged in its production, we think the balance of competing interests is clearly struck and that it is permissible to consider these materials as without the protection of the First Amendment.

* * *

Because § 263.15 is not substantially overbroad, it is unnecessary to consider its application to material that does not depict sexual conduct of a type that New York may restrict consistent with the First Amendment. As applied to Paul Ferber and to others who distribute similar material, the statute does not violate the First Amendment as applied to the States through the Fourteenth. The decision of the New York Court of Appeals is reversed and the case is remanded to that Court for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

So ordered.

---

COMMENT

1. Justice Brennan, in a concurrence joined by Justice Marshall, agreed with the Court that the tiny fraction of material of serious artistic, scientific, or educational value that could conceivably fall within the reach of the New York statute was insufficient to justify striking the law on grounds of overbreadth. But on First Amendment grounds Brennan was not so sure. The constitutional value of depictions of children that are in themselves serious contributions to art, literature, or science could be substantial. And he had to assume harm to children to agree with the Court in the case.

In a separate concurrence, Justice Stevens solidified Brennan's reservation: "The question whether a specific act of communication is protected by the First Amendment always requires some consideration of both its content and its context." Nevertheless, while he disagreed with the Court that the speech reached by the statute was totally without First Amendment protection, Stevens did agree that such marginal speech did not warrant the extraordinary protection afforded by the overbreadth doctrine, a doctrine analyzed at length in the Court's opinion but not included in our excerpt.

Was the Court too quick to disqualify a whole category of speech because of what it perceived as a countervailing social value? In Cooper v. Mitchell Brothers, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2273, 454 U.S. 849 (1981), the Court decided that states need not use a strict standard of proof, in this case "beyond a reasonable doubt," in a public nuisance abatement action by a city against adult theaters. The reasoning was that the "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard of proof was not required in civil proceedings. The case was decided without full written briefs and oral arguments. Justices Stevens, Brennan, and Marshall dissented vigorously. See Justice Brennan's concurrence in McKinney v. Alabama, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1516, 424 U.S. 669 (1976):

"The hazards to First Amendment freedoms inhering in the regulation of obscenity require that even in * * * a civil proceeding, the State comply with the more exacting standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt."

2. In 1976 an additional complexity had been added to film censorship when the Supreme Court in Young v. American Mini Theatres, Inc., 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1151, 427 U.S. 50 (1976), upholding a Detroit ordinance, called upon lower courts to decide not only which movies are "obscene" under state and local laws but also which are "adult" within the meaning of a local zoning ordinance. In Detroit, "adult" was defined as films depicting "specified sexual activities" or "specified anatomical areas." The specifications were listed.

Although the Detroit ordinance failed to meet Freedman's requirements for judicial review, Justice Stevens held for the Court that a relaxation of the standards for determining obscenity would be acceptable where there was no criminal sanction and dissemination of the material was not being prohibited altogether.

The Young case illustrated and encouraged the use of a zoning approach to obscenity regulation. Requiring dispersion of "adult" theaters throughout the city was upheld despite the argument that such legislation constituted an impermissible regulation on the basis of content. The Court viewed the zoning regulation as merely a permissible place regulation. Since access to "adult" theaters was not prohibited and the issue was merely where to place them, the Court declared that there was no direct First Amendment infringement.

Since Young, the New Mexico Supreme Court has struck down as unconstitutionally vague a municipal ordinance that prohibited location of adult bookstores, movie theaters, or newsracks within 1,000 feet of a "residential area." Harris Books v. Santa Fe, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1913, 647 P.2d 868 (N.M.1982).

On the other hand, an ordinance prohibiting exhibition or sale of sexually explicit motion pictures within 100 yards of a church, public school, or residential area was said, citing Young, not to violate the First Amendment. Avalon Cinema Corp. v. Thompson, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2059, 658 F.2d 555 (8th Cir. 1981), reversed 667 F.2d 659. The ordinance, however, was later attacked successfully as an unsupported response to the imminent opening of North Little Rock's first "adult" movie theater. No social science evidence for presumed neighborhood deterioration was cited, said the court. As in Schad v. Borough of Mount Ephraim, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1426, 452 U.S. 61 (1981) and Marco Lounge v. Federal Heights, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1229, 625 P.2d 982 (Colo.1981), zoning ordinances seeking to ban all sexually explicit entertainment, even that which was not obscene, did not state sufficient countervailing state interest. Mere nudity is not necessarily obscene.<sup>204</sup> Despite its hard core features appealing to prurient interest, the Louisiana Supreme Court held Penthouse magazine not to be obscene when taken as a whole.<sup>205</sup> The North Little Rock ordinance, said the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals, was clearly a content-based regulation of protected speech. It did not limit itself to obscenity. Avalon Cinema Corp. v. Thompson, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2588, 667 F.2d 659 (8th Cir. 1981).

“Redeeming Social Value”: The Roth-Memoirs Standard

1. In Jacobellis, Justice Brennan made the test—“utterly without redeeming social importance”—the primary standard against which censurable obscenity would be measured. The emergence of this test and its reformulation into a broader and more liberal “social value” rule are recounted in a delightfully literate book by Charles Rembar, the attorney who directed “Fanny Hill” on her long and perilous journey to the United States Supreme Court.<sup>206</sup>

That journey began in 1821 when “Fanny’s” conviction in a Massachusetts court may have been America’s first obscenity case. Court appearances followed many years later in New York, New Jersey, and again in Massachusetts. In Massachusetts the book itself was put on trial in an equity suit brought by the state’s attorney general. Rembar, attorney for publisher G.P. Putnam’s Sons, focused his efforts on getting expert witnesses to testify on the “social value” of the work.

Gerald Gardiner had done the same for “Lady Chatterley” in England. Defense witnesses included Dame Rebecca West, the Bishop of Woolwich, Lord Francis Williams, E.M. Forster, C.D. Lewis, Dilys Powell, and Norman St. John-Stevas. “Lady Chatterley” was acquitted.<sup>207</sup>

It was Rembar’s intention and his legal strategy to get the Court to substitute “social value” for “social importance.” “Social value” would be a less restrictive test. “Importance,” Rembar argued, has other meanings—not synonymous with value—that would impose a tougher standard. “Some value” might not be too hard to show; “some importance” could be something else again.

Rembar sought to replace the “prurient interest” test of Roth with his more meaningful “social value” standard. “Social value,” he explained in his brief to the Court, “provides a criterion that can be objectively applied, and by a process familiar to the law. Judges and jurors are no longer committed to a total reliance on their individual responses. Traditional judicial techniques come into play. There is evidence to be considered.”<sup>208</sup>

The measure of Rembar’s success is found in Justice BRENNAN’S plurality opinion for the Court in the “Fanny Hill” case.

---

A BOOK ETC. v. ATTORNEY GENERAL OF COMMONWEALTH OF MASS.

383 U.S. 413, 86 S.Ct. 975.
16 L.ED.2D 1 (1966).

* * *

204. Smith v. Indiana, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2344, 413 N.E.2d 652 (Ind.1980).

205. Louisiana v. Walden Book, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1696, 386 So.2d 342 (La.1980).

206. Rembar, The End of Obscenity (1968).

207. Rolph (ed.), The Trial of Lady Chatterley: Regina v. Penguin Books Limited (1961). See also, Note, The Use of Expert Testimony in Obscenity Litigation, 1965 Wis.L.Rev. 113.

208. Rembar, op. cit., 440.

* * * At the hearing before a justice of the Superior Court, which was conducted under § 28F, "in accordance with the usual course of proceedings in equity," the court received the book in evidence and also, as allowed by the section, heard the testimony of experts<sup>2</sup> and accepted other evidence, such as book reviews, in order to assess the literary, cultural, or educational character of the book. This constituted the entire evidence, as neither side availed itself of the opportunity provided by the section to introduce evidence "as to the manner and form of its publication, advertisement, and distribution." The trial justice * * * adjudged Memoirs obscene and declared that the book "is not entitled to the protection of the First and Fourteenth Amendments. * * *" The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court affirmed the decree. * * * We reverse. * * * [T]he sole question before the state courts was whether Memoirs satisfies the test of obscenity established in Roth v. United States.

We define obscenity in Roth in the following terms: "[W]hether to the average person, applying contemporary community standards, the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to prurient interest." Under this definition, as elaborated in subsequent cases, three elements must coalesce: it must be established that (a) the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to a prurient interest in sex; (b) the material is patently offensive because it affronts contemporary community standards relating to the description or representation of sexual matters; and (c) the material is utterly without redeeming social value. [Emphasis added.]

The Supreme Judicial Court purported to apply the Roth definition of obscenity and held all three criteria satisfied. We need not consider the claim that the court erred in concluding that Memoirs satisfied the prurient appeal and patent offensiveness criteria; for reversal is required because the court misinterpreted the social value criterion. * * *

The Supreme Judicial Court erred in holding that a book need not be "unqualifiedly worthless before it can be deemed obscene." A book cannot be proscribed unless it is found to be utterly without redeeming social value. This is so even though the book is found to possess the requisite prurient appeal and to be patently offensive. Each of the three federal constitutional criteria is to be applied independently; the social value of the book can neither be weighed against nor canceled by its prurient appeal or patent offensiveness. Hence, even on the view of the court below that Memoirs possessed only a modicum of social value, its judgment must be reversed as being founded on an erroneous interpretation of a federal constitutional standard.

It does not necessarily follow from this reversal that a determination that Memoirs is obscene in the constitutional sense would be improper under all circumstances. On the premise, which we have no occasion to assess, that Memoirs has the requisite prurient appeal and is patently offensive, but has only a minimum of social value, the circumstances of production, sale, and publicity are relevant in determining whether or not the publication or distribution of the book is constitutionally protected. Evidence that the book was commercially exploited for the sake of prurient appeal, to the exclusion of all other values, might justify the conclusion that the book was utterly without redeeming social importance. It is not that in such a setting the social value test is relaxed so as to dispense with the requirement that a book be utterly devoid of social value, but rather that, as we elaborate in Ginzburg v. United States, where the purveyor's sole emphasis is on the sexually provocative aspects of his publications, a court could accept his evaluation at its face value. In this proceeding, however, the courts were asked to judge the obscenity of Memoirs in the abstract, and the declaration of obscenity was neither aided nor limited by a specific set of circumstances of production, sale, and publicity. All possible uses of the book must therefore be considered, and the mere risk that the book might be exploited by panders because it so pervasively treats sexual matters cannot alter the fact—given the view of the Massachusetts court attributing to Memoirs a modicum of literary and historical value—that the book will have redeeming social importance in the hands of those who publish or distribute it on the basis of that value.

2. One of the witnesses testified in part as follows: "Cleland is part of what I should call this cultural battle that is going on in the 18th century, a battle between a restricted Puritan, moralistic ethic that attempts to suppress freedom of the spirit, freedom of the flesh, and this element is competing with a freer attitude towards life, a more generous attitude towards life, a more wholesome attitude towards life, and this very attitude that is manifested in Fielding's great novel 'Tom Jones' is also evident in Cleland's novel. * * * [Richardson's] 'Pamela' is the story of a young country girl; [his] 'Clarissa' is the story of a woman trapped in a house of prostitution. Obviously, then Cleland takes both these themes, the country girl, her initiation into life and into experience, and the story of a woman in a house of prostitution, and what he simply does is to take the situation and reverse the moral standards. Richardson believed that chastity was the most important thing in the world; Cleland and Fielding obviously did not and thought there were more important significant moral values."

Reversed.

---

COMMENT

1. Justice Brennan's three-element test would hold the tottering edifice of obscenity law in place for the next eight years. But the Court did something else that day: it decided Ginzburg v. United States, a case that permitted Brennan to add a fourth element to his three-part test.

The Court in Ginzburg upheld a five-year sentence and a $28,000 fine against Ralph Ginzburg, publisher of Eros, a glossy, well-designed magazine (now a collector's item) devoted to relatively sophisticated sexual themes. Ginzburg and his attorneys had not paid heed to Chief Justice Warren's admonition in Roth that it is the conduct of the purveyor that ought to be punished. Ginzburg's publications were not obscene by the Court's own standards, but a majority of the justices thought that he promoted them as if they were; he defined their "social value." If books cannot be punished, said the Court, booksellers can, especially if they display what Brennan referred to as the "leer of the sensualist."

---

GINZBURG v. UNITED STATES

383 U.S. 463, 86 S.Ct. 942,
16 L.Ed.2d 31 (1966).

Justice BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court. * * * In the cases in which this Court has decided obscenity questions since Roth, it has regarded the materials as sufficient in themselves for the determination of the question. In the present case, however, the prosecution charged the offense in the context of the circumstances of production, sale, and publicity and assumed that, standing alone, the publications themselves might not be obscene. We agree that the question of obscenity may include consideration of the setting in which the publications were presented as an aid to determining the question of obscenity, and assume without deciding that the prosecution could not have succeeded otherwise. * * * [W]e view the publications against a background of commercial exploitation of erotica solely for the sake of their prurient appeal. The record in that regard amply supports the decision of the trial judge that the mailing of all three publications offended the statute.

The three publications were EROS, a hard-cover magazine of expensive format; Liaison, a bi-weekly newsletter; and The Housewife's Handbook on Selective Promiscuity (hereinafter the Handbook), a short book. The issue of EROS specified in the indictment, * * * contains 15 articles and photo-essays on the subject of love, sex, and sexual relations. The specified issue of Liaison * * * contains a prefatory "Letter from the Editors" announcing its dedication to "keeping sex an art and preventing it from becoming a science." The remainder of the issue consists of digests of two articles concerning sex and sexual relations which had earlier appeared in professional journals and a report of an interview with a psychotherapist who favors the broadest license in sexual relationships. * * * The Handbook purports to be a sexual autobiography detailing with complete candor the author's sexual experiences from age 3 to age 36. The text includes, and prefatory and concluding sections of the book elaborate, her views on such subjects as sex education of children, laws regulating private consensual adult sexual practices, and the equality of women in sexual relationships. It was claimed at trial that women would find the book valuable, for example as a marriage manual or as an aid to the sex education of their children.

Besides testimony as to the merit of the material, there was abundant evidence to show that each of the accused publications was originated or sold as stock in trade of the sordid business of pandering—"the business of purveying textual or graphic matter openly advertised to appeal to the erotic interest of their customers." EROS early sought mailing privileges from the postmasters of Intercourse and Blue Ball, Pennsylvania. The trial court found the obvious, that these hamlets were chosen only for the value their names would have in furthering petitioners' efforts to sell their publications on the basis of salacious appeal; the facilities of the post offices were inadequate to handle the anticipated volume of mail, and the privileges were denied. Mailing privileges were then obtained from the postmaster of Middlesex, New Jersey. EROS and Liaison thereafter mailed several million circulars soliciting subscriptions from that post office; over 5,500 copies of the Handbook were mailed.

The "leer of the sensualist" also permeates the advertising for the three publications. The circulars sent for EROS and Liaison stressed the sexual candor of the respective publications, and openly boasted that the publishers would take full advantage of what they regarded as an unrestricted license allowed by law in the expression of sex and sexual matters. The advertising for the Handbook, apparently mailed from New York, consisted almost entirely of a reproduction of the introduction of the book, written by one Dr. Albert Ellis. [The American Sexual Tragedy, 1962.] Although he alludes to the book's informational value and its putative therapeutic usefulness, his remarks are preoccupied with the book's sexual imagery. The solicitation was indiscriminate, not limited to those, such as physicians or psychiatrists, who might independently discern the book's therapeutic worth. * * *

This evidence, in our view, was relevant in determining the ultimate question of obscenity and, in the context of this record, serves to resolve all ambiguity and doubt. The deliberate representation of petitioners' publications as erotically arousing, for example, stimulated the reader to accept them as prurient; he looks for titillation, not for saving intellectual content. Similarly, such representation would tend to force public confrontation with the potentially offensive aspects of the work; the brazenness of such an appeal heightens the offensiveness of the publications to those who are offended by such material. And the circumstances of presentation and dissemination of material are equally relevant to determining whether social importance claimed for material in the courtroom was, in the circumstances, pretense or reality—whether it was the basis upon which it was traded in the market place or a spurious claim for litigation purposes. Where the purveyor's sole emphasis is on the sexually provocative aspects of his publications, that fact may be decisive in the determination of obscenity. Certainly in a prosecution which, as here, does not necessarily imply suppression of the materials involved, the fact that they originate or are used as a subject of pandering is relevant to the application of the Roth test.

* * *

We perceive no threat to First Amendment guarantees in thus holding that in close cases evidence of pandering may be probative with respect to the nature of the material in question and thus satisfy the Roth test. No weight is ascribed to the fact that petitioners have profited from the sale of publications which we have assumed but do not hold cannot themselves be adjudged obscene in the abstract; to sanction consideration of this fact might indeed induce self-censorship, and offend the frequently stated principle that commercial activity, in itself, is no justification for narrowing the protection of expression secured by the First Amendment. Rather, the fact that each of these publications was created or exploited entirely on the basis of its appeal to prurient interests strengthens the conclusion that the transactions here were sales of illicit merchandise, not sales of constitutionally protected matter. A conviction for mailing obscene publications, but explained in part by the presence of this element, does not necessarily suppress the materials in question, nor chill their proper distribution for a proper use. Nor should it inhibit the enterprise of others seeking through serious endeavor to advance human knowledge or understanding in science, literature, or art. All that will have been determined is that questionable publications are obscene in a context which brands them as obscene as that term is defined in Roth—a use inconsistent with any claim to the shelter of the First Amendment.

* * *

Affirmed.

---

COMMENT

1. "Prurient interest" obviously was to remain a central element in adjudging obscenity. More important, the act of pandering somehow superseded any consideration of the intrinsic merits of the publication. "[I]f the First Amendment means anything," said Justice Stewart in dissent, "it means that a man cannot be sent to prison merely for distributing publications which offend a judge's esthetic sensibilities, mine or any other's."

There is a Catch-22 quality about Ginzburg. His publications were themselves protected by the First Amendment for, whatever they were, they were not "patently offensive," that is, hard core pornography. Ginzburg's crime was advertising them. "Commercial exploitation" and "titillation," longtime givens in American selling, had suddenly become crimes, and crimes for which Ginzburg was not charged.

The Court's affirmation of Ginzburg's five-year sentence (later reduced to three) sent shock waves through the publishing world.<sup>209</sup> Brennan's new test did not seem to meet minimal standards of due process. Justice Harlan called it "an astonishing piece of judicial improvisation." Rembar compared it with the ancient legal notion of estoppel, the idea that you ought to be held to what you say. If a publisher implies that his books are obscene, the Supreme Court will take him at his word. If he guarantees that his materials will cata-

---

209. Epstein, The Obscenity Business Atlantic, August 1966; Rembar, The End of Obscenity, 484-490.

lyze certain glandular juices, then that is in fact what they do.

Ironically the eroticism of the mid-sixties is not the eroticism of the eighties. In retrospect Ginzburg's incarceration seems unjust and ludicrous.

After ten years of appeals and legal maneuvering Ginzburg was committed to a federal prison where he served eight months of his three-year sentence. Through it all, fellow publishers remained frighteningly silent. After his release in October 1972, Ginzburg vowed to gain vindication in the Supreme Court, a Court which he then held in contempt.<sup>210</sup>

2. Between Roth and Ginzburg the Court was inclined not to uphold convictions for obscenity. Ginzburg opened the gates to a torrent of confusion. Some interpreted the ruling as a "frantic effort to rebalance the scales in favor of the censors after a decade of tipping them in favor of free expression."<sup>211</sup> Was the public to be denied its own assessment of artistic value because a publisher's promotional material was vulgar? How would pandering (obscenity per quod) affect the intrinsic merits of a book, a magazine, or a photograph?

"Prurient interest" was equally confounding. Do or do not sexually mature persons have prurient interests? The Kinsey Institute had concluded that "the impulse to seek pleasurable sexual visual stimuli is statistically, biologically, and psychologically normal."<sup>212</sup> Censors, as usual, were reserving prurient experiences for themselves—"privileged prurience," Eliot Fremont-Smith called it—or "like their Puritan ancestors they were objecting to bear-baiting not because it gave pain to the bear but because it gave pleasure to the spectators."<sup>213</sup>

And there was no uniform response to the "patent offensiveness" of hard core pornography. Half of the authors, critics, and university dons who engaged in debate in The Times literary supplement over the literary merits of Williams Burrough's Naked Lunch thought it a masterpiece; the other half considered it arcane trash!

Only the "social value" test seemed useful. If they felt strongly enough about work, reputable "experts" would testify, and courts could be influenced.

"As to whether the book has any redeeming social value," said a Massachusetts court in one of a number of Naked Lunch cases, " * * * it appears that a substantial and intelligent group in the community believes the book to be of some literary significance. Although we are not bound by the opinion of others concerning the book, we cannot ignore the serious acceptance of it by so many persons in the literary community."<sup>214</sup>

3. The Court's brief per curiam opinion in Redrup v. New York, 386 U.S. 767 (1967), reversing a conviction for selling obscene books and magazines unobtrusively to willing adults, provided a helpful map of the twisted path trod by the Warren Court. Roth and its aftermath had generated a Babel of opinions. The Redrup map contained the following landmarks.

The Roth-Memoirs test, based on the influential 1957 case and the Fanny Hill case of 1966, provided a coalescent, three-element definition of obscenity. Absent any one, and there would be no finding of punishable obscenity.

a. The dominant theme of the material taken as a whole must appeal to a prurient interest in sex;

210. Ginzburg, Castrated: My Eight Months in Prison, The New York Times Magazine, Dec. 3, 1972.

211. Note, The Substantive Law of Obscenity: An Adventure in Quicksand, 13 N.Y.L.F. 124 (1967).

212. Kinsey Institute for Sex Research, Sex Offenders, 403, 671, 678 (1965).

213. Freund, 42 F.R.D. 499 (1967).

214. Attorney-General v. A Book Named "Naked Lunch", 218 N.E.2d 571-572 (Mass.1966).

b. The material must be patently offensive because it affronts contemporary community standards relating to the description or representation of sexual matters, and the community standards were to be national rather than local;

c. The material must be utterly without redeeming social value.

The primary test could be overridden if—

a. there were appeals made to children or juveniles (Ginsberg);

b. there was pandering or a commercial exploitation of the natural interest in sex (Ginzburg); or

c. there was an assault upon personal privacy through the mail or by other public means. (Rowan)

Redrup led to scores of per curiam reversals of obscenity convictions, and it tidied up some of the mess left by earlier cases.

4. In 1969 the Court decided Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969), a case of freedom "for" rather than freedom "from" obscenity. Federal and state agents had entered Stanley's home with search warrants to look for evidence of bookmaking activity. They found none. But they did find three reels of 8 mm. film in a bedroom dresser drawer, and with Stanley's screen and projector they amused themselves for a few hours. Stanley was then arrested, charged with the possession of obscene matter, and convicted.

A unanimous Supreme Court reversed. "If the First Amendment means anything," said Justice Marshall for the Court, "it means that a [s]tate has no business telling a man, sitting alone in his own house, what books he may read or what films he may watch. Our whole constitutional heritage rebels at the thought of giving government the power to control men's minds." Marshall did not explain, though, how one might legally procure obscene films.<sup>215</sup>

In 1971 the Court backed off from Stanley, or at least distinguished it in two cases. In United States v. Reidel, 402 U.S. 351 (1971), the Court through Justice White upheld the constitutionality of a federal obscenity statute prohibiting the commercial mailing of obscene material even to willing adults. Stanley differed from other obscenity cases because it involved constitutionally protected privacy—the privacy of the home. No such zone of privacy was involved in Reidel. There was no First Amendment right to receive obscene publications as Stanley might have implied.

Stanley and Reidel, when seen together, produced an odd result. Material once obtained and brought into the home was safe from obscenity prosecution, but the retailer who sold it to the householder would be fair game.

In United States v. Thirty-Seven (37) Photographs, 402 U.S. 363 (1971), the question was whether Stanley permitted the government to seize allegedly obscene materials intended for purely private use from the luggage of a returning tourist. After construing the relevant federal law so as to read into it time limits for its application consistent with the Court's fourteen-day requirement in Freedman v. Maryland, the majority concluded that Stanley did not prevent Congress from removing obscene materials from the channels of incoming foreign commerce. A port of entry, said Justice White, is not a traveler's home.

Capturing the essential absurdity of the situation, Justice Douglas dissented in both cases:

215. The Arkansas Supreme Court held in 1979 that the First Amendment was violated by a state law that imposed criminal penalties for mere private possession of obscene materials. Buck v. Arkansas, 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1030, 578 S.W.2d 579 (Ark.1979).

It would seem to me that if a citizen had a right to possess "obscene" material in the privacy of his home he should have the right to receive it voluntarily through the mail. Certainly when a man legally purchases such material abroad he should be able to bring it with him through customs to read later in his home. * * *

This construction of Stanley, said Douglas, could only apply to a man who writes salacious books in his attic, prints them in his basement, and reads them in his living room.

5. One reason for the fragility of the Warren Court's obscenity doctrine, as enunciated by Justice Brennan, was Justice Harlan's notion in Roth that state autonomy in dealing with the question need not necessarily be bound by the federal rule.

By 1969 the composition of the Court had changed, and its new members were being influenced by the wise and aging Harlan. In Hoyt v. Minnesota, 339 U.S. 524 (1969), Justice Harry Blackmun in a dissent in which he was joined by Chief Justice Warren Burger reflected this influence. Said Blackmun:

I am not persuaded that the First and Fourteenth Amendments necessarily prescribe a national and uniform measure—rather than one capable of some flexibility and resting on concepts of reasonableness—of what each of our several States constitutionally may do to regulate obscene products within its borders. * * * Six of the seven Justices of the Supreme Court of that [s]tate, citing Redrup v. New York, and other decisions of this Court, have identified the offending material "for what it is," have described it as dealing "with filth for the sake of filth," and have held it obscene as a matter of law. * * * I cannot agree that the Minnesota trial court and those six justices are so obviously misguided in their holding that they are to be summarily reversed on the authority of Redrup. At this still, for me, unsettled state in the development of the state law of obscenity in the federal constitutional context I find myself generally in accord with the views expressed by Mr. Justice Harlan. * * *

The Warren Court edifice, built on the foundation stone of Roth, was beginning to crumble.

An Injection of Sanity: The Lockhart Report

1. The single most comprehensive and systematic study of obscenity and its effect is the 1970 Report of the Presidential Commission on Obscenity and Pornography (New York: Bantam Books), chaired by William B. Lockhart, former dean of the University of Minnesota Law School.

Considering the value of this document, which deserves to be read in its entirety, it is disappointing that it was rejected by a president and a Congress—in the Senate by resolution—and given only scant attention by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Facts developed by the commission did not support widely held assumptions. Although cautious about its conclusions, the commission could find little evidence that obscene books or motion pictures incite youth or adults to criminal conduct, sexual deviance, or emotional disturbances. And it hoped that its own modest pioneering work in empirical research would help to open the way for more extensive and long-term research.

In the context of constitutional law the commission rejected the three elements of the Roth-Memoirs definition—prurient interest, patent offensiveness, and redeeming social value—as vague and highly subjective esthetic, psychological, and moral judgments providing no meaningful guidance for law enforcement officials, juries, or courts. In its inconsistent application the test would interfere with constitutionally protected expression. In addition, public opinion would not, in the final analysis, support legal prohibition of adult use of obscene materials.

"Americans," the commission added, "deeply value the right of each individual to determine for himself what books he wishes to read and what pictures or films he wishes to see. Our traditions of free speech and press also value and protect the right of writers, publishers, and book-sellers to serve the diverse interests of the public. The spirit and letter of our Constitution tell us that government should not seek to interfere with these rights unless a clear threat of harm makes that course imperative. Moreover, the possibility of the misuse of general obscenity statutes prohibiting distributions of books and films to adults constitutes a continuing threat to the free communication of ideas among Americans—one of the most important foundations of our liberties."

The commission recommended the repeal of all existing federal, state, and local legislation prohibiting or interfering with consensual distribution of obscene materials to adults.

The commission did not reject the secondary tests that had attached themselves to Roth-Memoirs—appeals to the young, pandering, and assaults on personal privacy. Statutes protecting children were supported by the commission on the grounds that insufficient research had been done on the effects of exposure of children to sexually explicit stimuli. Also there were strong ethical feelings against experimenting with children in this realm. The commission respected the stated opinions of parents on the issue of obscenity.

Statutory proposals from the commission covered only pictorial material since it could think of no constitutionally safe way to control the distribution of books and other textual materials. Broadcast material would also be exempted because of adequate self-regulation and supervision by the Federal Communications Commission.

Additional support for the secondary tests was found in the commission's endorsement of state and local laws prohibiting public displays of sexually explicit materials and federal laws dealing with the mailing of unsolicited advertising of a sexually explicit nature. The commission was sensitive to unwanted intrusions upon individual privacy, but here again it would exempt written materials and broadcast programming.

Perhaps the most controversial of all its proposals was that of a massive sex education program beginning in the schools.

Ironically, as it was to turn out, the commission advised against the elimination by Congress of federal judicial jurisdiction in the obscenity areas as a response to vocal citizen criticism of the results of that jurisdiction. "Freedom in many vital areas," said the commission, "frequently depends upon the ability of the judiciary to follow the Constitution rather than strong popular sentiment."

Burger Court Revisionism: The Roth-Miller Standard

1. The Warren Court obscenity edifice came crashing down on June 21, 1973 when the Nixon appointees joined by Justice Byron White constituted a five-man majority in five cases in which Chief Justice Burger delivered the opinion of the Court.

The cases are Miller v. State of California, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1441, 413 U.S. 15 (1973) (mass mailing campaign to advertise illustrated "adult" books); Paris Adult Theatre I et al. v. Slaton, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1454, 413 U.S. 49 (1973) (commercial showing of two "adult" films); United States v. Orito, 413 U.S. 139 (1973) (interstate transportation of lewd, lascivious, and filthy materials); Kaplan v. State of California, 413 U.S. 115 (1973) (proprietor of "adult" bookstore selling unillustrated book containing repetitively descriptive material of an explicitly sexual nature); and United States v. 12

200-Ft. Reels of Super 8mm. Film et al., 413 U.S. 123 (1973) (importation of obscene matter for personal use and possession).

Essentially the cases reject the "utterly without redeeming social value" element of the Roth-Memoirs test, substituting the words "does not have serious literary, artistic, political or scientific value." Secondly, the contemporary community standards against which the jury is to measure prurient appeal and patent offensiveness are to be the standards of the state or local community. The trend toward permissiveness had been reversed by the first majority agreement on an obscenity definition since Roth in 1957. Justices Brennan, Douglas, Marshall, and Stewart dissented in all five cases.

The most important of the opinions are Chief Justice Burger's opinion for the Court in Miller, outlining the new standards, and Justice Brennan's masterful review of sixteen years of judicial tribulation in his Paris Adult Theatre dissent.

---

MILLER v. STATE OF CALIFORNIA

413 U.S. 15, 93 S.Ct. 2607, 37 L.Ed.2d 419 (1973).

Chief Justice BURGER delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * *

This case involves the application of a state's criminal obscenity statute to a situation in which sexually explicit materials have been thrust by aggressive sales action upon unwilling recipients who had in no way indicated any desire to receive such materials. This court has recognized that the states have a legitimate interest in prohibiting dissemination or exhibition of obscene material when the mode of dissemination carries with it a significant danger of offending the sensibilities of unwilling recipients or of exposure to juveniles. It is in this context that we are called on to define the standards which must be used to identify obscene material that a State may regulate without infringing the First Amendment as applicable to the States through the Fourteenth Amendment.

* * *

While Roth presumed "obscenity" to be "utterly without redeeming social value," Memoirs required that to prove obscenity it must be affirmatively established that the material is "utterly without redeeming social value." Thus, even as they repeated the words of Roth, the Mem-oirs plurality produced a drastically altered test that called on the prosecution to prove a negative, i.e., that the material was "utterly without redeeming social value"—a burden virtually impossible to discharge under our criminal standards of proof. Such considerations caused Justice Harlan to wonder if the "utterly without redeeming social value" test had any meaning at all.

* * *

Apart from the initial formulation in the Roth case, no majority of the Court has at any given time been able to agree on a standard to determine what constitutes obscene, pornographic material subject to regulation under the States' police power. We have seen "a variety of views among the members of the Court unmatched in any other course of constitutional adjudication." This is not remarkable, for in the area of freedom of speech and press the courts must always remain sensitive to any infringement on genuinely serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific expression. This is an area in which there are few eternal verities.

The case we now review was tried on the theory that California Penal Code § 311 approximately incorporates the three-stage Memoirs test, supra. But now the Memoirs test has been abandoned as unworkable by its author<sup>4</sup> and no member of the Court today supports the Memoirs formulation. [Emphasis added.]

This much has been categorically settled by the Court, that obscene material is unprotected by the First Amendment. The First and Fourteenth Amendments have never been treated as absolutes. We acknowledge, however, the inherent dangers of undertaking to regulate any form of expression. State statutes designed to regulate obscene materials must be carefully limited. As a result, we now confine the permissible scope of such regulation to works which depict or describe sexual conduct. That conduct must be specifically defined by the applicable state law, as written or authoritatively construed. A state offense must also be limited to works which, taken as a whole, appeal to the prurient interest in sex, which portray sexual conduct in a patently offensive way, and which, taken as a whole, do not have serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value. [Emphasis added.]

The basic guidelines for the trier of fact must be: (a) whether "the average person, applying contemporary community standards" would find that the work, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient interest, (b) whether the work depicts or describes, in a patently offensive way, sexual conduct specifically defined by the applicable state law, and (c) whether the work, taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value. We do not adopt as a constitutional standard the "utterly without redeeming social value" test of Memoirs v. Massachusetts; that concept has never commanded the adherence of more than three Justices at one time. If a state law that regulates obscene material is thus limited, as written or construed, the First Amendment values applicable to the States through the Fourteenth Amendment are adequately protected by the ultimate power of appellate courts to conduct an independent review of constitutional claims when necessary.

We emphasize that it is not our function to propose regulatory schemes for the States. That must await their concrete legislative efforts. It is possible, however, to give a few plain examples of what a state statute could define for regulation under the second part (b) of the standard announced in this opinion, supra:

a. Patently offensive representations or descriptions of ultimate sexual acts, normal or perverted, actual or simulated.

b. Patently offensive representation or descriptions of masturbation, excretory functions, and lewd exhibition of the genitals.

Sex and nudity may not be exploited without limit by films or pictures exhibited or sold in places of public accommodation any more than live sex and nudity can be exhibited or sold without limit in such public places. At a minimum, prurient, patently offensive depiction or description of sexual conduct must have serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value to merit First Amendment protection. For example, medical books for the education of physicians and related personnel necessarily use graphic illustrations and descriptions of human anatomy. In resolving the inevitably sensitive questions of fact and law, we must continue to rely on the jury system, accompanied by the safeguards that judges, rules of evidence, presumption of innocence and other protective features provide, as we do with rape, murder and a host of other offenses against society and its individual members.

* * *

Under the holdings announced today, no one will be subject to prosecution for the sale or exposure of obscene materials

4. See the dissenting opinion of Justice Brennan in Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 49 (1973).

unless these materials depict or describe patently offensive "hard core" sexual conduct specifically defined by the regulating state law, as written or construed. We are satisfied that these specific prerequisites will provide fair notice to a dealer in such materials that his public and commercial activities may bring prosecution.

* * *

It is certainly true that the absence, since Roth, of a single majority view of this Court as to proper standards for testing obscenity has placed a strain on both state and federal courts. But today, for the first time since Roth was decided in 1957, a majority of this Court has agreed on concrete guidelines to isolate "hard core" pornography from expression protected by the First Amendment. Now we may abandon the casual practice of Redrup v. New York, and attempt to provide positive guidance to the federal and state courts alike. [Emphasis added.]

This may not be an easy road, free from difficulty. But no amount of "fatigue" should lead us to adopt a convenient "institutional" rationale—an absolutist, "anything goes" view of the First Amendment—because it will lighten our burdens. "Such an abnegation of judicial supervision in this field would be inconsistent with our duty to uphold the constitutional guarantees." Nor should we remedy "tension between state and federal courts" by arbitrarily depriving the States of a power reserved to them under the Constitution, a power which they have enjoyed and exercised continuously from before the adoption of the First Amendment to this day. "Our duty admits of no 'substitute for facing up to the tough individual problems of constitutional judgment involved in every obscenity case.'"

Under a national Constitution, fundamental First Amendment limitations on the powers of the States do not vary from community to community, but this does not mean that there are, or should or can be, fixed, uniform national standards of precisely what appeals to the "prurient interest" or is "patently offensive." These are essentially questions of fact, and our nation is simply too big and too diverse for this Court to reasonably expect that such standards could be articulated for all 50 States in a single formulation, even assuming the prerequisite consensus exists. When triers of fact are asked to decide whether "the average person, applying contemporary community standards" would consider certain materials "prurient," it would be unrealistic to require that the answer be based on some abstract formulation. The adversary system, with lay jurors as the usual ultimate fact-finders in criminal prosecutions, has historically permitted triers-of-fact to draw on the standards of their community, guided always by limiting instructions on the law. To require a State to structure obscenity proceedings around evidence of a national "community standard" would be an exercise in futility.

* * *

We conclude that neither the State's alleged failure to offer evidence of "national standards," nor the trial court's charge that the jury consider state community standards, were constitutional errors.<sup>216</sup> Nothing in the First Amendment requires that a jury must consider hypothetical and unascertainable "national standards" when attempting to determine whether certain materials are obscene as a matter of fact. * * *

It is neither realistic nor constitutionally sound to read the First Amendment as requiring that the people of Maine or Mississippi accept public depiction of conduct found tolerable in Las Vegas or New York City. People in different States vary in their tastes and attitudes, and this diversity is not to be strangled by the absolutism of imposed uniformity. * * * We hold the requirement that the jury evaluate the materials with reference to "contemporary standards of the State of California" serves this protective purpose and is constitutionally adequate.

216. Chief Justice Burger indicates in a footnote that community standards in the Miller case were ascertained by a police officer with many years of specialization in obscenity offenses. He had conducted an extensive statewide survey—the Chief Justice says nothing more specific about the survey—and had given expert evidence on twenty-six occasions in the year prior to the Miller trial.

* * *

In sum we (a) reaffirm the Roth holding that obscene material is not protected by the First Amendment, (b) hold that such material can be regulated by the States, subject to the specific safeguards enunciated above, without a showing that the material is "utterly without redeeming social value," and (c) hold that obscenity is to be determined by applying "contemporary community standards," * * * not "national standards."

Vacated and remanded for further proceedings.

---

PARIS ADULT THEATRE I v. SLATON

413 U.S. 49, 93 S.Ct. 2628, 37 L.Ed.2d 446 (1973).

EDITORIAL NOTE

Chief Justice Burger in a second opinion for the Court upheld the judgment of the Georgia Supreme Court that two "adult" movies were constitutionally unprotected. He noted that although there had been a full adversary proceeding on the question, there was no error in failing to require "expert" affirmative evidence that the materials were obscene. "The films, obviously," said Burger, "are the best evidence of what they represent." He rejected the consenting adults standard on the grounds that the state had a legitimate interest in regulating the use of obscene material in local commerce and in all places of public accommodation.

Citing the Hill-Link Minority Report of the Commission on Obscenity and Pornography, which found an arguable correlation between obscene material and crime, the Chief Justice nevertheless depreciated the importance of the Court's resolving empirical uncertainties in legislation unless constitutional rights were being infringed. Legislators and judges, he said, could and must act on unprovable assumptions such as the notion that the crass commercial exploitation of sex debases sex in the development of human personality, family life, and community welfare.

Noting that "free will" is not to be a governing concept in human affairs—we don't leave garbage and sewage disposal up to the individual—Burger, with assistance from social commentator Irving Kristol, found an inconsistency in the liberal stance:

States are told by some that they must await a "laissez faire" market solution to the obscenity-pornography problem, paradoxically "by people who have never otherwise had a kind word to say for laissez faire," particularly in solving urban, commercial and environmental pollution problems.

Privacy, he added, while encompassing the personal intimacies of the home, the family, marriage, motherhood, procreation, and child rearing does not include the right to watch obscene movies in places of public accommodation. The Chief Justice concluded:

The idea of a "privacy" right and a place of public accommodation are, in this context, mutually exclusive. Conduct or depictions of conduct that the state police power can prohibit on a public street does not become automatically protected by the Constitution merely because the conduct is moved to a bar or a "live" theatre stage, any more than a "live" performance of a man and woman locked in a sexual embrace at high noon in Times Square is protected by the Constitution because they simultaneously engage in a valid political dialogue. * * * [W]e reject the claim that the State of Georgia is here attempting to control the minds or thoughts of those who patronize theatres. Preventing unlimited display or distribution of obscene material, which by definition lacks any serious literary, artistic, political or scientific value as communication, is distinct from a control of reason and the intellect. Where communication of ideas, protected by the First Amendment, is not involved, nor the particular privacy of the home protected by Stanley, nor any of the other "areas or zones" of constitutionally protected privacy, the mere fact that, as a consequence, some human "utterances" or "thoughts" may be incidentally affected does not bar the state from acting to protect legitimate state interests.

Justice Brennan, since Roth the Court's leading spokesman on obscenity law, was joined in his dissent by Justices Stewart and Marshall. His opinion provides an excellent review of the Court's work in this troubling area since 1957, an area which, he says, has demanded a substantial commitment of the Court's time, has generated much disharmony of views, and has remained resistant to the formulation of stable and manageable standards. The dissent should be read in its entirety. A segment follows.]

Justice BRENNAN, dissenting:

* * *

I am convinced that the approach initiated 15 years ago in Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957), and culminating in the Court's decision today, cannot bring stability to this area of the law without jeopardizing fundamental First Amendment values, and I have concluded that the time has come to make a significant departure from that approach.

* * *

The decision of the Georgia Supreme Court rested squarely on its conclusion that the State could constitutionally suppress these films even if they were displayed only to persons over the age of 21 who were aware of the nature of their contents and who had consented to viewing them. For the reasons set forth in this opinion, I am convinced of the invalidity of that conclusion of law, and I would therefore vacate the judgment of the Georgia Supreme Court. I have no occasion to consider the extent of state power to regulate the distribution of sexually oriented materials to juveniles or to unconsenting adults. Nor am I required, for the purposes of this appeal, to consider whether or not these petitioners had, in fact, taken precautions to avoid exposure of films to minors or unconsenting adults. * * * The essence of our problem in the obscenity area is that we have been unable to provide "sensitive tools" to separate obscenity from other sexually oriented but constitutionally protected speech, so that efforts to suppress the former do not spill over into the suppression of the latter. * *

To be sure, five members of the Court did agree in Roth that obscenity could be determined by asking "whether to the average person, applying contemporary community standards, the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to prurient interest." But agreement on that test—achieved in the abstract and without reference to the particular material before the Court,—was, to say the least, short lived. By 1967 the following views had emerged: Justice Black and Justice Douglas consistently maintained that government is wholly powerless to regulate any sexually oriented matter on the ground of its obscenity. Justice Harlan, on the other hand, believed that the Federal Government in the exercise of its enumerated powers could control the distribution of "hard-core" pornography, while the States were afforded more latitude to "[ban] any material which, taken as a whole, has been reasonably found in state judicial proceedings to treat with sex in a fundamentally offensive manner, under rationally established criteria for judging such material." Justice Stewart regarded "hard-core" pornography as the limit of both federal and state power.

The view that, until today, enjoyed the most, but not majority, support was an interpretation of Roth (and not, as the Court suggests, a veering "sharply away from the Roth concept" and the articulation of "a new test of obscenity," adopted by Chief Justice Warren, Justice Fortas, and the author of this opinion in Memoirs v. Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413 [1966]). We expressed the view that Federal or State Governments could control the distribution of material where "three elements * * * coalesce: it must be established that (a) the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to a prurient interest in sex; (b) the material is patently offensive because it affronts contemporary community standards relating to the description or representation of sexual matters; and (c) the material is utterly without redeeming social value." Even this formulation, however, concealed differences of opinion. * * * Nor, finally, did it ever command a majority of the Court.

In the face of this divergence of opinion the Court began the practice in 1967 in Redrup v. New York, 386 U.S. 767, of per curiam reversals of convictions for the dissemination of materials that at least five members of the Court, applying their separate tests, deemed not to be obscene. This approach capped the attempt in Roth to separate all forms of sexually oriented expression into two categories—the one subject to full governmental suppression and the other beyond the reach of governmental regulation to the same extent as any other protected form of speech or press. Today a majority of the Court offers a slightly altered formulation of the basic Roth test, while leaving entirely unchanged the underlying approach.

Our experience with the Roth approach has certainly taught us that the outright suppression of obscenity cannot be reconciled with the fundamental principles of the First and Fourteenth Amendments. For we have failed to formulate a standard that sharply distinguishes protected from unprotected speech, and out of necessity, we have resorted to the Redrup approach, which resolves cases as between the parties, but offers only the most obscure guidance to legislation, adjudication by other courts, and primary conduct. By disposing of cases through summary reversal or denial of certiorari we have deliberately and effectively obscured the rationale underlying the decision. It comes as no surprise that judicial attempts to follow our lead conscientiously have often ended in hopeless confusion. [Emphasis added.]

Of course, the vagueness problem would be largely of our own creation if it stemmed primarily from our failure to reach a consensus on any one standard. But after 15 years of experimentation and debate I am reluctantly forced to the conclusion that none of the available formulas, including the one announced today, can reduce the vagueness to a tolerable level while at the same time striking an acceptable balance between the protections of the First and Fourteenth Amendments, on the one hand, and on the other the asserted state interest in regulating the dissemination of certain sexually oriented materials. Any effort to draw a constitutionally acceptable boundary on state power must resort to such indefinite concepts as "prurient interest," "patent offensiveness," "serious literary value," and the like. The meaning of these concepts necessarily varies with the experience, outlook, and even idiosyncracies of the person defining them. * * *

As a result of our failure to define standards with predictable application to any given piece of material, there is no probability of regularity in obscenity decisions by state and lower federal courts.

That is not to say that these courts have performed badly in this area or paid insufficient attention to the principles we have established. The problem is, rather that one cannot say with certainty that material is obscene until at least five members of this Court, applying inevitably obscure standards, have pronounced it so. The number of obscenity cases on our docket gives ample testimony to the burden that has been placed upon this Court.

But the sheer number of the cases does not define the full extent of the institutional problem. For quite apart from the number of cases involved and the need to make a fresh constitutional determination in each case, we are tied to the "absurd business of perusing and viewing the miserable stuff that pours into the Court. * * * " Interstate Circuit, Inc. v. Dallas, 390 U.S. 676, 707 (1968) (Harlan, J., dissenting). While the material may have varying degrees of social importance, it is hardly a source of edification to the members of this Court who are compelled to view it before passing on its obscenity. Cf. Mishkin v. New York, 383 U.S. 502, 516-517 (1966) (Black, J., dissenting).

Moreover, we have managed the burden of deciding scores of obscenity cases by relying on per curiam reversals or denials of certiorari—a practice which conceals the rationale of decision and gives at least the appearance of arbitrary action by this Court. More important, no less than the procedural schemes struck down in such cases as Blount v. Rizzi, 400 U.S. 410 (1971), and Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51 (1965), the practice effectively censors protected expression by leaving lower court determinations of obscenity intact even though the status of the allegedly obscene material is entirely unsettled until final review here. In addition, the uncertainty of the standards creates a continuing source of tension between state and federal courts, since the need for an independent determination by this Court seems to render superfluous even the most conscientious analysis by state tribunals. And our inability to justify our decisions with a persuasive rationale—or indeed, any rationale at all—necessarily creates the impression that we are merely second-guessing state court judges.

The severe problems arising from the lack of fair notice, from the chill on protected expression, and from the stress imposed on the state and federal judicial machinery persuade me that a significant change in direction is urgently required. I turn, therefore, to the alternatives that are now open.

1. The approach requiring the smallest deviation from our present course would be to draw a new line between protected and unprotected speech, still permitting the States to suppress all material on the unprotected side of the line. In my view, clarity cannot be obtained pursuant to this approach except by drawing a line that resolves all doubts in favor of state power and against the guarantees of the First Amendment. We could hold, for example, that any depiction or description of human sexual organs, irrespective of the manner or purpose of the portrayal, is outside the protection of the First Amendment and therefore open to suppression by the States. That formula would, no doubt, offer much fairer notice of the reach of any state statute drawn at the boundary of the State's constitutional power. And it would also, in all likelihood, give rise to a substantial probability of regularity in most judicial determinations under the standard. But such a standard would be appallingly overbroad, permitting the suppression of a vast range of literary, scientific, and artistic masterpieces. Neither the First Amendment nor any free community could possibly tolerate such a standard. Yet short of that extreme it is hard to see how any choice of words could reduce the vagueness problem to tolerable proportions, so long as we remain committed to the view that some class of materials is subject to outright suppression by the State.

2. The alternative adopted by the Court today recognizes that a prohibition against any depiction or description of human sexual organs could not be reconciled with the guarantees of the First Amendment. But the Court does retain the view that certain sexually oriented material can be considered obscene and therefore unprotected by the First and Fourteenth Amendments. To describe that unprotected class of expression, the Court adopts a restatement of the Roth-Memoirs definition of obscenity: "The basic guidelines for the trier of fact must be: (a) whether 'the average person, applying contemporary community standards' would find that the work, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient interest, * * * (b) whether the work depicts or describes, in a patently offensive way, sexual conduct specifically defined by the applicable state law, and (c) whether the work, taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value." California v. Miller, ante. In an apparent illustration of "sexual conduct," as that term is used in the test's second element the Court identifies "(a) patently offensive representations or descriptions of ultimate sexual acts, normal or perverted, actual or simulated," and "(b) patently offensive representations or descriptions of masturbation, excretory functions, and lewd exhibition of genitals."

The differences between this formulation and the three-pronged Memoirs test are, for the most part, academic. The first element of the Court's test is virtually identical to the Memoirs requirement that "the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole [must appeal] to a prurient interest in sex." Whereas the second prong of the Memoirs test demanded that the material be "patently offensive because it affronts contemporary community standards relating to the description or representation of sexual matters," the test adopted today requires that the material describe, "in a patently offensive way, sexual conduct specifically defined by the applicable state law." The third component of the Memoirs test is that the material must be "utterly without redeeming social value." The Court's rephrasing requires that the work, taken as a whole, must be proved to lack "serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value."

The Court evidently recognizes that difficulties with the Roth approach necessitate a significant change of direction. But the Court does not describe its understanding of those difficulties, nor does it indicate how the restatement of the Memoirs test is in any way responsive to the problems that have arisen. In my view, the restatement leaves unresolved the very difficulties that compel our rejection of the underlying Roth approach, while at the same time contributing substantial difficulties of its own. The modification of the Memoirs test may prove sufficient to jeopardize the analytic underpinnings of the entire scheme. And today's restatement will likely have the effect, whether or not intended, of permitting far more sweeping suppression of sexually oriented expression, including expression that would almost surely be held protected under our current formulation.

Although the Court's restatement substantially tracks the three-part test announced in Memoirs v. Massachusetts, it does purport to modify the "social value" component of the test. Instead of requiring, as did Roth and Memoirs, that state suppression be limited to materials utterly lacking in social value, the Court today permits suppression if the government can prove that the materials lack "serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value." But the definition of "obscenity" as expression utterly lacking in social importance is the key to the conceptual basis of Roth and our subsequent opinions. In Roth we held that certain expression is obscene, and thus outside the protection of the First Amendment, precisely because it lacks even the slightest redeeming social value. The Court's approach necessarily assumes that some works will be deemed obscene—even though they clearly have some social value—because the State was able to prove that the value, measured by some unspecified standard, was not sufficiently "serious" to warrant constitutional protection. That result is not merely inconsistent with our holding in Roth; it is nothing less than a rejection of the fundamental First Amendment premises and rationale of the Roth opinion and an invitation to widespread suppression of sexually oriented speech. Before today, the protections of the First Amendment have never been thought limited to expressions of serious literary or political value.

Although the Court concedes that "Roth presumed 'obscenity' to be 'utterly without redeeming social value,'" it argues that Memoirs produced "a drastically altered test that called on the prosecution to prove a negative, i.e., that the material was 'utterly without redeeming social value'—a burden virtually impossible to discharge under our criminal standards of proof." One should hardly need to point out that under the third component of the Court's test the prosecution is still required to "prove a negative"—i.e., that the material lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value. Whether it will be easier to prove that material lacks "serious" value than to prove that it lacks any value at all remains, of course, to be seen.

In any case, even if the Court's approach left undamaged the conceptual framework of Roth, and even if it clearly barred the suppression of works with at least some social value, I would nevertheless be compelled to reject it. For it is beyond dispute that the approach can have no ameliorative impact on the cluster of problems that grows out of the vagueness of our current standards. Indeed, even the Court makes no argument that the reformulation will provide fairer notice to booksellers, theatre owners, and the reading and viewing public. Nor does the Court contend that the approach will provide clearer guidance to law enforcement officials or reduce the chill on protected expression. Nor, finally, does the Court suggest that the approach will mitigate to the slightest degree the institutional problems that have plagued this Court and the State and Federal Judiciary as a direct result of the uncertainty inherent in any definition of obscenity.

* * * The Court surely demonstrates little sensitivity to our own institutional problems, much less the other vagueness-related difficulties, in establishing a system that requires us to consider whether a description of human genitals is sufficiently "lewd" to deprive it of constitutional protection; whether a sexual act is "ultimate"; whether the conduct depicted in materials before us fits within one of the categories of conduct whose depiction the state or federal governments have attempted to suppress; and a host of equally pointless inquiries. In addition, adoption of such a test does not, presumably, obviate the need for consideration of the nuances of presentation of sexually oriented material, yet it hardly clarifies the application of those opaque but important factors.

If the application of the "physical conduct" test to pictorial material is fraught with difficulty, its application to textual material carries the potential for extraordinary abuse. Surely we have passed the point where the mere written description of sexual conduct is deprived of First Amendment protection. Yet the test offers no guidance to us, or anyone else, in determining which written descriptions of sexual conduct are protected, and which are not.

Ultimately, the reformulation must fail because it still leaves in this Court the responsibility of determining in each case whether the materials are protected by the First Amendment. * * *

3. I have also considered the possibility of reducing our own role, and the role of appellate courts generally, in determining whether particular matter is obscene. Thus, we might conclude that juries are best suited to determine obscenity vel non and that jury verdicts in this area should not be set aside except in cases of extreme departure from prevailing standards. Or, more generally, we might adopt the position that where a lower federal or state court has conscientiously applied the constitutional standard, its finding of obscenity will be no more vulnerable to reversal by this Court than any finding of fact. Cf. Interstate Circuit v. Dallas, 390 U.S. 676, 706-707 (1968) [separate opinion of Harlan, J.]. While the point was not clearly resolved prior to our decision in Redrup v. New York, it is implicit in that decision that the First Amendment requires an independent review by appellate courts of the constitutional fact of obscenity. That result is required by principles applicable to the obscenity issue no less than to any other area involving free expression, or other constitutional right. In any event, even if the Constitution would permit us to refrain from judging for ourselves the alleged obscenity of particular materials, that approach would solve at best only a small part of our problem: For while it would mitigate the institutional stress produced by the Roth approach, it would neither offer nor produce any cure for the other vices of vagueness. Far from providing a clearer guide to permissible primary conduct, the approach would inevitably lead to even greater uncertainty and the consequent due process problems of fair notice. And the approach would expose much protected sexually oriented expression to the vagaries of jury determinations. Plainly, the institutional gain would be more than offset by the unprecedented infringement of First Amendment rights. [Emphasis added.]

4. Finally, I have considered the view, urged so forcefully since 1957 by our Brothers Black and Douglas, that the First Amendment bars the suppression of any sexually oriented expression. That position would effect a sharp reduction, although perhaps not a total elimination, of the uncertainty that surrounds our current approach. Nevertheless, I am convinced that it would achieve that desirable goal only by stripping the States of power to an extent that cannot be justified by the commands of the Constitution, at least so long as there is available an alternative approach that strikes a better balance between the guarantee of free expression and the States' legitimate interests.

Our experience since Roth requires us not only to abandon the effort to pick out obscene materials on a case-by-case basis, but also to reconsider a fundamental postulate of Roth: that there exists a definable class of sexually oriented expression that may be totally suppressed by the Federal and State Governments. Assuming that such a class of expression does in fact exist, I am forced to conclude that the concept of "obscenity" cannot be defined with sufficient specificity and clarity to provide fair notice to persons who create and distribute sexually oriented materials, to prevent substantial erosion of protected speech as a by-product of the attempt to suppress unprotected speech, and to avoid very costly institutional harms. Given these inevitable side-effects of state efforts to suppress what is assumed to be unprotected speech, we must scrutinize with care the state interest that is asserted to justify the suppression. For in the absence of some very substantial interest in suppressing such speech, we can hardly condone the ill-effects that seem to flow inevitably from the effort.

* * *

In short, while I cannot say that the interests of the State—apart from the question of juveniles and unconsenting adults—are trivial or nonexistent, I am compelled to conclude that these interests cannot justify the substantial damage to constitutional rights and to this Nation's judicial machinery that inevitably results from state efforts to bar the distribution even of unprotected material to consenting adults. I would hold, therefore, that at least in the absence of distribution to juveniles or obtrusive exposure to unconsenting adults, the First and Fourteenth Amendments prohibit the state and federal governments from attempting wholly to suppress sexually oriented materials on the basis of their allegedly "obscene" contents. Nothing in this approach precludes those governments from taking action to serve what may be strong and legitimate interests through regulation of the manner of distribution of sexually oriented material. [Emphasis added.]

---

COMMENT

1. In his opinion for the Court in Orito, Chief Justice Burger reiterated the view that Stanley did not protect obscene materials outside of the home or in interstate commerce. And words alone may constitute obscenity, said the Chief Justice, in finding against the proprietor of the Peek-a-Boo Bookstore in Kaplan:

For good or ill, a book has a continuing life. It is passed hand to hand, and we can take note of the tendency of widely circulated books of this category to reach the impressionable young and have a continuing impact. A [s]tate could reasonably regard the "hard core" conduct described by Suite 69 as capable of encouraging or causing anti-social behavior, especially in its impact on young people. States need not wait until behavioral experts or educators can provide empirical data before enacting controls of commerce in obscene materials unprotected by the First Amendment or by a constitutional right to privacy.

Finally in 12 200-Ft. Reels of Super 8mm. Film, Burger closed the Customs Bureau door to the importation of obscene matter.

2. Justice Douglas dissented separately and predictably in all five cases. He seemed to take a quiet satisfaction in noting that the Court had worked hard to define obscenity but concededly had failed. The criminal law had become a trap. "To send men to jail," said Douglas, "for violating standards they cannot understand, construe, and apply is a monstrous thing to do in a Nation dedicated to fair trials and due process." "The Court's test," he added, "would make it possible to ban any paper or any journal or magazine in some benighted place. * * * To give the power to the censor, as we do today, is to make a sharp and radical break with the traditions of a free society." For Douglas obscenity is no more than a classification of offensive ideas, and to make that classification unprotected expression would require a constitutional amendment.

3. If Justice Brennan could have commanded a majority of the Court for a case or two more, essential elements of the Lockhart Commission proposals might have begun to shape the law, and society would have been spared the madness of most obscenity prosecutions. Brennan's desire to protect the privacy of unconsenting adults and to limit the dissemination of erotic material to children has long been subscribed to by liberal commentators.<sup>217</sup>

4. The abiding importance of Freedman v. Maryland and its standard of procedural due process was reflected in three 1979 cases. Missouri police learned that seizure of 1,000 allegedly obscene films and 13,000 allegedly obscene magazines from a wholesale distributor before a judicial adversary hearing was an unconstitutional prior restraint.<sup>218</sup> The Florida Supreme

---

217. Emerson, The System of Freedom of Expression, 497 (1970) and Kuh, Foolish Fickleaves? (1967).

218. Missouri v. All Star News Agency, 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1076, 580 S.W.2d 245 (Mo.1979).

Court ruled that a permanent injunction barring sales and distribution of printed material before a judicial determination of obscenity was also a prior restraint.<sup>219</sup> The U.S. Supreme Court itself in 1979 unanimously invalidated seizure of 800 magazines, films, and other material from a bookstore under an open-ended search warrant that grew from two to sixteen pages as the six-hour search proceeded. Presence of a town justice making snap judgments as to what was obscene was no substitute, said the Court, for a "neutral" and "detached" judicial officer. Reminiscent of the pre-Revolution general warrant, the whole procedure was said to violate the First, Fourth, and Fourteenth Amendments.<sup>220</sup>

A year later, Wisconsin's obscenity statute imposing felony sanctions against anyone who intentionally "imports, prints, advertises, sells, has in his possession for sale, or publishes, exhibits or transfers any lewd, obscene or indecent written matters, picture, sound recording or film" was struck down by that state's supreme court. As well as being facially vague and overbroad in violation of the First Amendment, it contained no procedural safeguards for reviewing denials of a license.<sup>221</sup>

That part of a Minnesota municipal ordinance that exempted certain schools, museums, churches, physicians, and government agencies from the strictures of obscenity law was said to be a violation of equal protection.<sup>222</sup> Later the same ordinance was held by a federal court to be an unconstitutional prior restraint in requiring operators of adult bookstores to pay an annual $500 fee to administer and enforce a licensing system.<sup>223</sup> And the First Amendment was also violated by a California municipal ordinance requiring businesses which were open to minors to seal, cover, or remove from the reach of minors all sexually explicit, although no-nobscene, material or, as an alternative, to exclude minors unless accompanied by parent or guardian.<sup>224</sup>

5. Applying the obscenity standards of Miller and defining community standards has not been so easy. In Ferber the Court noted that Miller has been followed in the statutory schemes of most states. Thirty-seven states and the District of Columbia have either legislatively adopted or judicially incorporated the Miller test for obscenity. Four states in 1982 followed the Roth-Memoirs<sup>225</sup> test. They were California, Connecticut, Florida, and Illinois. Five states regulated only the distribution of pornographic material to children. They were Maine, Montana, New Mexico, Vermont, and West Virginia. Three state laws did not fall into any of the above categories. Wisconsin's law was struck down in 1980 by the state's supreme court (fn. 221), and apparently hadn't been resuscitated by mid-1982 when the Supreme Court delivered Ferber. Mississippi's obscenity standard was declared invalid in ABC Interstate Theatres, Inc. v. State<sup>226</sup> in 1976. Alaska in 1982 had no obscenity law.

Although Miller has come to be applied more cautiously and narrowly by lower courts, it has by no means solved the puzzle of pornography. The first misapplication of its standard came to the Supreme 219. Ladoga Canning Corp. v. McKenzie, 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1102, 370 So.2d 1137 (Fla.1979).

220. Lo-Ji Sales v. New York, 442 U.S. 319 (1979).

221. Wisconsin v. Princess Cinema, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1458, 292 N.W.2d 807 (Wis.1980).

222. Duluth v. Sarette, 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1824, 283 N.W.2d 533 (Minn.1979).

223. Wendling v. Duluth, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1953, 495 F.Supp. 1380 (D.Minn.1980).

224. American Booksellers Association v. Superior Court, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 2014, 181 Cal.Rptr. 33 (1982).

225. Memoirs v. Massachusetts, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1390, 383 U.S. 413 (1966), this text, p. 744.

226. 325 So.2d 123 (Miss.1976).

Court from Georgia in 1974 and focused on a critically acclaimed movie titled Carnal Knowledge. In Jenkins v. Georgia, 418 U.S. 153 (1974) the Court was plunged into the consequences of its own mischief. The Court in Miller had hoped to avoid making an independent assessment of whether or not particular material was obscene. It sought a way out of the quagmire. But Jenkins showed that no such path was marked by Miller. Technically, the Court reversed the state supreme court in Jenkins because that court had misinterpreted Miller. It had thought that a jury verdict reached pursuant to Miller-based instructions precluded further judicial review. Juries, said the Court, did not have "unbridled discretion" to determine "what is 'patently offensive'." Moreover, Carnal Knowledge was not "hard core," said Justice Rehnquist, because the camera did not focus on the bodies of the actors during scenes of "ultimate sexual acts" nor were the actors' genitals exhibited during those scenes. Miller had held that the jury could use a "local" community standard in order to give meaning to prurency and patent offensiveness. Jenkins demonstrated that these elements of the test would not remain exclusive where the jury's verdict was dispositive.

Jenkins was a state prosecution under Miller. What about a federal prosecution? How would the Miller criteria apply? In Hamling v. United States, 1 Med. L.Rptr. 1479, 418 U.S. 87 (1974), the Court upheld the federal conviction of the mailer of an obscene brochure advertising what was purported to be an illustrated edition of the Lockhart Commission Report.

"A juror," said Justice Rehnquist, again speaking for the Court, "is entitled to draw on his own knowledge of the views of the average person [not the most prudish or the most tolerant] in the community or vicinage from which he comes from making the required determination, just as he is entitled to draw on his knowledge of the propensities of a 'reasonable' person in other areas of the law. * * * Our holding in Miller that California could constitutionally proscribe obscenity in terms of a 'statewide' standard did not mean that any such precise geographical area is required as a matter of constitutional law."

Expert testimony, the Court added, is irrelevant in defining obscenity or community standards, and there is no need for federal statutes to look to national standards of decency, even though the trial judge in Hamling had instructed the jury largely in terms of national standards.

An important aspect of Hamling, then, is that the Court made it clear that the fact that the federal jury had been instructed to apply a national community standard did not in itself constitute reversible error. But the boundaries of "community" remain fuzzy and flexible.

"National distributors choosing to send their products in interstate travels will be forced," said Justice Brennan in dissent, "to cope with the community standards of every hamlet into which their goods may wander."

Brennan had observed in Jenkins that as long as Miller remained in effect "one cannot say with certainty that material is obscene until at least five members of this Court, applying inevitably obscure standards, have pronounced it so." The Court, it seemed, would again have to deal with obscenity on a case-by-case basis.

In Smith v. United States, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1833, 431 U.S. 291 (1977), the Court held that in a federal obscenity prosecution a jury is not necessarily bound by the definition of contemporary community standards found in a state statute. Federal jurors could determine the meaning of prurency and patent offensiveness in light of their own understanding of local community standards. In addition the Court in Smith rejected a vagueness challenge to 18 U.S.C.A. § 1461, the Comstock Law.

The best guidance the Court can provide is that jurors consider the entire community and not simply their own subject-tive reactions or the reactions of a sensitive or a callous minority. Community standards will determine what appeals to prurient interest or is patently offensive, and this, said the Court, would be a question of fact for the jurors.

One of four dissenters, Justice Stevens thought it obvious that a federal statute defining a criminal offense should prescribe a uniform standard applicable throughout the country—especially where the First Amendment was involved. Stevens thought it inevitable that community standards, whether national or local, would be subjective, a matter of values and not of fact.

"In my judgment," wrote Stevens, "the line between communications which 'offend' and those which do not is too blurred to identify criminal conduct. It is also too blurred to delimit the protections of the First Amendment. * * *

"I am not prepared to rely on either the average citizen's understanding of an amorphous community standard or on my fellow judge's appraisal of what has serious artistic merit as a basis for deciding what one citizen may communicate to another by appropriate means"—and Stevens did think there were inappropriate means: for example, erotic displays in a residential neighborhood.

South Dakota's Supreme Court would allow "expert" testimony on community standards if witnesses could establish their expertise;<sup>227</sup> Massachusetts's Supreme Judicial Court held that expert testimony on what offends the average person in that state was unnecessary.<sup>228</sup> The Ninth Circuit ruled reluctantly that including children in the definition of community was not reversible error.<sup>229</sup> It was reversed by the Supreme Court in Pinkus v. United States, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 2329, 436 U.S. 293 (1978), but it was no error, said the Court, to include "sensitive" persons in the definition and to permit the jury to consider the appeal of material to the prurient interest of "deviant" groups and the degree to which it was pandered.

Litigation in Florida, resulting from the showing of Deep Throat in a journalism law class at a state university in Pensacola, sought to explore whether the academic community was part of or apart from the surrounding community.<sup>230</sup>

A federal district court in Georgia held that the appropriate community standard would be that of the county that had threatened plaintiff with prosecution rather than the entire state of Georgia or the applicable federal judicial district.<sup>231</sup> A Texas appeals court said that public opinion survey evidence as to community standards, while not required, was relevant to a determination of a material fact issue.<sup>232</sup>

6. What is patently offensive in Illinois may not be in Ohio. The Supreme Court affirmed an Illinois Supreme Court holding that the sale of sado-masochistic materials was prohibited by the state's obscenity statute.<sup>233</sup> A few months later a federal district court in Ohio ruled that state's pandering obscenity law overbroad in part because it included "display or depiction of extreme or bizarre violence, cruelty, or brutality." After all, Miller held that only materials showing or describing sexual

227. Sioux Falls v. Mini-Kota Art Theatres, Inc., 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1318, 247 N.W.2d 676 (S.D.1977).

228. District Attorney for Northern District v. Three Way Theatres Corp., 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1257, 357 N.E.2d 747 (Mass.1977).

229. United States v. Pinkus, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 2217, 551 F.2d 1155 (9th Cir. 1977).

230. Correspondence with Professor Churchill Roberts of the University of West Florida, Jan. 6, 1978.

231. Septum v. Keller, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1664, 614 F.2d 456 (5th Cir. 1981).

232. Carlock v. Texas, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2275, 609 S.W.2d 787 (Tex.1980).

233. Ward v. Illinois, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1929, 431 U.S. 767 (1977).

conduct were obscene.<sup>234</sup>

7. Prurient interest may be the deepest, darkest mystery of all. A trial jury in Manhattan acquitted a defendant of charges brought under New York's obscenity law because his films, depicting acts of bestiality, were "too disgusting and repulsive" to appeal to the prurient interest of average people. It is the stimulation of normal, healthy, sexual impulses that are punishable, what the U.S. Supreme Court has referred to as itching, longing, lascivious desire, a shameful or morbid interest in sex. The more revolting, outrageous, sickening, saddening, or violent the material, the less chance it has of being declared obscene. Could it be that sex and obscenity have come full circle and found themselves again?

The film Caligula, while patently offensive under Georgia law, did not appeal to prurient interests in sex—at least not to the prurient interests of the federal district judge who viewed it—and when taken as a whole it had serious artistic and political value.<sup>235</sup>

But even nonobscene films may not be pandered. The Ginzburg proscription against commercial exploitation was upheld by the Supreme Court in Splawn v. California, 431 U.S. 595 (1977). A minority of four justices thought Ginzburg could no longer stand in light of the Court's having extended First Amendment protection to commercial speech in Virginia Pharmacy.<sup>236</sup> Information alone about a product, no matter how tempting that product to the "salaciously disposed," should not be obstructed. Well-informed people can make choices in their own best interests. Moreover, the four justices did not think Mr. Splawn deserved jail for telling the truth about his shabby business.

Much discussion has focused on whether the definition of obscenity ought to be variable or constant. That is, does obscenity vary with time, place, audience, and context? If it does, then it is going to be more available to some than to others—perhaps to the sophisticated or those who can afford it, to adults rather than to juveniles, to professional rather than to nonprofessional persons. Shifting definitions may lead to what Justice Stevens, himself a proponent of the contextual approach, called in Marks v. United States, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1401, 430 U.S. 188 (1977), the grossly disparate treatment of similar offenders in the criminal enforcement of obscenity law. And in broadcast law, "indecentcy" has been equated with obscenity because of its timing, its random audience, and its supposed impact. See FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 2553, 438 U.S. 726 (1978), this text, p. 920.

Constant definitions of obscenity simply exclude a category of speech from First Amendment protection. Its danger is its dogma. There is the small comfort of consistency where its boundaries can be fixed. For example, Erznoznik v. City of Jacksonville, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1508, 422 U.S. 205 (1975), struck down a law against drive-in theaters showing nude scenes if the films could be seen from public places such as highways. Nudity, without more, is not obscene said the Court, and had been singled out for special treatment while other protected speech which might pose the same hazard to traffic was let alone. Little more can be said in favor of unbending definitions of obscenity.

Some would abandon use of the word obscenity altogether and invest the effort in protecting captive audiences against privacy-violating nuisances and children against abuse.<sup>237</sup> In dismissing the constitutional validity of the Court's Miller v. California ruling, Justice Brennan made similar suggestions, some of which are based on predictions of the havoc Miller would create. The assumptions behind those predictions have been attacked. Survey data demonstrate, for example, that Miller has had little inhibiting effect on the output of sexually explicit material. Indeed the volume has increased. There has been no chilling effect.

234. Sovereign News v. Falk, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1337, 448 F.Supp. 306 (D.Ohio 1977).

235. Penthouse v. McAuliffe, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1798 (N.D.Ga.1981). See also Massachusetts v. Saxon Theatre, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1979 (Mass.1980).

236. Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1930, 425 U.S. 748 (1976). See this text, pp. 159–606.

Since Miller may be interpreted as having limited the discretion of appellate courts, the number of appellate cases has predictably declined, and the proportion of reversals on appeal has decreased, belying Brennan's anticipation of a higher volume of appeals.<sup>238</sup> And, mercifully, fewer cases are getting to the Supreme Court. This is good news only if you are prepared to equate sexually explicit materials with pornography.

More useful is an examination of empirical support for the propositions underlying the law of obscenity. One writer could find practically no support in the behavioral literature for assuming that pornography harmed society, aroused prurient interest, was definable within frameworks of local or national standards, led to antisocial conduct, or had adverse effects on the development of children. Granted that the evidence is sometimes fragmentary and that the methodologies used in collecting and analyzing it are sometimes challengeable, should it be ignored as it is in lawyers' briefs, trial records, and oral arguments?

Justices sometimes rationalize their ignoring of social data by pointing to the lack of agreement among investigators.

They are not as prepared in judging obscenity as they are in judging other realms of human behavior to be influenced by the preponderance of evidence. Obscenity provides a vehicle for their own personal beliefs and feelings. Brennan may have been the only justice in the Miller cases who permitted facts to change his mind.<sup>239</sup>

In the fabric of American custom and law, pornography is still sex. Sometimes it's funny, sometimes it's ugly. It was funny when five movies and four magazines sent to the Supreme Court in early 1982 as part of an Idaho obscenity case disappeared before the case was heard. All the Court could do for Idaho concerning the missing exhibits was to apologize. Pornography can be ugly when it is combined with gratuitous violence.

Is the remedy here, as with other apostasies, more speech rather than enforced silence? Moral philosophy, esthetics, and accurate information about and artistic representations of sex through open channels and from reliable and sensitive sources could take the place of the warped, shallow, and criminal, although we can have no assurances that they will.

Important legal and constitutional questions remain. To what extent are rights jeopardized when government attempts to prohibit or punish what it cannot define? What is obscene to a feminist may not be obscene to a television producer. What is obscene to a fundamentalist may be the laughter of genius to a drama critic.

"The evil of arousing revulsion in adults who are a non-captive audience," said Harry Kalven, Jr., "[may be] simply too trivial a predicate for constitutional 237. Rembar, Obscenity—Forget It, Atlantic, May, 1977.

238. Riggs, Miller v. California Revisited: An Empirical Note. 1981 B.Y.U.L.Rev. 247.

239. Daniels, The Supreme Court and Obscenity: An Exercise in Empirical Constitutional Policy-Making, 17 San Diego L.Rev. 757 (July 1980).

regulation."<sup>240</sup> A pox on censors, said Luis Bunuel. "They are like nannies sitting on our shoulders inhibiting calm and destroying our phantoms."<sup>241</sup>

---

240. Kalven. The Metaphysics of the Law of Obscenity. 1960 S.Ct.Rev. 40.

241. Quoted in Penelope Gilliatt. Long Live the Living. The New Yorker (Dec. 5, 1977), p. 66.

The Regulation of Radio and Television Broadcasting: Some Problems of Law, Technology, and Policy

INTRODUCTION: THE RATIONALE OF BROADCAST REGULATION

One of the startling legal realities of the law of broadcasting as compared with the law of the press is that the legal framework of broadcasting is altogether different from that of the press. As Judge Warren Burger stated in Office of Communication of United Church of Christ v. FCC, 359 F.2d 994 at 1003 (D.C.Cir. 1966):

A broadcaster seeks and is granted the free and exclusive use of a limited and valuable part of the public domain; when he accepts that franchise it is burdened by enforceable public obligations. A newspaper can be operated at the whim or caprice of its owners; a broadcast station cannot.

The structure of broadcast regulation under the Federal Communications Act of 1934 is rather extensive. Until 1981, licenses for broadcasting stations were granted only for a period of three years under the act. In 1981, § 307(d) of the Act was amended to provide that the license period should be five years for television licenses and seven years for radio licenses (why the distinction?). According to the act, licenses are to be granted by the Federal Communications Commission provided that "the public convenience, interest, or necessity will be served thereby." 47 U.S.C.A. § 307(a). At the expiration of the licensing period, the licensee is required to apply for renewal which may be granted "if the commission finds that public interest, convenience, and necessity would be served thereby."<sup>1</sup> 47 U.S.C.A. § 307(d).

In the light of these and other provisions of the act, a dominant problem in broadcast regulation has been with the definition of the "public interest" standard. What criteria, for example, should govern the "public interest" principle of § 307 of the act?

It was argued in the NBC case below that the FCC's authority was limited solely to removing the technical and engineering impediments which obstruct effective broadcasting. Otherwise, the argument ran, the FCC has no authority to make any particular qualitative demands of broadcast licensees.

Should the FCC's function be limited to traffic control? Or should it be directed instead to determining the composition of the traffic, i.e., the character and quality of broadcast programming?

1. See generally, Tickton, At Last, Longer Station License Terms, 4 Communications and the Law 3 (1982).

NBC v. UNITED STATES

CBS v. UNITED STATES

319 U.S. 190, 63 S.Ct. 997,

87 L.ED. 1344 (1943).

Justice FRANKFURTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

In view of our dependence upon regulated private enterprise in discharging the far-reaching role which radio plays in our society, a somewhat detailed exposition of the history of the present controversy and the issues which it raises is appropriate.

* * *

On March 18, 1938, the Commission undertook a comprehensive investigation to determine whether special regulations applicable to radio stations engaged in chain broadcasting<sup>1</sup> were required in the "public interest, convenience, or necessity."

* * *

The regulations, * * * are addressed [directly] to station licensees and applicants for station licenses. They provide, in general, that no licenses shall be granted to stations or applicants having specified relationships with networks. Each regulation is directed at a particular practice found by the Commission to be detrimental to the "public interest," and we shall consider them seriatim. * * *

The commission found that at the end of 1938 there were 660 commercial stations in the United States, and that 341 of these were affiliated with national networks. * * * It pointed out that the stations affiliated with the national networks utilized more than 97% of the total night-time broadcasting power of all the stations in the country. NBC and CBS together controlled more than 85% of the total night-time wattage, and the broadcast business of the three national network companies amounted to almost half of the total business of all stations in the United States.

The commission recognized that network broadcasting had played and was continuing to play an important part in the development of radio. "The growth and development of chain broadcasting," it stated, "found its impetus in the desire to give widespread coverage to programs which otherwise would not be heard beyond the reception area of a single station. Chain broadcasting makes possible a wider reception for expensive entertainment and cultural programs and also for programs of national or regional significance which would otherwise have coverage only in the locality of origin. Furthermore, the access to greatly enlarged audiences made possible by chain broadcasting has been a strong incentive to advertisers to finance the production of expensive programs. * * * But the fact that the chain broadcasting method brings benefits and advantages to both the listening public and to broadcast station licensees does not mean that the prevailing practices and policies of the networks and their outlets are sound in all respects, or that they should not be altered. The commission's duty under the Communications Act of 1934, 47 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq., is not only to see that the public receives the advantages and benefits of chain broadcasting, but also, so far as its powers enable it, to see that practices which adversely affect the ability of licensees to operate in the public interest are eliminated."

The commission found * * * [certain] network abuses were amenable to correction within the powers granted it by Congress.

1. Chain broadcasting is defined in § 3(p) of the Communications Act of 1934, 47 U.S.C.A. § 153(p), as the "simultaneous broadcasting of an identical program by two or more connected stations." In actual practice, programs are transmitted by wire, usually leased telephone lines, from their point of origination to each station in the network for simultaneous broadcast over the air.

Regulation 3.101—Exclusive affiliation of station. The commission found that the network affiliation agreements of NBC and CBS customarily contained a provision which prevented the station from broadcasting the programs of any other network. The effect of this provision was to hinder the growth of new networks. * * *

"Restraints having this effect", the commission observed, "are to be condemned as contrary to the public interest irrespective of whether it be assumed that Mutual [another network] programs are of equal, superior, or inferior quality. The important consideration is that station licensees are denied freedom to choose the programs which they believe best suited to their needs; in this manner the duty of a station licensee to operate in the public interest is defeated. * * *"

* * *

Regulation 3.102—Territorial exclusivity. The commission found another type of "exclusivity" provision in network affiliation agreements whereby the network bound itself not to sell programs to any other station in the same area. The effect of this provision, designed to protect the affiliate from the competition of other stations serving the same territory, was to deprive the listening public of many programs that might otherwise be available.

* * *

The Commission concluded that * * * "It is as much against the public interest for a network affiliate to enter into a contractual arrangement which prevents another station from carrying a network program as it would be for it to drown out that program by electrical interference." * * *

Regulation 3.103—Term of affiliation. The standard NBC and CBS affiliation contracts bound the station for a period of five years, with the network having the exclusive right to terminate the contracts upon one year's notice. The commission, relying upon § 307(d) of the Communications Act of 1934, under which no license to operate a broadcast station can be granted for a longer term than three years, found the five-year affiliation term to be contrary to the policy of the act. * * *

The commission concluded that under contracts binding the affiliates for five years, "stations become parties to arrangements which deprive the public of the improved service it might otherwise derive from competition in the network field; and that a station is not operating in the public interest when it so limits its freedom of action." * * *

Regulation 3.104—Option time. The commission found that network affiliation contracts usually contained so-called network optional time clauses. Under these provisions the network could upon 28 days' notice call upon its affiliates to carry a commercial program during any of the hours specified in the agreement as "network optional time." For CBS affiliates "network optional time" meant the entire broadcast day. * * *

In the commission's judgment these optional time provisions, in addition to imposing serious obstacles in the path of new networks, hindered stations in developing a local program service. * * *

Regulation 3.105—Right to reject programs. The commission found that most network affiliation contracts contained a clause defining the right of the station to reject network commercial programs. The NBC contracts provided simply that the station "may reject a network program the broadcasting of which would not be in the public interest, convenience, and necessity." * * *

While seeming in the abstract to be fair, these provisions, according to the commission's finding, did not sufficiently protect the "public interest." As a practical matter, the licensee could not determine in advance whether the broadcasting of any particular network program would or would not be in the public interest. * * * "In practice, if not in theory, stations affiliated with networks have delegated to the networks a large part of their programming functions. In many instances, moreover, the network further delegates the actual production of programs to advertising agencies. These agencies are far more than mere brokers or intermediaries between the network and the advertiser. To an ever increasing extent, these agencies actually exercise the function of program production. Thus it is frequently neither the station nor the network, but rather the advertising agency, which determines what broadcast programs shall contain. Under such circumstances, it is especially important that individual stations, if they are to operate in the public interest, should have the practical opportunity as well as the contractual right to reject network programs. * * *

"It is the station, not the network, which is licensed to serve the public interest. * * *" (Federal Communications Commission, Report on Chain Broadcasting, 1941, pp. 39, 66.)

* * *

Regulation 3.106—Network ownership of stations. The commission found that [the] * * * 18 stations owned by NBC and CBS * * * were among the most powerful and desirable in the country, and were permanently inaccessible to competing networks. * * * The commission concluded that "the licensing of two stations in the same area to a single network organization is basically unsound and contrary to the public interest," and that it was also against the "public interest" for network organizations to own stations in areas where the available facilities were so few or of such unequal coverage that competition would thereby be substantially restricted. * * *

Regulation 3.108—Control by networks of station rates. * * * Under this provision the station could not sell time to a national advertiser for less than it would cost the advertiser if he bought the time from NBC. * * *

The commission concluded that "it is against the public interest for a station licensee to enter into a contract with a network which has the effect of decreasing its ability to compete for national business. We believe that the public interest will best be served and listeners supplied with the best programs if stations bargain freely with national advertisers."

* * *

The appellants attack the validity of these regulations along many fronts. They contend that the commission went beyond the regulatory powers conferred upon it by the Communications Act of 1934; * * * and that, in any event, the regulations abridge the appellants' right of free speech in violation of the First Amendment. We are thus called upon to determine whether Congress has authorized the commission to exercise the power asserted by the Chain Broadcasting Regulations, and if it has, whether the Constitution forbids the exercise of such authority. * * *

The enforcement of the Radio Act of 1912 presented no serious problems prior to the World War. Questions of interference arose only rarely because there were more than enough frequencies for all the stations then in existence. The war accelerated the development of the art, however, and in 1921 the first standard broadcast stations were established. They grew rapidly in number, and by 1923 there were several hundred such stations throughout the country. The act of 1912 had not set aside any particular frequencies for the use of private broadcast stations; consequently, the secretary of commerce selected two frequencies, 750 and 833 kilocycles, and licensed all stations to operate upon one or the other of these channels. The number of stations increased so rapidly, however, and the situation became so chaotic, that the secretary, upon the recommendation of the National Radio Conferences which met in Washington in 1923 and 1924, established a policy of assigning specified frequencies to particular stations. * * * Since there were more stations than available frequencies, the secretary of commerce attempted to find room for everybody by limiting the power and hours of operation of stations in order that several stations might use the same channel. * * *

The secretary of commerce was powerless to deal with the situation. * * * (and) the plea of the secretary went unheeded. From July, 1926, to February 23, 1927, when Congress enacted the Radio Act of 1927, 44 Stat. 1162, almost 200 new stations went on the air. These new stations used any frequencies they desired, regardless of the interference thereby caused to others. Existing stations changed to other frequencies and increased their power and hours of operation at will. The result was confusion and chaos. With everybody on the air, nobody could be heard. The situation became so intolerable that the President in his message of December 7, 1926, appealed to Congress to enact a comprehensive radio law.

* * *

The plight into which radio fell prior to 1927 was attributable to certain basic facts about radio as a means of communication—its facilities are limited; they are not available to all who may wish to use them; the radio spectrum simply is not large enough to accommodate everybody. There is a fixed natural limitation upon the number of stations that can operate without interfering with one another. Regulation of radio was therefore as vital to its development as traffic control was to the development of the automobile. In enacting the Radio Act of 1927, the first comprehensive scheme of control over radio communication, Congress acted upon the knowledge that if the potentialities of radio were not to be wasted, regulation was essential.

The Radio Act of 1927 created the Federal Radio Commission, composed of five members, and endowed the commission with wide licensing and regulatory powers. We do not pause here to enumerate the scope of the Radio Act of 1927 and of the authority entrusted to the Radio Commission, for the basic provisions of that Act are incorporated in the Communications Act of 1934, * * * 47 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq., * * * the legislation immediately before us. * * *

The criterion governing the exercise of the commission's licensing power is the "public interest, convenience, or necessity." §§ 307(a)(d), 309(a), 310, 312. In addition, § 307(b) directs the commission that "In considering applications for licenses, and modifications and renewals thereof, when and insofar as there is demand for the same, the commission shall make such distribution of licenses, frequencies, hours of operation, and of power among the several States and communities as to provide a fair, efficient, and equitable distribution of radio service to each of the same."

The act itself establishes that the commission's powers are not limited to the engineering and technical aspects of regulation of radio communication. Yet we are asked to regard the commission as a kind of traffic officer, policing the wave lengths to prevent stations from interfering with each other. But the act does not restrict the commission merely to supervision of the traffic. It puts upon the commission the burden of determining the composition of that traffic. The facilities of radio are not large enough to accommodate all who wish to use them. Methods must be devised for choosing from among the many who apply. And since Congress itself could not do this, it committed the task to the commission.

The commission was, however, not left at large in performing this duty. The touchstone provided by Congress was the "public interest, convenience, or necessity," a criterion which "is as concrete as the complicated factors for judgment in such a field of delegated authority permit." Federal Communications Comm. v. Pottsville Broadcasting Co., 309 U.S. 134, 138 (1940). * * *

The "public interest" to be served under the Communications Act is thus the interest of the listening public in "the larger and more effective use of radio." § 303(g). The facilities of radio are limited and therefore precious; they cannot be left to wasteful use without detriment to the public interest. * * * The commission's licensing function cannot be discharged, therefore, merely by finding that there are no technological objections to the granting of a license. If the criterion of "public interest" were limited to such matters, how could the commission choose between two applicants for the same facilities, each of whom is financially and technically qualified to operate a station? Since the very inception of federal regulation by radio, comparative considerations as to the services to be rendered have governed the application of the standard of "public interest, convenience, or necessity." * * *

The avowed aim of the Communications Act of 1934 was to secure the maximum benefits of radio to all the people of the United States. To that end Congress endowed the communications commission with comprehensive powers to promote and realize the vast potentialities of radio. Section 303(g) provides that the commission shall "generally encourage the larger and more effective use of radio in the public interest"; subsection (i) gives the commission specific "authority to make special regulations applicable to radio stations engaged in chain broadcasting"; and subsection (r) empowers it to adopt "such rules and regulations and prescribe such restrictions and conditions, not inconsistent with law, as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act."

These provisions, individually and in the aggregate, preclude the notion that the commission is empowered to deal only with technical and engineering impediments to the "larger and more effective use of radio in the public interest." We cannot find in the act any such restriction of the commission's authority. Suppose, for example, that a community can, because of physical limitations, be assigned only two stations. That community might be deprived of effective service in any one of several ways. More powerful stations in nearby cities might blanket out the signals of the local stations so that they could not be heard at all. The stations might interfere with each other so that neither could be clearly heard. One station might dominate the other with the power of its signal. But the community could be deprived of good radio service in ways less crude. One man, financially and technically qualified, might apply for and obtain the licenses of both stations and present a single service over the two stations, thus wasting a frequency otherwise available to the area. The language of the act does not withdraw such a situation from the licensing and regulatory powers of the Commission, and there is no evidence that Congress did not mean its broad language to carry the authority it expresses.

In essence, the Chain Broadcasting Regulations represent a particularization of the Commission's conception of the "public interest" sought to be safeguarded by Congress in enacting the Communications Act of 1934. The basic consideration of policy underlying the Regulations is succinctly stated in its Report: "With the number of radio channels limited by natural factors, the public interest demands that those who are entrusted with the available channels shall make the fullest and most effective use of them. If a licensee enters into a contract with a network organization which limits his ability to make the best use of the radio facility assigned him, he is not serving the public interest. * * * The net effect [of the practices disclosed by the investigation] has been that broadcasting service has been maintained at a level below that possible under a system of free competition. Having so found, we would be remiss in our statutory duty of encouraging 'the larger and more effective use of radio in the public interest' if we were to grant licenses to persons who persist in these practices."

We would be asserting our personal views regarding the effective utilization of radio were we to deny that the commission was entitled to find that the large public aims of the Communications Act of 1934 comprehend the considerations which moved the commission in promulgating the Chain Broadcasting Regulations. True enough, the act does not explicitly say that the commission shall have power to deal with network practices found inimical to the public interest. But Congress was acting in a field of regulation which was both new and dynamic. "Congress moved under the spur of a widespread fear that in the absence of governmental control the public interest might be subordinated to monopolistic domination in the broadcasting field." Federal Communications Comm. v. Pottsville Broadcasting Co., 309 U.S. 134, 137. In the context of the developing problems to which it was directed, the act gave the commission not niggardly but expansive powers. It was given a comprehensive mandate to "encourage the larger and more effective use of radio in the public interest," if need be, by making "special regulations applicable to radio stations engaged in chain broadcasting." § 303(g)(i).

Generalities unrelated to the living problems of radio communication of course cannot justify exercises of power by the commission. Equally so, generalities empty of all concrete considerations of the actual bearing of regulations promulgated by the commission to the subject-matter entrusted to it, cannot strike down exercises of power by the commission. While Congress did not give the commission unfettered discretion to regulate all phases of the radio industry, it did not frustrate the purposes for which the Communications Act of 1934 was brought into being by attempting an itemized catalogue of the specific manifestations of the general problems for the solution of which it was establishing a regulatory agency. That would have stereotyped the powers for the commission to specific details in regulating a field of enterprise the dominant characteristic of which was the rapid pace of its unfolding. And so Congress did what experience had taught it in similar attempts at regulation, even in fields where the subject-matter of regulation was far less fluid and dynamic than radio. The essence of that experience was to define broad areas for regulation and to establish standards for judgment adequately related in their application to the problems to be solved. * * *

We conclude, therefore, that the Communications Act of 1934 authorized the commission to promulgate regulations designed to correct the abuses disclosed by its investigation of chain broadcasting.

* * *

Since there is no basis for any claim that the commission failed to observe procedural safeguards required by law, we reach the contention that the Regulations should be denied enforcement on constitutional grounds. Here, as in New York Cent. Securities Corp. v. United States, 287 U.S. 12, 24, 25, the claim is made that the standard of "public interest" governing the exercise of the powers delegated to the commission by Congress is so vague and indefinite that, if it be construed as comprehensively as words alone permit, the delegation of legislative authority is unconstitutional. But, as we held in that case, "It is a mistaken assumption that this is a mere general reference to public welfare without any standard to guide determinations. The purpose of the act, the requirements it imposes, and the context of the provision in question show the contrary." Id.

We come, finally, to an appeal to the First Amendment. The Regulations, even if valid in all other respects, must fall because they abridge, say the appellants, their right of free speech. If that be so, it would follow that every person whose application for a license to operate a station is denied by the commission is thereby denied his constitutional right of free speech. Freedom of utterance is abridged to many who wish to use the limited facilities of radio. Unlike other modes of expression, radio inherently is not available to all. That is its unique characteristic, and that is why, unlike other modes of expression, it is subject to governmental regulation. Because it cannot be used by all, some who wish to use it must be denied. [Emphasis added.] But Congress did not authorize the commission to choose among applicants upon the basis of their political, economic or social views, or upon any other capricious basis. If it did, or if the commission by these regulations proposed a choice among applicants upon some such basis, the issue before us would be wholly different. The question here is simply whether the commission, by announcing that it will refuse licenses to persons who engage in specified network practices (a basis for choice which we hold is comprehended within the statutory criterion of "public interest"), is thereby denying such persons the constitutional right of free speech. The right of free speech does not include, however, the right to use the facilities of radio without a license. The licensing system established by Congress in the Communications Act of 1934 was a proper exercise of its power over commerce. The standard it provided for the licensing of stations was the "public interest, convenience, or necessity." Denial of a station license on that ground, if valid under the Act, is not a denial of free speech. * * *

Affirmed.

Justice MURPHY, dissenting.

* * * Although radio broadcasting, like the press, is generally conducted on a commercial basis, it is not an ordinary business activity, like the selling of securities or the marketing of electrical power. In the dissemination of information and opinion radio has assumed a position of commanding importance, rivaling the press and the pulpit. Owing to its physical characteristics radio, unlike the other methods of conveying information, must be regulated and rationed by the government. Otherwise there would be chaos, and radio's usefulness would be largely destroyed. But because of its vast potentialities as a medium of communication, discussion and propaganda, the character and extent of control that should be exercised over it by the government is a matter of deep and vital concern. Events in Europe show that radio may readily be a weapon of authority and misrepresentation, instead of a means of entertainment and enlightenment. It may even be an instrument of oppression. In pointing out these possibilities I do not mean to intimate in the slightest that they are imminent or probable in this country but they do suggest that the construction of the instant statute should be approached with more than ordinary restraint and caution, to avoid an interpretation that is not clearly justified by the conditions that brought about its enactment, or that would give the commission greater powers than the Congress intended to confer.

* * *

By means of these regulations and the enforcement program, the commission would not only extend its authority over business activities which represent interests and investments of a very substantial character, which have not been put under its jurisdiction by the act, but would greatly enlarge its control over an institution that has now become a rival of the press and pulpit as a purveyor of news and entertainment and a medium of public discussion. To assume a function and responsibility of such wide reach and importance in the life of the nation, as a mere incident of its duty to pass on individual applications for permission to operate a radio station and use a specific wave length, is an assumption of authority to which I am not willing to lend my assent.

* * *

---

COMMENT

1. Is the limited access medium rationale the only plausible basis for broadcast regulation? Since Justice Murphy points out that radio "may be a weapon of authority and misrepresentation instead of a means of entertainment and enlightenment," why doesn't he wish to uphold the Chain Broadcasting Regulations and thereby limit the concentration of communicating power?

Justice Murphy's dissent offers the basis for a new rationale for government regulation of broadcasting—the social impact rationale. Under this theory, the pervasiveness and the impact of broadcasting justify a greater measure of government regulation than other media. For application of this theory, see FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, p. 920ff.

2. The Chain Broadcasting Regulations revealed an attempt by the FCC to do what Congress failed to do in the Federal Communications Act, i.e., bring the networks under the regulatory authority of the FCC. The FCC was concerned with the problem that the station licensees, the parties regulated by the act, were becoming conduits for the networks. As with radio in 1943, at the present time television programming in the evening or "prime time" hours is largely dominated by the networks.

3. Presently, the networks, although not subject directly to regulation under the Federal Communications Act of 1934, are actually responsive to FCC jurisdiction in at least two ways. First, FCC rules and regulations do, of course, bind broadcast licensees. To the extent these licensees are network affiliates, which in large part they are, the networks are affected by FCC policy. Second, although there are limitations on how many broadcasting outlets of each type a single party may own, the networks utilize to the limit the existing rules which permit them to own a limited number of stations of each type. See text, p. 948. Not surprisingly, therefore, their outlets are found in the largest and most important markets. Therefore, with respect to O and O's (stations owned and operated by the networks) the networks are directly regulated by the FCC.

Should networks be placed under direct regulation?

Should lack of licensee control over programming be a negative factor even if there is no competing applicant?

We have been considering the problem of the station owner who is a network affiliate, who does not know what programming his station will be emitting until he flicks the dial with the rest of the audience. However, the same problem can arise with the station which is not a network affiliate.<sup>2</sup>

4. Although the Federal Communications Act of 1934 itself afforded the FCC no specific authority to regulate the contractual relationships between the individual broadcast licensee and the network, the FCC based its authority to issue the chain broadcasting regulations on the act's many references to the power of the FCC to regulate broadcasting in the "public interest." In the proposed "rewrite" of the Federal Communications Act of 1934, the "Communications Act of 1978," authored by the House Subcommittee on Communications chaired by Congressman Lionel Van Deerlin (D. Calif.), major revisions were proposed for broadcast regulation. The proposal still left the networks unregulated. However, the "rewrite" did make a major change by way of deletion. In the entire 217-page text of the proposed "rewrite" not a single reference was made to the "public interest, convenience and necessity." See H.R. 13015, 95th Cong., 2d Sess., June 6, 1978.

---

2. See Yale Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 478 F.2d 594 (D.C.Cir.1973), cert.den. 414 U.S. 914 (1973).

Harry Shooshan, chief counsel of the House Communications Subcommittee, explained the omission by observing that Congressman Van Deerlin "felt that much of what's bad in communications regulation can be traced to the FCC's trying to interpret that phrase" and therefore "decided not to invite any further misinterpretation of Congress' intentions." Shooshan also observed that the "rewrite" was "an effort to fulfill the public interest" and thus spoke for itself. See Broadcasting, pp. 39-40, June 12, 1978. Would the FCC and the courts still have to import a "public interest" concept to aid them in enforcing and interpreting a new act? Without importing such a standard into the text of a new act, it is hard to see how the flexibility necessary for effective regulation can exist, particularly in the event of the occurrence of unforeseen developments. After all, the Federal Communications Act of 1934 was applied to television and to cable television even though neither was a reality in 1934. Doesn't a regulatory agency with the task of governing an industry which is bound up with an everchanging technology need some language which authorizes it to exercise a wise discretion? How else can one govern new technology in the electronic field? It would seem that the "public interest" standard was designed to facilitate the exercise of such a wise discretion.

5. A more recent study still considered the NBC case to be a critical precedent on whether the FCC can regulate network practices even though the Federal Communications Act does not grant specific authority to the FCC to regulate the networks:

In NBC, the court addressed three points of continuing interest to the issue of the FCC's jurisdiction. First, the court confirmed that the commission's licensing authority over broadcast stations permits it to promulgate regulations involving network practices addressed to broadcast station licensees that are network affiliates. Second, the Court suggested that courts should construe the 1934 act liberally in evaluating the commission's regulatory powers and responsibilities. Stated simply, courts should view the specific responsibilities assigned the commission as exemplary of its larger responsibilities. Third, the court implied by its silence that the commission's overriding responsibility to regulate television broadcasting and its specific power to regulate stations engaged in chain broadcasting authorize it to regulate networks directly.

See, Krattenmaker and Metzger, FCC Regulatory Authority Over Commercial Television Networks: The Role of Ancillary Jurisdiction, 77 Northwestern U.L.Rev. 403 at 431-432 (1982).

EMERGING TECHNOLOGIES

Many of the issues in this chapter concern the legal governance of new communications technologies which were not anticipated when the Federal Communications Act was written. This era particularly is characterized by the constant development of new communications technologies. It will be the challenge to the communications specialists of the future to attempt to provide a structure for the orderly governance of these technologies. Should reasoning such as that found in the NBC case be used in the future, at least by analogy, to resolve the issues raised by these new technologies? Examples of some of these new technologies follow.

Direct Broadcast Satellites

Direct Broadcast Satellites (DBS) is a new, highly advanced technology which will permit the broadcast of multiple channels of television directly from satellites to individual homes. Individual subscribers will be equipped with a small, affordable receiving disc as well as an electronics unit which will descramble the satellite signal for display on a regular television set. Individual licensees will construct and launch the satellites and will have the option of either broadcasting their own selected programs or operating a common carrier-type service.

The DBS system has the potential to bring enormous benefits to the public. DBS will help meet the growing consumer demand for diversified and specialized television programming. In particular, DBS will bring improved video service to rural and remote areas that have long been underserved. DBS will also stimulate the program production industry by serving as an outlet for programming. Furthermore, DBS will promote competition in the video marketplace and has the potential to erode the current network dominance of national program distribution.

Permanent guidelines regulating the DBS industry awaited the 1983 Regional Administrative Radio Conference (RARC) which was to develop standards of operation for the Western Hemisphere. 86 FCC2d 719 (1981). Prior to the Conference, the FCC had promulgated a series of provisions which subjected DBS Systems to a minimum of regulations during its "experimental phase". 47 Fed.Reg. 31,555 (1982) (to be codified at 47 C.F.R. Pt. 100). This scheme imposed all applicable statutory requirements upon interim DBS Systems. 47 Fed.Reg. 31,568 n. 85 (1982), e.g., 47 U.S.C. § 201 et seq. (common carriers); 47 U.S.C. § 315 (broadcasters). Thus, DBS operators broadcasting their own programming had to comply with the mandates of the fairness doctrine, the equal time/access rules for political candidates, and the personal attack provisions. Moreover, DBS operators functioning as broadcasters were also subject to the same equal employment requirements as were conventional broadcasters. 47 Fed.Reg. 31,575 (1982) (to be codified at 47 C.F.R. § 100.51). In addition, all DBS operators licensed in the experimental phase were required to meet whatever international standards were agreed to at the 1983 RARC. 47 Fed.Reg. 31,558 n. 25 (1982). However, beyond these requirements, the interim provisions placed no restrictions on cross or multiple ownership, 47 Fed.Reg. 31,570 n. 95 (1982); nor were any restrictions placed on program content, service offerings, or methods of financing outside of the express mandates of the Communications Act. 47 Fed.Reg. 31,570 (1982).

An issue of conflict in the FCC interim provisions involved DBS spectrum allocation and the reassignment of territorial fixed service (FS) operations now using the 12.2–12.7 GHz band proposed for use by DBS operators. In 47 Fed.Reg. 31,562 n. 46, the FCC's compromise resolution established a transition period whereby DBS and FS systems would be considered co-equal. Thus, existing FS operations will not have to provide protection to DBS systems, and DBS operators desiring to expand into existing FS markets must accommodate the FS operator through agreement or otherwise.

Multipoint Distribution Service

Multipoint Distribution Service (MDS) is a technological alternative to full-service television broadcasting that has the capacity to fill the programming needs of much of the underserved locations throughout the nation. Technically, MDS consists of a microwave transmitter which broadcasts over a microwave frequency to a receiving antenna located within a coverage area of approximately ten to twenty miles. The microwave signal is converted at the receiving antenna to a lower frequency which then passes through a cable to the customer's set to be viewed on a VHF channel which is vacant in the community. 45 Fed.Reg. 29,350 at 24 (1980). In this manner, the MDS system can avoid objectionable interference with full-service stations while retaining the capability of broadcasting over available VHF channels.

A regulatory feature of the MDS system is that it may only operate as a common carrier. 47 C.F.R. § 21.903 (1981). Thus, the licensee cannot exercise any control over the programming presented on the channel. Moreover, as a common carrier, the licensee is not subject to FCC programming standards such as the fairness doctrine, the equal time/access provisions for political candidates, and the personal attack rules. FCC regulation of MDS broadcasting has focused on the technical side of the operation. See 47 C.F.R. §§ 904-908 (1981), relating to transmission power, standards, equipment, and bandwidths.

In 1983, there were only one or two channels available in most communities for MDS use, with the second channel being available only in fifty of the larger metropolitan areas. 47 C.F.R. § 21.90(c). These channels are allocated via the comparative hearing system. The FCC considered using a lottery method to expedite channel allocation and reduce processing expenses to both the applicant and the Commission. Notice of Inquiry and Proposed Rulemaking in CC Docket No. 80-116, 45 Fed.Reg. 29,335 (1980). However, the commission refused to implement the random selection system pursuant to 47 U.S.C. § 309(i) due to the "inevitable succession of administrative and judicial reviews." 89 FCC2d 257, 283 (1982). The FCC was also reviewing the feasibility of allocating additional MDS channels in the top fifty markets. 45 Fed.Reg. 29,335 (1980).

Low Power Television (LPTV)

As an alternative to CATV, MDS, and full-service television systems, the FCC in 1982 inaugurated the first low power television (LPTV) broadcasting service to be considered by the FCC in twenty years. 47 Fed.Reg. 21,468 (1982). The hope was that these new low power stations would bring television service to locations that otherwise are unserved or underserved as well as satisfy a public desire for additional and diversified television programming. 47 Fed.Reg. 21,468, 21,470 (1982). Low power systems may also open up new opportunities for minority ownership and "attract a new breed of * * * broadcast networks." 45 Fed.Reg. 67,168, 69,191 (1980). These hopes arose out of the peculiar nature of low power service, a service which, because of its particularly small and undefined coverage area, must be directly responsive to the interests of local consumers to assure economic viability.

In light of the nature of the low power service, the FCC has opted for a regulatory scheme of minimal government interference. This scheme protects existing full-service television stations by authorizing low power stations to operate only on a secondary spectrum priority and requiring low power stations to eliminate objectionable interference with full-service stations or cease operations. 47 Fed.Reg. 21,497 (1982) (to be codified at 47 C.F.R. §§ 74.-703-7). Program-related regulations such as the statutory prohibitions on the broadcast of obscene material, plugola, payola, and lotteries as well as the fairness doctrine, the equal time/access rules for political candidates, and the personal attack rules also apply to the low power service. 47 Fed.Reg. 21,491 (1982), to be codified at 47 C.F.R. § 74.780).

Beyond these requirements, the specific nature of low power service programming and operation has been left to the discretion of the licensee, based upon the mandates of the marketplace. There are no restrictions on ownership per se. The FCC believes that free entry into and out of the low power industry will best serve potential applicants as well as the public. 47 Fed.Reg. 21,489 (1982). There are no restrictions on the airing of commercials or the carriage of pay television broadcasts. 47 Fed.Reg. 21,486 (1982). LPTV stations also have no community ascertainment obligations or program log requirements, and there is no spectrum set aside for educational broadcasts. 47 Fed.Reg. 21,491 (1982).

The FCC believes that a minimal regulatory posture will best serve the programming needs of discrete community groups without unnecessarily burdening entry into the low power market. Moreover, as low power stations may be constructed and transferred at relatively low expense, this new service naturally lends itself to operation and ownership by minority groups and other entrants that are newcomers to the broadcast industry.

THE PROGRAMMING DISCRETION OF THE LICENSEE AND BROADCASTING IN THE PUBLIC INTEREST

The Problem of Securing Licensee Control and Responsibility Over Programming

The idea that the individual licensee must retain control over his or her programming and may not abdicate that responsibility is deeply embedded in broadcasting law. In an early and well-known case, Simmons v. FCC, 169 F.2d 670 (D.C.Cir.1948), it was held that a broadcaster is a trustee for the public and as such has a duty to retain control over programming. In Simmons, the FCC refused to grant an application for a power increase and a change in a station's frequency where the licensee frankly stated the intention to "plug" into the CBS network from 8 A.M. to 11 P.M. Suppose the licensee argued in such circumstances that its right of free expression includes the right to choose to "plug" into CBS from 8 A.M. to 11 P.M.? This argument was basically rejected in NBC v. United States, text, p. 770.

Although the Simmons case might be viewed as permitting FCC control of programming and therefore as a precedent for control of program content in broadcasting generally, it should be emphasized that what is being evaluated is "the total performance of stations." The Commission does not determine "which individual programs best suit the local needs of each community." Note, FCC Control of Radio Programming, 2 Vand. L.Rev. 464 at 465 (1949). Does this distinction between total evaluation of the licensee's performance rather than review of "individual" programs satisfy the requirements of § 326 of the Federal Communications Act. § 326 provides:

Nothing in this act shall be understood or construed to give the commission the power of censorship over the radio communications or signals transmitted by any radio station, and no regulation or condition shall be promulgated or fixed by the commission which shall interfere with the right of free speech by means of radio communication. Communications Act of 1934, § 326, 48 Stat. 1091, 47 U.S.C.A. § 326 (1958).

A related issue arose in Cosmopolitan Broadcasting Corp., 59 FCC2d 558 (1976)— should an FCC inquiry into a renewal applicant's past programming be viewed as censorship? The FCC made the inquiry in order to determine whether the renewal applicant had maintained adequate control over its programming in the past. The court, per Judge Bazelon, refused to view the inquiry into past programming as censorship.

In the Cosmopolitan case, the FCC itself designated Cosmopolitan's application for license renewal for hearing. No competing applicant was seeking Cosmopolitan's license. See generally Cosmopolitan Broadcasting Corp. v. FCC, 581 F.2d 917 (D.C.Cir.1978). Does the FCC have authority, under the rationale of NBC v. US, text, p. 770, to ascertain whether renewal of a sole applicant's license will be in the public interest? The problem arose in Henry v. FCC, 302 F.2d 191 (D.C.Cir. 1962), where a new applicant sought a permit to construct the first commercial FM station in Elizabeth, New Jersey. In support of the application, the applicant submitted programming proposals to support its license application which were identical in its application for an FM facility in Berwyn, Illinois.

In Henry, the court upheld the FCC's authority to reject even the sole applicant for a new license:

Appellants contend that the statutory licensing scheme requires a grant where, as here, it is established that the sole applicants for a frequency are legally, financially and technically qualified. This view reflects an arbitrarily narrow understanding of the statutory words "public convenience, interest, or necessity." It leaves no room for commission consideration of matters relating to programming.

The court concluded that the FCC could require that even a sole applicant for a license must show an "earnest interest in serving a local community by evidencing familiarity with its particular needs and an effort to meet them." The FCC's action in denying the license application in Henry was held to involve "no greater interference with a broadcaster's alleged right to choose its programs free from commission control than the interference involved in National Broadcasting Co."

The Henry case looks innocent enough. But it actually represents a challenge to the entire existing rationale for broadcast regulation. The theory of the NBC case was that broadcasting was a limited access medium. Therefore, the commission was under obligation to play a role in the "composition of the traffic." But if only one applicant seeks a station license, why should the commission play any role at all? The limited access rationale at this point presumably disappears. Does the Henry result suggest an alternative theory of broadcast regulation? If so, what is it?

The Concept of "Balanced" Programming

JOHNSTON BROADCASTING CO. v. FCC

175 F.2D 351 (D.C.CIR. 1949).

PRETTYMAN, Circuit Judge. Two applications, one for a permit to construct a new radio broadcasting station and the other for changes in the frequency and power of an existing station, were presented to the commission, one by Johnston Broadcasting Company and the other by Thomas N. Beach. The applications were mutually exclusive, both being for operation on the same frequency. The commission set them for a comparative hearing.

* * *

A choice between two applicants involves more than the bare qualifications of each applicant. It involves a comparison of characteristics. Both A and B may be qualified, but if a choice must be made, the question is which is the better qualified. Both might be ready, able and willing to serve the public interest. But in choosing between them, the inquiry must reveal which would better serve that interest. So the nature of the material, the findings and the bases for conclusion differ when (1) the inquiry is merely whether an applicant is qualified and (2) when the purpose is to make a proper choice between two qualified applicants. To illustrate, local residence may not be an essential to qualification. But as between two applicants otherwise equally able, local residence might be a decisive factor.

In the present case, the commission easily found both applicants to be qualified for a permit. The question then was which should receive it. Comparative qualities and not mere positive characteristics must then be considered. * * *

In sum, we think that there are no established criteria by which a choice between the applicants must be made. In this respect, a comparative determination differs from the determination of each applicant's qualifications for a permit. A choice can properly be made upon those differences advanced by the parties as reasons for the choice. To illustrate, if neither applicant presents as a material factor, the relative financial resources of himself and his adversary, the commission need not require testimony upon the point or make a finding in respect to it, beyond the requisite ability for bare qualification. It may assume that there is no material difference between the applicants upon that point.

* * *

In the case at bar, there were five points of difference urged by the contesting applicants as pertinent to a choice between them, (1) residence, (2) broadcasting experience, (3) proposed participation in the operation of the station, (4) program proposals, and (5) quality of staff.

The basis for the conclusion of the commission is clearly stated. In its Memorandum Opinion and Order, it said succinctly:

"Our opinion to favor the Beach application on its merits over that of the Johnston application was based on our finding that while there were no sharp distinctions between the applicants in terms of residence, broadcasting experience, or proposed participation in the operation of the facilities applied for, there was a sharp distinction in favor of the applicant Beach in matters of program proposals and planned staff operations."

* * *

As to the program proposals, the difference which the commission found is spelled out in detail in its findings. It found nothing in the record to indicate that Johnston had made or would make an affirmative effort to encourage broadcasts on controversial issues or topics of current interest to the community, such as education, labor, and civic enterprises. On the other hand, it found that Beach has had and proposes to have a program of positive action to encourage such broadcasts, and of complete cooperation with civic interests. The commission concluded that Beach would provide greater opportunity for local expression than would Johnston. The findings are based upon evidence in the record, and the conclusion seems to us to be within the permissible bounds of the commission's discretion.

The difference between the staffs of the applicants is succinctly stated. The commission found, as the evidence indicated, that the proposed positions and duties of the Beach staff promise a much more effective provision for program preparation and presentation than do those of the Johnston staff.

As to appellant's contention that the commission's consideration of the proposed programs was a form of censorship, it is true that the commission cannot choose on the basis of political, economic or social views of an applicant. But in a comparative consideration, it is well recognized that comparative service to the listening public is the vital element, and programs are the essence of that service. So, while the commission cannot proscribe any type of program (except for prohibitions against obscenity, profanity, etc.), it can make a comparison on the basis of public interest and, therefore, of public service. Such a comparison of proposals is not a form of censorship within the meaning of the statute. As we read the commission's findings, the nature of the views of the applicants was no part of the consideration. The nature of the programs was.

We cannot say that the commission acted arbitrarily or capriciously in making its conclusive choice between these two applicants.

Reversed and remanded.

COMMENT

1. Although the commission was reversed on grounds that do not concern us, the commission's estimate of the applicants based on a comparative evaluation of their programming proposals was upheld.

2. One of the most influential guides to balanced programming was set forth in the famous "Blue Book" where the commission stated that on a renewal application it would make an inquiry to determine whether the station's previous performance had been in the "public interest." The "Blue Book" required licensees to broadcast 1) sustaining programs (unsponsored, noncommercial, public interest programming); 2) local, live programming; 3) programs devoted to the discussion of public issues; and 4) to make an effort to eliminate advertising excesses. FCC, Public Service Responsibility of Broadcast Licensees (1946).

Note that the Johnston case is not really a renewal case. But it provides a good illustration of the consequences to license applicants of failing to propose local service, sustaining and public affairs programming in accordance with "Blue Book" standards. No licensee on renewal, however, has ever been denied a license for failing, during his previous license period, to broadcast the proper balanced programming mix. Why this leniency by the commission on license renewal as opposed to the original license application? Is such leniency defensible?

3. The Network Programming Inquiry Report and Statement of Policy, issued by the FCC on July 29, 1960, was a kind of updating of the "Blue Book." The "Statement," 44 FCC 2303, at 2314 (1960) declares:

The major elements usually necessary to meet the public interest, needs and desires of the community in which the station is located as developed by the industry, and recognized by the commission have included: (1) opportunity for local self-expression, (2) the development and use of local talent, (3) programs for children, (4) religious programs, (5) educational programs, (6) public affairs programs, (7) editorializing by licensees, (8) political broadcasts, (9) agricultural programs, (10) news programs, (11) weather and market reports, (12) sports programs, (13) service to minority groups, (14) entertainment programming.

What differences do you discern between the programming guides of the "Blue Book," as set forth above, and those set forth in the 1960 Program Policy Statement?

In Office of Communication of United Church of Christ v. FCC, 707 F.2d 1413 (D.C.Civ.1983) the action of the FCC in Report and Order, Deregulation of Order, 84 FCC 2d 968 (1981) undertaking a massive deregulation of the commercial radio industry was substantially affirmed. In Memorandum and Order, 87 FCC 2d 797 (1981), the FCC, clarifying its deregulation order, defined the "public interest to require programming responsive to community issues." As Judge Wright put it for the Court in Office of Communication of United Church of Christ, supra: "Broadcasters need not then, as a commission requirement, provide any specific types of programming such as those listed above." Thus, the court of appeals approved the repudiation of the 1960 Programming Statement. But it pointedly endorsed the FCC's determination to remain "faithful to its statutory mandate to regulate in the public interest."

At the same time, the Court warned that although the FCC has "reoriented its public interest away from categories, the extent and foreseeable consequence of that policy statement should not be overestimated." Judge Wright indicated that a licensee who conformed with the old 1960 Programming Statement would be in compliance with the "new FCC issue-responsive programming". Judge Wright observed on this point: "(W)e are hard-pressed to think of examples of programming categories described in the 1960 Programming Statement where content could not also be described in issue terms and thus still come within the Commission's delineation of public interest programming in each category."

4. One of the most significant FCC policy statements on the factors involved in choosing among qualified applicants for the same broadcast facilities is found in the Policy Statement on Comparative Broadcast Hearings, 1 FCC2d 393 (1965):

One of the commission's primary responsibilities is to choose among qualified new applicants for the same broadcast facilities. This commonly requires extended hearings into a number of areas of comparison. The hearing and decision process is inherently complex, and the subject does not lend itself to precise categorization or to the clear making of precedent. The various factors cannot be assigned absolute values, some factors may be present in some cases and not in others, and the differences between applicants with respect to each factor are almost infinitely variable.

* * *

We believe that there are two primary objectives toward which the process of comparison should be directed. They are, first, the best practicable service to the public, and, second, a maximum diffusion of control of the media of mass communications. The value of these objectives is clear. Diversification of control is a public good in a free society, and is additionally desirable where a government licensing system limits access by the public to the use of radio and television facilities. Equally basic is a broadcast service which meets the needs of the public in the area to be served, both in terms of those general interests which all areas have in common and those special interests which areas do not share. An important element of such a service is the flexibility to change as local needs and interests change. Since independence and individuality of approach are elements of rendering good program service, the primary goals of good service and diversification of control are also fully compatible.

Diversification of ownership and "meeting the needs of the public in the area to be served" are both emphasized in the Policy Statement. Diversification of ownership is discussed elsewhere in this chapter. See text, p. 948. But the goal of meeting the needs of the public in the area served was FCC policy both before and after the 1965 Policy Statement. We encounter it in the principle that the broadcast station must retain responsibility over its own programming, in the concept of balanced programming, and again in the development of the ascertainment process.

Changes in Program Format and Broadcasting in the Public Interest

A series of cases which dramatize the clash between claims of groups in the community for diversity in programming and the claims of the individual broadcaster to choose his own programming are the program format cases. These cases raise familiar questions. Should the FCC be required to define the "public interest" in such a way as to involve it in programming determinations? Should programming in the public interest compel a broadcaster to serve a minority taste within the community or should such issues be left for resolution in the marketplace?

WEFM-FM in Chicago, operated by the Zenith Radio Corporation, had a classical musical format for more than thirty years. In 1972, Zenith entered into an agreement to sell the station to GCC Communications of Chicago. GCC proposed to change WEFM's format from classical to "contemporary music, later defined to be 'rock music'." A group of Chicago area citizens, the Citizens Committee to Save WEFM, opposed the transfer because of the proposed change of format. The citizens filed a petition to deny the transfer with the FCC and requested a hearing. The FCC denied the petition and granted the assignment of the license. Initially, a panel of the court of appeals, per Judge Bazelon, affirmed. Citizens Committee to Save WEFM v. FCC, 506 F.2d 246 (D.C.Cir. 1974).

Summarizing prior law, Judge Bazelon, speaking for the court in WEFM said: "It is only when the format to be discontinued is apparently unique to the area served that a hearing on the public interest must be held." See, Citizens Committee to Preserve the Voice of the Arts in Atlanta v. FCC, 436 F.2d 263 (D.C.Cir.1970). In such situations, "the public interest in diversity may outweigh the dangers of government intrusion into the content of programming." However, the Chicago area was served by another classical music station. Therefore, in the case of WEFM transfer, there was no need for a hearing on the diversity point. Judge Bazelon observed that "[I]mportant First Amendment rights are at stake when music formats are regulated. * * * Danger lurks in government regulation of what music can be put on the airwaves. Such regulation, ostensibly in the name of diversity, may open the door to withholding approval of transfers if the new format is more controversial than the one to be abandoned."

However, on rehearing en banc, the court of appeals, in an opinion before Judge McGowan found that the Citizens Committee had raised serious and material questions necessitating a hearing before final disposition of the transfer application. The court therefore set aside the FCC orders in the case. Judge McGowan commented:

The theory underlying the court's decision in Citizens Committee of Atlanta is that the FCC does have some responsibility, under its public interest mandate, for programming content. * * * "The commission is not dictating tastes when it seeks to discover what they presently are, and to consider what assignment of channels is feasible and fair in terms of their gratification." (Citizens Committee of Atlanta)

In a significant statement, Judge McGowan declared: "Once a proposed format change engenders 'public grumbling of significant proportions,' the causal relationship between format and finance must be established, and if that requires the resolution of substantial factual questions, as it did in that case, then a hearing must be held."

Judge McGowan then summarized the law of the format change cases:

There is a public interest in a diversity of broadcast entertainment formats. The disappearance of a distinctive format may deprive a significant segment of the public of the benefits of radio, at least at their first-preference level. When faced with a proposed license assignment encompassing a format change, the FCC is obliged to determine whether the format to be lost is unique or otherwise serves a specialized audience that would feel its loss.

If the endangered format is of this variety, then the FCC must affirmatively consider whether the public interest would be served by approving the proposed assignment, which may, if there are substantial questions of fact or inadequate data in the application or other officially noticeable materials, necessitate conducting a public hearing in order to resolve the factual issues or assist the commission in discerning the public interest. Finally, it is not sufficient justification for approving the application that the assignor has asserted financial losses in providing the special format; those losses must be attributable to the format itself in order logically to support an assignment that occasions a loss of the format.

Judge McGowan concluded:

We think it axiomatic that preservation of a format [which] would otherwise disappear, although economically and technologically viable and preferred by a significant number of listeners, is generally in the public interest. There may well be situations in which that is not the case for reasons within the discretion of the FCC to consider, but a policy of mechanistic deference to "competition" in entertainment program format will not focus the FCC's attention on the necessity to discern such reasons before allowing diversity, serving the public interest because it serves more of the public, to disappear from the airwaves.

McGowan noted that the WEFM case also raised questions as to whether the other so-called classical station in Chicago (WFMT) was "a reasonable substitute for the service previously offered by WEFM." The court in WEFM then ordered the FCC to set the issue of transfer for hearing on the issue of whether the programming of the other "classical" station in Chicago was an adequate substitute for the old "classical" format of WEFM. Also, the issue of whether the classical format of WEFM occasioned financial losses was set for hearing.

In response to the WEFM case, the FCC began an inquiry into its policies dealing with changes in entertainment format. See Development of Policy Re: Changes In the Entertainment Formats of Broadcast Stations, 57 FCC2d 580 (1976), reconsideration denied 58 FCC2d 617 (1976). The FCC's distaste for intruding into broadcast judgment in connection with program formats was made clear. "For over 40 years, therefore, broadcast applicants have been free to select their own programming formats. * * * In the present controversy, we are being called upon to substitute our judgment for that of the applicant on the most subjective grounds imaginable without any clear danger to the public interest."

In his concurring opinion, in WEFM, Judge Bazelon stated his concern—and ours—with the fact that "the court had set a 'broad view of the commission's authority in the delicate area of programming with nary a syllable spoken to the First Amendment implications of its decision.' We believe that this issue warrants a prompt and thorough review and accordingly, such comments are requested. Specifically, would any system of commission intervention in, or selection of, licensee formats violate the First Amendment?"

In a separate dissenting statement, FCC Commissioner Glen Robinson challenged the line of cases in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit which began with the Voice of the Arts, see text, p. 786 and ended with WEFM: The standard for 'uniqueness' or 'diversity'—the diversity that the public wants enough so as to cause it to grumble when it is diminished—is obviously idiosyncratic and subjective. Quite aside from the constitutional objections * * * this subjective element presents intractable difficulties in administration. See 57 FCC2d 580 at 594 (1976).

Despite WEFM and its predecessors, the FCC still prefers to let the economic marketplace rather than the FCC determine problems of change of program format. See Changes in the Entertainment

Formats of Broadcast Stations, Memorandum Opinion and Order, 60 FCC2d 858 at 863-866 (1976).

Professor Canby has supported the FCC's noninterventionist approach to the format change problem. Under the Voice of the Arts ruling, whether a broadcaster will be required to suit a particular taste will "depend entirely upon what other broadcasters in the same marketplace may do." In order not to be frozen into a particular format, a broadcaster may avoid "specialty formats" and merely mimic the programming of other stations in the same market. Professor Canby concludes: "This coercive effect of the format decisions not only interferes with the first amendment rights of the broadcaster but also positively disservices any long-run interest of the audience in diversity." See Canby, Programming In Response to the Community: The Broadcast Consumer and the First Amendment, 55 Tex.L.Rev. 67 at 95 (1976).

Others have defended the format change cases in the District of Columbia Circuit on the ground that the cases recognize that unity comes not from the lowest common denominator, but from "the interplay among diverse and authentically expressed views." See Barron, Freedom of the Press for Whom? at 237, 238 (1973); and Note, The Public Interest in Balanced Programming Content: The Case for FCC Regulation of Broadcaster's Format Changes, 40 Geo.Wash.L.Rev. 933 (1972).

---

FCC v. WNCN LISTENERS GUILD

450 U.S. 582, 101 S.Ct. 1266,
67 L.ED.2D 521 (1981)

* * *

Justice WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

Sections 309(a) and 310(d) of the Communications Act of 1934, 47 U.S.C. § 151 et seq. (act), empower the Federal Communications Commission to grant an application for license transfer or renewal only if it determines that "the public interest, convenience and necessity" will be served thereby. The issue before us is whether there are circumstances in which the commission must review past or anticipated changes in a station's entertainment programming when it rules on an application for renewal or transfer of a radio broadcast license. The commission's present position is that it may rely on market forces to promote diversity in entertainment programming and thus serve the public interest.

This issue arose when, pursuant to its informal rulemaking authority, the commission issued a "policy statement" concluding that the public interest is best served by promoting diversity in entertainment formats through market forces and competition among broadcasters and that a change in entertainment programming is therefore not a material factor that should be considered by the commission in ruling on an application for license renewal or transfer. Respondents, a number of citizen groups interested in fostering and preserving particular entertainment formats, petitioned for review in the court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. That court held that the commission's policy statement violated the act. We reverse the decision of the court of appeals.

Beginning in 1970, in a series of cases involving license transfers, the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit gradually developed a set of criteria for determining when the "public-interest" standard requires the commission to hold a hearing to review proposed changes in entertainment formats. Noting that the aim of the act is "to secure the maximum benefits of radio to all the people of the United States," National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, * * * the court of appeals ruled in 1974 that "preservation of a format [that] would otherwise disappear, although economically and technologically viable and preferred by a significant number of listeners, is generally in the public interest." Citizens Committee to Save WEFM v. FCC * * *. It concluded that a change in format would not present "substantial and material questions of fact" requiring a hearing if (1) notice of the change had not precipitated "significant public grumbling"; (2) the segment of the population preferring the format was too small to be accommodated by available frequencies; (3) there was an adequate substitute in the service area for the format being abandoned; or (4) the format would be economically unfeasible even if the station were managed efficiently. The court rejected the commission's position that the choice of entertainment formats should be left to the judgment of the licensee, stating that the commission's interpretation of the public-interest standard was contrary to the act.

In January 1976 the commission responded to these decisions by undertaking an inquiry into its role in reviewing format changes. In particular, the commission sought public comment on whether the public interest would be better served by commission scrutiny of entertainment programming or by reliance on the competitive marketplace.

Following public notice and comment, the commission issued a policy statement pursuant to its rulemaking authority under the act. The commission concluded in the policy statement that review of format changes was not compelled by the language or history of the act, would not advance the welfare of the radio-listening public, would pose substantial administrative problems, and would deter innovation in radio programming. In support of its position, the commission quoted from FCC v. Sanders Brothers Radio Station, 309 U.S. 470, 475, * * * (1940): "Congress intended to leave competition in the business of broadcasting where it found it, to permit a licensee * * * to survive or succumb according to his ability to make his programs attractive to the public." The commission also emphasized that a broadcaster is not a common carrier and therefore should not be subjected to a burden similar to the common carrier's obligation to continue to provide service if abandonment of that service would conflict with public convenience or necessity.

The commission also concluded that practical considerations as well as statutory interpretation supported its reluctance to regulate changes in formats. Such regulation would require the commission to categorize the formats of a station's prior and subsequent programming to determine whether a change in format had occurred; to determine whether the prior format was "unique"; and to weigh the public detriment resulting from the abandonment of a unique format against the public benefit resulting from that change. The commission emphasized the difficulty of objectively evaluating the strength of listener preferences, of comparing the desire for diversity within a particular type of programming to the desire for a broader range of program formats and of assessing the financial feasibility of a unique format.

Finally, the commission explained why it believed that market forces were the best available means of producing diversity in entertainment formats. First, in large markets, competition among broadcasters had already produced "an almost bewildering array of diversity" in entertainment formats. Second, format allocation by market forces accommodates listeners' desires for diversity within a given format and also produces a variety of formats. Third, the market is far more flexible than governmental regulation and responds more quickly to changing public tastes. Therefore, the commission concluded that "the market is the allocation mechanism of preference for entertainment formats and * * * commission supervision in this area will not be conducive either to producing program diversity [or] satisfied radio listeners."

The court of appeals, sitting en banc, held that the commission's policy was contrary to the act as construed and applied in the court's prior format decisions. WNCN Listeners Guild v. FCC, * * *

The court questioned whether the commission had rationally and impartially re-examined its position and particularly criticized the commission's failure to disclose a staff study on the effectiveness of market allocation of formats before it issued the policy statement. The court then responded to the commission's criticisms of the format doctrine. First, although conceding that market forces generally lead to diversification of formats, it concluded that the market only imperfectly reflects listener preferences and that the commission is statutorily obligated to review format changes whenever there is "strong prima facie evidence that the market has in fact broken down." * * *

Second, the court stated that the administrative problems posed by the format doctrine were not insurmountable. Hearings would only be required in a small number of cases, and the commission could cope with problems such as classifying radio format by adopting a "rational classification schema." 197 U.S.App.D.C., at 334, 610 F.2d, at 853. Third, the court observed that the commission had not demonstrated that the format doctrine would deter innovative programming. Finally, the court explained that it had not directed the commission to engage in censorship or to impose common carrier obligations on licensees: WEFM did not authorize the commission to interfere with licensee programming choices or to force retention of an existing format; it merely stated that the commission had the power to consider a station's format in deciding whether license renewal or transfer would be consistent with the public interest. * * *

Although conceding that it possessed neither the expertise nor the authority to make policy decisions in this area, the court of appeals asserted that the format doctrine was "law," not "policy," and was of the view that the commission had not disproved the factual assumptions underlying the format doctrine. Accordingly, the court declared that the policy statement was "unavailing and of no force and effect."

Rejecting the commission's reliance on market forces to develop diversity in programming as an unreasonable interpretation of the act's public-interest standard, the court of appeals held that in certain circumstances the commission is required to regard a change in entertainment format as a substantial and material fact in deciding whether a license renewal or transfer is in the public interest. With all due respect, however, we are unconvinced that the court of appeals' format doctrine is compelled by the act and that the commission's interpretation of the public-interest standard must therefore be set aside.

It is common ground that the act does not define the term "public interest convenience, and necessity." The court has characterized the public-interest standard of the act as "a supple instrument for the exercise of discretion: by the expert body which Congress has charged to carry out its legislative policy." FCC v. Pottsville Broadcasting Co., 309 U.S. 134 (1940). * *

Furthermore, we recognized that the commission's decisions must sometimes rest on judgment and prediction rather than pure factual determinations. In such cases complete factual support for the commission's ultimate conclusions is not required, since "'a forecast of the direction in which future public interest lies necessarily involves deductions based on the expert knowledge of the agency.'"

The commission has provided a rational explanation for its conclusion that reliance on the market is the best method of promoting diversity in entertainment formats. The court of appeals and the commission agree that in the vast majority of cases market forces provide sufficient diversity. The court of appeals favors government intervention when there is evidence that market forces have deprived the public of a "unique" format, while the commission is content to rely on the market, pointing out that in many cases when a station changes its format, other stations will change their formats to attract listeners who preferred the discontinued format. The court of appeals places great value on preserving diversity among formats, while the commission emphasizes the value of intra-format as well as inter-format diversity. Finally, the court of appeals is convinced that review of format changes would result in a broader range of formats, while the commission believes that government intervention is likely to deter innovative programming.

In making these judgments, the commission has not forsaken its obligation to pursue the public interest. On the contrary, it has assessed the benefits and the harm likely to flow from government review of entertainment programming, and on balance has concluded that its statutory duties are best fulfilled by not attempting to oversee format changes. This decision was in major part based on predictions as to the probable conduct of licensees and the functioning of the broadcasting market and on the commission's assessment of its capacity to make the determinations required by the format doctrine. * * * It did not assert that reliance on the marketplace would achieve a perfect correlation between listener preferences and available entertainment programming. Rather, it recognized that a perfect correlation would never be achieved, and it concluded that the marketplace alone could best accommodate the varied and changing tastes of the listening public. These predictions are within the institutional competence of the commission.

Our opinions have repeatedly emphasized that the commission's judgment regarding how the public interest is best served is entitled to substantial judicial deference. * * * Furthermore, diversity is not the only policy the commission must consider in fulfilling its responsibilities under the act. The commission's implementation of the public-interest standard, when based on a rational weighing of competing policies, is not to be set aside by the court of appeals, for "the weighing of policies under the 'public interest' standard is a task that Congress has delegated to the commission in the first instance." FCC v. National Citizens Committee for Broadcasting, 436 U.S., at 810 * * *. The commission's position on review of format changes reflects a reasonable accommodation of the policy of promoting diversity in programming and the policy of avoiding unnecessary restrictions on licensee discretion. As we see it, the commission's policy statement is in harmony with cases recognizing that the act seeks to preserve journalistic discretion while promoting the interests of the listening public.

The policy statement is also consistent with the legislative history of the act. Although Congress did not consider the precise issue before us, it did consider and reject a proposal to allocate a certain percentage of the stations to particular types of programming.<sup>33</sup> Similarly, one of the bills submitted prior to passage of the Radio Act of 1927<sup>34</sup> included a provision requiring stations to comply with programming priorities based on subject matter.<sup>35</sup> This provision was eventually deleted

---

33. Congress rejected a proposal to allocate 25% of all radio stations to educational, religious, agricultural, and similar nonprofit associations. See 78 Cong.Rec. 8843-8846 (1934).

34. 44 Stat. 1162. The Radio Act of 1927 was the predecessor to the Communications Act.

35. This bill would have required the administrative agency created by the Radio Act of 1927 to prescribe "priorities as to subject matter to be observed by each class of licensed stations." H.R. 7357, 68th Cong., 1st Sess. § 1(B) (1924).

since it was considered to border on censorship. Congress subsequently added a section to the Radio Act of 1927 expressly prohibiting censorship and other "interference] with the right of free speech by means of radio communication." That section was retained in the Communications Act. As we read the legislative history of the act, Congress did not unequivocally express its disfavor of entertainment format review by the commission, but neither is there substantial indication that Congress expected the public-interest standard to require format regulation by the commission. The legislative history of the act does not support the court of appeals and provides insufficient basis for invalidating the agency's construction of the act.

In the past we have stated that "the construction of a statute by those charged with its execution should be followed unless there are compelling indications that it is wrong * * *." Prior to 1970, the commission consistently stated that the choice of programming formats should be left to the licensee. In 1971 the commission restated that position but announced that any application for license transfer or renewal involving a substantial change in program format would have to be reviewed in light of the court of appeals' decision in Citizens Committee to Preserve the Voice of the Arts in Atlanta, * * * 436 F.2d 263, 267 (D.C.Cir.1970), in which the court of appeals first articulated the format doctrine. * * * [A]lthough the commission was obliged to modify its policies to conform to the court of appeals' format doctrine, the policy statement reasserted the commission's traditional preference of achieving diversity in entertainment programming through market forces.

* * * Surely, it is argued, there will be some format changes that will be so detrimental to the public interest that inflexible application of the commission's policy statement would be inconsistent with the commission's duties. But radio broadcasters are not required to seek permission to make format changes. The issue of past or contemplated entertainment format changes arises in the courses of renewal and transfer proceedings; if such an application is approved, the commission does not merely assume but affirmatively determines that the requested renewal or transfer will serve the public interest.

Under its present policy, the commission determines whether a renewal or transfer will serve the public interest without reviewing past or proposed changes in entertainment format. This policy is based on the commission's judgment that market forces, although they operate imperfectly, will not only more reliably respond to listener preference than would format oversight by the commission but will also serve the end of increasing diversity in entertainment programming. This court has approved of the commission's goal of promoting diversity in radio programming, FCC v. Midwest Video Corp., 440 U.S. 689 (1979), but the commission is nevertheless vested with broad discretion in determining how much weight should be given to that goal and what policies should be pursued in promoting it. The act itself, of course, does not specify how the commission should make its public interest determinations.

A major underpinning of its policy statement is the commission's conviction, rooted in its experience, that renewal and transfer cases should not turn on the commission presuming to grasp, measure and weigh the elusive and difficult factors involved in determining the acceptability of changes in entertainment format. To assess whether the elimination of a particular "unique" entertainment format would serve the public interest, the commission would have to consider the benefit as well as the detriment that would result from the change. Necessarily, the commission would take into consideration not only the number of listeners who favor the old and the new programming but also the intensity of their preferences. It would also consider the effect of the format change on diversity within formats as well as on diversity among formats. The commission is convinced that its judgments in these respects would be subjective in large measure and would only approximately serve the public interest. It is also convinced that the market, although imperfect, would serve the public interest as well or better by responding quickly to changing preferences and by inviting experimentation with new types of programming. Those who would overturn the commission's policy statement do not take adequate account of these considerations.

It is also contended that since the commission has responded to listener complaints about nonentertainment programming, it should also review challenged changes in entertainment formats. But the difference between the commission's treatment of nonentertainment programming and its treatment of entertainment programming is not as pronounced as it may seem. Even in the area of nonentertainment programming, the commission has afforded licensees broad discretion in selecting programs. Thus, the commission has stated that "a substantial and material question of fact [requiring an evidentiary hearing] is raised only when it appears that the licensee has abused its broad discretion by acting unreasonably or in bad faith." Mississippi Authority for Educational TV, 71 FCC2d 1296, 1308 (1969). Furthermore, we note that the commission has recently re-examined its regulation of commercial radio broadcasting in light of changes in the structure of the radio industry. See Notice of Inquiry and Proposed Rulemaking, In the Matter of Deregulation of Radio, 73 FCC2d 457 (1979). As a result of that re-examination, it has eliminated rules requiring maintenance of comprehensive program logs, guidelines on the amount of nonentertainment programming radio stations must offer, formal requirements governing ascertainment of community needs, and guidelines limiting commercial time. See Report and Order, In the Matter of Deregulation of Radio, 46 Fed.Reg. 13888 (1981).

This case does not require us to consider whether the commission's present or past policies in the area of nonentertainment programming comply with the act. We attach some weight to the fact that the Commission has consistently expressed a preference for promoting diversity in entertainment programming through market forces, but our decision ultimately rests on our conclusion that the commission has provided a reasonable explanation for this preference in its policy statement.

We decline to overturn the commission's policy statement, which prefers reliance on market forces to its own attempt to oversee format changes at the behest of disaffected listeners. Of course, the commission should be alert to the consequences of its policies and should stand ready to alter its rule if necessary to serve the public interest more fully. * * *

Respondents contend that the court of appeals judgment should be affirmed because, even if not violative of the act, the policy statement conflicts with the First Amendment rights of listeners "to receive suitable access to social, political, esthetic, moral, and other ideas and experience." Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969) * * *. Red Lion held that the Commission's "fairness doctrine" was consistent with the public-interest standard of the Communications Act and did not violate the First Amendment, but rather enhanced First Amendment values by promoting "the presentation of vigorous debate of controversial issues of importance and concern to the public." * * * Although observing that the interests of the people as a whole were promoted by debate of public issues on the radio, we did not imply that the First Amendment grants individual listeners the right to have the commission review the abandonment of their favorite entertainment programs. The commission seeks to further the interests of the listening public as a whole by relying on market forces to promote diversity in radio entertainment formats and to satisfy the entertainment preferences of radio listeners. This policy does not conflict with the First Amendment.

Contrary to the judgment of the court of appeals, the commission's policy statement is not inconsistent with the act. It is also a constitutionally permissible means of implementing the public-interest standard of the act. Accordingly, the judgment of the court of appeals is reversed and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

So ordered.

Justice MARSHALL, with whom Justice Brennan joins, dissenting.

Under §§ 309(a) and 310(d) of the Communications Act of 1934, 47 U.S.C. § 151 et seq. (act), the Federal Communications Commission (commission) may not approve an application for a radio license transfer, assignment or renewal unless it finds that such change will serve "the public interest, convenience, and necessity." Any party in interest may petition the commission to deny the application, § 309(d)(1), and the commission must hold a hearing if "a substantial and material question of fact is presented," § 309(d)(2). In my judgment, the court of appeals correctly held that in certain limited circumstances, the commission may be obliged to hold a hearing to consider whether a proposed change in a licensee's entertainment program format is in the "public interest." Accordingly, I would affirm the judgment of the court of appeals insofar as it vacated the commission's "policy statement."

At the outset, I should point out that my understanding of the court of appeals' format cases is very different from the commission's. Both in its policy statement and in its brief before this court, the commission has insisted that the format doctrine espoused by the court of appeals,

"favors a system of pervasive governmental regulation," requiring "comprehensive, discriminating, and continuing state surveillance." The commission further contends that enforcement of the format doctrine would impose "common carrier" obligations on broadcasters and substitute for "the imperfect system of free competition * * * a system of broadcast programming by government decree." Were this an accurate description of the format doctrine, I would join the court in reversing the judgment below. However, I agree with the court of appeals that "the actual features of [its format doctrine] are scarcely visible in [the commission's] highly-colored portrait." * * *

* * *

Although the act does not define "public interest, convenience, and necessity," it is difficult to quarrel with the basic premise of the court of appeals' format cases that the term includes "a concern for diverse entertainment programming." * * * The commission has concluded that a general policy of relying on market forces is the best method for promoting diversity in entertainment programming formats. As the majority notes, this determination largely rests on the commission's predictions about licensee behavior and the functioning of the radio broadcasting market.

I agree with the majority that predictions of this sort are within the commission's institutional competence. I am also willing to assume that a general policy of disregarding format changes in making the "public interest" determination required by the act is not inconsistent with the commission's statutory obligation to give individualized consideration to each application. The commission has broad rule-making power under the act, and we have approved efforts by the commission to implement the act's "public interest" requirement through rules and policies of general application. * * *

The problem with the particular policy statement challenged here, however, is that it lacks the flexibility we have required of such general regulations and policies. * * * The act imposes an affirmative duty on the commission to make a particularized "public interest" determination for each application that comes before it. As we explained in National Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 319 U.S., at 225, * * * the commission must, in each case, "exercise an ultimate judgment whether the grant of a license would serve the 'public interest, convenience or necessity.'" The policy statement completely forecloses any possibility that the commission will re-examine the validity of its general policy on format changes as it applies to particular situations. Thus, even when it can be conclusively demonstrated that a particular radio market does not function in the manner predicted by the commission, the policy statement indicates that the commission will blindly assume that a proposed format change is in the "public interest." This result would occur even where reliance on the market to ensure format diversity is shown to be misplaced, and where it thus appears that action by the commission is necessary to promote the public interest in diversity. This outcome is not consistent with the commission's statutory responsibilities.

Moreover, our cases have indicated that an agency's discretion to proceed in complex areas through general rules is intimately connected to the existence of a "safety valve" procedure that allows the agency to consider applications for exemptions based on special circumstances. * * * For example, in National Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, we upheld the Commission's Chain Broadcasting Regulations, but we emphasized the need for flexibility in administering the rules. We noted that the "commission provided that 'networks will be given full opportunity, on proper application * * * to call our attention to any reasons why the principle should be modified or held inapplicable.'" * * * Similarly, in upholding the commission's Multiple Ownership Rules in United States v. Storer Broadcasting Co., * * * we noted that the regulations allowed an opportunity for a "full hearing" for applicants "that set out adequate reasons why the Rules should be waived or amended."

This "safety valve" feature is particularly essential where, as here, the agency's decision that a general policy promotes the public interest is based on predictions and forecasts that by definition lack complete factual support. * * *

In my judgment, this requirement of flexibility compels the commission to provide a procedure through which listeners can attempt to show that a particular radio market differs from the commission's paradigm, and thereby persuade the commission to give particularized consideration to a proposed format change. Indeed, until the policy statement was published, the commission had resolved to "take an extra hard look at the reasonableness of any proposal which would deprive a community of its only source of a particular type of programming." As I see it, the court of appeals' format doctrine was merely an attempt by that court to delineate the circumstances in which the commission must temper its general policy in view of special circumstances. Perhaps the court would have been better advised to leave the task of defining these situations to the commission. But one need not endorse every feature of the court of appeals' approach to conclude that the court correctly invalidated the commission's policy statement because of its omission of a "safety valve" procedure.

This omission is not only a departure from legal precedents; it is also a departure from both the commission's consistent policies and its admissions here. For the commission concedes that the radio market is an imperfect reflection of listener preferences, and that listeners have programming interests that may not be reflected in the marketplace. The commission has long recognized its obligation to examine program formats in making the "public interest" determination required by the act. As early as 1929, the commission's predecessor, the Federal Radio Commission, adopted the position that licensees were expected to provide a balanced program schedule designed to serve all substantial groups in their communities. * * * The commission's famous "Blue Book," published in 1946, reaffirmed the emphasis on a well-balanced program structure and declared that the commission has "an affirmative duty, in its public interest determinations, to give full consideration to program service." * * *

* * *

This theme was reiterated in the commission's 1960 Program Statement, which set forth 14 specific categories of programming that were deemed "major elements usually necessary to meet the public interest, needs and desires of the community," and which emphasized the necessity of each broadcaster's programming serving the "tastes and needs" of its local community. * * *

* * *

The majority attempts to minimize the inconsistency in the commission's treatment of entertainment and nonentertainment programming by postulating that the difference "is not as pronounced as it may seem." This observation, even if accurate, is simply beside the point. What is germane is the commission's failure to consider listener complaints about entertainment programming to the same extent and in the same manner as it reviews complaints about nonentertainment programming. Thus, whereas the commission will hold an evidentiary hearing to review complaints about nonentertainment programming where "'it appears that the licensee has * * * act[ed] unreasonably or in bad faith,'" (quoting Mississippi Authority for Educational TV, 71 FCC2d 1296, 1308 (1979)), the commission will not consider an identical complaint about a licensee's change in its entertainment programming. As I have indicated, * * * neither the commission nor the majority is able to offer a satisfactory explanation for this inconsistency.

Nor can the commission find refuge in its claim that "[e]ven after all the relevant facts [h]ad been fully explored in an evidentiary hearing, [the commission] would have no assurance that a decision finally reached by [the commission] would contribute more to listener satisfaction than the result favored by station management." Policy Statement, supra, at 865. The same must be true of the decisions the commission makes after reviewing listener complaints about nonentertainment programming, and I do not see why the commission finds this result acceptable in one situation but not in the other. Much the same can be said for the majority's suggestion that the commission should be spared the burden of "presuming to grasp, measure and weigh * * * elusive and difficult factors" such as determining the number of listeners who favor a particular change and measuring the intensity of their preferences. But insofar as the commission confronts these same "elusive and difficult factors" in reviewing nonentertainment programming, it need only apply the expertise it has acquired in dealing with these problems to review of entertainment programming.

Since I agree with the court of appeals that there may be situations in which the commission is obliged to consider format changes in making the "public interest" determination mandated by the act, it seems appropriate to comment briefly on the commission's claim that the "'acute practical problem[s]' inherent in format regulation render entirely speculative any benefits that such regulation might produce." One of the principal reasons given in the policy statement for rejecting entertainment format regulation is that it would be "administratively a fearful and comprehensive nightmare," that would impose "enormous costs on the participants and the commission alike." * * *

Although it has abandoned the "administrative nightmare" argument before this court, the commission nonetheless finds other "intractable" administrative problems in format regulation. For example, it insists that meaningful classification of radio broadcasts into format types is impractical, and that it is impossible to determine whether a proposed format change is in the public interest because the intensity of listener preferences cannot be measured. Moreover, the commission argues that format regulation will discourage licensee innovation and experimentation with formats, and that its effect on format diversity will therefore be counterproductive.

None of these claims has merit. Broadcasters have operated under the format doctrine during the past 10 years, yet the commission is unable to show that there has been no innovation and experimentation with formats during this period. Indeed, a commission staff study on the effectiveness of market allocation of formats indicates that licensees have been aggressive in developing diverse entertainment formats under the format doctrine regime. This "evidence"—a welcome contrast to the commission's speculation—undermines the commission's claim that format regulation will disserve the "public interest" because it will inhibit format diversity.

The commission's claim that it is impossible to classify formats, is largely overcome by the court of appeals' suggestion that the commission could develop "a format taxonomy which, even if imprecise at the margins, would be sustainable so long as not irrational." * * * Even more telling is the staff study relied on by the commission to show that there is broad format diversity in major radio markets, for the study used a format classification based on industry practice. As the court of appeals noted, it is somewhat ironic that the commission had no trouble "endorsing the validity of a study largely premised on classifications it claims are impossible to make." To be sure, courts do not sit to second-guess the assessments of specialized agencies like the commission. But where, as here, the agency's position rests on speculations that are refuted by the agency's own administrative record, I am not persuaded that deference is due.

The commission's policy statement is defective because it lacks a "safety valve" procedure that would allow the necessary flexibility in the application of the commission's general policy on format changes to particular cases. In my judgment, the court of appeals' format doctrine was a permissible attempt by that court to provide the commission with some guidance regarding the types of situations in which a re-examination of general policy might be necessary. Even if one were to conclude that the court of appeals described these situations too specifically, a view I do not share, I still think that the court of appeals correctly held that the commission's policy statement must be vacated.

I respectfully dissent.

---

COMMENT

1. In an article in praise of deregulation, FCC Chairman Mark Fowler and his legal assistant Daniel Brenner described the WNCN case as a decision where "the Supreme Court expressly sanctioned the commission's discretion to invoke market forces in its regulatory mission." See, Fowler & Brenner, A Marketplace Approach to Broadcast Regulation, 60 Texas Law Review 207 (1982). Fowler and Brenner contend that NBC, text, p. 770, Red Lion, text, p. 845, and CBS v. FCC, text, p. 815, did not directly involve a "conflict between the marketplace and trusteeship approaches to broadcasting" but that in WNCN these policies collided. How does the marketplace model of broadcast regulation differ from the trusteeship model? Fowler and Brenner suggest the following distinction:

This [marketplace] approach differs from a trusteeship model, under which the commission would require broadcasters to air programs—from public affairs shows to responses to station editorials—that might not be aired voluntarily, and that consumers, insofar as they can be heard in the advertiser-supported marketplace, do not demand.

The market perspective diminishes the importance of the commission's past efforts to define affirmatively the elements of operation "in the public interest." It recognizes as valid communications policy, well within commission discretion, reliance on voluntary broadcaster efforts to attract audiences—whether by specialized formats, as in the case of major market radio, or with a mix of programs, as in the case of television—and to provide the best practicable programming service to the public. It concludes that governmental efforts to improve the broadcast market have led to distortions of programming that have merely yielded a different programming mix, not a better one, and that the costs of government intrusion into the marketplace outweigh the benefits. Important first amendment interests support this conclusion as well.

Fowler and Brenner argue that the WNCN case diminishes the significance of the Red Lion trusteeship approach to broadcast regulation. They suggest that listener rights are best served when broadcasters, responding to the market, react to "perceived listener demand." This is deemed preferable to requirements that broadcasters respond to a government conception of listener demand.

In short, the marketplace can meet the rights of listeners and viewers fully as much as government can, and so long as the need is met, Red Lion is satisfied. Is this really true? Fowler and Brenner concede that they may be reading more into WNCN for their revisionist view of Red Lion than is warranted. They also concede that the new case of CBS v. FCC, text, p. 815, serves to diminish rather than to expand the role of broadcast editorial discretion and, therefore, the free play of the marketplace.

However, they distinguished CBS v. DNC as dealing with a narrow access statute. They conclude: "Absent an express commission finding that it cannot rely on licensee discretion to carry out its congressional mandate, however, WNCN suggests the compatibility of a marketplace approach and Red Lion's emphasis on listeners' rights."

For an article supporting the view that administrative choice of program formats presents graver problems than leaving the choice of program format to unfettered licensee discretion, see Spitzer, Radio Formats By Administrative Choice, 47 U. of Chi.L.Rev. 647 (1981). The article was written prior to the Supreme Court decision in the program format case.

2. The format doctrine as developed in the federal courts of appeal held that a change in format upon license transfer or renewal presented a substantial and material question of fact requiring a public hearing (under §§ 309(a) and 310(d) of the Federal Communications Act)—if certain specified circumstances were met. See Citizens Committee to Save WEFM v. FCC, 506 F.2d 246 (D.C.Cir.1974) (en banc). Does the format doctrine constitute an obligation to continue certain programming or stop broadcasting altogether? If so, does the format doctrine violate § 3(h) of the Communications Act which prohibits regulating broadcasters as common carriers? See, 47 U.S.C. § 153(h).

3. After the WEFM decision, the FCC issued a policy statement on format changes which asserted that the Federal Communications Act did not require that a proposed change in entertainment format should be reviewed by the FCC. See Memorandum Opinion and Order (policy statement), 60 FCC 2d 858 (1976), reconsideration denied, 66 FCC 2d 78 (1977). Is the implication of the policy statement that the FCC believed that WEFM and kindred cases usurped its authority to determine the public interest?

The policy statement effectively gutted the format doctrine decisions. See, WNCN Listeners Guild v. FCC, 610 F.2d 838 (D.C.Cir.1979). The FCC is the appropriate body to resolve matters of communications policy; the courts are the appropriate forums for resolving matters of communications law. The FCC, the federal court of appeals in WNCN, the WNCN Supreme Court majority, and the WNCN Supreme Court dissent all agree that the "public interest" standard requires diversity in programming. But should the definition of what the "public interest" requires in this instance be considered a matter of policy or one of statutory interpretation, i.e., law? In short, is the basic issue in WNCN—the question of how best to achieve diversity—a matter of policy? If diversity is a matter of policy, then, presumably the FCC is the appropriate body to define how it should be achieved? Did the Supreme Court in WNCN view the format change issue as "law" or "policy"?

4. In his WNCN dissent, Justice Marshall agreed that diversity is the goal and that the FCC has considerable latitude in determining how to achieve it. He condemned the policy statement's failure to provide a safety valve for special circumstances where FCC intervention might be desirable to achieve diversity in the "public interest." A large audience could desire an economically viable format, yet be denied satisfaction when the market does not operate according to the FCC market forces paradigm.

Justice White, for the WNCN majority, responded that the act does not require safety valves merely because the court has previously approved of regulations that include them. Furthermore, a new policy statement could always provide the needed emergency procedures if the FCC determines that they are in the public interest.

5. The challenge by Judge Bazelon in WEFM to the limitation of the spectrum rationale for radio regulation has served as a justification for the Reagan-era FCC to repeal much of the prior regulatory structure applicable to radio, i.e., formal ascertainment procedures, guidelines regarding the amount of nonentertainment programming, and guidelines limiting commercial time. See, Report and Order In the Matter of Deregulation of Radio, 46 Fed.Reg. 1388 (1981).

How does radio deregulation affect the licensee's underlying public interest obligation to provide different types of programs and to know the needs of the audience? Justice White, in WNCN, appears to be sympathetic to allowing deregulation based on the FCC's perception of the public interest. Justice Marshall's dissent demonstrates his belief that nonentertainment programming issues remain relevant to FCC consideration of petitions to deny a license grant or renewal. Since the FCC will continue to examine the reasonableness of a broadcaster's nonentertainment programming decisions, licensees must still know what issues interest their communities.

The FCC is reluctant to regulate entertainment programming. It perceives a greater public interest in diverse nonentertainment programming as well as a greater need for regulation. Because nonentertainment programming generates less revenue, it is less likely to generate market acceptance or rejection.

Whether composite logs are still required is unclear. The fourteen types of programming—the ingredients of a concept of "balanced programming"—are no longer mandated. See Office of Communication of United Church of Christ v. FCC, 707 F.2d 1413 (D.C.Cir.1983) and the textual material on "balanced programming," p. 785. Challenges to entertainment programming are now likely to arise in comparative license renewal hearings. Nonentertainment programming remains subject to a greater scrutiny. Intraprogram diversity and balance are sought through the fairness doctrine, which, having been codified, cannot be deregulated through commission action.

BROADCASTING AND POLITICAL DEBATE: § 315 AND THE "EQUAL TIME" REQUIREMENT

The "Equal Time" Concept

1. The most celebrated provision of the Federal Communications Act is certainly § 315, the "equal time" provision. Although disliked by many broadcasters, it has become a vital part of the political process. It prevents broadcasters from favoring one candidate and ignoring all others. The statute operates as a guaranty that broadcasting will be responsive to the dependency of the political process on the mass media.

The statute, 47 U.S.C.A. § 315(a) (1976), states:

§ 315. Candidates for public office; facilities; rules

(a) If any licensee shall permit any person who is a legally qualified candidate for any public office to use a broadcasting station, he shall afford equal opportunities to all other candidates for that office in the use of such broadcasting station: Provided, that such licensee shall have no power of censorship over the material broadcast under the provisions of this section. No obligation is imposed under this subsection upon any licensee to allow the use of its station by any such candidate. Appearance by a legally qualified candidate on any—

- 1 bona fide newscast,
- 2 bona fide news interview,

3 bona fide news documentary (if the appearance of the candidate is incidental to the presentation of the subjects covered by the news documentary), or

4 on-the-spot coverage of bona fide news events (including but not limited to political conventions and activities incidental thereto), shall not be deemed to be use of a broadcasting station within the meaning of this subsection. Nothing in the foregoing sentence shall be construed as relieving broadcasters, in connection with the presentation of newscasts, news interviews, news documentaries, and on the spot coverage of news events, from the obligation imposed upon them under this chapter to operate in the public interest and to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance.

(b) The charges made for the use of any broadcasting station for any of the purposes set forth in this section shall not exceed the charges made for comparable use of such station for other purposes.

(c) The Commission shall prescribe appropriate rules and regulations to carry out the provisions of this section.

2. The essence of the statute is in the term "equal opportunities" itself. Section 315 does not in fact require "equal time." "Equal opportunity" is what is required, not actual equality of access to broadcasting. If one candidate is sold time and his opponent cannot afford time, the station is not required to allow the impecunious opponent to speak free.

3. Political campaign coverage by public broadcasting stations operated by state broadcasting authorities can also be governed by state law. See McGlynn v. New Jersey Public Broadcasting Authority, 439 A.2d 54 (N.J.1981), text, p. 1029.

Defining a "Legally Qualified" Candidate

1. The simple operational rule of § 315 is that if one candidate is allowed to purchase prime time then all his "legally qualified" opponents must be allowed to purchase prime time. Who is a "legally qualified" candidate is a question which has not always been very flexibly approached in the past by the FCC. An inquiry into the meaning of the phrase is basic to an understanding of the statute. Flory v. FCC, 528 F.2d 124 (7th Cir. 1975), considered the problem. Ishmael Flory was nominated by the state committee of the Communist party to run in the 1974 election for United States senator from Illinois. Since the Communist party had not polled at least 5 percent of the vote in the preceding election, a nominating petition requiring 25,000 signatures was needed for its candidate to appear on the ballot.

Between the time of the nomination and the time when Flory eventually obtained the necessary signatures, he requested equal time in response to debates aired by broadcasters between the Republican and Democratic candidates. The FCC refused to order the broadcasters to give equal time to Flory: Since Flory had not yet secured a place on the ballot, he was not a legally qualified candidate at the time of the prior broadcasts.

The court held that Flory was not precluded from seeking equal time where the candidate involved had indicated that he would run as a write-in candidate if he did not obtain a place on the ballot:

We cannot agree with the argument of the commission that the rule which provides qualification either by obtaining a place on the ballot or by becoming eligible by being a write-in candidate must be construed as setting up mutually exclusive routes.

However, the court did not vacate the FCC order in the case because Flory should have sought review of the FCC rulings when they were made rather than attempting to obtain makeup time for past erroneous rulings.

2. As a result of the Flory case, the FCC amended its rules defining a "legally qualified" candidate. See Amendment of the Commission's Rules Relating to Broadcasts by Legally Qualified Candidates, 60 FCC2d 615 (1976). Under the new rules, a candidate is legally qualified if he:

1. has publicly announced his candidacy,

2. "meets the qualifications prescribed by the applicable laws to hold the office for which he is a candidate," and

3. either:

a. has qualified for a place on the ballot, or

b. "has publicly committed himself to seeking election by the write-in method, and is eligible under the applicable law" to be voted for by write-in or other method and "makes a substantial showing that he is a bona fide candidate for nomination or office."

The FCC has attempted with this definition to clarify the questions left unanswered by Flory. The rules require that the candidate publicly commit himself to seeking election by the write-in method in the event that his attempts to get on the ballot fail. But the question remains: Is the candidate's word alone sufficient "public commitment"? The commission's insistence on a "substantial showing" of bona fide candidacy suggests that more than a casual announcement by a candidate is necessary. Perhaps the pattern of continued assurance that the candidate will turn to a write-in candidacy, such as found in Flory, will be sufficient. See also Broadcasts and Cablecasts by Legally Qualified Candidates for Public Office, 44 F.R. 32790 (FCC, July 28, 1978).

Cablecasts by Candidates for Public Office. Is cable bound by an "equal time" rule? FCC regulations in 47 CFR (1981) § 76.205 provide that if a cable system permits a "legally qualified" candidate for public office to use the system's cablecasting channel(s) and facilities, the system operator shall afford equal opportunities to all other such candidates for such office. This requirement, however, does not pertain to a cablecast appearance of any legally qualified candidate on any bona fide newscast, news interview, news documentary, or any on-the-spot news coverage of bona fide news events.

In regulating the charges to be assessed to candidates for the use of the cable system, the FCC requires that during the forty-five days preceding a primary or sixty days prior to the date of a general or special election, cable system operators may charge no more than the "lowest unit charge" for the same class and amount of time. At all other times, candidates shall be charged no more than the prevailing rate, including discount privileges offered by the cable system to commercial advertisers.

Section 76.205 also provides that cable system operators shall have no power of censorship over cablecasts by candidates and that operators may not engage in any form of discrimination which would make or give any preference to any candidate or would subject any candidate to prejudice or disadvantage.

Primary Elections and the "Equal Time" Rule

1. Does the equal time rule apply to primary elections? Richard Kay, the unopposed candidate of the American Independent party for the Ohio Senate, requested broadcast time equivalent to that afforded by broadcasters to major party candidates who were engaged in Ohio primary elections. Both the Democratic and Republican primaries were contested, and in each of these major party primaries the opponents matched against each other were well known: Governor Rhodes and Congressman Taft in the Republican primary and Howard Metzenbaum and John Glenn in the Democratic primary. The candidates for these races had been offered broadcast time for appearances. The FCC refused to order the broadcasters to give Kay equal time. The Federal Court upheld the FCC. Kay v. FCC, 443 F.2d 638 (D.C. Cir.1970).

While agreeing that primary elections were covered under § 315, the court ruled that primary elections held by one party are to be considered separately from primary elections of other parties. Equal opportunity need only be afforded candidates for nomination "for the same office in the same party's primary." Section 315 provides for equal opportunities only when candidates are competing against each other. Appearance on the broadcast media, prior to the primary, of candidates of one party does not entitle candidates of another party equal time. Candidates in primary elections are running solely against other candidates from their own party and not against candidates from other parties.

2. The Kay case obviously presents some serious obstacles to the candidate of the minority party. Where a candidate, as was the case in Kay, is unopposed in his party's primary, the equal time rule provides no assistance. In short, major party candidates in contested primaries may gain great broadcast impact in terms of coverage and publicity before the equal time rule can be invoked. The Kay interpretation with respect to the application of the equal time rule to noncontested primaries is therefore particularly damaging to third party candidates who are necessarily dependent on media exposure if they are to popularize and legitimize their parties and candidacies.

Does the Kay ruling open the door for potential abuse by broadcasters? The court of appeals answered this question by declaring its acceptance of the FCC's response to the issue:

The commission brief said: Were a station to afford extensive time to candidates in one primary race and give little or no coverage of other races involving ultimately the same office, or having given extensive coverage to one party's primary race, a station did not cover the general election campaign involving the same race, a serious question would arise under the fairness doctrine as to the licensee's performance as a public trustee. See Office of Communication, Church of Christ v. FCC, 359 F.2d 994 (D.C.Cir. 1966).

Note that if Richard Kay had had an opponent in the American Independent party primary, his opponent would have had rights to equal time if Kay had been given the broadcast time he requested. The FCC recognized that primary elections were covered by § 315 when it stated that "both primary elections, nominating conventions and general elections are comprehended within the terms of Section 315."

"Equal Time" and Presidential Elections

1. The famous John F. Kennedy-Richard M. Nixon television debates of 1960, which many think led to the election of John F. Kennedy, were made possible by an amendment to § 315 which suspended the operation of § 315 during the presidential campaign of 1960. 74 Stat. 554 (1960). Why wouldn't the debate have been possible otherwise? Suppose the presidential candidate of the Vegetarian or the Prohibition party had asked for "equal time" after the Kennedy-Nixon debate and that § 315 was in effect, would the broadcasters have had to provide time?

There is apparent broadcaster willingness to give time to major party candidates but no such willingness with regard to minority party candidates. See Friedenthal and Medalie, The Impact of Federal Regulation of Political Broadcasting: § 315 of the Communications Act, 72 Harv. L.Rev. 445 at 449 (1959). Is the way to deal with the problem a statute which simply repeals § 315 for the purpose of those political contests where the minority party candidates have no real popular support and no chance of victory? Does such a technique assure permanent minority status to minority parties?

2. Notice that § 315 excludes from the "equal time" obligation candidates who appear on bona fide newscasts, news interviews, news documentaries, and on-the-spot coverage of bona fide news events. What is the reason for this exclusion? Do you think such an exclusion is to the advantage of dissent and debate? Does it benefit or hinder third-party candidates?

3. In the 1976 presidential election the equal time question, inevitable in presidential elections, arose once again: Could the television networks carry a live television debate between the candidates for the two major parties, Gerald Ford and Jimmy Carter, without incurring obligations to give "equal time" to third party candidates?

On September 30, 1975, in response to petitions filed by CBS and the Aspen Institute, the FCC held, overruling past decisions,<sup>3</sup> that the exemption in § 315(a)(4) for "on-the-spot coverage of bona fide news events" would free from "equal time" obligations broadcast coverage of debates between candidates sponsored by nonbroadcast entities, i.e., nonstudio debates.<sup>4</sup> In re Aspen Institute and CBS, Inc., 55 FCC2d 697 (1975).

3. See The Goodwill Industries Station, Inc., 40 FCC 362 (1962) and National Broadcasting Co. (Wyckoff), 40 FCC 370 (1962).

4. In Petitions of CBS and Aspen Institute, the FCC also held that presidential press conferences and press conferences of other candidates for political office which are broadcast "live" and in their entirety would qualify for exemption under § 315(a)(4).

The FCC said that its decisions in the overruled cases were based on an incorrect reading of the legislative history of newscast exemptions. Language in a 1959 House Report had suggested that for a candidate's appearance on the broadcast media to be exempt, it would have to be "incidental to" the main coverage of a news event. By definition, a debate could never qualify for exemption. The appearance of the candidates is the central focus of the event.

However, the FCC stated that the "incidental to" language was removed by congressional conference before the amendment to the Communications Act was passed in 1959. Thus, the FCC's former conclusion that a candidate's appearance must be incidental to be exempt was on re-examination held to be unsupported by legislative history. The FCC said that Congress did not intend the FCC "to take an unduly restrictive approach which would discourage news coverage of political activities of candidates." Accordingly, a program which is otherwise exempt does not lose that status because the appearance of a political candidate is central to the presentation. The FCC stressed that the broadcaster has reasonable latitude in making the initial determination of whether an event will be eligible for exemption under § 315. The FCC can overturn the licensee's determination if it was not reasonable or made in good faith.

Shortly after the Aspen decision, plans for a debate between Jimmy Carter and Gerald Ford, sponsored by the League of Women Voters, exclusive of any initiation or control by any broadcast media, was announced. The Aspen decision had done its work. A televised debate limited to the candidates of the two major parties had become a reality. Although there were numerous additional legally qualified candidates for president, none was invited by the league to take part in the debates. Broadcast networks ABC, CBS, and NBC were then invited by the league to air "live" each of the three scheduled debates before an invited audience. The panelists assigned to question the candidates were to be selected by the league and not by the broadcasters. Broadcasters would not be permitted to show the audience or its reaction.

4. When the networks agreed to air the debates on the basis of Aspen, the National Organization for Women ("NOW") and Representative Shirley Chisholm, a legally qualified candidate for president, challenged the FCC ruling and the legality of the planned debates. In Chisholm v. FCC, 538 F.2d 349 (D.C.Cir.1976), the court affirmed the FCC rulings in Aspen.

In Chisholm, the court upheld the FCC's new interpretation of the equal time rules. The court stressed the necessity for judicial deference to agency interpretation where Congress has assigned the responsibility for dealing with specific situations to the agency. Moreover, an agency could change its mind about the meaning of a statute no matter how long-standing its prior interpretation. As a result of Chisholm, therefore, debates between qualified political candidates, which were initiated by nonbroadcast entities, would be exempt under § 315(a)(4) provided that they

---

In so ruling, the FCC overruled Columbia Broadcasting Systems, Inc., 40 FCC 395 (1964), where the FCC refused to exempt presidential news conferences as "bona fide" news events under § 315(a)(4).

In extending the § 315(a)(4) exemption, the FCC used the same test that it used in determining the status of debates: a program which is otherwise exempt does not lose its status because the central focus is on the candidate. Under this analysis, press conferences do not lose their exemption because the candidate is the main figure of the program.

Although it applied § 315(a)(4) to news conferences, the FCC rejected CBS's contention that a press conference constitutes a "bona fide news interview" under § 315(a)(2). A news interview under § 315(a)(2) must be a regularly scheduled program, initiated by the licensee, with recurrent broadcasts, rather than a program which covers an event initiated by the candidate.

were covered "live" and that there was no evidence of broadcast favoritism. Once these requirements were met, the essential factor was that the decision to cover the debate was based on the good faith determination of the broadcast licensee that the debate was a "bona fide news event" worthy of broadcast coverage.

5. How does one explain the fact that Congress in 1960 had to change the law to permit what in 1976 was found to be permissible anyway, i.e., permitting broadcasters to televise a debate limited to the presidential candidates of the two major parties without incurring any equal time obligations? The court of appeals answered this argument in Chisholm:

[T]he 1960 suspension of Section 315 is more properly viewed as an isolated experiment in total repeal of the equal time requirements for presidential and vice presidential candidates, and not as a recognition or limitation of the scope of the news coverage exemption.

6. The theory of the Aspen Institute ruling is that a political debate between presidential candidates can qualify for an exemption under § 315(4) if in the good faith exercise of broadcaster judgment an event can reasonably qualify as "on-the-spot-coverage" of a bona fide news event. The actual televised presidential debate between Carter and Ford arranged by the League of Women Voters was the product of long negotiations between the networks and the league, leading to restrictions on broadcaster judgment. In November 1983, the FCC ruled that network sponsored debates be exempt under § 315(a)(4). See Broadcasting, November 21, 1983. Does it strain the reference in § 315(a)(4) to "on-the-spot" coverage of a bona fide news event to call an event so contrived either "on-the-spot" coverage or a bona fide news event?

Interpreting the Exemption in § 315(a) after Chisholm

KENNEDY FOR PRESIDENT COMMITTEE v. FCC

6 MED.L.RPTR. 1722, 636 F.2D 432 (D.C.CIR.1980).

ROBINSON, Circuit Judge: This controversy arose when, on February 13, 1980, President Carter held a press conference carried live in prime time by the four major American television networks. On the day following, petitioner Kennedy for President Committee complained to the networks that the President had taken advantage of the occasion for purposes of his candidacy for the 1980 presidential nomination of the Democratic party. Petitioner asked for "an equal opportunity" for its candidate, Senator Edward M. Kennedy, "to respond to * * * calculated and damaging statements" allegedly made by the President "and to provide contrasting viewpoints * * * ." Each of the networks responded negatively, whereupon petitioner turned to the Federal Communications Commission for assistance. On March 7, that agency's Broadcast Bureau denied petitioner's request, and on May 6, by the order now under review, the commission sustained the Bureau's ruling.

Petitioner challenges the commission's decision on several grounds. Foremost are contentions that the commission abdicated a duty to apply the equal-opportunity mandate of Section 315(a) of the Communications Act of 1934, and ignored an independent responsibility to accord First Amendment considerations their just due. The commission, on the other hand, insists that its action kept faith with principles of Section 315(a) interpretation formulated in its Aspen decision and approved by this court, and that its disposition furthered the common objective of Section 315(a) and the First Amendment by encouraging maximal coverage of events envisioned by the networks as newsworthy. We agree with the commission and affirm.

The press conference precipitating this litigation transpired on the eve of the 1980 presidential primary in New Hampshire. Petitioner charges that the conference was staged as an integral part of President Carter's so-called "Rose Garden" campaign strategy. During the course of the telecast, the President was asked four questions regarding his candidacy for the Democratic presidential nomination and that of Senator Kennedy, his principal rival. In its protest to the networks, petitioner predicated its equal-opportunity demand on allegedly "distorted and inaccurate statements" by the President in response to queries "about Senator Kennedy's views on a number of issues." In turning petitioner down, each network maintained that the telecast of the conference was free of Section 315(a)'s equal-opportunity obligation because it was an activity within that section's Exemption 4 for "[o]n-the-spot coverage of bona fide news events."

Petitioner then urged the commission "to rule that President Carter's News Conference of February 13 constituted a 'use' of television facilities offered by the major networks and to direct the networks to afford equal time<sup>14</sup> to Senator Kennedy * * *." Petitioner claimed that the President had "devoted more than five minutes * * * to a direct attack upon Senator Kennedy," with the consequence that "millions of viewers were misinformed about Senator Kennedy's views on national and international issues critical to voters in the campaign for the presidential nomination."

The commission's Broadcast Bureau denied petitioner's request, primarily in reliance upon the commission's Aspen decision, affirmed by this court in Chisholm v.

FCC. The bureau concluded that the telecast fell within Aspen's holding that press conferences featuring political candidates are exempt from Section 315(a)'s equal-opportunity requirement as "on-the-spot coverage of bona fide news events." The bureau felt that under Aspen the regulatory role in equal-opportunity proceedings is confined to determining "whether or not the broadcaster intends to promote the interest of a particular candidate in presenting coverage of a news event." Noting that petitioner had presented no evidence that the networks were not exercising good faith journalistic judgment in appraising the president's press conference as newsworthy, and detecting no indication of a purpose to favor the president's candidacy over the senator's by televising the event, the bureau rejected petitioner's plea for an order providing an opportunity to respond. The bureau acknowledged that an incumbent president "may well have an advantage over his opponent in attracting media coverage," but declared that "absent strong evidence that broadcasters were not exercising their bona fide news judgment, the commission will not interfere with such judgments." "Senator Kennedy was free," the bureau observed, "to hold a press conference the next day or evening to rebut the President's charges."

Four weeks later, on April 2, petitioner sought reexamination of the Bureau's ruling by the commission. On May 6, the commission denied petitioner's application for review. Since we later draw directly and heavily on the commission's opinion, it suffices for now merely to say that es-

14. The phrases "equal time" and "equal opportunity" are often used interchangeably. The latter is employed in the statute, see 47 U.S.C. § 315(a) (1976), and is the more accurate of the two. A broadcaster's obligations under § 315(a) extend beyond an equal amount of time for the use of rival candidates to such things as availability of the responsive broadcast, be made available at an equal rate, and a comparable hour of the day. See The Law of Political Broadcasting and Cablecasting, 69 FCC2d 2209, 2216, 2260-2262 (1978). Though, literally, § 315(a) makes its exaction only for use of a "broadcasting station," the commission has long held that a candidate may demand equal opportunities from a network presenting his opponent instead of looking to each individual station. Senator Eugene J. McCarthy, 11 FCC2d 511 n. 1 (1968). See also CBS v. FCC, [5 Med.L.Rptr. 2649 at 4649] 629 F.2d 1 (1980) (D.C.Cir.1980) (construing 47 U.S.C. § 312(a)(7)(1976)).

essentially the commission tracked the bureau's reasoning, and ultimately adhered pivotally to its Aspen holding that "so long as a covered event is considered newsworthy in the good faith judgment of the broadcaster," it is encompassed by one or more of Section 315(a)'s exemptions from the duty to afford equal opportunity. It is the commission's ensuing order that petitioner now brings before us.

Petitioner challenges the commission's decision on the basis of its construction and application of Section 315(a) and on grounds attributed to the First Amendment. Within these broad categories, petitioner argues that there were factual and analytical flaws in the commission's handling of constitutional, statutory and policy aspects of the controversy. We turn first to an examination of Section 315(a) and the commission's treatment of the statutory issues. We then address the First Amendment questions raised by petitioner.

THE SECTION 315(a) CLAIM

A. General Considerations

* * *

"Equal opportunities" is manifestly a comprehensive term, and the commission has given it rather full sway. Four types of programming, however, are statutorily deemed nonuses of a broadcasting station, and thus are exempted from this requirement. One—embraced by Exemption 4—immunizes the "[a]pppearance by a legally qualified candidate on any * * * on-the-spot coverage of bona fide news events (including but not limited to political conventions and activities incidental thereto)." This provision, in the commission's view, relieved the networks of any equal-opportunity obligation consequent upon the telecasts of the president's February 13 press conference.

The question, then, is whether the commission properly extended Exemption 4 to that conference, and in answering we do not write on a completely clean slate. * *

* * *

Aspen marked the commission's recognition that its original understanding—that candidates' press conferences were "uses" of station facilities enabling their opponents to demand broadcast privileges for their own purposes—was not congenial with the underlying purpose of the 1959 amendments. That construction, the commission admitted, had caused an "undue stifling of broadcast coverage of news events involving candidates for public office." Accordingly, the commission adopted the stance it deemed more in keeping with the legislative aims: that broadcasts of press conferences featuring candidates for political office qualified under Exemption 4 as "on-the-spot coverage of bona fide news events."

We upheld the commission's new determination in Chisholm. * * * Moreover, we found credible the commission's declaration in Aspen that "any appearance by a candidate on the broadcast media is designed, to the best of the candidate's ability, to serve his own political ends." We thus held that the commission acted reasonably in rejecting "the degree of control by the candidate, or the degree to which candidates tailor such events to serve their own political advantages," as a criterion for ascertaining whether the equal-opportunity provision of Section 315(a) had been triggered.

Having so concluded, we faced in Chisholm the further question whether the broadcaster's good faith judgment on newsworthiness—the element deemed crucial by the commission—provided an acceptable measure of applicability of Section 315(a)'s exemptions. At the outset, we noted that this standard came directly from the legislative history of Section 315(a): the chairman of the House Committee had explained during debate that "[i]t sets up a test which appropriately leaves reasonable latitude for the exercise of good faith news judgment on the part of broadcasters and networks * * * "

Although we did not find sufficient authority either in the reports or the debates to substantiate the proposition that Congress intended this to be the sole factor the commission could utilize in its calculus, we were satisfied that Congress wished to increase broadcaster discretion as a means of maximizing coverage of campaign activity. Through an examination of other passages in the reports and debates on the 1959 amendments, we learned that Congress had expressed a willingness to grant the commission considerable leeway in interpreting the exemptions and to accept some risks with respect to the equal-opportunity philosophy in order to achieve more complete broadcast coverage of newsworthy events. Accordingly, we upheld the commission's revised approach.

B. THE COMMISSION'S ANALYSIS AND APPLICATION OF SECTION

Petitioner raises four principal objections to the commission's handling of the statutory issues generated by this litigation. These include its use of Aspen and Chisholm as controlling precedents, the deference accorded broadcaster discretion, the burden placed on petitioners to demonstrate the absence of good faith on the part of the networks, and the commission's refusal to consider post hoc "corrective" action.<sup>61</sup> These we now examine in turn.

1. APPLICATION OF ASPEN AND CHISHOLM AS PRECEDENTS

The first contention advanced by petitioner is that the commission "woodenly applied" Aspen by improperly treating it as establishing a per se rule. Certainly we did not in Chisholm approve a per se exemption of press conferences from the equal-opportunity requirement of Section 315(a), nor do we think the commission attempted to apply Aspen in that manner here.

In Chisholm, we upheld the commission's specification of three criteria to govern the decision on whether a candidate's press conference is exempt from the equal-opportunity provision. They are (1) whether the conference is broadcast live, (2) whether it is based upon the good faith determination of the broadcaster that it is a bona fide news event, and (3) whether there is evidence of broadcaster favoritism. It is clear enough that the commission examined the president's February 13 press conference in each of these respects, and not in the least are we moved to impugn the conclusions the commission reached.

There is no suggestion that in any instance the press conference was not broadcast live, nor even so much as a whisper of network bias in favor of the president. Both the Broadcast Bureau and the commission thus correctly perceived the only issue to be whether the networks independently had exercised good faith journalistic judgment in concluding that the event was newsworthy. We move to an examination of the accuracy of the commission's analysis of this question, and to the objections raised thereto by petitioner.

2. GOOD FAITH DETERMINATION OF A BONA FIDE NEWS EVENT

Petitioner contends that the commission effectively delegated to the networks its responsibility to determine whether a particular appearance of a candidate is a "use" entitling opponents to equal opportunities. This, petitioner says, the commission did by attaching too great a weight to the broadcasters' good faith judgment of newsworthiness. The flaw in this argument is that, as we have noted, this criterion proceeds directly from the legislative history of Section 315(a). In Chisholm, we found congressional intent to expand the role of broadcasters under Section 315(a) and to place considerable reliance on the exercise of their journalistic discretion in order to insure attainment of goals viewed as even more important than equal responsive opportunities.

61. In sum, no balancing of § 312(a)(7) factors is required under § 315(a). Rather, as we held in Chisholm, 176 U.S.App.D.C. at 3, 538 F.2d at 351, and again in United Church of Christ v. FCC, 191 U.S.App.D.C. at 362-363, 590 F.2d at 1064-1065, if no evidence is brought forth to indicate that the broadcaster has exhibited favoritism toward a particular candidate or candidates at the expense of rivals, the commission need look only to the conditions of the broadcast and whether the broadcaster made a good faith estimate that the event was newsworthy before airing it.

It would be pointless to restate the analysis carefully expounded in Chisholm. It is enough to say that in applying the challenged criterion the commission pursued the course approved by this court as consistent with the legislative history and objectives. Thus we cannot agree with petitioner that the commission here engaged in an unauthorized delegation of its statutory functions merely by following Aspen and Chisholm as the guiding precedents. On the contrary, the commission quite properly honored Chisholm's teaching that "absent evidence of broadcaster intent to advance a particular candidacy, the judgment of the newsworthiness of an event is left to the reasonable news judgment of professionals."

3. THE BURDEN OF ESTABLISHING A PRIMA FACIE CASE OF ABSENCE OF GOOD FAITH

Nor do we believe the commission acted improperly in requiring a candidate seeking an order affording equal opportunities to come forward with evidence that the broadcaster involved did not exercise a bona fide judgment on newsworthiness in covering an appearance by his opponent.

Petitioner has never even alleged that any of the networks failed to make or abide a good faith estimate of newsworthiness. Petitioner thus is hardly in position to complain that the evidentiary burden defined by the commission erects an impermissible barrier to complainants attempting to assert rights under Section 315(a). * * * Requiring a complainant to substantiate his allegations at the outset effectuates this congressional purpose by promoting fearless exercise of the discretion Congress intended broadcasters to have.<sup>72</sup>

Petitioner's apparent inability to satisfy the commission's threshold burden—allegation and corroboration of either bad faith or nonexercise of judgment on newsworthiness by the networks—does not demonstrate that the standard on this score is improvident. On the contrary, it seems evident that one having a legitimate claim in this regard will ordinarily be able to point to something tending to support it. And we do not doubt that when a prima facie showing is made the commission, as it has stated, will inquire into the honesty and reasonableness of a broadcaster's professed news judgment.

4. CORRECTIVE ACTION

Finally, on statutory grounds, petitioner urges that the actual content of a candidate's press-conference broadcast should determine whether the equal-opportunity obligation of Section 315(a) is activated. This contention is linked with the further argument that the commission erroneously failed to consider post hoc whether remedial action should be taken to mitigate damage allegedly wrought. It seems much too late to raise these objections, for petitioner never placed a transcript or other recording of the press conference before the commission. In any event, we are convinced that one of the main purposes of Section 315(a) would be frustrated by requiring the commission to make subjective judgments on the political content of a broadcast program.

72. In its brief the commission points out: While the [agency's] order * * * did not address the types of situations where the reasonableness of a broadcaster's judgment might require further scrutiny, several suggest themselves. For example, if the broadcaster has reason to believe in advance that the press conference questions were going to be "rigged" or that the candidate were going to give his routine stump speech and not accept questions, then the broadcaster's treatment of the press conference as a bona fide news event might be called into question. A pre-existing family or business connection between the candidate and the broadcaster might also warrant closer scrutiny of the broadcaster's judgment.

As we have previously observed, a major goal of the 1959 amendments to Section 315(a) was preservation of broadcasters' journalistic judgment on news programming. Congress then decided that when broadcasters are allowed to exercise good faith discretion in evaluating the newsworthiness of candidates' appearances on the four exempted types of broadcast programs, the benefits to the public outweigh the detriments to either the public or the candidates. We think the commission steers the right course in declining to undertake assessments on the political or nonpolitical nature of a candidate's appearance, even assuming that there really is much of a difference. As the commission aptly stated, "to draw such distinctions would require [it] to make subjective judgments concerning content, context and potential political impact of a candidate's appearance," and "[n]either Congress nor the commission desires to expand governmental oversight of broadcasters' professional journalistic functions."

We find eminently reasonable, too, the commission's reading of Section 315(a) to require broadcasters to appraise newsworthiness prior to broadcast of the questioned event. Were the commission to hinge operation of the equal-opportunity provision on after-the-fact reexamination of the event broadcast, the purposes for which Congress enacted the Section 315(a) exemptions would largely be set for naught. Broadcasters could never be sure that coverage of any given event would not later result in equal-opportunity obligations to all other candidates; resultantly, broadcaster discretion to carry or not to carry would be seriously if not fatally crippled. * * *

We also deem irrelevant petitioner's assertion that the questioned press conference was "orchestrated as a partisan political event designed to gain maximum political advantage in the New Hampshire primary and subsequent elections—a fact recognized here and throughout the country if not at the commission." When we decided Chisholm, we fully explained the insignificance of the candidate's motivation in appearing on the broadcast program. We perceive no good reason to reiterate the discussion here.

We thus are unpersuaded by petitioner's statutory arguments. Together they travel several routes, but they all lead to the same destination. In a word, petitioner's objections to the commission's analysis of Section 315(a) do not warrant reversal of the order under review. We proceed, then, to the constitutional claim.

THE FIRST AMENDMENT CLAIM

Petitioner's First Amendment thesis is that "[p]rivate interests cannot be permitted to abridge the presentation and receipt of legitimate First Amendment expression on the basis of their own subjective values of 'bona fide' news judgment." Taken simply as a general proposition suitable for application in proper context, few if any expectably would disagree. What petitioner thus characterizes, however, is the commission's deference to the journalistic judgment of broadcasters on newsworthiness of statutorily-exempted events involving candidate appearances, absent some indicium of bad faith or favoritism on the broadcaster's part. In our view, petitioner's legal premise does not fit the situation this case summons us to examine.

* * *

We believe petitioner looks at the First Amendment aspect of this litigation from the wrong standpoint, for in the area of broadcasting the interest of the public is the chief concern. "It is the right of the viewers and listeners, not the right of the broadcasters, which is paramount * * *. It is the right of the public to receive suitable access to social, political, esthetic, moral and other ideas and experiences which is crucial here." From its inception more than a half-century ago, federal regulation of broadcasting has largely entrusted protection of that public right to short-term station licensees functioning under commission supervision, and with liberty as well as responsibility to determine who may get on the air and when. The history of this era portrays Congress' consistent refusal to mandate access to the air waves on a non-selective basis and, contrariwise, its decision "to permit private broadcasting to develop with the widest journalistic experience consistent with its public obligations." The commission has honored that policy in a series of rulings establishing that a private right to utilize the broadcaster's facilities exists only when specially conferred. The net of these many years of legislative and administrative oversight of broadcasting is that "[o]nly when the interests of the public are found to outweigh the private journalistic interests of the broadcasters will government power be asserted within the framework of the act."

While Section 315(a) generally exacts for a candidate's use of broadcast facilities an equal opportunity to his opponents, Congress specifically exempted coverage of a number of arguably "political" news events in the belief that an overly-broad statutory right of access would diminish rather than augment the flow of information to the American public. The real question, then, is whether this legislative scheme transgresses the First Amendment interests of a candidate demanding an opportunity to respond to another candidate's statements on an excepted occasion. We think the answer is evident. As the commission states, "Congress has chosen to enforce the public's primary right in having 'the medium function consistently with the ends and purposes of the First Amendment' by relying on broadcasters as public trustees, periodically accountable for their stewardship, to use their discretion in insuring the public's access to conflicting ideas." More importantly, the Supreme Court has emphasized that no "individual member of the public [has a right] to broadcast his own particular views on any matter," rejecting the "view that every potential speaker is 'the best judge' of what the public ought to hear or indeed the best judge of the merits of his or her views."

* * *

Thus we find no merit in petitioner's First Amendment contention. With the absence also of any valid statutory objection, the order under review is

Affirmed

---

COMMENT

1. Kennedy v. FCC illustrates some of the ambiguities that are present when broadcasters have to make decisions about whether the exemptions of § 315(a) apply. In Kennedy, three lines of inquiry were set forth for determining when a press conference was a "bona fide news event" and, therefore, exempt:

- a. whether the conference is live;
- b. whether it is based upon the good faith determination of a broadcaster that the event broadcast is a bona fide news event;
- c. whether there is evidence of broadcaster favoritism.

With respect to item b above, the Kennedy for President Committee thought the FCC's approach to exemption decisions constituted an improper delegation to the networks of the question as to whether a particular appearance was a "use" entitling opponents to equal opportunities. Do you agree?

How does a complainant meet the burden of establishing a prima facie case of absence of good faith? Note that footnote 72 of the court's opinion points out that the FCC brief gave an example of something that might indicate lack of good faith. The example used was the situation where the broadcaster had cause to believe that press conference questions were "going to be 'rigged' or that the candidate was going to give his routine stump speech and not accept questions." It was also suggested by the commission that lack of good faith might exist where there was a "pre-existing family or business connection between the candidate and the broadcaster."

2. What is the basis for the requirement that broadcasters should appraise newsworthiness prior to the broadcast of the questioned event? The court suggests that if the requirement were otherwise, broadcasters would not be able to forecast in advance whether a particular broadcast would trigger equal opportunities obligations. Why should broadcasters be able to forecast in advance? Perhaps the answer is that the requirement to forecast in advance serves to encourage broadcast of newsworthy events. If the rule were otherwise, a political opponent might have some basis for arguing that some part of a candidate's broadcast appearance had political content. In order to avoid the claims for equal opportunities which such retrospective analyses would produce, broadcasters might decide not to carry the events at all. The FCC takes the position that it should not assess the political or nonpolitical nature of a candidate's appearance. From a First Amendment point of view, this is sound, isn't it? Also, from the point of view of the media recognition factor, it is certainly arguable that all appearances by well-known political personalities are, in fact, political.

A Case for Private Actions Under § 315(a)?

Does a gubernatorial candidate who is denied the use of broadcast facilities in violation of § 315(a) have a basis for a private action against the broadcaster? In Belluso v. Turner Communications Corp., 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2357, 633 F.2d 393 (5th Cir. 1980), this question was answered in the negative. The pervasive nature of broadcast regulation was deemed to indicate that "Congress intended the administrative (FCC) remedy to be exclusive."

Belluso, a Georgia gubernatorial candidate who planned to use hypnotic techniques in his political commercial, contended that because of the short span between the time when a person becomes a qualified candidate and the actual time of the election, FCC intervention is insufficient to accomplish the purpose of § 315(a). The court declined to provide a private remedy where Congress had chosen not to do so.

Some First Amendment contentions were also raised in Belluso. It was held that the decision not to air Belluso's political commercial did not constitute governmental action under the First Amendment. Furthermore, even if the action of the station were viewed as governmental action for purposes of the First Amendment, it was held that there was no First Amendment right of access to the broadcast media. The court relied for its conclusion on the First Amendment issue on Kuzco v. Western Connecticut Broadcasting Co., 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1209, 566 F.2d 384 (2d Cir. 1977).

In Kuzco, a radio station had censored the material of two candidates who had been granted time pursuant to the equal time rule. The FCC found that the station had violated § 315(a). The candidates then brought a private action for damages against the station for violation of their First Amendment rights. Kuzco held that the station's action did not violate the First Amendment since the conduct of the radio station should be viewed as private rather than governmental action. In short, Kuzco held that the state action which is necessary to make the First Amendment operative was lacking.

Belluso also relied on CBS v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. 94 (1973) and Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974). In Belluso, plaintiff argued that "although a broadcaster argued in an area in which journalistic discretion may be exercised in engaging in private conduct, when he is acting in an area in which he has no discretion, his action becomes governmental action."

The argument boils down to this: The broadcaster has to accept advertising for one candidate if he accepts any such advertising. The broadcaster cannot censor any material broadcast under § 315(a). Therefore, Belluso argued, a "decision not to air a particular message in violation of Section 315(a) must be considered governmental action for purposes of a First Amendment challenge."

The Court rejected this argument: "Once it is determined that a broadcaster acts as a private person subject to government regulations, his actions cannot be imputed to the government unless they are in some way approved or sanctioned by the government." Is an argument available that the Supreme Court decision in CBS v. FCC, text, p. 815, should change the result in Belluso on the First Amendment issues? What is it?

The Meaning of § 315(b)

1. The FCC dealt with § 315(b) (see text, p. 800), in Martin-Trigona, 40 R.R.2d 1189 (1977). Station WBBM-TV refused to sell one hour or one-half hour blocks of prime time programming to Anthony Martin-Trigona, a legally qualified candidate for the Democratic nomination for mayor of Chicago. The station offered Martin-Trigona five minute non-prime time segments and spot announcements during prime time.

The most important question raised by the controversy was the following: Does § 315(b) exclusively concern the allowable rates that a broadcaster may charge a political candidate or does it have some bearing on the segments of broadcast time that the political candidate can claim?

In support of his position that § 315(b) gave him a right to buy particular segments of broadcast time, Martin-Trigona argued "a candidate cannot make an intelligent statement of his stand on an issue" in a spot announcement. The complaint in this regard was that broadcaster policy invalidly discriminated between those candidates who wished to use "spots" for their campaigning and those who wished to use larger blocks of time.

Martin-Trigona argued that the lowest "rate per unit of audience reached" occurs in prime time and under § 315(b) the station is obligated to offer the lowest unit charge. This theory led Martin-Trigona to the assertion that § 315(b) not only required a candidate to be on par with the station's most favored advertiser as to rates, but also as to times available. Under this rationale, if the broadcaster sold five-minute time segments to advertisers, he must also make identical time segments available for sale to political candidates.

The FCC pointed out that the licensee had not entirely denied access to a legally qualified candidate. Martin-Trigona's complaint was that he had not been given the specific amount of broadcast time that he desired. The FCC ruled that § 315(b) did not require a broadcaster to sell a political candidate specific time segments such as the half-hour blocks sought by mayoral candidate Martin-Trigona. Section 315, according to FCC rationale, deals only with allowable rates. It simply states that a broadcaster must charge a political candidate the lowest rate that it would charge to any advertiser during the same time period.

The Martin-Trigona ruling narrows the effective access of political candidates to the broadcast media by removing any affirmative duty from the broadcaster to provide more than a short "spot" for candidates during prime time.

2. In connection with the problem of being able to buy segments of time of sufficient length to be able to present adequately one's candidacy, consider the following language which was inserted in the Federal Communications Act by a 1972 amendment. The new statutory language enables the FCC to revoke any station license or construction permit "for willful or repeated failure to allow reasonable access to or to permit purchase of reasonable amounts of time for the use of a broadcasting station by a legally qualified candidate for Federal elective office on behalf of his candidacy." See 47 U.S.C.A. § 312(a)(7). See text, p. 815.

Does 47 U.S.C.A. § 312(a) offer any aid to Martin-Trigona? No, because Martin-Trigona was running for mayor of Chicago and § 312(a) applies only to candidates running for federal office. If the facts were otherwise and Martin-Trigona had been running for federal office such as, say, the United States Senate from Illinois, would § 312(a) be of any assistance? See text, p. 815.

"Equal Time" and Nonpolitical Broadcasts

1. In Adrian Weiss, 58 FCC2d 342 (1976), the applicability of the equal time doctrine to nonpolitical broadcasts was tested during the 1976 presidential campaign when a broadcast station in California sought a ruling prior to airing old movies starring Ronald Reagan, a legally qualified candidate in the New Hampshire presidential preferential primary. The FCC remarked that attempting to distinguish between political and nonpolitical use of broadcast facilities by candidates would require highly subjective judgments concerning content and would potentially enlarge government interference with broadcasting operations. Therefore the FCC declined to distinguish between political and nonpolitical appearances and ruled that "the broadcast of movies in which Ronald Reagan appears would be 'use' under Section 315 (Equal Time Doctrine) and would entitle opposing candidates to equal opportunities in the use of the broadcasting station."

2. At the time of the Weiss decision, Ronald Reagan was no longer engaged in an acting career. But what of an actor who is still performing on television and who is also campaigning for office? Should such an actor be successful in urging that his nonpolitical appearances should not impose "equal opportunities obligations upon broadcast licensees"? In Paulsen v. FCC, 491 F.2d 887 (9th Cir. 1974), the FCC responded in the negative to this question, and the federal court affirmed. The court explained:

Paulsen's proposed distinction between political and non-political use would, the FCC contends, require it to make highly subjective judgments concerning the content, context, and potential political impact of a candidate's appearance. We agree.

"Equal Time" and the Broadcaster's Obligation

It should be emphasized that the statute, § 315, forbids the station to censor the material broadcast under the provisions of this section. The issue of whether the station licensee will be granted immunity from liability for defamation, since he has no control over the content of the § 315 political broadcast, is dealt with in Chapter II in a discussion of Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union of America,

North Dakota Division v. WDAY, 360 U.S. 525 (1959). See text, p. 274.

The inability of the station licensee to censor the political broadcast is sometimes defended on the ground that the licensee is not required to provide broadcast time to political candidates. It is only when time is extended to one candidate that the "equal time" rule is set in motion. If the station need not, according to the strict language of § 315, give anyone political broadcast time, would a lawyer be giving wise counsel if he advised his broadcaster clients simply to make no political broadcast time available at all? What does an examination of the following excerpt from the WDAY case contribute to the resolution of this question? (The facts and opinion of the WDAY case are set forth in the text, Chapter II, p. 275.)

---

FARMERS EDUCATION AND COOPERATIVE UNION OF AMERICA, NORTH DAKOTA
DIVISION v. WDAY, INC.

360 U.S. 525, 79 S.Ct. 1302,
3 L.Ed.2d 1407 (1959).

Justice BLACK delivered the opinion of the Court:

* * *

Petitioner nevertheless urges that broadcasters do not need a specific immunity to protect themselves from liability for defamation since they may either insure against any loss, or in the alternative, deny all political candidates use of station facilities. We have no means of knowing to what extent insurance is available to broadcasting stations, or what it would cost them. Moreover, since § 315 expressly prohibits stations from charging political candidates higher rates than they charge for comparable time used for other purposes, any cost of insurance would probably have to be absorbed by the stations themselves. Petitioner's reliance on the stations' freedom from obligation "to allow use of its station by any such candidate," seems equally misplaced. While denying all candidates use of stations would protect broadcasters from liability, it would also effectively withdraw political discussion from the air. Instead the thrust of § 315 is to facilitate political debate over radio and television. Recognizing this, the Communications Commission considers the carrying of political broadcasts a public service criterion to be considered both in license renewal proceedings, and in comparative contests for a radio or television construction permit. Certainly Congress knew the obvious—that if a licensee could protect himself from liability in no other way but by refusing to broadcast candidates' speeches, the necessary effect would be to hamper the congressional plan to develop broadcasting as a political outlet, rather than to foster it.

* * *

Affirmed.

---

§ 312(a)(7) AND THE
"REASONABLE ACCESS"
PROVISION: A LIMITED RIGHT OF ACCESS FOR FEDERAL POLITICAL CANDIDATES?

---

CBS, INC. v. FCC

7 MED.LRPTR. 1563, 453 U.S. 367, 101 S.Ct. 2813,
69 L.Ed.2d 706 (1981).

Chief Justice BURGER delivered the opinion of the Court.

We granted certiorari to consider whether the Federal Communications Commission properly construed 47 U.S.C. § 312(a)(7) and determined that petitioners failed to provide "reasonable access to * * the use of a broadcasting station" as required by the statute.

* * *

On October 11, 1979, Gerald M. Rafshoon, President of the Carter-Mondale Presidential Committee, requested each of the three major television networks to provide time for a 30-minute program between 8 p.m. and 10:30 p.m. on either the 4th, 5th, 6th, or 7th of December 1979. The committee intended to present, in conjunction with President Carter's formal announcement of his candidacy, a documentary outlining the record of his administration.

The networks declined to make the requested time available. Petitioner CBS emphasized the large number of candidates for the Republican and Democratic presidential nominations and the potential disruption of regular programming to accommodate requests for equal treatment, but it offered to sell two 5-minute segments to the committee, one at 10:55 p.m. on December 8 and one in the daytime. Petitioner ABC replied that it had not yet decided when it would begin selling political time for the 1980 Presidential campaign, but subsequently indicated that it would allow such sales in January 1980. Petitioner NBC, noting the number of potential requests for time from presidential candidates, stated that it was not prepared to sell time for political programs as early as December 1979.

On October 29, 1979, the Carter-Mondale Presidential Committee filed a complaint with the Federal Communications Commission, charging that the networks had violated their obligation to provide "reasonable access" under § 312(a)(7) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended. Title 47 U.S.C. § 312(a)(7) states:

The commission may revoke any station license or construction permit * *

* * *

for willful or repeated failure to allow reasonable access to or to permit purchase of reasonable amounts of time for the use of a broadcasting station by a legally qualified candidate for federal elective office on behalf of his candidacy.

At an open meeting on November 20, 1979, the commission, by a 4-to-3 vote, ruled that the networks had violated § 312(a)(7). In its Memorandum Opinion and Order, the commission concluded that the networks' reasons for refusing to sell the time requested were "deficient" under its standards of reasonableness, and directed the networks to indicate by November 26, 1979, how they intended to fulfill their statutory obligations. 74 FCC2d 631.

Petitioners sought reconsideration of the FCC's decision. The reconsideration petitioners were denied by the same 4-to-3 vote, and, on November 28, 1979, the commission issued a second Memorandum Opinion and Order clarifying its previous decision. It rejected petitioners' arguments that § 312(a)(7) was not intended to create a new right of access to the broadcast media and that the commission had improperly substituted its judgment for that of the networks in evaluating the Carter-Mondale Presidential Committee's request for time. November 29, 1979, was set as the date for the networks to file their plans for compliance with the statute. 74 FCC2d 657.

The networks, pursuant to 47 U.S.C. § 402, then petitioned for review of the commission's orders in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. The court allowed the Committee and the National Association of Broadcasters to intervene, and granted a stay of the Commission's orders pending review.

Following the seizure of American Embassy personnel in Iran, the Carter-Mondale Presidential Committee decided to postpone to early January 1980 the 30-minute program it had planned to broadcast during the period of December 4-7, 1979. However, believing that some time was needed in conjunction with the president's announcement of his candidacy, the committee sought and subsequently obtained from CBS the purchase of five minutes of time on December 4. In addition, the committee sought and obtained from ABC and NBC offers of time for a 30-minute program in January, and the ABC offer eventually was accepted. Throughout these negotiations, the committee and the networks reserved all rights relating to the appeal.

The court of appeals affirmed the commission's orders, 629 F.2d 1 (1980), holding that the statute created a new, affirmative right of access to the broadcast media for individual candidates for federal elective office. As to the implementation of § 312(a)(7), the court concluded that the commission has the authority to independently evaluate whether a campaign has begun for purposes of the statute, and approved the commission's insistence that "broadcasters consider and address all nonfrivolous matters in responding to a candidate's request for time." For example, a broadcaster must weigh such factors as: "(a) the individual needs of the candidate (as expressed by the candidate); (b) the amount of time previously provided to the candidate; (c) potential disruption of regular programming; (d) the number of other candidates likely to invoke equal opportunity rights if the broadcaster grants the request before him; and, (e) the timing of the request." And in reviewing a broadcaster's decision, the commission will confine itself to two questions: "(1) has the broadcaster adverted to the proper standards in deciding whether to grant a request for access, and (2) is the broadcaster's explanation for his decision reasonable in terms of those standards?"

Applying these principles, the court of appeals sustained the commission's determination that the presidential campaign had begun by November 1979, and, accordingly, the obligations imposed by § 312(a)(7) had attached. Further, the court decided that "the record * * * adequately supports the commission's conclusion that the networks failed to apply the proper standards." In particular, the "across-the-board" policies of all three networks failed to address the specific needs asserted by the Carter-Mondale Presidential Committee. From this the court concluded that the commission was correct in holding that the networks had violated the statute's "reasonable access" requirement.

Finally, the court of appeals rejected petitioners' First Amendment challenge to § 312(a)(7) as applied, reasoning that the statute as construed by the commission "is a constitutionally acceptable accommodation between, on the one hand, the public's right to be informed about elections and the right of candidates to speak and, on the other hand, the editorial rights of broadcasters." In a concurring opinion adopted by the majority, Judge Tamm expressed the view that § 312(a)(7) is saved from constitutional infirmity "as long as the [commission] * * * maintains a very limited 'overseer' role consistent with its obligation of careful neutrality * * *."

We consider first the scope of § 312(a)(7). Petitioners CBS and NBC contend that the statute did not impose any additional obligations on broadcasters, but merely codified prior policies developed by the Federal Communications Commission under the public interest standard. The commission, however, argues that § 312(a)(7) created an affirmative, promptly enforceable right of reasonable access to the use of broadcast stations for individual candidates seeking federal elective office.

The Federal Election Campaign Act, of 1971, which Congress enacted in 1972, included as one of its four titles the Campaign Communications Reform Act (Title I). Title I contained the provision that was codified as 47 U.S.C. § 312(a)(7).

We have often observed that the starting point in every case involving statutory construction is "the language employed by Congress." Reiter v. Sonotone Corp., 442 U.S. 330, 337 * * * (1979). In unambiguous language, § 312(a)(7) authorizes the Commission to revoke a broadcaster's license. * * *

It is clear on the face of the statute that Congress did not prescribe merely a general duty to afford some measure of political programming, which the public interest obligation of broadcasters already provided for. Rather, § 312(a)(7) focuses on the individual "legally qualified candidate" seeking air time to advocate "his candidacy," and guarantees him "reasonable access" enforceable by specific governmental sanction. Further, the sanction may be imposed for "willful or repeated" failure to afford reasonable access. This suggests that, if a legally qualified candidate for federal office is denied a reasonable amount of broadcast time, license revocation may follow even a single instance of such denial so long as it is willful; where the denial is recurring, the penalty may be imposed in the absence of a showing of willfulness.

The command of § 312(a)(7) differs from the limited duty of broadcasters under the public interest standard. The practice preceding the adoption of § 312(a)(7) has been described by the commission as follows:

Prior to the enactment of the [statute], we recognized political broadcasting as one of the fourteen basic elements necessary to meet the public interest, needs and desires of the community. No legally qualified candidate had at that time a specific right of access to a broadcasting station. However, stations were required to make reasonable, good faith judgments about the importance and interest of particular races. Based upon those judgments, licensees were to "determine how much time should be made available for candidates in each race on either a paid or unpaid "basis." There was no requirement that such time be made available for specific "uses" of a broadcasting station to which Section 315 "equal opportunities would be applicable." [footnotes omitted.] Commission Policy in Enforcing Section 312(a)(7) of the Communications Act, 68 FCC2d 1079, 1087-1088 (1978) (1978 Report and Order).

Under the pre-1971 public interest requirement, compliance with which was necessary to assure license renewal, some time had to be given to political issues, but an individual candidate could claim no personal right of access unless his opponent used the station and no distinction was drawn between federal, state, and local elections. See Farmers Educational & Cooperative Union v. WDAY, Inc., 360 U.S. 525, 534 * * * (1959). By its terms, however, § 312(a)(7) singles out legally qualified candidates for federal elective office and grants them a special right of access on an individual basis, violation of which carries the serious consequence of license revocation. The conclusion is inescapable that the statute did more than simply codify the pre-existing public interest standard.

The legislative history confirms that § 312(a)(7) created a right of access that enlarged the political broadcasting responsibilities of licensees. When the subject of campaign reform was taken up by Congress in 1971, three bills were introduced in the Senate—S. 1, S. 382, and S. 956. All three measures, while differing in approach, were "intended to increase a candidate's accessibility to the media and to reduce the level of spending for its use." * * * The subsequent report of the Senate Commerce Committee stated that one of the primary purposes of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 was to "give candidates for public office greater access to the media so that they may better explain their stand on the issues, and thereby more fully and completely inform the voters." S.Rep. No. 92-96, 92d Cong., 1st Sess., 20 (1971) U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1972, pp. 1773, 1774 [Emphasis added]. The report contained neither an explicit interpretation of the provision that became § 312(a)(7) nor a discussion of its intended impact.

* * *

While acknowledging the "general" public interest requirement, the report treated it separately from the specific obligation prescribed by the proposed legislation.

As initially reported in the Senate, § 312(a)(7) applied broadly to "the use of a broadcasting station by a legally qualified candidate on behalf of his candidacy." The Conference Committee confined the provision to candidates seeking federal office. * * * During floor debate in the Conference Report in the House attention was called to the substantial impact § 312(a)(7) would have on the broadcasting industry:

* * *

[U]nder this provision, a broadcaster, whose license is obtained and retained on basis of performance in the public interest, may be charged with being unreasonable and, therefore, fall subject to revocation of his license. 118 Cong.Rec. 326 (1972) (remarks of Rep. Keith).

Such emphasis on the thrust of the statute would seem unnecessary if it did nothing more than reiterate the public interest standard.

Perhaps the most telling evidence of congressional intent, however, is the contemporaneous amendment of § 315(a) of the Communications Act. That amendment was described by the Conference Committee as a "conforming statement" necessitated by the enactment of § 312(a)(7). * * * Prior to the "conforming amendment," the second sentence of 47 U.S.C. § 315(a) (1970 ed.) read: "No obligation is imposed upon any licensee to allow the use of its station by any such candidate." This language made clear that broadcasters were not common carriers as to affirmative, rather than responsive, requests for access. As a result of the amendment, the second sentence now contains an important qualification: "No obligation is imposed under this subsection upon any licensee to allow the use of its station by any such candidate." 47 U.S.C. § 315(a) [emphasis added]. Congress retreated from its statement that "no obligation" exists to afford individual access presumably because § 312(a)(7) compels such access in the context of federal elections. If § 312(a)(7) simply reaffirmed the pre-existing public interest requirement with the added sanction of license revocation, no conforming amendment to § 315(a) would have been needed.

Thus, the legislative history supports the plain meaning of the statute that individual candidates for federal elective office have a right of reasonable access to the use of stations for paid political broadcasts on behalf of their candidacies,<sup>8</sup> without reference to whether an opponent has secured time.

We have held that "the construction of a statute by those charged with its execution should be followed unless there are compelling indications that it is wrong, especially when Congress has refused to alter the administrative construction." * *

Since the enactment of § 312(a)(7), the commission has consistently construed the statute as extending beyond the prior public interest policy. In 1972, the commission made clear that § 312(a)(7) "now imposes on the overall obligation to operate in the public interest the additional specific requirement [Emphasis added] that reasonable access and purchase of reasonable amounts of time be afforded candidates for Federal office." Use of Broadcast and Cablecast Facilities by Candidates for Public Office, 34 FCC2d 510, 537-

8. No request for access must be honored under § 312(a)(7) unless the candidate is willing to pay for the time sought. See Kennedy for President Comm. v. FCC, 636 F.2d 432, 446-450 (D.C.Cir. 1980).

538 (1972) (1972 policy statement). * * * In its 1978 Report and Order, the commission stated:

When Congress enacted Section 312(a)(7), it imposed an additional obligation on the general mandate to operate in the public interest. Licensees were specifically required to afford reasonable access to or to permit the purchase of reasonable amounts of broadcast time for the "use" of Federal candidates.

We see no merit to the contention that Section 312(a)(7) was meant merely as a codification of the commission's already existing policy concerning political broadcasts. There was no reason to commit that policy to statute since it was already being enforced by the commission * * *.

The commission has adhered to this view of the statute in its rulings on individual inquiries and complaints. * * *

Congress has been made aware of the commission's interpretation of § 312(a)(7). In 1973, hearings were conducted to review the operation of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971. Hearings on S. 372 before the Subcommittee on Communications of the Senate Committee on Commerce, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. (1973). Commission Chairman Dean Burch testified regarding the agency's experience with § 312(a)(7). He noted that the commission's 1972 policy statement was "widely distributed and represented our best judgment as to the requirements of the law and the intent of Congress." Chairman Burch discussed some of the difficult questions implicit in determining whether a station has afforded "reasonable access" to a candidate for federal office, and in conclusion stated: "We have brought our approach to these problems in the form of the 1972 Public Notice to the attention of Congress. If we have erred in some important construction, we would, of course, welcome congressional guidance." Senator Pastore, Chairman of the Communications Subcommittee, replied:

* * * I think what we did was reasonable enough, and I think what you did was reasonable enough as well.

* * *

The issue was joined when CBS Vice Chairman Frank Stanton also testified at the hearings and objected to the fact that § 312(a)(7) "grants rights to all legally qualified candidates for Federal office * * * ." He strongly urged "repeal" of the statute, but his plea was unsuccessful.<sup>9</sup>

The commission's repeated construction of § 312(a)(7) as affording an affirmative right of reasonable access to individual candidates for federal elective office comports with the statute's language and legislative history and has received congressional review. Therefore, departure from that construction is unwarranted. "Congress' failure to repeal or revise [the statute] in the face of such administrative interpretation [is] persuasive evidence that that interpretation is the one intended by Congress." * * *

In support of their narrow reading of § 312(a)(7) as simply a restatement of the public interest obligation, petitioners cite our decision in CBS, Inc. v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. 94 * * * (1973), which held that neither the First Amendment nor the Communications Act requires broadcasters to accept paid editorial advertisements from citizens at large. The Court in Democratic National Com-

9. Broadcasters have continued to register their complaints about § 312(a)(7) with Congress. See Hearing on S. 22 before the Subcommittee on Communications of the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, 95th Cong., 2d Sess., 67 (1978). And Congress has considered specific proposals to repeal the statute, but has declined to do so. See S. 22, 95th Cong., 1st Sess., § 3 (1977); S. 1178, 94th Cong., 1st Sess., § 2 (1975). Indeed when the Federal Election Campaign Act was amended in 1974, § 312(a)(7) was left undisturbed. See Pub.L. 93-443, 88 Stat. 1272.

mittee observed that "the commission on several occasions has ruled that no private individual or group has a right to command the use of broadcast facilities," and that Congress has not altered that policy even though it has amended the Communications Act several times. * * * In a footnote, on which petitioners here rely, we referred to the then recently enacted § 312(a)(7) as one such amendment, stating that it had "essentially codified the commission's prior interpretation of § 315(a) as requiring broadcasters to make time available to political candidates." * *

However, "the language of an opinion is not always to be parsed as though we were dealing with language of a statute." Reiter v. Sonotone Corp., supra. * * * The qualified observation that § 312(a)(7) "essentially codified" existing commission practice was not a conclusion that the statute was in all respects coextensive with that practice and imposed no additional duties on broadcasters. In Democratic National Committee, we did not purport to rule on the precise contours of the responsibilities created by § 312(a)(7) since that issue was not before us. Like the general public interest standard and the equal opportunities provision of § 315(a), § 312(a)(7) reflects the importance attached to the use of the public airwaves by political candidates. Yet we now hold that § 312(a)(7) expanded on those predecessor requirements and granted a new right of access to persons seeking election to federal office.<sup>10</sup>

Although Congress provided in § 312(a)(7) for greater use of broadcasting

stations by federal candidates, it did not give guidance on how the commission should implement the statute's access requirement. Essentially, Congress adopted a "rule of reason" and charged the commission with its enforcement. Pursuant to 47 U.S.C. § 303(r), which empowers the commission to "[m]ake such rules and regulations and prescribe such restrictions and conditions, not inconsistent with law, as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of [the Communications Act]," the agency has developed standards to effectuate the guarantees of § 312(a)(7). See also 47 U.S.C. § 154(i). The commission has issued some general interpretative statements, but its standards implementing § 312(a)(7) have evolved principally on a case-by-case basis and are not embodied in formalized rules. The relevant criteria broadcasters must employ in evaluating access requests under the statute can be summarized from the commission's 1978 Report and Order and the Memorandum Opinions and Orders in these cases.

Broadcasters are free to deny the sale of air time prior to the commencement of a campaign, but once a campaign has begun, they must give reasonable and good faith attention to access requests from "legally qualified" candidates<sup>11</sup> for federal elective office. Such requests must be considered on an individualized basis, and broadcasters are required to tailor their responses to accommodate, as much as reasonably possible, a candidate's stated purposes in seeking air time. In responding to access requests, however, broadcasters may also give weight to such factors as the amount of time previously sold to the candidate, the disruptive impact on regular programming, and the likelihood of requests for time by rival candidates under the equal opportunities provision of § 315(a). These considerations may not be invoked as pretexts for denying access; to justify a negative response, broadcasters must cite a realistic danger of substantial program disruption—perhaps caused by insufficient notice to allow adjustments in the schedule—or of an excessive number of equal time requests. Further, in order to facilitate review by the commission, broadcasters must explain their reasons for refusing time or making a more limited counteroffer. If broadcasters take the appropriate factors into account and act reasonably and in good faith, their decisions will be entitled to deference even if the commission's analysis would have differed in the first instance. But if broadcasters adopt "across-the-board policies" and do not attempt to respond to the individualized situation of a particular candidate, the commission is not compelled to sustain their denial of access. * * * 1978 Report and Order, at 1089-1092, 1094. Petitioners argue that certain of these standards are contrary to the statutory objectives of § 312(a)(7).

10. See generally Note, The Right of "Reasonable Access" for Federal Political Candidates Under Section § 312(a)(7) of the Communications Act, 78 Colum.L.Rev. 1287 (1978).

11. In order to be "legally qualified" under the commission's rules, a candidate must: (a) be eligible under law to hold the office he seeks; (b) announce his candidacy; and (c) qualify for a place on the ballot or be eligible under law for election as a write-in candidate. Persons seeking nomination for the Presidency or Vice Presidency are "legally qualified" in: (a) those states in which they or their proposed delegates have qualified for the primary or Presidential preference ballot; or (b) those states in which they have made a substantial showing of being serious candidates for nomination. Such persons will be considered "legally qualified" in all states if they have qualified in 10 or more states. See 1978 Primer, supra, at 2216-2218.

The commission has concluded that, as a threshold matter, it will independently determine whether a campaign has begun and the obligations imposed by § 312(a)(7) have attached. * * * Petitioners assert that, in undertaking such a task, the commission becomes improperly involved in the electoral process and seriously impairs broadcaster discretion.

However, petitioners fail to recognize that the commission does not set the starting date for a campaign. Rather, on review of a complaint alleging denial of "reasonable access," it examines objective evidence to find whether the campaign has already commenced, "taking into account the position of the candidate and the networks as well as other factors." [Emphasis added]. As the court of appeals noted, the "determination of when the statutory obligations attach does not control the electoral process, * * * the determination is controlled by the process." 629 F.2d at 16. Such a decision is not, and cannot be, purely one of editorial judgment.

Moreover, the commission's approach serves to narrow § 312(a)(7), which might be read as vesting access rights in an individual candidate as soon as he becomes "legally qualified" without regard to the status of the campaign. See n. 11, supra. By confining the applicability of the statute to the period after a campaign commences, the commission has limited its impact on broadcasters and given substance to its command of reasonable access.

Petitioners also challenge the commission's requirement that broadcasters evaluate and respond to access requests on an individualized basis. In petitioners' view, the agency has attached inordinate significance to candidates' needs, thereby precluding fair assessment of broadcasters' concerns and prohibiting the adoption of uniform policies regarding requests for access.

While admonishing broadcasters not to "'second guess' the 'political' wisdom or * * * effectiveness" of the particular format sought by a candidate, the commission has clearly acknowledged that "the candidate's * * * request is by no means conclusive of the question of how much time, if any, is appropriate. Other * * * factors, such as the disruption or displacement of regular programming (particularly as affected by a reasonable probability of requests by other candidates), must be considered in the balance." * * * Thus, the commission mandates careful consideration of, not blind assent to, candidates' desires for air time.

Petitioners are correct that the commission's standards proscribe blanket rules concerning access; each request must be examined on its own merits. While the adoption of uniform policies might well prove more convenient for broadcasters, such an approach would allow personal campaign strategies and the exigencies of the political process to be ignored. A broadcaster's "evenhanded" response of granting only time spots of a fixed duration to candidates may be "unreasonable" where a particular candidate desires less time for an advertisement or a longer format to discuss substantive issues. In essence, petitioners seek the unilateral right to determine in advance how much time to afford all candidates. Yet § 312(a)(7) assures a right of reasonable access to individual candidates for federal elective office, and the commission's requirement that their requests be considered on an individualized basis is consistent with that guarantee.

* * * As we held in CBS, Inc. v. Democratic National Committee, supra, the commission must be allowed to "remain in a posture of flexibility to chart a workable 'middle course' in its quest to preserve a balance between the essential public accountability and the desired private control of the media." Like the court of appeals, we cannot say that the commission's standards are arbitrary and capricious or at odds with the language and purposes of § 312(a)(7). See 5 U.S.C. § 706(2)(A). Indeed, we are satisfied that the commission's action represents a reasoned attempt to effectuate the statute's access requirement, giving broadcasters room to exercise their discretion but demanding that they act in good faith.<sup>12</sup>

There can be no doubt that the commission's standards have achieved greater clarity as a result of the orders in these cases.<sup>13</sup> However laudable that may be, it raises the question whether § 312(a)(7) was properly applied to petitioners.<sup>14</sup> Based upon the commission's prior decisions and 1978 Report and Order, however, we must conclude that petitioners had adequate notice that their conduct in responding to the Carter-Mondale Presidential Committee's request for access would contravene the statute.

In the 1978 Report and Order, the commission stated that it could not establish a precise point at which § 312(a)(7) obligations would attach for all campaigns because each is unique:

For instance, a presidential campaign may be in full swing almost a year before an election; other campaigns may be limited to a short concentrated period. * * *

[W]e expect licensees to afford access at a reasonable time prior to a convention or caucus. We will review a licensee's decisions in this area on a case-by-case basis. [Emphasis added].

In Anthony R. Martin-Trigona, 67 FCC2d 743 (1978), the commission observed:

12. The dissenters place great emphasis on the preservation of broadcaster discretion. However, endowing licensees with a "blank check" to determine what constitutes "reasonable access" would eviscerate § 312(a)(7).

13. In 1978, the commission issued a Notice of Inquiry, which asked whether rulemaking proceedings should be commenced in order to clarify licensee obligations under § 312(a)(7). 43 Fed.Reg. 12938 (March 28, 1978). Petitioners and others in the broadcasting industry expressed strong opposition to the promulgation of specific rules, and none were formulated. 1978 Report and Order, supra, at 1079-1081. Petitioners, therefore, must share responsibility for any vagueness and confusion in the commission's standards.

14. Section 312(a) empowers the commission to "revoke any station license or construction permit." [Emphasis added.] In the court of appeals, petitioners argued that the statute applies only to licensees, not to networks. However, the court rejected that contention, reasoning that the commission's jurisdiction to "mandate reasonable network access * * * is 'reasonably ancillary' to the effective enforcement of the individual licensee's Section 312(a)(7) obligations. * * *" 629 F.2d, at 25-27. Petitioners do not contest that holding in this Court. See Tr. of Oral Arg. 16-17. In any event, as the commission noted, each petitioner is "a multistation licensee fully reachable [as to its licenses] by [the express] revocation authority" granted under § 312(a)(7). 74 FCC2d, at 640, n. 10.

"[T]he licensee, and ultimately the Commission, must look to the circumstances of each particular case to determine when it is reasonable for a candidate's access to begin * * * ." [Emphasis added.] Id., at 746, n. 4. Further, the 1978 Report and Order made clear that "Federal candidates are the intended beneficiary of Section 312(a)(7) and therefore a candidate's desires as to the method of conducting his or her media campaign should be considered by licensees in granting reasonable access." The agency also stated:

[A]n arbitrary "blanket" ban on the use by a candidate of a particular class or length of time in a particular period cannot be considered reasonable. A federal candidate's decisions as to the best method of pursuing his or her media campaign should be honored as much as possible under the 'reasonable' limits imposed by the licensee.

Here, the Carter-Mondale Presidential Committee sought broadcast time approximately 11 months before the 1980 presidential election and 8 months before the Democratic national convention. In determining that a national campaign was underway at that point, the commission stressed: (a) that 10 candidates formally had announced their intention to seek the Republican nomination, and two candidates had done so for the Democratic nomination; (b) that various states had started the delegate selection process; (c) that candidates were traveling across the country making speeches and attempting to raise funds; (d) that national campaign organizations were established and operating; (e) that the Iowa caucus would be held the following month; (f) that public officials and private groups were making endorsements; and (g) that the national print media had given campaign activities prominent coverage for almost 2 months. * * * The commission's conclusion about the status of the campaign accorded with its announced position on the vesting of § 312(a)(7) rights and was adequately supported by the objective factors on which it relied.

Nevertheless, petitioners ABC and NBC refused to sell the Carter-Mondale Presidential Committee any time in December 1979 on the ground that it was "too early in the political season." * * * These petitioners made no counteroffers, but adopted "blanket" policies refusing access despite the admonition against such an approach in the 1978 Report and Order. * * * Likewise, petitioner CBS, while not barring access completely, had an across-the-board policy of selling only 5-minute spots to all candidates, notwithstanding the commission's directive in the 1978 Report and Order that broadcasters consider "a candidate's desires as to the method of conducting his or her media campaign." * * * Petitioner CBS responded with its standard offer of separate 5-minute segments, even though the Carter-Mondale Presidential Committee sought 30 minutes of air time to present a comprehensive statement launching President Carter's reelection campaign. Moreover, the committee's request was made almost 2 months before the intended date of broadcast, was flexible in that it could be satisfied with any prime time slot during a 4-day period, was accompanied by an offer to pay the normal commercial rate, and was not preceded by other requests from President Carter for access. * * * Although petitioners adverted to the disruption of regular programming and the potential equal time requests from rival candidates in their responses to the Carter-Mondale Presidential committee's complaint, the commission rejected these claims as "speculative and unsubstantiated at best." * * *

Under these circumstances, we cannot conclude that the commission abused its discretion in finding that petitioners failed to grant the "reasonable access" required by § 312(a)(7).<sup>15</sup> * * *

Finally, petitioners assert that § 312(a)(7) as implemented by the commission violates the First Amendment rights of broadcasters by unduly circumscribing their editorial discretion. * * * Petitioners argue that the commission's interpretation of § 312(a)(7)'s access requirement disrupts the "delicate balanc[e]" that broadcast regulation must achieve. We disagree.

A licensed broadcaster is "granted the free and exclusive use of a limited and valuable part of the public domain; when he accepts that franchise it is burdened by enforceable public obligations." Office of Communication of the United Church of Christ v. FCC. * * * This Court has noted the limits on a broadcast license:

A license permits broadcasting, but the licensee has no constitutional right to be the one who holds the license or to monopolize a * * * frequency to the exclusion of his fellow citizens. There is nothing in the First Amendment which prevents the Government from requiring a licensee to share his frequency with others * * *. Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, supra. * * *

See also FCC v. National Citizens Comm. for Broadcasting. * * * Although the broadcasting industry is entitled under the First Amendment to exercise "the widest journalistic freedom consistent with its public [duties]," CBS, Inc. v. Democratic National Committee, supra, * * * the Court has made clear that:

It is the right of the viewers and listeners, not the right of the broadcasters which is paramount. It is the purpose of the First Amendment to preserve an uninhibited marketplace of ideas in which truth will ultimately prevail, rather than to countenance monopolization of that market. * * *. It is the right of the public to receive suitable access to social, political, esthetic, moral, and other ideas and experience which is crucial here. Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, supra. * * *

The First Amendment interests of candidates and voters, as well as broadcasters, are implicated by § 312(a)(7). We have recognized that "it is of particular importance that candidates have the * * opportunity to make their views known so that the electorate may intelligently evaluate the candidates' personal qualities and their positions on vital public issues before choosing among them on election day." Buckley v. Valeo. * * * Section 312(a)(7) thus makes a significant contribution to freedom of expression by enhancing the ability of candidates to present, and the public to receive, information necessary for the effective operation of the democratic process.

Petitioners are correct that the Court has never approved a general right of access to the media. See, e.g., FCC v. Midwest Video Corp. * * *; Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo * * *; CBS, Inc. v. Democratic National Committee. Nor do we do so today. Section 312(a)(7) creates a limited right to "reasonable" access that pertains only to legally qualified federal candidates and may be invoked by them only for the purpose of advancing their candidacies once a campaign has commenced. The commission has stated that, in enforcing the statute, it will "provide leeway to broadcasters and not merely attempt de novo to determine the reasonableness of their judgments * * *." * * * If broadcasters have considered the relevant factors in good faith, the commission will uphold their decisions. * * * Further, § 312(a)(7) does not impair the discretion of broadcasters to present their views on any issue or to carry any particular type of programming.

15. As it did here, the commission, with the approval of broadcasters, engages in case-by-case adjudication of § 312(a)(7) complaints rather than awaiting license renewal proceedings. See Tr. of Oral Arg. 11-16. Although the penalty provided by § 312(a)(7) is license revocation, petitioners simply were directed to inform the commission of how they intended to meet their statutory obligations. See 74 FCC2d, at 651; 74 FCC2d, at 676-677. In essence, the commission entered a declaratory order that petitioners' responses to the Carter-Mondale Presidential Committee constituted a denial of "reasonable access." Such a ruling favors broadcasters by allowing an opportunity for curative action before their conduct is found to be "willful or repeated" and subject to the imposition of sanctions.

Section 312(a)(7) represents an effort by Congress to assure that an important resource—the airwaves—will be used in the public interest. We hold that the statutory right of access, as defined by the commission and applied in these cases, properly balances the First Amendment rights of federal candidates, the public, and broadcasters.

The judgment of the court of appeals is Affirmed

Justice WHITE, with whom Justice Rehnquist and Justice Stevens join, dissenting.

The Court's opinion is disarmingly simple and seemingly straightforward: in 1972, Congress created a right of reasonable access for candidates for federal office; the Federal Communications Commission, charged with enforcing the statute, has defined that right; as long as the agency's action is within the zone of reasonableness, it should be accepted even though a court would have preferred a different course. This approach, however, conceals the fundamental issue in this case, which is whether Congress intended not only to create a right of reasonable access but also to negate the long-standing statutory policy of deferring to editorial judgments that are not destructive of the goals of the act. In this case, such a policy would require acceptance of network or station decisions on access as long as they are within the range of reasonableness, even if the commission would have preferred different responses by the networks. It is demonstrable that Congress did not intend to set aside this traditional policy, and the commission seriously misconstrued the statute when it assumed that it had been given authority to insist on its own views as to reasonable access even though this entailed rejection of media judgments representing different but nevertheless reasonable reactions to access requests. As this case demonstrates, the result is an administratively created right of access which, in light of the pre-existing statutory policies concerning access, is far broader than Congress could have intended to allow. The Court unfortunately accepts this major departure from the underlying themes of the Communications Act and from the cases that have construed that statute. With all due respect, I dissent.

* * * It is untenable to suggest that the right of access the commission has created is required or even suggested by the plain language of this section. What is "reasonable" access and what are "reasonable" amounts of time that must be sold are matters about which fair minds could easily differ. * * * I think the commission fell into serious error and that its action was arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion and otherwise contrary to law. 5 U.S.C. § 706(2)(A). * * * There are several reasons for my position.

1. The commission seemed to approach this case as though Congress were legislating on a clean slate, without regard for other provisions of the act and the manner in which those provisions had been construed and applied to avoid undue intrusions upon the editorial judgment of broadcasters and without regard for the longstanding statutory policies about access, including the recognized duty imposed on broadcasters to serve the public interest by keeping the citizenry reasonably informed about political candidates.

* * *

The parties agree that prior to the adoption of § 312(a)(7) individuals or organizations had no specific right of access to broadcast facilities. This was the common view of the commission, the courts, and Congress. As we said in Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. v. Democratic National Committee, * * * Congress had "time and again rejected various legislative attempts that would have mandated a variety of forms of individual access." Broadcasters had obligations with respect to their programming, such as the fairness doctrine which obligated them to cover issues of public importance from opposing points of view, but this obligation was enforced with care so as not to unduly infringe on the "journalistic discretion in deciding how best to fulfill the Fairness Doctrine obligations." * * * We also observed that "in the area of discussion of public issues Congress chose to leave broad journalistic discretion with the licensee. Congress specifically dealt with—and firmly rejected—the argument that the broadcast facilities should be open on a nonselective basis to all persons wishing to talk about public issues." * * * S milarly, in FCC v. Midwest Video Corp., * * * where we held that the commission had erred in providing for a general system of access to cable television, we noted that the commission's authority with respect to cable television was derived from the provisions of the Communications Act and concluded that the commission should not have ignored "Congress' stern disapproval—evidenced in § 3(h)—of negation of the editorial discretion otherwise enjoyed by broadcasters and cable operators alike." * * * We reaffirmed "the policy of the act to preserve editorial control of programming in the licensee." * * *

Broadcasters, however, had certain statutory obligations with respect to political broadcasting: As the commission has explained, it had "recognized political broadcasting as one of the fourteen basic elements necessary to meet the public interest, needs and desires of the community." 68 FCC2d 1079, at 1087–1088 (1978). * * * The Communications Act had thus long been construed to impose upon the broadcasters a duty to satisfy the public need for information about political campaigns. As this Court observed in Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union v. WDAY, Inc., * * * a broadcaster policy of "denying all candidates use of stations * * * would * * * effectively withdraw political discussion from the air" and that such result would be quite contrary to congressional intent. Furthermore, § 315 had long provided that should a station permit a political candidate to use its broadcasting facilities, it must "afford equal opportunities to all other such candidates for that office. * * *" As that section expressly provided, however, the provision for equal time created no right of initial access.

It is therefore as clear as can be that the regulation of the broadcast media has been and is marked by a clearly defined "legislative desire to preserve values of private journalism." Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. v. Democratic National Committee, supra. * * * The corollary legislative policy has been not to recognize or attempt to require individual rights of access to the broadcast media. These policies have been so clear and are so obviously grounded in constitutional considerations that in the absence of unequivocal legislative intent to the contrary, it should not be assumed that § 312(a)(7) was designed to make the kind of substantial inroads in these basic considerations that the commission has now mandated. Section 312(a)(7) undoubtedly changed the law governing access in some respects, but the language of the section, as the commission itself concedes, does not require the access rights the commission has now created; and the legislative history, far from supporting the commission's actions in this case, has a contrary thrust.

2. The legislative history, most of which the commission ignored, shows that Congress was well aware of the statutory and regulatory background recounted above. It also shows that Congress had no intention of working the radical change in the roles of the broadcaster and the commission that the commission now insists is consistent with the statutory mandate.

* * *

The legislative history thus reveals that Congress sought to codify what it conceived to be the pre-existing duty of the broadcasters to serve the public interest by presenting political broadcasts. It also negates any suggestion that Congress believed it was creating the extensive, inflexible duty to provide access that the commission has now fastened upon the broadcasters. This is not to say that § 312(a)(7) did not work important changes in the law, for it did put teeth in the obligation of the broadcasters' duty to serve the public interest by providing the remedy of license revocation for willful or repeated refusals to provide a candidate for federal elective office with reasonable access to broadcast time. The need for this remedy arose out of the concern that other provisions of the Federal Election Campaign Reform Act could lead to a misunderstanding regarding the broadcasters' continuing duty to afford reasonable access to federal candidates.

The commission almost totally ignored the legislative history as a possible limitation on the reach of the broadcasters' duty to provide reasonable access or upon the scope of its oversight responsibilities. The commission did note that one of the purposes of the 1971 act had been described as affording candidates a greater access to the broadcast media. But none of these statements indicated that this was the purpose of § 312(a)(7), the provision at issue here. That purpose was served by other provisions of the amendments, such as the provision requiring the sale of broadcast time at the lowest unit charged during specified periods; § 312(a)(7) itself aimed at preventing the charge limitation from reducing access that might otherwise be available.<sup>2</sup>

The commission also noted, and the Court now heavily relies on, the so-called conforming amendment to § 315, the equal time provision, which then provided that "no obligation is imposed upon any licensee to allow the use of its station by any such candidate." But in its original form, this portion of § 315 had provided that "no obligation is hereby imposed"—the word "hereby" being omitted by the codifier of Title 47 of the United States Code. To the extent that § 315 without the conforming amendment, which returned the relevant provision to approximately its original form, suggested that the act in no way required access to political candidates, it also called into the question the commission's public interest policy of requiring stations to give reasonable access to political candidates. That the conforming amendment was made is understandable, but the Court gives it undue significance.

In any event, the Court relies on the conforming amendment for no more than an affirmative indication that Congress intended to give individual candidates a right of reasonable access, a right that did not exist prior to the enactment of § 312(a)(7). This much may be conceded, but nothing in this bit of legislative history, or in any other, furnishes any support for the commission's sweeping decision in this case. On the contrary, the legislative

---

2. One of the major purposes of the Federal Election Campaign Act was to shorten the length of campaigns thereby reducing campaign costs. See S.Rep.No. 92-96, 92d Cong., 1st Sess., 20-21, 28 (1971). Television advertising was described as "unquestionably the most used media in political campaigns, and it has been the most significant contributor to the spiraling cost of these campaigns." Id., at 30. U.S.Code Cong. & Admin. News, 1972, pp. 1783-1784. The majority's interpretation of § 312(a)(7) runs directly contrary to this broad goal. This decision is nothing more than an open invitation to start campaigning early, thus increasing the overall length of the campaign and the overall costs to all the candidates.

history negates the commission's conclusion that it was free to so drastically limit the discretion of the broadcasters and to so radically expand its own oversight authority.

3. The Court relies, as it must, on the authority of the commission to interpret and apply the statute and on the deference that courts should accord to agency views with respect to the legislation it is charged with enforcing. * * *

I find the commission's current radical version not only quite inconsistent with its prior views but also singularly unpersuasive.

* * *

There was no suggestion in 1972 that the "needs" of the requesting candidate shall be paramount. Indeed, the commission embraced its prior practice. Discretion was thought to remain with the broadcaster, not placed in hands of the candidates or subjected to close and exacting oversight by the commission. Clearly, the commission's contemporaneous construction of § 312(a)(7) is inconsistent with the sweeping construction of the section it has now adopted. * * *

Subsequent interpretations of the scope of § 312(a)(7), including the comprehensive Report and Order: Commission Policy in Enforcing Section § 312(a)(7) of the Communications Act, 68 FCC2d 1079 (1978), have consistently refrained from curtailing broadcaster discretion by refusing to impose stringent standards or to second guess the broadcaster's good faith judgments. In the Report and Order, the commission explained,

* * *

We continue to believe that the best method for achieving a balance between the desires of candidates for air time and the commitments of licensees to the broadcast of other types of programming is to rely on the reasonable, good faith discretion of individual licensees. We are convinced that there are no formalized rules which would encompass all the various circumstances possible during an election campaign.* * *

The commission went on to suggest some very broad guidelines it considered essential in effectuating the intent of Congress under § 312(a)(7). For example, candidates generally were to be afforded some access to prime time, and access was to be flexible, including the possibility of program time and "spot" announcements. Candidates were not entitled, however, "to a particular placement of his or her political announcement on a station's broadcast schedule. * * * It is best left to the discretion of a licensee when and on what date a candidate's spot announcement or program should be aired." * * * The commission specifically refused to arrogate to itself the power to determine when the reasonable access duty attached except on a case-by-case basis leaving the initial judgment in the hands of the broadcast licensee. Finally, there is no statement in this report that requires broadcasters to look to the needs of a candidate in the initial determination of reasonable access other than the admonition that broadcasters could not "follow a policy of flatly banning access by a federal candidate to any of the classes and lengths of program or spot time in the same periods which the station offers to commercial advertisers." Like the initial policy statement issued in 1972, this report lends little credence to the new-found power of the commission to oversee with an iron hand the implementation of § 312(a)(7).

In terms of the degree to which broadcaster editorial judgments should be subject to review and reversal by the commission—the most important issue in this case—it is evident that the commission has been quite inconsistent. Its present radical interpretation of § 312(a)(7) plainly rejects its earlier and more contemporaneous pronouncements as to the meaning and scope of the broadcasters' duties and of its own authority under § 312(a)(7).

4. Equally, if not more fundamental, the commission's opinions in this case are singularly unpersuasive. They contain a plethora of admonitions to the broadcast industry, some quite vague and others very specific but often inconsistent. Altogether, in operation and effect, they represent major departures from prior practice, from prior decisions, including those of this court, and from congressionally recognized policies underlying the Federal Communications Act. As I have indicated, we should not endorse them without much clearer congressional direction than is apparent in the actions leading to the adoption of § 312(a)(7). I shall mention my major difficulties with the commission's opinion and judgment.

The commission stated in a footnote that it should not differ with broadcaster decisions with respect to a candidate's access unless "arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law," an approach reflecting its traditional stance vis-à-vis the broadcasters. 74 FCC2d, at 642, n. 16. The commission had already determined, however, that because § 312(a)(7) was not self-explanatory on its face and because it failed to find explicit guidance to the contrary in the legislative history, it would and should exercise wide discretion in interpreting and enforcing the act. It is therefore not surprising that the commission's assertions of deference to editorial judgment are palpably incredible.<sup>3</sup>

The commission first confounds itself by announcing that the duty to provide access attaches when the campaign begins and that this threshold issue was to be "based on [an] independent evaluation of the status of the campaign taking into account the position of the candidate and the networks as well as other factors." * * This effectively withdrew the issue of timing from the area of broadcaster judgment and transformed it into a question of law to be determined by the commission de novo. It was also a major shift in the agency's position, for its Broadcast Bureau just 2 years before had ruled that the assessment of when a campaign is sufficiently underway to warrant the provision of access was to be left to broadcaster discretion: "A licensee's discretion in providing coverage of elections extends not only to the type and amount of time to be made available to candidates, but to the date on which its campaign coverage will commence." 66 FCC2d 968, at 969 (Broadcast Bureau 1977), app. for review denied, 67 FCC2d 33, reconsideration denied, 67 FCC2d 743 (1978). Although I have some difficulty in perceiving why the access obligation should begin when "the campaign" is underway, even if there is such a triggering event, reasonable men could differ as to when that moment has arrived. The commission overstepped its authority in imposing its own answer on the industry and in rejecting the network's reasonable submissions. The commission gave no explanation whatsoever for its action in this respect. In fact, it did not even acknowledge that it was making its own de novo determination until it issued its opinion on reconsideration.

The commission ruled that in responding to its obligation to provide reasonable time, a broadcaster should place particular emphasis on the candidates' needs, weigh each request in its own specific context on a particularized basis and tailor its response to the individual candidate. This approach expressly rejects the thesis of § 315 that all candidates be treated equally. If the networks in this case had responded affirmatively to the candidate's request, § 315 would require that equal time be extended to all other Democratic candidates and would forbid any kind of individualized consideration that would result in giving them less time than had been previously given to their competitor. There is no trace of support in the language of the act or in the legislative history for this unrealistic approach to § 312(a)(7). Nor does the commission offer any tenable explanation why a broadcaster's decision to provide equal time for all candidates is a violation of the obligation to provide reasonable time to each of them. The inference may be drawn from the commission's position that reasonable access may require unequal access, but § 315 requires equal time for all once it is granted to anyone. The commission's rejection of the equality approach as one of the possible ways of complying with § 312(a)(7) is a plain error.

3. Of a similar tenor is the court of appeals' observation that "[t]he interference with editorial discretion" created by the rigid scheme of regulatory oversight it was endorsing "seems no more or less" than had existed under the broad public interest standard. 629 F.2d, at 23, n. 102.

Of course, the individualized-need approach requires a broadcaster to make an assessment with respect to each request for time, and each of these countless assessments will be subject to review by the commission. If the degree of oversight to be exercised by the commission is to be measured by its work in this case, there will be very little deference paid to the judgment and discretion of the broadcaster. The demands of the candidate will be paramount. * * *

Indicative also of the stringent degree of oversight that the commission now intends to exercise is the manner in which it dealt with the networks' suggestions that in responding to the request for time involved here, they were entitled to take into account the fact that a total of 122 persons had filed notices of candidacy for the presidency with the Federal Election Commission. The commission conceded that this was a proper concern and that Republican candidates might have to be treated equally with Democrats. The commission, however, in its political wisdom, concluded that it was "unlikely" that more than a tiny percentage of all candidates would request time, the net effect being that the networks' anticipations based on their professional experience were rejected. As petitioner CBS submits on brief: "Broadcasters are not permitted to consider the likelihood of multiple future requests by similarly situated candidates unless the imminence of such requests can be demonstrated to a near certainty. But the likelihood that there will be multiple demands from other candidates is not susceptible to proof in advance. Candidate needs are necessarily shifting in nature, and no candidate can supply a precise prediction of his future plans. Thus, under the commission's approach, broadcasters can give only limited, if any, weight to potential disruption of normal program schedules, or their view that other material would better serve the interests of their audiences." CBS brief, at 38.

The court tells us, "If the broadcasters take the appropriate factors into account and act reasonably and in good faith, their decision will be entitled to deference even if the commission's analysis would have differed in the first instance." But this language can be taken with a grain of salt, since the commission, the court of appeals and the majority give the networks no deference whatsoever. This is so because the "appropriate factors" are designed to eviscerate broadcaster discretion. The abrupt departure from accepted norms and the truly remarkable extent to which the commission will seek to control the programming of political candidates in the future is best demonstrated by its rejection, as being unreasonable, of the submissions filed by the networks in response to the complaints. * * *

* * *

None of these justifications is patently unreasonable. They become so only because of the commission's conclusion, adopted by the majority, that the reasonableness of access is to be considered from the individual candidate's perspective, including that candidate's particular "needs." While both the Court and the commission describe other factors considered relevant such as the number of candidates and disruption in programming, the overarching focus is directed to the perceived needs of the individual candidate. This highly skewed approach is required because, as the Court sees it, the networks "seek the unilateral right to determine in advance how much time to afford all candidates." But such a right, reasonably applied, would seem to fall squarely within the traditionally recognized discretion of the broadcaster. Instead of adhering to this traditional approach, the Court has laid the foundation for the unilateral right of candidates to demand and receive any "reasonable" amount of time a candidate determines to be necessary to execute a particular campaign strategy. The concomitant commission involvement is obvious. There is no basis in the statute for this very broad and unworkable scheme of access. * * *

* * *

COMMENT

1. It has been argued that Red Lion and Tornillo "cannot be reconciled because the distinctions which have been drawn between them are constitutionally insignificant." But it is contended that "unlike Red Lion, CBS v. FCC can be reconciled with Tornillo." See, Shelledy, Note, Access to the Press: Teleological Analysis of a Constitutional Double Standard, Geo. Wash.L.Rev. 430 (1982). How? CBS v. FCC distinguished the right of access sought there from the Florida right of reply statute which was considered in Tornillo. The "identity of the medium" was not the critical factor. Tornillo is often distinguished from Red Lion on the ground that in a newspaper case the restraint which can be imposed under the First Amendment is far more severe in nature than that imposed upon the electronic media.

The George Washington note distinguishes Tornillo from CBS v. FCC as follows:

Only one of the limiting characteristics of section 312(a)(7), the reasonableness standard, distinguishes it from the Florida right of reply on a level of constitutional significance: an editor's decision not to broadcast another's message is left undisturbed so long as the decision has been reached reasonably. The Florida statute the Tornillo Court invalidated constrained editorial discretion far more severely than section 312(a)(7). Once a triggering editorial vested the Florida right of reply, the editor lost all control over the decision of whether to publish a response, what length to allot to the response, and placement and choice of typeset—notwithstanding reasonable alternatives the editor could have chosen. Had the Florida statute been limited by the reasonableness standard, as is Section 312(a)(7), it would not have transgressed the Court's command in Tornillo that any "compulsion to publish that which "reason" tells [editors] should not be published is unconstitutional."

Do you agree?

2. In CBS v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. 94 (1973), the Supreme Court held that an "arbitrary" blanket network policy refusing to sell time to political groups for the discussion of social and political issues did not violate the First Amendment. Yet, in CBS v. FCC, the Court held that an "arbitrary" blanket ban by the networks on the use by a candidate of a particular length of time in a particular period could not be considered reasonable under § 312(a)(7). A blanket network ban on a certain category of programming was deemed permissible in one instance and impermissible in the other. Why? The difference is that in CBS v. FCC a statute conferred particular rights on individual political candidates. The FCC's construction of the statute made the candidate's "desires as to the method of conducting his or her campaign" a matter to be considered by the licensee in determining whether to grant reasonable access under the statute.

In short, the second CBS case involved a limited statutorily conferred right, whereas the first CBS case would have required a decision by the Supreme Court that the First Amendment itself was a barrier to the exercise of broadcast editorial judgment.

3. In Comment, Beyond the Public Interest Standard: The Supreme Court Approves a Statutory Right of Access to the Broadcast Media for Federal Candidates in CBS, Inc. v. FCC, 48 Brooklyn L.Rev. 355 at 388 (1982), it is suggested that the limited holding in CBS "leaves undefined the point at which government-created access rights will offend constitutional guarantees." Furthermore, the comment challenges the attempt the Court makes at creating a distinction between CBS v. FCC and the earlier cases of CBS v. Democratic National Committee, text, p. 858, Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, text, p. 584, and Midwest Video v. FCC, text, p. 991:

The Court, however, never suggested that its decisions in these cases were based upon a distinction between general and limited rights of access. In Tornillo, the Court made clear that no right of access to the print media would be upheld, and in Midwest Video the constitutional issue was not even addressed. As noted earlier, Democratic National Committee raised the issue of what access obligations are constitutionally required rather than what are constitutionally permissible. Thus, even if the Court had made a distinction between general and limited rights of access, its effect on the Court's analysis in CBS would have been minimal at best.

The comment speculates, quite properly, that the Court might have been attempting to expound a distinction which will be important in access cases in the future. A distinction between a general right of access (arguably impermissible under the First Amendment) and a specific right of access (arguably permissible under the First Amendment) might be defensible. But then the comment asks if creation of such a distinction was the Court's purpose in CBS v. FCC, wasn't it "wholly unnecessary for the Court to distinguish Democratic National Committee, Tornillo, and Midwest Video"?

4. The Brooklyn Law Review comment makes the following observation: "Once the Court determined that the statute vested federal candidates with an individual right of access, it would have been absurd to insist that the commission adhere to the deferential good faith standard, since such a policy would have rendered Section 312(a)(7) virtually unenforceable."

The suggestion here is that if the standard were whether the broadcaster made a good faith reasonable judgment, then the grant in § 312(a)(7) of individual rights of access to federal political candidates would have been meaningless. This is because in most controversial situations the broadcasters will have an arguably reasonable basis for a decision not to grant access. In short, it would be nearly impossible to overcome a broadcaster's assertion that a programming decision was a good faith exercise of editorial judgment. The kind of deference to the good faith-reasonable judgment of the broadcasters which was extolled by Judge Leventhal in the Pensions case, text, p. 876, in a Fairness Doctrine setting might be particularly inapplicable in a setting where individual rights of access rather than fairness principles are at stake.

5. Did § 312(a)(7) of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 create an affirmative, promptly enforceable right of access? Or did it merely codify prior FCC policies, i.e., the obligation to provide reasonable access to federal political candidates was part of the public interest standard of the Federal Communications Act.

Chief Justice Burger's answer on this is very clear. Section 312(a) of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 created a new, affirmative, promptly enforceable right of access. Why? For one thing, the fact that the second sentence of § 312(a) was contemporaneously amended to make it clear that "no obligation is imposed under this subsection upon any licensee to allow the use of its station by any such candidate" is seen as quite significant. The amendment was interpreted by the Court in CBS v. FCC as evidence of congressional awareness that § 312(a)(7) had imposed upon broadcast licensees an obligation to allow the use of their stations by federal political candidates in a manner which previously had not obtained under either the public interest standard of the act or the prior unamended text of the second sentence of § 315(a).

6. How does § 312(a)(7) differ anyway from the duty to provide access for political candidates which broadcasters had under the public interest standard? See, Farmers Education and Cooperative Union of America, North Dakota Division v. WDAY, 360 U.S. 525 (1959), text, p. 815. One answer to this question is that previous to the enactment of § 312(a)(7), no legislative candidate had a specific right of access to broadcasting. There was a general public interest obligation to give political candidates some time, but no particularized rights were lodged in the candidates. If one candidate was given time, then, of course, under § 315(a) rights to equal opportunities were triggered for that office by broadcasters. If all candidates were denied time, then all the candidates seeking time would have had to rely on would be the general public interest obligation of broadcasters to provide time for political campaigns. This obligation was difficult to enforce since no particular candidate had any specified rights under such an obligation.

7. Do you agree with Justice White that the majority interpretation of § 312(a)(7) is an "open invitation to start campaigning early"? In § 312(a)(7), the FCC refuses to defer to the editorial judgment of the broadcasters about when a campaign may be deemed to have commenced and reserves that issue for itself. As a result, the candidate may be encouraged to show a "need" to campaign early. If his recognition factor is low and his treasury is full, the incentive to seek access for early campaigning is great. Does the majority opinion suggest any means by which such requests may be countered by the FCC? What are they?

Does § 312(a)(7) Require Broadcasters to Make Free Time Available?

KENNEDY FOR PRESIDENT COMMITTEE v. FCC

6 MED.L.RPTR. 1705, 636 F.2D 432 (D.C.CIR. 1980).

ROBINSON, Circuit Judge: On March 14, 1980, the three major commercial television networks broadcast a half-hour speech by President Carter from 4:00 to 4:30 p.m. and a presidential press conference from 9:00 to 9:30 p.m. On each occasion, the principal topic of discussion was the state of the Nation's economy. Each event was presented in its entirety and, with but one exception, was televised live by each network. The president's statements were also reported in the course of the networks' regularly scheduled national and local newscasts.

The Kennedy for President Committee, the petitioner herein, charges that these programs saturated the American public with the president's views on the economy only four days before the 1980 Illinois presidential primary. That, petitioner asserts, diminished the chances of its candidate, Senator Edward M. Kennedy, of winning the Democratic Party's presidential nomination later in the year. Petitioner claims that Section 312(a)(7) of the Communications Act of 1934 and the well-known fairness doctrine separately entitle the senator to time for telecasts of his own ideas and proposals on economic conditions.

The networks denied petitioner's request for responsive time, and the Federal Communications Commission rejected petitioner's bid for an administrative directive therefor. Before us now is a petition for review of the commission's order. We agree with the commission that petitioner's reliance on Section 312(a)(7) is misplaced, and that petitioner failed to establish the elements of a prima facie case under the fairness doctrine. We accordingly affirm.

I. BACKGROUND

Reacting to announcements of plans to televise President Carter's March 14 speech and press conference, petitioner implored the networks to provide Senator Kennedy with an opportunity to speak in prime time to the American people on the economy. Petitioner attached special importance to an airing of the Senator's views on that subject, stating that the economic situation was "one of the major issues that compelled Senator Kennedy to challenge Mr. Carter for the Democratic nomination." Petitioner asked that time be made available for the Senator's use prior to the March 18 Illinois primary.

Independently, the networks refused. In each instance, they construed petitioner's request as an invocation of the equal-opportunity command of Section 315(a) of the Communications Act, and expressed the belief that the telecasts in question were exempt from that requirement as on-the-spot coverage of bona fide news events. Each network reminded petitioner that it had given extensive coverage to the senator's campaign, and to his position on economic issues. Two of the networks emphasized their earlier presentations of wide spectra of economic commentary and analysis encompassing numerous alternatives to the stratagems advanced by the president.

Petitioner then turned to the commission for "redress [of] a pattern of conduct causing an unacceptably imbalanced presentation of important facts." Petitioner specifically identified Section 312(a)(7) of the Communications Act and the long-established fairness doctrine as bases for a commission order to the networks to make time available to the senator. It is noteworthy that petitioner has pointedly disclaimed any reliance on Section 315(a)'s equal-opportunity provision, and has accused the networks of replying to an equal-opportunity demand never made.

At the first level of commission consideration, the Broadcast Bureau denied relief. It first declared that petitioner's dependence on Section 312(a)(7) was faulty; "[g]iven the availability of prime time for purchase," it said, "the networks' failure to furnish free time does not raise a Section 312(a)(7) question." With respect to the fairness doctrine, the bureau concluded that petitioner had not established a prima facie case of violation because it had neither alleged nor substantiated any instance of bad faith on the networks' part, or any failure to present contrasting views on economic issues in their overall programming. The bureau cited petitioner's statement that it had "no doubt that" the networks "acted in good faith," pointed out that under the fairness doctrine no particular individual or group is entitled to present alternative outlooks, and observed that "[e]ven if [petitioner] believes that the controversial issue of public importance in this case is defined as which candidate for the Democratic party's nomination has the soundest economic proposals, there is no evidence presented that this issue was discussed in the broadcast. * * * [T]he networks have indicated that they have presented coverage of Senator Kennedy's economic viewpoints." The bureau readily acknowledged that an incumbent president commands a media advantage over opponents, but deemed that ascendancy inevitable in light of the public interest in informing all Americans of newsworthy presidential appearances. The bureau noted that it was precisely to increase reporting of campaign activity that Congress in 1959 amended Section 315(a) to exempt news coverage from the equal-opportunity requirement.

In essence, then the bureau held that Section 312(a)(7) does not entitle a candidate to free time when time is available for purchase, and that establishment of a prima facie case under the fairness doctrine demands more than a bare conclusory assertion that a broadcaster has not balanced his programming on an important and controversial issue. Without awaiting an application from petitioner, the commission, in the interest of expedition, examined the bureau's decision and affirmed simply on the basis of the bureau's opinion. Then followed the instant petition for review by this court.

II. THE SECTION 312(A)(7) CLAIM

Petitioner's Section 312(a)(7) contention is that it required the networks to allot free time to Senator Kennedy, particularly in consequence of the so-called saturation coverage of President Carter's economic views shortly before the Illinois primary. Two theories are advanced in attempted support of this position. One is that Section 312(a)(7) provides a candidate for federal elective office with a contingent right of access to free time, triggered in this instance by the telecasts of the president's March 14 speech and press conference. The other is that independently of this contingent right, the section confers upon such a candidate direct and unqualified entitlement to use broadcast facilities without charge.

As soon we shall see, Sections 312(a)(7) and 315(a) of the Communications Act work in tandem to govern access to broadcast media by candidates for public office. With the interaction of these two sections at the heart of federal intervention in political broadcasting, we begin our assessment of petitioner's arguments with an analysis of their interrelationship.

A. THE STATUTORY SCHEME

The first part of Section 315(a) is its equal-opportunity provision, frequently referred to as an equal-time grant. In pertinent part it states:

If any licensee shall permit any person who is a legally qualified candidate for any public office to use a broadcasting station, he shall afford equal opportunities to all other such candidates for that office in the use of such broadcasting station: *Provided, * * ** No obligation is imposed under this subsection upon any licensee to allow the use of its station by any such candidate.

The import of this language is clear: any broadcaster who permits a "use" of station facilities by a legally qualified candidate must provide equal opportunities to that candidate's opponents. As originally enacted, this was the full extent of Section 315(a), but in 1959 Congress amended it to exclude candidate appearances in bona fide newscasts and news interviews, bona fide documentaries in which the appearance is incidental, and on-the-spot coverage of bona fide news events—which no longer constitute a "use" of broadcast facilities, and therefore are unencumbered by the equal-opportunity obligation. Since Section 315(a), as its proviso specifically states, does not impose an unconditional obligation on broadcasters to allow use of their station facilities by any candidate, the equal-opportunity grant has aptly been characterized as a contingent right of access. It does not compel a broadcaster to afford access to any candidate in the first instance, but it does mandate parity for all candidates for a given office once access by one is permitted. The duty is thus no more or less than to accord equal treatment to all legally qualified candidates for the same public office, and "equal opportunity" encompasses such elements as hour of the day, duration and charges.

As we have noted, four categories of news-type programs are expressly exempted from this equal-opportunity mandate. Those programs, like others, however, remain subject to the exigencies of the public interest and the demands of the fairness doctrine. The last sentence of Section 315(a) makes plain that broadcasters are not relieved, in connection with the presentation of newscasts, news interviews, news documentaries, and on-the-spot coverage of news events, from the obligation imposed upon them under [the act] to operate in the public interest and to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance.

This language, placed in Section 315(a) in 1959 when Congress added the exemptions to the equal-opportunity provision, codifies the fairness doctrine formulated by the commission in 1949. So, while broadcast of an event exempted by Section 315(a) does not enliven the equal-opportunity requirement, it does summon adherence to public-interest and "fairness" considerations. Since we address the ramifications as well as the confines of the fairness doctrine in detail at a later point, we need not dwell upon them now. It is sufficient merely to say that this is another means by which a candidate might gain entree to broadcast facilities for use in his campaign.

The third leaf of the triad governing candidate access to broadcast media is Section 312(a)(7), which authorizes the commission to revoke any station license or construction permit * * * for willful or repeated failure to allow reasonable access to or to permit purchase of reasonable amounts of time for the use of a broadcasting station by a legally qualified candidate for federal elective office on behalf of his candidacy.

The import of this passage is the focus of the instant litigation, and it is immediately apparent that its language alone does not dispense with need for inquiry into whether Section 312(a)(7) was intended to serve as an auxiliary to Section 315(a)'s equal-opportunity specification nor whether, when applicable, it assures candidates of some quantum of free time.

This is not the first time that a controversy has arisen over interpretation of Section 312(a)(7). In our recent decision in CBS v. FCC, we addressed the question whether Section 312(a)(7) was enacted as a new and additional entitlement to broadcast-media access for federal candidates, or whether it merely codified the pre-existing duty of broadcasters to provide time to such candidates pursuant to the general mandate to operate in the public interest. Reading Section 312(a)(7) in light of its legislative history, we concluded that it does indeed "create an affirmative right of access for individual candidates for federal elective office." We did not, however, attempt to define the monetary parameters of that right, for CBS involved refusal of requests to purchase time. To resolve the issues now before us—whether Section 312(a)(7) augments Section 315(a) as an additional but broader equal-opportunity exaction, and the extent to which it independently grants access on a free basis—we must return to the legislative history and undertake a somewhat broader analysis.

B. THE LEGISLATIVE HISTORY OF SECTION 312(A)(7)

Section 312(a)(7) had its genesis in the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971. Title I of that legislation, denominated the "Campaign Communications Reform Act," contained three distinct provisions: the reasonable-access requirement now embodied in Section 312(a)(7); the lowestunit-cost specification which is now Section 315(b)(1); and a spending limitation on use of communications media by candidates for federal elective office, which has since been repealed. Each provision stemmed from serious congressional concern over the ever-mounting expense of modern electioneering.

As in CBS we observed, “[t]oday, there can be no doubt that we are in the ‘era of television campaigning.’” “Indeed,” we said, “since 95 percent of our people operate a television set for an average of over five hours a day, and 60 percent of them rely primarily on television for news, it would be hard to overestimate the importance of television to our political processes.” This has not been an overnight phenomenon; nearly a decade ago Congress recognized that in consequence of its increasing public significance television was both boon and bane to the American electoral process. As one member put it, “we have in the technology of television the potential renaissance of the Athenian forum where the public gathers, political contenders debate the issues and enlightened citizen decisions are formed.”<sup>59</sup> But to many the exorbitant cost of television campaigning seemed more likely to inspire a rebirth of the oligarchical aspect of the Athenian government than a resurgence of the high level of civic awareness and participation for which Athenian citizens were renowned. Reliance on radio and television programming had become so expensive a necessity for would-be holders of public office that one Congressman was prompted to accuse the “[s]kyrocketing costs of campaigning in this electronic era” of having “increasingly made elective politics the special preserve of the wealthy or of those who have access to the funds of well-healed [sic] special interests.”

* * *

It would be a mistake, though, to surmise that the legislators were necessarily determined to limit the role of television in election efforts. Instead, as in 1959—when the equal-opportunity provision of Section 315(a) was modified by exemptions—the goal Congress had in mind in 1971 was to make the medium more responsive to civic needs, and to provide better and more complete information to the American public. The debates on the floors of both Houses evince a congressional intent to improve the quality of television campaigning and at the same time to take measures to decrease its cost. It was believed that the informational and educational aspects of political broadcasting could greatly be enhanced by ensuring that more time would be made available to candidates at lower rates. This expectably would encourage less dependence on thirty- to sixty-second “spots”—necessarily little more than slogans—in favor of longer, more illuminating presentations; it would also enable more candidates to afford the television appearances so instrumental to present-day electioneering.

The amendments forged by the Campaign Communications Reform Act thus were inspired principally by concern that the broadcast media were not making enough time available to candidates and that candidates were being charged excessively high rates for the time they were permitted to purchase. But while these problems were clearly enough defined, approaches to their solutions were not. A number of bills were brought before each House proposing amendments to the Communications Act designed to achieve the desired reforms. The three bills of greatest significance in formulation of the Campaign Communications Reform Act were introduced in the Senate, and the focal point of these proposals was the equal-opportunity provision of Section 315(a) of the act.

59. 117 Cong.Rec. 272 (1971) (Remarks of Senator Gravel).

* * *

* * * [T]wo principal bills before the Senate were S. 382 and S. 956. These proposals would have abolished Section 315(a)'s equal-opportunity provision with respect to presidential and vice-presidential candidates, a step advocated by many of those present at the hearings as well as by Members on the floor of each chamber. In the course of the hearings, the networks and various others with expertise in the field—including several Senators and Representatives—testified that the equal-opportunity feature of Section 315(a) was itself the major impediment to the complete and accurate coverage necessary to fully inform the public of candidates' positions on major issues. It was perceived that although the 1959 amendments to Section 315(a)—exempting four categories of bona fide news-type broadcasts from its equal-opportunity requirement—had mitigated the problem, the statutory specification of equality for all legally qualified candidates for public office unduly curtailed coverage of principal contenders because broadcasters feared that allotting time to one candidate would inevitably lead to appearances by a string of hopefuls, even those who had no realistic chance of securing a victory or even of gaining substantial support.

Promoters of abridgement of Section 315(a)'s equal-opportunity mandate also emphasized the recognized quality of broadcast coverage of the 1960 presidential campaign, a period during which Congress had temporarily suspended that requirement. Many witnesses and legislators advanced their belief that the famed televised debates between John F. Kennedy and Richard M. Nixon were able to take place only because the equal-opportunity provision was not in effect. The networks indicated their amenability to free time for such events in the future if they were permitted to limit telecasts to appearances of "major" candidates.

To deal with the problem of high rates for campaign broadcasts, and to enable candidates to cut campaign spending in keeping with a basic purpose of the Federal Election Campaign Act, both S. 382 and S. 956 proposed to amend Section 315(b) of the Communications Act, which then prohibited the cost of broadcast time to candidates from exceeding the cost to comparable users. Both bills contained provisions precluding broadcasters from charging candidates amounts in excess of the lowest unit cost available for their slots, though S. 956 limited this requirement to specified periods preceding elections; during all other periods comparable user-rates could remain in effect. This requirement became part of Title I of the Federal Election Campaign Act and is now codified as Section 315(b)(1) of the Communications Act.<sup>97</sup>

The principal differences between S.382 and S.956 involved their approaches to campaign media spending limitations. One other variation, however, is key to our discussion. Unlike S.382, S.956 included a provision designed "to insure that all licensees make available to legally quali-

97. Section 315(b)(1), as thus amended, now stipulates rate ceilings for campaign broadcasts as follows: The charges made for the use of any broadcasting station by any person who is a legally qualified candidate for any public office in connection with his campaign for nomination for election, or election, to such office shall not exceed—

(1) during the forty-five days preceding the date of primary or primary runoff election and during the sixty days preceding the date of a general or special election in which such person is a candidate, the lowest unit charge of the station for the same class and amount of time for the same period; and

(2) at any other time, the charges made for comparable use of such station by other users thereof.

47 U.S.C. § 315(b)(1) (1976).

fied candidates for public office reasonable amounts of time for use of broadcasting station * * *," and broadcasters who failed to comply with this directive could have their licenses revoked by the commission. Although the principal source of the legislation eventuating as the Federal Election Campaign Act was S.382, it was essentially this provision of S. 956 that was enacted as Section 312(a)(7).

The drafters of S.956 said very little about the function of the reasonable-access provision. We held in CBS that it was intended to confer at least an affirmative entitlement to use broadcast facilities; we found "a clear indication [in the legislative history] that candidates in federal elections were being singled out for something beyond the amorphous right of access created by the public interest doctrine." Whether the phrase "reasonable access" extends a still broader right, however, is the issue now before us—whether Section 312(a)(7) requires broadcasters to furnish free time upon request of a candidate for federal elective office.

The most straightforward reading of the language of Section 312(a)(7) is that broadcasters may fulfill their obligation thereunder either by allotting free time to a candidate or by selling the candidate time at the rates prescribed by Section 315(b). Section 312(a)(7) in terms authorizes license or permit revocation "for willful or repeated failure to allow reasonable access to or to permit purchase of reasonable amounts of time for the use of a broadcasting station," and "or" normally connotes the disjunctive. While "or" permissibly may be accepted in the conjunctive sense when that adequately appears to have been the legislative intent, in this instance the disjunctive interpretation is clearly supported.

Each reference to Section 312(a)(7) in the legislative history of the Campaign Communications Reform Act speaks of the sale of time. * * *

This consistent characterization of the statutory text as a mandate for sale of a reasonable amount of time supplies firm support for a disjunctive reading. And when the rejection of S.1's free-time provision is recalled, the possibility that Congress intended to demand more than that broadcasters sell reasonable amounts of time seems very remote. Indeed, it would not make sense to read into Section 312(a)(7) an entitlement Congress unmistakably scrapped when it declined to enact S.1 or any of its provisions into the Campaign Communications Reform Act. This conclusion is in harmony with Senator Pastore's declaration, a year after passage of that act, that "there was a great deal of pressure to mandate free time" but that Congress decided "to avoid that" and imposed something different.

Consequently, we discern no right to free time for candidates for federal elective office under Section 312(a)(7) either from a reading of the statutory text or from our analysis of its legislative history. Remaining to be answered, however, is the question whether the "reasonable access" language of Section 312(a)(7) sometimes accomplishes that and by affording a right of access to broadcast facilities auxiliary to the Section 315(a) right to equal opportunities.

An equal-opportunity quality for Section 312(a)(7) is mentioned only fleetingly in the legislative history. The very few references to the section as an equal-opportunity provision all concerned S.956 and the role that Section 312(a)(7) would play upon the anticipated—but ultimately aborted—revocation of the equal-opportunity mandate of Section 315(a) with respect to presidential and vice-presidential candidates. In this context, there was but one notable allusion to Section 312(a)(7) as a guaranty of fair treatment of such candidates by broadcasters. The idea, advanced by Senator Mathias, was that after excluding presidential and vice-presidential candidates from the benefit of Section 315(a)'s equal-opportunity provision, Section 312(a)(7) could serve as a source of authority for requiring broadcasters selling time to one such candidate to do the same for his opponents. This suggestion seems to have contemplated no more, however, than that Section 312(a)(7) could operate as a means of assuring that broadcasters would make sufficient quantities of time for purchase available to candidates for presidential or vice-presidential office.

Even assuming that these references tended somewhat to depict Section 312(a)(7) as something of an equal-opportunity auxiliary, that justification eroded away when the proposed partial suspension of Section 315(a)'s equal-opportunity provision failed to pass. There was warm support for suspension, which we noted earlier, but many legislators were fearful of abolition of that provision. Despite the positive experience of the suspensions of the 1960's grave doubts were raised, and the consequences of resting at the mercy of the broadcasters were viewed by some as too serious, especially by members of the House who were particularly wary of complete revocation. Consequently, the Conference Committee decided to eliminate the portion of the Senate bill proposing elimination of Section 315(a)'s equal-opportunity requirement in presidential and vice-presidential campaigns, and neither the final Conference Report nor the ensuing debate on the floor of either House again referred to Section 312(a)(7) as an equal-opportunity measure.

C. THE ADMINISTRATIVE INTERPRETATION OF SECTION 312

Save for the instant proceeding, the commission has not had occasion to consider whether Section 312(a)(7) grants an automatic right to respond to broadcast material additional to that defined in Section 315(a); and here the denial of petitioner's rather vague argument on that point was unelucidated. The Broadcast Bureau dismissed reliance on Section 312(a)(7) for that purpose as misplaced, stating merely that this "section of the law was intended to insure that broadcasters make available reasonable amounts of time for use by federal candidates," and the commission affirmed without opinion of its own. To be sure, this disposition evinces an underlying construction of Section 312(a)(7) not at all inharmonious with its legislative reflections, but it adds nothing to an understanding of why. There is, however, a significant history of administrative interpretation with respect to whether Section 312(a)(7), when it does obtain, grants its right of access on a free or a paid basis.

The commission has consistently read Section 312(a)(7) as giving broadcasters the option of fulfilling their obligation thereunder by offering to candidates either free time or the privilege of purchasing time. The commission first took this position in 1972, shortly after passage of Section 312(a)(7), when it issued a public notice in the form of questions and answers:

5. Q. Does the "reasonable access" provision of Section 312(a)(7) require commercial stations to give free time to legally qualified candidates for Federal elective office?

A. No, but the licensee cannot refuse to give free time and also [refuse] to permit the purchase of reasonable amounts of time. If the purchase of reasonable amounts of time is not permitted, then the station is required to give reasonable amounts of free time.

6. Q. If a commercial station gives reasonable amounts of free time to candidates for federal elective office, must it also permit purchase of reasonable amounts of time?

A. No. A commercial station is required either to provide reasonable amounts of free time or permit purchase of reasonable amounts of time.

It is not required to do both.<sup>124</sup>

The commission brought this public notice to the attention of Congress in 1973, and neither then nor at any time thereafter has Congress expressed disagreement with the commission's interpretation of Section 312(a)(7). To boot, the commission has reiterated its original interpretation on subsequent occasions. In publications designed to furnish guidance to candidates and licensees, the commission has constantly maintained that Section 312(a)(7) imposes upon licensees "the specific responsibility to afford either reasonable free access or the opportunity to purchase reasonable amounts of time to legally qualified candidates for federal elective office."<sup>126</sup> In 1976, the commission denied rulemaking petitions requesting a new regulation mandating free time for candidates. And in its most recent political broadcasting primer, the commission instructed:

The reader should also note that the law does not require a station to provide free time. It says the station either must provide reasonable access free or "permit purchase of reasonable amounts of time." Thus, if a station gives away enough time to a candidate to amount to "reasonable access" under the circumstances of the case, it is not required to sell time to the candidate, and if it sells the candidate "reasonable amounts" it need not provide free time.<sup>128</sup>

We are duty bound to honor the "venerable principle that the construction of a statute by those charged with its execution should be followed unless there are compelling indications that it is wrong * * *." Especially should we do so when the agency's initial interpretation of the statute is substantially contemporaneous with its enactment. And where, as here, the administrative interpretations have maintained consistency undeviatingly, there can be no doubt that the deference they command is considerably heightened.

D. CONCLUSIONS

The Communications Act envisions integration of two of its sections in a relatively uncomplicated scheme of access to broadcast facilities by candidates for public office. Section 312(a)(7) supplies a right of access by requiring broadcasters, on pain of license revocation, to make reasonable amounts of time available for use by legally qualified persons seeking federal elective office. This right is unconditional in the sense that no prior use by any opponent of that candidate is necessary. Irrefutably, reasonable access is for the asking if the candidate is willing to pay, and the amount he can be charged is carefully limited by law. The measure of the right remains constant, however, at "reasonable access."

Section 315(a), in turn, ordains that whenever a broadcaster permits any candidate for any public office—federal, state or local—to "use" broadcast facilities, the broadcaster must afford an equal opportunity to any legally qualified rival of that candidate who seeks it. This right is contingent in nature; it does not come into fruition unless and until an opponent makes some "use" of station facilities, but once that occurs it ripens, and the candidate becomes unconditionally entitled to equal opportunities, though to no more. The Section 315(a) duty arises, however, only with respect to an opponent's "use" of broadcast facilities; and coverage of an event within the purview of the four ex-

124. Use of Broadcast and Cablecast Facilities by Candidates for Public Office, 34 FCC2d 510, 537 (1972).

126. Licensee Responsibility Under Amendments to the Communications Act Made by the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, 47 FCC2d 516 (1974) [Emphasis supplied].

128. The Law of Political Broadcasting and Cablecasting, 69 FCC2d 2209, 2288 (1978) [footnote omitted].

emptions to that section is statutorily deemed a nonuse, and therefore does not activate the equal-opportunity requirement.

The statutory language and historical precedents also make plain that this section does not, however, confer the privilege of using the broadcaster's facilities without charge. Rather, we have found that broadcasters may meet the demands of Section 312(a)(7) either by an allotment of free time or by making time available for purchase.

We are satisfied, too, that a candidate cannot secure broadcast time, free or otherwise, through the simple expedient of reading Section 312(a)(7) as just another equal-opportunity provision. Nothing in the history of the section's evolution or its administrative interpretation serves to validate the thesis that it confers a second responsive right to broadcast privileges that may be employed as a supplement to Section 312(a)'s equal-opportunity mandate. And without some clear indication that Congress so intended, we perceive no justification for such a reading. Settled principles of statutory construction militate strongly against that interpretation, for it would engender grave doubt as to the internal consistency of the statutory scheme.

If Section 312(a)(7) were to be viewed as an auxiliary source of entitlement to equal opportunities, the exemptions to Section 315(a) would easily be destroyed. The purpose of these exclusions, it will be recalled, was to free broadcasters who carried any of four types of newsworthy "political" events from the equal-opportunity burden, and thereby to encourage more complete coverage of these events. Should Section 312(a)(7) be construed as automatically entitling a candidate to responsive broadcast access whenever and for whatever reason his opponent has appeared on the air, Section 315(a)'s exemptions would soon become meaningless. Statutes are to be interpreted, if possible, to give operation to all of their parts, and to maintain them in harmonious working relationship. Congress has devised a comprehensive and cohesive plan in which Section 312(a)(7), Section 315(a) and the latter's exemptions all have well-defined missions. No provision may be misused to defeat the effective functioning of another.

Consequently, we do not find in Section 312(a)(7) a right of access that Section 315 denies. Petitioner has not advanced any claim under Section 315(a), nor has it quarreled with the networks' unanimous conclusion that the broadcasts of the President's March 14 speech and press conference were immune from the equal-opportunity command of that section. We hold that petitioner cannot use Section 312(a)(7) to circumvent the explicit exemptions of Section 315(a).

We further hold that petitioner is not in a position to utilize Section 312(a)(7) in the manner in which Congress designed it to function. Petitioner has never claimed that it was denied an opportunity to buy time; rather, it has insisted that the networks violated Section 312(a)(7) simply by refusing to provide free time to Senator Kennedy. We have seen that the section entitles a candidate to free time only if and when a broadcaster refuses to sell a reasonable quantity of time. No showing of that sort has been made, or indeed undertaken.

We thus find petitioner's Section 312(a)(7) arguments unpersuasive. We turn now to a consideration of its contentions under the fairness doctrine. [The portion of this opinion dealing with the fairness doctrine is reported in the text, p. 891.]

* * *

Affirmed.

---

THE "FAIRNESS" DOCTRINE AND ACCESS TO BROADCASTING

The "Fairness" Doctrine and the RED LION Case —The Background

In November 1964, the Red Lion Broadcasting Co. of Red Lion, Pennsylvania carried a program series entitled The Christian Crusade. One of the programs included an attack by Rev. Billy James Hargis on a book entitled Goldwater—Extremist Of The Right.

Hargis made the following statements concerning Fred J. Cook, the book's author:

Now who is Cook? Cook was fired from the New York World-Telegram after he made a false charge publicly on television against an unnamed official of the New York City government. New York publishers and Newsweek magazine for December 7, 1959, showed that Fred Cook and his pal Eugene Gleason had made up the whole story and this confession was made to the District Attorney, Frank Hogan. After losing his job, Cook went to work for the left-wing publication, The Nation. * * * Now among other things Fred Cook wrote for The Nation was an article absolving Alger Hiss of any wrongdoing * * * there was a 208 page attack on the FBI and J. Edgar Hoover; another attack by Mr. Cook was on the Central Intelligence Agency * * * now this is the man who wrote the book to smear and destroy Barry Goldwater called Barry Goldwater—Extremist Of The Right.

The Red Lion case concerns the "personal attack" rule, an aspect of the "fairness" doctrine requiring that, when an individual is personally attacked, the station carrying the attack must give him an opportunity to reply. A question which had been unclear under the personal attack rule was whether the station had to furnish broadcast time free if the person attacked could not obtain a sponsor and was himself unable to pay for the time. (What is the "equal time" rule on this point?)

Cook asked the radio station for an opportunity to reply to Hargis. The radio station replied that the "personal attack" aspect of the "fairness" doctrine only required a licensee to make free time for reply available if no paid sponsorship could be secured. The station therefore insisted that Cook had to warrant that no such paid sponsorship could be found. Cook refused and instead complained to the FCC. The FCC took the position that the station had the duty to furnish reply time, paid or not. The FCC declared that it was not necessary for Cook to show that he could neither afford nor find sponsored time before the station's duty to make reply time available went into effect. The FCC ruled that the public interest required that the public be given an opportunity to learn the other side and that this duty remained even where the time had to be sustained by the station. The FCC entered a formal order to that effect, and the station appealed to the United States Court of Appeals.

The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in the Red Lion case held that the fairness doctrine and the personal attack rules were constitutional. Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 381 F.2d 908 (D.C.Cir. 1967). The court, in its decision recited the history of the personal attack rules. On July 1, 1964, the FCC had issued a Public Notice entitled Applicability of the Fairness Doctrine in the Handling of Controversial Issues of Public Importance, 29 Fed.Reg. 19415 (1964). This document, sometimes called the Fairness Primer, states that fairness complaints would continue to be dealt with on an ad hoc basis. The FCC stated further that broadcast licensees would be afforded an opportunity to take action or to comment upon complaints made against them to the FCC prior to action thereon by the FCC. In the same document the personal attack principle was dealt with in detail and the rules implementing this principle were specified. (The text of the personal attack rules is set forth in the Supreme Court's decision in the Red Lion case which follows this note.)

With the Red Lion decision in the court of appeals, the fairness doctrine prevailed in the first court test of its validity under the First Amendment as did its corollary, the personal attack rules.

The broadcast industry was shocked by the court of appeals decision in the Red Lion case. The Radio Television News Directors Association decided to institute suit for judicial review of FCC orders upholding the personal attack rules and reply time for political editorials. Suit was filed in the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit in Chicago, a forum which was perhaps selected because it was thought to be less sympathetic to government than the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in Washington. The United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit ruled that the personal attack rules and the political editorial rules would violate the First Amendment. Radio Television News Directors Association v. United States, 400 F.2d 1002 (7th Cir. 1968).

The seventh circuit in the RTNDA case essentially adopted many of the prior restraint contentions which the District of Columbia Circuit had rejected in the Red Lion case. Basically, the RTNDA decision took the position that broadcasters might forego controversial commentary if they had to go to the expense of furnishing transcripts of personal attacks to those attacked, and if they had to furnish time free for responses to those who wished to avail themselves of the right of reply furnished by the personal attack rules. Under such circumstances, the RTNDA court reasoned, free speech would be unconstitutionally inhibited.

The Supreme Court had granted review in Red Lion but decided to defer decision until the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals had decided the RTNDA case. When the FCC appealed the RTNDA ruling, the Supreme Court joined the two cases. The world of broadcast journalism eagerly watched to see how the Supreme Court would break the 1-1 score on the fairness doctrine and personal attack rules produced by the split between the two federal courts of appeal.

To the professed amazement of the broadcast industry, the Supreme Court affirmed the Red Lion decision and reversed the RTNDA decision. The fairness doctrine and the personal attack rules were upheld as consistent with the First Amendment by a unanimous Supreme Court consisting of all the seven justices who participated in the case. Not only did the Court decision speak warmly of fairness, it spoke equally warmly of a newer doctrine, access. The Red Lion decision in the Supreme Court opened up a new affirmative approach to First Amendment theory, at least as applied to the broadcast media. See generally, Barron, Freedom of the Press for Whom? The Right of Access to Mass Media 137-149 (1973).

---

RED LION BROADCASTING CO., INC. v. FCC

UNITED STATES v. RADIO TELEVISION NEWS DIRECTORS ASSOCIATION

395 U.S. 367, 89 S.Ct. 1794,
23 L.ED.2D 371 (1969).

Justice WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

The Federal Communications Commission has for many years imposed on radio and television broadcasters the requirement that discussion of public issues be presented on broadcast stations, and that each side of those issues must be given fair coverage. This is known as the fairness doctrine, which originated very early in the history of broadcasting and has maintained its present outlines for some time. It is an obligation whose content has been defined in a long series of FCC rulings in particular cases, and which is distinct from the statutory requirement of § 315 of the Communications Act that equal time be allotted all qualified candidates for public office. Two aspects of the fairness doctrine, relating to personal attacks in the context of controversial public issues and to political editorializing, were codified more precisely in the form of FCC regulations in 1967. The two cases before us now, which were decided separately below, challenge the constitutional and statutory bases of the doctrine and component rules. Red Lion involves the application of the fairness doctrine to a particular broadcast, and RTNDA arises as an action to review the FCC's 1967 promulgation of the personal attack and political editorializing regulations, which were laid down after the Red Lion litigation had begun.

* * *

Not long after the Red Lion litigation was begun, the FCC issued a Notice of Proposed Rule Making, 31 Fed.Reg. 5710, with an eye to making the personal attack aspect of the fairness doctrine more precise and more readily enforceable, and also to specify its rules relating to political editorials. After considering written comments supporting and opposing the rules, the FCC adopted them substantially as proposed, 32 Fed.Reg. 10303. Twice amended, 32 Fed.Reg. 11531, 33 Fed.Reg. 5362, the rules were held unconstitutional in the RTNDA litigation by the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit on review of the rule-making proceeding as abridging the freedoms of speech and press. 400 F.2d 1002 (1968).

As they now stand amended, the regulations read as follows:

"Personal attacks; political editorials.

(a) When, during the presentation of views on a controversial issue of public importance, an attack is made upon the honesty, character, integrity or like personal qualities of an identified person or group, the licensee shall, within a reasonable time and in no event later than one week after the attack, transmit to the person or group attacked: (1) notification of the date, time and identification of the broadcast; (2) a script or tape (or an accurate summary if a script or tape is not available) of the attack; and (3) an offer of a reasonable opportunity to respond over the licensee's facilities.

(b) The provisions of paragraph (a) of this section shall not be applicable (i) to attacks on foreign groups or foreign public figures; (ii) to personal attacks which are made by legally qualified candidates, their authorized spokesmen, or those associated with them in the campaign, on other such candidates, their authorized spokesmen, or persons associated with the candidates in the campaign; and (iii) to bona fide newscasts, bona fide news interviews, and on-the-spot coverage of a bona fide news event (including commentary or analysis contained in the foregoing programs, but the provisions of paragraph (a) shall be applicable to editorials of the licensee).

NOTE: The fairness doctrine is applicable to situations coming within (iii), above, and, in a specific factual situation, may be applicable in the general area of political broadcasts (ii), above. See Section 315(a) of the Act, 47 U.S.C. 315(a); Public Notice: Applicability of the Fairness Doctrine in the Handling of Controversial Issues of Public Importance. 29 Fed.Reg. 10415. The categories listed in (iii) are the same as those specified in Section 315(a) of the Act.

(c) Where a licensee, in an editorial, (i) endorses or (ii) opposes a legally qualified candidate or candidates, the licensee shall, within 24 hours after the editorial, transmit to respectively (i) the other qualified candidate or candidates for the same office or (ii) the candidate opposed in the editorial (1) notification of the date and the time of the editorial; (2) a script or tape of the editorial; and (3) an offer of a reasonable opportunity for a candidate or a spokesman of the candidate to respond over the licensee's facilities. Provided, however, that where such editorials are broadcast within 72 hours prior to the day of the election, the licensee shall comply with the provisions of this subsection sufficiently far in advance of the broadcast to enable the candidate or candidates to have a reasonable opportunity to prepare a response and to present it in a timely fashion." 47 CFR 73.123, 73.300, 73.598, 73.679 (all identical).

Believing that the specific application of the fairness doctrine in Red Lion, and the promulgation of the regulations in RTNDA, are both authorized by Congress and enhance rather than abridge the freedoms of speech and press protected by the First Amendment, we hold them valid and constitutional, reversing the judgment below in RTNDA and affirming the judgment below in Red Lion.

The history of the emergence of the fairness doctrine and of the related legislation shows that the commission's action in the Red Lion case did not exceed its authority, and that in adopting the new regulations the commission was implementing congressional policy rather than embarking on a frolic of its own.

* * *

After an extended period during which the licensee was obliged not only to cover and to cover fairly the views of others, but also to refrain from expressing his own personal views, Mayflower Broadcasting Corp., 8 FCC 333 (1941), the latter limitation on the licensee was abandoned and the doctrine developed into its present form.

There is a twofold duty laid down by the FCC's decisions and described by the 1949 Report on Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, 13 FCC 1246 (1949). The broadcaster must give adequate coverage to public issues, United Broadcasting Co., 10

FCC 515 (1945), and coverage must be fair in that it accurately reflects the opposing views. New Broadcasting Co., 6 P & F Radio Reg. 258 (1950). This must be done at the broadcaster's own expense if sponsorship is unavailable. Cullman Broadcasting Co., 25 P & F Radio Reg. 895 (1963). Moreover, the duty must be met by programming obtained at the licensee's own initiative if available from no other source.

* * *

When a personal attack has been made on a figure involved in a public issue, both the doctrine of cases such as Red Lion and Times-Mirror Broadcasting Co., 24 P & F Radio Reg. 404 (1962), and also the 1967 regulations at issue in RTNDA require that the individual attacked himself be offered an opportunity to respond. Likewise, where one candidate is endorsed in a political editorial, the other candidates must themselves be offered reply time to use personally or through a spokesman. These obligations differ from the general fairness requirement that issues be presented, and presented with coverage of competing views, in that the broadcaster does not have the option of presenting the attacked party's side himself or choosing a third party to represent that side. But insofar as there is an obligation of the broadcaster to see that both sides are presented, and insofar as that is an affirmative obligation, the personal attack doctrine and regulations do not differ from preceding fairness doctrine. The simple fact that the attacked men or unendorsed candidates may respond themselves or through agents is not a critical distinction, and indeed, it is not unreasonable for the FCC to conclude that the objective of adequate presentation of all sides may best be served by allowing those most closely affected to make the response, rather than leaving the response in the hands of the station which has attacked their candidates, endorsed their opponents, or carried a personal attack upon them.

The statutory authority of the FCC to promulgate these regulations derives from the mandate to the "commission from time to time, as public convenience, interest, or necessity requires" to promulgate "such rules and regulations and prescribe such restrictions and conditions * * * as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this chapter * * *." 47 U.S.C.A. § 303 and § 303(r). The commission is specifically directed to consider the demands of the public interest in the course of granting licenses, 47 U.S.C.A. §§ 307(a), 309(a); renewing them, 47 U.S.C.A. § 307; and modifying them. Ibid. Moreover, the FCC has included among the conditions of the Red Lion license itself the requirement that operation of the station be carried out in the public interest, 47 U.S.C.A. § 309(h). This mandate to the FCC to assure that broadcasters operate in the public interest is a broad one, a power "not niggardly but expansive," National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 190, 219 (1943), whose validity we have long upheld. It is broad enough to encompass these regulations.

The fairness doctrine finds specific recognition in statutory form, is in part modeled on explicit statutory provisions relating to political candidates, and is approvingly reflected in legislative history.

In 1959 the Congress amended the statutory requirement of § 315 that equal time be accorded each political candidate to except certain appearances on news programs, but added that this constituted no exception "from the obligation imposed upon them under this act to operate in the public interest and to afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance." Act of September 14, 1959, § 1, 73 Stat. 557, amending 47 U.S.C.A. § 315(a) [Emphasis added]. This language makes it very plain that Congress, in 1959, announced that the phrase "public interest," which had been in the act since 1927, imposed a duty on broadcasters to discuss both sides of controversial public issues. In other words, the amendment vindicated the FCC's general view that the fairness doctrine inhered in the public interest standard. Subsequent legislation enacted into law and declaring the intent of an earlier statute is entitled to great weight in statutory construction. And here this principle is given special force by the equally venerable principle that the construction of a statute by those charged with its execution should be followed unless there are compelling indications that it is wrong, especially when Congress has refused to alter the administrative construction. Here, the Congress has not just kept its silence by refusing to overturn the administrative construction, but has ratified it with positive legislation. Thirty years of consistent administrative construction left undisturbed by Congress until 1959, when that construction was expressly accepted, reinforce the natural conclusion that the public interest language of the act authorized the commission to require licensees to use their stations for discussion of public issues, and that the FCC is free to implement this requirement by reasonable rules and regulations which fall short of abridgment of the freedom of speech and press, and of the censorship proscribed by § 326 of the act.

The objectives of § 315 themselves could readily be circumvented but for the complementary fairness doctrine ratified by § 315. The section applies only to campaign appearances by candidates, and not by family, friends, campaign managers, or other supporters. Without the fairness doctrine, then, a licensee could ban all campaign appearances by candidates themselves from the air and proceed to deliver over his station entirely to the supporters of one slate of candidates, to the exclusion of all others. In this way the broadcaster could have a far greater impact on the favored candidacy than he could by simply allowing a spot appearance by the candidate himself. It is the fairness doctrine as an aspect of the obligation to operate in the public interest, rather than § 315, which prohibits the broadcaster from taking such a step.

* * *

It is true that the personal attack aspect of the fairness doctrine was not actually adjudicated until after 1959, so that Congress then did not have those rules specifically before it. However, the obligation to offer time to reply to a personal attack was presaged by the FCC's 1949 Report on Editorializing, which the FCC views as the principal summary of its ratio decidendi in cases in this area.

* * * When the Congress ratified the FCC's implication of a fairness doctrine in 1959 it did not, of course, approve every past decision or pronouncement by the commission on this subject, or give it a completely free hand for the future. The statutory authority does not go so far. But we cannot say that when a station publishes a personal attack or endorses a political candidate, it is a misconstruction of the public interest standard to require the station to offer time for a response rather than to leave the response entirely within the control of the station which has attacked either the candidacies or the men who wish to reply in their own defense. When a broadcaster grants time to a political candidate, Congress itself requires that equal time be offered to his opponents. It would exceed our competence to hold that the commission is unauthorized by the statute to employ a similar device where personal attacks or political editorials are broadcast by a radio or television station.

In light of the fact that the "public interest" in broadcasting clearly encompasses the presentation of vigorous debate of controversial issues of importance and concern to the public; the fact that the FCC has rested upon that language from its very inception a doctrine that these issues must be discussed, and fairly; and the fact that Congress has acknowledged that the analogous provisions of § 315 are not preclusive in this area, and knowingly preserved the FCC's complementary efforts, we think the fairness doctrine and its component personal attack and political editorializing regulations are a legitimate exercise of congressionally delegated authority. The Communications Act is not notable for the precision of its substantive standards and in this respect the explicit provisions of § 315, and the doctrine and rules at issue here which are closely modeled upon that section, are far more explicit than the generalized "public interest" standard in which the commission ordinarily finds its sole guidance, and which we have held a broad but adequate standard before. We cannot say that the FCC's declaratory ruling in Red Lion, or the regulations at issue in RTNDA, are beyond the scope of the congressionally conferred power to assure that stations are operated by those whose possession of a license serves "the public interest."

The broadcasters challenge the fairness doctrine and its specific manifestations in the personal attack and political editorial rules on conventional First Amendment grounds, alleging that the rules abridge their freedom of speech and press. Their contention is that the First Amendment protects their desire to use their allotted frequencies continuously to broadcast whatever they choose, and to exclude whomever they choose, from ever using that frequency. No man may be prevented from saying or publishing what he thinks, or from refusing in his speech or other utterances to give equal weight to the views of his opponents. This right, they say, applies equally to broadcasters.

Although broadcasting is clearly a medium affected by a First Amendment interest, United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., 334 U.S. 131, 166 (1948), differences in the characteristics of new media justify differences in the First Amendment standards applied to them. Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495, 503 (1952). For example, the ability of new technology to produce sounds more raucous than those of the human voice justifies restrictions on the sound level, and on the hours and places of use, of sound trucks so long as the restrictions are reasonable and applied without discrimination. Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77 (1949).

Just as the Government may limit the use of sound amplifying equipment potentially so noisy that it drowns out civilized private speech, so may the Government limit the use of broadcast equipment. The right of free speech of a broadcaster, the user of a sound truck, or any other individual does not embrace a right to snuff out the free speech of others. Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1, 20 (1945).

When two people converse face to face, both should not speak at once if either is to be clearly understood. But the range of the human voice is so limited that there could be meaningful communications if half the people in the United States were talking and the other half listening. Just as clearly, half the people might publish and the other half read. But the reach of radio signals is incomparably greater than the range of the human voice and the problem of interference is a massive reality. The lack of know-how and equipment may keep many from the air, but only a tiny fraction of those with resources and intelligence can hope to communicate by radio at the same time if intelligible communication is to be had, even if the entire radio spectrum is utilized in the present state of commercially acceptable technology.

It was this fact, and the chaos which ensued from permitting anyone to use any frequency at whatever power level he wished, which made necessary the enactment of the Radio Act of 1927 and the Communications Act of 1934, as the Court has noted at length before. National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 190, 210-214 (1943). It was this reality which at the very least necessitated first the division of the radio spectrum into portions reserved respectively for public broadcasting and for other important radio uses such as amateur operation, aircraft, police, defense, and navigation; and then the subdivision of each portion, and assignment of specific frequencies to individual users or groups of users. Beyond this, however, because the frequencies reserved for public broadcasting were limited in number, it was essential for the Government to tell some applicants that they could not broadcast at all because there was room for only a few.

Where there are substantially more individuals who want to broadcast than there are frequencies to allocate, it is idle to posit an unabridgeable First Amendment right to broadcast comparable to the right of every individual to speak, write, or publish. If 100 persons want broadcast licenses but there are only 10 frequencies to allocate, all of them may have the same "right" to a license; but if there is to be any effective communication by radio, only a few can be licensed and the rest must be barred from the airways. It would be strange if the First Amendment, aimed at protecting and furthering communications, prevented the government from making radio communication possible by requiring licenses to broadcast and by limiting the number of licenses so as not to overcrowd the spectrum.

This had been the consistent view of the Court. Congress unquestionably has the power to grant and deny licenses and to delete existing stations. Federal Radio Commission v. Nelson Bros. Bond & Mortgage Co., 289 U.S. 266 (1933). No one has a First Amendment right to a license or to monopolize a radio frequency; to deny a station license because "the public interest" requires it "is not a denial of free speech." National Broadcasting Co. v. U. S., 319 U.S. 190, 227 (1943).

By the same token, as far as the First Amendment is concerned those who are licensed stand no better than those to whom licenses are refused. A license permits broadcasting, but the licensee has no constitutional right to be the one who holds the license or to monopolize a radio frequency to the exclusion of his fellow citizens. There is nothing in the First Amendment which permits the government from requiring a licensee to share his frequency with others and to conduct himself as a proxy or fiduciary with obligations to present those views and voices which are representative of his community and which would otherwise, by necessity, be barred from the airwaves.

This is not to say that the First Amendment is irrelevant to public broadcasting. On the contrary, it has a major role to play as the Congress itself recognized in § 326, which forbids FCC interference with "the right of free speech by means of radio communications." Because of the scarcity of radio frequencies, the government is permitted to put restraints on licensees in favor of others whose views should be expressed on this unique medium. But the people as a whole retain their interest in free speech by radio and their collective right to have the medium function consistently with the ends and purposes of the First Amendment. It is the right of the viewers and listeners, not the right of the broadcasters, which is paramount. [Emphasis added.] See FCC v. Sanders Bros. Radio Station, 309 U.S. 470, 475 (1940); FCC v. Allentown Broadcasting Corp., 349 U.S. 358, 361-362 (1955); Z. Chafee, Government and Mass Communications 546 (1947). It is the purpose of the First Amendment to preserve an uninhibited marketplace of ideas in which truth will ultimately prevail, rather than to countenance monopolization of that market, whether it be by the government itself or a private licensee. * * * It is the right of the public to receive suitable access to social, political, esthetic, moral, and other ideas and experiences which is crucial here. That right may not constitutionally be abridged either by Congress or by the FCC.

Rather than confer frequency monopolies on a relatively small number of licensees, in a Nation of 200,000,000, the government could surely have decreed that each frequency should be shared among all or some of those who wish to use it, each being assigned a portion of the broadcast day or the broadcast week. The ruling and regulations at issue here do not go quite so far. They assert that under specified circumstances, a licensee must offer to make available a reasonable amount of broadcast time to those who have a view different from that which has already been expressed on his station. The expression of a political endorsement, or of a personal attack while dealing with a controversial public issue, simply triggers this time-sharing. As we have said, the First Amendment confers no right on licensees to prevent others from broadcasting on "their" frequencies and no right to an unconditional monopoly of a scarce resource which the government has denied others the right to use.

In terms of constitutional principle, and as enforced sharing of a scarce resource, the personal attack and political editorial rules are indistinguishable from the equal-time provision of § 315, a specific enactment of Congress requiring stations to set aside reply time under specified circumstances and to which the fairness doctrine and these constituent regulations are important complements. That provision, which has been part of the law since 1927, Radio Act of 1927, c. 169, § 18, 44 Stat. 1162, 1170, has been held valid by this court as an obligation of the licensee relieving him of any power in any way to prevent or censor the broadcast, and thus insulating him from liability for defamation. The constitutionality of the statute under the First Amendment was unquestioned. Farmers Educ. & Coop. Union v. WDAY, 360 U.S. 525 (1959).

Nor can we say that it is inconsistent with the First Amendment goal of producing an informed public capable of conducting its own affairs to require a broadcaster to permit answers to personal attacks occurring in the course of discussing controversial issues, or to require that the political opponents of those endorsed by the station be given a chance to communicate with the public.<sup>18</sup> Otherwise station owners and a few networks would have unfettered power to make time available only to the highest bidders, to communicate only their own views on public issues, people and candidates, and to permit on the air only those with whom they agreed. There is no sanctuary in the First Amendment for unlimited private censorship operating in a medium not open to all. "Freedom of the press from governmental interference under the First Amendment does not sanction repression of that freedom by private interests." Associated Press v. U. S., 326 U.S. 1, 20 (1944).

It is strenuously argued, however, that, if political editorials or personal attacks will trigger an obligation in broadcasters to afford the opportunity for expression to speakers who need not pay for time and whose views are unpalatable to the licensees, then broadcasters will be irresistibly forced to self-censorship and their coverage of controversial public issues will be eliminated or at least rendered wholly ineffective. Such a result would indeed be a serious matter, for should licensees actually eliminate their coverage of controversial issues, the purposes of the doctrine would be stifled.

At this point, however, as the Federal Communications Commission has indicated, that possibility is at best speculative. The communications industry, and in particular the networks have taken pains to present controversial issues in the past, and even now they do not assert that they intend to abandon their efforts in this regard. It would be better if the FCC's encouragement were never necessary to induce the broadcasters to meet their responsibility. And if experience with the administration of these doctrines indicates that they have the net effect of reducing rather than enhancing the volume and quality of coverage, there will be time enough to reconsider the constitutional implications. The fairness doctrine in the past has had no such overall effect.

That this will occur now seems unlikely, however, since if present licensees should suddenly prove timorous, the commission is not powerless to insist that they give adequate and fair attention to public issues. It does not violate the First Amendment to treat licensees given the privilege of using scarce radio frequencies as proxies for the entire community, obligated to give suitable time and attention to matters of great public concern. To condition the granting or renewal of licenses on a willingness to present representative community views on controversial issues is consistent with the ends and purposes of those constitutional provisions forbidding the abridgment of freedom of speech and freedom of the press. Congress need not stand idly by and permit those with licenses to ignore the problems which beset the people or to exclude from the airways anything but their own views of fundamental questions. The statute, long administrative practice, and cases are to this effect.

* * *

18. The expression of views opposing those which broadcasters permit to be aired in the first place need not be confined solely to the broadcasters themselves as proxies. "Nor is it enough that he should hear the arguments of his adversaries from his own teachers, presented as they state them, and accompanied by what they offer as refutations. That is not the way to do justice to the arguments, or bring them into real contact with his own mind. He must be able to hear them from persons who actually believe them; who defend them in earnest, and do their very utmost for them." J. S. Mill, "On Liberty" 32 ed., R. McCallum, 1947.

The litigants embellish their first amendment arguments with the contention that the regulations are so vague that their duties are impossible to discern. Of this point it is enough to say that, judging the validity of the regulations on their face as they are presented here, we cannot conclude that the FCC has been left a free hand to vindicate its own idiosyncratic conception of the public interest or of the requirements of free speech. Past adjudications by the FCC give added precision to the regulations; there was nothing vague about the FCC's specific ruling in Red Lion that Fred Cook should be provided an opportunity to reply. The regulations at issue in RTNDA could be employed in precisely the same way as the fairness doctrine was in Red Lion. Moreover, the FCC itself has recognized that the applicability of its regulations to situations beyond the scope of past cases may be questionable, 32 Fed.Reg. 10303, 10304 and n. 6, and will not impose sanctions in such cases without warning. We need not approve every aspect of the fairness doctrine to decide these cases, and we will not now pass upon the constitutionality of these regulations by envisioning the most extreme applications conceivable, United States v. Sullivan, 332 U.S. 689, 694 (1948), but will deal with those problems if and when they arise.

We need not and do not now ratify every past and future decision by the FCC with regard to programming. There is no question here of the commission's refusal to permit the broadcaster to carry a particular program or to publish his own views; of a discriminatory refusal to require the licensee to broadcast certain views which have been denied access to the airways; of government censorship of a particular program contrary to § 326; or of the official government view dominating public broadcasting. Such questions would raise more serious first amendment issues. But we do hold that the Congress and the commission do not violate the First Amendment when they require a radio or television station to give reply time to answer personal attacks and political editorials. * * *

In view of the prevalence of scarcity of broadcast frequencies, the government's role in allocating those frequencies, and the legitimate claims of those unable without governmental assistance to gain access to those frequencies for expression of their views, we hold the regulations and ruling at issue here are both authorized by statute and constitutional. The judgment of the court of appeals in Red Lion is affirmed and that in RTNDA reversed and the causes remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

---

COMMENT

1. Note the Supreme Court's response to the industry position espoused by the Court in the RTNDA case that the fairness doctrine serves as a depressant rather than as a stimulant to debate. The end result of the fairness doctrine, under this view, is blandness rather than any offering of contentious and vigorous debate. The Court suggested that the FCC licensing process could be conditioned on the willingness of broadcast licensees to present representative community views on controversial public issues.

A particular incident where the interests of free debate were not served by a broadcaster's performance will rarely warrant denial of the broadcaster's license renewal application. How can fairness be enforced in a particular case assuming the drastic remedy of license denial at renewal time is not thought appropriate?

* * *

2. Why did the FCC in effect rule that if a person has a right of reply under the personal attack rules, the station must put him on free if he is not willing to pay? WGCN in Red Lion, Pennsylvania was a small, independent station whose rates compared to network time were not high. Presumably the FCC reasoned that if a principle were followed of only permitting paid reply time when the personal attack rules were involved, the high cost of network time, particularly television time, would serve to make the personal attack rules a dead letter. Few could or would wish to pay for reply time under such circumstances.

Both the court of appeals and the Supreme Court in the Red Lion case cited Cullman Broadcasting Co., 40 FCC 516 (1963), for the proposition that once a fairness doctrine obligation arises, time must be provided by the licensee at his own expense if sponsorship is not available. The FCC described Cullman rights as follows in the Democratic National Committee case:

* * * The paramount public interest, we stressed, is the right of the public to be informed. The licensee has adjudged that an issue is of importance to its area by presenting the first viewpoint; that being so, the public's right to hear the other side cannot turn on whether the licensee received money. This approach perfectly fits the public trustee concept. See, In re Democratic National Committee, Washington, D. C., Request for Declaratory Ruling Concerning Access to Time on Broadcast Stations, 25 FCC2d 216 (1970).

The Red Lion case marks the extension of the Cullman principle of a right of free response from the fairness doctrine context to the context of the personal attack rules once a licensee obligation under the personal attack rules arises.

3. Although the Red Lion decision professes allegiance to the scarcity rationale for broadcast regulation, does the case actually recognize a new justification for broadcast regulation? Does it add a new access-for-ideas justification for broadcast regulation which goes beyond the older rationalization of limited access to the spectrum?

4. The invalidation in Miami Herald Pub. Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974), of a state statutory right to reply to the print media in the case of editorial attack presents a vivid contrast to the right of reply to personal attack in the broadcast media upheld in Red Lion. In Miami Herald, the Supreme Court held, in a unanimous opinion, that a Florida statute requiring a newspaper to grant a political candidate equivalent space to reply if the paper editorially attacked the candidate violated the First Amendment. (See this text, p. 584). The Miami Herald decision does not so much as cite the Red Lion case decided only five years earlier. Henry Geller, former General Counsel of the FCC, has argued that "there is a direct conflict between Tornillo and Red Lion * * *." But he argues at the same time that the conflict is understandable. See Geller, Does Red Lion Square With Tornillo? 29 U. of Miami L.Rev. 477 (1975).
* * *

Geller points out that even if the fairness doctrine were abolished, government regulation would still play a role in the broadcast media that it does not play in the print media:

The point is that by eliminating the fairness doctrine, the problem of government control is not eliminated as long as regulation and licensing based on the public trust concept continues. But the public would be left wholly unprotected from licensees based on presenting only one side of an issue. I, for one, would not accept that.

In one of the opinions in the Pensions case, text, p. 876, Judge Tamm spoke directly to the broadcaster argument that Red Lion and Tornillo were flatly inconsistent:

I find the decisions "flatly consistent." Arguments advanced to the contrary are only reflective of broadcasters' desires to become indistinguishable from the print media and to be freed of their obligations as public trustees. While the relevancy of Red Lion was fully briefed in Tornillo, that decision contained no reference to Red Lion or to implications for the broadcast media. I read the Court's striking down a reply rule for newspapers in Tornillo after upholding a similar rule for broadcasters in Red Lion as demonstrating the Court's continuing recognition of the distinction between the two media, which is primarily manifested in the unique responsibilities of broadcasters as public trustees. See, National Broadcasting Co., Inc. v. FCC, 516 F.2d 1101 at 1193-1194 (D.C.Cir. 1974).

Do the "Fairness" Doctrine and its Related Rules Apply to Cable Television?

47 CFR § 76.209 (1981) consists of three distinct provisions, the first of which applies the "fairness doctrine" to origination cablecasting: "[A] cable television system operator engaging in origination cablecasting shall afford reasonable opportunity for the discussion of conflicting views on issues of public importance."

The second provision of § 76.209 concerns the original cablecasting of "personal attacks." The FCC requires that when an attack is made upon the "honesty, character, integrity, or like personal qualities of an identified person or group, the cable system operator shall, within a reasonable time and in no event later than one week, transmit to the person or group attacked:

1. Notification of the date, time, and identification of the cablecast;

2. a transcript or accurate summary of the attack; and

3. an offer of a reasonable opportunity to respond over the system's facilities."

The FCC exempts from the above requirements those cablecasts:

1. which personally attack foreign public figures;

2. which contain personal attacks made by a "legally qualified candidate for public office"; and

3. which occur during a bona fide newscast, news interview, or any on-the-spot coverage of a bona fide news event.

The third portion of § 76.209 concerns the cablecasting of political editorials. This provision, which is similar in nature to § 76.205, is invoked whenever a cable system publicly endorses or opposes a legally qualified candidate or candidates. Whenever a cable system engages in editorials of this nature, the operator must transmit to the candidate opposed, within twenty-four hours of the editorial, a) notice of the editorial, b) a script or tape of the editorial, and c) an offer of a reasonable opportunity for response. The FCC further requires, under part c), that where editorials are cablecast within seventy-two hours prior to the day of the election, cable system operators must comply with the procedures above sufficiently far in advance to allow for a reasonable opportunity to respond.

In short, cable operators are bound by the same fairness, political editorializing, and personal attack rules which broadcasters are bound by. The First Amendment rationale for applying the fairness doctrine to broadcasters is, according to the reasoning in Red Lion, the scarcity of the spectrum rationale. Is it not at least arguable that the regulations making fairness rules, et al., applicable to cable violate the First Amendment? After all, cable, unlike broadcasting, is usually described as a technology of abundance. See text, p. 998.

Cigarette Advertising in Broadcasting: From "Fairness" to Prohibition?

The BANZHAF Case

1. In December 1966, a young lawyer, John W. Banzhaf, asked WCBS-TV in New York for reply time to respond to cigarette commercials. The request raised a familiar fairness doctrine problem: were advertisements subject to the fairness doctrine? (In the past, the FCC has said the fairness doctrine would extend to a controversy which concerned advertising. Petition of Sam Morris, 11 FCC 197 [1946].) WCBS-TV rejected the Banzhaf proposal. But on complaint to the FCC, the FCC held that time should be provided for reply to cigarette advertisements because, among other reasons, the question of whether or not cigarettes were a threat to health was a controversial issue. WCBS-TV, 8 FCC2d 381 (1967); affirmed Applicability of the Fairness Doctrine to Cigarette Advertising, 9 FCC2d 921 (1967).

The United States Court of Appeals, per Chief Judge Bazelon, sustained the FCC decision ordering reply time to cigarette advertising Banzhaf v. FCC, 405 F.2d 1082 (D.C.Cir. 1968).

The court made a valiant effort in Banzhaf to confine its decision ordering reply time to cigarette advertising alone. But is the cigarette advertising situation truly unique?

2. The court in Banzhaf sustained the application of the Fairness Doctrine to cigarette advertising. But the fairness doctrine was not the only ground which the court relied on for its decision. The FCC's obligation to define and enforce the public interest in broadcasting was another and independent ground for the court's decision in Banzhaf. The public interest in warning the public against the danger that cigarette smoking presented to health had been manifested in publications, actions, and policies of many federal government instrumentalities.

Similarly, the uniqueness of the public interest and public health factors were emphasized by Judge Bazelon for the court in Banzhaf in an effort to thwart any implication that reply time to product advertisements could be ordered by the FCC under either the fairness doctrine or the public interest standard as a general proposition.

3. In Banzhaf, Judge Bazelon suggested that First Amendment protection may contain an affirmative dimension. The court implied that the marketplace of ideas in broadcasting may not be self-corrective. A debate between cigarette advertisers whose ads consisted of a sizable fraction of all broadcast revenues and opponents of cigarette smoking with no such "financial clout" may be no debate at all. In such circumstances the provision of free television reply time to cigarette ads appeared to the court to be entirely appropriate: "We do not think the principle of free speech stands as a barrier to required broadcasting of facts and information vital to an informed decision to smoke or not to smoke."

In summary, the court of appeals in Banzhaf affirmed the FCC decision ordering reply time to counter cigarette advertising on three separate grounds:

1. the fairness doctrine,

2. a definition of the public interest standard (reply time is appropriate in light of extraordinary and unique circumstances and when consistent with a demonstrably clear federal policy), and

3. the First Amendment (on a theory that governmental intervention in the form of compulsory reply time is permissible where necessary to serve as a "countervailing" force where meaningful broadcast debate would otherwise be impossible).

The latter two of these three bases of decision in Banzhaf were at least as important as the fairness doctrine in shaping the court's decision.

4. In its effort to make the ruling of reply time for cigarette advertisements unique and to keep it from being extended to other product advertisements, the court remarked that "the danger cigarettes may pose to health is, among others, a danger to life itself." Did this very sentence, which was designed to confine the scope of the Banzhaf ruling, in fact serve to expand or contract it? See, Friends of the Earth v. FCC, 449 F.2d 1164 (D.C.Cir.1971), text, infra, p. 867.

5. The Banzhaf case held that cigarette advertising had to be counterbalanced by expression devoted to pointing out the hazards of cigarette smoking and affirmed the FCC ruling that the "fairness" doctrine applied to cigarette advertising. The case had stressed that cigarette smoking was a controversial issue of great gravity which demanded balanced presentation. Is the health danger of cigarette smoking any longer a controversial issue?

In the Public Health Cigarette Smoking Act of 1969 Congress banned the advertising of cigarettes (but not cigarillos!) in broadcasting. The statute, 15 U.S.C.A. § 1335 states:

After January 1, 1971, it shall be unlawful to advertise cigarettes in any medium of electronic communication subject to the jurisdiction of the FCC.

Capital Broadcasting Co. v. Mitchell

Is a Congressional prohibition against advertisements of a particular product, no matter what the content of the ads, a violation of the First Amendment?

The issue was resolved in Capital Broadcasting Co. v. Mitchell, 333 F.Supp. 582 (D.D.C.1971), where the federal court held that enforcement of 15 U.S.C.A. § 1335 did not offend due process nor did it violate the First Amendment rights of broadcasters. The Supreme Court affirmed without opinion. Capital Broadcasting Co. v. Kleindienst, 405 U.S. 1000 (1972). The federal court sustained the statute on a number of grounds. First, product advertising is less vigorously protected by the First Amendment than other kinds of expression. Second, "[t]he unique characteristics of electronic communication make it especially subject to regulation in the public interest." Third, Congress, whether in its supervisory role over the federal administrative process or under its constitutional power to regulate interstate commerce, "has the power to prohibit the advertising of cigarettes in any media."

On the First Amendment issue, the court said that the statute did impose a loss of revenue on broadcasters but did not prohibit them from disseminating information about cigarettes.

Broadcasters contended that the cigarette advertising ban law violated due process because the print media were not prohibited from carrying cigarette ads. Only the electronic media were so restricted. Broadcasters said that such a distinction was "arbitrary and invidious." The court pointed out that the legislature can regulate one evil at a time. The test is whether there is a rational basis for regulating one medium of communication but not another. The court ruled that Congress had acted on the basis of information which indicated that such a distinction was reasonably justified:

Substantial evidence showed that the most persuasive advertising was being conducted on radio and television, and that these broadcasts were particularly effective in reaching a very large audience of young people.

* * *

A pre-school or early elementary school age child can hear and understand a radio commercial or see, hear, and understand a television commercial, while at the same time be substantially unaffected by an advertisement printed in a newspaper, magazine or appearing on a billboard.

Judge Skelley Wright dissented in Capital Broadcasting and provided some of the background behind the controversy. As a result of the Banzhaf case, "exceedingly effective anti-smoking commercials" had resulted in a "sustained trend toward lesser cigarette consumption." Judge Wright said that the cigarette industry itself had asked the Congress to bar cigarette advertising:

The Banzhaf ruling had clearly made electronic media advertising a losing proposition for the industry, and a voluntary withdrawal would have saved the companies approximately $250,000,000 in advertising costs, relieved political pressure for FCC action, and removed most anti-smoking messages from the air.

In Wright's view, the cigarette advertising ban law resulted in the transfer by tobacco companies of their advertising budgets to the print media "where there was no fairness doctrine to require a response." The Banzhaf decision had increased the information flow but, said Judge Wright, "the 1969 act cut off the flow of information altogether."

The CBS Case: The Broadcast Access Controversy

What has Red Lion's promise of suitable access to the public for ideas actually brought forth? One immediate result of the Red Lion decision was the release of a pent-up demand for individual and group access to television. The volume of access and fairness complaints rushing into the FCC was truly remarkable.

Symptomatic of the tremendous citizen pressure for access for political and social controversy and controversialists on television was an FCC decision which actually required a specific program to be provided for a specific point of view. See In re Complaints of the Committee for the Fair Broadcasting of Controversial Issues, 25 FCC2d 283 (1970).

In that case the FCC ordered on August 14, 1970 that, in view of the fact that Richard Nixon had given five presidential speeches in favor of American involvement in Vietnam, one prime time speech by an appropriate spokesman "for the contrasting viewpoint to that of the Administration on the Indochina war issue" was required.

Dissatisfaction with complete broadcaster control over entry to broadcasting for political groups and ideas continued unabated. In May 1970, the Democratic National Committee asked the FCC to prohibit broadcasters from refusing to sell time to groups like the Democratic National Committee for the solicitation of funds and for comment on public issues. The networks took the position that they did not sell half-hour segments of time for political and social comment. The FCC was sympathetic to the need of political parties for political spot announcements in which to solicit funds. But the FCC refused to rule that the networks were required to sell time to groups for the dissemination of political and social ideas. Such a rule, said the FCC, would be hostile to the broadcaster's role as trustee for the public. As between access and trusteeship, the FCC came down firmly in the Democratic National Committee case for licensee trusteeship, a term which the FCC defined to give broadcasters absolute discretion over programming.

Shortly thereafter, the U. S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia reversed and remanded the FCC's ruling. Business Executives' Move v. FCC, 450 F.2d 642 (D.C.Cir. 1971). The Supreme Court in turn reversed the court of appeals in the opinions which follow:

---

CBS v. DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEE

412 U.S. 94, 93 S.Ct. 2080, 36 L.Ed.2d 772 (1973).

Chief Justice BURGER delivered the opinion of the Court: * * *

* * *

In two orders announced the same day, the Federal Communications Commission ruled that a broadcaster who meets his public obligation to provide full and fair coverage of public issues is not required to accept editorial advertisements. A divided court of appeals reversed the commission, holding that a broadcaster's fixed policy of refusing editorial advertisements violates the First Amendment; the court remanded the cases to the commission to develop procedures and guidelines for administering a First Amendment right of access.

The complainants in these actions are the Democratic National Committee (DNC) and the Business Executives' Move for Vietnam Peace (BEM), a national organization of businessmen opposed to United States involvement in the Vietnam conflict. In January 1970, BEM filed a complaint with the commission charging that radio station WTOP in Washington, D. C., had refused to sell its time to broadcast a series of one-minute spot announcements expressing BEM views on Vietnam. WTOP, in common with many but not all broadcasters, followed a policy of refusing to sell time for spot announcements to individuals and groups who wished to expound their views on controversial issues. WTOP took the position that since it presented full and fair coverage of important public questions, including the Vietnam conflict, it was justified in refusing to accept editorial advertisements. WTOP also submitted evidence showing that the station had aired the views of critics of our Vietnam policy on numerous occasions. BEM challenged the fairness of WTOP's coverage of criticism of that policy, but it presented no evidence in support of that claim.

Four months later, in May 1970, the DNC filed with the commission a request for a declaratory ruling:

That under the First Amendment to the Constitution and the Communications Act, a broadcaster may not, as a general policy, refuse to sell time to responsible entities, such as DNC, for the solicitation of funds and for comment on public issues.

DNC claimed that it intended to purchase time from radio and television stations and from the national networks in order to present the views of the Democratic Party and to solicit funds. Unlike BEM, DNC did not object to the policies of any particular broadcaster but claimed that its prior "experiences in this area make it clear that it will encounter considerable difficulty—if not total frustration of its efforts—in carrying out its plans in the event the commission should decline to issue a ruling as requested." DNC cited Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969) as establishing a limited constitutional right of access to the airwaves.

In two separate opinions, the commission rejected respondents' claim that "responsible" individuals and groups have a right to purchase advertising time to comment on public issues without regard to whether the broadcaster has complied with the Fairness Doctrine. The commission viewed the issue as one of major significance in administering the regulatory scheme relating to the electronic media, one going "to the heart of the system of broadcasting which has developed in this country. * * *" 25 FCC2d at 221. After reviewing the legislative history of the Communications Act, the provisions of the act itself, the commission's decisions under the act and the difficult problems inherent in administering a right of access, the commission rejected the demands of BEM and DNC.

The commission also rejected BEM's claim that WTOP had violated the Fairness Doctrine by failing to air views such as those held by members of BEM; the commission pointed out that BEM had made only a "general allegation" of unfairness in WTOP's coverage of the Vietnam conflict and that the station had adequately rebutted the charge by affidavit. The commission did, however, uphold DNC's position that the statute recognized a right of political parties to purchase broadcast time for the purpose of soliciting funds. The commission noted that Congress has accorded special consideration for access by political parties, see 47 U.S.C.A. § 315(a), and that solicitation of funds by political parties is both feasible and appropriate in the short space of time generally allotted to spot advertisements.<sup>1</sup>

A majority of the court of appeals reversed the commission, holding that "a flat ban on paid public issue announcements is in violation of the First Amendment, at least when other sorts of paid announcements are accepted." 450 F.2d at 646. Recognizing that the broadcast frequencies are a scarce resource inherently unavailable to all, the court nevertheless concluded that the First Amendment mandated an "abridgeable" right to present editorial advertisements. The court reasoned that a broadcaster's policy of airing commercial advertisements but not editorial advertisements constitutes unconstitutional discrimination. The court did not, however, order that either BEM's or DNC's proposed announcements must be accepted by the broadcasters; rather it remanded the cases to the commission to develop "reasonable procedures and regulations determining which and how many 'editorial advertisements' will be put on the air." Ibid.

* * *

* * * [W]e next proceed to consider whether a broadcaster's refusal to accept editorial advertisements is governmental action violative of the First Amendment.

* * * The Court has not previously considered whether the action of a broadcast licensee such as that challenged here is "governmental action" for purposes of the First Amendment. The holding under review thus presents a novel question, and one with far-reaching implications. See L. Jaffe, The Editorial Responsibility of the Broadcaster, 85 Harv.L.Rev. 768, 782-787 (1972).

The court of appeals held that broadcasters are instrumentalities of the government for First Amendment purposes, relying on the thesis, familiar in other contexts, that broadcast licensees are granted use of part of the public domain and are regulated as "proxies" or "fiduciaries of the people." 450 F.2d, at 652. These characterizations are not without validity for some purposes, but they do not resolve the sensitive constitutional issues inherent in deciding whether a particular licensee action is subject to First Amendment restraints.

* * * The historic aversion to censorship led Congress to enact § 326 of the act which explicitly prohibits the commission from interfering with the exercise of free speech over the broadcast frequencies. Congress pointedly refrained from divesting broadcasters of their control over the selection of voices; § 3(h) of the act stands as firm congressional statement that broadcast licensees are not to be treated as common carriers, obliged to accept whatever is tendered by members of the public. Both these provisions clearly manifest the intention of Congress to maintain a substantial measure of journalistic independence for the broadcast licensee.

* * *

The tensions inherent in such a regulatory structure emerge more clearly when we compare a private newspaper with a broadcast licensee. The power of a privately owned newspaper to advance its own political, social, and economic views is bounded by only two factors: first, the acceptance of a sufficient number of readers—and hence advertisers—to assure financial success; and, second, the journalistic integrity of its editors and publishers. A broadcast licensee has a large measure of journalistic freedom but not as large as that exercised by a newspaper. A licensee must balance what it might prefer to do as a private entrepreneur with what it is required to do as a “public trustee.” To perform its statutory duties, the commission must oversee without censoring. This suggests something of the difficulty and delicacy of administering the Communications Act—a function calling for flexibility and the capacity to adjust and readjust the regulatory mechanism to meet changing problems and needs.

1. The commission's rulings against BEM's Fairness Doctrine complaint and in favor of DNC's claim that political parties should be permitted to purchase airtime for solicitation of funds were not appealed to the court of appeals and are not before us here.

The licensee policy challenged in this case is intimately related to the journalistic role of a licensee for which it has been given initial and primary responsibility by Congress. The licensee’s policy against accepting editorial advertising cannot be examined as an abstract proposition, but must be viewed in the context of its journalistic role. It does not help to press on us the idea that editorial ads are “like” commercial ads for the licensee’s policy against editorial spot ads is expressly based on a journalistic judgment that 10 to 60 second spot announcements are ill suited to intelligible and intelligent treatment of public issues; the broadcaster has chosen to provide a balanced treatment of controversial questions in a more comprehensive form. Obviously the licensee’s evaluation is based on its own journalistic judgment of priorities and newsworthiness.

Moreover, the commission has not fostered the licensee policy challenged here; it has simply declined to command particular action because it fell within the area of journalistic discretion. The commission explicitly emphasized that “there is of course no commission policy thwarting the sale of time to comment on public issues.” 25 FCC2d, at 226. The commission’s reasoning, consistent with nearly 40 years of precedent, is that so long as a licensee meets its “public trustee” obligation to provide balanced coverage of issues and events, it has broad discretion to decide how that obligation will be met. We do not reach the question whether the First Amendment or the Act can be read to preclude the commission from determining that in some situations the public interest requires licensees to re-examine their policies with respect to editorial advertisements. The commission has not yet made such a determination; it has, for the present at least, found the policy to be within the sphere of journalistic discretion which Congress has left with the licensee.

Thus, it cannot be said that the government is a “partner” to the action of broadcast licensee complained of here, nor is it engaged in a “symbiotic relationship” with the licensee, profiting from the invidious discrimination of its proxy. The First Amendment does not reach acts of private parties in every instance where the Congress or the commission has merely permitted or failed to prohibit such acts.

Our conclusion is not altered merely because the commission rejected the claims of BEM and DNC and concluded that the challenged licensee policy is not inconsistent with the public interest.

* * *

Here, Congress has not established a regulatory scheme for broadcast licensees. * * * More important, as we have noted, Congress has affirmatively indicated in the Communications Act that certain journalistic decisions are for the licensee, subject only to the restrictions imposed by evaluation of its overall performance under the public interest standard. * * *

More profoundly, it would be anomalous for us to hold, in the name of promoting the constitutional guarantees of free expression, that the day-to-day editorial decisions of broadcast licensees are subject to the kind of restraints urged by respondents. To do so in the name of the

First Amendment would be a contradiction. Journalistic discretion would in many ways be lost to the rigid limitations that the First Amendment imposes on government. Application of such standards to broadcast licensees would be antithetical to the very ideal of vigorous, challenging debate on issues of public interest. Every licensee is already held accountable for the totality of its performance of public interest obligations.

The concept of private, independent broadcast journalism, regulated by government to assure protection of the public interest, has evolved slowly and cautiously over more than 40 years and has been nurtured by processes of adjudication. That concept of journalistic independence could not co-exist with a reading of the challenged conduct of the licensee as governmental action. Nor could it exist without administrative flexibility to meet changing needs and the swift technological developments. We therefore conclude that the policies complained of do not constitute governmental action violative of the First Amendment. * * *

There remains for consideration the question whether the "public interest" standard of the Communications Act requires broadcasters to accept editorial advertisements or, whether, assuming governmental action, broadcasters are required to do so by reason of the First Amendment. In resolving those issues, we are guided by the "venerable principle that the construction of a statute by those charged with its execution should be followed unless there are compelling indications that it is wrong. * * *" Whether there are "compelling indications" of error in this case must be answered by a careful evaluation of the commission's reasoning in light of the policies embodied by Congress in the "public interest" standard of the act. Many of those policies, as the legislative history makes clear, were drawn from the First Amendment itself; the "public interest" standard necessarily invites reference to First Amendment principles. Thus, the question before us is whether the various interests in free expression of the public, the broadcaster and the individual require broadcasters to sell commercial time to persons wishing to discuss controversial issues. * * *

At the outset we reiterate what was made clear earlier that nothing in the language of the Communications Act or its legislative history compels a conclusion different from that reached by the commission. As we have seen, Congress has time and again rejected various legislative attempts that would have mandated a variety of forms of individual access. That is not to say that Congress' rejection of such proposals must be taken to mean that Congress is opposed to private rights of access under all circumstances. Rather, the point is that Congress has chosen to leave such questions with the commission, to which it has given the flexibility to experiment with new ideas as changing conditions require. In this case, the commission has decided that on balance the undesirable effects of the right of access urged by respondents would outweigh the asserted benefits. The court of appeals failed to give due weight to the commission's judgment on these matters.

The commission was justified in concluding that the public interest in providing access to the marketplace of "ideas and experiences" would scarcely be served by a system so heavily weighted in favor of the financially affluent, or those with access to wealth. Even under a first-come-first-served system, proposed by the dissenting commissioner in these cases, the views of the affluent could well prevail over those of others, since they would have it within their power to purchase time more frequently. Moreover, there is the substantial danger, as the court of appeals acknowledged, 450 F.2d, at 664, that the time allotted for editorial advertising could be monopolized by those of one political persuasion.

These problems would not necessarily be solved by applying the Fairness Doctrine including the Cullman doctrine, to editorial advertising. If broadcasters were required to provide time, free when necessary, for the discussion of the various shades of opinion on the issue discussed in the advertisement, the affluent could still determine in large part the issues to be discussed. [Emphasis added.] Thus, the very premise of the court of appeals' holding—that a right of access is necessary to allow individuals and groups the opportunity for self-initiated speech—would have little meaning to those who could not afford to purchase time in the first instance.

If the Fairness Doctrine were applied to editorial advertising, there is also the substantial danger that the effective operation of that doctrine would be jeopardized. To minimize financial hardship and to comply fully with its public responsibilities a broadcaster might well be forced to make regular programming time available to those holding a view different from that expressed in an editorial advertisement; indeed, BEM has suggested as much in its brief. The result would be a further erosion of the journalistic discretion of broadcasters in the coverage of public issues, and a transfer of control over the treatment of public issues from the licensees who are accountable for broadcast performance to private individuals who are not. The public interest would no longer be "paramount" but rather subordinate to private whim especially since, under the court of appeals' decision, a broadcaster would be largely precluded from rejecting editorial advertisements that dealt with matters trivial or insignificant or already fairly covered by the broadcaster. * * * If the Fairness Doctrine and the Cullman doctrine were suspended to alleviate these problems, as respondents suggest might be appropriate, the question arises whether we would have abandoned more than we have gained. Under such a regime the congressional objective of balanced coverage of public issues would be seriously threatened.

Nor can we accept the court of appeals' view that every potential speaker is "the best judge" of what the listening public ought to hear or indeed the best judge of the merits of his or her views. All journalistic tradition and experience is to the contrary. For better or worse, editing is what editors are for; and editing is selection and choice of material. [Emphasis added.] That editors—newspaper or broadcast—can and do abuse this power is beyond doubt, but that is not reason to deny the discretion Congress provided. Calculated risks of abuse are taken in order to preserve higher values. The presence of these risks is nothing new; the authors of the Bill of Rights accepted the reality that these risks were evils for which there was no acceptable remedy other than a spirit of moderation and a sense of responsibility—and civility—on the part of those who exercise the guaranteed freedoms of expression.

It was reasonable for Congress to conclude that the public interest in being informed requires periodic accountability on the part of those who are entrusted with the use of broadcast frequencies, scarce as they are. In the delicate balancing historically followed in the regulation of broadcasting Congress and the commission could appropriately conclude that the allocation of journalistic priorities should be concentrated in the licensee rather than diffused among many. This policy gives the public some assurance that the broadcaster will be answerable if he fails to meet their legitimate needs. No such accountability attaches to the private individual, whose only qualifications for using the broadcast facility may be abundant funds and a point of view. To agree that debate on public issues should be "robust and wide-open" does not mean that we should exchange "public trustee" broadcasting, with all its limitations, for a system of self-appointed editorial commentators.

The court of appeals discounted those difficulties by stressing that it was merely mandating a "modest reform," requiring only that broadcasters be required to accept some editorial advertising. * * * The court suggested that broadcasters could place an "outside limit on the total amount of editorial advertising they will sell" and that the commission and the broadcasters could develop "reasonable regulations" designed to prevent domination by a few groups or a few viewpoints." * * * If the commission decided to apply the Fairness Doctrine to editorial advertisements and as a result broadcasters suffered financial harm, the court thought the "commission could make necessary adjustments." Thus, without providing any specific answers to the substantial objections raised by the commission and the broadcasters, other than to express repeatedly its "confidence" in the commission's ability to overcome any difficulties, the court remanded the cases to the commission for the development of regulations to implement a constitutional right of access.

By minimizing the difficult problems involved in implementing such a right of access, the court of appeals failed to come to grips with another problem of critical importance to broadcast regulation and the First Amendment—the risk of an enlargement of government control over the content of broadcast discussion of public issues. This risk is inherent in the court of appeals remand requiring regulations and procedures to sort out requests to be heard—a process involving the very editing that licensees now perform as to regular programming. Although the use of a public resource by the broadcast media permits a limited degree of government surveillance, as is not true with respect to private media, the government's power over licensees as we have noted, is by no means absolute and is carefully circumscribed by the act itself.

Under a constitutionally commanded and government supervised right-of-access system urged by respondents and mandated by the court of appeals, the commission would be required to oversee far more of the day-to-day operations of broadcasters' conduct, deciding such questions as whether a particular individual or group has had sufficient opportunity to present its viewpoint and whether a particular viewpoint has already been sufficiently aired. Regimenting broadcasters is too radical a therapy for the ailment respondents complain of.

Under the Fairness Doctrine the commission's responsibility is to judge whether a licensee's overall performance indicates a sustained good faith effort to meet the public interest in being fully and fairly informed. The commission's responsibilities under a right-of-access system would tend to draw it into a continuing case-by-case determination of who should be heard and when. Indeed, the likelihood of government involvement is so great that it has been suggested that the accepted constitutional principles against control of speech content would need to be relaxed with respect to editorial advertisements. To sacrifice First Amendment protections for so speculative a gain is not warranted, and it was well within the commission's discretion to construe the act so as to avoid such a result.<sup>21</sup>

The commission is also entitled to take into account the reality that in a very real sense listeners and viewers constitute a "captive audience." * * * It is no answer to say that because we tolerate per-

21. DNC has urged in this Court that we at least recognize a right of our national parties to purchase airtime for the purpose of discussing public issues. We see no principled means under the First Amendment of favoring access by organized political parties over other groups and individuals.

vasive commercial advertisement we can also live with its political counterparts.

* * *

The judgment of the court of appeals is reversed.

Justice Stewart, concurring.

* * *

Justice Blackmun, with whom Justice Powell joins, concurring.

Justice DOUGLAS.

While I join the Court in reversing the judgment below, I do so for quite different reasons.

My conclusion is that the TV and radio stand in the same protected position under the First Amendment as do newspapers and magazines. * * *

If a broadcast licensee is not engaged in governmental action for purposes of the First Amendment, I fail to see how constitutionally we can treat TV and the radio differently than we treat newspapers. It would come as a surprise to the public as well as to publishers and editors of newspapers to be informed that a newly created federal bureau would hereafter provide "guidelines" for newspapers or promulgate rules that would give a federal agency power to ride herd on the publishing business to make sure that fair comment on all current issues was made. * * *

* * *

* * * The Fairness Doctrine has no place in our First Amendment regime. It puts the head of the camel inside the tent and enables administration after administration to toy with TV or radio in order to serve its sordid or its benevolent ends. * *

* * *

Justice BRENNAN, with whom Justice Marshall concurs, dissenting. (See this text, p. 866).

* * *

COMMENT

1. Was the difficulty in securing Supreme Court acceptance for a limited right of access to editorial advertising due to the fact that Chief Justice Burger thought of the BEM and DNC requests as an effort to establish a common carrier right of entry to all broadcast programming? The Court uses the magnitude of the access problem as a reason for recognizing no First Amendment rights of access to the broadcast media. For example, the Court was extremely sensitive to the complaint that the rich would buy up all available broadcast time and that the networks would have to sell time to the highest bidder if the requests of BEM and the Democratic National Committee were granted.

2. Note the Court's regulatory history of the fairness doctrine. The Court gives great importance to the "seek out" aspect of the fairness doctrine. Under the "seek out" rule the broadcaster must seek out controversial viewpoints. He cannot merely wait for spokesmen for such views to come and ask him for time. On the basis of the cases and materials reflecting fairness doctrine considerations which you have read, has the "seek out" rule figured very significantly in the fortunes of the fairness doctrine?

3. In CBS, Chief Justice Burger describes the fairness doctrine as follows: "The doctrine imposes two affirmative responsibilities on the broadcaster: coverage of issues of public importance must be adequate and must fairly reflect viewpoints." Does this statement mean that there must be coverage that provides a fair reflection of controversial viewpoints of public importance generally or that the broadcaster must affirmatively seek out differing views the broadcaster has chosen to cover? What difference does it make? See Patsy Mink, 59 FCC2d 984 (1976), text, p. 873.

4. A major portion of the Court's opinion in CBS is devoted to the question of whether private censorship is subject to constitutional sanction or obligation. The issue, said Chief Justice Burger, is "whether the action of a broadcast licensee such as that challenged here is 'governmental action' for purposes of the First Amendment."

When constitutional lawyers speak of the necessity that state action be present in order to invoke constitutional protection, what is meant is that constitutional limitations do not apply unless it is government which has restrained freedom. Since the First Amendment speaks to Congress and the Fourteenth Amendment speaks to the states, the argument is that if a nongovernmental source infringes freedom of expression, such an infringement does not rise to the dignity of a constitutional violation. In this respect, the fundamental issue of state action cuts across constitutional law generally. Should private power, specifically corporate power as reflected in the three corporations, CBS, NBC, and ABC, ever be constitutionalized, i.e., subject to constitutional obligation?

The Court, per Chief Justice Burger, answered this question, at least on the basis of the facts presented in the CBS case, in the negative. Four of the reasons given by the Court for refusing to view the broadcaster policy on editorial advertising as constituting state action are as follows:

a. Private power aggregates such as the broadcast media should not be viewed as quasipublic in order to satisfy the state action requirement.

b. As private parties, the broadcast media owe no First Amendment duties to other private parties as distinguished from the duties imposed on them by the Federal Communications Act.

c. If the state action problem can be sufficiently bridged for the broadcast media, it could be broadened for the print media as well, and this would be unthinkable.

d. Private power should not be constitutionalized because it is not all that powerful anyway.

5. The Court in CBS stated that the FCC neither required nor forbade the broadcaster policy of refusing to sell time for purchase of editorial advertisements; there was no state action in this case. Suppose the FCC had endorsed the position pressed on them by the Democratic National Committee and the BEM? Would the result have been different in the Supreme Court? On this point, the Court made the following observations:

We do not reach the question whether the First Amendment or the act can be read to preclude the commission from determining that in some situations the public interest requires licensees to re-examine their policies with respect to editorial advertisements. The commission has not yet made such a determination; it has for the present at least, found the policy to be within the sphere of journalistic discretion which Congress has left with the licensee.

6. The Court said that neither the "public interest" standard nor the First Amendment required a right of access for editorial advertising time because such a right would mean an end to the editorial function in broadcast journalism. Using language which was very welcome to broadcast journalism, Chief Justice Burger identified the request of the petitioners in CBS with an assault on the editorial function.

But isn't there a difference between seeking some access to advertising time and mandating time for specific editorial advertising?

Justice Brennan in dissent made a five-pronged argument for the position that the network policy at issue did constitute state action:

1. (p)ublic "ownership" of the airwaves.

2. the direct dependence of broadcasters upon the Federal Government for their right to operate broadcast frequencies.

3. the extensive governmental control over the broadcast industry.

4. the specific governmental involvement in the broadcaster policy. There is, for example, an obvious nexus between the commission's fairness doctrine and the absolute refusal of broadcast licensees to sell any part of their airtime to groups or individuals wishing to speak out on controversial issues of public importance. Indeed in defense of this policy, the broadcaster-petitioners argue vigorously that this exclusionary policy is authorized and even compelled by the Fairness Doctrine.

5. Finally, and perhaps most important, in a case virtually identical to the one now before us, we held that a policy promulgated by a privately owned bus company, franchised by the Federal Government and regulated by the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia, must be subjected to the constraints of the First Amendment. Public Utilities Commission v. Pollak, 343 U.S. 451 (1952).

Doesn't the analysis in item 4 above of the fairness doctrine rebut Chief Justice Burger's no-state-action conclusion? Justice Brennan points out that if the reason we can't have and don't need access is because we have the fairness doctrine, it should not be forgotten that the fairness doctrine manifests "specific governmental involvement" in broadcaster policy. Such involvement, in his view, constitutes state action. Thus, Justice Brennan is pointing out that although the fairness doctrine may look like a convenient weapon to club access to death, like all weapons it has its perils. It also serves to contradict the Court's conclusion that the broadcaster policy at issue here is private rather than state or governmental action.

In his dissent Justice Brennan takes the view that the Court seriously overestimates the efficacy of reliance on the fairness doctrine as an "adequate alternative to editorial advertising." He doubts the "ability—or willingness—of broadcasters to expose the public to the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources."

7. The student should contrast the CBS case with the print access materials in this text, p. 559. CBS should be evaluated with particular reference to Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo where the Supreme Court invalidated the Florida right of reply to the press law.

The "Fairness" Doctrine Reconsidered— The 1974 Fairness Report

Counter-Commercials For Automobile Ads: Friends of the Earth v. FCC

1. An effort by a citizen group, relying on the Banzhaf case, to win time for counter-commercials in an environmental context occurred when the Friends of the Earth asked the FCC to direct WNBC-TV in New York City to make free time available for antipollution groups to reply to automobile advertisements which it had carried. The FCC refused. But the court of appeals reversed and told the FCC to reconsider the request of the Friends of the Earth for counter-commercials to point out the air pollution threat by ads for Ford's Mustang and General Motors's Impala.

Of course, the Banzhaf case had insisted that a grant of free time to rebut cigarette smoking advertisements was uniquely permissible in that instance only because of the public interest in reducing the threat to life itself posed by cigarette smoking. But ads for cigarette smoking are not the only advertisements extolling a product that may endanger life. Judge McGowan for the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia said that pollution for the asthmatic in Manhattan is what cigarette smoking is to the lung cancer victim. See, Friends of the Earth v. FCC, 449 F.2d 1164 (D.C.Cir.1971).

2. The increased tempo of access petitions to the FCC, the uncertainty about the applicability of the fairness doctrine to access problems, and the general status and function of the fairness doctrine in the wake of the movement by groups and individuals for a right of access to television underscored for the FCC the need for rethinking the fairness doctrine. Pointing out that the fairness doctrine had been in effect for more than twenty years, since the issuance of the Report on Editorializing By Broadcast Licensees in 1948, the FCC announced that an overview of the fairness doctrine was in order. Therefore, on June 9, 1971, the FCC announced a "broad-ranging inquiry" into the fairness doctrine in light of the new demands for access to broadcasting. See In The Matter of the Handling of Public Issues Under the Fairness Doctrine, 30 FCC2d 25 (1971). The culmination of the FCC's reconsideration of the fairness doctrine was found in its 1974 Report. See In the Matter of the Handling of Public Issues Under the Fairness Doctrine and the Public Interest Standards of the Communications Act, 48 FCC2d 1 (1974). A major change made by the 1974 Fairness Report was that the fairness doctrine would no longer be applied to normal product commercials.

3. Other aspects of the 1974 Fairness Report, besides its ruling on product commercials, drew fire. The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia consolidated three cases challenging the FCC's 1974 Report, supra, and Reconsideration Order, 58 FCC2d 691 (1976). The court affirmed in part and reversed in part. Although the court upheld the essence of the FCC's redefinition of the fairness doctrine, the court specifically directed that the FCC reconsider two proposals which it had previously rejected.

The Committee for Open Media (COM) had suggested that a specified portion of the broadcast day be allocated for public access and the voluntary adoption of such a specific access scheme would be deemed presumptive compliance with the fairness doctrine.

Henry Geller had made a "10-issue" proposal which provided that the licensee (should be required to) list annually "the ten controversial issues of public importance, local and national, which it chose for the most coverage in the prior year."

---

NATIONAL CITIZENS COMMITTEE FOR BROADCASTING v. FCC

567 F.2D 1095 (D.C.CIR.1977).

MCGOWAN, Circuit Judge: These three consolidated petitions for review challenge various aspects of the Federal Communications Commission's Fairness Report. * * * For the reasons hereinafter appearing, we leave undisturbed the Report itself, including its central determination to withhold application of the fairness doctrine to broadcast communications promoting the sale of commercial products. Our remand to the FCC, however, is with directions to pursue further inquiry into two of the alternative courses of action proposed by some of the petitioners as ways by which the general objectives giving rise to the fairness doctrine can be realized. * * *

Petitioner Committee for Open Media (COM) challenges the commission's failure, on reconsideration of the Fairness Report, to adopt, or order further inquiry into, its access proposal as an alternative to current fairness enforcement. Intervenor Henry Geller challenges the commission's decisions to continue case-by-case consideration of fairness doctrine complaints, and its failure to consider and adopt his "10-issue" proposal relating to the fairness doctrine requirement that a broadcaster devote a reasonable amount of time to coverage of public issues.

* * *

The Report concludes that one type of announcement which may give rise to fairness doctrine obligations even though it is not an overt editorial is institutional advertising "designed to present a favorable public image of a particular corporation or industry rather than to sell a product." Although institutional advertising "ordinarily does not involve debate on public issues," if the advertiser "seek[s] to play an obvious and meaningful role in public debate, * * * the fairness doctrine * * * applies." The commission has attempted to provide some guidance for determining whether fairness doctrine obligations apply to advertisements that are not "explicitly controversial." Licensees are advised that when the relationship of an advertisement to ongoing debate in the community is substantial and obvious the ad is likely to represent "obvious participation in public debate." In such circumstances the fairness doctrine should be applied.

We interpret the foregoing pronouncements concerning overt editorials and institutional advertising as reaffirmations of previous FCC policy in these areas. That portion of the Report dealing with standard product commercials, on the other hand, is an explicit departure from previous policy. The Report announces that advertisements for commercial products or services, such as the cigarette advertisements in Banzhaf and the automobile and gasoline advertisements in Friends of the Earth, henceforth will not give rise to fairness obligations because they "make no meaningful contribution to informing the public on any side of any issue," even though "the business, product, or service advertised is itself controversial." * * * The commission thus explicitly rejects the chain of reasoning first enunciated in WCBS-TV: that because promoting a product raises the issue of the desirability of its use, such promotion triggers application of the fairness doctrine if use of the product is a controversial issue of public importance.

Under the policy announced in the Fairness Report, promotion of controversial products will not require presentation of points of view opposing use or sale of the products. This does not mean that all product advertisements are exempt from fairness obligations, however. If in the course of promotion of a product there is "obvious and meaningful * * * discussion" on one side of a controversial issue impinging on the desirability of the product, fairness obligations attach because such advocacy qualifies as an editorial advertisement.

The Report's treatment of commercial advertising is vigorously challenged on both statutory and constitutional grounds. We believe that the challenges invoking the first amendment are based on a fundamental misunderstanding of the relationship between constitutional protection of commercial, or any other type of, speech and the functioning of the fairness doctrine. * * *

* * *

We reject the suggestion that any speech protected by the first amendment must, as a matter of constitutional law, trigger application of the fairness doctrine. While an ultimate function of both the first amendment and the fairness doctrine may be to encourage the dissemination of viewpoints and information, this does not mean that the two principles cover exactly the same ground. There is an obvious difference between the standard employed by the commission for determining whether the fairness doctrine applies to advertisements—that is, whether the advertisement advocates one side of a controversial public issue—and the holding in Virginia State Board, 425 U.S. 748 (1976), that advertising is protected by the first amendment because it represents dissemination of valuable information important to the functioning of a free enterprise system. Nothing in the Supreme Court's decision in Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367

(1969), upholding the constitutionality of the political editorializing and personal attack rules promulgated under the fairness doctrine, suggests that the obligation to present opposing points of view must be applied to all constitutionally protected speech. Indeed, in most instances in which the fairness doctrine has been held not to apply, the speech which it was contended triggered application of the obligation was clearly protected by the first amendment.

* * *

Indeed, it can be argued that the first amendment protection afforded commercial speech cuts precisely contrarily from the manner urged by petitioners. It has been contended by commentators, although viewed skeptically by the Supreme Court, that broadcasters are discouraged from presenting messages which trigger fairness doctrine obligations. If the fairness doctrine does have this chilling effect, then First Amendment protection of commercial speech would make application of the fairness doctrine to such speech less, rather than more, desirable. This was certainly the context in which the Banzhaf court—upholding the commission's decision to subject cigarette advertisements to the fairness doctrine—discussed the relevance of First Amendment consideration.

STATUTORY CHALLENGES TO THE NEW COMMISSION POLICY

It is alleged that * * * to withdraw standard product commercials from the purview of the fairness doctrine violates the standards of the Communications Act and was arbitrary, capricious and an abuse of discretion. * * *

The 1946 decision concerning commercial advertisements so heavily relied on by petitioners merely stated that debate over the "relative merits of one product or another" could raise "basic and important social, economic, or political issues."<sup>48</sup> The WCBS-TV approach extended upon this principle in determining that the promotion of a controversial product was an important and controversial issue. The Fairness Report contracts the potential scope of the principle in requiring that the controversial issue be directly and obviously raised in the debate. But neither the WCBS-TV approach nor the Fairness Report is inconsistent with the principle announced in the 1946 Commission decision. Thus, while the 1959 amendments to the Communications Act "codifi[ed] the standards of fairness," we are not convinced that the WCBS-TV standard was one of the standards referred to.

* * *

Nor do we believe that the commission has acted arbitrarily or that it has abused its discretion in withdrawing most commercial advertisements from application of the fairness doctrine.

* * *

We think that the commission has adequately supported its decision to exclude standard product commercials from the scope of the fairness doctrine. Three major arguments are presented by the commission. First, the commission made the judgment that the WCBS-TV approach to the fairness doctrine and standard product commercials at most informed the public about only one side of a controversial issue. * * *

Certainly it must be admitted that counter-commercials are of a very different genre than are the product commercials themselves. They do not simply state, "Do not buy X; it is not desirable," but rather argue one side of the issues underlying the debate over desirability. Given this fundamental asymmetry, we do not think it was unreasonable for the commission to conclude that application of the fairness doctrine to standard product commercials does not further the objective of presenting all viewpoints on controversial issues of public importance.

48. Sam Morris, 11 FCC 197, 198 (1946).

The second major argument put forth by the commission is that application of the fairness doctrine to noneditorial advertisements would "divert the attention of broadcasters from their public trustee responsibilities in aiding the development of an informed public opinion." This argument is of course premised to some extent on the first. We understand the commission to be indicating that even if enforcement of fairness doctrine obligations with respect to commercial advertisements might marginally contribute to an informed public opinion, these benefits are outweighed by the reduction in public information which results from the decreased attention that broadcasters will afford to other aspects of the fairness doctrine. Given the wide range of controversial products to which the WCBS-TV approach could be applied<sup>60</sup> and the difficulties, discussed above, in determining which issues implicitly addressed give rise to fairness obligations, it is indeed quite possible that the effort broadcasters would have to devote to enforcing the fairness doctrine with respect to commercial advertisements would contribute relatively little to the overall objectives of the doctrine. We caution, however, that it is doubtful that the new FCC policy will substantially lessen the difficulties of drawing the line between advertisements which do and those which do not incur fairness obligations. The difference between obvious and unobvious advocacy is not obvious.

Finally, the commission suggested in the Fairness Report, though not in its arguments to this court, that application of the fairness doctrine to commercial advertisements could undermine the economic base of commercial broadcasting. It is possible that sponsors would be discouraged from broadcasting advertisements subject to mandatory counter-commercials, and that broadcasters could suffer additional losses through operation of the Cullman principle, 40 FCC 576 (1963), under which they must bear the cost of presenting opposing views where paid sponsorship is not available. Yet no evidence has been presented which indicates that the WCBS-TV policy had an adverse effect on commercial broadcasters, though admittedly this may be due to the rather unvigorous and confused enforcement of that policy. While we do not think this economic argument is conclusive standing alone, the other two arguments put forth by the commission provide adequate and substantial support for its decision.

* * *

The commission received three major proposals designed to overcome [the] difficulties of current fairness doctrine enforcement. Petitioner COM urged that the commission adopt as an optional substitute for the current fairness doctrine a system whereby licensees devote a specified percentage of their broadcast time to what COM labeled "free speech messages" and other public issue programming. Intervenor Geller requested the commission to adopt a requirement "that the licensee list annually the ten controversial issues of public importance, local and national, which it chose for coverage in the prior year." Geller also proposed that the commission confine review of fairness doctrine complaints to the time of license renewal.

60. See Geller, The Fairness Doctrine in Broadcasting: Problems and Suggested Courses of Action 85 (Rand Corp. 1973), ("There are relatively few advertised products whose normal use does not involve some significant issue: automobiles [large or small], gasoline [leaded or unleaded], any type of medication, beer, airplanes, any product that does not have a biodegradable container, any foreign product—the list is virtually endless.")

* * * In its petition, COM proposed a specific access scheme, not presented to the commission during the fairness inquiry itself, which would be deemed presumptive compliance with the fairness doctrine. Under the scheme suggested by COM:

1. A licensee would set aside one hour per week for spot announcements and lengthier programming which would be available for presentation of messages by members of the public.

2. Half of this time would be allocated on a first-come, first-served basis on any topic whatsoever; the other half would be apportioned "on a representative spokesperson system."

3. Both parts of the allocation scheme would be "nondiscretionary as to content with the licensee."

4. However, the broadcaster would still be required to ensure that spot messages or other forms of response to "editorial advertisements" are broadcast.

The commission addressed COM's proposal in its order denying reconsideration, stating that while the proposal was "the first serious attempt to meet" what the commission deemed the essential requirements of any access scheme, "[i]t is neither perfected nor ready for adoption as a rule or policy." Reconsideration Order at 699. The commission also expressed the view that the COM system could be a supplement to, but not a substitute for, the current fairness doctrine requirements. * * We do not think that the commission has demonstrated in the Fairness Report, in the Reconsideration Order, or in its written and oral arguments to this court that the COM proposal retains insufficient licensee discretion. * * * COM's proposal will involve the commission even less than do present procedures in overseeing compliance with the first [fairness doctrine] obligation. At the same time, the proposal would ensure a minimum amount of coverage of public issues.

Similarly, we think that the commission cannot ignore the advantage of an access system in providing information to the public which would not be provided under even full compliance with both obligations of the fairness doctrine as currently implemented. * * *

One of the proposals submitted to the commission during the fairness inquiry seems especially promising as one step toward fuller compliance with the first fairness obligation. Intervenor Geller suggests that the licensee list annually the ten controversial issues of public importance, local and national, which it chose for the most coverage in the prior year, set out the offers for response made, and note representative programming that was presented on each issue.

* * *

* * * It does seem to us, however, that issue reports could be useful to the commission in one or more ways. For instance, the commission initially could review each annual list to determine whether it appears that the licensee fulfilled his part one obligation. * * * Alternatively the commission might take no immediate action with respect to the annual reports, but instead examine them at the time of license renewal. We leave it to the commission's further examination to consider whether these or other uses of annual reports such as those proposed by Mr. Geller would be appropriate in enforcement of the fairness doctrine. * * *

In summary, we reject the challenges to the commission's decision to exempt product commercials which do not "obviously and meaningfully address a controversial issue of public importance" from fairness doctrine obligations. * * * However we remand the orders reviewed on this appeal with instructions that the commission undertake further inquiry into petitioner COM's access proposal and intervenor Geller's "10 issue" proposal in accordance with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

COMMENT

1. How much of the Banzhaf case, text, p. 855, is left after the court of appeal decision in the Fairness Report case? If there were no statute prohibiting cigarette advertising on television, wouldn't a cigarette ad that made no mention of the smoking-health issue be outside the scope of the Fairness Doctrine?

2. In a Notice of Inquiry, dated March 2, 1978, FCC 78-108, the FCC announced "the initiation of an inquiry into the 'right of access' policy submitted by COM, the 'ten issue approach' to the Fairness Doctrine proposed by Geller, and as suggested by the Court, into 'other ways of achieving compliance with the Fairness Doctrine's first obligation that deserve critical consideration, either in conjunction with, or as alternatives to the procedures referred to above.'" The FCC requested comments on its "ten-issue" proposal and asked, among other questions, the following:

Could a ten issue proposal be utilized in conjunction with an access scheme, or act itself as a substitute for or complement to present Fairness Doctrine procedures? If so, how would its application comport with the statutory mandate of Section 315(a)?

Suppose it was your task to respond to this question. What would you say?

Are there any advantages to the optional access scheme proposed by COM? One advantage of the proposal is related to the First Amendment. It will be remembered that in the CBS case, the Court was careful not to rule out the possibility that the FCC, if it chose, might, consistent with the First Amendment, be able to mandate a system of access. If an FCC system of mandatory access might be consistent with the First Amendment, then the adoption of an access scheme which is optional with the licensee should, by definition, be fairly well insulated from First Amendment attack.

The Duty to Cover Important Issues: Enforcing Part 1 of The "Fairness" Doctrine—WHAR

Although the 1974 Fairness Report might be read as evidencing an FCC retreat from an expensive conception of the fairness doctrine, two years later in the Patsy Mink case the FCC gave new life to the first part of the broadcaster's fairness doctrine obligation.

There are two parts to a broadcaster's fairness doctrine obligation. The first part of the fairness doctrine involves the affirmative duty on the part of the broadcaster to cover important issues. The second part of the fairness doctrine involves the duty to provide balanced coverage of important issues. In Patsy Mink, 59 FCC2d 984 (1976), the FCC held for the "first time * * * that a licensee was compelled under the first part of the fairness doctrine, to offer at least some programming addressing it." 59 FCC2d 984 at 998 (1976).

Representative Patsy Mink, sponsor of an anti-strip mining bill before Congress, requested that radio station WHAR, Clarksburg, West Virginia, broadcast an eleven-minute tape regarding her anti-strip mining proposal. This tape, Mink argued, would contrast with views previously aired over WHAR on a program entitled "What's The Issue."

WHAR responded that it had not broadcast the "What's The Issue" program nor any other programming on the strip mining controversy. Mink then complained to the FCC alleging that WHAR had violated its fairness doctrine obligation to devote programming time to an issue of "extreme importance to the economy and environment of the area served by WHAR."

Mink supported her contention that strip mining was extremely controversial by pointing, among other things, to the current battle in Congress over the issue, and the fact that deep mining, an industry vital to the Appalachian economy, will be adversely affected by strip mining. Mink also noted statements by WHAR in its 1972 license renewal application that surface and deep mining were major industries and that development of new industry and air and water pollution were of great concern to its listeners.

WHAR responded to the charges with three counterarguments. First, it assured the FCC that while it had originated no local programming concerning the strip mining controversy, it had broadcast a significant number of strip mining stories that it received from the Associated Press news service.

The station further contended that "there is presently no established precedent or rule requiring a particular licensee to cover any particular issue. * * *"

Finally, WHAR denied that strip mining was of critical importance to members of its community and pointed to the absence of any request, other than from Representative Mink, that it produce any programs concerning strip mining. The FCC rejected WHAR's defenses.

In a significant opinion, the FCC emphasized the importance of licensee compliance with the first part of the fairness doctrine:

* * * The fairness doctrine "imposes two affirmative responsibilities on the broadcaster: coverage of issues of public importance must be adequate and must fairly reflect differing viewpoints." CBS v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. 94, 111 (1973). Without licensee compliance with the responsibility to cover adequately vital public issues, the obligation to present contrasting views would have little success as a means to inform the listening public. If the fairness doctrine is to have any meaningful impact, broadcasters must cover, at the very least, those topics which are of vital concern to their listeners.

* * *

While it is our policy to defer to licensees journalistic discretion, we must emphasize that that discretion is not absolute, Committee for the Fair Broadcasting of Controversial Issues, and we have previously advised licensees that "some issues are so critical or of such great public importance that it would be unreasonable for a licensee to ignore them completely." Fairness Report. While it would be an exceptional situation and would counter our intention to stay out of decisions concerning the selection of specific programming matter, we believe that the unreasonable exercise of this licensee discretion, i.e., failure to adequately cover a 'critical issue' in a particular community, would require appropriate remedial action on the part of the commission. Such action in those rare instances was contemplated by the Supreme Court in Red Lion when it declared:

"* * * if the present licensees should suddenly prove timorous, the commission is not powerless to insist that they give adequate and fair attention to public issues * * * Congress need not stand idly by and permit those with licenses to ignore the problems which beset the people." Red Lion at 393.

These are rare instances, however, and licensees are not obligated to address each and every important issue which may be considered a controversial issue of public importance.

* * *

Where, as in the present case, an issue has significant and possibly unique impact on the licensee's service area, it will not be sufficient for the licensee as an indication of compliance with the fairness doctrine to show that it may have broadcast an unknown amount of news touching on a general topic related to the issue cited in a complaint. Rather it must be shown that there has been some attempt to inform the public of the nature of the controversy, not only that such a controversy exists.

We must conclude, therefore, that WHAR has acted unreasonably in failing to cover the issue of strip mining, an issue which clearly may determine the quality of life in Clarksburg for decades to come. Given these findings, we are of the opinion that the licensee of radio station WHAR is in violation of the fairness doctrine. Considering the continuing controversial nature of the issue of strip mining, the licensee is requested to inform the commission within 20 days of the release date of this order on how it intends to meet its fairness obligations with respect to adequate coverage of the aforementioned issue.

---

COMMENT

1. The impact of Patsy Mink, of course, should not be overstated. The FCC takes pains to point out that requiring compliance with the first part of the fairness doctrine will be an exceptional occurrence. The principle of the Patsy Mink case will be reserved for issues that are "so critical or of such great public importance that it would be unreasonable for a licensee to ignore them completely."

2. The two proposals which the court of appeals in the Fairness Report case directed the FCC to reconsider—the COM specific access proposal and the Geller "ten-issues" proposal—are perhaps better evaluated in light of the Patsy Mink case. In Patsy Mink, the FCC partially based its conclusion that the first part of the fairness doctrine would be violated if the strip mining issue was not covered on the licensee's own statement of the issues which it had ascertained were important to the community. Arguably, once "ten issues" had been indicated as of importance to the community, there would be some measuring rod by which to gauge the first part of the fairness doctrine—the licensee's affirmative duty to cover important issues. The Geller "ten-issue" proposal should, under this analysis, energize enforcement of the first part of the fairness doctrine.

With respect to the specific access scheme proposed by COM, the "ten-issue" proposal has a role to play also. If the specific access time in the main fails to cover the "ten issues," then arguably the specific access scheme is simply an inadequate substitute for the fairness doctrine, particularly its first part—the affirmative duty to cover important issues.

The Scope of the "Fairness" Doctrine—Does it Apply to Entertainment, Comedy, and Documentaries?

1. Suppose a dramatic presentation on television offends a particular group? Does the "fairness" doctrine apply? An example of an effort to extend the reach of the fairness doctrine to entertainment programs arose out of the CBS television show "Maude." Two anti-abortion groups, the Diocesan Union of Holy Name Societies of Rockville Centre and the Long Island Coalition for Life, unsuccessfully filed a complaint with the FCC against WCBS-TV concerning a two-part episode of the program "Maude." Specifically, the complaint concerned Maude's discovery that she was pregnant and her decision to have an abortion. See Diocesan Union of Holy Name Societies of Rockville Centre and Long Island Coalition for Life, 41 FCC2d 497 (1973).

Citing dialogue from the "Maude" program, the groups accused CBS of presenting only the pro-abortion argument.

The anti-abortion groups invoked the fairness doctrine "on the ground that abortion is a major controversial issue" and requested that "two pro-life programs be presented on successive Tuesday evenings at 8 p.m. on the CBS network within the framework of the 'Maude' show supporting the right to life for unborn babies, or that time be made available on successive Tuesday evenings at 8 p.m. on CBS for a pro-life presentation produced by appellants herein."

The FCC rejected the fairness doctrine complaint. Even assuming that the program presented one side of a controversial issue, the FCC ruled that anti-abortion groups had failed to offer any information indicating that CBS had only presented one side of the abortion issue in its overall programming.

2. Although the "fairness" doctrine requirement of balanced presentation of controversial issues of public importance has been given new vitality by the Red Lion case, it should not be thought that the "fairness" doctrine restricts station licensees from declaring where they stand on issues by editorializing. Editorializing is permitted and encouraged. This was not always the case. See, Mayflower Broadcasting Co., 8 FCC 333 (1941).

At what points do the right to editorialize and the "fairness" doctrine intersect? The controversiality quotient of editorials in broadcasting is sometimes found deficient. Might this be a consequence of the intersection between editorializing and the "fairness" doctrine?

The "Fairness" Doctrine, Investigative Journalism, and the PENSIONS Case

1. On September 12, 1972, NBC broadcast a documentary examining private pension plans called, "Pensions: The Broken Promise." The program ended with the cautionary note by NBC newsmen Edwin Newman that not all pension plans are bad. But, in the main, the program was a hard-hitting attack on the empty promise that pension plans had allegedly revealed themselves to be to American workers.

Accuracy in media (AIM) filed a complaint that NBC's pension show had violated the fairness doctrine, and the FCC so ruled. The sheer volume of the anti-pension statements was deemed to merit the presentation of an opposing viewpoint on pension plans. See 44 FCC2d 1027 (1973).

A panel of the United States Court of Appeals, in an opinion written by Judge Leventhal, reversed the FCC. NBC v. FCC, 516 F.2d 1101 (D.C.Cir. 1974). Judge Fahy joined in Judge Leventhal's opinion, and Judge Tamm dissented. The court of appeals stayed the FCC order so that further opportunity for reply should be granted the pro-pension plan point of view.

Leventhal's majority opinion held that the licensee had a "wide degree of discretion" in the presentation of the programming and ruled that NBC had not exceeded that discretion. The initial panel decision declared that the editorial judgment of the broadcaster, if reasonable and in good faith, will be maintained in fairness cases. In Leventhal's view, the broadcaster had reasonably concluded that the pensions program did not present a controversial issue. The fact that the FCC would have reached a different editorial judgment cannot itself justify a conclusion that the fairness doctrine was violated. The rest followed. No fairness doctrine obligation had occurred because no controversial issue of public importance had been aired.

AIM petitioned for a rehearing of the panel decision. On December 13, 1974, AIM's request for an en banc hearing was granted, and the panel decision authored by Judge Leventhal was voided. But after granting the petition for rehearing, a majority of the judges of the full court decided not to hear the case. The FCC filed a suggestion of mootness with the court of appeals on the ground that with the enactment of new pensions legislation, the Employment Retirement Security Act of 1974, the case had become moot. The court of appeals then vacated its own order for an en banc hearing (a hearing to the full court) and sent the case back to its original judicial spawning ground, the panel consisting of Leventhal, Fahy, and Tamm.

Judge Bazelon of the D.C. Federal Court of Appeals vigorously dissented from the full bench's decision to vacate its own prior order granting a rehearing before the full bench. His protests persuaded neither the full bench nor the panel. The panel of Leventhal, Tamm, and Fahy decided to remand the case to the FCC on the ground of mootness. All hope of keeping alive what started out to be a ground-breaking decision of the FCC applying the fairness doctrine to investigative journalism ended on April 19, 1976, when the Supreme Court refused to review the court of appeals order to remand to the FCC for mootness. Accuracy In Media, Inc. v. FCC, 425 U.S. 934 (1976).

Is the case precedent for anything? Since the Leventhal panel's original decision that NBC had not violated the fairness doctrine was set aside, the "Pensions" case is obviously not precedent on matters of substantive fairness doctrine law. But, nonetheless, the many opinions in the case are obviously a guide to current judicial thinking about important fairness doctrine issues. For example, if the question of fairness doctrine obligation comes to be approached as a matter of broadcaster judgment which the FCC can set aside only if that judgment is found to be unreasonable, then how much scope is left to the fairness doctrine? In the view of the majority in the initial panel decision, NBC had made a reasonable judgment that when a program addressed itself to a consideration of abuses in private "pension plans," there could be no real controversy that there were in fact such abuses. The FCC, on the other hand, viewed the program "Broken Promise" as raising a controversial issue of public importance—how well overall did the private pension system work and was there a need for governmental regulation of all private pension plans?

The fairness doctrine issue resolved around the subject matter of the pension plan show "Broken Promise." Did the show deal with the overall performance of the private pension plan system? Or was its focus on some abuses in some private pension plans?

The FCC took a different and larger estimate of the thrust and subject of the pension plan program than did NBC. In the FCC view, NBC was making a general evaluation of the overall performance of pension plans. But the court said such a subjective reassessment by the FCC should not be permitted to transform a program which the broadcaster viewed as a news documentary about some pension plans into a full-scale critical study of pension plans.

The outcome of the court's position in the pensions plan case is clear: merely because the FCC has a different idea of what a program is about than does the broadcaster who produced it does not mean that the FCC estimate of the program's content must prevail. Of course, if one wishes to diminish the necessity for wrangling over whether an issue does or does not raise a controversial issue of public importance, the simplest course is to say that the realm of investigative journalism is not covered by the fairness doctrine. The panel in the pension plan case decided not to chart so direct a course.

The court's technique of program analysis consisted of focusing only on the "handful" of specific comments concerning the "overall functioning of the pension system." The court then asked if some of the specific overall comments were favorable to the view that generally pension plans functioned well. Thus, the court concluded that there was reasonable balance.

Another approach would be to ask whether the remarks on the program favorable to pension plans were completely overshadowed when judged against the context of the entire program. In that context, Judge Tamm concluded that the program appeared to be part of an attack on the entire system. For Judge Bazelon, the technique constituted a de facto rejection of what had earlier been clear fairness doctrine law: In making an evaluation as to whether fairness doctrine problems attach, the implicit message of the program must be taken into account. In the majority's view of the "Broken Promise" show, analysis of express criticism of pension plans, and express criticism alone, was made the measure of fairness doctrine compliance.

In Bazelon's view, the court's conclusion that there was a reasonable balance between favorable and unfavorable comments on the issue of overall performance of pension plans was erroneous. Subdividing the issues in the program into sub-issues such as statements relating to the adequacy of pension plans and problems of vesting and eligibility was wrong. By pruning many of the unfavorable comments "down to a fraction" of what they might otherwise have appeared to be, the court reached a conclusion of balance on the "overall performance of the plan" which Bazelon considered unjustified.

Bazelon made the excellent point that the court perceived a "neat distinction" between a "televised presentation of a problem" or an "isolated incident" and an "overall criticism of the institution" or matter discussed. Bazelon declared: "There is no such distinction."

He perceived an implicit ultimate issue raised by the program: the overall performance of pension plans. As a result, Bazelon suggested that the court of appeals decision in the pensions plan case contained its own implicit message: "[T]he FCC may not resort to the implicit issue principle but may apply the Fairness Doctrine only to overt editorializing denominated as such."

Such a contention from Judge Bazelon was especially significant. It was Bazelon who had held for the court in the cigarette advertising case that there was an implicit issue in cigarette ads on television exploiting youth and sex; the implicit issue was the desirability or undesirability of cigarette smoking.<sup>5</sup>

In Bazelon's view, the pensions plan case raised a fundamental First Amendment issue which the majority's whittling down of the implicit issues raised by the program obscured: Should the definition of a "controversial issue of public importance" be expanded "to include major legislation pending before a significant legislative body when the journalistic interest is at its height, i.e., investigative journalism?"

In dissent, Judge Tamm particularly criticized the majority's conclusion that the broadcaster's determination of whether a particular program deals with a controversial issue should prevail unless unreasonable. It was the FCC's responsibility to determine whether a program raised a controversial issue. Once the FCC made that determination, the licensee "is accorded extensive latitude and journalistic discretion in fulfilling his obligation of reasonable opportunity." If the First Amendment interests of the broadcaster are at their height in the area of presentation of news and news documentaries, then, Tamm argued, the public's First Amendment rights of access to the widest variety of conflicting viewpoints on controversial issues are similarly at their height with respect to news and news documentaries.

How fair should investigative journalism be? A perfunctory fairness is foolish as well as unconvincing. Thus, the court cited with approval David Brinkley's affidavit in the case concerning a program he narrated on highway construction: "I did not think at the time that I was obliged to recite (or find someone to recite) that not all highway construction involves corruption, that many highways are built by honorable men or the like."

5. See Banzhaf v. FCC, 405 F.2d 1082 (D.C.Cir. 1968), cert. den. 396 U.S. 842 (1969), discussed in text at p. 855.

On the other hand, if a major television network devotes itself to attacking an evil that it perceives to exist in the society, should there be no recourse for the persons who bear the brunt of the exposé? Suppose the exposé is one-sided? Suppose it unjustly ruins a whole company or throws employees out of work? It is true that investigative print journalism is not restrained by the fairness doctrine or any equivalent. But what print outlet is the equivalent of NBC television in clout?

Does the fairness doctrine apply to investigative journalism on television? By analyzing the "Broken Promise" program in a manner that made the conclusion inevitable that the program did not raise a controversial issue of public importance, a ruling that no fairness doctrine obligation attached was possible. Thus, there was no need for a square holding that the fairness doctrine did or did not apply to investigative journalism.

Should the fairness doctrine apply to investigative journalism? For Tamm, investigative journalism was especially susceptible to a "manipulated and selective presentation" which "ignores all viewpoints" other than that of investigative journalists. Judge Tamm viewed investigative journalism on television as editorializing. In this view, "Broken Promise" was an editorial against pension plans and, therefore, fairness doctrine obligations attached. The fact that the program was not presented as an editorial but as a documentary should not free the broadcaster from the duty "to present a report in which all conflicting positions and viewpoints are fairly portrayed."

Judge Tamm finally acceded to the FCC suggestion of mootness and supported the ultimate disposition of the case by the court of appeals: an order vacating the prior judgment and remanding the case to the FCC with directions to dismiss the fairness doctrine complaint. Nevertheless, in his initial opinion and in his final opinion in the case Judge Tamm insisted that NBC had violated the fairness doctrine.

Judge Tamm particularly criticized the panel's view that where the FCC determines that the broadcaster "has not discharged its fairness doctrine obligations," the court is justified in subjecting the FCC determination to a more searching scrutiny, a "hard look" as it were. This "hard look" doctrine was justified by Judge Leventhal on the ground that the fairness doctrine is "suffused with First Amendment freedoms." Judge Tamm replied that in CBS the Supreme Court gave at least its implicit approval to the notion that "in evaluating the First Amendment claims" of broadcasters "great weight" must be accorded to FCC decisions.<sup>6</sup> Judge Tamm challenged what he believed to be a single implication running throughout the court's opinion: the view that the fairness doctrine is unconstitutional. As an intermediate federal court of appeal below the Supreme Court, the federal appeals court in Washington was not free to hold the fairness doctrine unconstitutional since it had been unanimously upheld in 1969 in Red Lion and reaffirmed as recently as 1973 in CBS v. DNC. What the majority could not do directly, it tried, in Tamm's view, to do indirectly. The court tried to so limit the fairness doctrine that the broadcaster's obligations under it "would have been a dead letter."

Judge Tamm challenged some observations of veteran broadcaster Fred Friendly on the significance of the pensions plan case. The consequences of upholding the fairness doctrine in the pensions plan show were described by Friendly in the following manner:<sup>7</sup>

6. See 516 F.2d 1101 at 1188, quoting CBS v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. 94, 102 (1973).

7. See 516 F.2d 1101 at 1201, quoting Friendly, What's Fair on the Air? N.Y. Times Magazine 11, 46 (March 30, 1975).

* * * every assertion of wrongdoing by persons or groups would have to be balanced with an equal statement of their claims to innocence—however unbelievable they might be. * * * [T]he broadcasters feared a decision for the government would make it difficult to air any program that took a point of view.

Judge Tamm answered Friendly's critique of the dire consequences of applying the fairness doctrine to investigative journalism as follows:

This is exactly what this case is not about. The commission did not substitute its judgment for the licensee's; it found the broadcaster's judgment to be unreasonable. It did not order equal time; it only required reasonable opportunity. The commission did not tell petitioner whom to put on the air; journalistic discretion as to format and spokesmen remains intact. The commission's decision does not preclude programming with a point of view; the fairness doctrine encourages such programming.

In discussing the Pensions case, Friendly emphasized the wallop the show "Broken Promise" actually packed:

It [the show] was an example of tough investigative reporting, and its coverage did not pretend to be fastidiously fair to all concerned. Its makers were muckrakers with their eyes and hearts open, not blind disciples of the goddess of justice. One nationally recognized expert in pension plans and abuses observed, "For years there had been attempts to get pension reform through Congress, and this one program probably did more good than all the other efforts." See Friendly, The Good Guys, The Bad Guys and The First Amendment: Free Speech vs. Fairness in Broadcasting, 150 (1975).

After the pensions program the Congress did, in fact, pass pension reform legislation. Friendly argues that the NBC show was a powerful blow to pension plans as they then existed. Perhaps the NBC pension plan show was a major force toward stimulating legislation of pension plans reform. But can't this argument be turned around to support extension of the fairness doctrine to such programs? Precisely because of the probable impact of a network documentary with respect to influencing opinion and law, some opportunity for response may be required.

Another approach to the resolution of problems of propagandizing, imbalance, or unfairness in investigative journalism is exclusively through the license renewal process. This view received new impetus when former FCC General Counsel Henry Geller, in his amicus curiae brief in the Pensions case, argued that the FCC could not decide fairness doctrine issues on an ad hoc case-by-case basis. When the FCC becomes involved in specific oversight of program content, he argued, serious First Amendment objections are raised. In Geller's view, the FCC should return to the practice it had followed until 1962 when the FCC merely asked the licensee for its reaction to a fairness complaint. During that period, the FCC did not order the licensee to take steps to provide a specific response for an opposing viewpoint. Instead, the old practice was for the FCC to wait and "consider the matter definitively at renewal in connection with the overall showing of the station." Furthermore, in Geller's view, the licensee's fairness performance would be evaluated by the New York Times v. Sullivan standard. License renewal would only be denied if the licensee had acted with "actual malice," that is, if the licensee acted with a reckless disregard of his fairness obligations. Mere error in judgment like negligent misstatement in the law of libel would not result in sanction.

The court of appeals refused to consider the merits of the Geller position. The Geller approach is defended as doing the least violence to First Amendment standards, yet it depends on a sanction which silences an offender forever. If a right of specific response attaches to a specific issue, the broadcaster is still in business. Enforcing the fairness doctrine exclusively through the license renewal process uses the sanction the industry has for years, with good cause, called the "death penalty"—the sanction of denial of license renewal. The trouble with this sanction is that it has unnecessary overkill.

Another defect of the license renewal approach is that it may be too mild. Suppose the sanction of denial of the license renewal application for failure to observe the fairness doctrine is deemed so drastic by the FCC that it is never used? If the license renewal process is to be the only vehicle for enforcement of the fairness doctrine and that process is in fact never used to deny a licensee renewal for fairness doctrine violations, then the fairness doctrine would be a toothless command devoid of any force or importance.

Geller has suggested, impliedly at least, that investigative journalism on television should be covered by the fairness doctrine. Geller says: "[A]n investigative program [on television] can be as hardhitting and as one-sided as the broadcast journalist wishes: the only requirement is that at some time the opposing view be given the opportunity." See Geller, The Fairness Doctrine In Broadcasting: Broadcasting Problems and Suggested Courses of Action 39 (1973).

But this observation itself raises an issue: Must fairness in a television documentary be achieved within the confines of the documentary itself or should it be achieved through some follow-up programming? It will be recalled that the remedy afforded by the FCC in the Pensions case was a request that at some future time the opposing viewpoint should be given some opportunity for expression. Judge Tamm, on the other hand, who supported the FCC decision in the Pensions case nevertheless suggested that a balanced presentation of the controversial issue examined should be achieved within the documentary itself.

The difficulty with trying to solve fairness problems in documentaries by insisting on fairness within a particular documentary itself is that it may be a futile objective. If a news department of a network is sufficiently exercised about a social evil that it does a documentary to expose what it considers to be a social evil, should the network be obliged to portray with equal force and flair the spokesmen and views of those identified with the very "social evil" being investigated? The debate that results from such efforts is likely to be stilted and, perhaps in the end, still one-sided. In the Pensions case the NBC staff itself spoke of the need to include "fairness filler" on the pensions plan show. When the effort to secure balanced presentation is thought of as "fairness filler" by those who are entrusted with furnishing balance, not too much reason exists to have faith in the integrity of an effort to provide balanced presentation within the confines of a single documentary.

From a short-run point of view, the Pensions case was a nonevent. The issue of whether the fairness doctrine should apply to investigative journalism was not resolved. Since network journalism seems increasingly drawn to investigative journalism, the issues raised by the Pensions case will inevitably have to be resolved. It is, therefore, likely that the opinions in the Pensions case will provide a basis for reflection on the role, if any, which the fairness doctrine should play in investigative journalism on television.

"Fairness" Doctrine Procedure: Writing the Fairness Complaint

---

AMERICAN SECURITY COUNCIL EDUCATION FOUNDATION v. FCC

5 MED.L.RPTR. 1193 (D.C.CIR. 1979) 607 F.2D 438, CERT. DENIED 44 U.S. 1073 (1980).

Before Wright, Chief Judge, and Bazelon, McGowan, Tamm, Leventhal, Robinson,

MacKinnon, Robb and Wilkey, Circuit Judges, sitting en banc.

TAMM, Circuit Judge:

We are called upon to decide whether the American Security Council Education Foundation (ASCEF) presented prima facie evidence that CBS, Inc. (CBS) violated the fairness doctrine by giving imbalanced coverage to "national security issues" in its news programming. The Federal Communications Commission (commission) concluded that because ASCEF did not base its complaint on a particular, well-defined issue, it did not present prima facie evidence of a fairness doctrine violation. We uphold the commission's decision.

In 1972, ASCEF launched a study to analyze the national television networks' coverage of issues relating to this country's national security. ASCEF originally planned to examine the news programs of all three national networks, but later decided, "in the interests of depth and thoroughness," to examine only one. E. LEFEVER, TV AND NATIONAL DEFENSE, AN ANALYSIS OF CBS NEWS, 1972-73 at vi (1974) (TV AND NATIONAL DEFENSE). ASCEF chose CBS because CBS had the largest audience for evening news and the largest number of affiliated stations.

ASCEF examined videotapes of all CBS "Evening News" broadcasts aired during 1972. It transcribed broadcasts of all news reports that it determined were relevant to four topics: United States military and foreign affairs; Soviet Union military and foreign policy; China military and foreign policy; and Vietnam affairs. ASCEF submitted examples of the broadcasts it transcribed to the commission. * * *

ASCEF dissected the transcribed news reports into sentences and categorized each sentence into one of three basic positions on national security:

Viewpoint A holds that the threat to U.S. security is more serious than perceived by the government or that the United States ought to increase its national security efforts;

Viewpoint B holds that present government threat perception is essentially correct or U.S. military and foreign policy efforts are adequate[;] and Viewpoint C holds that the threat to U.S. security is less serious than perceived by the government or that U.S. national security efforts should be decreased. TV and National Defense at 78 (emphasis in original).

Using this methodology ASCEF concluded that 3.54 per cent of the sentences transcribed reflected viewpoint A, 34.63 per cent reflected viewpoint B and 61.83 per cent reflected viewpoint C. ASCEF filed a fairness doctrine complaint with the commission against CBS based upon these statistics. In its complaint, ASCEF also alleged that it reviewed CBS's news programming other than CBS Evening News for 1972, as well as CBS's news programming for 1973 and parts of 1975 and 1976, and observed the same disproportionate treatment of national security issues. On the basis of its findings, ASCEF contended that CBS had engaged in advocacy journalism on "basic national security issues." ASCEF asked the commission to find the existence of a fairness doctrine violation and order CBS to provide a reasonable opportunity for the expression of A viewpoints.

* * *

Although the Court in Red Lion legitimized the fairness doctrine, it recognized the argument that overly ambitious enforcement could lead broadcasters to reduce coverage of controversial public issues, or to cover those issues blandly in an attempt to avoid fairness doctrine complaints. * * * [S]ee generally Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo. * * * The Court believed this danger was speculative at that time. It warned, however, that the constitutional implications could be reconsidered if the fairness doctrine, in practice, reduced rather than enhanced the volume and quality of coverage of public issues. * * *

In administering the fairness doctrine, the commission wisely attempts to avoid unnecessary risk of "chilling" presentations of controversial issues. The commission is concerned that unduly burdensome regulation will induce broadcasters to decrease vigorous and effective coverage of issues that are the subject of public debate. * * *

At center stage of the commission's regulatory scheme is its determination that broadcasters should have maximum editorial discretion in deciding how to fulfill fairness doctrine obligations. See Fairness Report, 48 FCC2d at 8-9, 28-31. In the course of presenting its programming, the broadcaster decides what issue has been discussed, whether an issue is a controversial issue of public importance, what views have been or should be presented on the issue, what format or which spokesmen should be used, and how much time should be allotted to discussion of various views. * * *

A viewer or listener who believes that a broadcaster is not meeting its fairness doctrine obligations must first complain to the broadcaster. See Broadcast Procedure Manual, 49 FCC2d 1, 5 (1974). If the broadcaster agrees to rectify the complaint or explains its position to the satisfaction of the complainant, commission intervention is unnecessary. See id.; Memorandum Opinion and Order on Reconsideration of the Fairness Report, 58 FCC2d at 696. A viewer or listener who remains dissatisfied may then file a complaint with the commission.

Such a complaint must present prima facie evidence of a fairness doctrine violation. Prima facie evidence consists of specific factual information which, in the absence of rebuttal, is sufficient to show that a fairness doctrine violation exists. Unless the complaint contains such evidence, the commission will not demand a response to a complaint from a broadcaster.

The prima facie evidence requirement is "part of the delicate balance allocating burdens between licensees and complainants": the complainant must produce prima facie evidence of a violation before the broadcaster will be burdened with establishing compliance with the fairness doctrine. * * * The commission explained the reasons for the prima facie evidence requirement in Allen C. Phelps, 21 FCC2d 12, 13 (1969):

Absent detailed and specific evidence of failure to comply with the requirements of the fairness doctrine, it would be unreasonable to require licensees specifically to disprove allegations. * * * The commission's policy of encouraging robust, wide-open debate on issues of public importance would in practice be defeated if, on the basis of vague and general charges of unfairness, we could impose upon licensees the burden of proving the contrary by producing recordings or transcripts of all news programs, editorials, commentaries, and discussion of public issues, many of which are treated over long periods of time. * * *

In its Fairness Primer, 40 FCC at 600, the commission set forth the information necessary to establish a prima facie case of a violation. The complainant should submit specific facts to show

(1) the particular station involved; (2) the particular issue of a controversial nature discussed over the air; (3) the date and time when the program was carried; (4) the basis for the claim that the station has presented only one side of the question; and (5) whether the station had afforded, or has plans to afford, an opportunity for the presentation of contrasting viewpoints. [Emphasis added; footnote omitted.]

* * * This Court has upheld the reasonableness of these requirements. See Hale v. FCC, 425 F.2d 556, 558-59 (D.C.Cir. 1970) (per curiam); see also Democratic National Committee v. FCC, 460 F.2d at 907-08.

If the commission determines that there is prima facie evidence of a fairness doctrine violation, it will direct the broadcaster to respond to the complaint. * * * The commission finds that prima facie evidence of a violation exists in relatively few cases. During fiscal year 1973, for example, the commission received approximately 2,400 complaints and determined that only 94, or four per cent, required the filing of a response. See Fairness Report, 48 FCC2d at 8. When the commission does require a broadcaster to respond to a fairness doctrine complaint, it reviews the response to determine whether the broadcaster's decisions with respect to the issues raised, the views presented, the format and spokesmen used, and the time allotted were made reasonably and in good faith. * * * If the commission determines that the broadcaster acted unreasonably or in bad faith, it will advise the broadcaster to meet its fairness obligations through additional programming. * * *

Our function in reviewing a decision made by the commission at any step of the fairness doctrine complaint procedure is to determine "whether the commission's order is unreasonable or in contravention of statutory purpose." Democratic National Committee v. FCC, 460 F.2d at 912 [quoting Neckritz v. FCC, 446 F.2d 501, 502-03 (9th Cir. 1971) (per curiam)]. We are mindful that the commission's task in administering the fairness doctrine is one of great delicacy and difficulty, and that the commission's experience in this matter accordingly is entitled to "great weight." Columbia Broadcasting System v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. at 102.

The commission ruled that ASCEF failed to meet the prima facie evidence requirement because, inter alia, it did not base its complaint on a particular, well-defined issue. American Security Council Education Foundation, 63 FCC2d 366, 368 (1977). In dismissing the complaint, the commission stated:

Although the "national security issue" is defined by the complainant as involving "the basic conflict relationship and the relative military balance between the U.S. and the U.S.S.R." in other parts of the complaint ASCEF refers to the subject of the study as "national defense and foreign policy issues," "Soviet and Chinese political and military objectives," and "domestic foreign policy." Moreover, the data collected in the accompanying study indicates that the complainant's perceived scope of the issue is much broader, encompassing subjects such as Chinese military and non-military policies, Southeast Asia and foreign relations generally.

* * * We affirm the commission's decision that ASCEF failed to base its complaint on a particular, well-defined issue because (1) the indirect relationships among the issues aggregated by ASCEF under the umbrella of "national security" do not provide a basis for determining whether the public received a reasonable balance of conflicting views, and (2), a contrary result would unduly burden broadcasters without a countervailing benefit to the public's right to be informed.

The fairness doctrine, by definition, is issue-oriented. It calls upon broadcasters to provide fair coverage on each controversial public issue discussed in their programs. * * * A fairness doctrine complaint, therefore, must focus the commission's attention on a particular, well-defined issue on which coverage was allegedly imbalanced. Presentation of such an issue is a prerequisite to a determination whether a broadcaster presented a reasonable balance of conflicting views.

ASCEF contends in this court that "national security" is a particular, well-defined issue. * * * ASCEF defines the issue, however, by aggregating under a broad umbrella concept individual issues that it determined were relevant to national security. As ASCEF stated in the material it submitted to the commission, the study which formed the basis of its allegation of imbalance "deal[t] with many U.S. foreign and defense policies" and various "national security issues facing the United States." TV AND NATIONAL DEFENSE at vi, 3. The broadcasts ASCEF studied involved issues as distinct as America's commitment to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), detente with China, SALT, amnesty, the Vietnam war, and America's response to the Soviet Union's role in the Middle East.

The issues that ASCEF joined together may have relevance, in varying degrees, to the umbrella concept of "national security." However, their relationships to one another are tangential. The issues analyzed by ASCEF arose independently in time and were largely discussed and acted upon on an independent basis. Consideration of the issues together, rather than individually, would not provide a basis for determining whether the broadcaster presented a reasonable balance of conflicting views because views on any one issue do not support or contradict views on the others.

* * *

If ASCEF had focused on individual issues, it could have identified the actual views expressed instead of superimposing artificial A, B and C viewpoints on the broadcasts studied. The commission then could have determined which, if any, issues had been the subject of imbalanced coverage, and could have ordered a meaningful remedy in the form of additional coverage if necessary. If a broadcaster fulfills fairness obligations on the various issues relating to national security, the fairness doctrine's goal of promoting informed public opinion will be served.

Acceptance of ASCEF's contention that "national security is a particular, well-defined issue" would not only render impossible a determination of reasonable balance vel non, but also would place a substantial burden on the broadcaster. A broadcaster must have a clear understanding of the issue forming the basis of a complaint in order to assess its compliance with the fairness doctrine. Unless a broadcaster can recognize the issue "with precision and accuracy," American Security Council Education Foundation, 63 FCC2d at 368, proof of compliance with the fairness doctrine would require the production of "recordings or transcripts of all news programs, editorials, commentaries, and discussion of public issues, many of which are treated over long periods of time." Allen C. Phelps, 21 FCC2d at 13. The commission has wisely determined that imposition of such onerous burdens on broadcasters would, in practice, defeat the policy of "encouraging robust, wide open debate." * * *

Adoption of ASCEF's notion of the particular issue requirement would create a precedent that might well have a serious effect on daily news programming, by inducing broadcasters to forego programming on controversial issues or by disrupting the normal exercise of journalistic judgment in such programming that is aired. The broadcasting of daily news demands the exercise of enormous editorial skill. The news editor must select from the vast array of the day's fast-moving events those which, in the limited amount of broadcast time available, should be presented to the public. In attempting to comply with the fairness doctrine as interpreted by ASCEF, an editor's news judgment would be severely altered. An editor preparing an evening newscast would be required to decide whether any of the day's newsworthy events are tied, even tangentially, to events covered in the past, and whether a report on today's lead story, in some remote way, balances yesterday's, last week's or last year's. Because this requirement would not promote the public interest, the limitations on the exercise of news judgment would be unjustified.

ASCEF's blunderbuss approach to the fairness doctrine would contribute little, if anything, toward achievement of the fairness doctrine's goal while posing all the dangers associated with government administration of fairness obligations. The prima facie case requirements are designed to weed out those complaints that would burden broadcasters without sufficient likelihood that a countervailing benefit will be gained. We uphold the commission's determination that ASCEF failed to present prima facie evidence of a fairness doctrine violation. The commission's decision that no action was warranted on the complaint is therefore

Affirmed.

Wright, Chief Judge, concurring.

* * *

BAZELON, Circuit Judge, concurring:

This case vividly illustrates the substantial constitutional perils inherent in the fairness doctrine. Unlike the personal attack and political editorial components of the fairness doctrine upheld in Red Lion, applying the fairness doctrine to daily news coverage poses a serious threat to the independence of the broadcast press.

* * *

In view of the commission's disposition of this fairness complaint, it is unnecessary to consider whether the application of the fairness doctrine to daily news coverage, absent bad faith or deliberate distortion, could ever meet the FCC's statutory mandate or the dictates of the First Amendment. I agree completely with Judge Tamm's careful and thorough analysis of the inadequacies of petitioners' prima facie complaint. We need go no further at this time.

As Judge Tamm notes, the fairness doctrine has traditionally found its justification in the scarcity of broadcast frequencies. As that factual predicate is called into question, courts may well be required to reassess the statutory and constitutional validity of the fairness doctrine's restraints on the independence of broadcast journalism. Such a reexamination, however, must await another day.

Wilkey, Circuit Judge, with whom join MacKinnon and Robb, Circuit Judges, dissenting:

We would reverse the commission's order as an abuse of discretion.

The fairness doctrine requires that broadcasters afford a reasonable opportunity for the presentation of contrasting views on controversial issues of public importance. Although the fairness doctrine has been upheld by the Supreme Court and been given statutory recognition by Congress, "important constitutional questions continue to haunt this area of the law." We would have thought that none of these questions is presented here, for in this case we confront not the merits of ASCEF's fairness complaint, but rather the threshold question of whether ASCEF made out a prima facie violation. The majority, however, apparently in view of these constitutional questions, has seen fit to convert the prima facie evidence standard into an open-ended "prudential" doctrine allowing the commission to decline jurisdiction over hard cases. Because, unlike the majority, we find the commission's stated reason for avoiding the merits in this case wholly unsatisfying, we dissent.

* * *

The fairness doctrine is itself not directly in question in this case. The issue before us is rather more modest. As stated by the majority, the question is simply whether ASCEF's complaint presented prima facie evidence of a violation of the fairness doctrine sufficient to warrant an FCC inquiry to CBS. The commission, with whom the majority agrees, thought that it did not.

We cannot help but sense that something more serious than a mine run question of prima facie evidence has been decided today. The tone and rationale of the majority opinion suggest that the wagons are being drawn about the fairness doctrine in a fashion assured to deflect the most worrisome fairness complaints—those, like petitioner's, alleging pervasive and continuous imbalance in the coverage of controversial matters. To be sure, the measurement and remedy of chronic "unfairness" raises novel and acutely difficult constitutional questions. And we mean to intimate no view of the precise shape of this frontier. We do, however, find it most regrettable that the majority does not confront these questions, instead carving an ill-defined safe harbor into which the commission may sail when the waters are rough.

Moreover, as is evident from the majority's rationale, the prima facie evidence test is a rather improbable safe harbor. Not only does the majority's position run headlong into the settled application of the prima facie standard, but also it infuses the standard with an element of discretion, and hence vagueness, painfully at odds with the precision customarily required of regulation affecting speech. Contrary to the majority's assertion, there is simply no warrant in law for the sort of free-wheeling "balancing" of interests under cover of the prima facie evidence test which the court today approves, and thus from which we must dissent.

As previously understood, the prima facie evidence test served a limited screening function. The requirement of a prima facie showing places the initial burden on the complaining party. This threshold allocation of burdens is rationalized by First Amendment concerns: by preventing broadcasters from being saddled with the task of "answering idle or capricious complaints," the commission endeavors as far as possible to eschew interference with their programming discretion. * * * Assuming, as does the majority, the validity of the Phelps criteria, then, the only question is whether the FCC reasonably complied with its own procedural standards in dismissing ASCEF's complaint.

It is possible to distinguish in the FCC's opinion four intertwined reasons in support of its conclusion that ASCEF's complaint failed to establish a prima facie case. The commission argued (1) that ASCEF did not define the "controversial issue" with sufficient specificity (2) that ASCEF's evidence did not support its assertion that the programs surveyed were imbalanced; and that ASCEF failed to provide evidence of imbalance in CBS' overall programming, either (3) because it did not survey a broad enough spectrum of the network's news and public affairs programs or (4) because it did not continue its study for a long enough period of time. We consider these arguments in turn.

A. DEFINITION OF THE ISSUE.

* * *

The issue ASCEF posed—whether this nation should do more, less, or the same about threats to its national security—is a specific issue because it is singular, precisely formulated, and explicit. The issue is admittedly a large one, but no larger than other major issues (such as abortion, or cigarette advertising) with which the commission in fairness cases has dealt. The issue is likewise a multi-faceted one, but no more multi-faceted than other major issues (such as "women's liberation" or children's advertising) which the commission in fairness cases has considered. An issue's size and complexity, in any event, do not impugn its specificity or singularity, and we think that ASCEF's definition of the issue was plainly sufficient to cross the threshold of a prima facie statement here, * * *

We have discovered extremely few cases in which the FCC has cited non-specificity as a reason for throwing out a fairness complaint. * * *

If the position taken by the FCC and this court is sustained, it would be very difficult to make any major issue in American life the subject of a fairness complaint. This is shown by the majority's assertion that the relationships of the subject areas comprising the issue of national security to one another are "tangential," and that views on any one of these subject areas could not "conflict with or support" a point of view on another subject area. As indicated above, what the majority defines—ignoring the right of the viewer to define the issue on which he wishes to make a complaint—as obligatory issues are nothing but subject areas or subissues under the viewer-defined issue of national security. Each subject area or subissue is a component part of the overall issue of national security—doing more, less, or the same about perceived threats to our national security. A stated viewpoint on one of these subject areas or subissues "conflicts" with or "supports" another—in a different subject area category—only when all the viewpoints on the different subject areas are added up under the overall issue of national security to see what was the predominant CBS viewpoint.

The majority opinion ignores the fact that where a large amount of data is surveyed, e.g., two full years of television broadcasts on the CBS "Evening News," plus additional study of limited periods of time in those and other years, the only way such a large survey can be tabulated is to analyze the defined issue in terms of its component subject areas or subissues.

* * *

There is nothing subtle or indirect about the pleadings upon whose adequacy we are asked to pass. It is plain that the complaint on its face alleges imbalance concerning issues sufficiently narrow for the majority. Ironically, petitioner's "inartful" pleading would apparently pass muster in any federal district court. Under the Federal Rules, only a "short and plain statement of the claim" is required, a condition obviously satisfied by petitioner's complaint. "Throwing people out of court" on overly formal pleading grounds is especially inappropriate in the fairness area, where the FCC's enforcement by its own admission depends almost entirely on "complaints received from interested citizens." Surely a complaint by laymen should not be judged by stricter standards than a court would apply to a lawyer's pleading.

While the majority affirmed the commission's dismissal of the complaint by sustaining it on the question of definition of the issue, and thus did not need to consider the other three asserted bases for the commission's dismissal, it is necessary for this dissent to do so, for in our view the other three asserted grounds were as equally devoid of merit as the first.

B. EVIDENCE OF PROGRAMMING IMBALANCE.

* * *

The FCC attacked the evidentiary basis for ASCEF's claim primarily by questioning the methodology of its viewpoint coding system. * * *

The soundness of ASCEF's methodology and the probativeness of its particular examples are questions for the merits, to be resolved on the basis of responsive submissions by the network and the complainant. They are not questions that must unanimously be answered in favor of ASCEF before an inquiry is even made to the licensee. To require that a complainant at the outset demonstrate his case beyond cavil is to transmute the requirement of a prima facie showing into an ex parte evidentiary decision on the merits. Such a transmutation would render the fairness doctrine, whose enforcement depends almost exclusively on viewer-initiated complaints, a dead letter.

* * *

* * * In this case, a host of "regular viewers" joined together not only in a "statement," but in an elaborate statistical analysis showing that they had not heard a balanced presentation of viewpoints on national security. By so doing, they "indicated the basis for their claim" of imbalanced programming and satisfied the evidentiary requirements of a prima facie case. The commission acted arbitrarily in concluding otherwise.

C. SCOPE OF COMPLAINANT'S STUDY.

* * *

The requirement that a fairness complaint demonstrate, as part of his prima facie showing, the absence of contrasting viewpoints in a licensee's overall programming is, on its face, quite burdensome. Proving a negative proposition is never easy; it is especially difficult when the subject of which the proposition is predicated goes on 24 hours a day, 365 days a year.

* * *

Both the FCC and CBS, finally, suggest that ASCEF is to be faulted for "wait[ing] more than three years" from the time the 1972 programs were broadcast—the programs that formed the core of its study—before filing its complaint. ASCEF finished its report in October 1974 and immediately sent the results to CBS. Six months later CBS delivered its definitive response. ASCEF at once undertook to update its study (May 1975), and updated it again just before filing its complaint (May 1976). To suggest that ASCEF can be scored for dilatoriness on this record is unsupportable. Obviously, the complainant could have sent its study to the commission in 1974 without giving CBS a chance to reply. That, however, would have violated the commission's published rules of fairness doctrine procedure. Alternatively, the complainant could have omitted its recheck for the years 1975 and 1976. In that event, however, the complainant might well have anticipated a rejoinder that its findings were stale or insufficiently thorough. Having first complied with the commission rule and then made its findings thorough and up-to-date, the complainant is now faced with the charge that its complaint is untimely. This is "Kafkaesque" bureaucracy in the ultimate.

In effect, the obligation of the television licensee is the other side of the coin from the obligation of a court. The most essential part of due process for centuries has been recognized by Anglo-American jurists to be audi alteram partem—"hear the other side." A licensee's obligation is to permit the other side to be heard by the American public. "The essential basis for any fairness doctrine, no matter with what specificity the standards are defined, is that the American public must not be left uninformed." We recognize in the courts that no justice is done if both sides are not heard; occasionally a court may reach a right result without hearing both sides, but we insist on the procedural due process of hearing both sides to validate the eventual judgment.

In regard to the exercise of free speech on the airways, the only protection under the First Amendment which those citizens not involved in the broadcast industry have is the protection of the fairness doctrine. Since television licenses cannot be granted to all, there must be a rough balance in the points of view presented over the airways. The licensee is the custodian for service to the public. Neither the licensee, nor the FCC, nor any member of the public can be the arbiter of the truth of what is broadcast. But the licensee, and then the FCC if the licensee does not perform, is the arbiter and enforcer of preserving a rough balance in the discussion of controversial issues of public importance over the facilities of each licensee.

As we stressed at the outset, so we emphasize in conclusion, that we express no views on the merits of ASCEF's complaint. Whatever flaws the study on which the complaint was based may ultimately be shown to have, the FCC did not demonstrate them in its opinion ruling on whether the complainant had made a prima facie case. Indeed, by the very nature of the issue and the purported exhaustive documentation, it would have been virtually impossible to have done so. We say only that, as a procedural matter, ASCEF specified "an issue" and presented sufficient evidence of imbalance in the network's overall programming on that issue to meet the threshold requirements of a prima facie case concerning the issue of national security. Since we anticipate the commission could hardly find the issue of national security not to be "controversial" and "of public importance," as the majority seems to agree, it should, in accordance with its own procedures, have made inquiry of CBS.

We therefore respectfully dissent.

---

COMMENT

1. In a footnote, in the earlier panel decision reversed by Judge Tamm's preceding en banc decision, Judge Wilkey pointed out that former FCC Commissioner Nicholas Johnson once suggested that the Phelps doctrine was itself unfair. See American Security Council Education Foundation v. FCC, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 1516, 607 F.2d 438 (D.C. Cir. 1978), cert. den. 444 U.S. 1013 (1980). Why, Commissioner Johnson asked, should the burden be on a member of the public to submit proof of something the licensee has not broadcast but should have? The theory is that less damage is done to First Amendment values if it is relatively difficult for the FCC to review the judgments of broadcast journalism. This is true if the source of First Amendment values is found in the CBS v. DNC decision. See text, p. 858. But does this hold true if it is argued, as Judge Wilkey does, that the appropriate source of First Amendment values is in the Red Lion case? See text, p. 845.

2. In his panel decision in American Security Council, Judge Wilkey observes that his court's reaction to the Phelps requirements in the past "was not exactly a ringing endorsement." See also, Democratic National Committee v. FCC, 460 F.2d 556, 559 (D.C.Cir. 1970). Judge Wilkey elaborated on this theme:

[M]ore recently we have noted the "potential for less than full enforcement" of the fairness doctrine that inheres in [the Phelps requirements]. See National Citizens Committee for Broadcasting, 567 F.2d 1095, 1111 and n. 68 [Pensions case]. We are not required to address the propriety of the Phelps test here.

Is there a legal basis for a challenge to the Phelps requirements? Under the Federal Communications Act? On the basis of the First Amendment?

3. In its Fairness Report, 48 FCC2d 1 (1974), the FCC defended the Phelps rule as follows:

[C]omplaints are not forwarded to the licensee for his comments unless they present prima facie evidence of a violation. * * * Thus, broadcasters are not burdened with the task of answering idle or capricious complaints. By way of illustration, the commission received some 2400 complaints in fiscal 1973, only 94 of which were forwarded to licensees for their comments.

Can it be argued that the Phelps rule is insulating broadcasters too well from effective enforcement of the fairness doctrine? Under Judge Tamm's decision in American Security Council are the procedural difficulties attendant on proving a fairness complaint now insurmountable as far as a complainant is concerned.

Judge Wilkey in dissent in American Security Council remarked in a footnote:

We wonder if any one of these 94 complaints was better documented and more thoroughly analyzed than the complaint in the instant case. Moreover, we wonder if it can be fairly said that all the 94 complaints, to which a response was required, more sharply and clearly defined the issue than was done in the instant case.

If the American Security Council fairness complaint failed to make out a prima facie case, is it possible to meet the prima facie rule? That question cannot be answered without also reflecting on Judge Wilkey's observation that the fairness complaint in American Security Council posed a fundamental challenge to network news judgment overall:

The tone and rationale of the majority opinion suggest that the wagons are being drawn about the fairness doctrine in a fashion assured to deflect the most worrisome fairness complaints—those, like petitioner's, alleging pervasive and continuous imbalance in the coverage of controversial matters.

Would it have been better for the majority to have rejected the fairness complaint in American Security Council, not on the procedural basis it chose, but on the ground that complaints about "editorial slant" were outside the scope of the fairness doctrine?

4. Judge Tamm, usually an advocate of fairness doctrine enforcement (See the Pensions case, text, p. 876), advocated a different position in American Security Council. What is troubling Judge Tamm?

---

KENNEDY FOR PRESIDENT COMMITTEE v. FCC

6 MED.L.RPTR. 1705, 636 F.2D 432 (D.C.CIR. 1980).

[EDITORIAL NOTE

The facts of this case as well as the portion of the opinion bearing on § 312(a)(7) are reported in the text, p. 834.]

ROBINSON, Circuit Judge

III. THE FAIRNESS DOCTRINE CLAIM

Petitioner's last claim of entitlement to free broadcast time for Senator Kennedy is founded upon the well-known fairness doctrine. That label shorthands a two-fold requirement that broadcasters give adequate coverage to controversial issues of public importance and fairly reflect contrasting viewpoints in that coverage. Petitioner does not impugn the networks' honesty in rejecting its free time request; indeed, it has expressly represented both to the commission and this court its belief that in doing so the networks acted in good faith. Given that, the issue before us is whether the fairness doctrine sustains petitioner's theory that Senator Kennedy was wrongly denied use of the networks' facilities for presentation of his views on the economy.

In the opinion and order affirmed by the commission, the Broadcast Bureau found three fatal flaws in petitioner's fairness complaint. One was a failure to define specifically the particular controversial issue involved. Another was the absence of any evidence indicating that the networks had neglected fairly to present contrasting viewpoints on the publicly-important aspects of the economy in the course of their overall programming. Still another was the asserted impropriety of insisting that a particular individual—Senator Kennedy—serve as a spokesman. We uphold the commission on all counts.

A complaint invoking the fairness doctrine, we have said, must present prima facie evidence of a fairness doctrine violation. Prima facie evidence consists of specific factual information which, in the absence of rebuttal, is sufficient to show that a fairness doctrine violation exists * *. [T]he complainant must produce prima facie evidence of a violation before the broadcaster will be burdened with establishing compliance with the fairness doctrine.<sup>155</sup>

---

155. American Security Council Educ. Foundation v. FCC, 607 F.2d 438 (1979) cert. denied 444 U.S. 1013 (1980).

We think the Bureau was adequately justified in concluding that petitioner fell well short of this standard.

In its opinion, the Bureau observed that petitioner "nowhere states with specificity what it believes the controversial issue really is." In its several arguments, petitioner has referred merely to such general topics as "the nation's economic crisis," "inflation, one of the most important issues in the 1980 presidential campaign," and "the economic stewardship" of the president. We agree with the Bureau that a complainant must define the proffered issue with greater particularity. In both its fairness primer and its political broadcasting primer the commission has emphasized the need to identify the issue precisely, and this court has upheld the reasonableness of such requirements.<sup>162</sup> Chief Judge Wright capsulized the requirement when very recently he admonished that the issue "must be * * * highly specific, one that can be defined with precision and can be addressed and responded to directly and efficiently by the broadcaster."

This is not an idle demand. As we have been careful to explain, "[a] broadcaster must have a clear understanding of the issue forming the basis of a complaint in order to assess its compliance with the fairness doctrine. Unless a broadcaster can recognize the issue 'with precision and accuracy,' * * * proof of compliance with the fairness doctrine requires the production of 'recordings or transcripts of all news programs, editorials, commentaries and discussion of public issues, many of which are treated over long periods of time.'" <sup>164</sup> Imprecise formulation of a controversial issue put forth thus can lead to

"imposition of such onerous burdens on broadcasters [that] would, in practice, defeat the policy of 'encouraging robust, wide-open debate.'" <sup>165</sup> In final result, "[i]ssue ambiguity in the fairness doctrine context is a certainty to lessen the free flow of information favored by the First Amendment, and is therefore unacceptable."<sup>166</sup> We are not disposed to blink procedural transgressions that jeopardize realization of this lofty goal.

Even if this flaw could be excused, another is immediately perceived. The Bureau pointed out that petitioner "has not presented any evidence that the networks have failed in their overall programming to present contrasting views on the issue of the economic crisis facing America." Moreover, said the Bureau, [e]ven if [petitioner] believes that the controversial issue of public importance in this case is defined as which candidate for the Democratic Party's nomination has the soundest economic policies, there is no evidence presented that this issue was discussed in the broadcast. Again, we note that the networks have indicated that they have presented coverage of Senator Kennedy's economic viewpoints.

The fairness doctrine does not operate with the dissective focus of Section 315(a)'s equal-opportunity provision; it "nowhere requires equality but only reasonableness." Intelligent assessment of the nature and caliber of a broadcaster's overall programming obviously cannot be confined to one program, or even to one day's presentations, so a failure to show some fairness deficiency on the whole is necessarily fatal. Wide discretion must be accorded broadcasters in their pro-

162. See, e.g., American Security Council Educ. Foundation v. FCC, supra, 607 F.2d at 446-447; Hale v. FCC, 425 F.2d 556, 558-559 (1970); see also, e.g., Democratic Nat'l Comm. v. FCC, 460 F.2d at 907-908.

164. 607 F.2d at 451, first quoting American Security Council Educ. Foundation, 63 FCC2d 366, 368 (1977), and next quoting Allen C. Phelps, 21 FCC2d 12, 13 (1969).

165. 607 F.2d at 451, quoting Allen C. Phelps, 21 FCC2d 12, 13 (1969).

166. 607 F.2d at 458 (Wright, C.J., concurring).

gramming, and while short-run imbalances desirably are to be minimized, it is only in the long run that a well-founded approach to fairness consideration becomes feasible. The objectives of the fairness doctrine are thus best promoted by encouraging "the discussion and presentation of controversial issues in the various broadcast program formats * * * for it is just not practical to require equality with respect to a large number of the issues dealt with in a great variety of programs on a daily and continuing basis." So it is that compliance with the fairness doctrine is to be determined on the basis of the broadcaster's programming in its entirety. As the Bureau foresaw, the alternative would involve the agency "much too deeply in broadcast journalism; [causing it to] become virtually a part of the broadcasting 'fourth estate,' overseeing thousands of complaints that some issue had not been given 'equal treatment.'"

The commission customarily finds a fairness-doctrine violation only upon a showing that the broadcaster's decision was unreasonable or in bad faith, a review standard we have consistently endorsed. Petitioner has not attempted to refute the networks' representations that they have afforded and will continue to afford extensive coverage of all views, including Senator Kennedy's, on questions of economic policy. Particularly in this milieu, we have no cause to overturn the Bureau's holding that "[i]n order for [petitioner] to make out a prima facie case under the Fairness Doctrine, it must offer much more complete evidence than that provided in its April 4 letter [to the commission] that the networks have not balanced their coverage of controversial issues."

Addressing what it deemed to be a third deficiency in petitioner's complaint, the Bureau held that the fairness doctrine did not endow Senator Kennedy with an individual right to broadcast his views on the current economic crisis. Undoubtedly there are cases wherein a particular individual may be an appropriate spokesman for a particular position. Absent that peculiar situation, however, it is the rule that, in the Bureau's words, "under the Fairness Doctrine, no specific individual or group is entitled to present the contrasting viewpoints." Petitioner neither alleged nor endeavored to show that the Senator is uniquely and singularly qualified to represent those who dispute the President's economic leadership or strategies. Certainly with the networks' assertions that they have already presented a wide range of views on the state of the Nation's economy, the fairness doctrine does not confer an individual right on Senator Kennedy to address these issues on the air.

We thus find petitioner's fairness doctrine contentions, as well as those implicating Section 312(a)(7), to be unacceptable. The order under review is accordingly

Affirmed.

---

The Denial of License Renewal As a "Fairness" Doctrine Sanction: A Case History

1. On July 1, 1970, a radio station in Media, Pennsylvania won the dubious honor of being the first licensee in the history of broadcast regulation to lose its license at renewal time because of failure to comply with the fairness doctrine. Brandywine Main Line Radio, Inc., 24 FCC 2218 (1970).

The operator of the station, Brandywine Main Line Radio, Inc., was wholly owned by the Faith Theological Seminary, presided over by right-wing radio preacher, Carl McIntire.

In 1965, McIntire's group applied for transfer of control of WXUR to them from its owners. Community groups fought this application. The FCC approved the transfer only after the McIntire group pledged that they would provide opportunity for the expression of opposing viewpoints on controversial public issues.

At renewal time citizen groups in the community contended that the McIntire staff had not honored their pledge. The renewal hearing determined that Thomas Livezy, moderator of a WXUR call-in program, "Freedom of Speech," was finally removed by the station management because of his encouragement and apparent approval of the remarks of some of the program's anti-semitic callers.

Under the personal attack rules, WXUR was required to furnish the attack victims notice of the attacks, copies of the transcript, or, lacking that, tapes and summaries of an offer of an opportunity to reply. WXUR, however, had established no procedures for providing notice and response.

The result in the Brandywine Main Line Radio case was the product of two of the most influential communications law cases of the 1960s, Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969) and Office of Communications of United Church of Christ v. FCC, 359 F.2d 994 (D.C.Cir. 1960). As a result of Red Lion, the fairness doctrine's constitutional status at long last was resolved squarely in its favor. As a result, vigorous enforcement of the Fairness Doctrine was now possible. As a result of the United Church of Christ decision, citizen groups now had standing to seek and obtain a hearing before the FCC where the actual performance of the broadcasters seeking renewal could be developed. See this text, p. 938ff. No competing broadcaster was seeking WXUR's license. If citizen groups had not been conferred sufficient standing to compel a hearing, license renewal would have been pro forma. Citizen groups had precipitated the first denial of a broadcaster's application for license renewal on the basis of the fairness doctrine in the whole history of broadcast regulation.

Was Brandywine Main Line Radio a vindication of the rights of the broadcast audience? Or was WXUR silenced because of the nonconformist right-wing political and fundamentalist views advocated on it? Or was Brandywine Main Line Radio a group defamation case which the FCC preferred not to recognize as such? See Barron, Freedom of the Press for Whom? The Right of Access to Mass Media 194-208 (1973).

---

BRANDYWINE-MAINE LINE RADIO, INC. v. FCC

473 F.2D 16 (D.C.CIR. 1972).

TAMM, Circuit Judge * * *

The Fairness Doctrine was, in the commission's view, the central aspect of the litigation. The reason for this is axiomatic—prior to issuing Brandywine's initial license a tremendous amount of concern was expressed to the commission by numerous parties, each fearing that WXUR would fail to comply with the doctrine. Brandywine's response to these fears was clear and apparently forthright—it had promised at the time of the transfer application to fully comply with the doctrine. In point of fact, the decision of the commission had "reiterated the necessity that a licensee serve the public interest by adherence to the Fairness Doctrine, including the personal attack principle."

The commission proceeded to review the record, including fifteen days of monitored broadcasts, and concluded "that Brandywine under its new ownership did not make reasonable efforts to comply with the Fairness Doctrine during the license period." * * *

The commission closed its 23-page opinion by stating:

We conclude upon an evaluation of all the relevant and material evidence contained in the hearing record, that renewals of the WXUR and WXUR-FM licenses should not be granted. The record demonstrates that Brandywine failed to provide reasonable opportunities for the presentation of contrasting views on controversial issues of public importance, that it ignored the personal attack principle of the Fairness Doctrine, that the applicant's representations as to the manner in which the station would be operated were not adhered to, that no adequate efforts were made to keep the station attuned to the community's or area's needs and interests, and that no showing has been made that it was, in fact so attuned. Any one of these violations would alone be sufficient to require denying the renewals here, and the violations are rendered even more serious by the fact that we carefully drew the Seminary's attention to a licensee's responsibilities before we approved transfer of the stations to its ownership and control.

* * *

This aspect of the case, while not the most troublesome, is clearly the most disturbing to the court. * * *

The changes which took place on WXUR within the very first days following the transfer show a common design on the part of the licensee to engage in deceit and trickery in obtaining a broadcast license. Within nine days a totally unexpected group of seven programs, each of a nature different than those on the typical program schedule, were on the air. These programs, * * * characterized as the "Hate Clubs of the Air," replaced programs which were predominantly entertainment oriented. The speed with which these changes took place can lead the court to one conclusion, and one conclusion only—Brandywine intended to place these controversial programs on the air from the first but feared to so inform the commission lest the transfer application be denied. This approach was foolish.

* * *

Journalists and broadcasters have no monopoly over concern with censorship. The courts, and indeed the American public as a whole, have a tremendous stake in a free press and an informed citizenry.

Yet, how can the citizenry remain informed if broadcasters are permitted to espouse their own views only without attempting to fully inform the public? This is the issue of good faith which, unfortunately, a small number of broadcasters refuse to exercise.

* * * The commission has made no attempt to influence WXUR's programming or censor its programming in general or specifically. Had the licensee met the obligations required of it we have no reason to believe that Brandywine would have met with any difficulty. The law places requirements on licensees as fiduciaries. Failure to live up to the trust placed in the hands of the fiduciary requires that a more responsible trustee be found. This is not the public's attempt to silence the trustee—it is the trustee's attempt to silence the public. This is not the public censoring the trustee—it is the trustee censoring the public. Attempting to impose the blame on the commission for its own shortcomings can only be likened to the spoiled child's tantrum at being refused a request by an otherwise overly-benevolent parent.

* * *

In light of the extensive violations found by the commission in the areas of the fairness doctrine, the personal attack rules, and misrepresentation of program plans, the commission refused to renew Brandywine's license. * * *

* * *

Brandywine was given every opportunity to succeed in the broadcast endeavor on which it set out. The commission fulfilled its duty in granting the initial license although it may have proven more popular and expedient to bow to the protestations of Brandywine's detractors. The commission forewarned Brandywine about its fairness doctrine and its personal attack rules and made every effort to explain them. Despite the commission's sanguine outlook it was soon evident that Brandywine refused to comply with those requirements, which are designed to serve the public interest and the broadcast audience. Commission good faith was interpreted as an act of weakness.

The First Amendment was never intended to protect the few while providing them with a sacrosanct sword and shield with which they could injure the many. Censorship and press inhibition do not sit well with this court when engaged in by either the commission or by a defiant licensee. The most serious wrong in this case was the denial of an open and free airwave to the people of Philadelphia and its environs.

Consequently, the opinion of the Federal Communications Commission is Affirmed.

Bazelon, Circuit Judge, dissenting: In this case I am faced with a prima facie violation of the First Amendment. The Federal Communications Commission has subjected Brandywine to the supreme penalty: it may no longer operate as a radio broadcast station. In silencing WXUR, the commission has dealt a death blow to the licensee's freedoms of speech and press. Furthermore, it has denied the listening public access to the expression of many controversial views. Yet, the commission would have us approve this action in the name of the fairness doctrine, the constitutional validity of which is premised on the argument that its enforcement will enhance public access to a marketplace of ideas without serious infringement of the First Amendment rights of individual broadcasters.

* * * But if we are to go after gnats with a sledgehammer like the fairness doctrine, we ought at least to look at what else is smashed beneath our blow.

* * *

We once stated that "[I]f the fairness doctrine cannot withstand First Amendment scrutiny, the reason is that to insure a balanced presentation of controversial issues may be to insure no presentation, or no vigorous presentation, at all." An examination of the facts of this case and the history of regulation which has brought us here raise for me serious doubts about the correctness of continuing to rely primarily on the fairness doctrine as the proper means of insuring First Amendment goals. The plain truth is that to uphold the commission's fairness ruling, not only must we bless again the road we have travelled in the past, we must go farther; for this will be the first time that the FCC has denied a license renewal because of fairness doctrine obligations.

* * *

I originally authorized issuance of the opinions of the court with my concurrence resting on the narrow ledge of Brandywine's misrepresentations under the Supreme Court's ruling in FCC v. WOKO, Inc. [329 U.S. 223 (1946)]. But it is abundantly clear that the fairness doctrine is the "central aspect" of this case which even touches the core of the applicability of WOKO. I have therefore concluded that the great weight of First Amendment considerations cannot rest on so narrow a ledge.

* * * Furthermore, in light of my discussion of the changing relationship between the First Amendment and broadcasting, there is some question as to what the FCC may constitutionally ask of applicants with respect to programming plans and adherence to fairness obligations. Thus the application of WOKO raises constitutional questions which cannot be neatly separated, as I had originally thought. * * *

I would remand the entire case to be reviewed in light of the matters discussed in this opinion.

Wright, Chief Judge, with whom Circuit Judge Tamm concurs, responding: Since Judge Bazelon's dissent seems to be an attack on the fairness doctrine, in fairness to the reader he should make clear at the outset of his opinion that the court's judgment in this case is not based on the fairness doctrine.

* * *

As shown in my separate opinion, I rested my concurrence in the court's judgment solely on the deception ground. Since Judge Tamm would affirm the commission on that ground also, that ground, and that ground alone, forms the basis of our judgment.

* * * I do not think that deception in obtaining a Government license is too narrow a ledge for voiding that license. The Supreme Court flatly so held in FCC v. WOKO, Inc., 329 U.S. 223 (1946), and there are no cases holding otherwise.

---

COMMENT

1. In his lone dissent, Judge Bazelon raises as many questions about fairness doctrine procedure as he does about the theoretical First Amendment justification for the fairness doctrine. He suggests, for example, that FCC requirements that a "regular procedure for previewing, monitoring, or reviewing its broadcasts" may be too costly for low budget radio stations. The FCC requirements, he suggests, may themselves raise "critical First Amendment questions." Judge Bazelon's suggestion apparently is that rules issued by a government agency which hit hardest at essentially noncommercial stations like WXUR whose reason for existence is to "propagate a viewpoint * * * not being heard in the greater Philadelphia area" may itself constitute a governmental restraint on popularly disapproved expression which is prohibited by the First Amendment.

2. Judge Bazelon makes the point that the fairness doctrine in principle was what was upheld in Red Lion; FCC applications of the fairness doctrine, on the other hand, were not necessarily upheld. This is, of course, an important and, one should have thought, an obvious distinction. Is this a distinction that gets sufficient attention in Judge Tamm's opinion for the court in Brandywine?

From a broader perspective, however, Judge Bazelon's dissent can also be viewed as second thoughts on the wisdom, as a First Amendment matter, of upholding the fairness doctrine even as a principle.

3. Is Judge Bazelon in Brandywine trying to apply the "tradition of print journalism" to broadcasting? It is in this sense, perhaps, that his dissent conflicts with the Supreme Court decision in Red Lion.

Judge Bazelon says in dissent that the real reason First Amendment scholars like Professor Thomas Emerson support governmental policies like the fairness doctrine is based "solely on the argument of tradition—that government is involved with radio and TV so it must be all right." Judge Bazelon says that "[w]ith all respect to Professor Emerson, this is a distinction without a difference."

Some rejoinder is perhaps in order to this criticism. First, Professor Emerson justifies broadcast regulation on the basis of the limitation of the spectrum rationale. Judge Bazelon, relying on new developments in fields like cable, belittles the significance of this argument. Second, the fact of government involvement could cause involuntary censorship to be viewed as governmental and thus subject to First Amendment obligation. Finally, doesn't the sheer impact of radio and television affect the legal approach used with regard to them as compared with the print media? NBC newsman Bill Monroe was quoted in Judge Bazelon's dissent as follows:

"Radio and television are at bottom, instantaneous, warmblooded press."

One of the implicit or unarticulated bases for broadcast regulation may well be the greater assumed impact and immediacy on the popular mind of the electronic as compared with the print media. In other words, there are other rationalizations for broadcast regulation besides either the limitation of the spectrum rationale or the access for ideas rationale, although evidence supporting those rationalizations is still sketchy.

Fairness, Group Defamation and Broadcasting

If the FCC had chosen to do so, the decision in the Brandywine case might well have been based on the issue of group defamation. It is by no means clear, however, that group libel is responsive to resolution through enforcement of the fairness doctrine.

The renewal hearing in the WXUR case is illustrative. Offending programs on WXUR had offered time to spokesmen for the racial and religious groups attacked. But these invitations were declined because the groups involved did not wish to further reply to the libels or to dignify them with a response. The disinclination of minority groups to accept reply time as redress for group libel in broadcasting is hardly without precedent. Thus, when a California radio station sought renewal, the Anti-Defamation League of the B'nai B'rith opposed renewal on the ground that the station carried a program by a commentator, Richard Cotten, who had identified Judaism with socialism. The station had offered the ADL equal free time to respond. The ADL told the FCC that it did not want to reply. The FCC permitted the California station, KTYM, to keep its license, and the federal court of appeals affirmed. Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, Pacific Southwest Regional Office v. FCC, 403 F.2d 169 (D.C. Cir. 1968).

Judge Burger, now Chief Justice Burger, spoke for the court in the ADL case, and he relied heavily on the concurring opinion in the FCC decision of Commissioner Lee Loevinger. Loevinger sharply disagreed with the ADL position that group libel should be classified along with hard-core obscenity as unprotected speech. See

Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U.S. 250 (1950). See text, p. 279.

Such a classification, Loevinger said, would constitute censorship. In a concurring opinion in the court of appeals, Judge Wright said that cancellation of a station's license for libeling an individual would not be censorship but that group libel was a different matter. Furthermore, Judge Wright questioned the capacity of the fairness doctrine to meet the problem of group libel.

2. Still another group defamation problem in broadcasting was the so-called WBAI case. In December 1968 and January 1969, WBAI-FM, a Pacifica radio station in New York City, carried two programs with anti-Semitic subject matter. The programs were symptomatic of the bitter dispute over "community control" of schools that arose in Brooklyn, New York at that time between the black community and the teachers union. The FCC declined to make any investigation. The FCC said it was satisfied that WBAI had afforded reasonable opportunity for the presentation of conflicting viewpoints. The FCC did concede, however, that there were occasions when speech was so enmeshed with "burgeoning violence" that FCC intervention would be appropriate. See In re Complaint of United Federation of Teachers, New York, N.Y., 17 FCC2d 204 (1969).

If group libel is handled as a fairness doctrine problem, the ultimate remedy for group defamation will be to require the broadcaster to make sure that group libel does not go unanswered. Unfortunately, as Judge Wright who suggested this solution in ADL knows all too well, such reply time is understandably regarded as unwelcome by minority groups who regard the reply as merely helping to publicize the attack and to add to the intragroup conflict which the original attack was designed to provoke.

3. On the basis of the majority opinion in Brandywine, it is apparent that the group defamation practices of WXUR were a serious factor in the massive citizen group effort to persuade the FCC to deny WXUR's license renewal application. But the group defamation problem, however large it may have loomed in stimulating the movement against renewal of WXUR, does not loom very large in the formal rationalization for the result reached either by the FCC or by the court.

In fact, just a count of judicial votes at the court of appeals level shows that the real basis for decision in Brandywine isn't even the Fairness Doctrine but is instead the misrepresentation issue. The only theory which the two judges of the three-judge appellate panel which reviewed the FCC decision in Brandywine agreed upon was that deception in obtaining a broadcast license is justification for denying renewal of that license. FCC v. WOKO, Inc., 329 U.S. 223 (1946).

4. Since the personal attack rules explicitly refer to "an attack * * * made upon the honesty, character, integrity or like personal qualities of an identified person or group" (see text, p. 846), can the personal attack rules be used as a remedy for group defamation in broadcasting?

The Fairness Doctrine and the Personal Attack Rule: Do They Apply to Television "Comedy"?

5. The issue of whether organizations representing ethnic groups can use the personal attack rule to counteract ethnic slurs arose in Polish American Congress v. FCC, 520 F.2d 1248 (7th Cir. 1975). (See text p. 900.) The Polish American Congress filed a complaint with the FCC that a "comedy" routine on ABC's Dick Cavett show constituted a personal attack "on the character, intelligence, hygiene or appearance of members of the Polish American community, an identifiable group." The complaint contended that such defamatory attacks represented a "warped and negative point of view which has enormous influence on the viewing audience." Although the personal attack rule was held not applicable on the ground that the offending skit did not involve a controversial issue of public importance, the Broadcast Bureau of the FCC said that the personal attack rule did not apply for another reason:

The statement of a particular view, however strongly or forcefully made, does not necessarily constitute a personal attack. The Port of New York Authority, 25 FCC2d 417 (1970). To qualify under the commission's rule, the attack must reflect upon the "honesty, character, integrity or like personal qualities" of a person or group, and not merely reflect upon ability, knowledge or like intellectual or motor skills. See In re Complaint by Polish-American Congress, 42 FCC2d 1100 (1973).

The FCC agreed with its Broadcast Bureau that the personal attack rules did not apply to the Polish jokes on the Dick Cavett show because there was no "attack on those personal qualities bearing on the moral rectitude or personal credibility of the named individual or group." 46 FCC2d 124 (1974). See In re Complaint of Thaddeus L. Kowalski, Esq., and Anti-Defamation League Commission of the Polish American Congress, Inc., 46 FCC2d 124 (1974). The court of appeals agreed with the FCC that the personal attack rule did not apply since the jokes did not involve discussion of a controversial issue of public importance.

Did the FCC take too limited an interpretation of the "personal attack" rule? The Polish National Congress contended in its complaint that the "unanswered 'Polack joke' * * * belittle[s] the Polish American in our society." While the FCC ruled that Polish jokes "perpetuating 'a dumb Polack image'" did not constitute a personal attack under the language of that rule, the FCC did not consider whether the reference to groups in the personal attack rule was intended to embrace racial or ethnic groups. Since the point was not discussed, it could be argued that by implication the FCC has accepted the view that ethnic and racial groups may invoke the personal attack rule if otherwise applicable. If this is true, a question arises as to the criteria that should be used to identify a group sufficiently representative to be permitted to request a right of reply on behalf of an ethnic group which asserts it has been attacked or defamed on television.

THE ENFORCEMENT POWERS OF THE FCC

In enforcing the Federal Communications Act and the rules, policies, and regulations issued thereunder, the FCC has tremendous discretion in terms of the range and severity of the sanctions available to it. Thus, in FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, text, p. 920, the Supreme Court, per Justice Stevens, quoted with apparent approval the FCC's statement of its enforcement powers in Pacifica, 56 FCC2d 94, at 96 fn. 3 (1975); "The commission noted: 'Congress has specifically empowered the FCC to (1) revoke a station's license, (2) issue a cease and desist order, or (3) impose a monetary forfeiture for a violation of Section 1464, 47 U.S.C.A. §§ 312(a), 312(b), 503(b)(1)(E). The FCC can also (4) deny license renewal or (5) grant a short term renewal, 47 U.S.C.A. §§ 307, 308.'"

Enforcement by Letter

One regulatory procedure used by the FCC is enforcement by letter. This usually takes place when a third party protests some programming decision by a licensee. The commission then dispatches a letter to the licensee stating its view of how the matter should be dealt with. There is some criticism of this method since it is very difficult to get judicial review of the course of action outlined by the FCC in a letter. These letters of reprimand, which is what they often are, constitute the so-called "raised eyebrow" technique. Do you see why such review would be difficult?<sup>8</sup>

Cease and Desist Orders

From a reading of the Federal Communications Act one might expect that § 312(b) would play an important role in enforcing the commission's programming standards. That provision states:

Where any person (1) has failed to operate substantially as set forth in a license, (2) has violated or failed to observe any of the provisions of this act, * * * or (3) has violated or failed to observe any rule or regulation of the commission authorized by this act or by a treaty ratified by the United States, the commission may order such person to cease and desist from such action.

Cease and desist orders have not been granted on a widespread basis by the

8. Sometimes FCC authority is deemed to have been exercised even though formal institutional action, even that evidenced by a letter, is not present. Informal action may be said to have been taken by a new statement of policy which the FCC chairman says should be taken by the industry in the future. The industry may think the new policy is contrary to law, but its informal and undefined character may make it difficult to get a court to review it. See Writers Guild of America, West, Inc. v. FCC, 423 F.Supp. 1064 (C.D.Calif.1976) which involved the controversial family viewing policy which had been adopted by the National Association of Broadcasters (NAB). FCC Chairman Wiley was deemed by the court to have informally, through a speech and otherwise, pressured the networks and the NAB into adopting the family viewing policy. The court held that under the circumstances the Writers Guild was entitled to obtain judicial review of the First Amendment validity of the family viewing policy even though there had been no prior formal FCC proceeding adopting the policy. See Cowan, See No Evil: The Backstage Battle Over Sex and Violence in Television (1978).

commission. The commission nevertheless professes to be willing to use them. An example of their use in a "fairness" context is provided by Richard Sneed, 15 P. & F. Radio Reg. 158 (1967). In that case a minister, objecting to the cancellation of a religious program that had been carried by the station, asked the commission to issue a cease and desist order to restrain the licensee from dropping the program. The commission refused to issue the cease and desist order and stated that the anti-censorship provision of the Federal Communications Act (§ 326) forbade it from ordering a licensee to broadcast any particular program. But what is significant about the case is that the commission did say that it had authority to issue cease and desist orders when its programming standards had been violated.

The cease and desist order device was actually used by the FCC in Mile High Stations, Inc., 28 FCC 795, 20 P. & F. Radio Reg. 345 (1960). In that case the FCC first issued an order requiring an AM radio station licensee to show cause why its license should not be revoked because it repeatedly had carried off-color remarks. The FCC retreated from that course of action and ultimately issued a cease and desist order against any similar broadcasts in the future.

Over the years the FCC has had to struggle with a limited budget and insufficient staff. Do you think, these limitations have anything to do with the infrequent use of the cease and desist order by the commission?

Denial of the Application for License Renewal: The Death Penalty

The most severe sanction in the FCC's enforcement arsenal is the commission's power to deny an application for license renewal. The industry calls this particular sanction "the death penalty." As a sanction, it exists more as a specter than a reality since it is rarely used. The FCC, of course, may also revoke licenses under specified circumstances. See, for example, the discussion of 47 U.S.C.A. § 312(a)(7) permitting revocation of a license where there has been willful failure to provide "reasonable access" to broadcasting to a "legally qualified candidate for federal elective office." See generally, text, p. 815. A halfway house between outright denial of the application for renewal is to grant an offending party a short-term renewal for one year rather than the three-year renewal authorized under the act. See 47 U.S.C.A. § 307(d). See Office of Communication of the United Church of Christ v. FCC, text, p. 938.

Is denial of a petition for license renewal a meaningful sanction any longer in communications law? Longer license terms have been accorded broadcast licensees, particularly television licensees. See text, p. 769. Furthermore, relatively recently, the Supreme Court has spoken sympathetically of the licensee's legitimate renewal expectancy which was deemed to be implicit in the structure of the Federal Communications Act. See FCC v. National Citizens Committee for Broadcasting, text p. 959.

The case which follows is an infrequent but powerful reminder that the FCC's most severe sanction, at least in the industry's view—denial of the license renewal application—is sometimes inflicted.

---

RKO GENERAL, INC. V. FCC

7 MED.L.RPTR. 2313, 670 F.2D 215 (D.C.CIR. 1981).

MIKVA, Circuit Judge:

The Federal Communications Commission (FCC) denied renewal of television licenses to RKO General, Inc. (RKO) in Boston, Los Angeles, and New York City. Renewal of the Boston license was denied because of the finding that RKO lacked the requisite character to be a licensee of that station. The denial of license renewals in Los Angeles and New York City followed from the commission's earlier determination that the Boston finding would be res judicata in those proceedings.

RKO is a wholly owned subsidiary of General Tire & Rubber Company (General Tire). General Tire, by its own admission, has engaged in a staggering variety of corporate misconduct. During the Boston proceeding, RKO withheld evidence of General Tire's conduct from the FCC, either because RKO sought to protect its parent or because the parent withheld information from the subsidiary in order to protect itself. The commission, in turn, has disqualified RKO after years of delay in an opinion that is multifarious at best. We reject most of the grounds that the FCC used to justify its denial of RKO's license renewals. We affirm the commission's decision that RKO lacked candor, but on a quite narrow ground that cannot automatically be applied to any other proceeding. Accordingly, although we uphold denial of the Boston license renewal, the proceedings in Los Angeles and New York City must be remanded.

* * *

The need for a remand and further action by the commission is discomfiting in a fifteen-year-case, but this extended proceeding has hardly been a model for the administrative process. We admonish all parties to get on with the task.

RKO appealed from all three orders denying license renewal, and the appeals were consolidated by this court.

At the outset, we hold that the FCC has stated at least three independent grounds for its ultimate finding that RKO should be disqualified as a broadcast licensee in Boston. The decision states that RKO's reciprocal dealings "alone" require disqualification, that RKO's "willful and repeated [financial] misrepresentation warrants disqualification by itself," and that "perhaps of greatest importance, RKO has demonstrated a persistent lack of candor with the commission in these proceedings."

* * *

* * * We uphold the commission's disqualification of RKO in the Boston proceeding because we conclude that the decision's ultimate basis, RKO's lack of candor before the FCC, fully and independently supports that judgment. * * *

The record fully supports the commission's finding that RKO did not display full candor before the commission during the period from late 1975 to July 1976. * * *

* * *

* * * In spite of an SEC investigation that was rapidly gathering steam, and in spite of the fact that its qualifications as a licensee were at issue before the FCC, RKO failed to come forward with a candid statement of relevant facts. RKO did not inform the FCC that the SEC had issued a formal order of investigation in February 1976, even though this suggested the seriousness of the charges against General Tire. RKO did not advise the FCC of the SEC's preliminary findings until May 14, 1976, despite the fact that General Tire had advised its stockholders of these preliminary findings in February when it released its 1975 Annual Report. RKO did not advise the FCC until May 1976 that General Tire's own internal investigation demonstrated that many of the SEC concerns were valid, even though * * * General Tire's 10-K Report [had been submitted] the previous March. RKO never once attempted to amend or supplement its earlier pleadings with the FCC, despite a growing awareness of the facts that General Tire would later admit in its Special Report. These instances involve a lack of candor through omission. Whether or not RKO would have had an obligation to come forward with these facts under other circumstances, it could not have doubted their relevance once the filings and petitions of the intervenors put these questions before the commission. We need not decide whether RKO's pleadings were affirmatively misleading—it is enough to find that they did not state the facts.

The record suggests that RKO had ample motive for its failure to act with total candor during this period. There are numerous indications that General Tire initially decided to oppose the SEC investigation and did not begin to cooperate with that agency until sometime in the spring of 1976. Clearly, it would have been pointless for General Tire to resist the SEC inquiry at one level while RKO came forward with damaging evidence against General Tire before the commission. * * But such conjecture is not relevant, because the documents speak for themselves. It is also unnecessary to show that RKO officials had actual knowledge in early 1976 of the improprieties and illegalities to which General Tire later admitted, or that RKO officials willfully intended to misrepresent these facts to the FCC. Whether RKO sought to protect its parent, or whether the parent withheld information from the subsidiary in order to protect itself, the result is the same. We cannot improve on the language of FCC counsel: "It is obvious that where a complete disclosure of facts will militate against the interests of this organization, the commission will be deprived of that information. It is irrelevant where in the RKO-General Tire organizational structure this breakdown in candor first occurs. In the end, RKO, as the public trustee, is responsible for the reliability of the information and representations furnished by it to the commission." * * *

RKO objects to the FCC's finding on a variety of grounds. First, it contends that "there is not a shred of evidence that * * the commission was in fact 'misled'." * * Such an argument has no pertinence to this appeal, as the Supreme Court observed forty years ago:

The fact of concealment may be more significant than the facts concealed. The willingness to deceive a regulatory body may be disclosed by immaterial and useless deceptions as well as by material and persuasive ones. We do not think it is an answer to say that the deception was unnecessary and served no purpose.

FCC v. WOKO, Inc., 329 U.S. 223, 227 * * (1946). As the commission correctly emphasizes, it must rely on the applicants who come before it for the truth of their representations; it cannot countenance willingness to mislead simply because there is no evidence that the commission was in fact misled.

Equally unpersuasive is RKO's objection that its decision not to inform the commission of the SEC investigation was made on advise of counsel. * * * In modern America, parties communicate with administrative agencies almost exclusively through lawyers, but this is all the more reason why we cannot assume that RKO did not know what its lawyers were saying—particularly when the number of pleadings and other opportunities for dissembling were as great as recounted above. It is not credible that lawyers were running the strategy of RKO and General Tire to the exclusion of all the corporate chiefs.

RKO's most persuasive objection to the FCC finding that it lacked candor is that the finding was made without giving RKO formal notice and a hearing on the charge. The FCC acknowledges a "technical failure to issue such a formal designation order," * * * and admits that "[i]n the normal case a hearing probably would have been warranted." * * * We conclude, however, that RKO's conduct has been so egregious and so conspicuous that we cannot say the FCC's decision was an abuse of its authority. No purpose would have been served in this case by extending administrative proceedings that had already moved well into their second decade. The evidence of RKO's lack of candor was obvious from the documents that RKO itself had submitted to the FCC in this proceeding, as the applicants competing with RKO had been arguing for years. The commission needed only to draw legal conclusions from "facts already known." Lakewood Broadcasting Service, Inc. v. FCC, 478 F.2d 919, 924 (D.C.Cir. 1973). In this context, the FCC was not required to designate the candor issue and reopen the proceeding for an evidentiary hearing that would have served no purpose. * * * This is especially true where RKO itself had urged that there was no need to reopen the proceeding because resolution of * * * claims "turns on inferences and legal conclusions" to be drawn from facts already before the commission. * * *

In reaching this determination, we start with the emphatic differences between a broadcast applicant before the FCC and one who faces the possibility of punishment. RKO has suffered a hardship as a result of the FCC's action, but it has not been punished; denial of a renewal application "is not a penal measure." FCC v. WOKO, Inc., 329 U.S. at 228, 67 S.Ct. at 215. As the decision explains, the FCC's purpose is not to punish licensees for past wrongs, but to ensure that these "fiduciaries of a great public resource" will "satisfy the highest standards of character commensurate with the public trust that is reposed in them." * * * A broadcast license is less a property right than a privilege, Mansfield Journal Co. v. FCC, 180 F.2d 28, 35 (D.C.Cir. 1950), and retention is not automatic but must be earned. * * *

* * * The FCC has an affirmative obligation to license more than 10,000 radio and television stations in the public interest, each required to apply for renewal every three years. * * * As a result, the commission must rely heavily on the completeness and accuracy of the submissions made to it, and its applicants in turn have an affirmative duty to inform the commission of the facts it needs in order to fulfill its statutory mandate. This duty of candor is basic, and well known. * * * The commission has said before that "no specific misrepresentation or lack of candor issues are needed to consider these matters, since the commission always has authority to deny a license or application where the record reveals such misconduct." * * *

* * *

* * * When a statute dictates that parties receive notice and a hearing, of course, the provision of those basic procedural rights is not left to be decided by administrative "flexibility" or "discretion." For that reason, RKO contends that Section 309 of the act, 47 U.S.C. § 309 (1976), requires a hearing prior to the denial of a renewal application even when there are no substantial or material questions of fact. * * * But such a literal approach to the words of the act cannot govern this case, in which RKO had already been the subject of FCC proceedings that had lasted for years. The question is not whether RKO was entitled to a hearing under Section 309, but whether during the course of agency proceedings in which this candor issue arose in the most obvious and unavoidable manner, the commission was required to call a halt to its proceedings, designate the issue formally, and begin again.

We conclude that such an approach in this case would not have promoted "the proper dispatch of business" and "the ends of justice." At some point in any administrative process, someone must determine whether the remaining issues are factual or legal, and whether hearings that have already been held must be supplemented by further proceedings. * * * In Ranger [v. FCC, 294 F.2d 240 (D.C.Cir. 1961)], we held that Section 309 requires a hearing only if, "with the required information before it," the FCC still cannot make a determination as to whether granting the application would be in the public interest. Id. at 242. We thereby recognized the FCC's authority to determine without an evidentiary hearing whether applicants had submitted "the required information." Cf. Guinan v. FCC, 297 F.2d 782, 785 (D.C.Cir. 1961) (FCC need not designate comparative hearing "once it has been established that one of the competing applicants is basically unqualified" because of frequency interference). The commission's discretion should also be respected in this case, in which RKO has obviously failed to supply the information required for consideration of its merit in the public interest.

* * *

* * * RKO does not for a moment contend that it has in fact been candid with the commission, nor do we see how it possibly could. No evidence remains to be introduced; no witnesses have been denied a chance to speak. There are no further issues to try. The FCC has not assumed the answers to any questions of fact, but has simply examined uncontested and uncontestable documents that are in the record at RKO's own election.

Because the commission had "so perfect a knowledge" of the RKO misconduct that was evident from the documents directly before it, we cannot say that the commission's action was erroneous. * *

Our decision to affirm the FCC's action should not be read to include situations not covered by this unique record. The commission concedes that "this case is unprecedented," * * * and we expect that successors if any will be rare. Before the FCC can take action of this sort in the future, we believe that at least three conditions must be met in order to protect the parties. First, not only must the misconduct occur directly before the agency, but it should be of such a blatant and unacceptable dimension that its existence cannot be denied. The FCC has satisfied itself that this is the case with regard to RKO, whose lack of candor "is abundantly clear." * * * Second, although formal notice may not always be necessary, it should be evident that the party has some form of actual notice of the conduct said to be at issue, and must not be prejudiced by surprise. Finally, the party must be given an "opportunity to speak in [its] own behalf in the nature of a right of allocution." Groppi v. Leslie, 404 U.S. at 504. * * * The procedure adopted by the FCC in this case satisfies these requirements, at least insofar as the Boston renewal is concerned. RKO does not contend that it was prejudiced by the lack of notice, for it undoubtedly had actual notice of the candor issue, as the pleadings filed prior to the commission's decision demonstrate. * * *

RKO does not contend that it was denied any opportunity to present for the commission's determination any matter of fact or law, or that the commission has not given all matters submitted by RKO due and full consideration. * * * RKO had a full opportunity to speak in its own behalf, and exercised it in pleadings, proffers of proof, and oral argument before the commission. We cannot say that the FCC abused its discretion by not giving RKO a formal hearing on issues arising from RKO's conduct during the initial proceeding. Section 309 was not intended by Congress to reward delay and concealment that disserves the public interest. "Congress did not intend by this section of the statute to require the formality of commission consideration of and [re]hearing on an application in which the signatory obviously fails in major material respects to abide by the regulations." Ranger v. FCC, 294 F.2d at 243. * * * The FCC's denial of the Boston license renewal must therefore be affirmed.

The narrow basis of our decision concerning RKO's Boston license illustrates why the FCC may not deny license renewals in Los Angeles and New York City simply because it happened to condition those proceedings on the Boston outcome.

RKO's lack of candor during the Boston proceeding justifies its disqualification there because the misconduct took place directly before the trier of fact and has bearing on its general character, but the same cannot be said of the Los Angeles and New York City proceedings. The latter was conditioned on the Boston outcome in order to avoid making the parties "relitigate those issues" that had already been specified with regard to Boston. * * By contrast, the former had been conditioned on the reciprocity issue only, in order to "enable the commission to proceed with the Los Angeles matter and bring it to a conclusion with no risk to the public interest." * * * The FCC could not have known, when it conditioned either of these proceedings as it did, that the Boston outcome would turn on a lack of candor issue that had not even been designated in the Boston proceeding. RKO's misconduct did not occur directly before the trier of fact in either the Los Angeles or New York City proceedings. Accordingly, these decisions must be remanded to the commission for further consideration as it deems appropriate.

This conclusion is buttressed by the commission's own discussion of what effect, if any, RKO's Boston disqualification should have on its other broadcast licenses. In an order released on November 26, 1980, the FCC designated thirteen RKO stations for hearing, but held those proceedings in abeyance until resolution of this appeal. RKO General, Inc., 82 FCC2d 291, appeal pending sub nom. New South Media Corp. v. FCC, 644 F.2d 37 (D.C.Cir. 1980). One purpose of the separate proceeding will be to allow RKO "to introduce evidence on meritorious programming with respect to the 13 other stations and any other mitigating evidence with respect to the remaining licenses."

Now that the issues in the Boston proceeding have been sorted out, the same treatment is appropriate for RKO's New York City and Los Angeles licenses. The judgment that RKO showed a lack of candor in the Boston proceeding is res judicata, of course, and is not subject to collateral attack in these subsequent proceedings. The commission may give that finding whatever weight it considers appropriate. Indeed, it may well be that such a finding is inconsistent with a licensee holding a license anywhere, although that decision is for the commission in the first instance. At the same time, our remand of these proceedings is more than just an empty exercise. Each of RKO's renewal applications arises in different contexts and presents different levels of complexity. For example, the Los Angeles renewal was tentatively granted in 1973 subject only to future reciprocity findings. Because we have rejected reciprocity as a legitimate basis for disqualification of RKO in Boston, the Los Angeles situation may seem quite different when that proceeding is remanded. * * * These stations are entitled to an opportunity to appear directly before the commission and to argue that they deserve different treatment than RKO's Boston station. * * *

This opinion will not close a sorry chapter in the history of American communications law. We must remand the Los Angeles and New York City proceedings because the FCC has not yet provided a principled explanation for RKO's disqualification as a licensee of those stations. The FCC's findings that RKO intentionally misrepresented financial information and engaged in unlawful reciprocal trade practices cannot stand, for one was reached without notice or hearing and the other constitutes an ex post facto application of new standards to conduct that is long past.

We affirm the FCC's decision in the Boston proceeding, however, because the commission's finding that RKO displayed an egregious lack of candor in that proceeding does not suffer from either of these infirmities. During an administrative review that had already lasted for years, the FCC suddenly was confronted by documentary evidence establishing beyond doubt that RKO had been less than candid with the commission in the very proceeding under way. The FCC could observe all material facts for itself, simply by comparing the documents that had already been submitted with those that were now before it.

The denial of a license renewal to a major licensee in a major market is of manifest moment and financial impact. The FCC's decision has not been reviewed callously, and we have tried not to lose sight of the difficult issues in this case by sweeping the reasoning of the commission under a rug of agency expertise or administrative convenience. The record presented to this court shows irrefutably that the licensee was playing the dodger to serious charges involving it and its parent company. The commission was entitled to ask whether such conduct, however convenient for corporate purposes, was consistent with the candor required of an applicant for a license to the public airwaves. We believe the commission's answer is not open to doubt. The disqualification of RKO as a licensee of WNAC in Boston is affirmed.

It is so ordered.

---

COMMENT

1. As should become clear from the materials in this chapter, denial of a license renewal application is an unusual event in broadcast regulation. Although licensing is not given a specific preference in the license renewal process in the Federal Communications Act, the "living law" certainly supports the view that such a preference for incumbency exists. Why does the FCC exercise such solicitude toward the applicant who has been licensed before?

If the relatively few license renewal applications which have been denied are examined, it will be seen that misrepresentation by the licensee to the FCC is apparently deemed to constitute sin of a fundamental kind. For cases where misrepresentation played a significant role in denial of a license renewal application, see Robinson v. FCC (arose in an obscenity context), text, p. 934 and Brandywine-Main Line Radio, Inc. v. FCC (arose in a fairness context). See text, p. 894. Why is "misrepresentation" a preferred ground for denial of a license renewal application compared to denial on the basis of violation of a programming standard?

2. Some highlights in the aftermath of the RKO decision should be of interest. On January 18, 1982, a petition for rehearing en banc was denied by the United States Court of Appeals. RKO then filed a motion to stay enforcement of its decision pending Supreme Court review. The motion was rejected. On June 6, 1982, FCC issued an order stating that RKO's operating authority would expire on March 3, 1982.

RKO then filed a motion with the FCC requesting that RKO should not be required to cease operation of WNAC-TV prior to the completion of all judicial review, i.e., Supreme Court action on RKO's petition for certiorari. RKO pleaded that the station should be kept from going dark.

The New England Television Corp. (NETV), a competitor, opposed the RKO motion for a continuance of operating authority, asserting that RKO's request was the very relief which the court of appeals had desired.

On February 25, 1982, the FCC decided the issue of RKO's continuance against it. RKO General, Inc. (WNAC-TV), 89 FCC2d 361 (1982). But the channel was not allowed to go dark. The FCC found NETV to be a qualified licensee and issued a conditional construction permit to NETV. The FCC also ruled that the public interest would best be served by authorizing RKO to operate WNAC-TV until fourteen days after NETV gave notice to the FCC that all the conditions of its construction permit were satisfied and that it was ready to commence operations. Among the conditions included in the construction permit was that the Supreme Court issue a decision either denying certiorari or affirming the FCC's decision not to renew RKO in Boston.

On April 19, 1982, the Supreme Court denied RKO's petition for writ of certiorari. RKO General, Inc. v. FCC, 456 U.S. 927 (1982). The foregoing facts illustrate that a license renewal controversy is indeed a battle royal. The license renewal applicant does not go gently into the dark. See generally Byrne, RKO General: Some Lessons To Be Learned, 27 St. Louis U.L.Rev. 145 (1983).

THE PROBLEM OF REGULATING OBSCENITY IN BROADCAST PROGRAMMING

The Basis for Regulation

1. An area of considerable obscurity in broadcast regulation has been the field of obscenity. Obscenity is a difficult problem to resolve in broadcasting because the FCC has to reconcile two statutes which appear to contradict each other: 47 U.S.C.A. § 326 of the Federal Communications Act which prohibits censorship and 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464 of the criminal code which prohibits the broadcasting of "any obscene, indecent, or profane language."

Section 326 of the Federal Communications Act states:

Nothing in this chapter shall be understood or construed to give the commission the power of censorship over the radio communications or signals transmitted by any radio station, and no regulation or condition shall be promulgated or fixed by the commission which shall interfere with the right of free speech by means of radio communication.

The Federal Criminal Code, 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464, provides as follows:

Whoever utters any obscene, indecent, or profane language by means of radio communication shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

In 1978, the Supreme Court in FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, Inc., text, p. 920, set forth the legislative history of the two provisions and pointed out that 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464 and 47 U.S.C.A. § 326 had a common origin. The Court insisted that the two statutes were not in conflict:

A single section of the 1927 (Radio) act is the source of both the anticensorship provision and the [c]ommission's authority to impose sanctions for the broadcast of indecent or obscene language. Quite plainly, Congress intended to give meaning to both provisions. Respect for that intent requires that the censorship language be read as inapplicable to the prohibition on broadcasting obscene, indecent, or profane language.

The broadcaster can be punished directly for violation of 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464 by the United States Department of Justice. Such suits are tried in the federal courts. They are more serious than complaints brought by the FCC since they carry a risk of imprisonment.

2. In the WUHY case, which follows, the FCC gave some attention to regulation of obscenity in broadcasting. A licensee was fined for "indecentcy" in broadcasting in WUHY. Notice that the licensee was not fined directly under 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464 but under a provision of the Federal Communications Act, 47 U.S.C.A. § 503(b)(2), which authorizes the FCC to punish infractions of 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464 by exacting forfeitures (fines) provided that a notice of apparent liability is given the offending party. An example of such a notice is found in the opinion reported below.

In Illinois Citizens Committee for Broadcasting v. FCC, 515 F.2d 397 (D.C.Cir. 1975), more fully discussed in the text at p. 917, Judge Bazelon in a separate opinion questioned whether 47 U.S.C.A. § 503(b)(2) does in fact allow the FCC to enforce 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464:

47 U.S.C.A. § 503(b)(1) (1970) is not clear on the issue of whether the commission may issue a forfeiture prior to a judicial determination and its language can be read to support the position that the commission may not so act.<sup>62</sup> Furthermore, the FCC until 1970 and the incredible WUHY decision had held that it would not institute forfeiture proceedings until after a judicial determination and would instead refer all obscenity complaints to the Justice Department.

In FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, text, p. 920, which provided the first full Supreme Court review of the FCC's power in the area of obscenity, the point was not directly at issue since the FCC did not impose formal sanctions such as monetary forfeiture in that case. But the Supreme Court did note with apparent approval the FCC's view that it had power to impose a monetary forfeiture.<sup>9</sup>

In summary, the broadcaster can be punished by the FCC for infractions of 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464 since that provision is incorporated, for the purpose of levying fines against offenders, into the Federal Communications Act. See 47 U.S.C.A. § 503(b)(1)(E) and (b)(2).

3. The WUHY case appears to indicate a nominalistic approach to obscenity, i.e., certain words are indecent. Do you think the approach the FCC takes in WUHY coheres with the general structure of obscenity law in force at the time WUHY was decided as revealed in cases like Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957), reported in the text at p. 728 and Ginsberg v. State of New York, 390 U.S. 629 (1968), reported in the text at p. 913?

How does the so-called "dirty word" test of WUHY comport with the Supreme Court's landmark obscenity decision announced in 1973, Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973), reported in the text at p. 753?

---

IN RE WUHY-FM EASTERN EDUCATION RADIO

24 FCC2D 408 (1970).

Facts: WUHY-FM, a non-commercial educational radio station, broadcasts a weekly program, CYCLE II, from 10:00 to 11:00

---

62. 47 U.S.C.A. § 503(b)(1)(E) (1970) speaks in terms of one who "violates" 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464 (1970) and thus may refer only to one adjudicated in violation and not one merely charged with a violation by the FCC (who can only charge a violation and not conclusively adjudicate a violation). The legislative history is similarly unclear. Originally, the FCC was given enforcement powers over obscene broadcasts. See Duncan v. United States, 48 F.2d 128 (9th Cir. 1931), cert. denied 283 U.S. 863. In 1948, the prohibition on obscene broadcasts was moved to Title 18 and nothing in Title 47 authorized the FCC to consider obscenity in a forfeiture proceeding. In 1960 Congress added § 503 to grant authority to the FCC to aid in the enforcement of antiquiz fraud provisions. Law 86-752, 74 Stat. 889. It was not stated whether the FCC was to have co-ordinate enforcement powers with the Department of Justice. The commission in Sonderling Broadcasting Corp., 41 FCC2d 777, 778, 781 (1973) argues that FCC v. American Broadcasting Co., 347 U.S. 284, 289-90 n. 7 * * (1954) establishes this concurrent enforcement authority. The commission misinterprets this case. The Supreme Court therein referred only to the power to enforce the general law upon licensees by revoking or failing to renew a license and expressly declined to hold in a comprehensive footnote that the FCC has forfeiture powers. The power to adjudicate violations of a criminal statute to impose a forfeiture prior to judicial review of the adjudication is a far cry from considering adjudicated illegal conduct or allegations of illegal conduct at license renewal time. See the perceptive discussion of this argument in Note, Broadcasting Obscene Language, 43 Ariz.St.L.J. 457, 466-70 (1974).

9. FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 at 730, n. 1 (1978).

P.M. On January 4, 1970, Jerry Garcia, of a musical group called The Grateful Dead, was interviewed by WUHY on the air from his hotel room. In the interview two of the most celebrated Anglo-Saxon four letter words were used with remarkable frequency by Garcia. The FCC investigated WUHY.

Three commissioners, Bartley, Lee and Wells, comprised the majority who notified WUHY-FM of liability for forfeiture of $100 because of indecent programming.

* * *

The issue in this case is not whether WUHY-FM may present the views of Mr. Garcia or "Crazy Max" on ecology, society, computers, and so on. Clearly that decision is a matter solely within the judgment of the licensee. See Section 326 of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended. Further, we stress, as we have before, the licensee's right to present provocative or unpopular programming which may offend some listeners. * * * Rather the narrow issue is whether the licensee may present previously taped interview or talk shows where the persons intersperse or begin their speech with expressions like, "Shit, man * * * * " " * * * and shit like that," or " * * * 900 fuckin' times," " * * * right fucking out of ya," etc.

We believe that if we have the authority, we have a duty to act to prevent the widespread use on broadcast outlets of such expressions in the above circumstances. For, the speech involved has no redeeming social value, and is patently offensive by contemporary community standards, with very serious consequences to the "public interest in the larger and more effective use of radio" (Section 303(g)). * * *

* * *

This brings us to the second part of the analysis—the consequence to the public interest. * * * And here it is crucial to bear in mind the difference between radio and other media. Unlike a book which requires the deliberate act of purchasing and reading (or a motion picture where admission to public exhibition must be actively sought), broadcasting is disseminated generally to the public under circumstances where reception requires no activity of this nature. Thus, it comes directly into the home and frequently without any advance warning of its content. Millions daily turn the dial from station to station. While particular stations or programs are oriented to specific audiences, the fact is that by its very nature, thousands of others not within the "intended" audience may also see or hear portions of the broadcast. Further, in that audience are very large numbers of children. Were this type of programming (e.g., the WUHY interview with the above described language) to become widespread, it would drastically affect the use of radio by millions of people. * * * There are two aspects of this issue. First, there is the question of the applicability of 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464, which makes it a criminal offense to "utter any obscene, indecent, or profane language by means of radio communication." This standard, we note, is incorporated in the Communications Act. See Sections 312(a)(6) and 503(b)(1)(E), 47 U.S.C.A. § 312(a)(6); 503(b)(1)(E). The licensee urges that the broadcast was not obscene "because it did not have a dominant appeal to prurience or sexual matters." We agree, and thus find that the broadcast would not necessarily come within the standard laid down in Memoirs v. Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413, 418 (1965); see also Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U.S. 184, 191 (1963). Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1956). However, we believe that the statutory term, "indecent," should be applicable, and that, in the broadcast field, the standard for its applicability should be that the material broadcast is (a) patently offensive by contemporary community standards; and (b) is utterly without redeeming social value. The Court has made clear that different rules are appropriate for different media of expression in view of their varying natures. "Each method tends to present its own peculiar problems." Burstyn v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495, 502-503 (1951). We have set forth [above], the reasons for applicability of the above standard in defining what is indecent in the broadcast field. We think that the factors set out [above] are cogent, powerful considerations for the different standard in this markedly different field.

* * *

The licensee argues that the program was not indecent, because its basic subject matters " * * * are obviously decent"; "the challenged language though not essential to the meaning of the program as a whole, reflected the personality and life style of Mr. Garcia"; and "the realistic portrayal of such an interview cannot be deemed 'indecent' because the subject incidentally used strong or salty language." We disagree with this approach in the broadcast field. * * *

The licensee itself notes that the language in question "was not essential to the presentation of the subject matter * * *" but rather was " * * * essentially gratuitous." We think that is the precise point here—namely, that the language is "gratuitous"—i.e., "unwarranted or [having] no reason for its existence." There is no valid basis in these circumstances for permitting its widespread use in the broadcast field, with the detrimental consequences described [above].

The matter could also be approached under the public interest standard of the Communications Act. * * * The standard for such action under the public interest criterion is the same as previously discussed—namely, that the material is patently offensive by contemporary community standards and utterly without redeeming social value. * * *

In sum, we hold that we have the authority to act here under Section 1464 (i.e., 503 (b)(1)(E) ) or under the public interest standard (Section 503(b)(1)(A)(B)—for failure to operate in the public interest as set forth in the license or to observe the requirement of Section 315(a) to operate in the public interest).

However, whether under Section 1464 or the public interest standard, the criteria for commission action thus remains the same, in our view—namely, that the material be patently offensive and utterly without redeeming value. Finally, as we stressed before in sensitive areas like this [Report and Order on Personal Attack Rules, 8 FCC2d 721, 725 (1968) ], the commission can appropriately act only in clear-cut, flagrant cases; doubtful or close cases are clearly to be resolved in the licensee's favor.

* * * In view of the foregoing, little further discussion is needed on this aspect. We believe that the presentation of the Garcia material quoted [above] falls clearly within the two above criteria, and hence may be the subject of a forfeiture under Section 503(b)(1)(A)(B) and (E). We further find that the presentation was "willful" (503(b)(1)(A)(B) ). We note that the material was taped. Further the station employees could have cautioned Mr. Garcia either at the outset or after the first few expressions to avoid using these "gratuitous" expressions; they did not do so. That the material was presented without obtaining the station manager's approval—contrary to station policy—does not absolve the licensee of responsibility. * * * Indeed, in light of the facts here, there would appear to have been gross negligence on the part of the licensee with respect to its supervisory duties.

* * * [T]he issue in this case is whether to impose a forfeiture (since one of the reasons for the forfeiture provision is that it can be imposed for the isolated occurrence, such as an isolated lottery, etc.). On this issue, we note that, in view of the fact that this is largely a case of first impression, particularly as to the Section 1464 aspect, we could appropriately forego the forfeiture and simply act prospectively in this field.

* * * However, were we to do so, we would prevent any review of our action and in this sensitive field we have always sought to insure such reviewability. * * * Thus, while we think that our action is fully consistent with the law, there should clearly be the avenue of court review in a case of this nature (see Section 504(a)). * * *

In view of the foregoing, we determine that, pursuant to Section 503(b)(1)(A), (B), (E) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, Eastern Education Radio has incurred an apparent liability of one hundred dollars ($100).

* * *

---

COMMENT

1. In the WUHY case, the FCC ignored the concept of obscenity around which a whole body of constitutional adjudication was clustered. See Chapter VIII.

Did the FCC choose "indecent" as the actionable term precisely because it had not received a detailed and limiting construction by the courts but "obscenity" had? Did the FCC think that making "indecent" the key term would give itself more room to deal with the different kinds of obscenity problems presented by the broadcast media as compared with the print media? *

2. The FCC definition of "indecent" differed materially from the Supreme Court's pre-Miller v. California definition of obscenity. The FCC defined "indecent" in WUHY as follows:

* * * we believe that the statutory term, "indecent" should be applicable, and that in the broadcast field, the standard for its applicability should be that the material broadcast is (a) patently offensive by contemporary community standards, and (b) is utterly without redeeming social value.

3. The FCC identified certain words in WUHY as without social value. In the FCC's judgment, these words furthered no debate and served no social purpose. In A Book Named John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure v. Attorney General of Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413 (1966), the Supreme Court defined obscenity as it had evolved from the starting point in Roth:

Under the Roth definition of obscenity, as elaborated in subsequent cases, three elements must coalesce: it must be established that (a) the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to a prurient interest in sex; (b) the material is patently offensive because it affronts contemporary community standards relating to the description or representation of sexual matters; and (c) the material is utterly without redeeming social value.

The FCC's definition of "indecent" omits any necessity to make a finding that the "dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to a prurient interest in sex." Obviously, if a case of "indecent" is made out by pointing out that a broadcast used a "verboten" word, the "dominant theme" requirement must be dropped.

But the function of Roth's "dominant theme" requirement was to give maximum protection to expression, to prevent one objectionable word or a few words from being used to ban an entire book, play, or movie. Is there any reason why the most susceptible member of the audience and the single offensive word should be the touchstone of "indecent" when for the print media the "average reader" and the "dominant theme" requirements suffice?

4. It should be noted that the Supreme Court's new and revised definition of obscenity retains the inquiry into "(w)hether 'the average person, applying contemporary community standards' would find that the work, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient interest." See Miller v. California, text, p. 753.

Are there compelling reasons for a more restricted latitude for expression in broadcasting? Is it demonstrably clear that the shock effect or impact of a single word is immeasurably greater on radio than it might be in a textbook? In the case of the radio broadcast it is difficult to make assumptions about or to establish controls for the ultimate composition of the broadcast audience. But are there not alternatives to making the most impressionable or susceptible viewer or listener the arbiter for what is tolerable in broadcasting?

5. One alternative to a rigid list of "verboten" words could be a variable obscenity approach to broadcast programming problems. The variable obscenity idea was outlined and developed in Lockhart and McClure, Censorship of Obscenity: The Developing Constitutional Standards, 45 Minn.L.Rev. 5 (1960). Under this approach, the same material which would be proscribed if sold to children is perfectly permissible if sold to adults. The key is how the material is treated by the primary audience for whom it is intended. Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629 (1968), was a high watermark for the variable obscenity idea. There, a prosecution was upheld involving the sale of magazines to children although the sale of the same magazines to adults would have been permissible. See this text p. 740.

Is the variable obscenity idea transferable to broadcasting? Obviously, one difficulty is that the broadcaster, unlike the cashier in the corner drugstore, has no way of selecting those who receive his wares?

But the variable obscenity approach is by definition an elastic and flexible concept. Indeed, in WUHY, the broadcaster's defense against the charge of "indecent" programming was, in essence, a variable obscenity defense. The broadcaster said the program was not "indecent" because of three factors: 1) the time of the broadcast, 2) the unlikelihood that children were in the audience, and 3) the necessity of continuing announcements to listeners in advance of disagreeable programming.

6. The public interest standard the FCC used in WUHY is "patent offensiveness to contemporary standards." Does this standard consist of a list of shock words that cannot be used in broadcasting? Certainly it is at least that. Or is it more? It should be noted that the FCC's "patent offensiveness" standard leaves out the inquiry into whether the material in question makes an "appeal to the prurient interest."

Broadcast law would have been much richer if WUHY-FM had declined to pay the fine and appealed the case to the courts. Unfortunately, WUHY chose to pay its $100 fine. Therefore, there was no appeal.

Eight years were to elapse before the issues raised in WUHY were resolved.

In WUHY-FM the FCC decided that the reference to "indecent" utterance in 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464 permitted the FCC to expand its regulatory authority to prohibit programming which was allegedly patently offensive but which did not otherwise meet the constitutional test for obscenity. Such a policy clearly ran a risk of judicial reversal since the whole point of putting a separate and distinct meaning in the reference to "indecent" utterance in 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464 appeared to be designed to escape the rigors of the constitutional definition of obscenity. In the 1978 Supreme Court decision in FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726, (1978), see text, p. 920, the FCC's gamble in trying to create a new category of prohibited programming on broadcasting—"indecent" programming—succeeded. In a decision which surprised broadcasters and disappointed civil libertarians, the Supreme Court agreed that the FCC's authority to regulate "indecent" programming was not limited by the constitutional requirements associated with its authority to regulate "obscene" programming. In the Pacifica case, the Supreme Court specifically cited WUHY-FM along with other FCC cases for the point that the FCC "has long interpreted § 1464 as encompassing more than the obscene." The WUHY case marked a first step in a new development which expanded the scope of FCC regulation of broadcast programming.

7. In Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, text, supra, at p. 753, the Supreme Court denied that "there are, or should or can be, fixed, uniform national standards of precisely what appeals to the 'prurient interest' or is 'patently offensive.'" As a result of Miller v. California, one element in defining obscenity is whether "the work depicts or describes, in a patently offensive way, sexual conduct specifically defined by the applicable state law."

At present, as we have seen, obscenity-type problems in broadcasting are resolved by focusing on either a public interest standard or by making the operative statutory term some term other than obscenity such as "indecenty." This strategy is presumably employed to avoid making the problems of broadcasting susceptible to the general law of obscenity.

As a result of Miller v. California, obscenity law is now a far more relative matter than it was in the reign of Roth. What is obscene in Maine may now not necessarily be so in California.

Should (must) broadcast regulation take account of the cultural or geographical relativity the Supreme Court has fed into the definition of obscenity in constitutional law? Should a New York City FM radio station, for example, be given greater latitude in expression than an Iowa AM radio station? If such distinctions are required by Miller, is it feasible to have such determinations made by the FCC? It is one thing for state and federal courts in different parts of the country to ascertain what is "patently offensive" for their part of the country. But how can the FCC in Washington make such a determination?

SONDERLING BROADCASTING CORP., WGLD-FM

41 FCC2D 777 (1973).

This letter constitutes a Notice of Apparent Liability for forfeiture issued under Section 503(b)(2) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, 47 U.S.C.A. 503(b)(2), pursuant to Section 503(b)(1)(E) of the Act, 47 U.S.C.A. 503(b)(1)(E).

The Facts Station WGLD-FM, Oak Park, Illinois, licensed to Sonderling Broadcasting Corporation, is one of a number of broadcast stations which have been using a format sometimes called "topless radio," in which an announcer takes calls from the audience and discusses largely sexual topics. The program on WGLD-FM is called "Femme Forum" and runs five hours a day, from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m., Monday through Friday, moderated by Mr. Morgan Moore. On February 23, 1973, the topic was "oral sex." The program consisted of very explicit exchanges in which the female callers spoke of their oral sex experiences.

Discussion It is the commission's conclusion that broadcasts of this nature—and these particular broadcasts—call for imposition of a forfeiture under Section 503(b)(1)(E) of the Communications Act.

* * *

First, it is most important to make clear what we are not holding. We are emphatically not saying that sex per se is a forbidden subject on the broadcast medium. * * * Second, we note that we are not dealing with works of dramatic or literary art as we were in Pacifica. We are rather confronted with the talk or interview show where clearly the interviewer can readily moderate his handling of the subject matter so as to conform to the basic statutory standards—standards which, as we point out, allow much leeway for provocative material.<sup>2</sup>

* * *

We shall apply here the * * * Roth test and guidelines such as in Ginzburg v. U. S., 383 U.S. 463 (1966).

* * * It is important to note that these criteria are being applied in the broadcast field. The Supreme Court has made clear that different approaches are appropriate for different media of expression in view of their varying natures. * * * That ca-veat applies with particular force to broadcasting. This is peculiarly a medium designed to be received and sampled by millions in their homes, cars, on outings, or even as they walk the streets with transistor radio to the ear, without regard to age, background or degree of sophistication. A person will listen to some musical piece or portion of a talk show, and decide to turn the dial to try something else. While many have loyalty to a particular station or stations, many others engage in this electronic smorgasbord sampling. That, together with its free access to the home, is a unique quality of radio, wholly unlike other media such as print or motion pictures. It takes a deliberate act to purchase and read a book, or seek admission to the theater.<sup>3</sup> * * *

We also repeat what we said at the outset. The foregoing does not mean that the only material that can be broadcast is what must be suitable for children or will never offend any significant portion of a polyglot audience. But it does mean that in determining whether broadcast material meets the statutory test, the special quality of this medium must be taken appropriately into account. The consequences of not doing so would be disastrous to "the larger and more effective use of radio in the public interest." (Section 303(g) of the act.) For there is a Gresham's Law at work here. If broadcasters can engage in commercial exploitation of obscene or indecent material of the nature described above, an increasing number will do so for competitive reasons, with spiralling adverse effects upon millions of listeners.

* * *

Application of the Roth criteria to this case. First, we note the applicability of some elements of Ginzburg to this case. There is here "commercial exploitation," an effort at pandering. Formats like Femme Forum, aptly called "topless radio," are designed to garner large audiences through titillating sexual discussions. The announcer actively solicits the titillating response. We shall not treat this aspect further, because in any event, all this is background to the crucial consideration: Were the Roth criteria met by the material here broadcast?

We believe that they were. We have no doubt that the explicit material set out above is patently offensive to contemporary community standards for broadcast matter. * * * If discussions in this titillating and pandering fashion of coating the penis to facilitate oral sex, swallowing the semen at climax, overcoming fears of the penis being bitten off, etc., do not constitute broadcast obscenity within the meaning of 18 U.S.C.A. 1464, we do not perceive what does or could. We also believe that the dominant theme here is clearly an appeal to prurient interest. The announcer coaxed responses that were designed to titillate—to arouse sexual feelings. Indeed, again in this very program, one caller stated that as a result of what she had heard on the program, she was going to try

2. In order to assure compliance with the law and their own programming policies, many licensees interpose a "tape delay" in telephone interview programs, enabling the licensee to delete certain material before it is broadcast.

3. In that sense, a broadcast or cable pay-TV operation (or any "locked-key" cable operation) may well stand on a different footing.

oral sex that night. Finally, from what has been discussed, we do not believe that there is redeeming social value here. This is not a serious discussion of sexual matters, but rather titillating, pandering exploitation of sexual materials. Further, we think that not only can we examine the program in its "commercial exploitation" context but also in sections or parts. These are five-hour talk shows; some parts are of necessity not obscene—are, for example, nothing more than banal "filler". It would make no sense to say that a broadcaster can escape the proscription against obscenity if he schedules a three, four or five-hour talk program, and simply intersperses the obscenity—so critical for the ratings—with other, non-obscene material.

Our conclusions here are based on the pervasive and intrusive nature of broadcast radio, even if children were left completely out of the picture. However, the presence of children in the broadcast audience makes this an a fortiori matter. There are significant numbers of children in the audience during these afternoon hours—and not all of a pre-school age. Thus, there is always a significant percentage of school age children out of school on any given day. Many listen to radio; indeed it is almost the constant companion of the teenager. * * *

There is evidence that this program is not intended solely for adults. On the February 6, 1973 program on "Do you always achieve orgasm?", the announcer moved from a discussion of orgasm to a comment aimed in large part at the 16-20 year old audience.

* * *

[T]here is an alternative ground for action in this case. In WUHY we set out at some length our construction that the term "indecent," as used in 18 U.S.C.A. 1464, constituted a different standard from "obscene" in the broadcast field. * * * We therefore find, as an alternative ground, that the material, even if it were not found to appeal to a prurient interest, warrants the assessment of a forfeiture because it is within the statutory prohibition against the broadcast of indecent matter.

* * * [W]e recognize that we are not the final arbiters in this sensitive First Amendment field. Therefore, we welcome and urge judicial consideration of our action. As to the amount of the forfeiture, we believe that $2,000 is appropriate for the willful or repeated violations here involved (covering both the February 21 and 23, 1973, programs). While it is true that there has been no judicial consideration of obscenity or indecency in this specific broadcast situation we are not fashioning any new theory here.

* * *

In view of the foregoing, we determine that, pursuant to Section 503(b)(1)(E) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, Sonderling Broadcasting Corporation has incurred an apparent liability of two thousand dollars ($2000).

---

COMMENT

1. In Sonderling the FCC invoked both the indecency and the obscenity standards of 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464 and found that a forfeiture was warranted under both standards. Sonderling specifically applied the Roth-Ginzburg obscenity standard to broadcasting while making note that "the special quality of the medium must be taken into account." Note that the "commercial exploitation" theme of Ginzburg v. United States, text p. 746, was invoked.

2. Why did the FCC suddenly make the "obscenity" standard in 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464 operative? Perhaps the fact, as the FCC put it, that "the announcer actively solicits the titillating response," made the Ginzburg addendum to Roth appear an appropriate standard to apply.

The difficulty with this approach is one of providing adequate notice to the parties affected. Would it not have been reasonable for the broadcasters and broadcast lawyers reading WUHY to conclude that the FCC was going to avoid Roth and post-Roth elaborations on the definition of obscenity? If so, it would have been reasonable to suppose that the FCC intended to make the "indecency" standard the exclusively operative standard for 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464 enforcement purposes? Is the notice and fairness problem in Sonderling really overcome by saying somewhat perfunctorily that the "indecency" standard of 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464 was also violated?

3. The FCC says that on the basis of its discussion of obscenity in Sonderling, it is clear that the matter broadcast is "indecent" as well. Do you agree? Note that the "dirty words" test of WUHY does not seem to have been violated by the broadcasts in question in Sonderling.

4. Commissioner Johnson in dissent attacked the FCC policy of enforcing both an obscenity standard and an indecency standard. His position was that since the FCC concedes that the "indecency" standard may proscribe material that does not constitute "obscenity," it is questionable whether "indecency" can be regulated. He complains further that the defense of "indecency" is constitutionally imprecise. What is imprecise about it?

Do you think the censorship problems objected to by Commissioner Johnson would be solved if the FCC were to announce that hereafter it would regulate only "obscene" material but not "indecent" or otherwise nonobscene material?

Commissioner Johnson offered the criticism that the majority did not define the community whose standards were supposed to have been violated. This duty to define the relevant community is now much more fundamental than ever in the light of the new importance given to the local community standard by Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973), a case which had not been decided at the time of the announcement of the FCC's Sonderling opinion.

In the light of Miller, how should community be defined in a case like Sonderling?

5. Commissioner Johnson said that the enforcement of 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464 is better left to the Justice Department. This approach would leave the problem of defining § 1464 to the federal courts, and it is certainly arguable that federal judges are better equipped to deal with the sensitive First Amendment issues involved than is the FCC. On the other hand, the FCC in Sonderling was acting pursuant to 47 U.S.C.A. § 503(b)(1)(E), Federal Communications Act of 1934. It is not appropriate for the agency to declare a provision of its enabling statute unconstitutional.

6. The Sonderling Broadcasting Co. simply paid the forfeiture to the FCC and did not appeal. But the Illinois Citizens Committee for Broadcasting and the Illinois Division of the American Civil Liberties Union took up the fight and sought a petition for reconsideration of the notice of apparent liability and also sought remission of the forfeiture from the FCC. The fact that the appeal was taken by citizen groups rather than the affected licensee raised a standing question. See text, p. 944. These requests were denied by the FCC, and the ACLU and the committee petitioned the federal court of appeals for review.

In Illinois Citizens Committee for Broadcasting v. FCC, 515 F.2d 397 (D.C. Cir. 1975), the court, per Judge Leventhal, upheld the FCC determination in the Sonderling case: The FCC did not unconstitutionally infringe the listening alternatives of the public when it determined that a radio call-in show carrying an explicit discussion of ultimate sexual acts in a titillating context was an obscene broadcast.

The court reasoned that the station's approach in the radio call-in show in question, "Femme Forum," triggered the principles of Ginzburg v. United States, text, p.

746. Justice Brennan there found that commercial exploitation of interests in erotica could be decisive in the determination of obscenity. In Ginzburg, the "leering innuendo" was found in the modes of sales promotion. Here the "commercial exploitation" of titillation was found in the "tone" which was "set by the continuity provided by the announcer."

Perhaps most significant was Sonderling's choice of broadcast hours. "Femme Forum" was broadcast from 10 A.M. to 3 P.M. when the radio audience might include children, home from school for lunch, illness, or staggered school hours. Judge Leventhal concluded: "Given this combination of factors, we do not think that the FCC's evaluation of this material infringes upon rights protected by the First Amendment."

A problem arose in determining the obscenity standard that should be applied. The FCC found Sonderling's broadcasts obscene under the standards of Roth v. United States, text, p. 728, and Memoirs v. Massachusetts, text, p. 744. Between the FCC's resolution of the case and the present appeal, the Supreme Court decided Miller v. California, text, p. 753, which sets out the following guidelines for the trier of fact:

(a) whether "the average person, applying contemporary community standards" would find that the work, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient interest * * * (b) whether the work depicts or describes, in a patently offensive way, sexual conduct specifically defined by the applicable state law, and (c) whether the work, taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value.

The court, per Judge Leventhal, rejected the contention that Miller required reversal of the FCC ruling in Sonderling:

We conclude that, where a radio call-in show during daytime hours broadcasts explicit discussions of ultimate sexual acts in a titillating context, the commission does not unconstitutionally infringe upon the public's right to listening alternatives when it determines that the broadcast is obscene.

The petitioners then sought a rehearing en banc by the full court. On March 13, 1975, that request was denied. Judge Bazelon, however, disagreed with his colleagues in refusing a grant a rehearing. He questioned the conclusion of obscenity in light of the fact that Miller requires "local fact-finders to apply 'local community standards' of decency." Bazelon argued that the court should have required the FCC "to take evidence on 'local community standards' before reaching a decision under Miller." He was particularly scornful of the court's conclusion that petitioners had waived their right to challenge the lack of specificity (required by Miller) in the statutes enforced by the FCC:

Surely petitioners did not waive their right to challenge the lack of specificity of the statutes because they did not raise it in their reply brief when the FCC decision was not even based on Miller. And why does the court "see no point in pursuing in the abstract" a central contention that must be considered by every court considering a post-Miller statute and which one can assume the petitioners would vigorously assert if they knew Miller was in issue? And what is the relevance of titillation and exposure to juveniles to the question of specificity and the general narrowing of the test of obscenity in Miller?

Judge Bazelon set forth further objections to the court's reasoning:

There is another difficulty with the court's opinion. Miller retains the established requirement that material allegedly obscene must be "taken as a whole" in the judgment of obscenity. Here the commission made its judgment of obscenity on a 22 minute tape which eliminated the bulk of the Sonderling (and other broadcasters') talk show programming not involving sexual discussion. By the admitted facts the FCC did not take the material as a whole but rather viewed the material piece meal. * * * I think this is grounds for a remand.

Bazelon argued that the specificity requirement of Miller was designed to provide more than fair notice to the broadcaster—it was designed to protect listeners as well: “It is also designed to prevent statutory overbreadth and the attendant chilling effect of overbroad statutes. And the extremely obvious chilling effect in this case has deprived the petitioners of programming they desired.”

7. Further, Judge Bazelon complained that the FCC’s separate standard of “indecentcy” was inconsistent with Miller in that it excluded from the test of obscenity the requirement that the language appeal to a prurient interest in sex. The FCC’s substantive decision could not be sustained on the basis of Roth and Memoirs for four reasons:

First the broadcasts involved no visual material. Second, there clearly was an arguable “redeeming social value” to the broadcasts and thus we would be hard pressed to hold that the broadcasters were “utterly without” redeeming social value. Third, the commission in its decision relied on several of its precedents which are inconsistent with Memoirs and Roth, most particularly the amazing WUHY decision. Finally, the FCC simply misunderstood the meaning of the Ginzburg case and adopted a view of pandering which equates all commercialization of speech with titillation. There is no significant evidence of Ginzburg-type pandering.

8. In Bazelon’s view the condemnation of sex oriented radio shows by then FCC Chairman Burch, and the commencement by the FCC a day earlier of a closed notice of inquiry into the broadcast of obscene, indecent, or profane material made it clear that what was involved was not a “specific attack on Sonderling but rather a general attack on all sex-oriented talk shows.”

An entire class of speech has been chased off the air:

Here the commission has effectively terminated sex-oriented talk shows without any due process for the licensees, without any consideration of the individual merits of different shows, and without any participation by the courts which are given the primary burden of defining obscenity.

9. Finally, there was a basic statutory defect in the FCC’s regulation of obscenity in broadcasting as manifested by the Sonderling decision: Judge Bazelon questioned whether “any FCC enforcement of obscenity prohibitions prior to a judicial determination of obscenity is consistent with the broad principles of First Amendment ‘due process.’” (This point is elaborated on earlier in the text, at p. 909.

10. Judge Bazelon then discussed whether the “FCC as a national administrative agency” is equipped “to make a finding of whether speech appeals to a prurient interest under contemporary community standards (qua Memoirs-Roth) or under a local community standard (qua Miller).” The court had rejected this objection on the ground that “the Supreme Court has found that jury trials are not required in obscenity decisions.” But Bazelon’s rejoinder to this was that it was “irrelevant to the larger question of whether a national administrative agency can be compared even to a local trial judge.”

“Indecency” in Broadcasting— A Constitutional Concept

1. May the FCC regulate, consistent with the First Amendment, a radio broadcast that is “indecent” under 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464 even though it is not obscene? This issue—the question raised at the outset of this section in WUHY—was squarely presented to the Supreme Court in FCC v. Pacifica Broadcasting Co. Although the Supreme Court was literally besieged with

amicus curiae groups from the media, media organizations, citizens groups, and civil liberties organizations arguing that the Supreme Court had no authority to proscribe any list of words on broadcasting, the Court gave the FCC a new but narrow charter to regulate both, "indecent" and "obscenity" in broadcasting.

FCC v. PACIFICA FOUNDATION

3 MED.L.RPTR. 2553, 438 U.S. 726, 98 S.CT. 3026, 57 L.ED.2D 1073 (1978).

Justice STEVENS delivered the opinion of the Court (Parts I, II, III, and IV-C) and an opinion in which the Chief Justice and Justice Rehnquist joined (Parts IV-A and IV-B).

This case requires that we decide whether the Federal Communications Commission has any power to regulate a radio broadcast that is indecent but not obscene.

A satiric humorist named George Carlin recorded a 12-minute monologue entitled "Filthy Words" before a live audience in a California theater. He began by referring to his thoughts about "the words you couldn't say on the public, ah, airwaves, um, the ones you definitely wouldn't say, ever." He proceeded to list those words and repeat them over and over again in a variety of colloquialisms.
* * *

At about 2 o'clock in the afternoon on Tuesday, October 30, 1973, a New York radio station owned by respondent, Pacifica Foundation, broadcast the "Filthy Words" monologue. A few weeks later a man, who stated that he had heard the broadcast while driving with his young son, wrote a letter complaining to the commission. He stated that, although he could perhaps understand the "record's being sold for private use, I certainly cannot understand the broadcast of same over the air that, supposedly, you control."

The complaint was forwarded to the station for comment. In its response, Paci-fica explained that the monologue had been played during a program about contemporary society's attitude toward language and that immediately before its broadcast listeners had been advised that it included "sensitive language which might be regarded as offensive to some."

* * *

On February 21, 1975, the commission issued a declaratory order granting the complaint and holding that Pacifica "could have been the subject of administrative sanctions." 56 FCC2d 94, 99 (1975). The commission did not impose formal sanctions, but it did state that the order would be "associated with the station's license file, and in the event that subsequent complaints are received, the commission will then decide whether it should utilize any of the available sanctions it has been granted by Congress."

In its memorandum opinion the commission stated that it intended to "clarify the standards which will be utilized in considering" the growing number of complaints about indecent speech on the airwaves. Advancing several reasons for treating broadcast speech differently from other forms of expression, the commission found a power to regulate indecent broadcasting in two statutes: 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464, which forbids the use of "any obscene, indecent, or profane language by means of radio communications," and 47 U.S.C.A. § 303(g), which requires the commission to "encourage the larger and more effective use of radio in the public interest."

The commission characterized the language used in the Carlin monologue as "patently offensive," though not necessarily obscene, and expressed the opinion that it should be regulated by principles analogous to those found in the law of nuisance where the "law generally speaks to channeling behavior more than actually prohibiting it. * * * [T]he concept of 'indecent' is intimately connected with the exposure of children to language that describes in terms patently offensive as measured by contemporary community standards for the broadcast medium, sexual or excretory activities and organs, at times of the day when there is a reasonable risk that children may be in the audience." 56 FCC2d, at 98.

Applying these considerations to the language used in the monologue as broadcast by respondent, the commission concluded that certain words depicted sexual and excretory activities in a patently offensive manner, noted that they "were broadcast at a time when children were undoubtedly in the audience (i. e., in the early afternoon)," and that the prerecorded language, with these offensive words "repeated over and over," was "deliberately broadcast." In summary, the commission stated: "We therefore hold that the language as broadcast was indecent and prohibited by 18 U.S.C. 1464."

After the order issued, the commission was asked to clarify its opinion by ruling that the broadcast of indecent words as part of a live newscast would not be prohibited. The commission issued another opinion in which it pointed out that it "never intended to place an absolute prohibition on the broadcast of this type of language, but rather sought to channel it to times of day when children most likely would not be exposed to it." 59 FCC2d 892 (1976). The commission noted that its "declaratory order was issued in a specific factual context," and declined to comment on various hypothetical situations presented by the petition. It relied on its "long standing policy of refusing to issue interpretive rulings or advisory opinions when the critical facts are not explicitly stated or there is a possibility that subsequent events will alter them."

The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia reversed, with each of the three judges on the panel writing separately.

* * *

The relevant statutory questions are whether the commission's action is forbidden "censorship" within the meaning of 47 U.S.C.A. § 326 and whether speech that concededly is not obscene may be restricted as "indecent" under the authority of 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464. The questions are not unrelated, for the two statutory provisions have a common origin. Nevertheless, we analyze them separately.

Section 29 of the Radio Act of 1927 provided:

Nothing in this act shall be understood or construed to give the licensing authority the power of censorship over the radio communications or signals transmitted by any radio station, and no regulation or condition shall be promulgated or fixed by the licensing authority which shall interfere with the right of free speech by means of radio communications. No person within the jurisdiction of the United States shall utter any obscene, indecent or profane language by means of radio communication.

The prohibition against censorship unequivocally denies the commission any power to edit proposed broadcasts in advance and to excise material considered inappropriate for the airwaves. The prohibition, however, has never been construed to deny the commission the power to review the content of completed broadcasts in the performance of its regulatory duties.

There is nothing in the legislative history to contradict this conclusion. * * * In 1934, the anticensorship provision and the prohibition against indecent broadcasts were re-enacted in the same section, just as in the 1927 act. In 1948, when the Criminal Code was revised to include provisions that had previously been located in other titles of the United States Code, the prohibition against obscene, indecent, and profane broadcasts was removed from the Communications Act and re-enacted as § 1464 of Title 18. That rearrangement of the code cannot reasonably be interpreted as having been intended to change the meaning of the anticensorship provision.

We conclude, therefore, that § 326 does not limit the commission's authority to impose sanctions on licensees who engage in obscene, indecent, or profane broadcasting.

The only other statutory question presented by this case is whether the afternoon broadcast of the "Filthy Words" monologue was indecent within the meaning of § 1464. Even that question is narrowly confined by the arguments of the parties.

The commission identified several words that referred to excretory or sexual activities or organs, stated that the repetitive, deliberate use of those words in an afternoon broadcast when children are in the audience was patently offensive, and held that the broadcast was indecent. Pacifica takes issue with the commission's definition of indecency, but does not dispute the commission's preliminary determination that each of the components of its definition was present. Specifically, Pacifica does not quarrel with the conclusion that this afternoon broadcast was patently offensive. Pacifica's claim that the broadcast was not indecent within the meaning of the statute rests entirely on the absence of prurient appeal.

The plain language of the statute does not support Pacifica's argument. The words "obscene, indecent, or profane" are written in the disjunctive, implying that each has a separate meaning. Prurient appeal is an element of the obscene, but the normal definition of "indecent" merely refers to nonconformance with accepted standards of morality.

Pacifica argues, however, that this Court has construed the term "indecent" in related statutes to mean "obscene," as that term was defined in Miller v. California. Pacifica relies most heavily on the construction this Court gave to 18 U.S.C.A. § 1461 in Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87. Hamling rejected a vagueness attack on § 1461, which forbids the mailing of "obscene, lewd, lascivious, indecent, filthy or vile" material.

* * *

In Hamling the Court agreed with Justice Harlan that § 1461 was meant only to regulate obscenity in the mails; by reading into it the limits set by Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, the Court adopted a construction which assured the statute's constitutionality.

The reasons supporting Hamling's construction of § 1461 do not apply to § 1464. * * * The former statute deals primarily with printed matter enclosed in sealed envelopes mailed from one individual to another; the latter deals with the content of public broadcasts. It is unrealistic to assume that Congress intended to impose precisely the same limitations on the dissemination of patently offensive matter by such different means.<sup>17</sup>

Because neither our prior decisions nor the language or history of § 1464 supports the conclusion that prurient appeal is an essential component of indecent language, we reject Pacifica's construction of the statute. When that construction is put to one side there is no basis for disagreeing with the commission's conclusion that indecent language was used in this broadcast.

17. But it is well settled that the First Amendment has a special meaning in the broadcasting context. See, e.g., FCC v. National Citizens Committee for Broadcasting, 436 U.S. 775; Red Lion Broadcasting Co., Inc. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367; Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. v. Democratic Nat. Committee, 412 U.S. 94. For this reason, the presumption that Congress never intends to exceed constitutional limits, which supported Hamling's narrow reading of § 1461, does not support a comparable reading of § 1464.

Pacifica makes two constitutional attacks on the commission's order. First, it argues that the commission's construction of the statutory language broadly encompasses so much constitutionally protected speech that reversal is required even if Pacifica's broadcast of the "Filthy Words" monologue is not itself protected by the First Amendment. Second, Pacifica argues that inasmuch as the recording is not obscene, the Constitution forbids any abridgment of the right to broadcast it on the radio.

A

The first argument fails because our review is limited to the question whether the commission has the authority to proscribe this particular broadcast. As the commission itself emphasized, its order was "issued in a specific factual context." 59 FCC2d, at 893. That approach is appropriate for courts as well as the commission when regulation of indecency is at stake, for indecency is largely a function of context—it cannot be adequately judged in the abstract.

The approach is also consistent with Red Lion Broadcasting Co. Inc. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367. In that case the Court rejected an argument that the commission's regulations defining the fairness doctrine were so vague that they would inevitably abridge the broadcasters' freedom of speech.

* * *

It is true that the commission's order may lead some broadcasters to censor themselves. At most, however, the commission's definition of indecency will deter only the broadcasting of patently offensive references to excretory and sexual organs and activities. While some of these references may be protected, they surely lie at the periphery of First Amendment concern.

* * *

B

When the issue is narrowed to the facts of this case, the question is whether the First Amendment denies government any power to restrict the public broadcast of indecent language in any circumstances. For if the government has any such power, this was an appropriate occasion for its exercise.

The words of the Carlin monologue are unquestionably "speech" within the meaning of the First Amendment. It is equally clear that the commission's objections to the broadcast were based in part on its content. The order must therefore fall if, as Pacifica argues, the First Amendment prohibits all governmental regulation that depends on the content of speech. Our past cases demonstrate, however, that no such absolute rule is mandated by the Constitution.

The classic exposition of the proposition that both the content and the context of speech are critical elements of First Amendment analysis is Justice Holmes' statement for the Court in Schenck v. United States. * * * Other distinctions based on content have been approved in the years since Schenck. The government may forbid speech calculated to provoke a fight. See Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568. It may pay heed to the "'commonsense differences' between commercial speech and other varieties." Bates v. State Bar. It may treat libels against private citizens more severely than libels against public officials. See Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc. Obscenity may be wholly prohibited. Miller v. California. And only two Terms ago we refused to hold that a "statutory classification is unconstitutional because it is based on the content of communication protected by the First Amendment." Young v. American Mini Theatres.

The question in this case is whether a broadcast of patently offensive words dealing with sex and excretion may be regulated because of its content.<sup>20</sup> Obscene materials have been denied the protection of the First Amendment because their content is so offensive to contemporary moral standards. Roth v. United States. But the fact that society may find speech offensive is not a sufficient reason for suppressing it. Indeed, if it is the speaker's opinion that gives offense, that consequence is a reason for according it constitutional protection. For it is a central tenet of the First Amendment that the government must remain neutral in the marketplace of ideas. If there were any reason to believe that the commission's characterization of the Carlin monologue as offensive could be traced to its political content—or even to the fact that it satirized contemporary attitudes about four letter words, First Amendment protection might be required. But that is simply not this case. These words offend for the same reasons that obscenity offends. * *

Although these words ordinarily lack literary, political, or scientific value, they are not entirely outside the protection of the First Amendment. * * * Nonetheless, the constitutional protection accorded to a communication containing such patently offensive sexual and excretory language need not be the same in every context. It is a characteristic of speech such as this that both its capacity to offend and its "social value," to use Justice Murphy's term, vary with the circumstances. Words that are commonplace in one setting are shocking in another.

* * *

In this case it is undisputed that the content of Pacifica's broadcast was "vulgar," "offensive," and "shocking." Because content of that character is not entitled to absolute constitutional protection under all circumstances, we must consider its context in order to determine whether the commission's action was constitutionally permissible.

C

We have long recognized that each medium of expression presents special First Amendment problems. Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495, 502–503. And of all forms of communication, it is broadcasting that has received the most limited First Amendment protection. Thus, although other speakers cannot be licensed except under laws that carefully define and narrow official discretion, a broadcaster may be deprived of his license and his forum if the Commission decides that such an action would serve "the public interest, convenience, and necessity." Similarly, although the First Amendment protects newspaper publishers from being required to print the replies of those whom they criticize, Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, it affords no such protection to broadcasters; on the contrary, they must give free time to the victims of their criticism. Red Lion Broadcasting Co., Inc. v. FCC.

The reasons for these distinctions are complex, but two have relevance to the present case. First, the broadcast media have established a uniquely pervasive presence in the lives of all Americans. Patently offensive, indecent material presented over the airwaves confronts the citizen, not only in public, but also in the privacy of the home, where the individual's right to be let alone plainly outweighs the First Amendment rights of an intruder. Because the broadcast audience is constantly tuning in and out, prior warnings cannot completely protect the listener or viewer from unexpected program content. To say that one may avoid further offense by turning off the radio when he hears indecent language is like saying that the remedy for an assault is to run away after the first blow. One may hang up on an indecent phone call, but that option does not give the caller a constitutional immunity or avoid a harm that has already taken place.

20. Although neither Justice Powell nor Justice Brennan directly confronts this question, both have answered it affirmatively, the latter explicitly, * * *, and the former implicitly by concurring in a judgment that could not otherwise stand.

Second, broadcasting is uniquely accessible to children, even those too young to read. * * * Other forms of offensive expression may be withheld from the young without restricting the expression at its source. Bookstores and motion pictures theaters, for example, may be prohibited from making indecent material available to children. We held in Ginsberg v. New York, that the government's interest in the "well being of its youth" and in supporting "parents' claim to authority in their own household" justified the regulation of otherwise protected expression. The ease with which children may obtain access to broadcast material, coupled with the concerns recognized in Ginsberg, amply justify special treatment of indecent broadcasting.

It is appropriate, in conclusion, to emphasize the narrowness of our holding. This case does not involve a two-way radio conversation between a cab driver and a dispatcher, or a telecast of an Elizabethan comedy. We have not decided that an occasional expletive in either setting would justify any sanction or, indeed, that this broadcast would justify a criminal prosecution. The commission's decision rested entirely on a nuisance rationale under which context is all-important. The concept requires consideration of a host of variables. The time of day was emphasized by the commission. The content of the program in which the language is used will also affect the composition of the audience, and differences between radio, television, and perhaps closed-circuit transmissions, may also be relevant. As Justice Sutherland wrote, a "nuisance may be merely a right thing in the wrong place—like a pig in the parlor instead of the barnyard." We simply hold that when the commission finds that a pig has entered the parlor, the exercise of its regulatory power does not depend on proof that the pig is obscene.

The judgment of the court of appeals is reversed.

* * *

Justice POWELL, with whom Justice Blackmun joins, concurring.

* * *

* * * Because I do not subscribe to all that is said in Part IV, however, I state my views separately.

* * *

The issue, however, is whether the commission may impose civil sanctions on a licensee radio station for broadcasting the monologue at two o'clock in the afternoon. The commission's primary concern was to prevent the broadcast from reaching the ears of unsupervised children who were likely to be in the audience at that hour. In essence, the commission sought to "channel" the monologue to hours when the fewest unsupervised children would be exposed to it. In my view, this consideration provides strong support for the commission's holding.

* * *

As the foregoing demonstrates, my views are generally in accord with what is said in Part IV(C) of Justice Stevens' opinion. I therefore join that portion of his opinion. I do not join Part IV(B), however, because I do not subscribe to the theory that the Justices of this Court are free generally to decide on the basis of its content which speech protected by the First Amendment is most "valuable" and hence deserving of the most protection, and which is less "valuable" and hence deserving of less protection. In my view the result in this case does not turn on whether Carlin's monologue, viewed as a whole, or the words that comprise it, have more or less "value" than a candidate's campaign speech. This is a judgment for each person to make, not one for the judges to impose upon him.

The result turns instead on the unique characteristics of the broadcast media, combined with society's right to protect its children from speech generally agreed to be inappropriate for their years, and with the interest of unwilling adults in not being assaulted by such offensive speech in their homes. Moreover, I doubt whether today's decision will prevent any adult who wishes to receive Carlin's message in Carlin's own words from doing so, and from making for himself a value judgment as to the merit of the message and words. (Powell, J., concurring). These are the grounds upon which I join the judgment of the Court as to Part IV.

Justice STEWART, with whom Justice Brennan, Justice White, and Justice Marshall join, dissenting.

* * * The commission held, and the Court today agrees, that "indecent" is a broader concept than "obscene" as the latter term was defined in Miller v. California, because language can be "indecent" although it has social, political or artistic value and lacks prurient appeal. But this construction of § 1464, while perhaps plausible, is by no means compelled. To the contrary, I think that "indecent" should properly be read as meaning no more than "obscene." Since the Carlin monologue concededly was not "obscene," I believe that the commission lacked statutory authority to ban it. Under this construction of the statute, it is unnecessary to address the difficult and important issue of the commission's constitutional power to prohibit speech that would be constitutionally protected outside the context of electronic broadcasting.

* * *

Justice BRENNAN, with whom Justice Marshall joins, dissenting.

I agree with Justice Stewart that, under Hamling v. United States, and United States v. 12 200-ft. Reels of Film, 413 U.S. 123 (1973), the word "indecent" in 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464 must be construed to prohibit only obscene speech. I would, therefore, normally refrain from expressing my views on any constitutional issues implicated in this case. However, I find the Court's misapplication of fundamental First Amendment principles so patent, and its attempt to impose its notions of propriety on the whole of the American people so misguided, that I am unable to remain silent.

* * *

* * * Yet despite the Court's refusal to create a sliding scale of First Amendment protection calibrated to this Court's perception of the worth of a communication's content, and despite our unanimous agreement that the Carlin monologue is protected speech, a majority of the Court nevertheless finds that, on the facts of this case, the FCC is not constitutionally barred from imposing sanctions on Pacifica for its airing of the Carlin monologue. This majority apparently believes that the FCC's disapproval of Pacifica's afternoon broadcast of Carlin's "Dirty Words" recording is a permissible time, place, and manner regulation. Both the opinion of my Brother Stevens and the opinion of my Brother Powell rely principally on two factors in reaching this conclusion: (1) the capacity of a radio broadcast to intrude into the unwilling listener's home, and (2) the presence of children in the listening audience. * * *

Without question, the privacy interests of an individual in his home are substantial and deserving of significant protection. In finding these interests sufficient to justify the content regulation of protected speech, however, the Court commits two errors. First, it misconceives the nature of the privacy interests involved where an individual voluntarily chooses to admit radio communications into his home. Second it ignores the constitutionally protected interests of both those who wish to transmit and those who desire to receive broadcasts that many—including the FCC and this Court—might find offensive.

* * *

Whatever the minimal discomfort suffered by a listener who inadvertently tunes into a program he finds offensive during the brief interval before he can simply extend his arm and switch stations or flick the "off" button, it is surely worth the candle to preserve the broadcaster's right to send, and the right of those interested to receive a message entitled to full First Amendment protection. To reach a contrary balance, as does the Court, is clearly, to follow Justice Stevens' reliance on animal metaphors, "to burn the house to roast the pig."

The Court's balance, of necessity, fails to accord proper weight to the interests of listeners who wish to hear broadcasts the FCC deems offensive. It permits majoritarian tastes completely to preclude a protected message from entering the homes of a receptive, unoffended minority. No decision of this Court supports such a result. Where the individuals comprising the offended majority may freely choose to reject the material being offered, we have never found their privacy interests of such moment to warrant the suppression of speech on privacy grounds. * * *

Most parents will undoubtedly find understandable as well as commendable the Court's sympathy with the FCC's desire to prevent offensive broadcasts from reaching the ears of unsupervised children. Unfortunately, the facial appeal of this justification for radio censorship masks its constitutional insufficiency.

* * * [W]e have made it abundantly clear that "under any test of obscenity as to minors * * * to be obscene 'such expression must be, in some significant way, erotic.'" Quoting Cohen v. California, 403 U.S., at 20.

Because the Carlin monologue is obviously not an erotic appeal to the prurient interests of children, the Court, for the first time, allows the government to prevent minors from gaining access to materials that are not obscene, and are therefore protected, as to them. It thus ignores our recent admonition that "[s]peech that is neither obscene as to youths nor subject to some other legitimate proscription cannot be suppressed solely to protect the young from ideas or images that a legislative body thinks unsuitable for them."<sup>3</sup> The Court's refusal to follow its own pronouncements is especially lamentable since it has the anomalous subsidiary effect, at least in the radio context at issue here, of making completely unavailable to adults material which may not constitutionally be kept even from children. This result violates in spades the principle of Butler v. Michigan, 352 U.S. 380 (1957). * * * Speaking for the Court, (in Butler). Justice Frankfurter reasoned:

"The incidence of this enactment is to reduce the adult population of Michigan to reading only what is fit for children. * * *"

* * *

3. It may be that a narrowly drawn regulation prohibiting the use of offensive language on broadcasts directed specifically at younger children constitutes one of the "other legitimate proscription[s]" alluded to in Erznoznik. This is so both because of the difficulties inherent in adapting the Miller formulation to communications received by young children, and because such children are "not possessed of that full capacity for individual choice which is the presupposition of the First Amendment guarantees." Ginsberg v. New York. I doubt, as my Brother Stevens suggests * * * that such a limited regulation amounts to a regulation of speech based on its content, since, by hypothesis, the only persons at whom the regulated communication is directed are incapable of evaluating its content. To the extent that such a regulation is viewed as a regulation based on content, it marks the outermost limits to which content regulation is permissible.

As demonstrated above, neither of the factors relied on by both the opinion of by Brother Powell and the opinion of my Brother Stevens—the intrusive nature of radio and the presence of children in the listening audience—can, when taken on its own terms, support the FCC's disapproval of the Carlin monologue. These two asserted justifications are further plagued by a common failing: the lack of principled limits on their use as a basis for FCC censorship. No such limits come readily to mind, and neither of the opinions comprising the Court serve to clarify the extent to which the FCC may assert the privacy and children-in-the-audience rationales as justification for expunging from the airways protected communications the commission finds offensive. * * * For my own part, even accepting that this case is limited to its facts,<sup>7</sup> I would place the responsibility and the right to weed worthless and offensive communications from the public airways where it belongs and where, until today, it resided: in a public free to choose those communications worthy of its attention from a marketplace unsullied by the censor's hand.

* * *

It is quite evident that I find the Court's attempt to unstitch the warp and woof of First Amendment law in an effort to reshape its fabric to cover the patently wrong result the Court reaches in this case dangerous as well as lamentable. Yet there runs throughout the opinions of my Brothers Powell and Stevens another vein I find equally disturbing: a depressing inability to appreciate that in our land of cultural pluralism, there are many who think, act, and talk differently from the members of this Court, and who do not share their fragile sensibilities. It is only an acute ethnocentric myopia that enables the Court to approve the censorship of communications solely because of the words they contain.

* * *

Today's decision will thus have its greatest impact on broadcasters desiring to reach, and listening audiences comprised of, persons who do not share the Court's view as to which words or expressions are acceptable and who, for a variety of reasons, including a conscious desire to flout majoritarian conventions, express themselves using words that may be regarded as offensive by those from different socio-economic backgrounds. In this context, the Court's decision may be seen for what, in the broader perspective, it really is: another of the dominant culture's inevitable efforts to force those groups who do not share its mores to conform to its way of thinking, acting, and speaking.

* * *

---

COMMENT

1. Four major themes in the Supreme Court's decision in Pacifica should be emphasized. First, the decision says more than that the FCC can regulate broadcast programming that is "indecent" even though it is not "obscene." The decision is a major statement of the basis for broadcast regulation. In this sense it provides a new rationale for broadcast regu-

---

7. Having insisted that it seeks to impose sanctions on radio communications only in the limited circumstances present here, I believe that the FCC is estopped from using either this decision or its own orders in this case, 56 FCC2d 94 (1975) and 59 FCC2d 892 (1967), as a basis for imposing sanctions on any public radio broadcast other than one aired during the daytime or early evening and containing the relentless repetition, for longer than a brief interval, of "language that describes, in terms patently offensive as measured by contemporary community standards for the broadcast medium, sexual or excretory activities and organs." 56 FCC2d, at 98. For surely broadcasters are not now on notice that the commission desires to regulate any offensive broadcast other than the type of "verbal shock treatment" condemned here, or even this "shock treatment" type of offensive broadcast during the late evening.

lation—apart from the classic scarcity of the spectrum rationale found in the NBC case in 1943, text, p. 770. The “uniquely pervasive presence of the broadcast media” and the fact that broadcasting is “uniquely accessible to children”—the unique nature of the broadcast media—provided a basis in itself for broadcast regulation.

Second, the anticensorship provision of the Communications Act, § 326, did not prevent after-the-fact regulation of broadcast programming.

Third, the Court stressed the narrowness of its ruling. This was perhaps the only aspect of the decision which provided any cheer to broadcasters. The validity of FCC regulation of broadcast programming on indecency or obscenity grounds was declared to be related to the context in which the complaint arose. If the allegedly patently offensive programming was broadcast late at night when no children were in the audience, the case for regulation would presumably be far weaker than if the offending program occurred during daytime hours.

Fourth, the Court virtually rang the curtain down on the hope of broadcasters that a Supreme Court decision would one day give them equivalent constitutional status to that enjoyed by the print media. Justice Stevens directly raised and rejected this possibility: “and of all forms of communication, it is broadcasting that has received the most limited First Amendment protection.”

2. Then FCC Chairman Charles D. Ferris, reacting to the decision, quickly moved to reassure broadcasters that he did not view the decision as a mandate to “involve myself or the commission in program content.” See Broadcasting, July 10, 1978, p. 21.

3. A clue that the FCC is unlikely to take an expanded view of its powers as a result of the Pacifica decision is found in the commission’s rejection of a petition to deny the license renewal application of WGBH, an educational broadcasting station in Boston. Morality in Media of Massachusetts made the following allegations concerning WGBH’s programming:

Petitioner alleges that WGBH-TV “has failed in its responsibility to the community by consistently broadcasting offensive, vulgar and material otherwise harmful to children without adequate supervision or parental warnings.”

The FCC granted WGBH’s application for license renewal. In the course of its opinion reaching this conclusion, the FCC made the following remarks on its view of its powers under Pacifica:

* * * The Supreme Court’s decision in FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, affords this commission no general prerogative to intervene in any case where words similar or identical to those in Pacifica are broadcast over a licensed radio or television station. We intend strictly to observe the narrowness of the Pacifica holding. See In re Application of WGBH Educational Foundation, FCC 78-522, July 31, 1978.

4. The impact of Pacifica has been to keep the status quo in place rather than to change the regulatory situation vis-à-vis the treatment of obscenity-related issues by the FCC. Illustrative is a 1981 Memorandum and Order, 87 FCC2d 40 where the FCC announced, over the objection of the ACLU, its determination to continue to apply its obscenity rule to programming under the editorial control of cable operators. Reliance on the Supreme Court’s decision in Pacifica figured significantly in the FCC’s position in the matter:

Obscenity is not protected speech under the Constitution and its distribution may therefore be restricted. * * * A commission rule which applies only to a broadcast or a cable system operator imposes no prior restraint if it merely provides for the imposition of sanctions after the fact—i.e., after a determination has been made that a rule violation has occurred. FCC v. Pacifica

Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978). However, a rule which requires the cable system operator to censor programming on a channel set aside as a public forum, to which the programmer has a right of access by virtue of local, state, or federal law, would impose a system of prior restraint in violation (of the Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51 (1965) procedural requirements). Our Order * * * maintains this constitutional distinction.

In its order complying with the mandate of the Supreme Court in the mandatory public access cable case, Midwest Video Corp. v. FCC, text, p. 991, the FCC had announced that it would continue to distinguish between access-type programming which was provided voluntarily or as a result of state or local law and programming which was under the editorial control of the cable operator. Compare American Civil Liberties Union v. FCC, 523 F.2d 1344 (C.A.D.C.1975). See Memorandum and Order, 83 FCC2d 147 (1980). In the 1980 Memorandum and Order, the FCC said that it would continue to apply the specific content control rules (§ 76.215) concerning obscenity only to programming which is subject to the editorial control of the cable system operator. In short, the FCC has limited its obscenity rule to cable systems which are under the editorial control of the cable operator. Isn't an argument available that Pacifica might have authorized the FCC to apply its obscenity rules to access-type cable programming despite Freedman v. Maryland?

A Note on Violence

The issue of legal control of violence in programming is far less developed than the issues of "obscenity" and "indecent" in broadcast programming. Nevertheless, there are some legal landmarks in this area. In Writers Guild of America West, Inc. v. FCC, 423 F.Supp. 1064 (C.D.Calif. 1976), the National Association of Broadcasters (NAB) sponsored an effort to segregate a segment of television prime time which would be free from alleged exploitation of sex and violence. This development, the so-called "family viewing" hour, was held to be an invalid attempt at censorship. The court said the "family viewing" hour violated the First Amendment since it emanated from an informal FCC-induced effort at censorship. This decision was vacated. See, Writer's Guild of America v. The American Broadcasting Company, 609 F.2d 355 (9th Cir.1979). See Cowan, See No Evil: The Backstage Battle Over Sex and Violence in Television (1978).

Congress has been interested in the problem of violence on television particularly in terms of the impact of such programming on children. In 1974, Congress directed the FCC to detail its plans "to protect children from excessive programming of violence." The FCC's reaction to the problem is found in Report on the Broadcast of Violent, Indecent and Obscene Material, 51 FCC2d 418 (1975). In the Report, the FCC came out against any rigid regulation of such programming and asked the industry to police itself. But see (as a possibly bolder approach), In Re Capital Communications, Inc., 54 FCC2d 1035 (1975).

Does the Pacifica case where the Supreme Court permitted the FCC to regulate otherwise constitutionally protected material on the basis of "indecent" suggest that the Congress may be able to endow the FCC with jurisdiction to regulate "violence"? Could some forms of violence be deemed to constitute "indecent"?

Tort Liability of Television— Impact of PACIFICA

1. Does Pacifica aid in the development of a legal basis for damage claims for tortious injuries which were occasioned by incitements to violence on television?

Does the Pacifica case help to remove the barrier to the development of such a tort theory? See Cox Broadcasting Corp. v. Cohn, 420 U.S. 469 (1972).

2. In Weirum v. RKO General, Inc., 123 Cal.Rptr. 468, 539 P.2d 36 (1975), the Supreme Court of California held that a radio station could be liable for the deaths of two motorists who were killed as the result of a promotional program sponsored by the station. The station had sponsored a contest to reward the first listener who could locate one of the station's disc jockeys. The disc jockey was driving around Los Angeles broadcasting clues about his location. Some teenagers, anxious to locate the disc jockey, forced a car off the road, killing its two occupants. The heirs of the victims sued the radio station. The California Supreme Court held that the First Amendment would not be a bar to establishing liability against the radio station since "the foreseeable results 'of the broadcast' created an undue risk of harm." The Supreme Court of California further observed: "The First Amendment does not sanction the infliction of physical injury merely because achieved by word, rather than act." Although the Weirum case was decided before Pacifica, the California Supreme Court had no difficulty in saying that the First Amendment would not be a bar to liability.

3. In other cases, however, the First Amendment has been held to be a bar for actions to establish liability against suits to recover injuries which allegedly were occasioned by television broadcasts. In Olivia N. v. NBC, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2359, 178 Cal.Rptr. 888 (1981), an action was brought to recover damages for physical and emotional injuries inflicted upon a female minor by her assailant who had seen the television movie "Born Innocent," broadcast by NBC. The assailant had viewed and discussed an "artificial rape scene" in "Born Innocent." The plaintiff asserted that "the film allegedly caused the assailant to decide to commit a similar act on her." The trial court granted judgment for NBC, Niemi v. NBC, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1830 (1976). That decision was reversed by the California Court of Appeal, Olivia N. v. NBC, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1454, 141 Cal.Rptr. 511 (1977). On remand for trial, the trial court granted NBC's motion for judgment of nonsuit, and the plaintiff appealed. The California Court of Appeal affirmed the trial court's grant of the motion for nonsuit. As a result, Olivia N., the female minor, was out of court. The California Court of Appeal, in Olivia N., pointed out the dangers that would follow if negligence actions for harm attributable to television broadcasts were to become freely available.

Realistically, television networks would become significantly more inhibited in the selection of controversial materials if liability were to be based on simple negligence theory. * * * The deterrent effects of subjecting the television networks to negligence liability because of their programming choices would dampen the vigor and limit the variety of public debate.

The court in Olivia N. considered the impact of FCC v. Pacifica Foundation and said that, notwithstanding the pervasive effects of the broadcast media and the unique access afforded children by them, "the effect of the imposition of liability could reduce the U.S. adult population to viewing only what is fit for children." Considerable attention was given to the question of whether or not the film had in fact advocated or encouraged violent acts which constituted "incitement" under the rule of Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969). Olivia N. conceded that the film did not advocate or encourage violent acts and, therefore, did not constitute an "incitement." Olivia N. held that the television broadcast which occasioned the lawsuit "concededly did not fulfill the incitement requirements of Brandenburg." As a consequence, the broadcast was "constitutionally protected." For there to be liability for negligence as the result of alleged harm occasioned by a television broadcast, there first has to be a showing that the broadcast actually constituted an incitement to violence, as that phrase is defined in Brandenburg v. Ohio. If the incitement to violence can be shown, then the First Amendment barrier to allowing the action is removed because speech, as Brandenburg puts it, "directed to incite or produce imminently lawless action * * * likely to incite or produce such action" is not protected under the First Amendment.

The California Court of Appeal in Olivia N. concluded: "The trial court's determination that the First Amendment bars appellant's claim where no incitement is alleged must be upheld." Finally, the court pointed out in passing that the "narrowness of the Pacifica decision precludes its application here." The court also pointed out that Justice Powell, in his concurrence in Pacifica, had emphasized that the Court was not free to decide on the basis of content which speech protected by the First Amendment is most valuable. In addition, the court pointed out that reliance on Pacifica Foundation for the suit in Olivia N. was "misplaced" because "Pacifica deals with regulation of indecency, not the imposition of general tort liability." The Supreme Court of California refused to entertain the appeal.

Do you see any distinction between Weirum and Olivia N.? Was there more of an "incitement" in Weirum?

4. De Filippo v. NBC, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1873, 446 A.2d 1036 (R.I.1981), involved a negligence action brought against NBC and WJAR-TV (the NBC affiliate in Providence, Rhode Island) by the parents of a boy who hanged himself while trying to imitate a stunt that he was watching on "The Tonight Show." Johnny Carson, host of "The Tonight Show," announced that a professional stuntman would "hang" him in the broadcast. Robinson said of the stunt he would perform: "[B]elieve me, it's not something that you want to go and try—this is a stunt. * * *" The audience laughed, and the following conversation took place:

Robinson: I've got to laugh—you know, you're all laughing. * * *

Carson: Explain that to me.

Robinson: I've seen people try things like this. I really have. I happen to know somebody who did something similar to it, just fooling around, and almost broke his neck. * * *

Justice Murray of the Rhode Island Supreme Court states the consequence of the broadcast: "Several hours after the broadcast, the De Filippis found Nicky hanging from a noose in front of the television set, which was still on and turned to WJAR-TV."

The plaintiffs, seeking $10,000,000 in damages, asserted four theories in trial court alleging

1. that the defendant broadcasters had negligently permitted the stunt to be broadcast,
2. negligently failed to warn infant plaintiff of the dangers of the program,
3. a claim in products liability, and
4. an intentional tort-trespass.

Defendant broadcasters made a motion for summary judgment which was granted by the trial judge. The judge ruled that the First Amendment barred relief. The trial judge also ruled that the defendant's broadcast was not a product. The Supreme Court of Rhode Island affirmed the ruling of the trial court, declined to rule on the trial judge's finding that the broadcast was not a product: "We hold that the First Amendment does indeed bar recovery in such actions; therefore, we do not reach plaintiffs' other contentions."

In De Filippo the Rhode Island Supreme Court said that they could find no basis for a conclusion that the broadcast could be construed as an "incitement":

Under the facts of this case, we see no basis for a finding that the broadcast in any way could be construed as incitement. Consequently, the exception set forth in Brandenburg v. Ohio, supra, is inapplicable to the case at bar. In any event, the incitement exception must be applied with extreme care since the criteria underlying its application are vague, further, allowing recovery under such an exception would inevitably lead to self-censorship on the part of broadcasters, thus depriving both broadcasters and viewers of freedom and choice, for "above all else, the First Amendment means that government has no power to restrict expression because of its message, its ideas, its subject matter or its content." Police Department of Chicago v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92, 95, 92 S.Ct. 2286, 2290, 33 L.Ed.2d 212, 216 (1972).

Accordingly, the court held that the award of summary judgment to the defendant broadcaster was proper. The appeal was denied and dismissed, and the judgment appealed from was affirmed. The court seemed to agree with the trial justice that the Weirum case could be distinguished in that there was an "explicit incitement" involved in Weirum. Is that a fair analysis of Weirum?

Another case that figured in the decision of the Rhode Island Supreme Court in De Filippo was Zamora v. CBS, 5 Med.L. Rptr. 2109, 480 F.Supp. 199 (C.D.Fla.1979). Zamora had been convicted of murder and sued three television networks for having impermissibly "stimulated, incited, and instigated" him to "duplicate the atrocities that he viewed on television." The federal district court found that the First Amendment was a bar to suit and dismissed the complaint. Zamora was distinguished as follows:

The plaintiffs maintain that the holding in Zamora is inapposite because there the plaintiff was not referring to one specific incident but to television broadcasting in general. While plaintiffs are correct in pointing out the differences between Zamora and the instant case, we do not accept their characterization of that case as inapposite. In both cases the plaintiffs tried to establish negligence and recklessness by the broadcasters. We are therefore persuaded by the [d]istrict [c]ourt's holding that the First Amendment bars this type of suit.

How does one measure incitement? The De Filippo court said that this was a problem but pointed out that the only person who appears to have been "incited" was young De Filippo. In such circumstances, the court said it could not find that the broadcast constituted incitement. The court was especially concerned about the adverse consequences that would flow from a holding that the broadcaster could be liable.

This self-censorship would not only violate defendants' limited right to make their own programming decisions. Writers Guild of America, West, Inc. v. Federal Communications Commission, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1009, 423 F.Supp. 1064, 1154 (C.D.Cal.1976), vacated sub nom. Writers Guild of America v. American Broadcasting Co. 609 F.2d 355 (9th Cir. 1979), but would also violate the paramount rights of the viewers to suitable access to "social, esthetic, moral, and other ideas and experiences * * *." Columbia Broadcasting System v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. 94, 102 (1973).

De Filippo referred to the Pacifica case and mentioned with apparent approval its ruling that the First Amendment did not provide "the broadcast media with unbridged rights, as is evidenced by the limited governmental control over the broadcast media." But Pacifica was not seen by the Rhode Island Supreme Court in De Filippo as a basis for removing the First Amendment bar sufficient to provide a basis for tort liability against the broadcasters.

The Relationship Between Obscenity in Broadcasting and the License Renewal Process

1. The license renewal process can be used as a regulatory device to control obscene, indecent, or profane utterance. In Robinson v. FCC, 334 F.2d 534 (D.C.Cir. 1964), the FCC took the unusual step of refusing to renew a license in a case where, among other issues, the licensee had allocated a substantial amount of its programming to the Charlie Walker disc jockey show which featured off-color jokes and remarks. The station involved, Palmetto Broadcasting Co., WDKD, was owned by the late Hollywood actor, movie "bad man" Edward G. Robinson, Jr. See Palmetto Broadcasting Co., 33 FCC 250 (1962).

The obscenity issue in the Robinson radio case came up in the contest of the renewal process. The FCC denied Robinson's application for renewal of radio station WDKD, Kingstree, South Carolina. One of the grounds for denial listed by the FCC was that Robinson had made misrepresentations in the license renewal proceeding. (Robinson said he had never heard complaints about the objectionable disc jockey show, but numerous witnesses testified to the contrary.) The court of appeals in a per curiam opinion affirmed the decision on that ground alone. Robinson v. FCC, 334 F.2d 534 (D.C.Cir. 1964).

Judge Wilbur Miller, in a concurring opinion, believed that some of the Charlie Walker disc jockey shows constituted violations of 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464.

One of the FCC findings which the court of appeals refused to pass upon was the finding that some of the disc jockey program material was "coarse, vulgar, suggestive, and susceptible of indecent, double meaning." Judge Miller thought this and other FCC findings should have been upheld by the court of appeals. Judge Miller speculated on why the court's opinion in Robinson v. FCC nervously avoided the obscenity issue:

"Perhaps, the majority refrained from discussing the other issues because of a desire to avoid approving any commission action which might be called program censorship. I do not think that denying renewal of a license because of the station's broadcast of obscene, indecent or profane language—a serious criminal offense—can properly be called program censorship."

Robinson petitioned for rehearing and raised the issue once more that censorship by the FCC of program content was unconstitutional.

Do you think the per curiam opinion for the court of appeals can be read as authorizing a denial of license renewal for violation of an FCC programming standard?

It should be noted that the FCC decision in Palmetto Broadcasting Co. did not rely on the statutory language of 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464. The FCC took the position that since the broadcaster must perform in the public interest to secure renewal, renewal could be denied if the FCC found that the licensee had broadcast "coarse" and "vulgar" programs not in the public interest. In Palmetto, the FCC scored "coarseness and indecency" and did not predicate its decision on the general law of obscenity.

2. (The Palmetto decision was appealed under the name of Robinson v. FCC.) Judge Miller in his concurrence in Robinson relied on KFKB Broadcasting Association v. Federal Radio Commission, 47 F.2d 670 (D.C.Cir. 1931), for the proposition that making obscene, indecent, or profane language a demerit or at least a factor in a renewal proceeding was not censorship:

"There has been no attempt on the part of the commission to subject any part of appellant's broadcasting matter to scrutiny prior to its release. In considering the question whether the public interest, convenience or necessity will be served by a renewal of appellant's license, the commission has merely exercised its undoubted right to take note of appellant's past conduct which is not censorship."

3. The whole area of obscenity in broadcasting has been an area, as WUHY illustrates, where general constitutional standards are apparently not applied, this despite the fact that no indigenous standards have been evolved for broadcasting by either the FCC or the courts. The result is considerable ambiguity concerning the issue of obscenity in broadcasting.

4. A monetary forfeiture proceeding, authorized by § 503(b)(1)(E) of the Communications Act against broadcast licensees who violate § 1464 for "obscene" and "indecent" programming, was inflated by the FCC into a challenge to the broadcaster's license by an order that its license renewal application be set for hearing even though the application was otherwise uncontested. See In re Notice to Trustees of the University of Pennsylvania, 57 FCC2d 783 (1975).

On January 27, 1975 radio station WXPB(FM), Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, created a furor with two allegedly obscene broadcasts of a "live" call-in program called "The Vegetable Report," broadcast Monday evenings between 4:00 P.M. and 7:00 P.M. The station was licensed to the Trustees of the University of Pennsylvania but admittedly was managed solely by the students of the University. Despite corrective action by the University, the FCC found a violation of § 1464, text, p. 908, for the broadcast of indecent and obscene matter. Accordingly, under § 503(b)(1)(E) of the Communications Act, the FCC fined the licensee $2,000.

The FCC found at least four particular segments of the January 27 broadcast obscene under the test set forth in Miller v. California. One of the segments dealt with sexual relations between husband and wife. The other three dealt with using an on-the-air conversation with a three-year-old boy for purposes of sexual titillation. In one instance, the program announcer asked the child who had been put on the phone by his mother, "Johnny, can you say 'fuck'?"

Concerning these four segments, the FCC stated:

The commission believes that these particular segments appear to appeal to the prurient interest, describe sexual conduct in a patently offensive way, and lack serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value. We note that the Court in Illinois Citizens Committee, indicated that it would not be inappropriate for the commission to evaluate a broadcasting program that is episodic in nature with a cluster of individual and typically disconnected commentaries such as a call-in program of this type. We believe that these segments of the January 27 broadcast appear to present a pandering approach to explicit descriptions of ultimate sexual acts. Furthermore, the broadcast not only occurred at a time of the day when children might be expected to be present in the listening audience, but at one point apparently involved a three-year-old child directly in the discussion.

These two broadcasts of "The Vegetable Report" also appear to have been indecent under the then prevailing standard regarding indecent language set forth in the WUHY case, and the subsequent standard enunciated in WBAI, to comply with the Miller decision.

In view of the FCC determination that WXPB had broadcast obscene and indecent programming, the FCC said it was unable to find that a grant of the station's renewal application would serve the public interest, convenience, and necessity. It therefore designated the application for hearing.

The FCC placed upon the licensee, the University of Pennsylvania, the burden of proving that it possessed the requisite qualifications to be a licensee and that a grant of the application would serve the public interest.

In terms of measuring the future impact of the Supreme Court's decision in Pacifica on all phases of broadcast obscenity regulation, it is noteworthy that in the WPXB case the FCC relied on its own decision in the Pacifica case, or as the case was styled at the FCC level, In re Citizens Complaint Against Pacifica Foundation WBAI-FM, 32 R.R.2d 1331 (1975).

The FCC stated that in WBAI it had relied on the Illinois Citizens Committee decision which "was the first judicial decision upholding the commission's conclusion that the probable presence of children in the radio audience is relevant to a determination of obscenity."

The Supreme Court Pacifica decision could be used to provide new impetus and new legitimacy for use of the denial of the license renewal application as a sanction in the enforcement of the regulation of "indecent" and "obscenity" in broadcasting by the FCC. But thus far this has not happened.

"Obscene, Indecent, or Profane" Utterance in Broadcasting: The Enforcement Role of the Federal Courts

1. As has been the case with the FCC, the meaning of the words "indecent or profane" in 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464 has been a source of legal controversy in the federal courts. In Tallman v. United States, 465 F.2d 282 (7th Cir. 1972), a full inquiry into the meaning of these terms was avoided. Since the petitioner, the party being prosecuted, was indicted for having broadcast "obscene" language, the petitioner was actually tried only for using obscene language. The court said that the offending broadcasts "show plain filth by any contemporary standards of obscenity," so that there was no need for the jury to determine whether they were also "indecent" or "profane."

However, the Tallman case took the position that the terms "profane" and "indecent" are capable of sufficiently precise definition to withstand constitutional attack. United States v. Smith, 467 F.2d 1126 (7th Cir. 1972), appears to take a similar view. There are no indications in Tallman on how these terms differ from the definition of "obscenity."

2. A full inquiry into the meaning of the words "obscene, indecent, or profane" in 18 U.S.C. § 1464 in the context of a criminal prosecution is found in United States v. Simpson, 561 F.2d 53 (7th Cir. 1977). A federal court of appeals was there presented with the question of whether the words "indecent" and "obscene" used in 18 U.S.C.A. § 1464, text, p. 908, had distinct meanings. The question arose not in the context of an FCC enforcement of regulation § 1464, but in the context of a criminal prosecution brought by the Department of Justice of that statute. The defendant had used a CB radio transmitter in his home "to broadcast explicit references to sexual activities, descriptions of sexual and excretory organs, and abusive epithets directed to other radio operators with whom he was communicating, all in street vernacular." The broadcasts were received not only on citizens band radio but on AM radio, television, and telephones.

The defendant was convicted for violation of § 1464 as well as on other counts. The court stated the issue before it: "The jury's determination in its guilty verdict that the broadcast was 'indecent' but not 'obscene' requires us to decide whether those two words, as used in the statute have different meanings." The court added somewhat ruefully: "We would have had no difficulty in affirming a finding that the language was obscene, but we are of course bound by the jury's contrary finding."

In the jury instructions, the district court judge defined "obscenity" in accordance with Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973). The judge's definition of "indecent" was similar but omitted a key element of the Miller definition of obscenity—appeal of the material, taken as a whole, to the prurient interest in sex. Could the defendant be convicted for "indecent" under § 1464 on the basis of anything less than the full constitutional test employed for obscenity? The Simpson court ruled that he could not.

The court of appeals in Simpson relied on the fact that the words in the mailing statute in the criminal code, 18 U.S.C. § 1461 had been interpreted in Manual Enterprises, Inc. v. Day, 370 U.S. 478 at 482-484 (1962), as reaching only indecent material which as now expressed in Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, at 489 (1957) 'taken as a whole appeals to the prurient interest.'". The Simpson court noted that this passage from Manual was later quoted with approval by the Supreme Court in Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87, 117 (1974). "Indecency" appeared to be constitutionally punishable if it could meet the general definition of "obscenity."

The development that the Simpson court felt was decisive to whether "indecent" utterance in § 1464 should be interpreted as having a distinct meaning from "obscene" utterance derived from a companion case to Miller, United States v. 12 200-Ft. Reels of Super 8MM. Film, 413 U.S. 123, 130 (1973). In 12 200-Ft. Reels, the word "indecent" in 18 U.S.C.A. § 1462 (dealing with the transportation of materials in the interstate commerce) had been defined as follows: "[W]e are prepared to construe such terms as limiting regulated material to patently offensive representations or descriptions of that specific 'hard core' sexual conduct given as examples in Miller. * * *"

The Simpson court acknowledged that the Court in 12 200-Ft. Reels had not, in defining "indecent," specifically referred to § 1464. The Simpson court then attempted to prophesy on how the Supreme Court would ultimately interpret the reference to "indecent" utterance in § 1464:

[T]he constitutional doubt may be less serious with respect to radio broadcasts than it would be with respect to § 1462's application to materials transported in interstate commerce, (but) we must assume that the Court would interpret "indecent" in § 1464 as it has in § 1462.

The Simpson court's prophecy on whether the Supreme Court would uphold its interpretation of the words "indecent" and "obscene" as parts of a single proscription "applicable only if the challenged language appeals to the prurient interest" proved to be entirely wrong. The Supreme Court in the Pacifica case, on the contrary, declared that the words "obscene, indecent, or profane" in § 1464 were in the disjunctive suggesting that each of the foregoing terms had a separate meaning. Further, even though "appeal to the prurient interest" is part of the definition of what is obscene, it was not part of the definition of "indecent" which was defined as nonconformance with accepted standards of morality.

The Supreme Court declined review in the Simpson case. Therefore, it is not clear whether the same latitude which was permitted to the FCC by the Supreme Court in Pacifica to regulate "indecent" as opposed to "obscene" speech is also open to the Department of Justice in bringing criminal prosecutions for broadcasting "indecent" programming under § 1464. Certainly, when criminal sanctions such as imprisonment are at stake, the First Amendment interests of a broadcast ought to weigh more heavily than is the case in an FCC proceeding where the threatened sanction is a monetary forfeiture, a short-term renewal, or even the denial of a license renewal.

In Simpson, the court emphasized that its view that the words "indecent" and "obscene" were interchangeable "parts of a single proscription" was a matter of statutory interpretation. The court was thus spared the difficult question of resolving "whether the First Amendment protects, against federal criminal sanctions, a radio broadcast made in the crude sex vernacular of the street that is patently offensive but lacks prurient appeal." With the advent of the Supreme Court decision in Pac- ifica, the constitutional issue that the Simpson court was happy not to reach is now both open and troublesome.

STANDING TO ENFORCE THE FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS ACT

Who is the Addressee of the Public Interest?

The sanctions available to enforce the FCC's programming policies have been indicated previously. See text, p. 900. But the question remains: who is entitled to set the enforcement process in motion? If a licensee seeks renewal of a license, who can challenge that renewal application? The law is clear that the other applicants for the license may certainly challenge a renewal application. Indeed, in such a case a comparative hearing must be held in which all the applicants are joined in a single proceeding and the merits and demerits of each applicant are weighed one against the other. See Ashbacker Radio Corp. v. FCC, 326 U.S. 327 (1945).

But who beyond the competitors of a licensee may institute and intervene in FCC proceedings? Until recently, standing to challenge the programming activity of a licensee before the FCC was rather limited. The traditional view had been established by the Supreme Court's decision in FCC v. Sanders, 309 U.S. 470 (1940), where it was held that a showing of economic injury was necessary for standing before the commission. The theory behind this doctrine was that only someone who had an economically measurable interest in a proceeding could be considered to have a bona fide or nonmischievous stake in it. The theory proceeded on the belief that the public interest could best be defended by someone who was economically injured by the illegal behavior of a licensee since only he would have sufficient incentive to be steadily on the alert for noncompliance with the Federal Communications Act.

The difficulty with the doctrine was that it had an industry rather than a consumer orientation. The Sanders doctrine proceeded on the rather simplistic assumption that the competitive interests of other members of the broadcasting industry exhausted the range of values encompassed under the category of broadcasting in the "public interest." As a result, the stake of the listening audience in the social and informing function of broadcasting was largely unrepresented. An approach to standing based on economic injury reflected a quantitative rather than a qualitative approach to the problems of broadcasting. In 1966, a heavy assault was finally made on the Sanders doctrine.

---

OFFICE OF COMMUNICATION OF THE UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST v. FCC,

359 F.2D 994 (D.C.CIR. 1966).

BURGER, Circuit Judge: This is an appeal from a decision of the Federal Communications Commission granting to the Intervenor a one-year renewal of its license to operate television station WLBT in Jackson, Mississippi. * * * The commission dismissed appellants' petition and, without a hearing, took the unusual step of granting a restricted and conditional renewal of the license. Instead of granting the usual three-year renewal, it limited the license to one year from June 1, 1965, and imposed what it characterizes here as "strict conditions" on WLBT's operations in that one-year probationary period.

The questions presented are a. whether appellants, or any of them, have standing before the Federal Communications Commission as parties in interest under Section 309(d) of the Federal Communications Act to contest the renewal of a broadcast license; and

b. whether the commission was required by Section 309(e) to conduct an evidentiary hearing on the claims of the appellants prior to acting on renewal of the license.

BACKGROUND

The complaints against Intervenor embrace charges of discrimination on racial and religious grounds and of excessive commercials. As the commission's order indicates, the first complaints go back to 1955 when it was claimed that WLBT had deliberately cut off a network program about race relations problems on which the General Counsel of the NAACP was appearing and had flashed on the viewers' screens a "Sorry, Cable Trouble" sign. In 1957 another complaint was made to the commission that WLBT had presented a program urging the maintenance of racial segregation and had refused requests for time to present the opposing viewpoint. Since then numerous other complaints have been made.

When WLBT sought a renewal of its license in 1958, the commission at first deferred action because of complaints of this character but eventually granted the usual three-year renewal because it found that, while there had been failures to comply with the Fairness Doctrine, the failures were isolated instances of improper behavior and did not warrant denial of WLBT's renewal application.

Shortly after the outbreak of prolonged civil disturbances centering in large part around the University of Mississippi in September 1962, the commission again received complaints that various Mississippi radio and television stations, including WLBT, had presented programs concerning racial integration in which only one viewpoint was aired. In 1963 the commission investigated and requested the stations to submit detailed factual reports on their programs dealing with racial issues.

On March 3, 1964, while the commission was considering WLBT's responses, WLBT filed the license renewal application presently under review.

To block license renewal, appellants filed a petition in the commission urging denial of WLBT's application and asking to intervene in their own behalf and as representatives of "all other television viewers in the State of Mississippi." * *

The petition claimed that WLBT failed to serve the general public because it provided a disproportionate amount of commercials and entertainment and did not give a fair and balanced presentation of controversial issues, especially those concerning Negroes, who comprise almost forty-five per cent of the total population within its prime service area; it also claimed discrimination against local activities of the Catholic Church.

Appellants claim standing before the commission on the grounds that:

1. They are individuals and organizations who were denied a reasonable opportunity to answer their critics, a violation of the Fairness Doctrine.

2. These individuals and organizations represent the nearly one half of WLBT's potential listening audience who were denied an opportunity to have their side of controversial issues presented, equally a violation of the Fairness Doctrine, and who were more generally ignored and discriminated against in WLBT's programs.

3. These individuals and organizations represent the total audience, not merely one part of it, and they assert the right of all listeners, regardless of race or religion, to hear and see balanced programming on significant public questions as required by the Fairness Doctrine and also their broad interest that the station be operated in the public interest in all respects.

The commission denied the petition to intervene on the ground that standing is predicated upon the invasion of a legally protected interest or an injury which is direct and substantial and that "petitioners * * * can assert no greater interest of claim or injury than members of the general public." * * *

Upon considering Petitioners' claims and WLBT's answers to them on this basis, the commission concluded that serious issues are presented whether the licensee's operations have fully met the public interest standard. Indeed, it is a close question whether to designate for hearing these applications for renewal of license.

Nevertheless, the commission conducted no hearing but granted a license renewal, asserting a belief that renewal would be in the public interest since broadcast stations were in a position to make worthwhile contributions to the resolution of pressing racial problems, this contribution was "needed immediately" in the Jackson area, and WLBT, if operated properly, could make such a contribution. * * *

The one-year renewal was on conditions which plainly put WLBT on notice that the renewal was in the nature of a probationary grant. * * *

STANDING OF APPELLANTS

The commission's denial of standing to appellants was based on the theory that, absent a potential direct, substantial injury or adverse effect from the administrative action under consideration, a petitioner has no standing before the commission and that the only types of effects sufficient to support standing are economic injury and electrical interference. It asserted its traditional position that members of the listening public do not suffer any injury peculiar to them and that allowing them standing would pose great administrative burdens.

Up to this time, the courts have granted standing to intervene only to those alleging electrical interference, NBC v. FCC

(KOA), 132 F.2d 545 (1942), aff'd, 319 U.S. 239, or alleging some economic injury, e.g., FCC v. Sanders Bros. Radio Station, 309 U.S. 470 (1940). * * *

* * *

We see no reason to believe, therefore, that Congress through its committees had any thought that electrical interference and economic injury were to be the exclusive grounds for standing or that it intended to limit participation of the listening public to writing letters to the Complaints Division of the commission. Instead, the Congressional reports seem to recognize that the issue of standing was to be left to the courts. * * *

* * * Since the concept of standing is a practical and functional one designed to insure that only those with a genuine and legitimate interest can participate in a proceeding, we can see no reason to exclude those with such an obvious and acute concern as the listening audience. * * *

There is nothing unusual or novel in granting the consuming public standing to challenge administrative actions.

* * *

These "consumer" cases were not decided under the Federal Communications Act, but all of them have in common with the case under review the interpretation of language granting standing to persons "affected" or "aggrieved". The commission fails to suggest how we are to distinguish these cases from those involving standing of broadcast "consumers" to oppose license renewals in the Federal Communications Commission. * * * Furthermore, assuming, we look only to the commercial economic aspects and ignore vital public interest, we cannot believe that the economic stake of the consumers of electricity or public transit riders is more significant than that of listeners who collectively have a huge aggregate investment in receiving equipment.

The argument that a broadcaster is not a public utility is beside the point. * * *

After nearly five decades of operation the broadcast industry does not seem to have grasped the simple fact that a broadcast license is a public trust subject to termination for breach of duty. * * *

Such beneficial contribution as these Appellants, or some of them, can make must not be left to the grace of the commission.

Public participation is especially important in a renewal proceeding, since the public will have been exposed for at least three years to the licensee's performance, as cannot be the case when the commission considers an initial grant, unless the applicant has a prior record as a licensee. In a renewal proceeding, furthermore, public spokesmen, such as appellants here, may be the only objectors. In a community served by only one outlet, the public interest focus is perhaps sharper and the need for airing complaints often greater than where, for example, several channels exist. * * * Even when there are multiple competing stations in a locality, various factors may operate to inhibit the other broadcasters from opposing a renewal application. An imperfect rival may be thought a desirable rival, or there may be a "gentleman's agreement" of deference to a fellow broadcaster in the hope he will reciprocate on a propitious occasion.

Thus we are brought around by analogy to the Supreme Court's reasoning in Sanders; unless the listeners—the broadcast consumers—can be heard, there may be no one to bring programming deficiencies or offensive overcommercialization to the attention of the commission in an effective manner. * * * The late Edmond Cahn addressed himself to this problem in its broadest aspects when he said, "some consumers need bread; others need Shakespeare; others need their rightful place in the national society—what they all need is processors of law who will consider the people's needs more significant than administrative convenience."

Law in the Consumer Perspective, 112 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1, 13 (1963). * * *

The responsible and representative groups eligible to intervene cannot here be enumerated or categorized specifically; such community organizations as civic associations, professional societies, unions, churches, and educational institutions or associations might well be helpful to the commission. * * *

The fears of regulatory agencies that their processes will be inundated by expansion of standing criteria are rarely borne out. Always a restraining factor is the expense of participation in the administrative process, an economic reality which will operate to limit the number of those who will seek participation; legal and related expenses of administrative proceedings are such that even those with large economic interests find the costs burdensome.

In line with this analysis, we do not now hold that all of the appellants have standing to challenge WLBT's renewal. We do not reach that question. As to these appellants we limit ourselves to holding that the commission must allow standing to one or more of them as responsible representatives to assert and prove the claims they have urged in their petition. * * *

HEARING

We hold further that in the circumstances shown by this record an evidentiary hearing was required in order to resolve the public interest issue. Under Section 309(e) the commission must set a renewal application for hearing where "a substantial and material question of fact is presented or the commission for any reason is unable to make the finding" that the public interest, convenience, and necessity will be served by the license renewal. [Emphasis supplied.]

The commission argues in this Court that it accepted all appellants' allegations of WLBT's misconduct and that for this reason no hearing was necessary. * * *

The commission in effect sought to justify its grant of the one-year license, in the face of accepted facts irreconcilable with a public interest finding, on the ground that as a matter of policy the immediate need warranted the risks involved, and that the "strict conditions" it imposed on the grant would improve future operations. However the conditions which the commission made explicit in the one-year license are implicit in every grant. * * *

Assuming arguendo that the commission's acceptance of appellants' allegations would satisfy one ground for dispensing with a hearing, i.e., absence of a question of fact, Section 309(e) also commands that in order to avoid a hearing the commission must make an affirmative finding that renewal will serve the public interest. Yet the only finding on this crucial factor is a qualified statement that the public interest would be served, provided WLBT thereafter complied strictly with the specified conditions. * * * The statutory public interest finding cannot be inferred from a statement of the obvious truth that a properly operated station will serve the public interest.

* * * The issues which should have been considered could be resolved only in an evidentiary hearing in which all aspects of its qualifications and performance could be explored. * * *

We hold that the grant of a renewal of WLBT's license for one year was erroneous. The commission is directed to conduct hearings on WLBT's renewal application, allowing public intervention pursuant to his holding. Since the commission has already decided that appellants are responsible representatives of the listening public of the Jackson area, we see no obstacle to a prompt determination granting standing to appellants or some of them. Whether WLBT should be able to benefit from a showing of good performance, if such is the case, since June 1965 we do not undertake to decide. The commission has had no occasion to pass on this issue and we therefore refrain from doing so.

The record is remanded to the commission for further proceedings consistent with this opinion; jurisdiction is retained in this court.

Reversed and remanded.

---

COMMENT

In what sense does the very nature of the "fairness" doctrine stimulate a recognition of the inadequacy of the standing rules as they existed prior to United Church of Christ?

What difficulties do you see in implementing the new standing approach of United Church of Christ in terms of relating it to programming areas other than the "fairness" doctrine? See text, p. 944.

The Court's opinion in United Church of Christ appears to exude a mood of displeasure with the commission's regulatory philosophy. Why is the FCC in the WLBT case, unlike the court, so sympathetic to the incumbent broadcaster?

United Church of Christ II: The Meaning of Standing for the Citizen Group

1. On the basis of the holding in the first United Church of Christ decision that listeners and viewers had standing to participate in broadcast renewal proceedings, the United Church of Christ went back to the FCC ready to show at the hearing the unfitness of WLBT for license renewal. It was a vain effort. This time the FCC granted a full term three-year renewal to WLBT.

Once again the United Church of Christ took the FCC to court. Once again, Judge Burger reversed the FCC. Office of Communication of the United Church of Christ v. FCC (United Church of Christ II), 425

F.2d 543 (D.C. Cir. 1969). But this time, Judge Burger, now Chief Justice Burger, vacated the license renewal grant to WLBT and directed the FCC to invite applicants to apply for the license.

2. In United Church of Christ II, the court repudiated the treatment of the citizen group by the FCC hearing examiner:

The [e]xaminer seems to have regarded appellants as "plaintiffs" and the licensee as "defendant," with burdens of proof allocated accordingly. This tack, though possibly fostered by the commission's own action, was a grave misreading of our holding on this question. We did not intend that intervenors representing a public interest be treated as interlopers. Rather, if analogues can be useful, a "public intervenor" who is seeking no license or private right is, in this context, more nearly like a complaining witness who presents evidence to police or a prosecutor whose duty it is to conduct an affirmative and objective investigation of all the facts and to pursue his prosecutorial or regulatory function if there is probable cause to believe a violation has occurred.

The court of appeals, per Judge Burger, complained that it was inappropriate for "the examiner or the commission to sit back and simply provide a forum for the intervenors." The court observed further: "A curious neutrality-in-favor of the licensee seems to have guided the examiner in his conduct of the evidentiary hearing." The affirmative duty of the commission and the hearing examiner in the context of a situation such as United Church of Christ was explicitly set forth by the court of appeals:

The commission and the examiners have an affirmative duty to assist in the development of a meaningful record which can serve as the basis for the evaluation of the licensee's performance of his duty to serve the public interest. The public intervenors, who were performing a public service under a mandate of this court, were entitled to a more hospitable reception in the performance of that function. As we view the record the examiner tended to impede the exploration of the very issues which we would reasonably expect the commission itself would have initiated; an ally was regarded as an opponent.

3. The court of appeals in United Church of Christ II then took the remarkable step of itself vacating the FCC's license grant to WLBT:

We are compelled to hold, on the whole record, that the commission's conclusion is not supported by substantial evidence. For this reason the grant of a license must be vacated forthwith and the commission is directed to invite applications to be filed for the license. We do refrain, however, from holding that the licensee be declared disqualified from filing a new application; the conduct of the hearing was not primarily the licensee's responsibility, although as the applicant it had the burden of proof. Moreover, the commission necessarily did not address itself to the precise question of WLBT's qualifications to be an applicant in the new proceeding now ordered, and we hesitate to pass on this subject not considered by the commission.

The commission is directed to consider a plan for interim operation pending completion of its hearings; if it finds it in the public interest to permit the present licensee to carry on interim operations that alternative is available.

The FCC had placed the burden of showing that WLBT was unqualified for renewal on the citizen group intervenors, the United Church of Christ. Judge Burger felt that the citizen groups had been treated by the FCC as intruders in the hitherto cozy world of bureaucrat and broadcaster. The FCC had adhered to the form but not the substance of the earlier decision. Burger's opinion in United Church of Christ II was a stinging rebuke to FCC treatment of citizen groups. The opinion also underscored the fact that the United Church of Christ case was no fluke: the federal court of appeals had fully intended to give a legitimate and vital place in FCC renewal proceedings to citizen groups.

4. Judge Burger believed that on the basis of United Church of Christ I, and the Federal Communications Act itself, the burden of proof in a renewal hearing should be on the renewal applicant rather than the citizen group. What arguments would you make to defend Judge Burger's views on burden of proof? Against? Are there any basic reasons in the structure of American broadcast regulation which lead to the kind of FCC sympathy for licensee failings and resistance to citizen group objections displayed in the United Church of Christ case?

Some Limits on Citizen Group Standing?

1. Nine years after United Church of Christ I, the steady expansion of citizen group standing in broadcast regulation was halted somewhat in Illinois Citizens Committee for Broadcasting v. FCC, 515 F.2d 397 (D.C.Cir. 1975). The factual and substantive issues in the case, arising out of a problem in the FCC's regulation of obscene and indecent programming, are set forth in this text, p. 914. After issuing a notice of apparent liability to Sonderling Broadcasting Co. on the ground that certain broadcasts carried on its station WGLD-FM, Oak Park, Illinois, featuring discussions of oral sex, warranted a $2,000 forfeiture, the FCC informed Sonderling of its statutory right to refuse payment of the forfeiture and seek judicial review. Despite its stated belief that the FCC's action was unconstitutional, Sonderling elected to pay the fine. Sonderling said that it preferred to pay a $2,000 fine rather than spend many times that amount litigating the constitutional validity of the fine.

Although Sonderling did not want to challenge the constitutional validity of the fine, a citizen group and a civil liberties group did. The Illinois Citizens Committee for Broadcasting and the Illinois Division of the American Civil Liberties Union filed an application for remission of the forfeiture and a petition for reconsideration. The two groups asserted that they were representatives of the listening public and that their members and contributors included many in the Chicago area who were being deprived, contrary to the First Amendment, of listening alternatives because of the FCC action against Sonderling. The FCC did not grant the relief sought by the two groups but agreed to clarify its intentions in order to correct any misunderstanding about its notice of apparent liability.

In the course of its opinion, the FCC expressed doubt over the standing of the two groups to obtain a remission or reconsideration of a forfeiture which had not been challenged by the licensee against whom it was directed. The court of appeals agreed with the FCC's action in the case. See text, p. 917. The portions of the court of appeals decision, per Judge Leventhal, dealing with the standing issue follow.

---

ILLINOIS CITIZENS COMMITTEE FOR BROADCASTING v. FCC, 515 F.2D 397 (D.C. CIR. 1975).

LEVENTHAL, Circuit Judge:

* * *

The United States urges that the public, as distinguished from the licensee, has no interest in a forfeiture proceeding.

* * * In this case, the representatives of the public allege that the right of the public to be informed has been curtailed by limitations imposed by the government, invalidly, on the broadcaster's discretion to present material.

We uphold petitioners' standing to vindicate the public's interest. That interest is underscored by the likelihood that the licensee who is directly governed by the order in the forfeiture proceeding will, as here, find the burden too great, in terms of its own interest, to warrant its undertaking the risk and expense involved in contesting the commission's action. In comparable situations we have allowed interested parties to intervene where the party that would ordinarily be expected to press the public interest has failed to appeal an initial decision. * * * The procedure used by the FCC in issuing the notice of apparent liability raises questions with regard to the rights of the licensee. First, it includes terms of conclusions, while the statute contemplates only charges.<sup>12</sup> If construed as the latter, then Sonderling was not provided with notice or opportunity for a hearing before its issuance, even though it seemed to go far towards the imposition of a substantial fine. This procedure seems very like that condemned by the Supreme Court in Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan, 372 U.S. 58 (1963). There the Court reviewed the practices of a state commission that sent distributors of publications that had been found objectionable for sale to minors notification of that finding, accompanied by reminders of possible criminal sanctions if the distributor failed to "cooperate." The system was found to constitute an informal "scheme of * * * censorship," based on "radically deficient" procedures.

It is true that the licensee here does have an opportunity for judicial review, if it is willing to shoulder the expense. However, the Court's "insistence [in Bantam Books] that regulations of obscenity scrupulously embody the most rigorous procedural safeguards," 372 U.S. at 66, 83 S.Ct. at 637, and its requirement of notice and hearing before a determination of obscenity is made, cast doubt on the procedures used by the commission.

However, we do not think that the procedural safeguards prescribed in Bantam Books, which were found to be essential for the protection of "[t]he publisher or the distributor," can be asserted by the public as procedural error. The statute contemplates that the licensee will, in the first instance, ensure that First Amendment limitations are not overstepped in forfeiture action under § 503(b)(1)(E). We have no need to consider whether the public is entitled to intervene on a petition for reconsideration after the initial determination has been made when the licensee declines to press the matter further. * * * In this case a representative of the public did in fact ask the commission to reconsider its determination, and the commission responded in some detail to the concerns expressed. Finding no prejudice from the procedure,<sup>13</sup> we turn to the merits.

* * *

---

COMMENT

1. After the court of appeals decision, the Illinois Citizens Committee asked to have a rehearing en banc (a rehearing by the full court rather than just a panel of the court). The court of appeals denied the committee's request for a rehearing. Chief Judge Bazelon would have granted a rehearing en banc. In a long opinion explaining his vote in favor of a rehearing, Judge Bazelon challenged the majority's

---

12. 47 U.S.C.A. § 503(b)(2) (1970) calls for a "written notice of apparent liability" that contains specific information as to the act or omission with which the licensee is "charged" before forfeiture liability can be imposed. [Emphasis added.]

13. The petitioners contend that the language of § 503(b)(1)(E), which authorizes the commission to impose a forfeiture on any licensee who "violates section * * * 1464 of Title 18," contemplates that the FCC may act only after the licensee has been convicted under § 1464 in a criminal proceeding. That issue involves the rights of the licensee, rather than the rights of the public, and is appropriately raised only by the licensee. See text, p. 909.

distinction between substantive and procedural issues in the standing rights of citizen groups.

2. Judge Bazelon suggested that the court's limitation of citizen group standing in the case to substantive as opposed to procedural issues was at odds with whole course of the law since United Church of Christ I:

The legality of listener standing is so well accepted that the point is never raised in present FCC litigation. * * * [L]isteners have been implicitly granted standing to challenge just about every form of FCC program regulation or of licensee programming activity.

3. Taking a contrary view, Judge Leventhal filed a supplemental opinion in order to respond to the claim of the Illinois Citizens Committee and the ACLU in their petition for rehearing that the court was "insensitive to their role as representatives of the listening public." In defense of the court, Judge Leventhal declared:

We do contemplate that representatives of the public have a role in FCC proceedings concerning obscenity determinations—as is indicated by our recognition that they have standing to challenge the substantive grounds of commission action even where the licensee is willing to pay the forfeiture and thus acquiesces in the commission's determination. We are cited to no Supreme Court case that goes this far in a situation where the producer or distributor directly affected has acquiesced. However, we found such a requirement implicit in the contours of the statute, a procedural right that furthers the substantive rights of the public under the First Amendment.

The Petition to Deny and the Citizens Group: HALE v. FCC

1. Suppose a citizens group is dissatisfied with the job a broadcast licensee has been doing. What can it do? If another applicant applies for a license, the citizens group can enter the renewal proceeding as a result of the United Church of Christ decision. But if there is no hearing in which to participate, what can a citizens group do then? It can file a petition to deny with the FCC, requesting that the incumbent's license renewal application be denied. But a denial of a license renewal application will hardly be granted without a hearing, and a petition to deny does not usually lead to the grant of a hearing.

In Hale v. FCC, 425 F.2d 556 (D.C.Cir. 1970), two citizens of Salt Lake City challenged the license renewal application of an AM radio station in Salt Lake City, KSL-AM. KSL is wholly owned by the Mormon church as is one of the daily newspapers in Salt Lake City, the Deseret News.

The Salt Lakers seeking to defeat the license renewal application waged a tough battle for a hearing. Without a hearing, the citizens said, the testimony, both on direct and cross-examination, which would show the poor programming response by the licensee to community needs, would be difficult to obtain. Proof of the actual programming presented by KSL was made particularly difficult for the licensee because KSL did not even publish its daily program log in any Salt Lake daily newspaper.

The FCC adamantly refused to grant a hearing on the matter because the commission interprets § 309(d) and (e) of the Federal Communications Act to require a hearing only when the petition to deny reveals a substantial issue of fact requiring a resolution by hearing. Of course, the whole thing was a triumph of circular reasoning. Without a hearing the citizens group found it nearly impossible to show the material issue of fact concerning the licensee's performance which alone would produce a hearing.

The citizens took the FCC to court for its refusal to grant them a hearing. In a decision which sharply reduced the potential effectiveness of the petition to deny, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia affirmed the FCC determination not to grant a hearing. The case is an excellent illustration of the type of difficulty citizens groups experience in obtaining a hearing from the FCC through a petition to deny.

The two citizens fighting the license renewal application of KSL-AM raised two objections to the station's past performance. One objection related to whether KSL had complied with the fairness doctrine. The second objection concerned whether "KSL-AM is part of a business conglomerate so constituted as to create an undue concentration of business and broadcasting influence in the Salt Lake City area communications market." The citizens contended that both issues required the "illumination of a hearing." The court of appeals, like the FCC, did not agree.

2. On the concentration of ownership issue, the court of appeals again concluded that the allegations were insufficient to show a material issue of fact requiring a hearing:

Appellants do assert that this particular concentration has had ill effects on the communications media in Salt Lake City, and is thus not in the public interest. But here again, to merit a hearing under Section 309(e), appellants must go beyond generalization and allege some specific instances of injury in the immediate context of the intervenor's operations, not merely that it is unwise for newspapers to be under common ownership with radio and television interests, and for both to be part of a broader business combine. In two recent opinions, involving the license renewals of WCCO-AM and KRON-FM, the commission designated the renewal applications for hearing after the parties protesting the renewals had alleged, in the case of WCCO, that the conglomerate was using the economic power of its newspaper to obtain unique sports events broadcasting rights for its television station and, in effect, to subsidize advertising for its television station; and in the case of KRON, that the conglomerate was using the economic power of its television station to subsidize the subscription campaigns of its newspaper. Appellants here have not made such specific allegations.

The court in Hale concluded that in view of complainants' nonspecific showing, there was no basis "for ad hoc action against the licensee on grounds of undue concentration of control of media of mass communications." The court added:

"Rather, any actions in this area as to a licensee such as this would be appropriate only in the context of overall rule-making proceedings. In this connection we point out the outstanding inquiry on conglomerate ownership and the specific rule-making proceeding, FCC Docket No. 18110."

3. Petitions to deny are sometimes used to pressure stations into making changes particularly in the areas of personnel practices and minority programming policies. In view of the difficulties in obtaining a hearing on a license renewal, citizen groups sometimes file petitions to deny for their n terrorem effect and then bargain (often very successfully) privately and directly with the stations involved. If the citizens group requests are granted, the petition to deny is withdrawn. Sometimes the citizens group bargains with the broadcaster first, usually just before renewal time, keeping the threat of filing a petition to deny in reserve for leverage. What criticisms would you make of these developments? What suggestions for corrections? See Barron, "The Citizen Group At Work," Freedom of the Press for Whom? 233-248 (1973).

4. The FCC has set forth standards which, within limits, generally allow broadcasters to enter into agreements with citizen groups. See In the Matter of Agreements Between Broadcast Licensees and the Public, 57 FCC2d 42 (1975). The FCC made it clear that "a licensee is not obliged to undertake negotiations or agreements." If a licensee does enter into an agreement with citizens, the FCC stressed that "(t)he obligation to determine how to serve the public interest is personal to each licensee and may not be delegated, even if the licensee wishes to." The FCC warned that agreements should "not take responsibility for making public interest decisions out of the hands of a licensee."

PROBLEMS OF RENEWAL AND DIVERSIFICATION OF OWNERSHIP

The Multiple Ownership Rules and the One-to-a-Market Rule

1. The FCC's so-called multiple ownership rules create a conclusive presumption that nationwide ownership by a single party of more than seven AM, seven FM radio stations or seven television stations (of which no more than five may be VHF) is in itself contrary to the public interest. Moreover, the FCC prohibits the grant of a license of the same type of facility to anyone already holding such a license in a given community. In other words, if one already holds one AM radio station license in Middletown, Connecticut, one cannot acquire a license for another such AM radio station in Middletown. See 47 C.F.R. §§ 73.35, 73.240, and 73.636. See also, Multiple Ownership of AM, FM and TV Stations, 18 FCC 288 (1953), affirmed United States v. Storer Broadcasting Co., 351 U.S. 192 (1956). In September 1983, the FCC announced a proposed rule-making designed to either repeal or at least relax the so-called initial "Rule of Sevens," ie. the multiple-ownership rules. See Broadcasting, Sept. 26, 1983, p. 27.

Do you see any connection between the "balanced programming" concept, the "fairness" doctrine, and the rules designed to diversify ownership of broadcasting stations?

The multiple ownership rules have been criticized in the past for focusing on each type of electronic medium separately. Originally, under the multiple ownership rules, the same individual was permitted to own an AM station, an FM station, and a TV station—all in the same community. Do you see how this was possible? For discussion on this point and on the multiple ownership rules generally, see Note, Diversification and the Public Interest: Administrative Responsibility of the FCC, 66 Yale L.J. 365, 370-373 (1957).

In 1970, the FCC prohibited the "common ownership, operation, or control of more than one unlimited-time broadcast station in the same area, regardless of the type of broadcast service involved." First Report and Order, Multiple Ownership of Standard, FM & TV Broadcast Stations, 22 FCC2d 306 (1970). This rule is known popularly as the one-to-a-market rule. The rule has not done much to alter concentration of ownership in the media since the FCC specifically exempted existing AM, FM, and TV combinations because of the disruptive effects of a divestiture order. See First Report And Order, supra, 22 FCC2d 306 at 323 (1970).

Although no specific provision in the Federal Communications Act of 1934 deals materially with the concentration of ownership problems in broadcasting, the multiple ownership rules have been held to lie within the administrative discretion of the FCC under the broad purposes of the act. See United States v. Storer Broadcasting Co., 351 U.S. 192 (1956).

In March 1971, the FCC amended the so-called one-to-a-market rule so that the rule will apply only to combinations of VHF television stations with radio stations in the same market. The amendment to the one-to-a-market rule will permit AM and FM radio stations in the same market to be under common ownership. See In The Matter of Amendment of Sections 73.-

35, 73.240, and 73.636 of the Commission's Rules Relating to Multiple Ownership of Standard, FM and Television Broadcast Stations, 28 FCC2d 662 (1971). The FCC Memorandum Opinion order supporting the Amendment defends the Amendment on the following grounds:

In * * * most cases existing AM-FM combinations in the same area may be economically and/or technically interdependent. * * * We therefore adopted rules permitting the assignment or transfer of combined AM-FM stations to a single party if a showing was made that established the interdependence of such stations and the impracticability of selling and operating them as separate stations. In so doing, we observed that although this would not foster our objective of increasing diversity, it would prevent the possible closing down of many FM stations, which could only decrease diversity.

2. In its decision to lift the prohibition against AM-FM radio common ownership in the same market, the FCC observed that its "official position" is that the paramount problem in securing diversification of control of mass media is that of cross-ownership of television stations and newspapers. The reasons for this doubtless is the consistency with which major markets reveal a pattern where a VHF network-affiliated television station is presently owned by a newspaper in the same market.

3. The one-to-a-market rule applies only to new common ownership situations, does not apply to existing licensees, and does not apply to newspapers. In justification the FCC pointed out in the AM-FM combination exception proceeding, 28 FCC2d 662 (1971), that the whole point of the one-to-a-market rules was to produce more diversity of programming and viewpoints over the broadcast media. The rules did not "contemplate any action with regard to cross-ownership of newspapers and broadcast facilities." But the FCC conceded that problems of divestiture and newspaper cross-ownership gave the FCC pause. The commission further conceded that perhaps it should have adopted rules on these subjects in connection with the "one-to-a-market" proceeding. The FCC then concluded:

We considered it the better course to issue a further notice concerning them [divestiture and newspaper cross-ownership] because of the far reaching ramifications of any rules that might be adopted on these subjects and in order to develop additional information about them.

The further notice the FCC is referring to here is the announcement the FCC made simultaneous with the promulgation of the one-to-a-market rule of the initiation of a rule-making proceeding to consider whether it would be in the public interest to require divestiture by newspapers or multiple owners in a given market. See Further Notice of Proposed Rulemaking, Multiple Ownership of Standard, FM and TV Broadcast Stations, 22 FCC2d 339 (1970). This proceeding culminated in FCC v. National Citizens Committee for Broadcasting, 436 U.S. 775 (1978), text, p. 959.

---

MANSFIELD JOURNAL CO. v. FCC

180 F.2D 28 (D.C.CIR.1950).

WASHINGTON, Circuit Judge.

* * *

The facts are as follows: The Mansfield Journal is the sole newspaper in the town of Mansfield, Ohio. The only other medium of mass communication in Mansfield is radio station WMAN, which is under different ownership than the newspaper and competes with it for local advertising. The commission found that the Mansfield Journal used its position as sole newspaper in the community to coerce its advertisers to enter into exclusive advertising contracts with the newspaper and to refrain from utilizing station WMAN for advertising purposes. It did this by refusing to permit certain advertisers, who also use the radio to sell their products, to secure regular advertising contracts or to place any advertisements in the newspaper whatever. The commission found further that Mansfield Journal had demonstrated a marked hostility to station WMAN by declining to publish WMAN's program log and by failing to print any comments about the station unless unfavorable. The commission concluded that such actions were taken with the intent and for the purpose of suppressing competition and of securing a monopoly of mass advertising and news dissemination, and that such practices were likely to continue and be reenforced by the acquisition of a radio station.

* * *

The commission has determined in the instant case that it is contrary to the public interest to grant a [broadcast] license to a newspaper which has attempted to suppress competition in advertising and news dissemination. * * * Appellant argues that this amounts to enforcement of the antitrust laws. But whether appellant has been guilty of a violation of these laws is not here in issue. The fact that a policy against monopoly has been made the subject of criminal sanction by Congress as to certain activities does not preclude an administrative agency charged with furthering the public interest from holding the general policy of Congress to be applicable to questions arising in the proper discharge of its duties. Whether Mansfield's activities do or do not amount to a positive violation of law, and neither this court nor the Federal Communications Commission is determining that question, they still may impair Mansfield's ability to serve the public. Thus, whether Mansfield's competitive practices were legal or illegal, in the strict sense, is not conclusive here. Monopoly in the mass communication of news and advertising is contrary to the public interest, even if not in terms proscribed by the antitrust laws.

It may be that appellant is contending that if the commission's findings of fact were correct, then appellant has violated the antitrust laws, and that in such case the commission is without jurisdiction to consider these matters. There is no merit in such a contention. It is provided in the Federal Communications Act itself that the Federal Communications Commission may refuse a license to any person who "has been finally adjudged guilty by a Federal court of unlawfully monopolizing or attempting unlawfully to monopolize, radio communication, directly or indirectly * * * or to have been using unfair methods of competition." 47 U.S.C.A. § 311. The Mansfield Journal has not been convicted of any such violation. But the statute does not for that reason place the Journal's past conduct with regard to monopoly and the antitrust laws beyond the consideration of the commission.

* * *

* * * We hold, therefore, that it was fully within the commission's jurisdiction to hear evidence on the alleged monopolistic practices of the appellant, regardless of whether or not such practices were specifically forbidden by statute, and to deny the licenses upon its finding that such practices had in fact taken place and were likely to carry over into the operation of the radio station.

Appellant contends that to deny it a license because it has refused to carry the log of station WMAN, or because it has refused to permit certain people to advertise, is to impinge upon the freedom of the press. We think that the appellant misconceives the commission's holding. The commission did not deny the license merely because the newspaper refused to print certain items or because it refused to serve certain advertisers, but rather because the commission concluded that those practices were followed for the purpose of suppressing competition. Similarly, it would appear that Mansfield was not denied a license because it was a newspaper, but because it used its position as sole newspaper in the community to achieve a monopoly in advertising and news dissemination. Such a denial does not constitute a violation of the First Amendment.

* * *

With regard to (the case) in which the Lorain Journal was denied a license for an AM station [342 U.S. 143 (1951); see this text, p.—]: The denial was predicated on the grounds that there is a complete common ownership and common control of the Lorain and Mansfield Journals, and that the same control which cannot be entrusted with a radio station in Mansfield cannot be entrusted with a radio station in Lorain, as it is likely to abuse its power in either situation. While these two newspapers were separate corporations, with separate editorial staffs, and located in communities more than fifty miles apart, the record shows that one family owns all of the stock in both corporations and that the owners took a very active part in the control and policy formulation of the newspapers. We think the commission was entitled to ascertain, and base its findings upon, the true locus of control. It could properly conclude that what had occurred in Mansfield was indicative of what might occur under similar circumstances in Lorain.

This is not to disregard the fact that the two newspaper companies conduct separate businesses. It is rather to recognize that the true applicant in each of these cases is the same individual, or group of individuals, and that the commission is empowered to consider the conduct and history of the applicant before deciding to grant the benefits represented by a broadcasting license.

* * *

Upon examination of the record we find no reversible error. The decisions of the Federal Communications Commission in all three cases are therefore affirmed.

---

COMMENT

1. Antitrust prosecution and conviction of the defendants in the principal case did in fact, eventually occur. As a result, the FCC denied the license application of the Lorain Journal Co. Under § 313 of the Federal Communications Act the FCC is directed to refuse a license "to any person whose license has been revoked by a court." 47 U.S.C.A. § 313 (1964). Does such an explicit statutory provision argue for or against the result reached by the court in the Mansfield Journal case?

2. The facts of the Mansfield Journal case revealed the inadequacy of the multiple ownership rules. They were entirely silent as to cross-media ownership. In other words, there was nothing in them to prohibit the acquisition by the only newspaper in a community of that community's only television station. Was the reason for this omission grounded on the fact that newspapers are not licensed and are not under the jurisdiction of the FCC?

3. While the FCC can, as seen in the Mansfield Journal case, consider antitrust policy when it makes a determination of whether "the public interest, convenience, or necessity" is served by granting or renewing a broadcast license, it is also clear that the broadcast industry is not itself exempt from the antitrust laws as a "regulated industry." In United States v. Radio Corp. of America, 358 U.S. 334 (1959), the Court rejected the argument made by RCA and its subsidiary, NBC, that FCC approval of the exchange of an NBC-owned station in Cleveland for one in Philadelphia barred the Justice Department's antitrust attack on that exchange. The Court held that since the broadcast industry was not regulated as a common carrier or a public utility, "there [is] no pervasive regulatory scheme, and no rate structure to throw out of balance, [so] sporadic action by federal courts can work no mischief."

For a discussion of antitrust problems as they relate to the newspaper press, see text, Chapter VIII, p. 637.

The WHDH Case

The WHDH case is a milestone in broadcasting law since it represents the denial by the FCC of an application for a license renewal by an established and presently operating licensee which was a party to a broadcast-newspaper combination in the same city.

IN THE MATTER OF WHDH, INC.

16 FCC2D 1 (1969).

Commissioner BARTLEY for the commission.

Our basic disagreement with the examiner's conclusions lies in the preferred status which he gave to WHDH "not because it is an applicant for renewal but because it has an operating record and its very existence as a functioning, manned station to advance against its opponents, whose promises, after all, are as yet just so much talk." Thus, the examiner decided that the traditional mode of comparing mutually exclusive applicants, "in the mechanical or point-by-point manner especially advocated by BBI" [a competitive applicant], would have been a sterile exercise. In his judgment, the cardinal probative attribute—for good or bad—of WHDH was its operating record.

* * *

With regard to WHDH's past broadcast record, Examiner Sharfman concluded ultimately that as a whole such record is favorable. The superiority of WHDH's claims to renewal against those of its competitors for initial authorization, the examiner stated, rests on a basis of achievement, theirs on promises, often glittering, but of relatively uncertain and unestablished validity.

In our judgment, the examiner's approach to this proceeding places an extraordinary and improper burden upon new applicants who wish to demonstrate that their proposals, when considered on a comparative basis, would better serve the public interest. In fairness to the examiner, it should be pointed out that he followed what he understood to be the commission's policy in proceedings of this nature, as expressed in Hearst Radio, Inc. (WBAL), 6 R.R. 994 (1951), and Wabash Valley Broadcasting Corp. (WTHI-TV), 35 FCC 677, R.R.2d 573 (1963). Thus, in Hearst the determining factor in the commission's decision was "the clear advantage of continuing the established and excellent service * * * [of the existing station] when compared to the risks attendant on the execution of the proposed programming of * * * [the new applicant] excellent though the proposal may be."

* * *

As noted in the policy statement, diversification is a factor of first significance since it constitutes a primary objective in the commission's licensing scheme. The benefits derived from diversification have been set forth in many cases decided by the courts and by the commission, and they need not be recited in detail here. When compared with Charles River and BBI, WHDH manifestly ranks a poor third because of its ownership of a powerful standard broadcast station, an FM station, and a newspaper in the city of Boston itself. While it is true that the existence of numerous other media in Boston in which WHDH has no ownership interest may not be ignored and does somewhat diminish the weight to be accorded the preferences to Charles River and BBI on local diversification, nonetheless those preferences are quite significant here. A grant to either Charles River or BBI would clearly result in a maximum diffusion of control of the media of mass communications as compared with a grant of the renewal application of WHDH. A new voice would be brought to the Boston community as compared with continuing the service of WHDH-TV. We believe that the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources is in the public interest, and this principle will be significantly advanced by a grant of either the Charles River or the BBI application.

* * *

Although conceding that it has never editorialized, WHDH contends that this is a factor which minimizes any question of concentration of control flowing from the common ownership of newspaper and broadcast interests. We disagree with this contention. Licensees have an obligation to devote a reasonable amount of their broadcast time to the presentation of programs on controversial issues of public importance to their communities. Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, 13 FCC 1246 (1949). If anything, the failure to editorialize demonstrates the wisdom of the commission's policy in favor of a maximum diffusion of control of the media of mass communications.

* * *

Both Charles River and BBI must be preferred to WHDH under the diversification and integration criteria. In addition, a demerit attaches to the WHDH applicant because of the unauthorized transfers of control which have occurred.

* * *

Dissenting statement of Commissioner Robert E. LEE.

* * *

* * * The majority here holds in effect that the weight to be afforded the comparative factors in a renewal application is the same as a new application. I believe that the weight to be given such evidence is substantially reduced in view of the renewal applicant's existing track record. To hold otherwise would permit a new applicant to submit a "blue sky" proposal tailor-made to secure every comparative advantage while the existing licensee must reap the demerits of hand-to-hand combat in the business world, and the community it serves. * * * Vast expenditures for facilities and good will have been made (by the renewal applicant) which it would be inequitable to declare forfeited unless the licensee has operated against the public interest.

* * *

Concurring statement of Commissioner Nicholas JOHNSON.

* * * In America's eleven largest cities there is not a single network-affiliated VHF television station that is independently and locally owned. They are all owned by the networks, multiple station owners, or major local newspapers. The decision not to award Channel 5 to the Herald-Traveler is supported by good and sufficient reasons beyond the desire to promote diversity of media ownership in Boston. And I take no present position on the merits of continued newspaper ownership of broadcasting properties in markets where there is competing media. But I do think it is healthy to have at least one station among these politically powerful 33 network-affiliated properties in the major markets that is truly locally owned, and managed independently of the other major local mass media. * * * Nor is the significance of this case limited to the impact on media ownership in Boston. For the commission also speaks generally of situations in which a new competitor is seeking the right to broadcast as against a present broadcast license holder. We suggest that the standards at renewal time ought to be the same standards that would prevail if all applicants were new applicants. * * *

COMMENT

1. In the Policy Statement on Comparative Broadcast Hearings, 5 P. & F. Radio Reg. 1901 (1965), the FCC emphasized maximum diffusion of control of the media of communications as a factor in selecting among competing applicants for the same facilities. The FCC also announced in the policy statement that it would be interested in full participation in station operation by the owner and in participation in civic affairs. The court also insisted that broadcast experience would be a factor, but that broadcast experience was not the same as a past broadcast record since, otherwise, newcomers would be unduly discouraged. The commission also renewed its support for the programming criteria set out in the Report and Statement of Policy Re: Commission en banc Programming Inquiry, 20 P. & F. Radio Reg. 1901 (1960) and declared that these criteria would still apply.

The commission opinion in the WHDH case strongly relies on the Policy Statement on Comparative Broadcast Hearings which had emphasized that the FCC was going to award a new degree of decisiveness to diffusion of control of the mass media in awarding broadcast licenses in comparative hearings.

2. On its broadest interpretation WHDH could mean those holding broadcast licenses, no matter how long they have been in business and how routinely their licenses have been renewed in the past, have no special claim to renewal. It is this broad interpretation which horrified Commissioner Robert E. Lee. On a narrower interpretation of its ruling, the WHDH case could be read to hold that where the applicant has substantial ownership interests in other media in the same community, his license renewal application may be denied if new applicants lacking such cross-media connections are the competing applicants for the same license. The broadcast industry did not react to the uncertainties of the WHDH decision calmly. The industry looked to Congress for an end to the insecurity the decision posed for renewal of existing broadcast licenses.

On January 15, 1970, the FCC came in with the new 1970 Policy Statement on Renewals. Under the policy statement, where there is a hearing in which an applicant seeks the license of an incumbent licensee, the incumbent shall be preferred if he can demonstrate substantial past performance not characterized by serious deficiencies. In such circumstances the incumbent "will be preferred over the newcomer and his application for renewal will be granted." The choice of the new criterion for renewal, "substantial service to the public," rather than, say, choosing the applicant deemed most likely to render the best possible service, was justified by the FCC on the basis of "considerations of predictability and stability." It was feared that if there was no stability in the industry, if licenses were truly up for grabs every three years, it would not be possible for a station to render even substantial service. See Policy Statement On Comparative Hearings Involving Regular Renewal Applicants, 22 FCC2d 424 (1970).

If the investment of the broadcaster were not given protection, the FCC warned, there would "be an inducement to the opportunist who might seek a license and then provide the barest minimum of service which would permit short run maximization of profit, on the theory that the license might be terminated whether he rendered a good service or not."

Professor Hyman Goldin of Boston University's School of Public Communication said the crucial flaw in the 1970 policy statement was the FCC's failure to give any meaning to the "substantial service" requirement. See Goldin, 'Spare the Golden Goose'—The Aftermath of WHDH in FCC License Renewal Policy, 83 Harvard L.Rev. 1014 (1970). What definition of "substantial service" would you suggest? What should its components be? Community involvement and quality programming for children are components suggested by Professor Goldin.

If the FCC and the broadcast industry thought the attack on automatic renewals of broadcast licenses had been outflanked by the 1970 policy statement, they were taking comfort prematurely. For one thing, the FCC's decision in the WHDH case was affirmed by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia on November 13, 1970. Greater Boston Television Corp. v. FCC, 444 F.2d 841 (D.C. Cir.1970). It is true that Judge Leventhal, who wrote the opinion, emphasized that the 1970 policy statement was not involved in the case since it specifically stated it did not apply to "unusual cases" like WHDH where the renewal applicant, for unique reasons, is treated like a new applicant. But a basic fact remained: the FCC's dramatic decision to take away a television station from an incumbent newspaper-affiliated licensee had been affirmed by the United States Court of Appeals. The de facto automatic renewal process had been dealt a body blow.<sup>10</sup>

Additionally, Judge Leventhal's opinion in WHDH fully approved the preference that the FCC gave to the diversification of control of media of mass communication criterion in the WHDH proceeding. In other words, the FCC had been authorized, in the Court's opinion, to choose a non-newspaper-affiliated applicant in a contest between it and a newspaper-affiliated incumbent. This endorsement of the diversification policy was an indication of rising judicial dissatisfaction with the FCC's automatic renewal policy, a disenchantment given vivid expression in Judge Burger's decision in United Church of Christ II. See text, p. 942.

WHDH argued on appeal that the Red Lion decision pulled the rug out from under the FCC's "pretentious policy statement justification of its 'diversity' criterion." WHDH thought that the Red Lion stress on the need for access had rendered diversification of control of media unnecessary. Judge Leventhal responded that the Red Lion doctrine and diversification of control policy both were proper means to serve the goal of diversity of viewpoint.

The Citizens Communication Center Case: The Renewal Controversy Renewed

Citizen groups, the Citizens Communication Center, and BEST (Black Efforts for Soul in Television) challenged the legality of the 1970 policy statement.

The citizen groups prevailed, and on June 11, 1970, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia directed the FCC to stop applying the policy statement. The FCC order refusing to institute rule-making proceedings was reversed. See Citizens Communication Center v. FCC, 447 F.2d 1201 (D.C.Cir.1971).

The successful citizens groups had won on a three-pronged argument. First, the Ashbacker rule requiring a comparative hearing for mutually exclusive applicants was violated by depriving an applicant of such a hearing if the incumbent made a showing of substantial service. See Ashbacker Radio Corp. v. FCC, 326 U.S. 327 (1945). Further, the policy statement was unlawful because it deprived a competing applicant of a hearing in violation of § 309(c) of the Federal Communications Act. Second, the policy statement was attacked on the ground that it violated the

10. As a result of the WHDH case, the Boston Herald-Traveler found it could not go it alone. As a result, the Herald-Traveler, which had been financially dependent upon WHDH, merged with the Record-American. Paradoxically, as a result of WHDH, Boston had one less daily newspaper voice. Was this cause for reconsideration of a policy aimed against cross-ownership? Indeed it had that effect, and WHDH would come to be considered an aberration.

Administrative Procedure Act. Thirdly, the policy statement was successfully attacked on the ground that the decision unlawfully chilled the exercise of First Amendment rights.

The tremors the Citizens Communication Center case sent through the broadcast industry rivaled the FCC's WHDH decision of January 1969. The unwritten rule of automatic renewal for the broadcast incumbent was once more under attack.

Communications lawyers in Washington read with particular care footnotes 35 and 36 of Judge Wright's decision in the Citizens Communication Center case. See Broadcasting, June 21, 1971. Footnote 35 said licensees rendering "superior service" ought to be renewed, otherwise the public will suffer. What is necessary, therefore, is to define "superior service." Wright suggested some criteria, i.e., avoidance of excessive advertising, quality programming, and whether the incumbent reinvests his profits "to the service of the viewing and listening public." Do you see any dangers in replacing a "superior service" standard with a "substantial service" standard? Isn't the key factor the FCC attitude toward the renewal process?

Footnote 36 of the decision appeared to indicate that the "public interests" requirement of the Federal Communications Act would prohibit any standard for making judgments in renewals which did not give a chance of entry to broadcasting to new interests and racial minorities. Can you formulate a standard which would do this? Is it possible that Judge Wright's preference for a "superior service" standard could be used to frustrate concern over the fact that then "only a dozen of 7500 broadcast licenses issued are owned by racial minorities?"

In the exhaustive study of the comparative hearing procedure presented by the court in the Citizens Communication Center case, one of the most salient points made by Wright was his observation (Footnote 28) that the FCC had in effect "abolished the comparative hearing mandated by § 309(a) and (e) and converted the comparative hearing into a petition-to-deny proceeding." Do you see why Judge Wright said this?

Although Judge Wright spoke kindly of a "superior service" standard, presently there is no such standard. As the Citizens Communication Center decision stands, therefore, the renewal applicant enjoys no particular advantage in the renewal process.

The issue of diversification of media ownership received considerable attention in the Citizens Communication Center case. This scrutiny was significant because it meant that the efforts of broadcast owners with newspaper affiliations to escape the WHDH ruling on the cross-newspaper ownership point were dealt a heavy blow.

The FCC decided not to seek a rehearing of the Citizens Communication Center case from the full nine-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals. As the decision stands, the FCC is reported to believe that the Citizens Communication Center decision leaves the FCC with considerable discretion over the renewal process. Broadcasting, July 5, 1971.

The Reaction to the CCC Case

1. Since the 1970 policy statement was invalidated in the Citizens Communication Center case, the FCC has moved warily with regard to promulgating new guidelines for the renewal process.

2. The FCC reaction to the CCC case was quite analogous to the FCC reaction to United Church of Christ I. In Moline Television Corp., 31 FCC2d 263 (1971), the incumbent licensee was granted renewal even though the incumbent had not provided superior programming and the competing applicant offered superior programming proposals and greater integration of ownership.

3. Shortly after the CCC case, the FCC issued a statement interpreting the significance the CCC case would have in the ongoing FCC proceeding regarding the implementation of policies in broadcast renewals. In the Matter of Formulation of Policies Relating to the Broadcast Renewal Applicant, Stemming from the Comparative Hearing Process, FCC 71-826, August 4, 1971. The FCC gave the following interpretation to the CCC decision:

We recognize that particular labels can be misleading. Thus, we used the term "substantial service" in the sense of "strong, solid" service—substantially above the mediocre service which might just minimally warrant renewal (see 22 FCC2d at p. 425, n. 1). We believe that the Court may have read this use of "substantial" service as meaning minimal service meeting the public interest standard and therefore employed the term "superior" service to make clear that it had in mind a contrast with mediocre service—as it put it, a "lapse into mediocrity, to seek the protection of the crowd." In short, we believe that it is unnecessary to further refine the label. What rather counts are the guidelines actually adopted to indicate the "plus of major significance"—the type of service which, if achieved, is of such nature that one can " * * * reasonably expect renewal."

4. Was the FCC really saying that "superior service" and "substantial service" are the same thing? Was this consistent with the court's reaction in the CCC case to the substantial service criterion? The real thrust of the foregoing excerpt was to re-establish the process of virtually automatic renewal for the incumbent licensee. If superior service, as defined by Judge Wright, were to be required before an incumbent licensee would be renewed, then routine renewal for the broadcast licensee would, of course, by no means be a certainty.

The FCC did not appeal the CCC decision to the Supreme Court. In the light of the FCC's substantial-equals-superior pronouncement stated above, was it reasonable that the FCC decided it would rather "interpret" the CCC decision than appeal it and risk having the decision resoundly affirmed?

5. In Fidelity Television Inc. v. FCC, 515 F.2d 684 (D.C.Cir. 1975), cert. den. 423 U.S. 926 (1975), an incumbent licensee whose past performance was judged to be "average" (rather than the "substantial" performance needed to earn a "plus of major significance") was renewed against a challenger. While the challenger did not particularly impress the FCC either, the challenger did have a comparative advantage over the incumbent in terms of diversification of ownership interests. Nevertheless, the FCC renewed the incumbent's license, and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court per Judge Davis declared:

On the whole, it is fair to say that the commission found that the ultimate effect of its analysis of the record was that Fidelity and RKO were essentially equally poor contenders—or, at the best, both were minimally acceptable applicants. While the agency was under no obligation to give the license to either competitor, we cannot say that it committed legal error when, in its attitude as of the times pertinent in this case, it took the view that "minimal service is to be preferred to no service at all." * * * There is no need here to expand on "renewal expectancies." We are not faced with a situation where a superior applicant is denied a license because to give it to him would work a "forfeiture" of his opponent's investment. We merely confirm what we intimated in the Greater Boston Television Corp. case—that, when faced with a fairly and evenly balanced record, the [c]ommission may, on the basis of the renewal applicant's past performance, award him the license.

See also Standards For Substantial Program Service, 43 R.R.2d 278 (FCC 1978).

6. In a 1977 report and order the FCC terminated its inquiry into comparative renewal criteria to be used in determining whether a new applicant or the incumbent licensee should be chosen at renewal time. Although it said that its preference was that Congress should abolish the comparative renewal process,<sup>11</sup> the FCC decided that until Congress chose to act on this suggestion it would act on a case-by-case basis.<sup>12</sup> The past performance of the incumbent licensee would continue to be examined. "[T]he licensee's responsiveness to the ascertained problems and needs of its community, including minority * * * concerns, remains central." But the FCC emphasized that in making decisions at renewal time "there is no 'formula of general application' that can be applied to all cases."

See In the Matter of Formulation of Policies Relating to the Broadcast Renewal Applicant, Stemming from the Comparative Hearing Process, 66 FCC2d 419 (1977).

The court of appeals decision affirming the FCC's WHDH decision was relied on by the FCC in the broadcast renewal applicant report in a manner which revealed how little was left of any likelihood that the FCC's WHDH decision would lead to any real changes in the renewal process: "Where the renewal applicant has served the public interest in such a substantial fashion it will be entitled to the 'legitimate renewal expectancy' clearly 'implicit in the structure of the [Communications] act.' Greater Boston Television Corporation v. FCC. * * *"

The Broadcast Renewal Applicant proceeding was affirmed by the court of appeals in National Black Media Coalition v. FCC, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 1085, 589 F.2d 578 (D.C. Cir. 1978).

The Cross-Ownership Case

The 1978 Supreme Court decision in the cross-ownership case was the denouement of the long but inconsistent effort of the FCC to wrestle with the role newspaper ownership should play in choosing from among the applicants for the licenses of broadcast stations.

In 1975, the FCC set forth its new cross-ownership rules. The substance of the new rules was to prohibit the future licensing or transfer of broadcast stations to those who owned a newspaper in the same community. The new rules were designed to forbid in the future the operation of a broadcast station and a newspaper by a common ownership in the same community. The new rules, however, were not as draconian as this account might indicate. Existing cross-ownership

11. In the Broadcasting Renewal Applicant report and order, the FCC set forth the essence of its reasons for this recommendation: "In November 1976 we therefore recommended to Congress the elimination of comparative renewal hearings, stating: 'Since the earliest broadcast legislation was considered, Congress has favored a competitive, privately run broadcast system operating free of government censorship of program content. On the other hand, we have rightfully viewed broadcasters as public trustees with obligations to serve the public interest and with no vested interest in their assigned frequencies. The optimal balance between these values would produce a renewal process that encourages licensee performance with a minimum of government intrusion into the broadcaster's programming discretion. The possibility of a comparative renewal challenge has been viewed as an incentive operating to spur the broadcaster toward the best possible public service performance. In view of the fact that the comparative process has not and cannot operate effectively for this purpose and since the subjectivity inherent in this process carries with it an ever present threat of undue government intrusion into broadcaster discretion, we believe that the comparative renewal process should be abolished. [Footnotes omitted].'" See Report of the Federal Communications Commission to the Subcommittee of Communications of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce [of the House of Representatives] Re the Comparative Renewal Process, at p. 41.

12. See Ascertainment of Community Problems for Broadcast by Broadcast Applicants, 57 FCC2d 418 (1976).

situations were—with the exception of sixteen communities where the only daily newspaper and the only television station in the community were under common ownership—essentially "grandfathered."

Broadcasters thought the new rules went too far, and citizens groups thought they did not go far enough. On review to the federal court of appeals in Washington, D.C., that court in a notable opinion by Judge Bazelon upheld the new FCC rules in part and reversed them in part. The court upheld the FCC's prospective ban on the future creation of cross-ownership situations in the same community. But the court held that the FCC had erred in "grandfathering" the existing cross-ownership situations. The FCC sought review in the Supreme Court. The Court agreed with the FCC and not with the court of appeals.

---

FCC v. NATIONAL CITIZENS COMMISSION FOR BROADCASTING

3 MED.L.RPTR. 2409, 436 U.S. 775, 98 S.C.T. 2096
56 L.ED.2D 697 (1978).

Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the Court.

At issue in these cases are Federal Communications Commission regulations governing the permissibility of common ownership of a radio or television broadcast station and a daily newspaper located in the same community. Second Report and Order. 50 FCC2d 1046 (1975) (hereinafter cited as Order), as amended upon reconsideration, 53 FCC2d 589 (1975), codified in 47 CFR 73.35, 73.240, 73.636 (1976). The regulations, adopted after a lengthy rulemaking proceeding, prospectively bar formation or transfer of co-located newspaper-broadcast combinations. Existing combinations are generally permitted to continue in operation. However, in communities in which there is common ownership of the only daily newspaper and the only broadcast station, or (where there is more than one broadcast station) of the only daily newspaper and the only television station, divestiture of either the newspaper or the broadcast station is required within five years, unless grounds for waiver are demonstrated.

The questions for decision are whether these regulations either exceed the commission's authority under the Communications Act of 1934, or violate the First or Fifth Amendment rights of newspaper owners; and whether the lines drawn by the commission between new and existing newspaper-broadcast combinations, and between existing combinations subject to divestiture and those allowed to continue in operation, are arbitrary or capricious within the meaning of § 10(e) of the Administrative Procedure Act. For the reasons set forth below, we sustain the regulations in their entirety.

* * *

In setting its licensing policies, the commission has long acted on the theory that diversification of mass media ownership serves the public interest by promoting diversity of program and service viewpoints, as well as by preventing undue concentration of economic power. See e.g., Multiple Ownership of Standard, FM and Television Broadcast Stations, 45 FCC 1476, 1476-1477 (1964). This perception of the public interest has been implemented over the years by a series of regulations imposing increasingly stringent restrictions on multiple ownership of broadcast stations. In the early 1940s, the commission promulgated rules prohibiting ownership or control of more than one station in the same broadcast service (AM radio, FM radio, or television) in the same community. In 1953, limitations were placed on the total number of stations in each service a person or entity may own or control. And in 1970, the commission adopted regulations prohibiting, on a prospective basis, common ownership of a

VHF television station and any radio station serving the same market.

More generally, "[d]iversification of control of the media of mass communications" has been viewed by the commission as "a factor of primary significance" in determining who, among competing applicants in a comparative proceeding, should receive the initial license for a particular broadcast facility. Policy Statement on Comparative Broadcast Hearings, 1 FCC2d 393, 394-395 (1965). Thus, prior to adoption of the regulations at issue here, the fact that an applicant for an initial license published a newspaper in the community to be served by the broadcast station was taken into account on a case-by-case basis and resulted in some instances in awards of licenses to competing applicants.

Diversification of ownership has not been the sole consideration thought relevant to the public interest, however. The commission's other, and sometimes conflicting goal has been to ensure "the best practicable service to the public." To achieve this goal, the commission has weighed factors such as the anticipated contribution of the owner to station operations, the proposed program service, and the past broadcast record of the applicant—in addition to diversification of ownership—in making initial comparative licensing decisions. Moreover, the commission has given considerable weight to a policy of avoiding undue disruption of existing service. As a result, newspaper owners in many instances have been able to acquire broadcast licenses for stations serving the same communities as their newspapers and the commission has repeatedly renewed such licenses on findings that continuation of the service offered by the common owner would serve the public interest.

Against this background, the commission began the instant rulemaking proceeding in 1970 to consider the need for a more restrictive policy toward newspaper ownership of radio and television broadcast stations. Further Notice of Proposed Rulemaking, 22 FCC2d 339 (1970). Citing studies showing the dominant role of television stations and daily newspapers as sources of local news and other information, the notice of rulemaking proposed adoption of regulations that would eliminate all newspaper-broadcast combinations serving the same market, by prospectively banning formation or transfer of such combinations and requiring dissolution of all existing combinations within five years, id., at 346. The commission suggested that the proposed regulations would serve "the purpose of promoting competition among the mass media involved, and maximizing diversification of service sources and viewpoints." At the same time, however, the commission expressed "substantial concern" about the disruption of service that might result from divestiture of existing combinations. * * * The Order * * * explained that the prospective ban on creation of co-located newspaper-broadcast combinations was grounded primarily in First Amendment concerns, while the divestiture regulations were based on both First Amendment and antitrust policies. In addition, the commission rejected the suggestion that it lacked the power to order divestiture, reasoning that the statutory requirement of license renewal every three years necessarily implied authority to order divestiture over a five-year period.

After reviewing the comments and studies submitted by the various parties during the course of the proceeding, the commission then turned to an explanation of the regulations and the justifications for their adoption. The prospective rules, barring formation of new broadcast-newspaper combinations in the same market, as well as transfers of existing combinations to new owners, were adopted without change from the proposal set forth in the notice of rulemaking. While recognizing the pioneering contributions of newspaper owners to the broadcast industry, the commission concluded that changed circumstances made it possible, and necessary, for all new licensing of broadcast stations to "be expected to add to local diversity." In reaching this conclusion, the commission did not find that existing co-located newspaper-broadcast combinations had not served the public interest, or that such combinations necessarily "speak with one voice" or are harmful to competition. In the commission's view, the conflicting studies submitted by the parties concerning the effects of newspaper ownership on competition and station performance were inconclusive, and no pattern of specific abuses by existing cross-owners was demonstrated. The prospective rules were justified, instead, by reference to the commission's policy of promoting diversification of ownership: increases in diversification of ownership would possibly result in enhanced diversity of viewpoints and, given the absence of persuasive countervailing considerations, "even a small gain in diversity" was "worth pursuing."

With respect to the proposed across-the-board divestiture requirement, however, the commission concluded that "a mere hoped for gain in diversity" was not a sufficient justification. Characterizing the divestiture issues as "the most difficult" presented in the proceeding, the Order explained that the proposed rules, while correctly recognizing the central importance of diversity considerations, "may have given too little weight to the consequences which could be expected to attend a focus on the abstract goal alone." Forced dissolution would promote diversity, but it would also cause "disruption for the industry and hardship for individual owners, resulting in losses or diminution of service to the public."

The commission concluded that in light of these countervailing considerations divestiture was warranted only in "the most egregious cases," which it identified as those in which a newspaper-broadcast combination has an "effective monopoly" in the local "marketplace" of ideas as well as economically." The commission recognized that any standards for defining which combinations fell within that category would necessarily be arbitrary to some degree, but "[a] choice had to be made." It thus decided to require divestiture only where there was common ownership of the sole daily newspaper published in a community and either

1. the sole broadcast station providing that entire community with a clear signal, or
2. the sole television station encompassing the entire community with a clear signal.

The Order identified eight television-newspaper and 10 radio-newspaper combinations meeting the divestiture criteria. Waivers of the divestiture requirement were granted sua sponte to one television and one radio combination, leaving a total of 16 stations subject to divestiture. The commission explained that waiver requests would be entertained in the latter cases, but, absent waiver, either the newspaper or the broadcast station would have to be divested by January 1, 1980.

On petitions for reconsideration, the commission reaffirmed the rules in all material respects. Memorandum Opinion and Order, 53 FCC2d 589 (1975).

Various parties * * * petitioned for review of the regulations in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. * * * NAB, ANPA, and the broadcast licensees subject to divestiture argued that the regulations went too far in restricting cross-ownership of newspapers and broadcast stations; NCCB and the Justice Department contended that the regulations did not go far enough and that the commission inadequately justified its decision not to order divestiture on a more widespread basis.

Agreeing substantially with NCCB and the Justice Department, the court of appeals affirmed the prospective ban on new licensing of co-located newspaper-broadcast combinations, but vacated the limited divestiture rules, and ordered the commission to adopt regulations requiring dissolution of all existing combinations that did not qualify for a waiver under the procedure outlined in the Order. 555 F.2d 938 (1977). The court held, first, that the prospective ban was a reasonable means of furthering "the highly valued goal of diversity" in the mass media, and was therefore not without a rational basis. The court concluded further that, since the commission "explained why it considers diversity to be a factor of exceptional importance," and since the commission's goal of promoting diversification of mass media ownership was strongly supported by First Amendment and antitrust policies, it was not arbitrary for the prospective rules to be "based on [the diversity] factor to the exclusion of others customarily relied on by the commission."

The court also held that the prospective rules did not exceed the commission's authority under the Communications Act. The court reasoned that the public interest standard of the act permitted, and indeed required, the commission to consider diversification of mass media ownership in making its licensing decisions, and that the commission's general rule-making authority under 47 U.S.C.A. §§ 303(r) and 154(i) allowed the commission to adopt reasonable license qualifications implementing the public interest standard. The court concluded, moreover, that since the prospective ban was designed to "increas[e] the number of media voices in the community," and not to restrict or control the content of free speech, the ban would not violate the First Amendment rights of newspaper owners.

After affirming the prospective rules, the court of appeals invalidated the limited divestiture requirement as arbitrary and capricious within the meaning of § 10(e) of the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C.A. § 706(2)(A). The court's primary holding was that the commission lacked a rational basis for "grandfathering" most existing combinations while banning all new combinations. The court reasoned that the commission's own diversification policy, as reinforced by First Amendment policies and the commission's statutory obligation to "encourage the larger and more effective use of radio in the public interest 47 U.S.C.A. § 303(g), required the commission to adopt a "presumption" that stations owned by co-located newspapers "do not serve the public interest." The court observed that, in the absence of countervailing policies, this "presumption" would have dictated adoption of an across-the-board divestiture requirement, subject only to waiver "in those cases where the evidence clearly discloses that cross-ownership is in the public interest." The countervailing policies relied on by the commission in its decision were, in the court's view, "lesser policies" which had not been given as much weight in the past as its diversification policy. And "the record [did] not disclose the extent to which divestiture would actually threaten these [other policies]." The court concluded, therefore, that it was irrational for the commission not to give controlling weight to its diversification policy and thus to extend the divestiture requirement to all existing combinations.

The court of appeals held further that, even assuming a difference in treatment between new and existing combinations was justifiable, the commission lacked a rational basis for requiring divestiture in the 16 "egregious" cases while allowing the remainder of the existing combinations to continue in operation. The court suggested that "limiting divestiture to small markets of 'absolute monopoly' squanders the opportunity where divestiture might do the most good," since "[d]ivestiture * * * may be more useful in the larger markets." The court further observed that the record

"[did] not support the conclusion that divestiture would be more harmful in the grandfathered markets than in the 16 affected markets," nor did it demonstrate that the need for divestiture was stronger in those 16 markets. On the latter point, the court noted that, "[a]lthough the affected markets contain fewer voices, the amount of diversity in communities with additional independent voices may in fact be no greater."

The commission, NAB, ANPA, and several cross-owners who had been intervenors below, and whose licenses had been grandfathered under the commission's rules but were subject to divestiture under the court of appeals' decision, petitioned this court for review. We granted certiorari. And we now affirm the judgment of the court of appeals insofar as it upholds the prospective ban and reverse the judgment insofar as it vacates the limited divestiture requirement.

Petitioners NAB and ANPA contend that the regulations promulgated by the commission exceed its statutory rulemaking authority and violate the constitutional rights of newspaper owners. We turn first to the statutory, and then to the constitutional, issues.

* * * NAB contends that, since the act confers jurisdiction on the commission only to regulate "communication by wire or radio." 47 U.S.C.A. § 152(a), it is impermissible for the commission to use its licensing authority with respect to broadcasting to promote diversity in an overall communications market which includes, but is not limited to, the broadcasting industry.

This argument undersells the commission's power to regulate broadcasting in the "public interest." In making initial licensing decisions between competing applicants, the commission has long given "primary significance" to "diversification of control of the media of mass communications," and has denied licenses to newspaper owners on the basis of this policy in appropriate cases. As we have discussed on several occasions, see e.g., the physical scarcity of broadcast frequencies, as well as problems of interference between broadcast signals, led Congress to delegate broad authority to the commission to allocate broadcast licenses in the "public interest." And "[t]he avowed aim of the Communications Act of 1934 was to secure the maximum benefits of radio to all the people of the United States." National Broadcasting Co. v. United States. It was not inconsistent with the statutory scheme, therefore, for the commission to conclude that the maximum benefit to the "public interest" would follow from allocation of broadcast licenses so as to promote diversification of the mass media as a whole.

Our past decisions have recognized, moreover, that the First Amendment and antitrust values underlying the commission's diversification policy may properly be considered by the commission in determining where the public interest lies. "[T]he 'public interest' standard necessarily invites reference to First Amendment principles," Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. v. Democratic Nat. Committee, 412 U.S. 94, 122 (1973), and, in particular, to the First Amendment goal of achieving "the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources," Associated Press v. United States. And, while the commission does not have power to enforce the antitrust laws as such, it is permitted to take antitrust policies into account in making licensing decisions pursuant to the public interest standard.

It is thus clear that the regulations at issue are based on permissible public interest goals and, so long as the regulations are not an unreasonable means for seeking to achieve these goals, they fall within the general rulemaking authority recognized in the Storer Broadcasting and National Broadcasting cases. Petitioner ANPA contends that the prospective rules are unreasonable in two respects: first, the rulemaking record did not conclusively establish that prohibiting common ownership of co-located newspapers and broadcast stations would in fact lead to increases in the diversity of viewpoints among local communications media; and second, the regulations were based on the diversification factor to the exclusion of other service factors considered in the past by the commission in making initial licensing decisions regarding newspaper owners. With respect to the first point, we agree with the court of appeals that, notwithstanding the inconclusiveness of the rulemaking record, the commission acted rationally in finding that diversification of ownership would enhance the possibility of achieving greater diversity of viewpoints. As the court of appeals observed, "[d]iversity and its effects are * * * elusive concepts, not easily defined let alone measured without making qualitative judgments objectionable on both policy and First Amendment grounds." Moreover, evidence of specific abuses by common owners is difficult to compile; "the possible benefits of competition do not lend themselves to detailed forecast." In these circumstances, the commission was entitled to rely on its judgment, based on experience, that "it is unrealistic to expect true diversity from a commonly owned station-newspaper combination. The divergency of their viewpoints cannot be expected to be the same as if they were antagonistically run." * * *, see 555 F.2d at 962.

As to the commission's decision to give controlling weight to its diversification goal in shaping the prospective rules, the Order makes clear that this change in policy was a reasonable administrative response to changed circumstances in the broadcasting industry. The Order explained that, although newspaper owners had previously been allowed, and even encouraged, to acquire licenses for co-located broadcast stations because of the shortage of qualified license applicants, a sufficient number of qualified and experienced applicants other than newspaper owners was now available. In addition, the number of channels open for new licensing had diminished substantially. It had thus become both feasible and more urgent for the commission to take steps to increase diversification of ownership, and a change in the commission's policy toward new licensing offered the possibility of increasing diversity without causing any disruption of existing service. In light of these considerations, the commission clearly did not take an irrational view of the public interest when it decided to impose a prospective ban on new licensing of co-located newspaper-broadcast combinations.

Petitioners NAB and ANPA also argue that the regulations, though designed to further the First Amendment goal of achieving "the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources," Associated Press v. United States, nevertheless violate the First Amendment rights of newspaper owners. We cannot agree, for this argument ignores the fundamental proposition that there is no "unabridgeable First Amendment right to broadcast comparable to the right of every individual to speak, write, or publish." Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S., at 388.

The physical limitations of the broadcast spectrum are well known. Because of problems of interference between broadcast signals, a finite number of frequencies can be used productively; this number is far exceeded by the number of persons wishing to broadcast to the public. In light of this physical scarcity, government allocation and regulation of broadcast frequencies are essential, as we have often recognized. No one here questions the need for such allocation and regulation, and, given that need, we see nothing in the First Amendment to prevent the commission from allocating licenses so as to promote the "public interest" in diversification of the mass communications media.

NAB and ANPA contend, however, that it is inconsistent with the First Amendment to promote diversification by barring a newspaper owner from owning certain broadcasting stations. In support, they point to our statement in Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976), to the effect that "government may [not] restrict the speech of some elements of our society in order to enhance the relative voice of others." As Buckley also recognized, however, "the broadcast media pose unique and special problems not present in the traditional free speech case.'" Id., at 50 n. 55, quoting Columbia Broadcasting System v. Democratic Nat. Committee. Thus efforts to "'enhanc[e] the volume and quality of coverage' of public issues" through regulation of broadcasting may be permissible where similar efforts to regulate the print media would not be. And n. 55, quoting Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC; compare Miami Herald Pub. Co. v. Tornillo. Requiring those who wish to obtain a broadcast license to demonstrate that such would serve the "public interest" does not restrict the speech of those who are denied licenses; rather, it preserves the interests of the "people as a whole * * * in free speech." Red Lion Broadcasting Co. As we stated in Red Lion, "to deny a station license because 'the public interest' requires it 'is not a denial of free speech.'" Quoting National Broadcasting Co. v. United States.

* * *

Finally, petitioners argue that the commission has unfairly "singled out" newspaper owners for more stringent treatment than other license applicants. But the regulations treat newspaper owners in essentially the same fashion as other owners of the major media of mass communications were already treated under the commission's multiple ownership rules; owners of radio stations, television stations, and newspapers alike are now restricted in their ability to acquire licenses for co-located broadcast stations. Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233 (1936), in which this Court struck down a state tax imposed only on newspapers, is thus distinguishable in the degree to which newspapers were singled out for special treatment. In addition, the effect of the tax in Grosjean was "to limit the circulation of information to which the public is entitled," an effect inconsistent with the protection conferred on the press by the First Amendment.

In the instant case, far from seeking to limit the flow of information, the commission has acted, in the court of appeals' words, "to enhance the diversity of information heard by the public without on-going government surveillance of the content of speech." 555 F.2d at 954. The regulations are a reasonable means of promoting the public interest in diversified mass communications; thus they do not violate the First Amendment rights of those who will be denied broadcast licenses pursuant to them. Being forced to "choose among applicants for the same facilities," the commission has chosen on a "sensible basis," one designed to further, rather than contravene, "the system of freedom of expression." T. Emerson, The System of Freedom of Expression 663 (1970).

After upholding the prospective aspect of the commission's regulations, the court of appeals concluded that the commission's decision to limit divestiture to 16 "egregious cases" of "effective monopoly" was arbitrary and capricious within the meaning of the Administrative Procedure Act (APA), § 10(e), 5 U.S.C.A. § 706(2)(A).

* * *

In the view of the court of appeals, the commission lacked a rational basis, first, for treating existing newspaper-broadcast combinations more leniently than combinations that might seek licenses in the future; and, second, even assuming a disinction between existing and new combinations had been justified, for requiring divestiture in the "egregious cases" while allowing all other existing combinations to continue in operation. We believe that the limited divestiture requirement reflects a rational weighing of competing policies, and we therefore reinstate the portion of the commission's order that was invalidated by the court of appeals.

* * *

The commission was well aware that separating existing newspaper-broadcast combinations would promote diversification of ownership. It concluded, however, that ordering widespread divestiture would not result in "the best practicable service to the American public", a goal that the commission has always taken into account and that has been specifically approved by this Court, FCC v. Sanders Bros. Radio Station, 309 U.S. 470 (1940).

In particular, the commission expressed concern that divestiture would cause "disruption for the industry" and "hardship to individual owners," both of which would result in harm to the public interest. Especially in light of the fact that the number of co-located newspaper-broadcast combinations was already on the decline as a result of natural market forces, and would decline further as a result of the prospective rules, the commission decided that across-the-board divestiture was not warranted.

The Order identified several specific respects in which the public interest would or might be harmed if a sweeping divestiture requirement were imposed: the stability and continuity of meritorious service provided by the newspaper owners as a group would be lost; owners who had provided meritorious service would unfairly be denied the opportunity to continue in operation; "economic dislocations" might prevent new owners from obtaining sufficient working capital to maintain the quality of local programming; and local ownership of broadcast stations would probably decrease. We cannot say that the commission acted irrationally in concluding that these public interest harms outweighed the potential gains that would follow from increasing diversification of ownership.

In the past, the commission has consistently acted on the theory that preserving continuity of meritorious service furthers the public interest, both in its direct consequence of bringing proven broadcast service to the public, and in its indirect consequence of rewarding—and avoiding losses to—licensees who have invested the money and effort necessary to produce quality performance. Thus, although a broadcast license must be renewed every three years, and the licensee must satisfy the commission that renewal will serve the public interest, both the commission and the courts have recognized that a licensee who has given meritorious service has a "legitimate renewal expectanc[y]" that is "implicit in the structure of the Act" and should not be destroyed absent good cause. Greater Boston Television Corp. v. FCC. Accordingly, while diversification of ownership is a relevant factor in the context of license renewal as well as initial licensing, the commission has long considered the past performance of the incumbent as the most important factor in deciding whether to grant license renewal and thereby to allow the existing owner to continue in operation. Even where an incumbent is challenged by a competing applicant who offers greater potential in terms of diversification, the commission's general practice has been to go with the "proven product" and grant renewal if the incumbent has rendered meritorious service.

* * *

In the instant proceeding, the commission specifically noted that the existing newspaper-broadcast cross-owners as a group had a "long record of service" in the public interest; many were pioneers in the broadcasting industry and had established and continued "[t]raditions of service" from the outset. Order, at 1078. Notwithstanding the commission's diversification policy, all were granted initial licenses upon findings that the public interest would be served thereby, and those that had been in existence for more than three years had also had their licenses renewed on the ground that the public interest would be furthered. The commission noted, moreover, that its own study of existing co-located newspaper-television combinations showed that in terms of percentage of time devoted to several categories of local programming, these stations had displayed "an undramatic but nonetheless statistically significant superiority" over other television stations. An across-the-board divestiture requirement would result in loss of the services of these superior licensees, and—whether divestiture caused actual losses to existing owners, or just denial of reasonably anticipated gains—the result would be that future licensees would be discouraged from investing the resources necessary to produce quality service.

At the same time, there was no guarantee that the licensees who replaced the existing cross-owners would be able to provide the same level of service or demonstrate the same long-term commitment to broadcasting. And even if the new owners were able in the long run to provide similar or better service, the commission found that divestiture would cause serious disruption in the transition period. Thus, the commission observed that new owners "would lack the long knowledge of the community and would have to begin raw," and—because of high interest rates—might not be able to obtain sufficient working capital to maintain the quality of local programming.

The commission's fear that local ownership would decline was grounded in a rational prediction, based on its knowledge of the broadcasting industry and supported by comments in the record. That many of the existing newspaper-broadcast combinations owned by local interests would respond to the divestiture requirement by trading stations with out-of-town owners. It is undisputed that roughly 75% of the existing co-located newspaper-television combinations are locally owned, and these owners' knowledge of their local communities and concern for local affairs, built over a period of years, would be lost if they were replaced with outside interests. Local ownership in and of itself has been recognized to be a factor of some—if relatively slight—significance even in the context of initial licensing decisions. It was not unreasonable, therefore, for the commission to consider it as one of several factors militating against divestiture of combinations that have been in existence for many years.

In light of these countervailing considerations, we cannot agree with the court of appeals that it was arbitrary and capricious for the commission to "grandfather" most existing combinations, and to leave opponents of these combinations to their remedies in individual renewal proceedings. In the latter connection we note that, while individual renewal proceedings are unlikely to accomplish any "overall restructuring" of the existing ownership patterns, the Order does make clear that existing combinations will be subject to challenge by competing applicants in renewal proceedings, to the same extent as they were prior to the instant rulemaking proceedings. That is, diversification of ownership will be a relevant but somewhat secondary factor. And, even in the absence of a competing applicant, license renewal may be denied if, inter alia, a challenger can show that a common owner has engaged in specific economic or programming abuses.

In concluding that the commission acted unreasonably in not extending its divestiture requirement across-the-board, the court of appeals apparently placed heavy reliance on a "presumption" that existing newspaper-broadcast combinations "do not serve the public interest." The court derived this presumption primarily from the commission's own diversification policy, as "reaffirmed" by adoption of the prospective rules in this proceeding, and secondarily from "[t]he policies of the First Amendment," and the commission's statutory duty to "encourage the larger and more effective use of radio in the public interest." 47 U.S.C.A. § 303(g). As explained above, we agree that diversification of ownership furthers statutory and constitutional policies, and, as the commission recognized, separating existing newspaper-broadcast combinations would promote diversification. But the weighing of policies under the "public interest" standard is a task that Congress has delegated to the commission in the first instance, and we are unable to find anything in the Communications Act, the First Amendment, or the commission's past or present practices that would require the commission to "presume" that its diversification policy should be given controlling weight in all circumstances.

Such a "presumption" would seem to be inconsistent with the commission's longstanding and judicially approved practice of giving controlling weight in some circumstances to its more general goal of achieving "the best practicable service to the public." Certainly, as discussed above, the commission through its license renewal policy has made clear that it considers diversification of ownership to be a factor of less significance when deciding whether to allow an existing licensee to continue in operation than when evaluating applicants seeking initial licensing. Nothing in the language or the legislative history of § 303(g) indicates that Congress intended to foreclose all differences in treatment between new and existing licensees, and indeed, in amending § 307(d) of the Act in 1952, Congress appears to have lent its approval to the commission's policy of evaluating existing licensees on a somewhat different basis than new applicants. Moreover, if enactment of the prospective rules in this proceeding itself were deemed to create a "presumption" in favor of divestiture, the commission's ability to experiment with new policies would be severely hampered. * * *

The court of appeals also relied on its perception that the policies militating against divestiture were "lesser policies" to which the commission had not given as much weight in the past as its divestiture policy. This perception is subject to much the same criticism as the "presumption" that existing co-located newspaper-broadcasting combinations do not serve the public interest. The commission's past concern with avoiding disruption of existing service is amply illustrated by its license renewal policies. In addition, it is worth noting that in the past when the commission has changed its multiple ownership rules it has almost invariably tailored the changes so as to operate wholly or primarily on a prospective basis. * * *

The court of appeals apparently reasoned that the commission's concerns with respect to disruption of existing service, economic dislocations, and decreases in local ownership necessarily could not be very weighty since the commission has a practice of routinely approving voluntary transfers and assignments of licenses. But the question of whether the commission should compel proven licensees to divest their stations is a different question from whether the public interest is served by allowing transfers by licensees who no longer wish to continue in the business. As the commission's brief explains:

[I]f the commission were to force broadcasters to stay in business against their will, the service provided under such circumstances, albeit continuous, might well not be worth preserving.

* * *

We also must conclude that the court of appeals erred in holding that it was arbitrary to order divestiture in the 16 "egregious cases" while allowing other existing combinations to continue in operation. The commission's decision was based not—as the court of appeals may have believed—on a conclusion that divestiture would be more harmful in the grandfathered markets than in the 16 affected markets, but rather on a judgment that the need for diversification was especially great in cases of local monopoly. This policy judgment was certainly not irrational, see United States v. Radio Corp. of America, 358 U.S., at 351–352, and indeed was founded on the very same assumption that underpinned the diversification policy itself and the prospective rules upheld by the court of appeals and now by this Court—that the greater the number of owners in a market, the greater the possibility of achieving diversity of program and service viewpoints.

As to the commission's criteria for determining which existing newspaper-broadcast combinations have an "effective monopoly" in the "local marketplace of ideas as well as economically," we think the standards settled upon by the commission reflect a rational legislative-type judgment. Some line had to be drawn, and it was hardly unreasonable for the commission to confine divestiture to communities in which there is common ownership of the only daily newspaper and either the only television station or the only broadcast station of any kind encompassing the entire community with a clear signal. Cf. United States v. Radio Corp. of America. It was not irrational, moreover, for the commission to disregard media sources other than newspapers and broadcast stations in setting its divestiture standards. The studies cited by the commission in its notice of rulemaking unanimously concluded that newspapers and television are the two most widely utilized media sources for local news and discussion of public affairs; and, as the commission noted in its Order, at 1081, "aside from the fact that [magazines and other periodicals] often had only a tiny fraction in the market, they were not given real weight since they often dealt exclusively with regional or national issues and ignored local issues." Moreover, the differences in treatment between radio and television stations were certainly justified in light of the far greater influence of television than radio as a source for local news. See Order, at 1083.

The judgment of the court of appeals is affirmed in part and reversed in part.

It is so ordered.

---

COMMENT

1. The Supreme Court decision in the cross-ownership case reversed the court of appeal's effort to restructure on an across-the-board basis existing cross-ownership patterns in American communities. Beyond this holding, the Supreme Court decision in the cross-ownership case gave a new sense of security to incumbent or existing licensees by declaring that past performance by the incumbent licensee rather than diversification of ownership was the "most important factor in deciding whether to grant license renewals." See Central Florida Enterprises v. FCC, text, p. 973.

Citing the Broadcast Applicant Renewal proceeding, text, p. 957, the Court appeared to approve the FCC's practice of making the central factor in comparative licensing decisions the past performance of the incumbent. The Court appeared to approve as well of the FCC's refusal to make diversification of ownership a conclusive factor in such decisions.

2. The decision in National Citizens Committee for Broadcasting v. FCC, 555 F.2d 938 (D.C.Cir.1977), sent a shock through the broadcasting industry because of the court's ruling that the FCC's preservation of existing cross-ownership combinations was unreasonable.

Judge Bazelon, writing for a panel which included Judge Robinson and Judge Skelly Wright, made clear that his new passion for requiring a vigorous diversification of ownership policy arose out of a concern that the continuous and supervisory role of the FCC in fairness doctrine administration menaced the First Amendment rights of broadcasters. Diversification of ownership policy, it was hoped, would secure diversity of opinion and yet at the same time avoid the unwelcome government intrusion that intense enforcement of the fairness doctrine might engender. Bazelon declared that "the prospective ban [on cross-ownership combinations] is an attempt to enhance the diversity of information heard by the public without ongoing government surveillance of the content of speech." In short, the court of appeals decision in the cross-ownership case owed much to Judge Bazelon's profound disenchantment with the fairness doctrine.

3. Even if the court of appeals decision had stood, the result would not necessarily have been to unscramble immediately existing cross-ownership combinations in communities across the country. The court of appeals expressly authorized the FCC to administer a petition-for-waiver procedure whereby a licensee would be allowed to secure exemption from the cross-ownership ban if they could show that a particular cross-ownership combination was in the public interest.

The petition-for-waiver procedure was added to the court of appeals decision, some industry lawyers reasoned, in hopes that this feature of the decision would allow it to withstand an attack upon review by the Supreme Court. Absent some provision for waiver for existing cross-ownership combinations, even combinations that were rendering "superior" service would have been broken up. But a waiver procedure also presented existing cross-ownership combinations with an opportunity for long and expensive delay.

Moreover, if the Supreme Court had upheld the court of appeals extension of the ban on cross-ownership to existing combinations, the result would not, at least on a national basis, have necessarily led to a substantial change in ownership patterns in the communications industry. A cross-ownership ban on existing combinations was bound to encourage trades. A newspaper in one city could sell its television station in that city to a newspaper in another and buy in its stead the television station in the other city. During the time period between the appeals decision and the Supreme Court decision in the cross-ownership case, the Washington Post sold its CBS-affiliated VHF-television station to media interests in Detroit. When the decision of the Supreme Court in the cross-ownership case came down, it was clear that the deal had been unnecessary. The Post was stoic and editorialized:

That the Supreme Court might have required the Washington Post Company to sever its link with WTOP encouraged the swap of stations now under way, but the transaction stands on its own as good public policy. If the presumption about diverse sources of information has any validity—and we believe it does—the trade of stations will serve both Detroit and Washington. That, in turn, will be good for those who own the stations. Editorial, "The Newspaper-Television Link", The Washington Post, p. A 22, June 16, 1978.

4. Although the Supreme Court may have "grandfathered" for the moment existing cross-ownership combinations, such combinations are by no means impervious to future attack. See Central Florida Enterprises, text, p. 973. The Court, per Justice Marshall, was careful to say: "And even in the absence of a competing applicant, license renewal may be denied if a challenger can show that a common owner has engaged in specific economic or programming abuses."

Citizens groups interested in working to bring a larger measure of deconcentration of ownership in the broadcast industry were thus relegated to the renewal process and resort to petitions to deny individual application for renewal. In short, absence of diversification of ownership on the part of a renewal application can still be asserted as a demerit in petitions to deny and comparative hearings. In the absence of another alternative, this remedy was better than nothing, but it was hardly likely to yield much overall change in the broadcast industry.

5. The Supreme Court did not agree with the court of appeals that the FCC should have found that existing colocated newspaper-broadcast combinations were not in the public interest. Diversification of ownership should be a factor but not the dispositive factor in determining whether a colocated combination licensee should be renewed. But there were other factors relevant to such an FCC determination:

- a. Would a new ownership perform as well as the old one?
- b. Would losses to existing owners result from forced sales?
- c. Would losses from divestiture "discourage future investment in quality programming"?

6. The FCC had announced that its cross-ownership ban was to apply prospectively and not retroactively. The FCC had ordered divestiture of only sixteen existing colocated combinations on the ground that these were "egregious" cross-ownership situations where the combination involved the community's sole daily newspaper and either the only radio or the only television station in the community. The court of appeals had held that the FCC's order requiring divestiture in only sixteen cross-ownership situations was arbitrary and capricious.

The court of appeals had sought to make divestiture the general rule and allow exemption through a petition-for-waiver device for meritorious combinations. The Supreme Court, however, found the FCC's refusal to extend the ban on cross-ownership to most existing combinations to be reasonable. The FCC justification for refusing to apply the cross-ownership ban to existing colocated combinations was essentially accepted by the Supreme Court. These justifications included

1. fear that across-the-board divestiture would result in a loss of "stability and continuity of meritorious service" provided by newspaper owners as a group,
2. concern that newspaper owners who had provided good service would unfairly be prevented from continuing to broadcast, and
3. concern that economic dislocations might prevent new owners from obtaining the capital to maintain even existing levels of quality in local programming.

7. One additional FCC point the Supreme Court put its finger on in the cross-ownership decision was a concern that an absolute ban on cross-ownership in a community might have the result of decreasing local ownership of broadcast stations. Such a rule might also have the effect of decreasing local ownership of daily newspapers as well as further accelerating the trend to chain ownership of the daily press. Further, where the broadcast property is more financially successful than the newspaper property, the loss of the station may actually terminate the life of the newspaper as happened in Boston with respect to the WHDH situation. See text, p. 955, fn. 10.

8. In its cross-ownership rules opinion, the FCC emphasized that the rules derived from First Amendment policy rather than antitrust policy. Diversification of ownership was seen by the FCC as a First Amendment goal. The Supreme Court agreed with this perspective. The First Amendment rights of the public as previously outlined in passages in Red Lion and even in CBS were cited and quoted by the Court in the cross-ownership case with approval.

Justice Marshall rejected the argument that if a newspaper in a community could not acquire a broadcast station in its own community, its First Amendment rights were forfeited. In a perhaps unresponsive rejoinder, Marshall said that since the same newspaper could acquire a broadcast station in another community, the newspaper's First Amendment rights were not forfeited. It might be argued that the implication of this observation is that a flat ban against newspaper ownership of broadcast stations would be unconstitutional since in that event there would be a total deprivation on the right of a particular group to engage in communication by means of broadcasting.

As in the 1978 broadcast obscenity case, Pacifica, the Supreme Court in the cross-ownership case made clear its view that the First Amendment status of broadcasters was not equivalent to that of newspapers and other print media:

"[E]fforts to 'enhanc[e] the volume and quality of coverage' of public issues through regulation of broadcasting may be permissible where similar efforts to regulate the print media would not be."

9. Perhaps the whole philosophy of the diversification of ownership concept in broadcasting is wrongheaded. The concept assumes apparently that the more diffuse the ownership of broadcast stations, the more diverse the content of broadcast programming will be. But is this a realistic assumption?

Justice Marshall acknowledged that an FCC study of colocated newspaper-television combinations revealed that such combinations showed an "'undramatic but nonetheless statistically significant superiority'" in the percentage of programming time devoted to some local programming. If colocated newspaper-broadcast combinations display a measurably superior performance, how can even application of a prospective ban on the formation of such combinations be justified?

Is the reason the Court sustains the prospective ban based on the principle that the formation of broadcast regulatory policy is an FCC and not a judicial responsibility? Perhaps, the FCC's decision to root the cross-ownership rules in First Amendment policy rather than antitrust policy indicates that the rules reflect a certain leap of First Amendment faith rather than any empirically or economically demonstrable policy.

10. Since the 1975 Supreme Court ruling, the FCC has affirmed its stance on the one-to-a-market rule. However, the FCC does not always adhere strictly to the letter of the rule. In Evangelistic Missionary Fellowship (EMF), 75 FCC2d 724 (1980), because of the uniqueness of broadcast operations in Alaska, the FCC granted a VHF television construction permit to EMF despite the fact that EMF would own an AM, an FM, and a television broadcast station in the same market. The waiver of the one-to-a-market rule was deemed to be warranted because of the limited economic potential and demonstrated lack of interest in operating a broadcast station in Alaska.

Under the present one-to-a-market rule, combinations involving radio and UHF television stations are treated separately from the absolute proscriptions involving UHF-TV. Note 8 to the original rules (47 U.S.C. §§ 73.240, 73.636) provides that applications involving UHF-radio combinations will be treated on a "case-by-case basis" to determine whether common ownership, operation, or control of the stations would be in the public interest.

It is apparent that in applying this case-by-case analysis, the FCC permits combination UHF-radio ownership only where such ownership will ensure or foster the development of UHF-TV. See Commercial Radio Institute, Inc., 78 FCC2d 1016 (1980); Television Corp. of Virginia, 69 FCC2d 1161 (1978). More than likely, UHF television construction permits will be granted on the condition that the licensee divest itself of either of the proscribed combinations within a short period of time. See Palmetto Radio Corp., 67 FCC2d 771 (1978); Mid-Texas Broadcasting, Inc., 71 FCC2d 1173 (1979). In Notice of Proposed Rulemaking, Multiple Ownership of AM, FM, and TV Broadcasting Stations, 44 Fed.Reg. 55,603 (1979), the FCC appears ready to eliminate the case-by-case analysis under Note 8 and treat UHF stations the same as VHF stations with regard to the one-to-a-market and regional concentration rules. This FCC move came after a notable rise in the number of UHF applications, due in part to the fact that existing UHF stations are becoming increasingly profitable.

The Central Florida Enterprises Case: New Guidepost for Weighing the Claims of the Incumbent Against the Challenger?

Does the Supreme Court's cross-ownership decision command an implicit preference for the incumbent? In a post-cross-ownership decision case, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia indicated that it didn't think so. See Central Florida Enterprises, Inc. v. FCC, 683 F.2d 503 (D.C.Cir.1982), reported below. Central Florida sets forth some guidelines which, if applied, would mean that the incumbent will not necessarily prevail in renewal battles.

CENTRAL FLORIDA ENTERPRISES, INC. v. FCC

683 F.2d 503 (D.C.Cir.1982).

WILKEY, Circuit Judge:

This case involves a license renewal proceeding for a television station. The appeal before us is taken from a new decision<sup>1</sup> by the Federal Communications Commission ("FCC" or "the commission") after our opinion in Central Florida Enterprises v. FCC (Central Florida I)<sup>2</sup> vacated the commission's earlier orders involving the present parties. The FCC had granted the renewal of incumbent's license, but we held that the commission's fact-finding and analysis on certain issues before it were inadequate, and that its method of balancing the factors for and against renewal was faulty. On remand, while the FCC has again concluded that the license should be renewed, it has also assuaged our concerns that its analysis was too cursory and has adopted a new policy for comparative renewal proceedings which meets the criteria we set out in Central Florida I. Accordingly, and with certain caveats, we affirm the commission's decision.

The factual background and legal issues involved in this case were discussed at length in our earlier opinion and can be summarized briefly here. Central Florida Enterprises has challenged the FCC's decision to renew Cowles Broadcasting's license to operate on Channel 2 in Daytona Beach, Florida. In reaching a renewal/nonrenewal decision, the FCC must engage in a comparative weighing of pro-renewal considerations against anti-renewal considerations. In the case here, there were four considerations potentially cutting against Cowles: its illegal move of its main studio, the involvement of several related companies in mail fraud, its ownership of other communications media, and its relative (to Central Florida) lack of management-ownership integration. On the other hand, Cowles' past performance record was "superior," i.e., "sound, favorable and substantially above a level of mediocre service which might just minimally warrant renewal."

1. Cowles Broadcasting, Inc., 86 FCC2d 993 (1981). The proceedings prior to this new decision are at 60 FCC2d 372 (1976), reconsideration denied and clarified, 62 FCC2d 953 (1977), reconsideration denied 40 Rad.Reg.2d 1627 (1977), vacated and remanded sub nom. Central Fla. Enterprises v. FCC, 598 F.2d 37 (D.C.Cir.1978), cert. dismissed 441 U.S. 957 (1979).

2. 598 F.2d 37 (D.C.Cir.1978), cert. dismissed 441 U.S. 957 (1979).

In its decision appealed in Central Florida I the FCC concluded that the reasons undercutting Cowles' bid for renewal did "not outweigh the substantial service Cowles rendered to the public during the last license period." Accordingly, the license was renewed. Our reversal was rooted in a twofold finding. First, the commission had inadequately investigated and analyzed the four factors weighing against Cowles' renewal. Second, the process by which the FCC weighed these four factors against Cowles' past record was never "even vaguely described" and, indeed, "the commission's handling of the facts of this case [made] embarrassingly clear that the FCC [had] practically erected a presumption of renewal that is inconsistent with the full hearing requirement" of the Communications Act. We remand with instructions to the FCC to cure these deficiencies.

On remand the commission has followed our directives and corrected, point by point, the inadequate investigation and analysis of the four factors cutting against Cowles' requested renewal. The commission concluded that, indeed, three of the four merited an advantage for Central Florida, and on only one (the mail fraud issue) did it conclude that nothing needed to be added on the scale to Central's plan or removed from Cowles'. We cannot fault the commission's actions here.

We are left, then, with evaluating the way in which the FCC weighed Cowles' main studio move violation and Central's superior diversification and integration, on the one hand, against Cowles' substantial record of performance on the other. This is the most difficult and important issue in this case, for the new weighing process which the FCC has adopted will presumably be employed in its renewal proceedings elsewhere. We therefore feel that it is necessary to scrutinize carefully the FCC's new approach, and discuss what we understand and expect it to entail.

For some time now the FCC has had to wrestle with the problem of how it can factor in some degree of "renewal expectancy" for a broadcaster's meritorious past record, while at the same time undertaking the required comparative evaluation of the incumbent's probable future performance versus the challenger's. As we stated in Central Florida I, "the incumbent's past performance is some evidence, and perhaps the best evidence, of what its future performance would be." And it has been intimated—by the Supreme Court in FCC v. National Citizens Committee for Broadcasting (NCCB) and by this court in Citizens Communications Center v. FCC and Central Florida I—that some degree of renewal expectancy is permissible. But Citizens and Central Florida I also indicated that the FCC has in the past impermissibly raised renewal expectancy to an irrebuttable presumption in favor of the incumbent.

We believe that the formulation by the FCC in its latest decision, however, is a permissible way to incorporate some renewal expectancy while still undertaking the required comparative hearing. The new policy, as we understand it, is simply this: renewal expectancy is to be a factor weighed with all the other factors, and the better the past record, the greater the renewal expectancy "weight."

In our view [states the FCC], the strength of the expectancy depends on the merit of the past record. Where, as in this case, the incumbent rendered substantial but not superior service, the "expectancy" takes the form of a comparative preference weighed against [the] other factors. * * * An incumbent performing in a superior manner would receive an even stronger preference. An incumbent rendering minimal service would receive no preference. This is to be contrasted with commission's 1965 Policy Statement on Comparative Broadcast Hearings, where "[o]nly unusually good or unusually poor records have relevance."

If a stricter standard is desired by Congress, it must enact it. We cannot: the new standard is within the statute.

The reasons given by the commission for factoring in some degree of renewal expectancy are rooted in a concern that failure to do so would hurt broadcast consumers.

The justification for a renewal expectancy is three-fold. (1) There is no guarantee that a challenger's paper proposals will, in fact, match the incumbent's proven performance. Thus, not only might replacing an incumbent be entirely gratuitous, but it might even deprive the community of an acceptable service and replace it with an inferior one. (2) Licensees should be encouraged through the likelihood of renewal to make investments to ensure quality service. Comparative renewal proceedings cannot function as a "competitive spur" to licensees if their dedication to the community is not rewarded. (3) Comparing incumbents and challengers as if they were both new applicants could lead to a haphazard restructuring of the broadcast industry especially considering the large number of group owners. We cannot readily conclude that such a restructuring could serve the public interest.

We are relying, then, on the FCC's commitment that renewal expectancy will be factored in for the benefit of the public, not for incumbent broadcasters. In subsequent cases we must judge the faithfulness of the FCC to that commitment, for, as the Supreme Court has said, "It is the right of the viewers and listeners, not the right of the broadcasters, which is paramount," citing its earlier statement that "[p]lainly it is not the purpose of the [Communications] act to protect a license against competition but to protect the public." Then Circuit Judge Burger, as a member of this court, wrote:

A broadcaster seeks and is granted the free and exclusive use of a limited and valuable part of the public domain; when he accepts that franchise it is burdened with enforceable public obligations. * * * After nearly five decades of operation the broadcast industry does not seem to have grasped the simple fact that a broadcast license is a public trust subject to termination for breach of duty.

As we concluded in Central Florida I, "[t]he only legitimate fear which should move [incumbent] licensees is the fear of their own substandard performance, and that would be all to the public good."

There is a danger, of course, that the FCC's new approach could still degenerate into precisely the sort of irrebuttable presumption in favor of renewal that we have warned against. But this did not happen in the case before us today, and our reading of the commission's decision gives us hope that if the FCC applies the standard in the same way in future cases, it will not happen in them either. The standard is new, however, and much will depend on how the commission applies it and fleshes it out. Of particular importance will be the definition and level of service it assigns to "substantial"—and whether that definition is ever found to be "opaque to judicial review," "wholly unintelligible," or based purely on "administrative 'feel.'" <sup>27</sup>

27. Id. at 50 [quoting earlier proceeding, 60 FCC2d 372, 422 (1976)]. We think it would be helpful if at some point the commission defined and explained the distinctions, if any, among: substantial, meritorious, average, above average, not above average, not far above average, above mediocre, more than minimal, solid, sound, favorable, not superior, not exceptional, and unexceptional—all terms used by the parties to describe what the FCC found Cowles' level of performance to have been. We are especially interested to know what the

In this case, however, the commission was painstaking and explicit in its balancing. The commission discussed in quite specific terms, for instance, the items it found impressive in Cowles' past record. It stressed and listed numerous programs demonstrating Cowles' "local community orientation" and "responsive[ness] to community needs," discussed the percentage of Cowles' programming devoted to news, public affairs, and local topics, and said it was "impressed by [Cowles'] reputation in the community. Seven community leaders and three public officials testified that [Cowles] had made outstanding contributions to the local community. Moreover, the record shows no complaints. * * *

The commission concluded that "Cowles' record [was] more than minimal," was in fact "'substantial,' i.e., 'sound, favorable and substantially above a level of mediocre service which might just minimally warrant renewal.' "

The commission's inquiry in this case did not end with Cowles' record, but continued with a particularized analysis of what factors weighed against Cowles' record, and how much. The FCC investigated fully the mail fraud issue. It discussed the integration and diversification disadvantages of Cowles and conceded that Central had an edge on these issues—"slight" for integration, "clear" for diversification. But it reasoned that "structural factors such as [these]—of primary importance in a new license proceeding should have lesser weight compared with the preference arising from substantial past service."<sup>31</sup> Finally, with respect to the illegal main studio move, the FCC found that "licensee misconduct" in general standard of comparison is in each case. "Average" compared to all applicants? "Mediocre" compared to all incumbents? "Favorable" with respect to the FCC's expectations? We realize that the FCC's task is a subjective one, but the use of imprecise terms needlessly compounds our difficulty in evaluating what the commission has done. We think we can discern enough to review intelligently the commission's actions today, but if the air is not cleared or, worse, becomes foggier, the FCC's decision-making may again be adjudged "opaque to judicial review."

---

31. Id. at 1015. The Supreme Court upheld a similar decision by the FCC to weigh diversification more heavily for prospective, as opposed to existing, licensees. NCCB, 436 U.S. at 803-809 * * *. Thus, "diversification will be a relevant but somewhat secondary factor." Id. at 809, 98 S.Ct. at 2119. See also Citizens, 447 F.2d at 1208-09 n. 23.

The FCC argues that diversification and integration should not be given "heavy weight in the comparative renewal context" since "[c]hallengers could easily structure their proposals to be superior to the incumbent's," resulting in possible "substantial restructuring of the industry with possible disruptions of service" and a loss of "incentive to provide quality programming." 86 FCC2d at 1016.

Here we have a caveat. We do not read the commission's new policy as ignoring integration and diversification considerations in comparative renewal hearings. In its brief at page 6 the commission states that "an incumbent's meritorious record should outweigh in the comparative renewal context a challenging applicant's advantages under the structural factors of integration and diversification." Ceteris paribus, this may be so—depending in part, of course, on how "meritorious" is defined. But where there are weights on the scales other than a meritorious record on the one hand, and integration and diversification on the other, the commission must afford the latter two some weight, since while they alone may not outweigh a meritorious record they may tip the balance if weighed with something else. See Citizens, 447 F.2d at 1208-09 n. 23.

That, of course, is precisely the situation here, since the main studio move violation must also be balanced against the meritorious record. The commission may not weigh the antirenewal factors separately against the incumbent's record, eliminating them as it goes along. It must weigh them all simultaneously. * * *. We are convinced, however, despite some ambiguous passages like the one just quoted in the preceding paragraph, that the Commission has followed the correct procedure here. See, e.g., 86 FCC2d at 1018. Thus the commission's conclusion that diversification and integration are to be given "lesser weight" than renewal expectancy does not mean that they were or will be given no weight. The relative weight to be given these factors will vary, depending on how much or how little diversification or integration is at stake. Here, as stated in the text, the commission did consider the degree of Central's integration advantage ("slight") and diversification advantage ("clear") 86 FCC2d at 1009-10.

"may provide a more meaningful basis for preferring an untested challenger over a proven incumbent." The commission found, however, that here the "comparative significance of the violation" was diminished by the underlying facts:

Cowles did not actually move a studio away from Daytona Beach. It maintained two studios, one of which gradually became somewhat superior to the other. Thus, while a violation of the rule technically occurred, Cowles demonstrated no tendency to flout commission rules or disserve the community of license.

The FCC concluded that "the risk to the public interest posed by the violation seems small when compared to the actuality of depriving Daytona Beach of Cowles' tested and acceptable performance."

Having listed the relevant factors and assigned them weights, the commission concluded that Cowles' license should be renewed. We note, however, that despite the finding that Cowles' performance was "'substantial,' i.e., 'sound, favorable and substantially above a level of mediocre service,'" the combination of Cowles' main studio rule violation and Central's diversification and integration advantages made this a "close and difficult case." Again, we trust that this is more evidence that the commission's weighing did not, and will not, amount to automatic renewal for incumbents.

We are somewhat reassured by a recent FCC decision granting, for the first time since at least 1961, on comparative grounds the application of the challenger for a radio station license and denying the renewal application of the incumbent licensee.<sup>38</sup> In that decision the commission found that the incumbent deserved no renewal expectancy for his past program record and that his application was inferior to the challenger's on comparative grounds. Indeed, it was the incumbent's preferences on the diversification and integration factors which were overcome (there, by the challenger's superior programming proposals and longer broadcast week). The commission found that the incumbent's "inadequate [past performance] reflects poorly on the likelihood of future service in the public interest." Further, it found that the incumbent had no "legitimate renewal expectancy" because his past performance was neither "meritorious" nor "substantial."

We have, however, an important caveat. In the commission's weighing of factors the scale mid-mark must be neither the factors themselves, nor the interests of the broadcasting industry, nor some other secondary and artificial construct, but rather the intent of Congress, which is to say the interests of the listening public. All other doctrine is merely a means to this end, and it should not become more. If in a given case, for instance, the factual situation is such that the denial of a license renewal would not undermine renewal expectancy in a way harmful to the public interest, then renewal expectancy should not be invoked.<sup>40</sup>

Finally, we must note that we are still troubled by the fact that the record remains that an incumbent television licensee has never been denied renewal in a comparative challenge. American television viewers will be reassured, although a trifle baffled, to learn that even the worst television stations—those which are, presumably, the ones picked out as vulnerable to a challenge—are so good that they never need replacing. We suspect that somewhere, sometime, somehow, some television licensee should fail in a comparative renewal challenge, but the FCC has never discovered such a licensee yet. As a court we cannot say that it must be Cowles here.

38. In re Applications of Simon Geller and Grandbanke Corp., FCC Docket Nos. 21104-05 (released 15 June 1982). We intimate no view at this time, of course, on the soundness of the commission's decision there; we cite it only as demonstrating that the commission's new approach may prove to be more than a paper tiger.

40. Thus, the three justifications given by the commission for renewal expectancy, supra, should be remembered by the FCC in future renewal proceedings and, where these justifications are in a particular case attenuated, the commission ought not to chant "renewal expectancy" and grant the license.

We hope that the standard now embraced by the FCC will result in the protection of the public, not just incumbent licensees. And in today's case we believe the FCC's application of the new standard was not inconsistent with the commission's mandate. Accordingly the commission's decision is affirmed.

---

COMMENT

1. An examination of the history of the Central Florida litigation is instructive since it provides a particularly vivid example of FCC solicitude for the incumbent applicant in a comparative renewal proceeding, even though the incumbent has other media interests and the new applicant does not. See Cowles Florida Broadcasting, Inc., 60 FCC2d 372 (1976). The stated premise of the holding is that an applicant without other media interests has a preference over an applicant without such interest. But the preference is not decisive absent proof that the new applicant will render equal or superior service to that which the incumbent with other media interests is likely to render. Quality of service was said to be primary, especially where a license grant would not add to media concentration.

The incumbent licensee, WESH-TV, Daytona, Florida, owned by Cowles Florida Broadcasting, Inc. (Cowles), was in turn owned completely by Cowles Communications, Inc. (CCI). At the time of the initial hearing, CCI also owned an AM-FM-TV combination in Iowa, and another CCI subsidiary owned AM-FM stations in Tennessee. In addition, CCI owned a substantial stock interest in the New York Times Company, which published the New York Times, other newspapers and periodicals, and broadcast interests. Further, certain CCI stockholders have substantial mass-media involvement. Central Florida Enterprises, Inc. (Central), the competing applicant, had no mass media interests. The incumbent licensee, WESH-TV—with other mass media interests—was renewed.

On the diversification issue, the FCC minimized Cowles's other media interests because the media involved were either not controlled by Cowles or were located in a different community than WESH-TV. The FCC stated further, referring to its cross-ownership rules that even in the more compelling situation involving common ownership of a daily newspaper and broadcast stations in the same market, except in extreme cases, it would not require divestiture to break up existing concentrations.

Then FCC Chairman Wiley dissented, emphasizing that while he personally believed WESH's record warranted renewal, the present state of the law required denial of the renewal application. Central should receive a preference under the diversification criterion, and Central should also be preferred under the best practicable service criterion. These criteria had been set forth in the 1965 Policy Statement on Broadcast Comparative Hearings, 1 FCC2d 393 (1963).

Further, under Citizens Communication Center v. FCC, 447 F.2d 1201 (D.C.Cir. 1971), an incumbent licensee was entitled to a "plus of major significance" only on a showing of "superior" service. The FCC Administrative Law Judge's characterization of Cowles's performance, however, was "thoroughly acceptable." This was a phrase Wiley pointed out which "clearly does not connote superiority." Thus, Wiley concluded that Central should have been preferred under the operational comparative criteria.

At the same time, Wiley argued that a more appropriate system would be to scrap the comparative hearing procedure and renew all incumbents who "do a good and faithful job of serving their communities."

Commissioner Robinson, in dissent, also urged reform of the comparative hearing procedure. "Something has to be changed. One place to begin is with a legal recognition of the reality: a licensee has a property right in its license which is feasible only for serious misbehavior."

The FCC approach in Cowles, however, was soon undone. In Central Florida Enterprises v. FCC, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 1502, 598 F.2d 37 (D.C.Cir.1978), a panel of the federal court of appeals in Washington, D.C., per Judge Wilkey, reversed the FCC in the Cowles case in a decision which spread almost as much fright in broadcasting circles as the WHDH case had nearly a decade earlier. Judge Wilkey declared that the FCC had failed to set forth any articulate rationale in the record to justify its comparative evaluation of the incumbent and the challenger:

(T)he state of administrative practice in commission comparative renewal proceedings is unsatisfactory. Its paradoxical history reveals an ordinarily tacit presumption that the incumbent licensee is to be preferred over competing applicants. * * * The Federal Communications Act fairly precludes any preference based on incumbency per se. * * * Despite the apparent statutory assurance of a free-wheeling inquiry into the relative merit of challenger and incumbent licensee, the history of commission practice reveals a strong preference for renewal. Further, until fairly recently, such choices by the commission were routinely affirmed by this court. This general phenomenon has been rationalized into what we have called on occasion "a renewal expectancy." * * * The development of commission policy on comparative renewal hearings has now departed sufficiently from the established law, statutory and judicial precedent, that the commission's handling of the facts in this case make embarrassingly clear that the FCC has practically erected a presumption of renewal that is inconsistent with the full hearing requirement of Sec. 309(e).

We emphasize that lawful renewal expectancies are confined to the likelihood that an incumbent will prevail in a fully comparative inquiry. "Superior" or above average past performance is, of course, highly relevant to the comparison, and might be expected to prevail absent some clear and strong showing by the challenger under the comparative factor (either affirmative bearing on the challenger's projected program performance, or negative regarding the incumbent's media ties or perhaps discovered character deficiencies) or other designated issues. But we do not see how performance that is merely average, whether "solid" or not, can warrant renewal or, in fact, be of especial relevance without some finding that the challenger's performance would likely be no more satisfactory.

On remand, the commission will have occasion to reconsider its characterization of Cowles' past performance and to articulate clearly the manner in which its findings are integrated into the comparative analysis. We remand this case in light of our abiding conviction that the commission's order is unsupported by the record and the prior law on which it purported to rely. We are especially troubled by the possibility that settled principles of administrative practice may be ignored because of the commission's insecurity or unhappiness with the substance of the regulatory regime it is charged to enforce. Nothing would be more demoralizing or unsettling of expectations than for drifting administrative adjudications quietly to erode the statutory mandate of the commission and judicial precedent.

Orders vacated and case remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

With respect to Judge Wilkey's concern that the FCC has "erected a presumption of renewal" that is inconsistent with renewal, see the discussion of RKO General Inc. v. FCC, 670 F.2d 215 (D.C.Cir.1981) where FCC denial of the license renewal application of a television station was upheld, text, p. 901.

The foregoing opinion was decided before the Supreme Court decision in the cross-ownership case.

Did the cross-ownership decision influence Judge Wilkey's decision in the Central Florida case?

2. Judge Wilkey summarized the FCC's new approach to renewals in Central Florida II as follows: "We believe that the formulation by the FCC in its latest decision, however, is a permissible way to incorporate some renewal expectancy while still undertaking the required comparative hearing. The new policy, as we understand it, is simply this: renewal expectancy is to be a factor weighed with all the other factors, and the better the past record, the greater the renewal expectancy 'weight'."

Under the FCC renewal policy described by Judge Wilkey in Central Florida II, will an incumbent television licensee which has other media affiliations be in a worse or better position in a renewal contest with a new applicant which has no media affiliations?

Is there any basis for an argument that the renewal philosophy of Central Florida is inconsistent with the Supreme Court's decision in FCC v. National Citizens Committee for Broadcasting, text, p. 959. Why?

CABLE TELEVISION

---

UNITED STATES v.
SOUTHWESTERN CABLE CO.
MIDWEST TELEVISION, INC.
v. SOUTHWESTERN CABLE CO.
392 U.S. 157, 88 S.Ct. 1994, 20 L.Ed.2d 1001 (1968).

Justice HARLAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

These cases stem from proceedings conducted by the Federal Communications Commission after request by Midwest Television for relief under §§ 74.1107 and 74.1109 of the rules promulgated by the commission for the regulation of community antenna television (CATV) systems. Midwest averred that respondents' CATV systems transmitted the signals of Los Angeles broadcasting stations into the San Diego area, and thereby had, inconsistently with the public interest, adversely affected Midwest's San Diego station.<sup>4</sup> Midwest sought an appropriate order limiting the carriage of such signals by respondents' systems. After consideration of the petition and of various responsive pleadings, the commission restricted the expansion of respondents' service in areas in which they had not operated on February 15, 1966, pending hearings to be conducted on the merits of Midwest's complaints. 4 FCC2d 612. On petitions for review, the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit held that the commission lacks authority under the Communications Act of 1934, to issue such an order. * * * For reasons that follow, we reverse.

CATV systems receive the signals of television broadcasting stations, amplify them, transmit them by cable or microwave, and ultimately distribute them by wire to the receivers of their subscribers. CATV systems characteristically do not produce their own programming, and do not recompense producers or broadcasters for use of the programming which they receive and redistribute. Unlike ordinary broadcasting stations, CATV systems commonly charge their subscribers installation and other fees.

* * *

---

4. Midwest asserted that respondents' importation of Los Angeles signals had fragmented the San Diego audience, that this would reduce the advertising revenues of local stations, and that the ultimate consequence would be to terminate or to curtail the services provided in the San Diego area by local broadcasting stations. Respondents' CATV systems now carry the signals of San Diego stations, but Midwest alleged that the quality of the signals, as they are carried by respondents, is materially degraded, and that this serves only to accentuate the fragmentation of the local audience.

CATV systems perform either or both of two functions. First, they may supplement broadcasting by facilitating satisfactory reception of local stations in adjacent areas in which such reception would not otherwise be possible; and second, they may transmit to subscribers the signals of distant stations entirely beyond the range of local antennae. As the number and size of CATV systems have increased, their principal function has more frequently become the importation of distant signals. * * * Thus, "while the CATV industry originated in sparsely settled areas and areas of adverse terrain * * * it is now spreading to metropolitan centers. * * *"

* * *

We must first emphasize that questions as to the validity of the specific rules promulgated by the commission for the regulation of CATV are not now before the Court. The issues in these cases are only two: whether the commission has authority under the Communications Act to regulate CATV systems, and, if it has, whether it has, in addition, authority to issue the prohibitory order here in question.

The commission's authority to regulate broadcasting and other communications is derived from the Communications Act of 1934, as amended. The act's provisions are explicitly applicable to "all interstate and foreign communication by wire or radio. * * *" 47 U.S.C.A. § 152(a). The commission's responsibilities are no more narrow: it is required to endeavor to "make available * * * to all the people of the United States a rapid, efficient, Nation-wide and world-wide wire and radio communication service. * * *" 47 U.S.C.A. § 151. The commission was expected to serve as the "single government agency" with "unified jurisdiction" and "regulatory authority over all forms of electrical communication, whether by telephone, telegraph, cable, or radio." It was for this purpose given "broad authority." As this Court emphasized in an earlier case, the act's terms, purposes, and history all indicate that Congress "formulated a unified and comprehensive regulatory system for the [broadcasting] industry." FCC v. Pottsville Broadcasting Co., 309 U.S. 134, 137.

Respondents do not suggest that CATV systems are not within the term "communication by wire or radio." Indeed, such communications are defined by the act so as to encompass "the transmission of * * signals, pictures, and sounds of all kinds," whether by radio or cable, "including all instrumentalities, facilities, apparatus, and services (among other things, the receipt, forwarding and delivery of communications) incidental to such transmission." 47 U.S.C.A. §§ 153(a), (b). These very general terms amply suffice to reach respondents' activities.

Nor can we doubt that CATV systems are engaged in interstate communication, even where, as here, the intercepted signals emanate from stations located within the same state in which the CATV system operates. We may take notice that television broadcasting consists in very large part of programming devised for, and distributed to, national audiences; respondents thus are ordinarily employed in the simultaneous retransmission of communications that have very often originated in other States. The stream of communication is essentially uninterrupted and properly indivisible.

Nonetheless, respondents urge that the Communications Act, properly understood, does not permit the regulation of CATV systems. First, they emphasize that the commission in 1959 and again in 1966 sought legislation that would have explicitly authorized such regulation, and that its efforts were unsuccessful. In the circumstances here, however, this cannot be dispositive. The commission's requests for legislation evidently reflected in each instance both its uncertainty as to the proper width of its authority and its understandable preference for more detailed policy guidance than the Communications Act now provides. We have recognized that administrative agencies, should in such situations, be encouraged to seek from Congress clarification of the pertinent statutory provisions.

* * *

Second, respondents urge that § 152(a) does not independently confer regulatory authority upon the commission, but instead merely prescribes the forms of communication to which the Act's other provisions may separately be made applicable. Respondents emphasize that the commission does not contend either that CATV systems are common carriers, and thus within Subtitle II of the act, or that they are broadcasters, and thus within Subtitle III. They conclude that CATV, with certain of the characteristics both of broadcasting and of common carriers, but with all of the characteristics of neither, eludes altogether the act's grasp.

We cannot construe the act so restrictively. Nothing in the language of § 152(a), in the surrounding language, or in the act's history or purposes limits the commission's authority to those activities and forms of communication that are specifically described by the act's other provisions. The section itself states merely that the "provisions of [the act] shall apply to all interstate and foreign communication by wire or radio. * * *" Similarly, the legislative history indicates that the commission was given "regulatory power over all forms of electrical communication. * * *" S.Rep.No.830, 73d Cong., 2d Sess., 1. Certainly Congress could not in 1934 have foreseen the development of community antenna television systems, but it seems to us that it was precisely because Congress wished "to maintain, through appropriate administrative control, a grip on the dynamic aspects of radio transmission," FCC v. Pottsville Broadcasting Co., that it conferred upon the commission a "unified jurisdiction" and "broad authority."

* * *

Moreover, the commission has reasonably concluded that regulatory authority over CATV is imperative if it is to perform with appropriate effectiveness certain of its other responsibilities. Congress has imposed upon the commission the "obligation of providing a widely dispersed radio and television service," with a "fair, efficient, and equitable distribution" of service among the "several states and communities." 47 U.S.C.A. § 307(b). The commission has, for this and other purposes, been granted authority to allocate broadcasting zones or areas, and to provide regulations "as it may deem necessary" to prevent interference among the various stations. 47 U.S.C.A. § 303(f), (h). The commission has concluded, and Congress has agreed, that these obligations require for their satisfaction the creation of a system of local broadcasting stations, such that "all communities of appreciable size [will] have at least one television station as an outlet for local self-expression." In turn, the commission has held that an appropriate system of local broadcasting may be created only if two subsidiary goals are realized. First, significantly wider use must be made of the available ultra-high frequency channels. Second, communities must be encouraged "to launch sound and adequate programs to utilize the television channels now reserved for educational purposes." These subsidiary goals have received the endorsement of Congress.

The commission has reasonably found that the achievement of each of these purposes is "placed in jeopardy by the unregulated explosive growth of CATV." H.R. Rep.No.1635, 89th Cong., 2d Sess.

Although CATV may in some circumstances make possible "the realization of some of the [commission's] most important goals," First Report and Order, 38 FCC 683, at 699, its importation of distant signals into the service areas of local stations may also "destroy or seriously degrade the service offered by a television broadcaster," id., at 700, and thus ultimately deprive the public of the various benefits of a system of local broadcasting stations. In particular, the commission feared that CATV might, by dividing the available audiences and revenues, significantly magnify the characteristically serious financial difficulties of UHF and educational television broadcasters. The commission acknowledged that it could not predict with certainty the consequences of unregulated CATV, but reasoned that its statutory responsibilities demand that it "plan in advance of foreseeable events, instead of waiting to react to them."

* * * The commission has reasonably found that the successful performance of these duties demands prompt and efficacious regulation of community antenna television systems. We have elsewhere held that we may not, "in the absence of compelling evidence that such was Congress' intention * * * prohibit administrative action imperative for the achievement of an agency's ultimate purposes." There is no such evidence here, and we therefore hold that the commission's authority over "all interstate * * * communication by wire or radio" permits the regulation of CATV systems.

There is no need here to determine in detail the limits of the commission's authority to regulate CATV. It is enough to emphasize that the authority which we recognize today under § 152(a) is restricted to that reasonably ancillary to the effective performance of the commission's various responsibilities for the regulation of television broadcasting. The commission may, for these purposes, issue "such rules and regulations and prescribe such restrictions and conditions, not inconsistent with law," as "public convenience, interest or necessity requires." 47 U.S.C.A.

§ 303(r). We express no views as to the commission's authority, if any, to regulate CATV under any other circumstances or for any other purposes.

We must next determine whether the commission has authority under the Communications Act to issue the particular prohibitory order in question in these proceedings. * * *

The commission, after examination of various responsive pleadings but without prior hearings, ordered that respondents generally restrict their carriage of Los Angeles signals to areas served by them on February 15, 1966, pending hearings to determine whether the carriage of such signals into San Diego contravenes the public interest. The order does not prohibit the addition of new subscribers within areas served by respondents on February 15, 1966; it does not prevent service to other subscribers who began receiving service or who submitted an "accepted subscription request" between February 15, 1966, and the date of the commission's order; and it does not preclude the carriage of San Diego and Tiajuana, Mexico, signals to subscribers in new areas of service. 4 FCC2d 612, 624-625. The order is thus designed simply to preserve the situation as it existed at the moment of its issuance.

* * *

The commission has acknowledged that, in this area of rapid and significant change, there may be situations in which its generalized regulations are inadequate, and special or additional forms of relief are imperative. It has found that the present case may prove to be such a situation, and that the public interest demands "interim relief * * * limiting further expansion," pending hearings to determine appropriate commission action. Such orders do not exceed the commission's authority. This Court has recognized that "the administrative process [must] possess sufficient flexibility to adjust itself" to the "dynamic aspects of radio transmission,"

National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. at 219, and that it was precisely for that reason that Congress declined to "stereotyp[e] the powers of the commission to specific details. * * *"

* * * The judgments of the court of appeals are reversed, and the cases are remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. It is so ordered. Judgments reversed and cases remanded.

---

The Scope of FCC Jurisdiction Over Cable

1. Does the Supreme Court in Southwestern Cable think it sufficient to base FCC jurisdiction over cable television on the fact that cable may have an adverse effect on broadcasting? Under such a theory is there any legal limit to FCC jurisdiction?

The Court itself is quite careful to limit the scope of FCC jurisdiction over cable in Southwestern. As Justice Harlan put it for the Court: "It is enough to emphasize that the authority which we recognize today under § 152(a) is restricted to that reasonably ancillary to the effective performance of the commission's various responsibilities for the regulation of television broadcasting."

2. One of the concerns expressed in the Southwestern Cable case was that the ability of cable to make available many channels to viewers receiving the service was at odds with the emphasis the FCC had placed on local service programming. The ability of listeners to view channels far from their homes erodes the audience of the locally based channel and therefore shrinks its appeal to local advertisers. Moreover, the FCC's licensing policy favors applicants who have strong identifications with the community they wish to serve. The basis for the policy is the belief that, if applicants are familiar with the needs of the community, they will therefore be in the best position for local expression. But the problem with the local service emphasis was that it, like all programming responsibilities, was placed on the individual station licensee. But how much responsibility does the typical TV station licensee have over his programming?

Do you suppose the networks and the broadcasting industry approve or oppose FCC jurisdiction over cable television? The argument can be made that if the FCC is industry dominated, one of the best ways to stimulate change in American broadcasting is to leave new technological developments outside the reach of the FCC.

3. The promise of cable to alter and enrich broadcasting by using its multi-channel capacity in ways that will make it a viable alternative to commercial VHF television is still unfulfilled. Illustrative of the legal problems that beset the development of cable is Midwest Video Corp. v. FCC, 406 U.S. 649 (1972).

On June 24, 1970, the FCC ordered all cable systems having 3,500 or more subscribers to originate their own programming. The FCC ruling was heralded as a significant step toward providing an alternative to commercial television. The hope was that the development of local television programming by cable systems in communities throughout the country might provide an alternative to network television and an opportunity for local participation in community affairs through the new technology of cable television.

The conclusion of the Eighth Circuit in Midwest Video that the FCC lacked jurisdiction to require cable systems to originate programming momentarily placed the future of cable in limbo, Midwest Video Corp. v. United States, 441 F.2d 1322 (8th Cir. 1971), a status which has been the hallmark of cable since its inception. The FCC has continually issued proposed rules and regulations for cable but adopted very few of them. The harsh lower federal court reaction to one of the few positive steps the FCC has taken with regard to cable—the program origination requirement—was a bitter pill for those who advocated FCC control over cable. The Supreme Court, however, reversed the lower court, sustained the program origination rule, and ushered in a theory of FCC jurisdiction over cable which was far more encompassing than that enunciated in Southwestern.

---

UNITED STATES v. MIDWEST VIDEO CORP.

406 U.S. 649, 92 S.Ct. 1860,
32 L.ED.2D 390 (1972).

Justice BRENNAN announced the judgment of the Court, and an opinion in which Justice White, Justice Marshall, and Justice Blackmun joined.

* * *

As we said in Southwestern, * * * CATV “[promises] for the future to provide a national communications system, in which signals from selected broadcasting centers would be transmitted to metropolitan areas throughout the country.” Moreover, as the commission has noted, “the expanding multichannel capacity of cable systems could be utilized to provide a variety of new communications services to homes and businesses within a community,” such as facsimile reproduction of documents, electronic mail delivery, and information retrieval. Perhaps more important, CATV systems can themselves originate programs, or “cablecast”—which means, the commission has found, that CATV can “[increase] the number of local outlets for community self-expression and [augment] the public's choice of programs and types of services, without use of broadcast spectrum. * * *”

Recognizing this potential, the commission, shortly after our decision in Southwestern, initiated a general inquiry “to explore the broad question of how best to obtain, consistent with the public interest standard of the Communications Act, the full benefits of developing communications technology for the public, with particular immediate reference to CATV technology. * * *” In particular, the commission tentatively concluded, as part of a more expansive program for the regulation of CATV, “that, for now and in general, CATV program origination is in the public interest,” and sought comments on a proposal “to condition the carriage of television broadcast signals (local or distant) upon a requirement that the CATV system also operate to a significant extent as a local outlet by originating.” As for its authority to impose such a requirement, the commission stated that its “concern with CATV carriage of broadcast signals is not just a matter of avoidance of adverse effects, but extends also to requiring CATV affirmatively to further statutory policies.”

On the basis of comments received, the commission on October 24, 1969, adopted a rule providing that “no CATV system having 3,500 or more subscribers shall carry the signal of any television broadcast station unless the system also operates to a significant extent<sup>5</sup> as a local outlet by cablecasting<sup>6</sup> and has available

---

5. “By significant extent [the commission indicated] we mean something more than the origination of automated services (such as time and weather, news ticker, stock ticker, etc.) and aural services (such as music and announcements). Since one of the purposes of the origination requirement is to insure that cablecasting equipment will be available for use by others originating on common carrier channels, ‘operation to a significant extent as a local outlet’ in essence necessitates that the CATV operator have some kind of video cablecasting system for the production of local live and delayed programming (e.g., a camera and a video tape recorder, etc.)” First Report and Order 214.

6. “Cablecasting” was defined as “programming distributed on a CATV system which has been originated by the CATV operator or by another entity, exclusive of broadcast signals carried on the system.” 47 CFR facilities for local production and presentation of programs other than automated services." 47 CFR 74.1111(a). In a report accompanying this regulation, the commission stated that the tentative conclusions of its earlier notice of proposed rulemaking:

recognize the great potential of the cable technology to further the achievement of long-established regulatory goals in the field of television broadcasting by increasing the number of outlets for community self-expression and augmenting the public's choice of programs and types of services. * * * They also reflect our view that a multi-purpose CATV operation combining carriage of broadcast signals with program origination and common carrier services,<sup>8</sup> might best exploit cable channel capacity to the advantage of the public and promote the basic purpose for which this commission was created: "regulating interstate and foreign commerce in communication by wire and radio so as to make available, so far as possible, to all people of the United States a rapid, efficient, nationwide, and worldwide wire and radio communication service with adequate facilities at reasonable charges * * *" (sec. 1 of the Communications Act). After full consideration of the comments filed by the parties, we adhere to the view that program origination on CATV is in the public interest.<sup>10</sup> First Report and Order, 20 FCC2d 201, 202 (1969).

The commission further stated:

The use of broadcast signals has enabled CATV to finance the construction of high capacity cable facilities. In requiring in return for these uses of radio that CATV devote a portion of the facilities to providing needed origination service, we are furthering our statutory responsibility to "encourage the larger and more effective use of radio in the public interest" (§ 303(g)). The requirement will also facilitate the more effective performance of the commission's duty to provide a fair, efficient, and equitable distribution of television service to each of the several states and communities (§ 307(b)), in areas where we have been unable to accomplish this through broadcast media.

Upon the challenge of respondent Midwest Video Corp., an operator of CATV systems subject to the new cablecasting requirement, the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit set aside the regulation on the ground that the com-

74.1101(j). As this definition makes clear, cablecasting may include not only programs produced by the CATV operator, but "films and tapes produced by others, and CATV network programming." First Report and Order 214. See also id., at 203. The definition has been altered to conform to changes in the regulation, * * * and now appears at 47 CFR 76.5(w). See Report and Order on Cable Television Service 3279. Although the definition now refers to programming "subject to the exclusive control of the cable operator," this is apparently not meant to effect a change in substance or to preclude the operator from cablecasting programs produced by others. See id., at 3271.

8. Although the commission did not impose common carrier obligations on CATV systems in its 1969 report, it did note that "the origination requirement will help ensure that origination facilities are available for use by others originating on leased channels." First Report and Order 209. Public access requirements were introduced in the commission's Report and Order on Cable Television Service, although not directly under the heading of common carrier service. See Report and Order on Cable Television Service 3277.

10. In so concluding the commission rejected the contention that a prohibition on CATV originations was "necessary to prevent potential fractionalization of the audience for broadcast services and a siphoning off of program material and advertising revenue now available to the broadcast service." First Report and Order 202. "[B]roadcasters and CATV originators * * *," the commission reasoned, "stand on the same footing in acquiring the program material with which they compete." Id., at 203. Moreover, "a loss of audience or advertising revenue to a television station is not in itself a matter of moment to the public interest unless the result is a net loss of television service," ibid.—an impact that the commission found had no support in the record and that, in any event, it would undertake to prevent should the need arise. See id., at 203–204. See also Memorandum Opinion and Order 826 n. 3, 828–829.

mission "is without authority to impose" it. 441 F.2d 1322, 1328 (1971). "The commission's power [over CATV], * * *" the court explained, "must be based on the commission's right to adopt rules that are reasonably ancillary to its responsibilities in the broadcasting field,"—a standard that the court thought the commission's regulation "goes far beyond." The court's opinion may also be understood to hold the regulation invalid as not supported by substantial evidence that it would serve the public interest. * * *

The parties now before us do not dispute that in light of Southwestern CATV transmissions are subject to the commission's jurisdiction as "interstate * * * communication by radio or wire" within the meaning of § 2(a) even insofar as they are local cablecasts. The controversy instead centers on whether the commission's program origination rule is "reasonably ancillary to the effective performance of [its] various responsibilities for the regulation of television broadcasting." We hold that it is.

At the outset we must note that the commission's legitimate concern in the regulation of CATV is not limited to controlling the competitive impact CATV may have on broadcast services. Southwestern refers to the commission's "various responsibilities for the regulation of television broadcasting." These are considerably more numerous than simply assuring that broadcast stations operating in the public interest do not go out of business. Moreover, we must agree with the commission that its "concern with CATV carriage of broadcast signals is not just a matter of avoidance requiring CATV affirmatively to further statutory policies." Since the avoidance of adverse effects, itself the furtherance of statutory policies, no sensible distinction even in theory can be drawn along those lines. More important, CATV systems, no less than broadcast stations, * * * may enhance as well as impair the appropriate provision of broadcast services. Consequently, to define the commission's power in terms of the protection, as opposed to the advancement, of broadcasting objectives would artificially constrict the commission in the achievement of its statutory purposes and be inconsistent with our recognition in Southwestern "that it was precisely because Congress wished 'to maintain, through appropriate administrative control, a grip on the dynamic aspects of radio transmission,' * * * that it conferred upon the commission a 'unified jurisdiction' and 'broad authority.'"

The very regulations that formed the backdrop for our decision in Southwestern demonstrate this point. Those regulations were, of course, avowedly designed to guard broadcast services from being undermined by unregulated CATV growth. At the same time, the commission recognized that "CATV systems * * * have arisen in response to public need and demand for improved television service and perform valuable public services in this respect." Second Report and Order, 2 FCC2d 725, 745 (1966). Accordingly, the commission's express purpose was not:

"to deprive the public of these important benefits or to restrict the enriched programming selection which CATV makes available. Rather, our goal here is to integrate the CATV service into the national television structure in such a way as to promote maximum television service to all people of the United States (secs. 1 and 303(g) of the act [nn. 9 and 11, supra]), both those who are cable viewers and those dependent on off-the-air service. The new rules * * * are the minimum measures we believe to be essential to insure that CATV continues to perform its valuable supplementary role without unduly damaging or impeding the growth of television broadcast service." In implementation of this approach CATV systems were required to carry local broadcast station signals to encourage diversified programming suitable to the community's needs as well as to prevent a diversion of audiences and advertising revenues. The duplication of local station programming was also forbidden for the latter purpose, but only on the same day as the local broadcast so as "to preserve, to the extent practicable, the valuable public contribution of CATV in providing wider access to nationwide programming and a wider selection of programs on any particular day." Finally, the distant-importation rule was adopted to enable the commission to reach a public-interest determination weighing the advantages and disadvantages of the proposed service on the facts of each individual case. In short, the regulatory authority asserted by the commission in 1966 and generally sustained by this Court in Southwestern was authority to regulate CATV with a view not merely to protect but to promote the objectives for which the commission had been assigned jurisdiction over broadcasting.

In this light the critical question in this case is whether the commission has reasonably determined that its origination rule will "further the achievement of long-established regulatory goals in the field of television broadcasting by increasing the number of outlets for community self-expression and augmenting the public's choice of programs and types of services. * * *" We find that it has.

The goals specified are plainly within the commission's mandate for the regulation of television broadcasting. * * *

Equally plainly the broadcasting policies the commission has specified are served by the program-origination rule under review. To be sure, the cablecasts required may be transmitted without use of the broadcast spectrum. But the regulation is not the less, for that reason, reasonably ancillary to the commission's jurisdiction over broadcast services. The effect of the regulation, after all, is to assure that in the retransmission of broadcast signals viewers are provided suitably diversified programming, the same objective underlying regulations sustained in National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, as well as the local-carriage rule reviewed in Southwestern and subsequently upheld. In essence the regulation is no different from commission rules governing the technological quality of CATV broadcast carriage. In the one case, of course, the concern is with the strength of the picture and voice received by the subscriber, while in the other it is with the content of the programming offered. But in both cases the rules serve the policies of §§ 1 and 303(g) of the Communications Act on which the cablecasting regulation is specifically premised, and also, in the commission's words, "facilitate the more effective performance of [its] duty to provide a fair, efficient, and equitable distribution of television service to each of the several States and communities" under § 307(b). In sum, the regulation preserves and enhances the integrity of broadcast signals and therefore is "reasonably ancillary to the effective performance of the commission's various responsibilities for the regulation of television broadcasting."

Respondent, nevertheless, maintains that just as the commission is powerless to require the provision of television broadcast services where there are no applicants for station licenses no matter how important or desirable those services may be, so, too, it cannot require CATV operators unwillingly to engage in cablecasting. In our view, the analogy respondent thus draws between entry into broadcasting and entry into cablecasting is misconceived. The commission is not attempting to compel wire service where there has been no commitment to undertake it. CATV operators to whom the cablecasting rule applies have voluntarily engaged themselves in providing that service, and the commission seeks only to ensure that it satisfactorily meets community needs within the context of their undertaking.

For these reasons we conclude that the program-origination rule is within the commission's authority recognized in Southwestern.

The question remains whether the regulation is supported by substantial evidence that it will promote the public interest. We read the opinion of the court of appeals as holding that substantial evidence to that effect is lacking because the regulation creates the risk that the added burden of cablecasting will result in increased subscription rates and even the termination of CATV services. That holding is patently incorrect in light of the record.

* * *

* * * [T]he commission chose to apply the regulation to systems with 3,500 or more subscribers, effective January 1, 1971.

* * * [A]pproximately 70 percent of the systems now originating have fewer than 3,500 subscribers; indeed, about half of the systems now originating have fewer than 2,000 subscribers * * * [T]he 3,500 standard will encompass only a very small percentage of existing systems at present subscriber levels, less than 10 percent."

On petitions for reconsideration the commission observed that it had "been given no data tending to demonstrate that systems with 3,500 subscribers cannot cablecast without impairing their financial stability, raising rates or reducing the quality of service." Memorandum Opinion and Order, 23 FCC2d 825, 826 (1970). The commission repeated that "[t]he rule adopted is minimal in the light of the potentials of cablecasting," but, nonetheless, on its own motion postponed the effective date of the regulation to April 1, 1971, "to afford additional preparation time."

This was still not the commission's final effort to tailor the regulation to the financial capacity of CATV operators. In denying respondent's motion for a stay of the effective date of the rule, the commission reiterated that "there has been no showing made to support the view that compliance * * * would be an unustainable burden." Memorandum Opinion and Order, 27 FCC2d 778, 779 (1971). On the other hand, the commission recognized that new information suggested that CATV systems of 10,000 ultimate subscribers would operate at a loss for at least four years if required to cablecast. That data, however, was based on capital expenditure and annual operating cost figures "appreciably higher" than those first projected by the commission. The commission concluded:

"While we do not consider that an adequate showing has been made to justify general change, we see no public benefit in risking injury to CATV systems in providing local origination. Accordingly, if CATV operators with fewer than 10,000 subscribers request ad hoc waiver of [the regulation], they will not be required to originate pending action on their waiver requests. * * * Systems of more than 10,000 subscribers may also request waivers, but they will not be excused from compliance unless the commission grants a requested waiver * * *. [The] benefit [of cablecasting] to the public would be delayed if the * * * stay [requested by respondent] is granted, and the stay would, therefore, do injury to the public's interest."

This history speaks for itself. The cablecasting requirement thus applied is plainly supported by substantial evidence that it will promote the public interest.

* * *

Reversed.

Chief Justice BURGER, concurring in the result.

* * *

Candor requires acknowledgment, for me at least, that the commission's position strains the outer limits of even the opened and pervasive jurisdiction that has evolved by decisions of the commission and the courts. The almost explosive development of CATV suggests the need of a comprehensive re-examination of the statutory scheme as it relates to this new development, so that the basic policies are considered by Congress and not left entirely to the commission and the courts.

I agree with the plurality's rejection of any meaningful analogy between requiring CATV operators to develop programming and the concept of commandeering someone to engage in broadcasting. Those who exploit for private commercial surface transmission by CATV—to which they make no contribution—are not exactly strangers to the stream of broadcasting. The essence of the matter is that when they interrupt the signal and put it to their own use for profit, they take on burdens, one of which is regulation by the commission.

I am not fully persuaded that the commission has made the correct decision in this case and the thoughtful opinions in the court of appeals and the dissenting opinion here reflect some of my reservations. * * * (But) I * * * conclude that until Congress acts, the commission should be allowed wide latitude and I therefore concur in the result reached by this Court.

Justice Douglas, with whom Justice Stewart, Justice Powell, and Justice Rehnquist concur, dissenting.

* * *

* * * The commission is not given carte blanche to initiate broadcasting stations; it cannot force people into the business. It cannot say to one who applies for a broadcast outlet in city A that the need is greater in city B and he will be licensed there. The fact that the commission has authority to regulate origination of programs if CATV decides to enter the field does not mean that it can compel CATV to originate programs. The fact that the act directs the commission to encourage the larger and more effective use of radio in the public interest, 47 U.S.C.A. § 303(g), relates to the objectives of the act and does not grant power to compel people to become broadcasters any more than it grants the power to compel broadcasters to become CATV operators.

The upshot of today's decision is to make the commission's authority over activities "ancillary" to its responsibilities greater than its authority over any broadcast licensee. Of course, the commission can regulate a CATV (station) that transmits broadcast signals. But to entrust the commission with the power to force some, a few, or all CATV operators into the broadcast business is to give it a forbidding authority. Congress may decide to do so. But the step is a legislative measure so extreme that we should not find it interstitially authorized in the vague language of the act.

I would affirm the court of appeals.

---

COMMENT

1. In Midwest Video, the Supreme Court appears to expand the scope of FCC jurisdiction over cable far beyond the more tentative basis for FCC jurisdiction outlined in Southwestern. In Midwest Video, the Supreme Court suggested that the FCC can not only regulate cable to "protect" broadcasting but can also regulate to "promote" the objectives for which the FCC had been given jurisdiction over television broadcasting. As an illustration, the goal of diversified programming is said by the Court in Midwest Video to be such an objective and apparently can be implemented by FCC regulation of either cablecasting or television broadcasting.

2. Isn't the Supreme Court really saying in Midwest Video that any public interest objective which would justify a regulatory policy or action by the FCC with regard to television broadcasting may justify such a policy or action by the FCC with regard to cable?

If this is so, then the Supreme Court has laid the groundwork of plenary or complete jurisdiction by the FCC over cable. In other words, all of cable has now become potentially subject to FCC jurisdiction. Any aspect of cable not regulated by the FCC would then be unregulated as a matter of FCC choice not because of lack of power. If the doctrine of Midwest Video gives the FCC plenary jurisdiction over cable, this constitutes a significant advance over the assertion in Southwestern that the FCC jurisdiction over cable is "restricted to that reasonably ancillary to the effective performance" of the FCC's regulatory responsibilities over television broadcasting.

The Mandatory Public Access Controversy

Despite the 1972 Supreme Court decision in United States v. Midwest Video (Midwest Video I), reversing the Eighth Circuit decision invalidating the FCC's program origination rules, the Eighth Circuit continued to be an unreceptive forum with respect to extensive regulation of cable by the FCC. In Midwest Video Corp. v. FCC, 571 F.2d 1025 (8th Cir. 1978), (Midwest Video II), the court, per Chief Judge Markey, struck down as beyond the FCC's jurisdiction the 1976 Cable Report, Report and Order in Docket No. 20508, 59 FCC2d 399 (1976), which required cable operators to make available four channels for public access on a first-come, nondiscriminatory basis. The Eighth Circuit's decision in Midwest Video II was affirmed by the Supreme Court in FCC v. Midwest Video Corp.

---

FCC v. MIDWEST VIDEO CORP.
4 MED.L.RPTR. 2345, 440 U.S. 689, 99 S.CT. 1435, 59 L.ED. 692 (1979).

Justice WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

In May 1976, the Federal Communications Commission promulgated rules requiring cable television systems that have 3,500 subscribers and carry broadcast signals to develop, at a minimum, a 20-channel capacity by 1986, to make available certain channels for access by third parties, and to furnish equipment and facilities for access purposes. Report and Order in Docket No. 20528, 59 FCC2d 294 (1976) (1976 Order). The issue here is whether these rules are "reasonably ancillary to the effective performance of the commission's various responsibilities for the regulation of television broadcasting," United States v. Southwestern Cable Co. * * *, and hence within the commission's statutory authority.

The regulations now under review had their genesis in rules prescribed by the commission in 1972 requiring all cable operators in the top 100 television markets to design their systems to include at least 20 channels and to dedicate four of those channels for public, governmental, educational, and leased access. The rules were reassessed in the course of further rule-making proceedings. As a result, the commission modified a compliance deadline, effected certain substantive changes, and extended the rules to all cable systems having 3,500 or more subscribers, 1976 Order, supra. In its 1976 Order, the commission reaffirmed its view that there was "a definite societal good" in preserving access channels, though it acknowledged that the "overall impact that use of these channels can have may have been exaggerated in the past." 59 FCC2d, at 296.

As ultimately adopted, the rules prescribe a series of interrelated obligations ensuring public access to cable systems of a designated size and regulate the manner in which access is to be afforded and the charges that may be levied for providing it. Under the rules, cable systems must possess a minimum capacity of 20 channels as well as the technical capability for accomplishing two-way, nonvoice communication. 47 CFR § 76.252 (1976). Moreover, to the extent of their available activated channel capacity, cable systems must allocate four separate channels for use by public, educational, local governmental, and leased access users, with one channel assigned to each. § 76.254(a). Absent demand for full-time use of each access channel, the combined demand can be accommodated with fewer than four channels but with at least one. § 76.254(b)-(c). When demand on a particular access channel exceeds a specified limit, the cable system must provide another access channel for the same purpose, to the extent of the system's activated capacity. § 76.254(d). The rules also require cable systems to make equipment available for those utilizing public access channels. § 76.256(a).

Under the rules, cable operators are deprived of all discretion regarding who may exploit their access channels and what may be transmitted over such channels. System operators are specifically enjoined from exercising any control over the content of access programming except that they must adopt rules proscribing the transmission on most access channels of lottery information and commercial matter.<sup>4</sup> §§ 77.256(b), (d). The regulations also instruct cable operators to issue rules providing for first-come, nondiscriminatory access on public and leased channels. §§ 77.256(d)(1), (3).

Finally, the rules circumscribe what operators might charge for privileges of access and use of facilities and equipment. No charge may be assessed for the use of one public access channel. § 76.256(c)(2). Operators may not charge for the use of educational and governmental access for the first five years the system services such users. § 75.256(c)(1). Leased access channel users must be charged an "appropriate" fee. § 76.256(d)(3). Moreover, the rules admonish that charges for equipment, personnel, and production exacted from access users "shall be reasonable and consistent with the goal of affording users a low-cost means of television access." § 76.256(c)(3). And "[n]o charges shall be made for live public access programs not exceeding five minutes in length." Ibid. Lastly, a system may not charge access users for utilization of its playback equipment or the personnel required to operate such equipment when the cable's production equipment is not deployed and when tapes or film can be played without technical alteration to the system's equipment. Petition for Reconsideration in Docket No. 20508, 62 FCC2d 399, 407 (1976).

The commission's capacity and access rules were challenged on jurisdictional grounds in the course of the rulemaking proceedings. In its 1976 Order, the commission rejected such comments on the ground that the regulations further objectives that it might properly pursue in its supervision over broadcasting. Specifically, the commission maintained that its rules would promote "the achievement of longstanding communications regulatory objectives by increasing outlets for local self-expression and augmenting the public's choice of programs." 59 FCC2d, at 298. The commission did not find persuasive the contention that "the access requirements are in effect common carrier obligations which are beyond our authority to impose." * * * Additionally, the commission denied that the rules violated the First Amendment, reasoning that when broadcasting or related activity by cable systems is involved First Amendment values are served by measures facilitating an exchange of ideas.

4. Cable systems were also required to promulgate rules prohibiting the transmission of obscene and indecent material on access channels. 47 CFR § 76.256(d) (1976). The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit stayed this aspect of the rules in an order filed in American Civil Liberties Union v. FCC, — U.S.App.D.C. —, No. 76-1695 (Aug. 26, 1977). The court below, moreover, disapproved the requirement in belief that it imposed censorship obligations on cable operators. The commission has instituted a review of the requirement, and it is not now in controversy before this Court.

On petition for review, the Eighth Circuit set aside the commission's access, channel capacity, and facilities rules as beyond the agency's jurisdiction. 571 F.2d 1025 (1978). The court was of the view that the regulations were not reasonably ancillary to the commission's jurisdiction over broadcasting, a jurisdictional condition established by past decisions of this Court. The rules amounted to an attempt to impose common-carrier obligations on cable operators, the court said, and thus ran counter to the statutory command that broadcasters themselves may not be treated as common carriers. See Communications Act of 1934, § 3(h), 47 U.S.C. § 153(h). Furthermore, the court made plain its belief that the regulations presented grave First Amendment problems. We granted certiorari, * * * and we now affirm.

The commission derives its regulatory authority from the Communications Act of 1934, 48 Stat. 1064, as amended, 47 U.S.C. § 151 et seq. The act preceded the advent of cable television and understandably does not expressly provide for the regulation of that medium. But it is clear that Congress meant to confer "broad authority" on the commission, H.R.Rep. No. 1850, 73d Cong., 2d Sess., 1 (1934), so as "to maintain, through appropriate administrative control, a grip on the dynamic aspects of radio transmission." FCC v. Pottsville Broadcasting Co. * * *. To that end, Congress subjected to regulation "all interstate and foreign communication by wire or radio." Communications Act of 1934, § 2(a), 47 U.S.C. § 152(a). * * *

The Southwestern litigation arose out of the commission's efforts to ameliorate the competitive impact on local broadcasting operations resulting from importation of distant signals by cable systems into the service areas of local stations. Fearing that such importation might "destroy or seriously degrade the service offered by a television broadcaster," First Report and Order, 38 FCC 683, 700 (1965), the commission promulgated rules requiring CATV systems to carry the signals of broadcast stations into whose service area they brought competing signals, to avoid duplication of local station programming on the same day such programming was broadcast, and to refrain from bringing new distant signals into the 100 largest television markets unless first demonstrating that the service would comport with the public interest. * * *

The commission's assertion of jurisdiction was based on its view that "the successful performance" of its duty to ensure "the orderly development of an appropriate system of local television broadcasting" depended upon regulation of cable operations. 392 U.S., at 177, 88 S.Ct., at 2005. Against the background of the administrative undertaking at issue, the Court construed § 2(a) of the act as granting the commission jurisdiction over cable television "reasonably ancillary to the effective performance of the commission's various responsibilities for the regulation of television broadcasting." * * *

Soon after our decision in Southwestern, the commission resolved "to condition the carriage of television broadcast signals * * * upon a requirement that the CATV system also operate to a significant extent as a local outlet by originating." Notice of Proposed Rulemaking and Notice of Inquiry, 15 FCC2d 417, 422 (1968). It stated that its "concern with CATV carriage of broadcast signals [was] not just a matter of avoidance of adverse effects, but extend[ed] also to requiring CATV affirmatively to further statutory policies." Ibid. Accordingly, the commission promulgated a rule providing that CATV systems having 3,500 or more subscribers may not carry the signal of any television broadcast station unless the system also operates to a significant extent as a local outlet by originating its own programs—or cablecasting—and maintains facilities for local production and presentation of programs other than automated services. 47 CFR § 74.1111(a) (1970). This Court, by a five-to-four vote but without an opinion for the Court, sustained the commission's jurisdiction to issue these regulations in United States v. Midwest Video, supra.

Four Justices, in an opinion by Justice Brennan, reaffirmed the view that the commission has jurisdiction over cable television and that such authority is delimited by its statutory responsibilities over television broadcasting. They thought that the reasonably ancillary standard announced in Southwestern permitted regulation of CATV "with a view not merely to protect but to promote the objectives for which the commission had been assigned jurisdiction over broadcasting." * * * The conclusion was that the "program-origination rule [was] within the commission's authority recognized in Southwestern."

* * *

Because its access and capacity rules promote the long-established regulatory goals of maximization of outlets for local expression and diversification of programming—the objectives promoted by the rule sustained in Midwest Video—the commission maintains that it plainly had jurisdiction to promulgate them. Respondents, in opposition, view the access regulations as an intrusion on cable system operations that is qualitatively different from the impact of the rule upheld in Midwest Video. Specifically, it is urged that by requiring the allocation of access channels to categories of users specified by the regulations and by depriving the cable operator of the power to select individual users or to control the programming on such channels, the regulations wrest a considerable degree of editorial control from the cable operator and in effect compel the cable system to provide a kind of common-carrier service. Respondents contend, therefore, that the regulations are not only qualitatively different from those heretofore approved by the courts but also contravene statutory limitations designed to safeguard the journalistic freedom of broadcasters, particularly the command of § 3(h) of the act that "a person engaged in * * * broadcasting shall not * * * be deemed a common carrier." 47 U.S.C. § 153(h).

We agree with respondents that recognition of agency jurisdiction to promulgate the access rules would require an extension of this Court's prior decisions. Our holding in Midwest Video sustained the commission's authority to regulate cable television with a purpose affirmatively to promote goals pursued in the regulation of television broadcasting; and the plurality's analysis of the origination requirement stressed the requirement's nexus to such goals. But the origination rule did not abrogate the cable operators' control over the composition of their programming, as do the access rules. It compelled operators only to assume a more positive role in that regard, one comparable to that fulfilled by television broadcasters. Cable operators had become enmeshed in the field of television broadcasting, and, by requiring them to engage in the functional equivalent of broadcasting, the commission had sought "only to ensure that [they] satisfactorily [met] community needs within the context of their undertaking." * * *

With its access rules, however, the commission has transferred control of the content of access cable channels from cable operators to members of the public who wish to communicate by the cable medium. Effectively, the commission has relegated cable systems, pro tanto, to common-carrier status. A common-carrier service in the communications context is one that "makes a public offering to provide [communications facilities] whereby all members of the public who choose to employ such facilities may communicate or transmit intelligence of their own design and choosing." * * * Report and Order, Industrial Radiolocation Service, Docket No. 16106, 5 FCC2d 197, 202 (1966). * * *

A common carrier does not "make individualized decisions, in particular cases, whether and on what terms to deal." National Association of Regulatory Utility Commissioners v. FCC, 525 F.2d, at 641.

The access rules plainly impose common-carrier obligations on cable operators. Under the rules, cable systems are required to hold out dedicated channels on a first-come, nondiscriminatory basis. 47 CFR §§ 76.254(a), 76.256(d) (1976). Operators are prohibited from determining or influencing the content of access programming. § 76.256(b). And the rules delimit what operators may charge for access and use of equipment. § 76.256(c). Indeed, in its early consideration of access obligations—whereby "CATV operators [would] furnish studio facilities and technical assistance [but] have no control over program content except as may be required by the commission's rules and applicable law"—the commission acknowledged that the result would be the operation of cable systems "as common carriers on some channels." First Report and Order in Docket No. 18397, 20 FCC2d 201, 207 (1969); see id., at 202; Cable Television Report and Order, 36 FCC2d 143, 197 (1972). In its 1976 order, the commission did not directly deny that its access requirements compelled common carriage, and it has conceded before this Court that the rules "can be viewed as a limited form of common carriage-type obligation." Brief for United States 39. But the commission continues to insist that this characterization of the obligation imposed by the rules is immaterial to the question of its power to issue them; its authority to promulgate the rules is assured, in the commission's view, so long as the rules promote statutory objectives.

Congress, however, did not regard the character of regulatory obligations as irrelevant to the determination of whether they might permissibly be imposed in the context of broadcasting itself. The commission is directed explicitly by § 3(h) of the act not to treat persons engaged in broadcasting as common carriers. We considered the genealogy and the meaning of this provision in Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. 94, * * * (1973). The issue in that case was whether a broadcast licensee's general policy of not selling advertising time to individuals or groups wishing to speak on issues important to them violated the Communications Act of 1934 or the First Amendment. Our examination of the legislative history of the Radio Act of 1927—the precursor to the Communications Act of 1934—prompted us to conclude that "in the area of discussion of public issues Congress chose to leave broad journalistic discretion with the licensee." 412 U.S. at 105. * * * We determined, in fact, that "Congress specifically dealt with—and firmly rejected—the argument that the broadcast facilities should be open on a nonselective basis to all persons wishing to talk about public issues." Ibid. The Court took note of a bill reported to the Senate by the Committee on Interstate Commerce providing in part that any licensee who permits "a broadcasting station to be used * * * for the discussion of any question affecting the public * * * shall make no discrimination as to the use of such broadcasting station, and with respect to said matters the licensee shall be deemed a common carrier in interstate commerce: Provided, that such licensee shall have no power to censor the material broadcast.'" Id., at 106, * * * quoting 67 Cong.Rec. 12503 (1926). That bill was amended to eliminate the common-carrier obligation because of the perceived lack of wisdom in "put[ting] the broadcaster under the hampering control of being a common carrier" and because of problems in administering a nondiscriminatory right of access. See 67 Cong.Rec. 12502, 12504 (1926).

The Court further observed that, in enacting the 1934 act, Congress rejected still another proposal "that would have imposed a limited obligation on broadcasters to turn over their microphones to persons wishing to speak out on certain public issues." 412 U.S., at 107-108. "Instead," the Court noted, "Congress after prolonged consideration adopted § 3(h), which specifically provides that 'a person engaged in radio broadcasting shall not, insofar as such person is so engaged, be deemed a common carrier.'" Id., at 108-109.

"Congress' flat refusal to impose a 'common carrier' right of access for all persons wishing to speak out on public issues," id., at 110, 93 S.Ct., at 2090, was perceived as consistent with other provisions of the 1934 act evincing "a legislative desire to preserve values of private journalism." Id., at 109. Notable among them was § 326 of the act, which enjoins the commission from exercising "the power of censorship over the radio communications or signals transmitted by any radio station," and commands that "no regulation shall be promulgated or fixed by the commission which shall interfere with the right of free speech by means of radio communication." Id., at 110, * * * quoting 47 U.S.C. § 326.

The holding of the Court in Columbia Broadcasting was in accord with the view of the commission that the act itself did not require a licensee to accept paid editorial advertisements. Accordingly, we did not decide the question whether the act, though not mandating the claimed access, would nevertheless permit the commission to require broadcasters to extend a range of public access by regulations similar to those at issue here. The Court speculated that the commission might have flexibility to regulate access, id., at 122, and that "[c]onceivably at some future time Congress or the commission—or the broadcasters—may devise some kind of limited right of access that is both practicable and desirable," id., at 131. But this is insufficient support for the commission's position in the present case. The language of § 3(h) is unequivocal; it stipulates that broadcasters shall not be treated as common carriers. As we see it, § 3(h), consistently with the policy of the act to preserve editorial control of programming in the licensee, forecloses any discretion in the commission to impose access requirements amounting to common-carrier obligations on broadcast systems.<sup>14</sup> The provision's background manifests a congressional belief that the intrusion worked by such regulation on the journalistic integrity of broadcasters would overshadow any benefits associated with the resulting public access. It is difficult to deny, then, that forcing broadcasters to develop a "nondiscriminatory system for controlling access * * * is precisely what Congress intended to avoid through § 3(h) of the Act." Id., at 140 n. 9 * * * (Stewart, J., concurring); see id., at 152, and n. 2 * * * (Douglas, J., concurring).<sup>15</sup>

14. Whether less intrusive access regulation might fall within the commission's jurisdiction, or survive constitutional challenge even if within the commission's power, is not presently before this Court. Certainly, our construction of § 3(h) does not put into question the statutory authority for the fairness doctrine obligations sustained in Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 * * * (1969). The fairness doctrine does not require that a broadcaster provide common carriage; it contemplates a wide range of licensee discretion. See Report on Editorializing by Broadcast Licensees, 13 FCC 1246, 1251 (1949) (in meeting fairness doctrine obligations the "licensee will in each instance be called upon to exercise his best judgment and good sense in determining what subjects should be considered, the particular format of the programs to be devoted to each subject, the different shades of opinion to be presented, and the spokesmen for each point of view.").

15. The dissent maintains that § 3(h) does not place "limits on the commission's exercise of powers otherwise within its statutory authority because a lawfully imposed requirement might be termed a 'common carrier obligation.'" Post, at 1447. Rather, § 3(h) means only that "every broadcast station is not to be deemed a common carrier, and therefore subject to common-carrier regulation under Title II of the act, simply because it is engaged in radio broadcasting." Post, at 1447. But Congress was plainly anxious to avoid regulation of broadcasters as common carriers under Title II, which commands inter alia that regulated entities

Of course, § 3(h) does not explicitly limit the regulation of cable systems. But without reference to the provisions of the act directly governing broadcasting, the commission's jurisdiction under § 2(a) would be unbounded. See, United States v. Midwest Video, 406 U.S., at 661 * * * (opinion of Justice Brennan). Though afforded wide latitude in its supervision over communication by wire, the commission was not delegated unrestrained authority. The Court regarded the commission's regulatory effort at issue in Southwestern as consistent with the act because it had been found necessary to ensure the achievement of the commission's statutory responsibilities. Specifically, regulation was imperative to prevent interference with the commission's work in the broadcasting area. And in Midwest Video the commission had endeavored to promote long-established goals of broadcasting regulation. Petitioners do not deny that statutory objectives pertinent to broadcasting bear on what the commission might require cable systems to do. Indeed, they argue that the commission's authority to promulgate the access rules derives from the relationship of those rules to the objectives discussed in Midwest Video. But they overlook the fact that Congress has restricted the commission's ability to advance objectives associated with public access at the expense of the journalistic freedom of persons engaged in broadcasting.

That limitation is not one having peculiar applicability to television broadcasting. Its force is not diminished by the variant technology involved in cable transmissions. Cable operators now share with broadcasters a significant amount of editorial discretion regarding what their programming will include. As the commission, itself, has observed, "both in their signal carriage decisions and in connection with their origination function, cable television systems are afforded considerable control over the content of the programming they provide." Report and Order in Docket No. 20829, 43 Fed.Reg. 53742 (1978).

In determining, then, whether the commission's assertion of jurisdiction is "reasonably ancillary to the effective performance of [its] responsibilities for the regulation of television broadcasting," United States v. Southwestern Cable Co., * * * we are unable to ignore Congress' stern disapproval—evidenced in § 3(h)—of negation of the editorial discretion otherwise enjoyed by broadcasters and cable operators alike. Though the lack of congressional guidance has in the past led us to defer—albeit cautiously—to the commission's judgment regarding the scope of its authority, here there are strong indications that agency flexibility was to be sharply delimited.

The exercise of jurisdiction in Midwest Video, it has been said, "strain[ed] the outer limits" of commission authority. 406 U.S., at 676 (Burger, C.J., concurring). In shall "furnish * * * communication service upon reasonable request therefore. [sic]" 47 U.S.C. § 201(a). Our review of the act in Columbia Broadcasting led us to conclude that § 3(h) embodies a substantive determination not to abrogate a broadcaster's journalistic independence for the purpose of, and as a result of, furnishing members of the public with media access:

---

"Congress pointedly refrained from divesting broadcasters of their control over the selection of voices; § 3(h) of the act stands as a firm congressional statement that broadcast licensees are not to be treated as common carriers, obliged to accept whatever is tendered by members of the public. [The] provision[ ] clearly manifest[s] the intention of Congress to maintain a substantial measure of journalistic independence for the broadcast licensee." Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. 94, 116 * * *. We now reaffirm that view of § 3(h): the purpose of the provision and its mandatory wording preclude commission discretion to compel broadcasters to act as common carriers, even with respect to a portion of their total services. As we demonstrate in the following text, that same constraint applies to the regulation of cable television systems.

light of the hesitancy with which Congress approached the access issue in the broadcast area, and in view of its outright rejection of a broad right of public access on a common-carrier basis, we are constrained to hold that the commission exceeded those limits in promulgating its access rules. The commission may not regulate cable systems as common carriers, just as it may not impose such obligations on television broadcasters. We think authority to compel cable operators to provide common carriage of public-originated transmissions must come specifically from Congress.<sup>19</sup>

Affirmed.

---

COMMENT

1. Since its holding invalidating the public access rules was based on the lack of FCC jurisdiction to issue them, the court of appeals, per Judge Markey, declined to base its holding on constitutional grounds.

Despite the Court's guidance in Miami Herald, the commission has attempted here to require cable operators, who have invested substantially to create a private electronic "publication"—a means of disseminating information—to open their "publications" to all for use as they wish. * * * Though we are not deciding that issue here, we have seen and heard nothing in this case to indicate a constitutional distinction between cable systems and newspapers in the context of the government's power to compel public access.

Cable can be described as a technology of abundance, as compared with VHF television, a technology of scarcity. Should the First Amendment model applied to cable be the same as that applied to the newspaper press? Tornillo, rather than Red Lion, governs the public access obligations of the newspaper press, should Tornillo, rather than Red Lion, provide the appropriate First Amendment model for cable?

2. The argument for applying Tornillo to cable is a strong one. But there is an argument the other way as well. Cable has more communicative capacity than the newspaper press. Problems of space, caused by the cost of newsprint, present difficult practical obstacles to the development of compulsory public access schemes in the daily press completely apart from the editorial autonomy First Amendment questions such issues raise (see Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, text, p. 584). Cable, unlike the daily newspaper, has the capacity to meet the demands of an access system. The practical problems found in newspapers are simply not present in today's multi-channel cable systems. Indeed, cable operators are often unable to use all this capacity at present in the first place.

3. If the scarcity rationale is deemed to be technologically inapplicable to cable, does this mean that federal legislation imposing common carrier status on cable would present First Amendment problems just as the imposition of common carrier status on cable would present an insuperable First Amendment obstacle?

For the proponents of mandatory public access for cable, the following comment of Justice White in Midwest Video in footnote 14 provides an encouraging response.

"Whether less intrusive access regulations might fall within the commission's

---

19. The court below suggested that the commission's rules might violate the First Amendment rights of cable operators. Because our decision rests on statutory grounds, we express no view on that question, save to acknowledge that it is not frivolous and to make clear that the asserted constitutional issue did not determine or sharply influence our construction of the statute. The court of appeals intimated, additionally, that the rules might effect an unconstitutional "taking" of property or, by exposing a cable operator to possible criminal prosecution for offensive cablecasting by access users over which the operator has no control, might affront the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment. We forego comment on these issues as well.

jurisdiction, or survive constitutional challenge even if within the commission's power, is not presently before this Court. Certainly, our construction of § 3(h) does not put into question the statutory authority for the fairness doctrine obligations sustained in Red Lion. * * *

4. If the Supreme Court had had to face the First Amendment issue raised by the mandatory public access rules, how do you think they would have decided the issue? See fn. 19 in the majority opinion in Midwest Video.

The Home Box Office Case or Freeing Pay Cable from FCC Bondage

The FCC does not have power under the Communications Act to restrict programming by pay television cablecasters. Home Box Office, Inc. v. FCC, 567 F.2d 9 (D.C.Cir.1977); cert. den. 434 U.S. 829 (1977). In an attempt to protect the conventional broadcast media, the FCC had issued detailed regulations limiting the types of programming available to cablecasters and subscription broadcast television stations. The regulations on subscription television were based on two assumptions. First, subscription systems should serve as supplements to conventional television, and therefore distinct programming was required. The second assumption was that revenue raised from subscription operations would allow subscription operators to bid away the best programs, thus reducing the quality of conventional television. Unregulated cable television, the FCC reasoned, would allow cable operators, through revenue raised by subscriptions, to siphon off or purchase programs currently shown on conventional free television for showing on a subscription cable channel. The FCC argued that in such a situation a segment of the American people—those in areas not served by cable or those too poor to afford subscription cable—would receive delayed access to programs or no access at all.

In a decision that should radically improve the power and potential of cable television, the federal court of appeals invalidated the FCC restrictions as they applied to cable television. Relying on Southwestern Cable, the court said the FCC may regulate cable television but only where the objectives to be achieved were "long-established regulatory goals in the field of television broadcasting" or were "congressionally approved." Further, the FCC may regulate cable only to achieve ends for which it could also regulate broadcast television.

Did the FCC regulations restricting the pay television programming standards offered by cablecasters satisfy these standards? The court looked to the underlying rationale of the restrictive rules to answer this question:

[The purpose of the pay cable rules] is to prevent siphoning of feature film and sports material from conventional broadcast television to pay cable. Although there is dispute over the effectiveness of the rules, it is clear that their thrust is to prevent any competition by pay cable entrepreneurs for film or sports material that either has been shown on conventional television or is likely to be shown there. How such an effect furthers any legitimate goal of the Communications Act is not clear. * * * First, the commission appears to take the position that it has both the obligation and the authority to regulate program format content to maintain present levels of public enjoyment. For this reason, and because the commission also seems to assert that the overall level of public enjoyment of television entertainment would be reduced if films or sports events were shown only on pay cable or shown on conventional television only after some delay, it concludes that anti-siphoning rules are both needed and authorized. Second, and closely related, is the argument pressed here by counsel for the commission that Section 1 of the Communications Act, 47 U.S.C.A. § 151

(1970), mandates the commission to promulgate anti-siphoning rules since cable television cannot now and will not in the near future provide a nationwide communications service. * * * Before considering each of these arguments in turn, we note that we do not understand the commission to be asserting that subscription cable television will divide audiences and revenues available to broadcast stations in such a manner as to put the very existence of these stations in doubt.

The court next noted that the FCC has concluded, contrary to the court's decision in WEFM, text, p. 786, that it has no statutory authority to dictate entertainment formats in the radio broadcast context, text, p. 787. Reflecting on the FCC's stated aversion to dictating entertainment formats, the court observed:

If the commission's own recently announced standards are applied to the rules challenged here, it seems clear that the rules cannot stand. The very essence of the feature film and sports rules is to require the permission of the commission "to commence * * * programming, including program format services, offered to the public." However, it has been the consistent position of the commission itself that cablecasters, like broadcasters, are not to be regulated as common carriers, a view sustained by a number of courts. * * We seriously doubt that the Communications Act could be construed to give the commission "regulatory tools" over cablecasting that it did not have over broadcasting. Thus, even if the siphoning rules might in some sense increase the public good, this consideration alone cannot justify the commission's regulations.

The court said that the FCC had not produced sufficient facts to demonstrate that the public interest necessitated preservation of "free" television as the primary viewing service. The court said there is not "even speculation in the record about what material would replace that which might be 'siphoned' to cable television." Without such a comparative inquiry, the court could not understand how the FCC could determine "the current level of programming as a baseline for adequate service." The court also questioned the FCC's determination that feature films are a sufficiently unique format to warrant protection. It noted that "broadcasters are increasingly substituting made-for-television movies—for which 'siphoning' is not a problem since the broadcasters own the copyrights—for feature films."

The court then stated its conclusions as follows:

The sole purpose of undertaking this analysis is to demonstrate that the commission has, in this proceeding, seemingly backed into an area of regulation * * *. Indeed, in this very proceeding, and despite the commission's definition of current quantity and quality levels of films and sports events as the minimum level consistent with adequate television service, there is no indication that the commission is prepared to require broadcasters to continue to present material presently on conventional television. In the absence of this court's opinion in WEFM, these unexplained inconsistencies in agency policy would require us to set aside the commission's rules and remand the case to the agency to allow it to "supply a reasoned analysis indicating that prior policies and standards are being deliberately changed, not casually ignored." Because we understand the commission's Memorandum Opinion and Order in the format change proceeding to constitute a request to this court to reconsider its position in WEFM, see 60 FCC2d at 865-866, and because we are hesitant to approve rules which seem inconsistent with the commission's best thinking in a closely analogous area, we think we should not affirm the feature film and sports regulations on the basis of WEFM.

Before remanding, however, the court considered and rejected the FCC's second theory of jurisdiction—the contention that Section 1 of the Communications Act, 47 U.S.C.A. § 151 requires the commission to formulate antisiphoning rules to protect those viewers to which cable is not available. The court referred to National Association of Theatre Owners v. FCC, 420 F.2d 194 (1969), cert. den. 397 U.S. 922 (1970), where the FCC itself had rejected such a construction of Section 1, stating that such an interpretation could not "reasonably be made."

The court summarized its holding on the pay cable television rules:

Although we hold today that the commission has not established its jurisdiction on the record evidence before it, we think it important to note the limits of our holding. We do not hold that the commission must find express statutory authority for its cable television regulations. Such a holding would be inconsistent with the nature of the FCC's Organic Act and the flexibility needed to regulate a rapidly changing industry. However, we do require that at a minimum the commission, in developing its cable television regulations, demonstrate that the objectives to be achieved by regulating cable television are also objectives for which the commission could legitimately regulate the broadcast media. Where the First Amendment is involved, more will be required. Further, we require that the commission state clearly the harm which its regulations seek to remedy and its reasons for supposing that this harm exists. Because our holding is so limited, it is possible that the commission will, after remand, be able to satisfy the jurisdictional prerequisites for regulating pay cable television. In order to avoid multiple remands, therefore, we will now consider other objections raised against these rules.

A further rationale for invalidating the rules was that there was no evidence in the record to support the need for regulation:

The commission has in no way justified its position that cable television must be a supplement to, rather than an equal of, broadcast television. Such an artificial narrowing of the scope of the regulatory problem is itself arbitrary and capricious and is ground for reversal. Moreover, by narrowing its discussion in this way the commission has failed to crystallize what is in fact harmful about "siphoning."

An additional factor leading to the invalidity of the pay cable regulations was the court's analysis of the impact of the First Amendment. Important differences between cable and broadcast television, the court said, necessitated differences in the First Amendment standards applied to each.

The First Amendment theory used to validate FCC regulation of broadcasting in National Broadcasting Co., text, p. 770, the court declared, "cannot be directly applied to cable television since an essential precondition of that theory—physical interference and scarcity requiring an umpiring role for government—is absent." There is no apparent scarcity of channels with cable systems. Cable has the capacity to convey more than thirty-five channels and technology is available to increase that number to eighty. It noted further that there are no barriers of physical or electrical interference or even of economic monopoly which prohibit operation of a number of cable systems in a given locality. Even if such scarcity did exist, the court, on the basis of Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, text, p. 584, ruled that scarcity resulting from economic conditions was insufficient to justify government intrusion into First Amendment rights. Miami Herald dealt with intrusion upon the rights of the conventional press, but the court in Home Box Office found no "constitutional distinction between cable television and newspapers on this point."

The inapplicability of the scarcity rationale does not mean that cable cannot be regulated. The key is the purpose for which the government regulates. The court used the test set forth in United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 at 377 (1960), for dealing with regulations designed to effectuate a government interest

"unrelated to the suppression of free expression." The court conceded that the FCC's purpose in issuing the pay cable rules was not content suppression but protection of the viewing rights of those not served by cable or too poor to pay for cable. Nevertheless, the court held that the FCC rules could not meet the standards set forth in O'Brien and, therefore, violated the First Amendment. Among other things, the court found no compliance with the implied requirement of O'Brien that a convincing showing, particularly in a rule-making context, must be made that a problem exists and that the solution offered is related to the statutory mandate of the agency.

While the court invalidated the FCC rules for cable television, it reached a different result with respect to subscription broadcast operators. In National Association of Theatre Owners (NATO) v. FCC, 420 F.2d 194 (D.C.Cir.), cert. denied 397 U.S. 922 (1970), the court of appeals had earlier affirmed the FCC's restrictions on subscription broadcast television. These restrictions had been based on an elaborate rule-making record. Since the NATO case, few subscription broadcast stations have begun operations on a commercial basis. As a result, the precepts of the NATO proceeding had not been shaken. Accordingly, the court chose not to reopen the issue of the rationality of the antisiphoning rules as they pertained to subscription broadcast television.

Perhaps cable will at last be able to emerge from the regulatory morass in which it has been trapped and will thus be able to fulfill its potential. The demise of the pay cable rules is certainly a new legal development that augurs well for the future of cable. Similarly, the copyright law limbo into which cable had been placed has now been clarified. Congress has enacted a new copyright law which specifically addresses the copyright status of cable. For a discussion of the copyright issues in cable television, see Chapter VIII, text, p. 605.

The Deregulation of Cable

In Report and Order in Docket No. 20984 and 21284, 79 FCC2d 663 (1980), the FCC abolished two of the principal regulatory limitations on the growth of cable—the restrictions on distant signal carriage and the syndicated program exclusivity rules on cable retransmission. These restrictions aided in protecting broadcasting at the expense of the growth of cable and owed their life to a large extent to the fact that cable retransmission of copyrighted broadcast programming did not constitute copyright infringement under the old 1909 Copyright Act which had governed copyright. See Fortnightly Corp. v. United Artists, Inc., 392 U.S. 390 (1968) and Teleprompter Corp. v. CBS, 415 U.S. 394 (1974), text, p. 691.

In 1976, Congress enacted a new copyright statute. See text, p. 689. With the advent of the 1976 Act, which finally confronted and attempted to resolve the cable copyright problem, the need for broadcaster protection from cable—in the light of cable's previous immunity from copyright liability vis-à-vis broadcasting—was sharply reduced. There is little doubt that the FCC repeal of both the restrictions on distant signal carriage and the syndicated program exclusivity rules was a response to the new reality.

A number of broadcasters, including the NAB and the major television networks, brought suit in the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit to set aside the FCC order to deregulate cable by rescinding the rules concerning syndicated program exclusivity and distant signal carriage. In the opinion which follows, the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in Malrite TV v. FCC, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1649, 652 F.2d 1140 (2d Cir. 1981), upheld the FCC's deregulatory orders. Judge Newman's opinion below provides the reader with an excellent account of the rise and decline of FCC regulation of cable.

---

MALRITE TV v. FCC

7 MED.L.RPTR. 1649, 652 F.2D 1140 (2D CIR. 1981).

NEWMAN, Circuit Judge:

In a major reversal of its regulatory policy, the Federal Communications Commission ("FCC" or "commission") has decided to deregulate cable television by rescinding rules relating to syndicated program exclusivity and distant signal carriage. Television broadcasting and programming interests have petitioned to set aside the FCC's order and to reimpose the regulations, which have been in force since 1972. On November 19, 1980 we stayed the order pending the disposition of the appeal. We now vacate the stay and deny the petition, thereby permitting the exclusivity and distant signal rules to be repealed.

The television broadcasting industry, transmitting video signals free to viewers, is dominated by the three national networks, which contract with local station affiliates to carry network programming, most of which the networks purchase from independent producers. In addition, there are unaffiliated, independent stations which obtain most of their programming in the syndication market.<sup>1</sup> The cable television industry consists of various local systems, which transmit broadcast video signals from a central station to individual homes by closed circuit, coaxial cable. Cable subscribers pay a monthly fee to receive a basic set of channels plus an optional fee for special channels (pay cable).

Each of the 1,000 broadcasting stations, affiliate or independent, operates along an electromagnetic frequency established by the FCC on either very high frequency (VHF) or ultra high frequency (UHF) channels. The VHF range produces a higher quality viewing signal than UHF for most viewers. Though the FCC had avidly supported the expansion of UHF channels as a means of providing increased program diversity and expression of local interests, UHF stations have been plagued with financial difficulties due to small audiences and low revenues, stemming in part from their inferior reception, and comprise the least profitable sector of the television industry. See R. Noll, M. Peck & J. McGowan, Economic Aspects of Television Regulation 79-129 (1973) [hereafter "R. Noll, et al."]; Revised TV Broadcasting Financial Data-1978, FCC Memo No. 30037 (July 17, 1980). The networks and their affiliates, which operate primarily in the VHF range, account for the largest audience shares and the vast majority of industry revenues and profits. See R. Noll, et al., supra at 3-5, 16-18; Revised TV Broadcasting Financial Data-1978.

Cable television mitigates some of the disadvantages faced by UHF stations by making possible improved reception; to a cable subscriber, the reception quality of a UHF signal is indistinguishable from a VHF signal. But cable provides an additional service by increasing the number of stations available to a viewer through the importation of signals from distant geographic areas using microwave relays or orbiting communications satellites. Cable increases viewers' program choices, offering greater content and time diversity, and consequently it diverts some portion of the 1. Syndicated programming, supplied by independent producers, consists of either programs previously broadcast on network stations or newly produced programs. Unlike network programming, simultaneous broadcasting of syndicated programs is infrequent because the independent stations do not all purchase the same programs. See Besen, Manning & Mitchell, Copyright Liability for Cable Television: Compulsory Licensing and the Coase Theorem, 21 J.L. & Econ. 67, 77 (1978).

---

viewing audience away from local broadcast stations to more distant ones.

After an initial period in which the FCC declined to exercise regulatory authority over cable television on the grounds that it did not have jurisdiction under the Communications Act, see Frontier Broadcasting Co. v. Collier, 24 FCC 251 (1958), reconsideration denied in Report and Order in Docket No. 12443, 26 FCC 403, 428 (1959), the FCC began to regulate the cable industry directly in 1966.<sup>2</sup> See Second Report and Order in Docket Nos. 14895, 15233 and 15971, 2 FCC2d 725 (1966). The Supreme Court upheld the FCC's jurisdiction over cable in United States v. Southwestern Cable Co., 392 U.S. 157, 178 (1968), insofar as the particular regulations were "reasonably ancillary" to the commission's performance of its statutory duties. These 1966 regulations initiated close to a decade of regulation that can fairly be described as hostile to the growth of the cable industry, as the FCC sought to protect, in the name of localism and program diversity, the position of existing broadcasters, and particularly, the struggling UHF stations. See Besen & Crandall, The Deregulation of Cable Television, 44 Law & Contemp. Prob. 77 (1981); Chazen & Ross, Federal Regulation of Cable Television: The Visible Hand, 83 Harv.L.Rev. 1820 (1970). These rules severely restricted the expansion of cable television services by permitting cable operators in the top 100 markets to import distant signals only after showing in an evidentiary hearing that to do so would be in the public interest and not harmful to UHF broadcast services.<sup>3</sup> While the cable industry continued to grow in the 1960's in spite of these restrictions and other costly operating requirements, such as mandatory program origination, access, channel capacity, and other equipment regulations, it entered the 1970's as a small industry, relegated primarily to rural areas and small communities due in large part to the FCC's policies. Besen & Crandall, supra at 79, 93.

In late 1971, the commission began to consider relaxation of the cable television regulations. See Commission Proposals for Regulation of Cable Television, 31 FCC2d 115 (1971) ("Letter of Intent" to Congress). Shortly thereafter, the 1972 regulations emerged from an industry-wide Consensus Agreement negotiated by the White House and the affected industry interests—broadcasters, cable operators, and program producers (copyright owners). Cable Television Report and Order, 36 FCC2d 143 (1972). Though the 1972 rules eased the 1966 restrictions and permitted limited cable expansion, broadcasting interests were still strongly protected. The Report and Order challenged on this appeal, Report and Order in Docket Nos. 20988 and 21284, 79 FCC2d 663 (1980) [hereafter "Report and Order"], abolishes the core of the 1972 regulatory structure by

2. The commission began regulating the cable industry indirectly as early as 1962, when it denied a request for a permit by a common carrier to install microwave relays to carry signals for a cable television system. Carter Mountain Transmission Corp., 32 FCC 459 (1962), aff'd, 321 F.2d 359 (D.C.Cir.), cert. denied, 375 U.S. 951 (1963). The commission held that granting the permit, though improving the cable system's service to its subscribers, was not in the public interest because it would adversely affect the economic operation of a local broadcast station.

3. There are about 200 television markets in the United States. Eighty-six per cent of the approximately 74 million television households are located in the top 100 markets; 33 per cent are in the top 10 markets. Notice of Proposed Rule Making in Docket Nos. 20988 and 21284, 71 FCC2d 1004, 1011 (1979). About one-third of all television households have access to cable service, and about 19 per cent of all television households subscribe. Id. at 1013-14. The households for which a cable connection is available are located primarily outside of the major metropolitan markets. Report in Docket No. 21284, Inquiry into the Economic Relationship Between Television Broadcasting and Cable Television, 71 FCC2d 632, 664-65 (1979) [hereafter "Economic Inquiry Report"].

repealing the two main methods of broadcaster protection, the distant signal carriage and syndicated program exclusivity restrictions on cable retransmissions.

The distant signal rules, 47 C.F.R. §§ 76.59(b)–(e), 76.61(b)–(f), and 76.63 (1980), limit the number of signals from distant stations that a cable system can transmit to its subscribers, the limit varying according to market size and the number of available over-the-air signals within the market. While cable systems are required to carry all local stations (defined as within 35 miles of the cable system's community), the number of distant signals that they can carry is limited as follows: in the top 50 markets, cable systems can make available a total of 3 network stations and 3 independents; in the second 50 markets, 3 networks and 2 independents; in the smaller markets, 3 networks and 1 independent; 2 "bonus" independent signals can be carried in major markets where local signals fill the allotted cable complement. By limiting the number of distant signals, the FCC sought to lessen potential adverse impact on the audience shares of local stations, a policy which has the additional effect of lessening the attractiveness of cable to potential subscribers.

The syndicated program exclusivity rules, 47 C.F.R. §§ 76.151–76.161 (1980), authorize a local television station, which has purchased exclusive exhibition rights to a program, to demand that a local cable system delete that program from distant signals, whether or not the television station was simultaneously showing, or ever planning to show, the program. Copyright holders, in addition to broadcasters, are also protected by the rules and can require deletion of their programs from cable systems. The extent and duration of this protection varies according to market size, program type, and time of showing with the greatest protection afforded to stations located in the largest markets.<sup>5</sup> Cable operators are allowed to substitute other distant signals when they have to delete a program under these rules.

These 1972 rules were fashioned in the context of a continuing policy debate as to whether cable operators should face copyright liability for the programs they retransmitted to subscribers. Prior to Congress'

---

5. For example, in the top 50 markets, at the request of a local station, cable operators must delete all syndicated programs under exclusive exhibition contract to the requesting station regardless of when the program is scheduled for showing on the local station, and program copyright owners can request deletion for one year after the first syndicated sale of the program, even if no local station has the rights to exhibit it. In the second 50 markets, distant syndicated programs need not be deleted if broadcast in prime time unless the requesting local station is also planning to air the program in prime time, and exclusivity rights expire at specified time periods or on the occurrence of specified events, depending on the nature of the program, e.g., first-run syndicated series and feature films are protected for two years while reruns of network series are protected for only one year. Only systems in the top 100 markets are subject to these rules.

Though much less comprehensive in coverage, exclusivity rules exist for network programming. Duplication of network programming is prohibited with respect to simultaneous showings. 47 C.F.R. §§ 76.92–76.99 (1980). The duration of network program protection is more limited than that for syndicated programs in part due to the different methods of distribution. Unlike network programs, which are shown at the same time on virtually all affiliates as they come over the air, with exceptions for stations in different time zones that involve program retaping, syndicated programs are shown at separately scheduled, diverse times by each purchasing independent station. Moreover, cable systems may not carry more than three network signals, which reduces the possibility of duplication of local affiliate programming, whereas they can carry several independent signals, which increases the likelihood of a syndicated program being duplicated. The network nonduplication rules, as well as rules requiring the blacking out of certain live sports programs, 47 C.F.R. § 76.67 (1980), are not altered by the Report and Order challenged on appeal, though petitioners Commissioner of Baseball, National Football League, National Basketball Association, and National Hockey League, and intervenors American Broadcasting Companies, Inc., and Jet Broadcasting Company, Inc., contend that repeal of the distant signal and syndicated exclusivity rules will decrease the effectiveness of the network and sports programming regulations.

revision of the copyright laws in 1976, the Supreme Court had consistently held that cable systems were not liable under the copyright laws for their use of copyrighted broadcast programs without the owner's consent. Teleprompter Corp. v. Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc., 415 U.S. 394 (1974); Fortnightly Corp. v. United Artists Television, Inc., 392 U.S. 390 (1968). As a result of these rulings, while the broadcasting industry spent billions of dollars to create and purchase programming, cable operators could retransmit those programs at their operating cost without making any payments to program suppliers. Losing in the courts, broadcasters sought FCC protection from what they alleged was a situation of "unfair competition" by cable systems. The FCC rules restricting cable operators' ability to carry distant signals and syndicated programs served, in effect, as proxies for the copyright liability the courts had refused to impose, by restricting cable systems in their use of copyrighted works. See H.R.Rep. No. 1476, 94th Cong., 2d Sess. 176-77, reprinted in [1976] U.S. Code Cong. & Ad. News 5659, 5792-93; Comment, Regulatory Versus Property Rights Solutions for the Cable Television Problem, 69 Calif.L.Rev. 527, 536-44 (1981). Indeed, the revision of the cable television rules in 1972 pursuant to the industry-wide compromise was undertaken with a view toward facilitating enactment of legislation imposing copyright liability on cable operators. See Commission Proposals for Regulation of Cable Television, supra, 31 FCC2d at 115-16; Geller v. FCC, 610 F.2d 973, 974-75 (D.C.Cir.1979) (per curiam).

The situation changed, however, in 1976, when Congress adopted a system of partial copyright liability for cable television with a compulsory licensing scheme. 17 U.S.C. § 111 (1976). Under the new Copyright Act, cable operators are expressly permitted to retransmit programs without any need to obtain the consent of, or negotiate license fees directly with, copyright owners, but in return they must pay the owners a prescribed royalty fee, based on the number of distant signals the system carries and its gross revenues. Ibid. See generally Nimmer on Copyright § 8.18[E] (1980). After Congress had resolved the copyright issue by a system of compulsory licensing, the FCC commenced an inquiry into the need for maintaining its copyright surrogates, the distant signal and syndicated exclusivity rules. Notice of Inquiry in Docket No. 20988, 61 FCC2d 746 (1976) (announcing review of desirability of syndicated exclusivity rules); Notice of Inquiry in Docket No. 21284, 65 FCC2d 9 (1977) (announcing sweeping review of economic relationship between cable and broadcast television industries).<sup>7</sup> These inquiries resulted in two extensive staff reports advocating elimination of the rules, Report in Docket No. 20988, Cable Television Syndicated Program Exclusivity Rules, 71 FCC2d 951 (1979), and Report in Docket No. 21284, Inquiry into the Economic Relationship Between Television Broadcasting and Cable Television, 71 FCC2d 632 (1979) [hereafter "Economic Inquiry Report"]. After considering several econometric and case studies concerning the impact of cable television on local station audiences and future cable penetration rates, the commission found that the impact on broadcasting stations from the deregulation of cable television would be negligible, and that consumers would be decidedly better off due to increased viewing options from the greater availability of expanded cable services.

In conjunction with the release of these reports, the FCC initiated an informal notice-and-comment rulemaking proceeding to eliminate the distant signal and syndicated exclusivity restrictions. Notice of Proposed Rule Making in Docket Nos. 20988 and 21284, 71 FCC2d 1004 (1979).

7. This reevaluation was further prompted by Geller v. FCC, supra, 610 F.2d at 980, which required the FCC to review the necessity of retaining the syndicated exclusivity rules.

After widespread public comment and administrative reevaluation, it issued the Report and Order, which adopted the proposal for repeal with three commissioners dissenting in whole or in part. The FCC also rejected a suggestion of the National Telecommunications and Information Administration (NTIA) of the United States Department of Commerce that it impose a "retransmission consent" requirement on cable systems if it eliminated the distant signal and syndicated exclusivity rules. Under that proposal, cable operators would need the consent of the originating broadcast station before they could transmit non-network programming to their subscribers.<sup>8</sup> Both the United States Department of Justice and the United States Copyright Office opposed the NTIA proposal as contrary to Congress's mandate of a compulsory licensing system for cable television under the new Copyright Act, and the FCC adopted their view.

Petitioners challenge the Commission's Report and Order, among other grounds, for seriously misconstruing the mandate of the 1976 Copyright Act and for being arbitrary and capricious. We conclude that a fair reading of the Copyright Act supports the FCC's position and that the FCC's action was neither arbitrary nor capricious. While the deregulation of the cable television industry raises serious policy questions, evidenced by the sharp division within the commission as to the conclusions of the Report and Order, these questions are best left to the agencies that were created, in large part, to resolve them.

FCC AUTHORITY UNDER THE COPYRIGHT ACT

Petitioners' substantive argument concerning the FCC's interpretation of its regulatory authority over cable television under the Copyright Act is two-pronged:

1. that the act's compulsory licensing system was premised on maintenance of the existing regulatory framework and
2. that the act does not prohibit adoption of a retransmission consent requirement.

These claims are based on passages in the act and its legislative history, allegedly indicating Congress's intention to leave the FCC with free rein to readjust inter-industry relations by regulation. Specifically, petitioners refer to the provision establishing the compulsory license, § 111, which premises the license upon the "carriage of signals * * * permissible under the rules, regulations, or authorizations of the Federal Communications Commission." 17 U.S.C. § 111(c)(1). Petitioners contend that this language implies both that the FCC cannot upset the existing framework restricting the amount of programming cable systems can carry, and that the commission can adopt rules conditioning cable retransmission upon receipt of broadcaster consent, as the NTIA proposed, because the compulsory license covers only signals the FCC permits cable systems to carry pursuant to commission rules. Petitioners further rely on a passage in the report of the House Judiciary Committee, which stated that the Committee did not intend to "interfere" with FCC rules or communications policy, and that the FCC should neither read the copyright legislation to touch on issues such as increased distant signal carriage, nor rely on it to enact any significant changes in the existing "delicate balance" of regulation in areas where Congress had not resolved

8. The NTIA proposal would have required consent for only new and expanding cable systems and would have grandfathered existing systems because they were built on the basis of either no or partial copyright liability. On this appeal petitioners do not seem to envision such a limited retransmission consent rule, though their arguments are not directed to the content of such a regulation but rather to the FCC's ability to impose a consent requirement in general.

the issue. H.R.Rep. No. 1476, supra at 89, [1976] U.S. Code Cong. & Ad. News at 5703-04. From these glimmerings of legislative intent, petitioners contend that the legislative scheme will not tolerate repeal of the distant signal or syndicated exclusivity rules, but will accept a retransmission consent requirement.

We reject both contentions. Though Congress was aware of the underlying regulations restricting cable transmissions when it adopted the compulsory licensing system, it also recognized the legitimacy within the statutory plan of FCC modifications of that regulatory structure. Congress provided that the Copyright Royalty Tribunal ("Tribunal"), the entity established to collect and distribute the royalty fees, could readjust the statutory royalty rate if the FCC altered either the distant signal or syndicated program exclusivity rules. 17 U.S.C. §§ 801(b)(2)(B) and (C) (1976). The plain import of § 801 is that the FCC, in its development of communications policy, may increase the number of distant signals that cable systems can carry and may eliminate the syndicated exclusivity rules, in which event the Tribunal is free to respond with rate increases.

The views expressed in the House Report do not call for a different construction. Though perhaps revealing concern for congressional etiquette among the several committees with overlapping jurisdiction over the regulated subject matter, the comments do not foreclose the FCC's decision to repeal the distant signal and exclusivity rules. In repealing its rules, the FCC has heeded the Committee's caution against using the 1976 copyright legislation to determine matters that Congress "did not resolve." The FCC did not base its repeal of the cable regulations solely upon the revision, but upon a careful reassessment, in light of all the evidence, of the gains and losses to the public interest from deregulation.

While the commission is not obliged by the act to preserve existing rules, it is not free to adopt a new one that would be inconsistent with a basic arrangement of the new legislation. Retransmission consents would undermine compulsory licensing because they would function no differently from full copyright liability, which Congress expressly rejected. Under the NTIA proposal cable operators would be forced to negotiate individually with numerous broadcasters and would not be guaranteed retransmission rights, a scenario Congress considered unworkable when opting for the compulsory licensing arrangement. H.R.Rep. No. 1476, supra at 89, [1976] U.S. Code Cong. & Ad. News at 5704; see Comment, Regulatory Versus Property Rights Solutions for the Cable Television Problem, supra at 550. A rule imposing a retransmission consent requirement would also directly alter the statutory royalty formula by precipitating an increase in the level of payments of cable operators to obtain consent for program use. Such a rule would be inconsistent with the legislative scheme for both the specific compensatory formula and the appropriate forum for its adjustment. In an era of compulsory copyright licensing,<sup>10</sup> we find it difficult to imagine that Congress intended its formula for royalty fees to be only a minimum subject to FCC alteration, since it delegated broad discretionary authority to the Tribunal, and not the FCC, to readjust the rates if regulatory action so required. Congress did not specifically set the royalty rate for other types of compulsory licenses established under the new act. See 17 U.S.C. § 118 (1976) (public broadcasting royalty rates set by Tribunal). To hold that the compulsory license formula sets only a minimum, and not a maximum rate (subject to Tribunal adjustment), would undermine the carefully established legislative arrangement.<sup>11</sup>

10. The 1976 Copyright Act provided for blanket licensing in several contexts in addition to cable television. See 17 U.S.C. § 116 (1976) (juke boxes); id. § 115 (mechanical royalties); id. § 118 (public broadcasting).

REVIEW OF THE FCC'S RULEMAKING PROCESS

Apart from arguments based on the Copyright Act, petitioners contend that the FCC's determination to repeal the cable television regulations should be set aside as arbitrary and capricious. 5 U.S.C. § 706(2)(A) (1976). The scope of judicial review of informal rulemaking under the Administrative Procedure Act is circumscribed. Though a reviewing court is to be "searching and careful" in its inquiry to ensure that the agency has articulated a "rational connection between the facts found and the choice made," Burlington Truck Lines, Inc. v. United States, 371 U.S. 156, 168 (1962), it cannot substitute its judgment for that of the agency. Citizens to Protect Overton Park v. Volpe, 401 U.S. 402, 416 (1971).

The report and order repealing the cable television regulations followed several years of thorough study by FCC staff and extensive public commentary, both before and after reports of findings were issued in 1979. Numerous econometric studies, as well as case studies of existing markets where cable systems had been less strictly regulated because of "grandfathering" provisions in the FCC regulations,<sup>12</sup> were carefully evaluated in reaching the administrative decision. Petitioners challenge the FCC's use of the vast material compiled in the proceeding as biased and irrational, contending that the FCC's conclusion that broadcasting stations would not be injured from cable deregulation was unfounded, and that the FCC failed to consider fully, or impartially, data projecting its decision's adverse economic impact on station finances and program supply. For example, the professional sports leagues claim the commission did not consider the effect of deregulation on sports programming; the independent television stations charge it with viewing the industry as a whole, thereby ignoring the adverse impact on independents; and American Broadcasting Companies, Inc. ("ABC") contends that the FCC failed to consider the effects of deregulation upon different groups of viewers.

The FCC specifically responded to petitioners' factual and theoretical assertions in the Report and Order, articulating clear reasons when it rejected, or did not fully use, the economic predictions in industry studies due to erroneous assumptions or modeling flaws. E.g., Economic Inquiry Report, supra, 71 FCC2d at 677-78 (rejecting certain results of Wharton Econometric Forecasting Associates study for National Association of Broadcasters because it used a formula that biased results toward smaller independent stations), reasserted in Report and Order, supra, 79 FCC2d at 696. It commissioned an outside economist to reanalyze the data in his study, one on which the FCC's 1979 reports relied, after incorporating industry criticisms of his techniques; his results were unchanged. Appendix B, Report and Order, supra, 79 FCC2d at 827 (Rand Note, prepared for FCC by R. Park). The Report and Order thus reasserted the 1979 reports' conclusion that unregulated cable television would divert less than ten per cent of local station audiences, a result that would have only a slight effect on broadcasting industry revenues and the supply of programming. We cannot conclude that this finding was arbitrary or capricious. The commission offered a rational explanation for its policy founded on a predictive judgment well within its authority. See FCC v. WNCN Listeners Guild, 450 U.S. 582, 49 U.S.L.W. 4306 (Mar. 24, 1981).

11. Because we find that the FCC's rejection of a transmission consent requirement was based on a proper construction of the Copyright Act, we do not reach petitioners' further contentions that such a requirement, if not prohibited by the Copyright Act, would be permissible under the Communications Act, 47 U.S.C. § 151 et seq. (1976).

12. Under 47 C.F.R. §§ 76.65 and 76.99 (1980), the regulations regarding distant signal and syndicated exclusivity, respectively, were made inapplicable to signals being transmitted by cable systems prior to March 31, 1972.

Nor do we think the FCC assigned too little significance to, or overlooked, any of the contentions by any of the pertinent segments of the industry. While independent stations are less profitable than network affiliates, there were data indicating that local affiliates were subject to greater audience diversion than independents, e.g., R. Noll, et al., supra at 162-69, that UHF stations, most of which are independent, benefited from cable television in terms of improved viewing quality, E.g., id. at 166, and that independent stations in the grandfathered markets prospered, Economic Inquiry Report, supra, 71 FCC2d at 698-701. Though in the past the FCC has accorded special treatment to UHF stations, it is not required to do so when in its judgment the public interest would be disserved; the FCC's statutory directives are to promote a "rapid, efficient" nationwide communications service and to encourage its use in the "public interest," 47 U.S.C. §§ 151, 303 (1976), neither of which commands a specific industry structure or protection of any particular stations from financial difficulty or even failure. Moreover, the FCC reviewed the circumstances of broadcast stations that filed comments alleging current or potential injury from cable television and found that cable had not adversely affected those stations. Economic Inquiry Report, supra, 71 FCC2d at 711. The concerns of independent broadcasters were adequately considered by the FCC and did not require retention of either set of rules.

The independent stations further maintain that the FCC should have grandfathered existing syndicated program exclusivity contracts. The FCC was not required to take such action upon elimination of the exclusivity rules. The property of regulated industries is subject to such limitations as may reasonably be imposed in the public interest, and consequently, as numerous courts have recognized, regulations may be adopted that abolish or modify preexisting interests. For example, in General Telephone Company of the Southwest v. United States, 499 F.2d 846, 863-64 (5th Cir. 1971), FCC rules were upheld requiring telephone companies to divest their interests in cable television systems; in rejecting a grandfathering claim, the Court stated that the FCC should not be limited to building on the status quo when seeking to impose a regulatory policy. Moreover, in deciding not to grandfather existing exclusivity rights, the commission considered evidence indicating that these exclusivity rights were rarely asserted.

The sports programming issue was not as thoroughly reviewed by the commission in the preliminary stages of the rulemaking process as other issues, such as the effect on independent stations, because no change in the primary means of sports program protection, the home broadcast black-out rules, 47 CFR § 76.67 (1980), was ever contemplated. However, the commission did respond to the sports leagues' comments in the report and order. The leagues contend that cable television, by making available more broadcasts of games from distant cities when a club is playing at home, will decrease gate receipts, threaten the league concept by hurting weaker franchises, and ultimately lead to less sports programming. But the leagues did not produce any evidence that the number of sports broadcasts by home clubs has been reduced in the existing areas of high cable penetration, or would be reduced in the future. Further, as the FCC noted, many variables besides the availability of sports programming on television influence gate attendance, such as the weather and the caliber of the home and visiting teams. It was not arbitrary for the FCC to conclude that sports programming requires no special protection after the repeal of the distant signal rules.

Finally, the FCC's action is not deficient, as ABC contends, for lack of precise assessment of the impact of repeal on discrete groups of viewers. While the FCC did not conduct detailed demographic studies of cable and noncable television audiences, this fact does not lessen the validity of its conclusion that deregulation is in the public interest. Though lower-income families benefit more from a system of free television than from cable television, see R. Noll, et al., supra at 25–26, the expansion of cable services was reasonably found not to threaten the basic nature of free television. Given current and estimated cable penetration rates and the profitability of the broadcasting industry, we do not doubt the reasonableness of the FCC's conclusion that programming on free television will not substantially change or diminish after deregulation.<sup>13</sup> If free television retains its existing programming, then there is an increase in overall consumer welfare and no significant inequity among groups of viewers from the FCC's decision: those who do not purchase cable are substantially unaffected in their viewing patterns, while those who do, being able to pay for programming, some of which does not generate sufficient mass appeal to be aired on free television, receive a service more responsive to their viewing preferences. See id. at 136.<sup>14</sup>

Ultimately, the task in adopting rules to achieve the appropriate mix between broadcast and cable services requires determining a desired tradeoff between the inefficiency of the pricing system of cable television and the inadequacy of programming under free television. Since the marginal cost of programs for an extra viewer is zero, any price paid by a cable subscriber for receiving television signals is inefficient. Though free television is price efficient, because advertisers and not viewers pay for programming, the pricing does not reflect the intensity with which viewers prefer to see certain types of shows. See Spence & Owen, Television Programming, Monopolistic Competition and Welfare, 91 Q.J.Econ. 103 (1977). Free television consequently limits program diversity by its concentration on mass audience shows, which make advertising worthwhile. In shifting its policy toward a more favorable regulatory climate for the cable industry, the FCC has chosen a balance of television services that should increase program diversity, a valid FCC regulatory goal, see FCC v. National Citizens Committee for Broadcasting, 436 U.S. 775, 795–97 (1978); United States v. Midwest Video Corp., 406 U.S. 649, 669 (1972) (plurality opinion). While there will undoubtedly be more of the same type of mass audience programming now populating the national networks on cable channels as well, the unlimited number of cable channels holds out the best possibility for special interest programming. As the market shares for mass audiences are divided up among the several stations, programming will be purchased to capture the next largest share, selective audiences, see R. Noll et al., supra at 151; Spence & Owen, supra, and programs will be supplied when revenues exceed cost and not only when a specified 13. As in Home Box Office, Inc. v. FCC, 567 F.2d 9 (D.C.Cir.) (per curiam), cert. denied 434 U.S. 829 (1977) (vacating FCC rules restricting pay cable showing of certain feature film and sports programming), there was no significant evidence presented of program siphoning.

14. Although in a system of only pay television (whereby the viewer pays per program or per channel, and not simply a cable subscription and installation fee) the distributional effect would be to shift income from consumers to the television industry, under a cable system consumers gain, and it is the broadcasting network segment that loses due to increased competition from independent stations. R. Noll, et al., supra at 135, 173–74, 182.

audience size is attained, as under the advertiser-supported system.

The commission's repeal of the distant signal and syndicated exclusivity rules, after widespread participation of all industry segments and comprehensive evaluation of technical data, reflects the "rational weighing of competing policies" Congress intended to be exercised by the agency and to be sustained by a reviewing court. See FCC v. National Citizens Committee for Broadcasting, supra, 436 U.S. at 803.

BURDEN OF PROOF IN THE PROCEEDINGS

Petitioners raise one further contention that merits attention. They argue that the FCC impermissibly shifted the burden of proof in its rulemaking proceeding to those parties seeking retention of the regulations. We disagree. After an extended inquiry into the effect of the existing regulations and the state of the industry that encompassed several years of investigation, and thorough consideration of the vast material compiled, the FCC concluded that the existing regulations should be repealed. Only after receiving that evidence did the FCC ask members of the public who disagreed with its findings to produce data showing how they would be injured by deregulation since it had not found any evidence to that effect. Such action did not reverse the burden of proof because the FCC had already produced an overwhelming mass of evidence supporting elimination of the rules. Rather, its request for data, evincing a desire for widespread participation from all interested segments of the public who might be aware of information that the agency's intensive inquiry did not uncover, reflects the proper exercise of reasoned decision-making.

The petition to set aside the Report and Order is denied.

COMMENT

1. The Supreme Court refused to review the second circuit's decision in the Malrite case. See National Association of Broadcasters v. FCC, 454 U.S. 1143 (1982). Broadcasters feel that the copyright compensation provided to them by the 1976 act is still not sufficient to justify the new opportunities for cable to exploit broadcasting made possible by the FCC's cable deregulation orders reversed in Malrite.

Broadcasters have striven to change the Malrite decision by statute. In September 1982, H.R. 5949 was passed by the House. Among other matters the bill would, with some changes, reinstitute the pre-Malrite syndicated exclusivity rules. The bill's provisions, however, would exempt most of the existing cable industry from coverage.

2. In response to the change in the exclusivity rules and the repeal of the restriction on importing distant signals, the Copyright Tribunal Office has adjusted the rates imposed for the new programming made available to cable operators. See CRT Deregulation Adjustment, 47 Fed.Reg. 52146, 52155. It has been contended that the cable copyright structure was built upon the assumption that the FCC-imposed restrictions on cable would remain basically intact, although there might be minor changes.

3. Perhaps it could be argued that the distant carriage and syndicated exclusivity restrictions imposed by the FCC made sense prior to the enactment of the 1976 copyright law. The FCC was protecting the owners of copyrighted broadcast programming until the Congress had an opportunity to resolve the issue. The 1976 act, however, with its Copyright Royalties Tribunal procedures, did resolve the matter. Thus, arguably, there is no longer a need for the FCC to stretch its regulatory authority to provide a degree of protection the Congress, in enacting the 1976 act, has not found necessary.

FCC Regulation of Cable System Franchising

Presently, there is a multitiered system accepted for the regulation of CATV (cable) systems in the United States. State or local government agencies have the authority to issue franchises to locally selected cable system operators. But this system of local regulation operates subject to certain FCC standards. Cable operators, therefore, unlike broadcasters, have two systems of regulation to cope with, state or local and federal. With regard to the establishment of franchise fees, the FCC requires that franchise fees for cable systems serving 1,000 or more subscribers be no more than 3 percent of the franchisee's gross revenues from that system per annum. A franchise fee in the range of 3-5 percent of such revenues will be approved by the commission upon a showing that the fee is appropriate in light of the planned local regulatory program and that it will not interfere with the effectuation of federal regulatory goals.

The FCC recommends, but does not require, that as part of the franchising process the local franchising authority should

1. hold public selection proceedings which consider the legal, character, financial, technical, and other qualifications of each candidate,

2. limit the duration of franchise periods to fifteen years and require a public proceeding prior to any decision to renew,

3. require that the franchisee make significant efforts to complete the construction of the cable system within one year after FCC certification,

4. implement a policy of construction which would optimally require the complete wiring of the franchise area,

5. specify procedures to be adopted by the franchising authority and the franchisee for the continued administration of the cable system and the investigation and resolution of all subscriber complaints.

See FCC Regulation of Cable System Franchising, 47 CFR §§ 76.30-31 (1981).

Mandatory Carriage of "Local" Television Broadcast Signals

The provisions of 47 CFR §§ 76.57, 76.59 and 76.61 (1981) require that, upon request, cable systems must carry the broadcast signals of what normally would be considered the "local" television stations of the franchise area. These provisions thus vary according to the size of the television market—the cable system's community.

§ 76.57 requires cable systems operating in communities outside of all major and smaller television markets to carry the signals of—

1. TV stations within whose Grade B contours the cable systems operate;

2. noncommercial educational TV within whose specified zone the cable system operates; and

3. significantly viewed TV broadcast stations (see note on § 76.54)

§ 76.59 requires those systems operating in a community in whole or in part within a small TV market to carry the signals of:

1. TV broadcasts if within specified zone;

2. noncommercial educational TV if within Grade B contours;

3. commercial TV stations of other smaller TV markets if within Grade B contour;

4. commercial TV broadcasts that are significantly viewed in the community of the cable system.

§ 76.61 requires those systems operating in major television markets to carry the signals of:

1. TV stations (* * * in which the community of cable system franchise is wholly or partly) within its specified zone, except that there is no requirement to carry the signals of a TV station licensed to a designated community in another major television market unless the designated community is located wholly within the specified zone of the station;

2. noncommercial educational television broadcast stations if cable system operates in whole or in part within its Grade B contours;

3. TV broadcast stations licensed to obtain designated communities of the same major television market;

4. commercial television broadcast stations that are significantly viewed in the community of the cable system.

In addition to the mandatory carriage provisions above, the FCC permits cable systems to carry any additional "distant" signals. Also, pursuant to § 76.64, the provisions of §§ 76.57, 76.59, and 76.61 do not operate to require the carriage of any subscription television broadcast program.

What is the regulatory philosophy behind the mandatory carriage provisions? Is it to prevent the fragmentation of the viewing audience of the "local" television station? Should the FCC regulate to prevent the growth of a new technology?

Nonduplication Protection of Network Programming

Pursuant to 47 CFR § 76.92 (1981), the FCC requires that cable systems carrying the same "network programming" as a local commercial television broadcasting station or a noncommercial educational television broadcasting station shall, upon the request of the station licensee, delete the duplicating network programming of lower priority signals. (What is the purpose of the nonduplication rules?) Specifically, § 76.92 pertains to those cable systems operating in a community located in whole or in part within the thirty-five-mile specified zone of any television station or within the secondary zone, which extends twenty miles beyond the specified zone, of smaller market television stations. The FCC assigns the highest order of nonduplicating priority to those stations within whose specified zone the cable systems operate and a second priority to those smaller market stations within whose secondary zones the cable systems operate.

There are two exceptions under § 76.92 to their system of nonduplication protection:

1. any cable system operating within the secondary zone of a smaller market station is not required to delete the duplicating network program of any major market television programming whose reference point of broadcast is also within fifty-five miles of the cable system

2. a cable system is not required to delete any duplicating broadcast which is significantly viewed in the cable television community.

Pursuant to § 76.54, those signals that are significantly viewed in a specific community are listed in appendix A of the Memorandum Opinion and Order on Reconsideration of Cable Television Report and Order, FCC 72-530, 36 FCC2d 326 (1972). Any signal not encompassed by the surveys used in appendix B of that survey may be demonstrated as significantly viewed by independent audience surveys.

Exceptions to the Nonduplication Provisions

Section 76.94 provides for some exceptions to the nonduplication protections afforded broadcast stations in § 76.92: First, § 76.94 provides that cable systems need only refrain from simultaneously broadcasting protected network programming where the cable systems operator has received timely notification by the broadcasting stations of the date and time of the programming to be protected. Second, where the cable system is required to afford same-day protection either pursuant to FCC order or pending FCC action, the cable system need not 1) delete reception of any network program which would leave available for reception by subscribers, at any time, less than the programs of two networks; or 2) delete reception of a network program scheduled by the network between the hours of 6:00 and 11:00 P.M., but is to be broadcast by the station requesting the deletion outside the hours of what is normally considered prime time in the zone involved.

Section 76.95 provides three further exceptions to § 76.92: 1) A cable system need not delete any program which would be carried on the cable unit in color, but is to be broadcast in black and white by the station requesting deletion; 2) the mandatory deletion requirements of § 76.92 do not apply to cable systems with fewer than 1,000 subscribers; 3) cable systems need not extend network nonduplication protection beyond one hour after the scheduled time of completion of a live sports event.

The Boulder Case and Local Regulation of Cable

Are there limits to local regulation of cable? In Community Communications Co., Inc. v. City of Boulder, Colorado, 455 U.S. 40, (1982),—see p. 658—the Supreme Court ruled that Boulder had violated the antitrust provisions of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, by enacting an ordinance which prohibited the assignee of a cable television permit from expanding its cable operations for a period of three months. The decision has been heralded by cablecasters as the end of restrictive municipal regulation of the cable industry.

Boulder is a "home rule" municipality under the Colorado Constitution and is entitled to exercise "the full right of self-government in both local and municipal matters." In the late 1970s, the City Council of Boulder sought to revise its cable television policy to take advantage of new developments in technology and to lure new entrants into the Boulder cable market. While the City Council was drafting its proposed "model cable television ordinance," it enacted an "emergency" (moratorium) ordinance which prohibited the plaintiff, Community Communications Co., from expanding its business into other areas of the city for a period of three months.

Plaintiff sought a preliminary injunction in the federal district court to prevent the city's emergency ordinance from taking effect. Plaintiff alleged that, in enacting the ordinance, the City Council had violated § 1 of the Sherman Act which provides, in applicable part, that "Every contract, combination * * *, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States * * * is declared to be illegal." The city, in response, claimed antitrust immunity under the "state action" exemption set forth in Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341 (1943). The district court rejected the city's contention, finding Parker to be wholly inapplicable to the present case, 485 F.Supp. 1035 (1980). On appeal, the Tenth Circuit reversed the district court's ruling and found the Parker doctrine applicable. 630 F.2d 704 (1980).

The Supreme Court's majority opinion, written by Justice Brennan, analyzed the "state action" issue and set forth the following two-part standard for review. "Our precedents thus reveal that Boulder's moratorium ordinance cannot be exempt from antitrust scrutiny unless it constitutes the action of the State of Colorado itself in its sovereign capacity, see Parker, or unless it constitutes municipal action in furtherance or implementation of a clearly articulated and affirmatively expressed state policy."

Under the first test of the proffered standard, Justice Brennan had little difficulty dismissing Boulder's contention that its emergency ordinance was an act of government performed by the city acting as a state. This was based on his finding that: "[T]he Parker state action exemption reflects Congress' intention to embody in the Sherman Act the federalism principles that the state possesses a significant measure of sovereignty under our Constitution. But this principle contains its own limitation: Ours is a 'dual system of government' * * * which has no place for sovereign cities." Accordingly, Boulder's emergency ordinance could fall within the state action exemption only if it was enacted pursuant to a clearly articulated and affirmatively expressed state policy.

That claim was also dismissed by Justice Brennan for the majority: "(T)he requirement of 'clear articulation and affirmative expression' is not satisfied when the state's position is one of mere neutrality respecting the municipal actions challenged as anticompetitive. A state that allows its municipalities to do as they please can hardly be said to have 'contemplated' the specific anticompetitive actions for which municipal liability is sought."

Justice Rehnquist, joined by Chief Justice Burger and Justice O'Connor, in dissent, asserted that the majority had incorrectly framed the issue in the case by focusing on "exemption" analysis rather than on principles of federal preemption under the Supremacy Clause. Justice Rehnquist claimed that the Parker decision was not a "state action" exemption to the Sherman Act but reflected a congressional determination that, under certain circumstances, state regulation of the economy is not preempted by federal law. There is one important result of classifying Parker as Justice Rehnquist does. Under exemption theory, where a state or municipal ordinance is not saved by the Parker doctrine, the state may be found to have actually violated the Sherman Act. Under Justice Rehnquist's approach, the statute would simply be unenforceable because it is preempted. The preemption approach thus saves municipalities from Sherman Act liability and the threat of treble damages.

Does the Boulder design signal the end of municipal regulation of the cable television industry? See Marticorena, Municipal Cable Television Regulation—Is There Life After Boulder?, 9 Western St.U.L.Rev. 113 (1982). This commentator argues that Boulder will not end local regulation of cable. Boulder does, however, impose new responsibilities on local governments to be aware of local competitive conditions which will be affected by local regulation of cable since such post-Boulder regulation is likely to be the subject of increased antitrust litigation.

The Supreme Court in Boulder rejected the claim of the City of Boulder that its "home rule" status automatically exempted it from antitrust liability under the "state action" exemption announced in Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341 (1942).

Boulder raises important public policy concerns since it subjects municipalities with limited budgets to the threat of expensive antitrust litigation and the possibility of treble damage awards. Although the Boulder court recognized the negative implications of its decision, the Court felt bound by the principles of statutory construction. The public policy arguments were more appropriate for congressional debate.

Taking issue with Justice Rehnquist, Marticorena states that it is clear from the majority opinion in Boulder that a finding of no antitrust immunity cannot be regarded as a per se finding of Sherman Act liability. In the face of a Boulder-type decision, municipalities may still protect the integrity of their ordinances by demonstrating the reasonableness and social importance of the economic regulation.

After Boulder, it is clear that municipalities may restrict local competition in the cable television industry without violating the Sherman Act only where such action is somehow authorized by the state.

The future applicability of the "state action" exemption is thus entirely dependent upon the regulatory schemes of the individual states.

Marticorena points out that the regulatory schemes of the fifty states generally can be divided into three categories. First, there are those states, including Colorado, which have no statutes regulating cable television. As the Boulder decision makes clear, municipalities in these states cannot claim antitrust immunity as their respective states maintain a position of mere neutrality on the issue of anticompetitive cable regulation.

Falling within a second category of state regulatory schemes would be those states which either structure the cable system as a public utility or take direct responsibility for the franchising and regulation of cable operators. This centralized system should be safe from antitrust liability since any anticompetitive regulation would proceed directly from a state governmental unit.

The final category includes those states which delegate broad franchising authority to counties and municipalities and which specifically allow for local regulation of cable franchises. Marticorena asserts that municipalities acting pursuant to this type of regulatory scheme should be afforded immunity where the state has articulated a policy to displace competition in the cable market with regulation or monopoly public service.

THE RISE OF PUBLIC BROADCASTING

The Public Broadcasting Act of 1967

1. A significant development in the life of American radio and television was the Public Broadcasting Act of 1967, 47 U.S.

C.A. §§ 390-401. In January 1967 the Carnegie Foundation under the chairmanship of Dr. James R. Killian, Jr. of M.I.T. recommended the development of a nonprofit corporation to encourage the development of noncommercial television. The Carnegie Report was a seminal document, and the Public Broadcasting Act of 1967 owes much to the Report. See Public Television, A Program for Action, The Report and Recommendations of the Carnegie Commission on Educational Television (New York, Harper & Row, 1967). See also, Carnegie II (1979), which suggests substantial changes in the present governing mechanisms and funding of public broadcasting.

The scheme for selecting the board of directors of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, (CPB) now calls for a total of ten members, appointed by the president with the advice and consent of the Senate. Only six members of the Board appointed by the president may be members of the same political party. The act directs that members should be selected from among those eminent in educational, cultural, and artistic affairs, including radio and television; from among various regions of the nation, professions, and occupations; and from among various kinds of talent and expertise. One member of the board should be selected from among those who represent public radio stations and another from those who represent public television stations. Members should serve a term of five years but not more than two consecutive terms. See Public Broadcasting Amendments Act of 1981, 95 Stat. 725-736.

One of the broad purposes of the Public Broadcasting Act is to assist through matching grants in the construction of non-commercial educational television or radio broadcasting facilities. 47 U.S.C.A. § 391. But the truly novel aspect of the act is the provision for the creation of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting. Great Britain has had long experience with a public network run by an independent board—the much praised BBC, the British Broadcasting Corporation. Similarly, CBC, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which is sponsored by the federal parliament of Canada, is an integral part of Canadian life. But an American effort in the direction of government-sponsored broadcasting is a relatively recent development in American broadcasting. Indeed, whether the federal government can finance an instrument which will influence the opinion-making process is itself an unresolved First Amendment question. For these reasons the act is in some respects necessarily unclear.

Public Broadcasting and the First Amendment

The question of the future of public broadcasting has been debated almost solely by the executive and legislative branches of government. Rarely have courts had the opportunity to consider the matter. But Justice Douglas, in a separate concurring opinion in the CBS v. DNC case, see text, p. 858, took the opportunity to consider public broadcasting's role as part of the "press" and to raise a doubt as to the constitutionality of public broadcasting:

Public broadcasting, of course, raises quite different problems from those tendered by the TV outlets involved in this litigation.

* * * [The Corporation for Public Broadcasting] is a nonprofit organization and by the terms of 396(b) [of the Public Broadcasting Act of 1967] is said not to be "an agency or establishment of the United States Government." Yet, since it is a creature of Congress whose management is in the hands of a [b]oard named by the [p]resident and approved by the Senate, it is difficult to see why it is not a federal agency engaged in operating a "press" as that word is used in the First Amendment. If these cases involved that [c]orporation, we would have a situation compa-

table to that in which the United States owns and manages a prestigious newspaper like the New York Times. * * * The government as owner and manager would not, as I see it, be free to pick and choose such news items as it desired. For by the First Amendment it may not censor or enact or enforce any other "law" abridging freedom of the press. Politics, ideological slants, rightist or leftist tendencies could play no part in its design of programs. * * More specifically, the programs tendered by the respondents in the present cases could not then be turned down.

Governmental action may be evidenced by various forms of supervision or control of private activities. * * * I have expressed the view that the activities of licensees of the government operating in the public domain are governmental actions, so far as constitutional rights and responsibilities are concerned. * * * But that view has not been accepted. If a TV or radio licensee were a federal agency, * * * [as] a licensee of the [f]ederal [g]overnment [it] would be in precisely the situation of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting. A licensee, like an agency of the government, would within limits of its time be bound to disseminate all views. For being an arm of the government it would be unable by reason of the First Amendment to "abridge" some sectors of thought in favor of others. The Court does not, however, decide whether a broadcast licensee is a federal agency within the context of this case. Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. 94 (1973).

Justice Douglas asserted that a public station could not refuse the programs offered by the DNC and the spot announcements of BEM (Business Executives' Move for Vietnam Peace). Would public television serve as a solution to the access problem? If the only difference between private commercial stations and the public, noncommercial ones, particularly if CPB control is diminished, turns out to be that public stations receive federal grants that match their private contributions, while private stations must rely on advertising revenue, is that enough justification to treat the two media differently under the First Amendment?

“Objectivity” and “Balance” in Public Broadcasting

The Corporation for Public Broadcasting is supposed to facilitate the development of programming of high quality for educational broadcasting with “strict adherence to objectivity and balance in all programs or series of programs of a controversial nature.” See 47 U.S.C.A. § 396(g)(1)(A).

Is the requirement that public broadcasting must be “balanced” and “objective” enforceable? This issue was presented for decision in Accuracy In Media, Inc. v. FCC, 521 F.2d 288 (D.C.Cir. 1975).

Accuracy In Media (AIM), a feisty conservative citizens organization and a professional thorn in many a media side, filed a complaint against the Public Broadcasting System (PBS) before the FCC, charging that two programs distributed by PBS to member stations did not provide a balanced or objective presentation of the subject presented. In its complaint, AIM charged that PBS had violated the law in two respects. First, AIM charged that the PBS programs violated the fairness doctrine. (The FCC rejected this contention.) AIM's other contention involved a little-known provision of the Public Broadcasting Act of 1967, which required the Corporation for Public Broadcasting (CPB) to adhere to a standard of objectivity or balance in programming of a controversial nature.<sup>13</sup> AIM contended that the two offending programs (one dealing with sex education and the other dealing with the American system of criminal justice) violated the balance and objectivity requirement of the Public Broadcasting Act.

The provision of the Public Broadcasting Act which required “balance” and “objectivity” authorizes CPB to “facilitate the full development of educational television.” CPB's mandate is to obtain programs of “high quality * * * from diverse sources” and to make them available to noncommercial broadcasters. This provision of the act concludes that these responsibilities are to be accomplished “with strict adherence to objectivity and balance in all programs or series of programs of a controversial nature.”

AIM contended that since the PBS programs it objected to were funded by CPB, pursuant to the authorization just described, the programs were subject to the requirement of “strict adherence to objectivity and balance”—a requirement which AIM contended was “more stringent than the standard of balance and fairness in overall programming contained in the fairness doctrine.”

If CPB programming must be balanced and objective, how does such a requirement differ from the fairness doctrine? AIM argued that the balance and objectivity requirement differed from the fairness doctrine in two ways. With respect to the “balance” requirement of the programming standard, AIM argued that broadcasters must achieve a balanced presentation of the issues with respect to each program. Balanced discussion in a broadcaster's overall programming would not suffice as suggested by fairness doctrine law. With respect to “objectivity” requirements, AIM contended that the FCC would have to conduct a “more searching inquiry into alleged factual inaccuracies than contemplated by the fairness doctrine.”

The FCC refused to rule on the correctness of AIM's interpretation of the “balance and objectivity” standard in the Public Broadcasting Act because in its view it had no jurisdiction to enforce the Act. AIM then sought review in the federal court of appeals. The federal court, per Judge Bazelon, spokesman for the new liberal unease with the fairness doctrine, agreed with the FCC and not AIM.

13. 47 U.S.C.A. § 396(g)(1)(A) (1970).

The court of appeals' conclusion that the FCC had no jurisdiction to enforce the "balance and objectivity" standard was based on § 398 of the Public Broadcasting Act which provides that no "agency * * of the United States" should have authority to supervise or control CPB. The court reasoned that since the FCC was an "agency of the United States," ergo, the FCC could not "supervise" the Corporation for Public Broadcasting. Nevertheless, as Judge Bazelon conceded, the matter was hardly free from doubt. A provision of the Public Broadcasting Act of 1967, § 399, mandates "supervision" of noncommercial licenses and contemplates FCC supervision.

The court of appeals, per Judge Bazelon, however, made it clear that there was nothing in § 398 of the Federal Communications Act which served to limit FCC authority—"including the Fairness Doctrine"—over local noncommercial licensees. "While § 398 prohibits FCC jurisdiction over CPB and its program-related activities, i.e., production, funding or distribution, the commission retains its authority concerning the broadcasting of programs, whether funded by CPB or not." Noncommercial licensees, therefore, were subject to FCC jurisdiction including programming policies like the Fairness Doctrine. But the FCC could not enforce the "objectivity" and "balance" requirement imposed on CPB by the Public Broadcasting Act.

The implication from the legislative history materials gathered by Judge Bazelon in his decision for the federal court of appeals is that permitting FCC supervision of the programming product of PBS would result in precisely that governmental supervision which Congress had desired to prevent.

If the FCC had no jurisdiction or authority to enforce the balance and objectivity requirements of the Public Broadcasting Act, who did? AIM argued that if the FCC was removed from enforcing the standard, then the specific statutory directive of the Congress was rendered meaningless. Judge Bazelon disagreed. The congressional appropriations process was the means designed to safeguard against "partisan abuse." As Bazelon put it: "Ultimately, Congress may show its disapproval of any activity of the Corporation [for Public Broadcasting] through the appropriations process."

AIM lost its effort to secure a judicial ruling that the FCC had a duty to enforce the objectivity and balance requirement of the Public Broadcasting Act. The court not only held that the FCC did not have jurisdiction to enforce the obligation found in the Public Broadcasting Act requiring the Corporation for Public Broadcasting to adhere strictly to objectivity and balance in its programming, but the court went beyond the FCC's determination of no jurisdiction to enforce the objectivity and balance provisions. The federal court of appeals in effect repealed the specific congressional directive that there be objectivity and balance in CPB programming. "The corporation is not required to provide programs with 'strict adherence to objectivity and balance' but rather to 'facilitate the full development of educational broadcasting in which programs * * * will be made available * * *.' We leave the interpretation of this hortatory language to the directors of the corporation and to Congress in its supervisory capacity."

May Public Broadcasters Editorialize?

As you will remember from the Red Lion case, p. 845, broadcast licensees are permitted to editorialize. Is there any justification for making a distinction with regard to noncommercial educational broadcasting?

In League of Women Voters v. FCC, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 2081, 547 F.Supp. 379 (C.D.Cal. 1982), the constitutionality of the no-editorializing rule for public broadcasting set forth in 47 U.S.C. § 399 was successfully challenged. The version of § 399 considered by the federal district court in League of Women Voters differed significantly from the original language of § 399. On August 13, 1981, the Public Broadcasting Amendments Act of 1981, Pub.L. No. 97-35, 95 Stat. 725-36 (1981) became law.

The challenge filed by the plaintiffs to § 399 was directed solely to the statutory ban on editorializing by public broadcasters receiving federal grants from CPB. No challenge was made to the provision in § 399 prohibiting public broadcast stations from either endorsing or opposing political candidates.

There were three plaintiffs in League of Women Voters, the League of Women Voters of California, Congressman Henry Waxman, and Pacifica Foundation, which operates public broadcast stations receiving grants from CPB. Although equal protection objections to the statute were asserted, the contention that § 399's ban on editorializing violated the First Amendment was the determinative issue in the case.

The court said, however, that even though § 399 is being construed narrowly, the no-editorializing rule still limits participation in public issues by public broadcasters and, therefore, raises a serious First Amendment question. Statutes on First Amendment grounds can "withstand scrutiny under the First Amendment only if they serve a compelling state interest and are narrowly tailored to that end." Should less stringent standards be applied where the broadcast media are concerned? The court said, "No." The special factors present in FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, text, p. 920, were deemed not relevant.

What compelling state interests might be served by § 399? The defendant relied on two related justifications: 1. funded noncommercial broadcasters should "not become propaganda organs for the government"; and 2. government funding should not interfere "with the balanced presentation of opinion on funded noncommercial stations."

The court rejected these concerns as sufficient to justify a compelling state interest sufficient to save the statute from attack under the First Amendment. "The modest level of government funding, the protective insulation of the CPB, and the restrictions of the fairness doctrine all work to ensure that funded noncommercial broadcasters will not be vulnerable to attempts to use them as propaganda organs for the government. Nor will funded noncommercial broadcasters be influenced to take particular editorial positions in order to curry favor with the government. Both the 'stick' and the 'carrot' of federal funding have been effectively eliminated."

The court concluded that the government had failed to carry the burden that the ban on editorializing in § 399 was tailored with sufficient precision to meet the compelling state interest standard of review. "The fear that funded noncommercial broadcasters will become propaganda organs for the government is too speculative to provide such a compelling interest. The desire to ensure the balanced presentation of opinion by funded noncommercial broadcasters, even if it had been a motivating factor in the passage of § 399, also fails to provide a sufficiently compelling interest to justify the ban on editorializing imposed by that statute." Accordingly, the court held that § 399 violates the First Amendment "insofar as it prohibits funded noncommercial broadcasters from editorializing."

On February 28, 1983, the Supreme Court in FCC v. League of Women Voters, — U.S. —, 103 S.Ct. 1249 (1983), decided to review the constitutionality of the ban in revised § 399 of the Public Broadcasting Act prohibiting editorializing by public broadcasting stations which receive federal funds from the Corporation for Public Broadcasting. The government, in its jurisdictional statement seeking review, contended that the no-editorializing ban should be reviewed by a balancing test rather than by use of the strict scrutiny standard of review. The strict scrutiny standard would permit validation of the statute only if the rigors of the compelling state interest would be met.

If editorializing by public broadcasters is to be encouraged, should some due process protection attach? Writing before the decisions in AIM and League of Women Voters, Professor (now Judge) Canby thoughtfully delineated the problems endemic to monitoring a standard of "objectivity" and fairness when multiple decision makers—CPB, Public Broadcasting System (PBS), and the individual stations—are involved and concluded that the editorial function must be protected even in the case of publicly sponsored communication facilities. He cautioned against abandonment of content controls and an open access approach. But he stressed the need for identifying lines of editorial authority in public broadcasting and then adhering to them:

"[I]t is important that stations take the salutary step of clearly delineating where within their hierarchies the editorial responsibility lies. Protection of that editorial function will also be facilitated if some attempt is made to defer to expertise in its allocation and if professional standards for its exercise are developed and observed. * * * The prospect of enforcement of imprecise first amendment standards in a new medium of communication may give courts pause and cause stations and network officials to fear the bonds of judicial oversight. Nevertheless, some sort of procedural due process standards should be evolved for editorial decision making by stations supported by the state or receiving substantial government funding." Canby, The First Amendment And the State as Editor: Implications for Public Broadcasting, 52 Tex.L.Rev. 1123 at 1164–1165 (1974). The problems raised by the next subsection are illustrative.

The State in the Editor's Chair: Problems of Access in Public Broadcasting

Muir v. Alabama Educational Television Commission, 688 F.2d 1033 (5th Cir. 1982), presented the access issue in the context of public broadcasting. Alabama Educational Television Commission (AETC), a network of nine noncommercial educational television stations, is funded from state legislative appropriations, matching federal grants through the Corporation for Public Broadcasting (CPB), and private contributions. AETC is a member of the Public Broadcasting Service (PBS) and of the Station Program Corporation (SPC), a program-funding and acquisition mechanism operated by PBS. Members of SPC select and fund national public television programs distributed by PBS. Members agreeing to contribute are free to broadcast or not to broadcast programs. PBS's "Station Users Agreement" gives licensees the absolute right to decide what to broadcast and what not to broadcast.

AETC was scheduled to program "Death of a Princess," a dramatization of the public execution for adultery in 1977 of a Saudi Arabian princess and her lover, on May 12, 1980, at 8:00 P.M. There were protests about the planned showing of "Death of a Princess" for fear that its showing would jeopardize the physical security of Alabamians working in the Middle East. Two days prior to the planned broadcast, AETC announced that it would not broadcast the film.

Residents of Alabama who had planned to watch the show filed suit in the federal district court under 42 U.S.C.

§ 1983 and the First and Fourteenth Amendments to compel AETC to broadcast the film and to enjoin it from making "political" program decisions. The district court refused to order AETC to broadcast the program and granted summary judgment for AETC. A panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed the decision of the district court.

In Texas, a federal district court reacted affirmatively to a viewer's request that a noncommercial broadcast station, KUHT-TV, owned and operated by the University of Houston, which had scheduled "Death of a Princess" but then canceled it, be compelled to show it. The federal district court held that KUHT-TV was a "public forum" and that the station could not deny access to speakers without meeting the strict standing by which prior restraints are traditionally reversed. See Barnstone v. University of Houston, 487 F.Supp. 1347 (S.D.Tex.1980).

In the Houston case the district judge said that the decision to cancel "Death of a Princess" was made by Patrick Nicholson, Vice President of University Relations for the University of Houston: "It was the government, the University of Houston, which decided not to program 'The Death of a Princess.' When the government gets involved in broadcasting, it has an obligation, at a minimum, to establish procedures that assure that programming decisions are not based on the political beliefs of its programmers and are not made arbitrarily and without due process of law."

In Barnstone v. Houston, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2185, 660 F.2d 137 (5th Cir. 1981), cert. den. 103 S.Ct. 1274 (1983), a panel of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the federal district court on the basis of the panel decision in Muir v. Alabama Educational Television Commission, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1933, 656 F.2d 1012 (5th Cir. 1981).

The Fifth Circuit directed that both panel decisions in Muir and Barnstone be consolidated and reheard en banc. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in its en banc decision affirmed the judgment of the District Court for the Northern District of Alabama in Muir and reversed the decision of the Southern District Court of Texas in Barnstone.

Do individual members of the public have a First Amendment right to compel public television stations "to broadcast a previously scheduled program which the licensees have decided to cancel"? In its en banc opinion, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in Muir v. Alabama Educational Television Commission, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 2305, 688 F.2d 1033 (5th Cir. 1982), cert. den. 103 S.Ct. 1274 (1983), answered "No" to this question. The First Amendment protects private rather than government expression: "To find that the government is without First Amendment protection is not to find that the government is prohibited from speaking or that private individuals have the right to limit or control the expression of government."

The Fifth Circuit decision in Muir may serve as a kind of magna carta of the rights of public broadcasting: "Under the existing statutes public licensees such as AETC and the University of Houston possess the same rights and obligations to make free programming decisions as their private counterparts; however, as state instrumentalities, these public licensees are without the protection of the First Amendment. This lack of constitutional protection implies only that government could possibly impose restrictions on these licensees which it could not impose on private licensees. The lack of First Amendment protection does not result in the lessening of any of the statutory rights and duties held by the public licensees. It also does not result in individual viewers gaining any greater right to influence the programming discretion of the public licensees."

An issue that continually arose in the "Death of a Princess" litigation was whether public television stations were

"public forums." If public television stations were public forums, then, presumably, individual viewers could appropriately argue that they had a right of access to compel the broadcast of a program which had been scheduled and then canceled. In the Barnstone case, for example, the district court did find that the public television station there, KUHT-TV, was a public forum since it was operated "by the government for public communication of views on issues of political and social significance." The theory was that a public forum could not deny access to speakers unless the constitutional norms that were usually applied to governmentally imposed prior restraints were complied with.

The plaintiffs in Muir, unlike the district court in Barnstone, however, made a different argument based on the public forum theory. They contended that public television stations could not make programming decisions which were "motivated by hostility to the communicative impact of a program's message and stemming from a specific viewpoint of the broadcaster." In the en banc decision in Muir, Judge Hill said for the Fifth Circuit that the court of appeals disagreed with both the public forum theory of the district court in Barnstone, as well as the public forum theory of the plaintiffs who argued before the Fifth Circuit. The reasons which the en banc decision of the court in Muir offered for its conclusion that public television stations are not public forums is set forth below:

In the cases in which a public facility has been deemed a public forum the speakers have been found to have a right of access because they were attempting to use the facility in a manner fully consistent with the "pattern of usual activity" and "the general invitation extended." The pattern of usual activity for public television stations is the statutorily mandated practice of the broadcast licensee exercising sole programming authority. The invitation extended to the public is not to schedule programs, but to watch or decline to watch what is offered. It is thus clear that the public television stations involved in the cases before us are not public forums. The plaintiffs have no right of access to compel the broadcast of any particular program.

The court of appeals in Muir also specifically rejected the public access argument of the plaintiffs. According to this argument, even if a public right of access were denied on the theory that public television stations were not public forums, the action of the public television stations in the "Death of a Princess" litigation was impermissible on the ground that public television stations could not "make programming decisions based on the communicative impact of a program".

"We find this contention to be untenable. It is the right of public access which is the essential characteristic of a public forum and the basis which allows a speaker to challenge the state's regulation of the forum. The gravamen of a speaker's public forum complaint is the invalid and discriminatory denial of his right of access to the forum. If a speaker does not have a right of access to a facility, that facility by definition is not a 'public forum' and the speaker is without grounds for challenge under the public forum doctrine."

Another issue which was resolved by the en banc decision of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals in Muir was whether the decision to cancel "Death of a Princess" by the public television stations should be deemed to constitute government censorship. The view was rejected that the decision to cancel "Death of a Princess" constituted governmental censorship. A distinction was drawn between state regulation of private expression and "the exercise of editorial discretion by state officials responsible for the operation of public television stations":

When state officials operate a public television station they must necessarily make discriminating choices. As the Supreme Court pointed out in CBS, 412 U.S. at 124, 93 S.Ct. at 2097, "[f]or better or worse, editing is what editors are for; and editing is selection and choice of material." In exercising their editorial discretion state officials will unavoidably make programming decisions which can be characterized as "politically motivated." All television broadcast licensees are required, under the public interest standard, to cover political events and to provide news and public affairs programs dealing with the political, social, economic and other issues which concern their community. The licensees are thus required to make the inherently subjective determination that their programming decisions are responsive to the needs, problems and interests of the residents of the area they serve. A general proscription against political programming decisions would clearly be contrary to the licensees' statutory obligations, and would render virtually every programming decision subject to judicial challenge.

The plaintiffs seek to draw a distinction between a decision not to show a program and a decision to cancel a previously scheduled program. They suggest that while it is a proper exercise of editorial discretion for a licensee initially to decide not to schedule a program, it is constitutionally improper for the licensee to decide to cancel a scheduled program because of its political content. In support of their view the plaintiffs cited decisions holding that school officials may be free initially to decide which books to place in their school libraries but that a decision to remove any particular book may be subject to constitutional challenge. We are not persuaded, however, that the distinction urged upon us is valid or that the school library cases are applicable.

The decision to cancel a scheduled program is no less editorial in nature than an initial decision to schedule the program. Both decisions require the licensee to determine what will best serve the public interest, and, as we noted earlier, such a determination is inherently subjective and involves judgments which could be termed "political."

Judge Hill, for the court in Muir, summarized the en banc court's reasons for concluding that the decision to cancel "Death of a Princess" could not properly be characterized as impermissible government censorship as follows: "Had the states of Alabama and Texas sought to prohibit the exhibition of the film by another party then indeed a question of censorship would have arisen. Such is not the case before us. The states have not sought to forbid or curtail the right of any person to show or view the film. In fact plaintiff Barnstone has already viewed the film at an exhibition at Rice University in Houston. The state officials in charge of AETC and KUHT-TV have simply exercised their statutorily mandated discretion and decided not to show a particular program at a particular time. There is a clear distinction between a state's exercise of editorial discretion over its own expression, and a state's prohibition or suppression of the speech of another."

Judge Rubin concurred, joined by three other judges who participated in the en banc review of Muir by the Fifth Circuit, pointing out that the government was involved in the publication of a variety of informational media. Content neutrality was not necessarily required in the operation of these media.

The function of a state agency operating an informational medium is significant in determining first amendment restrictions on its actions. State agencies publish alumni bulletins, newsletters devoted to better farming practices, and law reviews; they operate or subsidize art museums and theater companies and student newspapers. The federal government operates the Voice of America and Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty, publishes "journals, magazines, periodicals, and similar publications" that are "necessary in the transaction of the public business," including newspapers for branches of the Armed Forces, and pays the salaries of many federal officials who, like the president's press secretary, communicate with the public through the media. The first amendment does not dictate that what will be said or performed or published or broadcast in these activities will be entirely content-neutral. In those activities that, like television broadcasting to the general public, depend in part on audience interest, appraisal of audience interest and suitability for publication or broadcast inevitably involves judgment of content.

Judge Frank Johnson, joined by four other judges, dissented from the en banc decision of the Fifth Circuit in Muir. The question as he saw it was this: can executive officers of a state-operated public television station cancel a previously scheduled program because it presents a point of view disagreeable to the religious and political regime of a foreign country? Judge Johnson's answer was in the negative. He took particular issue with the majority's reliance on FCC regulation to deal with abuses in programming decisions: "* * * [T]he majority has granted state broadcasters immunity from constitutional scrutiny. * * * To rely on FCC regulation is to create a substantial gap in the protection of First Amendment interests. Because the FCC does not distinguish between private and public broadcasters in its regulation of the airwaves, it provides no protection from the kind of state censorship alleged in these cases." Drawing on support from the Supreme Court decision in the school libraries cases, Judge Johnson said that both the plurality and Justice Blackmun agreed that school officials could "'not remove books for the purpose of restricting access to the political ideas or social perspectives discussed in them, when that action is motivated simply by the officials' disapproval of the ideas involved.'" See Board of Education v. Pico, 457 U.S. 853, 102 S.Ct. 2799 (1982). In Johnson's view, allegations of censorship in public television were "entitled to much greater scrutiny than similar allegations involving school board regulation of students' reading material." Judge Johnson advocated a local standard of review for programming decisions such as those involved in the "Death of a Princess": "Once the plaintiff demonstrates that the government has silenced a message because of its substantive content, the government's decision becomes presumptively unconstitutional. The government should then be allowed to demonstrate that it would have taken the same action on the basis of legitimate reasons. Finally, the plaintiff should be given a full opportunity to refuse the government's assertion."

In a separate dissent, Judge Reavley insisted that the First Amendment required neutrality by the state with respect to "relaying messages into the idea marketplace." On the other hand, Judge Reavley resisted Judge Johnson's view that if a state's decision not to show a program was based on the substantive content of the program, the decision was presumptively unconstitutional.

In a perceptive concurrence, Judge Garwood made a distinction between an "open forum" and a "conventional" public broadcasting station:

First, plaintiffs are not attacking governmental "public" broadcasting as such. Nor do they seek to require its operation to be on a pure "open forum" basis—like an empty stage available to all comers—where each citizen can cause the broadcast of his or her program of choice, with the inevitable selectivity determined by completely content neutral factors such as lot, or first come first served or the like. Rather, plaintiffs seek to become a part of governmental "public" broadcasting essentially as it is, except they want it to broadcast this particular program of their choice. However, there is simply no way for them—together with all others who might wish to assert similar rights for their favorite "dramatization"—to become a part of such "conventional" (as distinguished from pure "open forum") governmental broadcasting except on the basis of governmental selection of the individual programs.

* * *

In the second place, plaintiffs do not assert that the stations in question have, on the basis of their agreement or disagreement with the different points of view involved or for similar "political" type reasons, structured their programming so that it constitutes a one-sided or slanted presentation of any matter of public concern, importance or controversy, whether relevant to the "message" of plaintiffs' desired program or otherwise. So far as any such matters are concerned, plaintiffs' complaint is made essentially in a vacuum—they claim that merely because on one particular occasion a "political" type decision was made not to air one specific program plaintiffs wished to see, they therefore have a right to a court order directing these conventionally operated governmental stations to promptly air this precise program. We have rejected this claim. This is not to say, however, that no private citizen has a right to question the programming of governmental "public" television stations under any circumstances, or that the remedy of complaint to the FCC will always be adequate.

---

COMMENT

1. Are Muir and Barnstone equivalent situations? In Muir, the editorial judgment of broadcast journalists was the source of the decision to cancel. Broadcast journalists were the decision makers in Muir, and their exercise of editorial judgment was upheld. But the decision to cancel in Barnstone was a governmental and politically inspired judgment made by a university official not a journalist.

2. The "Death of a Princess" case was seen by the Fifth Circuit as a case of First Amendment rights in conflict—freedom of the press versus freedom of speech and the derivative right to hear. The plaintiffs contended that the decision to cancel could not be viewed the same way as a decision to cancel a program by a private broadcaster. The presence of the state government as a sponsor and as a source of funds in part for AETC was said to have transformed the programming decisions of AETC into "governmental action" and "governmental censorship." Judge Markey, author of the Fifth Circuit panel decision in Muir, disagreed. See Muir v. Alabama Educational Television Commission, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1933, 656 F.2d 1012 (5th Cir. 1981). "The application of constitutional principles cannot, however, be controlled by the bare and barren fact that government plays some role."

Judge Markey appeared to be unimpressed with the argument that government funding of public broadcasting should serve to provide the public with greater rights of participation in editorial decision making: "Hence, if government ownership and partial funding alone be synonymous with government censorship of program content, government ownership and funding would doubtless have to cease. * * * If initial rejection of some programs were considered a form of constitutionally forbidden censorship, every public television station would violate the Constitution with virtually every choice it made. * * * It would demean the First Amendment to find that it required a public referendum on every programming decision made every day by every public television station solely because the station is 'owned' and partially funded by a state government." No difference was seen between a decision canceling a scheduled broadcast and the initial scheduling decision as far as judicial oversight is concerned. Both suffered from the same infirmity. The use of court injunctions in either situation would destroy editorial freedom as well as involve excessive government entanglement in the editorial process.

Allowing government to be an editor there is a risk government might attempt to propagandize the public through public television. But there was no evidence to show that the government of Alabama had anything to do with the decision to cancel the show. What if there had been proof that government sought to propagandize? Would the First Amendment rights of the viewers then have overridden the editorial rights of a public television station? That issue was not before the court, and quite properly, Judge Markey does not answer these questions. The implication in the panel decision in Muir is, however, that evidence of government intent to propagandize in editorial decision making would have made a difference and would have been declared impermissible. Here then is a difference in the editorial freedom of a public broadcaster as compared to that of a private broadcaster. If private broadcasters cancel a television show out of a desire to propagandize, presumably the First Amendment is not violated although arguably some aspect of FCC law may have been violated. But if a public broadcaster cancels a show out of a desire to propagandize, then presumably the First Amendment is violated. Government cannot mandate a point of view. This would be impermissible "compelled speech." See Wooley v. Maynard, 430 U.S. 705 (1977), text, p. 177.

3. In Note, Editorial Discretion of State Public Broadcasting Licensees, 82 Colum. L.Rev. 1161 (1982), two possible models through which the problem of editorial discretion in public broadcasting can be analyzed are suggested. The first model sees the selection of material by public broadcasters as involving "Government-speech." Government speech presents dangers: "It may indoctrinate, distort judgment, perpetuate the current regime, drown out private media, and require taxpayers to support points of view they consider objectionable." Perhaps for these reasons, the Columbia Note argues, courts should extend a less deferential standard of review to the editorial discretion of public broadcasters.

The second analytical model is the so-called "Government-facility" model. This model raises the question of whether the government as facility provider may constitutionally regulate access to the facility.

What kind of "facility" is the public broadcasting station? Like the en banc decision of the Fifth Circuit in Muir, the Columbia Note argues that the public broadcasting station is neither a "traditional public forum" nor a "state created public forum". "[T]he historical role of the public broadcaster is that of public servant, using independent editorial discretion to program in specific ways for the benefit of the public as audience. * * * [G]uaranteed access—common carrier status—would be incompatible with the licensee's operation."

But must the television audience for First Amendment purposes be looked at as entirely passive? Should the only actor to be accorded First Amendment status be the public broadcaster? To recognize audience rights in public broadcasting is not necessarily the same thing as transforming public broadcasters into common carriers.

As a procedural tool to safeguard expressive access from the "prior restraint" risks inherent in the public broadcaster's editorial decision making, the Note concludes by asking that the initial burden be on the "speaker" or "audience member" to establish a prima facie case for abuse of discretion. Once the challenger has made out the prima facie case, the public broadcaster's decision would be presumed unconstitutional. The public broadcaster would then have to bear the burden of proving that it would have taken the same action on the basis of legitimate reasons. In the Fifth Circuit's en banc decision in Muir v. Alabama Educational Television Commission, the majority chose not to apply this approach. But it did win the approval of five judges in a dissenting opinion written by Judge Johnson.

State Regulation of Public Broadcasting: The McGlynn Case

State as well as federal law governs state-owned public television stations. This sometimes may produce divergent results. Illustrative is McGlynn v. New Jersey Public Broadcasting Authority, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2446, 439 A.2d 54 (N.J.1981). The New Jersey Supreme Court ruled that under applicable state law, state public television networks are not required to provide equal air time to all gubernatorial candidates so long as such programming is presented with "balance, fairness and equity." This ruling opens up the New Jersey court system as an alternative forum to the FCC for aggrieved gubernatorial candidates seeking access to public television.

The McGlynn controversy arose out of a May 25, 1981 decision of New Jersey Public Broadcasting Authority (Authority), which excluded candidate McGlynn as well as ten other gubernatorial candidates from a series of broadcasts that focused on the leading candidates in the 1981 gubernatorial election. Specifically, the decision to exclude certain candidates came after it became apparent to the executive producer of the series that there was insufficient time available to air the taped interviews of each of the twenty-one candidates. Accordingly, the decision was made on the basis of "professional news judgment" to limit the program to a select group of leading candidates.

On May 25, 1981, the Authority announced its intention to broadcast the previously selected interviews on a program entitled "A Closer Look." The following day, plaintiff McGlynn filed a complaint with the New Jersey Superior Court, Chancery Division, alleging that his exclusion from "A Closer Look" had violated his rights under the Federal Communications Act (FCA), the Campaign Expenditures and Reporting Act, N.J.Stat. Ann. § 19:44A-39, the Public Broadcasting Authority Act, N.J.Stat. Ann. § 48:23-1 et seq., and the First and Fourteenth Amendments. Plaintiff's action was transferred to the appellate division which issued an order on May 27, 1981, requiring that the taped interviews of the excluded candidates be broadcast at approximately the same hour as the original telecasts on "A Closer Look." The appellate division order was summarily affirmed by the New Jersey Supreme Court following an appeal by the Authority. 434 A.2d 1056 (N.J.1981). After the primary election was held, the New Jersey Supreme Court granted the Authority's petition for rehearing in order to clarify its previous ruling.

On rehearing, the McGlynn court ruled first that the Federal Communications Act did not preempt state law and second, that the First Amendment did not preclude state limitation on the editorial discretion of the state-owned/operated television authority. The New Jersey Supreme Court took notice of the equal opportunity provisions of 47 U.S.C. § 315, particularly its provisions which eliminate bona fide newscasts, interviews, news documentaries, and on-the-spot coverage of bona fide news events from all equal time constraints. The court noted that Congress, in enacting these "news" exemptions, recognized that an all-inclusive equal time requirement would inhibit campaign coverage and would actually be more detrimental to the public than preferential treatment of candidates. Further, the McGlynn court noted that it was FCC policy to accord individual broadcasters a great deal of deference in determining what telecasts are exempt under the enumerated "news" exemptions. See text, p. 805.

The New Jersey Supreme Court did not agree with the New Jersey Public Broadcasting Authority's assertion that 47 U.S.C. § 315 preempted state provisions which imposed greater "equal-opportunity" obligations on broadcasters. The issue was whether New Jersey's Campaign and Expenditures and Reporting Act, N.J.Stat.

Ann. § 19:44A-39, which placed an affirmative duty on public broadcasters to cover the gubernatorial campaign, actually conflicted with 47 U.S.C. § 315.

In answering this important question, the New Jersey Supreme Court found it dispositive that the Authority was owned and operated as an instrumentality of the State of New Jersey. New Jersey, in this situation, was acting as a broadcast proprietor rather than as a government regulator of private business. Consequently, using logic analogous to that of the Supreme Court in Hughes v. Alexandria Scrap Corp., 426 U.S. 794 (1976), the court ruled that New Jersey has the same freedoms as a private citizen in determining the degree to which the equal opportunity provisions of 47 U.S.C. § 315 apply. "It follows, in this context, that N.J.S.A. § 19:44A-39 is not a governmental restraint upon a broadcast medium. Rather, it constitutes an exercise of discretion on the part of the State in its capacity as a Federal licensee under the FCA. Thus, since the statutes in question were passed pursuant to, rather than in conflict with, the FCA, the statutes are not preempted by the FCA."

The McGlynn court also rejected any claim that the First Amendment barred the New Jersey Legislature from imposing on the Authority the requirements of subsection 7(h) of the Authority Act, N.J.Stat. Ann. 48:23-7(h) that: "[p]rograms or series of programs of a controversial nature shall be presented with balance, fairness and equity."

The court held that:

The First Amendment limits governmental restraints on private participation in the marketplace of ideas. However, it does not prevent government itself from participating, Community-Service Broadcasting v. FCC, 593 F.2d 1102, 1110 n. 14 (D.C.Cir.1978); L. Tribe, American Constitutional Law, 588-90 (1978), and when the state exercises its freedom to speak, it may express its own viewpoint * * * as it may neutrally relay the messages of others. The goal of the New Jersey statutory scheme is to use the state television network to neutrally relay the messages of the candidates for governor of New Jersey.

Thus, as no private speech had been abridged, the court affirmed the constitutionality of subsection 7(h).

Though the New Jersey Supreme Court had ruled in favor of plaintiff McGlynn on the jurisdictional and constitutional issues, the court reversed its previous ruling that had guaranteed gubernatorial candidates equal access under New Jersey law. This holding was based primarily upon its interpretation of the 1981 Amendment to the Campaign Expenditures and Reporting Act. Act of April 2, 1981, ch. 107, § 1, 1981, N.J.Sess. Law Serv. 265 (codified at N.J.Stat. Ann. § 19:44A-39 (1981)). That amendment eliminated the rigid equal time requirements previously contained in the act and replaced them with a "general obligation to promote full discussion by the candidates in accordance with Federal Law." The court said that this amended provision, when read with the relevant provisions of the Authority Act, subsection 7(h), imposed an affirmative duty on the Authority to "promote full discussions by the gubernatorial candidates in a balanced, fair, and equitable fashion." It did not confer a general right of access to gubernatorial candidates. Rather, it required only that the Authority provide a fair distribution of air time.

The New Jersey Supreme Court also rejected the assertion that the New Jersey statutory scheme, as construed in the majority's holding, converted the Authority into a "public-forum" to which all citizens have a right of access. Justice Pashman for the court noted that the public forum concept has been strictly limited to those facilities in which tradition mandates a right of access. Citing Muir v. Alabama Television Commission, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1933, 656 F.2d 1012 (5th Cir. 1981), he further noted that the broadcast media, which lack the requisite tradition of public access, may be converted into a public forum only when it has been "dedicated to public use." Any right of access arising under New Jersey statutes, the majority claimed, was not created for public use. It extends only to "legally qualified candidates, in only one election, which occurs only once every four years." Thus, in the holding of the majority, no public forum has or may have been created.

In Note, Political Broadcasting—New Jersey Public Broadcasting Authority Mandated to Cover Gubernatorial Elections with Balance, 13 Seton Hall L.Rev. 153 (1982), it is pointed out that the McGlynn decision authorizes the use of two standards of review vis-à-vis New Jersey public broadcasters, the "fairness" standard applied by the FCC pursuant to 47 U.S.C. § 315, and the amorphous "balance, fairness, and equity" standard to be applied by state courts pursuant to N.J. Stat. Ann. § 19:44A-39 (West's, 1982) and N.J. Stat. Ann. § 48:23-7(h) (West's, 1982). The advent of the new state standard is likely to create confusion. In New Jersey this confusion was particularly troublesome since local news reports of state-owned public television stations are the primary source of gubernatorial election coverage. The New Jersey electorate must therefore rely on a public broadcasting system whose editorial discretion is presently subject to an uncertain set of standards. Campaign coverage in New Jersey now depends on the ability of the Authority to skillfully carry out the New Jersey fairness mandate.

Does the McGlynn decision threaten the Authority's editorial function? Though the decision stopped short of assigning the Authority to be a common carrier of campaign information, the decision could deleteriously restrict a reporter's ability and freedom to serve the public by inhibiting news coverage in delicate circumstances.

Will candidates for office now seek to find in public broadcasting a coverage denied them on commercial broadcasting? Will McGlynn encourage state legislatures to draft New Jersey-type fairness statutes to govern their public broadcasting authorities?

The Constitution of the United States

PREAMBLE

We the People of the United States, in Order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

ARTICLE I

Section 1. All legislative Powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

Section 2. [1] The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second Year by the People of the several States, and the Electors in each State shall have the Qualifications requisite for Electors of the most numerous Branch of the State Legislature.

[2] No Person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the Age of twenty five Years, and been seven Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

[3] Representatives and direct Taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective Numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole Number of free Persons, including those bound to Service for a Term of Years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other Persons. The actual Enumeration shall be made within three Years after the first Meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent Term of ten Years, in such Manner as they shall by Law direct. The Number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty Thousand, but each State shall have at Least one Representative; and until such enumeration shall be made, the State of New Hampshire shall be entitled to chuse three,

Massachusetts eight, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations one, Connecticut five, New York six, New Jersey four, Pennsylvania eight, Delaware one, Maryland six, Virginia ten, North Carolina five, South Carolina five, and Georgia three.

[4] When vacancies happen in the Representation from any State, the Executive Authority thereof shall issue Writs of Election to fill such Vacancies.

[5] The House of Representatives shall chuse their Speaker and other Officers; and shall have the sole Power of Impeachment.

Section 3. [1] The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six Years; and each Senator shall have one Vote.

[2] Immediately after they shall be assembled in Consequence of the first Election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three Classes. The Seats of the Senators of the first Class shall be vacated at the Expiration of the Second Year, of the second Class at the Expiration of the fourth Year, and of the third Class at the Expiration of the sixth Year, so that one third may be chosen every second Year; and if Vacancies happen by Resignation, or otherwise, during the Recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary Appointments until the next Meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such Vacancies.

[3] No Person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty Years, and been nine Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

[4] The Vice President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no Vote, unless they be equally divided.

[5] The Senate shall chuse their other Officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the Absence of the Vice President, or when he shall exercise the Office of President of the United States.

[6] The Senate shall have the sole Power to try all Impeachments. When sitting for that Purpose, they shall be on Oath or Affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: And no Person shall be convicted without the Concurrence of two thirds of the Members present.

[7] Judgment in Cases of Impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from Office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any Office of honor, Trust, or Profit under the United States: but the Party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to Indictment, Trial, Judgment, and Punishment, according to Law.

Section 4. [1] The Times, Places and Manner of holding Elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by Law make or alter such Regulations, except as to the Places of chusing Senators.

[2] The Congress shall assemble at least once in every Year, and such Meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by Law appoint a different Day.

Section 5. [1] Each House shall be the Judge of the Elections, Returns, and Qualifications of its own Members, and a Majority of each shall constitute a Quorum to do Business; but a smaller Number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the Attendance of absent Members, in such Manner, and under such Penalties as each House may provide.

[2] Each House may determine the Rules of its Proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly Behavior, and, with the Concurrence of two thirds, expel a Member.

[3] Each House shall keep a Journal of its Proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such Parts as may in their Judgment require Secrecy; and the Yeas and Nays of the Members of either House on any question shall, at the Desire of one fifth of those Present, be entered on the Journal.

[4] Neither House, during the Session of Congress, shall, without the Consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other Place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting.

Section 6. [1] The Senators and Representatives shall receive a Compensation for their Services, to be ascertained by Law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States. They shall in all Cases, except Treason, Felony and Breach of the Peace, be privileged from Arrest during their Attendance at the Session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any Speech or Debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other Place.

[2] No Senator or Representative shall, during the Time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil Office under the Authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the Emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no Person holding any Office under the United States, shall be a Member of either House during his Continuance in Office.

Section 7. [1] All Bills for raising Revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with Amendments as on other Bills.

[2] Every Bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it becomes a Law, be presented to the President of the United States; If he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his Objections to the House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the Objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such Reconsideration two thirds of that House shall agree to pass the Bill, it shall be sent together with the Objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two thirds of that House, it shall become a Law. But in all such Cases the Votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and Nays, and the Names of the Persons voting for and against the Bill shall be entered on the Journal of each House respectively. If any Bill shall not be returned by the President within ten Days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the Same shall be a Law, in like Manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their Adjournment prevent its Return in which Case it shall not be a Law.

[3] Every Order, Resolution, or Vote, to Which the Concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of Adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the Same shall take Effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the Rules and Limitations prescribed in the Case of a Bill.

Section 8. [1] The Congress shall have Power To lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States; but all Duties, Imposts and Excises shall be uniform throughout the United States;

[2] To borrow money on the credit of the United States;

[3] To regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes;

[4] To establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization, and uniform Laws on the subject of Bankruptcies throughout the United States;

[5] To coin Money, regulate the Value thereof, and of foreign Coin, and fix the Standard of Weights and Measures;

[6] To provide for the Punishment of counterfeiting the Securities and current Coin of the United States;

[7] To Establish Post Offices and Post Roads;

[8] To promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts, by securing for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries;

[9] To constitute Tribunals inferior to the supreme Court;

[10] To define and punish Piracies and Felonies committed on the high Seas, and Offenses against the Law of Nations;

[11] To declare War, grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal, and make Rules concerning Captures on Land and Water;

[12] To raise and support Armies, but no Appropriation of Money to that Use shall be for a longer Term than two Years;

[13] To provide and maintain a Navy;

[14] To make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces;

[15] To provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions;

[16] To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers, and the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress;

[17] To exercise exclusive Legislation in all Cases whatsoever, over such District (not exceeding ten Miles square) as may, by Cession of particular States, and the Acceptance of Congress, become the Seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like Authority over all Places purchased by the Consent of the Legislature of the State in which the Same shall be, for the Erection of Forts, Magazines, Arsenals, dock-Yards, and other needful Buildings;—And [18] To make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers, and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof.

Section 9. [1] The Migration or Importation of Such Persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the Year one thousand eight hundred and eight, but a Tax or duty may be imposed on such Importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each Person.

[2] The privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it.

[3] No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law shall be passed.

[4] No Capitation, or other direct, Tax shall be laid, unless in Proportion to the Census or Enumeration herein before directed to be taken.

[5] No Tax or Duty shall be laid on Articles exported from any State.

[6] No Preference shall be given by any Regulation of Commerce or Revenue to the Ports of one State over those of another: nor shall Vessels bound to, or from, one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay Duties in another.

[7] No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law; and a regular Statement and Account of the Receipts and Expenditures of all public Money shall be published from time to time.

[8] No Title of Nobility shall be granted by the United States: And no Person holding any Office of Profit or Trust under them, shall, without the Consent of the Congress, accept of any present, Emolument, Office, or Title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State.

Section 10. [1] No State shall enter into any Treaty, Alliance, or Confederation; grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal; coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts; pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post facto Law, or Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts, or grant any Title of Nobility.

[2] No State shall, without the Consent of the Congress, lay any Imposts or Duties on Imports or Exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection Laws: and the net Produce of all Duties and Imposts, laid by any State on Imports or Exports, shall be for the Use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such Laws shall be subject to the Revision and Controul of the Congress.

[3] No State shall, without the Consent of Congress, lay any Duty of Tonnage, keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace, enter into any Agreement or Compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in War, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay.

ARTICLE II

Section 1. [1] The executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his Office during the Term of four Years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same Term, be elected, as follows:

[2] Each State shall appoint, in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a Number of Electors, equal to the whole Number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or Person holding an Office of Trust or Profit under the United States, shall be appointed an Elector.

[3] The Electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by Ballot for two Persons, of whom one at least shall not be an Inhabitant of the same State with themselves. And they shall make a List of all the Persons voted for, and of the Number of Votes for each; which List they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the Seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the Presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the Certificates, and the Votes shall then be counted. The Person having the greatest Number of Votes shall be the President, if such Number be a Majority of the whole Number of Electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such Majority, and have an equal Number of Votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately chuse by Ballot one of them for President; and if no Person have a Majority, then from the five highest on the List the said House shall in like Manner chuse the President. But in chusing the President, the Votes shall be taken by States the Representation from each State having one Vote; A quorum for this Purpose shall consist of a Member or Members from two thirds of the States, and a Majority of all the States shall be necessary to a Choice. In every Case, after the Choice of the President, the Person having the greater Number of Votes of the Electors shall be the Vice President. But if there should remain two or more who have equal Votes, the Senate shall chuse from them by Ballot the Vice President.

[4] The Congress may determine the Time of choosing the Electors, and the Day on which they shall give their Votes; which Day shall be the same throughout the United States.

[5] No person except a natural born Citizen, or a Citizen of the United States, at the time of the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the Office of President; neither shall any Person be eligible to that Office who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty-five Years, and been fourteen Years a Resident within the United States.

[6] In case of the removal of the President from Office, or of his Death, Resignation or Inability to discharge the Powers and Duties of the said Office, the Same shall devolve on the Vice President, and the Congress may by Law provide for the Case of Removal, Death, Resignation or Inability, both of the President and Vice President, declaring what Officer shall then act as President, and such Officer shall act accordingly, until the Disability be removed, or a President shall be elected.

[7] The President shall, at stated Times, receive for his Services, a Compensation, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the Period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that Period any other Emolument from the United States, or any of them.

[8] Before he enter on the Execution of his Office, he shall take the following Oath or Affirmation: "I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the Office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my Ability, preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States."

Section 2. [1] The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the Executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offenses against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

[2] He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law; but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

[3] The President shall have Power to fill up all Vacancies that may happen during the Recess of the Senate, by granting Commissions which shall expire at the End of their next Session.

Section 3. He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

Section 4. The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

ARTICLE III

Section 1. The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

Section 2. [1] The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States;—between a State and Citizens of another State;—between Citizens of different States;—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under the Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

[2] In all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be a Party, the supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction. In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.

[3] The trial of all Crimes, except in Cases of Impeachment, shall be by Jury; and such Trial shall be held in the State where the said Crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the Trial shall be at such Place or Places as the Congress may by Law have directed.

Section 3. [1] Treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying War against them, or, in adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort. No Person shall be convicted of Treason unless on the Testimony of two Witnesses to the same overt Act, or on Confession in open Court.

[2] The Congress shall have Power to declare the Punishment of Treason, but no Attainder of Treason shall work Corruption of Blood, or Forfeiture except during the Life of the Person attainted.

ARTICLE IV

Section 1. Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general Laws prescribe the Manner in which such Acts, Records and Proceedings shall be proved, and the Effect thereof.

Section 2. [1] The Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States.

[2] A Person charged in any State with Treason, Felony, or other Crime, who shall flee from Justice, and be found in another State, shall on demand of the executive Authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having Jurisdiction of the Crime.

[3] No Person held to Service or Labour in one State, under the Laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in Consequence of any Law or Regulation therein, be discharged from such Service or Labour, but shall be delivered up on Claim of the Party to whom such Service or Labour may be due.

Section 3. [1] New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the Jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the Junction of two or more States, or Parts of States, without the Consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

[2] The Congress shall have Power to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to Prejudice any Claims of the United States, or of any particular State.

Section 4. The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government, and shall protect each of them against Invasion; and on Application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic Violence.

ARTICLE V

The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

ARTICLE VI

[1] All Debts contracted and Engagements entered into, before the Adoption of this Constitution shall be as valid against the United States under this Constitution, as under the Confederation.

[2] This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.

[3] The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the Members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial Officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support this Constitution; but no religious Test shall ever be required as a Qualification to any Office or public Trust under the United States.

ARTICLE VII

The Ratification of the Conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the Establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the Same.

AMENDMENT I [1791]

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

AMENDMENT II [1791]

A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed.

AMENDMENT III [1791]

No Soldier shall, in time of peace be quartered in any house, without the consent of the Owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

AMENDMENT IV [1791]

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

AMENDMENT V [1791]

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

AMENDMENT VI [1791]

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

AMENDMENT VII [1791]

In Suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.

AMENDMENT VIII [1791]

Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

AMENDMENT IX [1791]

The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

AMENDMENT X [1791]

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

AMENDMENT XI [1798]

The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State.

AMENDMENT XII [1804]

The Electors shall meet in their respective states and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same state with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate;—The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted;—The person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by states, the representation from each state having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the states, and a majority of all states shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President.—The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice-President, shall be the Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed, and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice-President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President of the United States.

AMENDMENT XIII [1865]

Section 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

Section 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

AMENDMENT XIV [1868]

Section 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Section 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the Executive and Judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

Section 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

Section 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations and claims shall be held illegal and void.

Section 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

AMENDMENT XV [1870]

Section 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Section 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

AMENDMENT XVI [1913]

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration.

AMENDMENT XVII [1913]

[1] The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

[2] When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

[3] This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.

AMENDMENT XVIII [1919]

Section 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

Section 2. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Section 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress.

AMENDMENT XIX [1920]

[1] The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

[2] Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

AMENDMENT XX [1933]

Section 1. The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 20th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 3d day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

Section 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 3d day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

Section 3. If, at the time fixed for the beginning of the term of the President, the President elect shall have died, the Vice President elect shall become President. If the President shall not have been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or if the President elect shall have failed to qualify, then the Vice President elect shall act as President until a President shall have qualified; and the Congress may by law provide for the case wherein neither a President elect nor a Vice President elect shall have qualified, declaring who shall then act as President, or the manner in which one who is to act shall be selected, and such person shall act accordingly until a President or Vice President shall have qualified.

Section 4. The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them.

Section 5. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the 15th day of October following the ratification of this article.

Section 6. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission.

AMENDMENT XXI [1933]

Section 1. The eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

Section 2. The transportation or importation into any State, Territory, or possession of the United States for delivery or use therein of intoxicating liquors, in violation of the laws thereof, is hereby prohibited.

Section 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress.

AMENDMENT XXII [1951]

Section 1. No person shall be elected to the office of the President more than twice, and no person who has held the office of President, or acted as President, for more than two years of a term to which some other person was elected President shall be elected to the office of President more than once. But this Article shall not apply to any person holding the office of President when this Article was proposed by the Congress, and shall not prevent any person who may be holding the office of President, or acting as President, during the term within which this Article becomes operative from holding the office of President or acting as President during the remainder of such term.

Section 2. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission to the States by the Congress.

AMENDMENT XXIII [1961]

Section 1. The District constituting the seat of Government of the United States shall appoint in such manner as the Congress may direct:

A number of electors of President and Vice President equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives in Congress to which the District would be entitled if it were a State, but in no event more than the least populous state; they shall be in addition to those appointed by the states, but they shall be considered, for the purposes of the election of President and Vice President, to be electors appointed by a state; and they shall meet in the District and perform such duties as provided by the twelfth article of amendment.

Section 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

AMENDMENT XXIV [1964]

Section 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote in any primary or other election for President or Vice President, for electors for President or Vice President, or for Senator or Representative in Congress, shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State by reason of failure to pay any poll tax or other tax.

Section 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

AMENDMENT XXV [1967]

Section 1. In case of the removal of the President from office or of his death or resignation, the Vice President shall become President.

Section 2. Whenever there is a vacancy in the office of the Vice President, the President shall nominate a Vice President who shall take office upon confirmation by a majority vote of both Houses of Congress.

Section 3. Whenever the President transmits to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives his written declaration that he is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, and until he transmits to them a written declaration to the contrary, such powers and duties shall be discharged by the Vice President as Acting President.

Section 4. Whenever the Vice President and a majority of either the principal officers of the executive departments or of such other body as Congress may by law provide, transmit to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives their written declaration that the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, the Vice President shall immediately assume the powers and duties of the office as Acting President.

Thereafter, when the President transmits to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives his written declaration that no inability exists, he shall resume the powers and duties of his office unless the Vice President and a majority of either the principal officers of the executive department or of such other body as Congress may by law provide, transmit within four days to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives their written declaration and the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office. Thereupon Congress shall decide the issue, assembling within forty-eight hours for that purpose if not in session. If the Congress, within twenty-one days after receipt of the latter written declaration, or, if Congress is not in session, within twenty-one days after Congress is required to assemble, determines by two-thirds vote of both Houses that the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, the Vice President shall continue to discharge the same as Acting President; otherwise, the President shall resume the powers and duties of his office.

AMENDMENT XXVI [1971]

Section 1. The right of citizens of the United States, who are eighteen years of age or older, to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of age.

Section 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Glossary

A

Actionable. Providing legal reasons for a lawsuit.

Affidavit. The sworn written statement of a party or a witness in a suit. The person who makes the statement is called an affiant.

Affirmed. Signifies that the appellate court agreed with the lower court's decision and has decided to let it stand after review, thus "affirming" it.

A fortiori. It follows unavoidably, as, for example, the next step in an argument.

Amicus Curiae. A friend of the court. Usually refers to legal briefs submitted to a court by persons or groups, not parties of record to an action. Briefs amici curiae are submitted to courts to help the court reach its decision and to bring to the attention of the court factors and problems raised by a case which the parties to the action may not bring to the court's attention.

Appellant. The party who appeals a lower court decision rendered against him to a higher court is the appellant.

Appellee. The party who opposes an appeal, and who is usually content with the lower court decision is the appellee. Courts sometimes use terms like "plaintiff-appellee" or "defendant-appellant" to indicate that the defendant lost at trial and now appeals, and plaintiff won below and now opposes the appeal.

A priori. From cause to effect. Inferring specific facts from general principles.

Arguendo. Assume something true for the sake of argument.

B

Balance of Interests Doctrine. This is an approach often used by courts in cases involving First Amendment issues. The stated mission of the doctrine or test is to weigh the state's interest in effecting a restraint on freedom of expression as distilled in a particular statute against the claim that the statute offends freedom of speech or press.

Bill of Attainder. A legislative act pronouncing a person guilty of a crime without a trial.

Barratry. Provoking a lawsuit intentionally, e.g., a lawyer for profit.

Bill of Rights. First 10 Amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

Black Letter Law. Legal principles accepted by the judiciary in most jurisdictions.

Brief. The written legal arguments which are presented to the court by a party to a lawsuit. A brief is generally partisan. The brief states the facts and the relevant legal authorities on which a party relies for the result which it thinks should obtain.

C

Canon Law. The law of the Church. During the Middle Ages, the ecclesiastical or church courts had considerable control over family and other matters. The law thus developed has influenced the common law.

Certiorari. A writ by which review of a case is sought in the United States Supreme Court. Technically, when the writ is granted, the Court will order the lower court to send the record of the case, a transcript of the proceedings below, up to the Supreme Court for it to review. The Supreme Court has discretion over which petitions for certiorari (cert.) it will or will not grant, and can thus retain control over what cases it will review. This practice should be contrasted with obtaining review by way of appeal, where, theoretically at least, if the statutory requirements for appeal are met, the Court is supposed to be obliged to review the lower court decision. The dismissal of an appeal is considered to be a disposition on the merits of a case, but the denial of a petition for a writ of certiorari is held to be no statement on the merits of the case itself. The situations in which review should be sought by way of appeal and certiorari are precisely set forth in the U.S. Judicial Code.

Civil Action. A lawsuit brought to enforce a right or redress a wrong.

Civil Law. Law based on codes originating with the Romans.

Clear and Convincing Proof (or evidence). A standard of proof in civil litigation more stringent than the normal requirement that the successful party be favored by the preponderance of the evidence. The standard is, yet, less stringent than the standard of proof used in criminal litigation which is that the evidence must show guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

Collateral Estoppel. Prohibition of making a claim that has been disproved in a prior court.

Collusion. When two or more parties agree to maintain a suit even though there is no real adversity between them, it is termed collusion. When a suit is brought under these circumstances it is called a "collusive suit" and is constitutionally proscribed since the U.S. Constitution, Art. III, limits federal courts to deciding actual "cases or controversies". Also, when two parties agree to practice a fraud upon the court or a third party.

Common Law. The legal system of the United States and Great Britain and other countries whose formative legal institutions derive in some measure from England. A common law system is distinguished from the civil law systems of Europe since the former is based upon general rules and principles found in judicial decisions, as opposed to the codification of those rules and principles in statutory law. Common law is judge made law as opposed to law made by legislatures, or statutory law. The historic understanding of American law as common law is no longer apt since, increasingly, "law" in the United States is statutory law.

Complainant. The person who brings a lawsuit. It can also refer to the "complaining witness" or the person who has asked the state to bring criminal charges against the defendant. Often used as a synonym for plaintiff.

Concurring Opinion. When a court, consisting of more than one judge, reaches its decision, one or more of the judges on the court comprising the majority may agree with the decision reached, but for different reasons than those found in the court's opinion. Such judges may decide to state their separate reasons for joining in the result reached by the majority of the court in a concurring opinion. A concurring opinion is often used by a judge to emphasize or de-emphasize a particular portion of a majority opinion or to argue with a dissent (an opinion filed by a judge who disagrees with the court's decision and wishes to make the reasons explicit.)

Constitutional Law. Law based on the basic principles of the constitution as to structure, rights, and functions of government.

Contempt of Court. Any act which is deemed by a court to embarrass, hinder, or obstruct the court in the administration of justice or calculated to lessen its authority or its dignity. Direct contempt is committed in the presence of the court, or very near thereto, and can be punished summarily, without a jury trial. Constructive or indirect contempt refers to actions outside of court which hinder the administration of justice, as when a court order is not obeyed.

Contra. Against.

Counterclaim. A claim brought by the defendant against the plaintiff. A counterclaim may be similar to the plaintiff's claim against the defendant, or it might be totally unrelated to the plaintiff's claim.

D

Damages. Money that a person receives as compensation, as the result of a court order, for injury to her person, property, or rights because of the act, omission, or negligence of another.

Declaratory Judgment. A judicial decision that sets out the rights and obligations of the parties to a dispute and expresses an opinion on a question of law, but which does not necessarily order any coercive relief such as an injunction or damages.

Defeasance. A collateral deed made at the same time as another conveyance of property, containing certain conditions upon the performance of which the estate then created may be defeated, or totally undone.

Defendant. The party against whom a suit is brought. The defendant must answer the plaintiff's complaint and defend against his allegations. In criminal cases, the defendant is the party accused of crime by the state.

De jure. A matter of law whether or not consistent with fact.

De minimis. The law does not concern itself with trifles.

De novo. Means anew or fresh. A new trial of a case is a "trial de novo." A new trial can be granted by the trial judge or ordered by an appellate court.

Deposition. A sworn, recorded, oral statement made by a party or a witness out of court, either in the form of a narrative, or as answers to questions posed by an attorney. The party whose deposition is taken is called the deponent. The deposition is a device often used to obtain testimony in advance of a trial, or to secure the testimony of a person unable to come into court. A deposition can be used at trial to contradict a deponent's testimony at trial or it can be used in the event of the deponent's unavailability.

Dicta. See Obiter dictum.

Directed Verdict. The trial judge decides that as a matter of law reasonable men cannot differ concerning the proper verdict in a case, and directs the jurors to reach that verdict. The judge, in effect, makes the jury's decision for them; he takes it out of their hands.

Discovery. A period of information exchange between the parties in a lawsuit accomplished by interrogatories and deposition.

Disparagement. An untrue or misleading statement about a competitor's goods that is intended to influence, or tends to influence the public not to buy the goods. Trade disparagement is distinguished from libel in that it is directed toward the goods rather than the personal integrity of the merchant.

Diversity Action. An action brought in a federal court between parties who are citizens of different states. Such an action is based on the provision in the U.S. Constitution, Article III, granting jurisdiction to federal courts in diversity cases. Congress has enacted legislation, under this authority, granting the federal courts such jurisdiction. The action is in federal court only because the parties are from different states. The federal court, in this situation, is supposed to apply the substantive law of the state in which it sits.

Doctrine of Judicial Restraint. A doctrine associated in twentieth century American constitutional law with Supreme Court Justices Frankfurter and Harlan as well as many other jurists. Under this view, courts should only rarely exercise their power to invalidate legislation on constitutional grounds. This doctrine holds that as long as the legislation in controversy is reasonable and has some constitutional authorization it should be given a presumption of validity. The doctrine holds that in a democratic society nonelected judges should be reluctant to invalidate legislation enacted by the elected representatives of the people.

Doctrine of Preferred Freedoms. In constitutional litigation, a statute is normally presumed to be constitutional until it is shown to be otherwise. The doctrine of preferred freedoms states that when considering statutes that limit the individual rights guaranteed by the Bill of Rights and the fourteenth amendment, the normal presumption of constitutionality should not operate. When a statute seeks to limit a preferred freedom such as the freedom of expression, those who seek to uphold the statute must prove that it is constitutional, instead of making those who attack the statute prove that it is unconstitutional. The usual presumption of validity attaching to legislation attacked on constitutional grounds is thus reversed.

Duces tecum. A subpoena commanding a person to appear in court with documentary evidence; a subpoena ad testificandum commands a person to appear in court to give testimony.

Due Process. A complex of rights guaranteed by the fifth and fourteenth amendments to the U.S. Constitution, as interpreted by the Supreme Court. There are two kinds of due process. Procedural due process is offended when the fair procedures of the judicial process have not been complied with such as right to notice of the charges against one and a fair hearing concerning those charges. Substantive due process is offended by legislative action abridging substantive rights guaranteed by the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment such as freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom of assembly, etc.

E

Equity. As distinguished from common law, equity means to be flexible where the common law is rigid. Equity fashions remedies where the law is inadequate in order to do substantial justice. Also, refers to the separate equity court system developed in England and to the remedies fashioned by those courts. Many of these remedies have now been adopted by American courts. Thus courts have the broad power to order the equitable remedy of an injunction when money damages (the legal remedy) are inadequate.

Estoppel. An estoppel works a preclusion on the basis of a party's own act, or acceptance of facts, relied upon by another party. Thus, when a party makes a promise on which another relies, such a party may later be precluded from denying such a promise or refusing to accept its consequences.

Ex parte. Something done by, for, or on the application of one party only. An example of an ex parte proceeding is a hearing on a temporary restraining order. Such an order can be granted to a party in the absence of the party sought to be restrained.

Ex rel. Legal proceedings which are instituted by the attorney general in the name of and in behalf of the state, but on the information and at the instigation of an individual who has a private interest in the matter.

F

Federalism. The complex interaction between federal and state governments.

Felony. A serious crime, in contrast to a misdemeanor.

G

Gloss. An annotation, explanation, or comment on any passage in the text of a work for purposes of elucidation or amplification.

Grand Jury. A jury whose responsibility it is to decide whether probable cause exists to warrant the trial of an accused for a serious crime. A finding of probable cause is not equivalent to a finding of guilt. If the grand jury believes sufficient evidence exists to establish probable cause, it issues an indictment. The grand jury is termed a "grand jury" because it has more members than the trial or "petit" jury.

H

Habeas Corpus. "You have the body." Often called the "Great Writ" because it has been considered basic to liberty in American law. Typically, a writ of habeas corpus issues to order a warden or jailer to bring a prisoner before the court so that the court can determine whether the prisoner is lawfully confined. The writ can be used to secure review of a criminal conviction in the hope that the court will release the prisoner if it decides the prisoner is unlawfully confined.

Haec Verba. In these exact words.

Holding. The essential core of a judge's holding or a court's decision.

I

In camera. In a judge's chambers, or in a courtroom with the public excluded.

Indefeasible. A right that cannot be taken away or defeated.

Indictment. A written accusation made by a grand jury charging that the person named therein is accused of committing a crime. An indictment should be distinguished from an information (see below). Most jurisdictions require a grand jury indictment as the basis for charges of the most serious crimes.

Inducement. The benefit or advantage that the promisor is going to receive from a contract is the inducement for making it.

Information. The information is an alternate method by which a criminal prosecution can be commenced. In states which allow a prosecutor to proceed by information as an alternative to a grand jury indictment, a preliminary hearing is first held before a magistrate to determine if there is "probable cause" to believe that a crime has been committed. If the magistrate determines that, on the evidence presented by the state prosecutor, probable cause exists, the accused is bound over for trial and the prosecutor files an information which states the crime with which the accused is charged, serving substantially the same function as a grand jury indictment.

Infra. Refers to something printed later in the text. Used in the sense of "see below."

Injunction. A court-issued writ ordering a party either to refrain from doing something or to perform a specific act. When a court issues an injunction against a party, it enjoins that party. This equitable remedy is issued at the request of a litigant. An injunction may be granted temporarily to preserve the status quo while the issue in controversy is still pending before a court. This is called a preliminary injunction. A permanent injunction is granted only after a hearing on the merits.

In limine. On or at the threshold; at the very beginning; preliminarily.

Instantly. Immediately.

Inter alia. Literally "among other things"; Reference to only a part of something.

Interlocutory Appeal. An appeal of a judicial order in a case rendered by a court prior to final decision of that case. An order which is not final, or which is not dispositive of the entire suit, is interlocutory in nature. Interlocutory appeals, except for a few statutory exceptions, are not permissible in federal practice. But this rule is sometimes circumvented by application to appellate courts for prerogative writs such as writs of mandamus which in effect do subject interlocutory orders to appeal.

Interrogatories. Written questions submitted by one party to the opposing party before the trial. The opposing party is then required under oath to provide specific written answers to the interrogatories of the other party. Interrogatories are part of the discovery process used by counsel prior to the actual trial to inform each other of the basic facts and issues in the case. The interrogatories are usually written and answered by counsel after consultation with the client.

Ipse Dixit. To rely on one's own ipse dixit is to say something which rests not on independent evidence but solely on the say-so of the speaker.

J

Judgment. The final decision of the court defining the rights and duties of the parties to a law suit. A judgment should be distinguished from a verdict (see below) which is the name given to the decision of a jury rather than of a court.

Judgment n. o. v. (non obstante veredicto). A judgment notwithstanding the verdict occurs when the court renders a judgment in favor of one party after the jury has returned with a verdict in favor of the other party. When a motion for a judgment n. o. v. is granted, the judge in effect overrules the jury's verdict. The motion is usually granted on the grounds that the jury's verdict was clearly unreasonable and not supported by the evidence. This decision by the judge can be the basis for an appeal.

Judicial Activist. A judicial activist is the opposite of an exponent of judicial restraint. See this glossary. A judicial activist believes the judiciary may, in some circumstances, serve as a fulcrum for social change. The majority of the Supreme Court under the leadership of Chief Justice Warren, the so-called Warren Court, was often charged by its critics with judicial activism. The Warren Court, through the process of constitutional interpretation, imposed new rules and duties in the areas of reapportionment, racial equality, and criminal procedure. Defenders of these examples of judicial activism say that they illustrate the democratic character of judicial review.

Judicial Review. The invalidation or validation by courts of governmental action on the ground that that action is inconsistent or consistent with the Constitution.

Jurisprudence. The philosophy of law. Sometimes used as a synonym for law itself.

L

Long-arm Statute. A state law allowing its courts jurisdiction outside the state.

M

Malfeasance. Usually refers to wrongdoing by a public official.

Mandamus. A writ ordering a lower court judge or other public official to perform a legal duty as to which he has no discretion.

Memorandum Decision. A court ruling without written opinion or reasons given.

Misprision. A word used to describe a misdemeanor which does not possess a specific name. More specifically a contempt against the government or the courts, all forms of sedition or disloyal conduct; or maladministration of high public office; or failure of a citizen to endeavor to prevent the commission of a crime, or, having knowledge of its commission, to reveal it to the proper authorities.

Mistrial. A trial interrupted and concluded for a major procedural defect.

Model Acts. Laws proposed by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws.

Movant (Movent). One who makes a motion before a court; the applicant for a rule or order.

Moving Papers. Such papers as are made the basis of some motion in court proceedings.

N

Nolle Prosequi (nol. pros.). When the prosecuting attorney in a criminal suit decides that he will "prosecute the case no further", a nol. pros. is entered into the court records. The use of a nol. pros. usually terminates the lawsuit. Unless a nol. pros. is obtained with leave of court, the case will not be reopened at a later date; a nol. pros. usually signifies that the matter has been dropped altogether.

N.O.V. Non obstante veredicto. Notwithstanding the verdict of a jury the judge gives judgment to the other side.

Non-feasance. Usually failure of a public official to perform an assigned public duty.

Nunc pro tunc. Retroactive.

O

Obiter Dictum, or Dicta. Statements made in a judge's opinion that strictly speaking are not necessary to the decision of the court. These "statements by the way" are often responsive to some suggestion that is made by the case's facts or its legal issue, but are not themselves part of the court's holding. To characterize a statement in a judicial decision as "dicta" means that the statement does not have the precedential value of a statement which recites the holding of the decision.

Original Jurisdiction. Authority to try a case.

P

Per Curiam. When the opinion of a court of more than one judge is styled per curiam, what is meant is that the opinion is issued by and for the entire court, rather than by one judge writing for the court.

Peremptory. Conclusive, even if arbitrary, and requiring no explanation, e.g., peremptory challenges of prospective jurors.

Petitioner. The most common way of seeking review of a lower court decision in the United States Supreme Court is by petitioning for a writ of certiorari. The person who files the petition seeking review is called by the Court the petitioner. A person who petitions for any judicial relief such as a party who seeks other writs, such as mandamus is also called a petitioner.

Plaintiff. The party who brings the lawsuit. The party who complains.

Pleading. The written statements of the parties containing their respective allegations, denials, and defenses. The plaintiff's complaint and the defendant's answer are examples of pleadings.

Police Blotter. At the police station, the book in which a record is first made of the arrest of an accused person and the charges filed against her. Often used as a source for the journalist's report on the facts of the arrest.

Positive Law. Law enacted by a legislature.

Precedent. A judicial decision that is said to be authority for or to furnish a rule of law binding on the disposition of a current case. A precedent will involve similar facts or raise similar questions of law to the case at bar.

Preliminary Hearing. A hearing before a judge to determine if there is enough evidence to show that there is probable cause to justify bringing a person accused of crime to trial. In some jurisdictions, if probable cause is shown to exist at the preliminary hearing, the accused will be bound over to the grand jury.

Preponderance of Evidence. The standard of proof in civil as distinguished from criminal litigation. The greater weight of evidence, i.e., that evidence which is more credible and convincing to the mind, and therefore entitled to be given probative value (to be believed as proven true) in a civil law suit.

Prima facie. On the face of it, e.g., a prima facie or presumptively winning case.

Public Law. Law defining the relationship between government and persons, and the operations of government, e.g., constitutional, administrative, and criminal law.

R

Ratio decidendi. The crux of a judge's decision.

Recusation. Process of disqualifying a judge for prejudice or a special interest in a lawsuit.

Remand. A remand is an order of a higher court directing the lower court to conform its decision to the mandates of the higher court.

Remittitur. When the jury awards the plaintiff excessive damages, the court may, in lieu of awarding the defendant a new trial, remit what it considers to be the excess, and award the remaining damages to the plaintiff. The judge gives the plaintiff the option of accepting the damages the court believes authorized by the evidence in the form of reduction of damages by a remittitur or else facing a new trial.

Replevin. A lawsuit instituted to reclaim private property held by another.

Res Judicata. Literally, the "thing judicially acted upon." This doctrine states the rule that a party cannot bring the same suit on the same facts against the same parties after these matters have already been decided once by a court. A party has only one "day in court" and once a case has been finally decided, he cannot bring the same suit again.

Respondeat Superior. The legal doctrine whereby the employer can be held liable for the torts of his employee committed in the scope of his employment. Thus, in a media setting, the publisher may be required to respond in damages for defamation perpetrated in his newspaper by a journalist in his employ.

Respondent. The term used to identify the party opposed to granting a petition. The party petitioning for judicial relief is the petitioner, her opponent is the respondent.

Respondent Superior. Legal rule making an employer responsible for actions of an employee while employed.

Restatement of Torts. A publication of the American Law Institute which attempts to state in a comprehensive way the modern common law of torts on the basis of both a study of the judicial decisions and what it believes to be sound policy. The ALI also publishes restatements on other areas of the common law, such as contracts or conflicts of law.

Reversed. This term found at the end of an appellate decision simply means that an appeals court has reversed or overturned the judgment of a lower court.

Reversible Error. A judicial error in law or procedures substantial enough to warrant an appeal.

S

Scienter. Guilty Knowledge. In some criminal prosecution, an allegation of scienter, or guilty knowledge, concerning the act or omission complained of, is a prerequisite to prosecution. Proof of scienter has often been an issue in obscenity prosecutions.

Sealed Records. The records of certain cases may be sealed, and closed from public view, by order of the court. Cases involving trade secrets, or juveniles, are examples of what a court might order sealed.

Sequester. To put aside, e.g., to lock up a jury.

Slip Opinion. A copy of a court opinion printed and distributed immediately after it is delivered.

Stare Decisis. Literally, to hold the decision. A doctrine intended to provide continuity in the common law system. The doctrine requires that when a court has developed a principle of law and has applied it to a certain set of facts, it will apply the same principle in future cases where the facts are substantially the same. The doctrine does not operate inexorably and in contemporary American law, particularly constitutional law, has not been the barrier to legal, and thus to social change as may have been the case in the past.

State Action. The necessity that there be governmental involvement in a matter in order for the standards of the Fourteenth Amendment to be operative.

Sua Sponte. To do something on one's own initiative. A term used when a court makes a ruling on its own even though the ruling has not been requested by counsel for either side.

Sub nom. When used in case citations, this abbreviation means that the same case as the previous case is being noted, but that it was decided on appeal under a different name.

Substantive Law. The basic law of rights and duties.

Sui generis. One of a kind.

Summary Judgment. A motion for summary judgment is a pretrial motion which will be granted when the pleadings, affidavits and discovery materials disclose that there is no issue of material fact in controversy between the parties. In that event, the only issues left to resolve are questions of law which can be decided by the court. Summary judgment, therefore, is a pretrial device which if appropriate for rendition will result in judgment to the successful party without the necessity of going through a trial.

Summons. A notice delivered by a sheriff or other official (or sometimes a private individual) to a person to inform him that he has been named as a defendant in a civil suit and must come to court on a certain day and answer the complaint against him.

Supra. Refers to something printed earlier in the text in the sense of "see above."

T

Tort. A civil wrong not based on contract. A tort may be accomplished with or without force, against the person or property of another. Typical torts include trespass, assault, libel, slander, invasion of privacy, or negligence. The same word used to identify a tort may also be used to identify a crime, but the two meanings will often be quite different. Relief is usually sought through a suit seeking money damages.

Tortfeasor. One who commits a tort. A wrongdoer.

Trover (Trover and Conversion). An action for the recovery of damages against a person who has found another's goods and has wrongfully converted them to his own use.

U

Ultra Vires. Acts beyond the scope of the powers of a corporation, as defined by its charter or act of incorporation.

V

Vel Non. (Latin for "or not"), i.e., the issue is the validity vel non of this statute. (The issue is the validity or invalidity of the statute.)

Venireman. A member of a panel of jurors.

Verdict. The decision of the trial or "petit" jury. The jury reaches its verdict on the basis of the instructions given by the trial judge. The verdict may be a general verdict of "guilty" in a criminal case or a general verdict for either the defendant or the plaintiff in a civil case.

A special verdict consists of answers in the affirmative or negative to specific questions posed by the judge.

Viva voce. Orally rather than in writing.

Void. Without legal effect.

W

Writ. A judge's order requiring or authorizing something to be done outside the courtroom.

---

Writ of Prohibition. An extraordinary judicial writ from a court of superior jurisdiction directed to an inferior court or tribunal to prevent the latter from usurping a jurisdiction with which it is not lawfully vested, or from assuming or exercising jurisdiction over matters beyond its cognizance or in excess of its jurisdiction.

Index

- ABORTION
  - Advertising, 159
  - Fairness doctrine,
    - “Personal attack” rule, 875–876
  - Privacy, 315
- ACCESS TO INFORMATION
  - See, generally, Freedom of Information; Government, Access to
- ACCESS TO PRINT MEDIA
  - See also First Amendment
  - Advertising,
    - Editorial discretion, 572, 599, 602
    - News and editorial columns vs., 602
  - Commercial exploitation doctrine, implications of, 564–565
  - Editorial advertising, 564, 571–581, 597–603
    - Editorial replies, distinguished, 594
    - Right to refuse to publish, 573–579, 597–603
    - State-directed compulsory publication, 579
  - Electronic media, compared, 570
  - Fourteenth amendment,
    - Federal legislative power to enforce first amendment rights, 567
  - History of, 560
  - Indifference to new ideas, 564
  - Judicial enforcement, 566–567
  - Law reviews, 596
  - Legislation, 567–568, 609
  - Message composers and media owners distinguished, 569–570
  - Minority tastes or viewpoints, airing and publication of, 565
  - New First Amendment right, argument for, 559–569
  - Newspapers,
    - Nondiscriminating access to, 566–568
    - Regulation of, 565–566
      - Radio and television compared, 565–566
  - Public officials,
    - Right to respond or demand retraction, 563–564
  - Public press, 596–603
  - Public vs. private ownership, 570–581
  - Retraction statutes, 592–593
  - Right of reply statutes,
    - Generally, 581–596
    - Defamation, response to, 583, 593
    - Newspaper space vs. broadcast time, 584
    - Property, unconstitutional taking of, 584
    - Retraction statutes, compared, 592–593
    - Vagueness, 583
  - Technology, changes in, 560–561
- ADVERTISING
  - See also Access to Print Media; Antitrust Laws; Freedom of Speech
  - Abortions, 159
  - Antitrust laws, 611, 660–662
    - Blanketing, 662
    - Boycott, 611
    - Conscious parallelism, 662
    - Forced combination rates and refusals to deal, 660–661
    - Newspaper and refused advertiser in direct competition, 611
    - Rate differential for national and retail, 662
    - Refusing to accept, 579
    - Tying, 661
    - Volume discounts, 661–662
    - Zoned editions, 662
  - Automobile ads,
    - Counter-commercials, pointing out air pollution threat, 867
  - Billboards, 174–175
  - Boycott by advertisers,
    - Antitrust violation, 611
  - Cigarette advertising,
    - Congressional prohibition of, 857–858
    - FCC regulation of, 855–858
  - Commercial advertising,
    - See Fairness Doctrine, this topic
  - Comparative, 684
  - Copyright protection, 686
  - Counter-commercials, 856
  - Discrimination,
    - One commercial advertiser vs. others, 571–572
  - Editorial advertising,
    - Right of access to,
      - Television, network, 611
  - Electrical utility, ban on promotional advertising by, 169–174
  - Fairness doctrine,
    - Commercial advertising, 868–873
      - New FCC policy,
        - Constitutionality of, 869–870
        - Statutory challenges to, 870–871
    - Editorial advertising, 863, 866
  - False,
    - First amendment protection, no, 606–607, 631
  - Lawyers, 164–167
  - Legal or public notice, 635–636

- Media rights to refuse or control conditions of, 609-612
- Newspapers,
 Refusal of space to some advertisers,
 Conspiracy with segment of advertisers, 611
 Right of access to, 566, 571-581, 597-603
- Pharmacists, 159-162
- Political, 637
 Statutes restricting candidates' use of, 611
- Public notice,
 See Legal or public notice, this topic
- Regulation of, 605-635
 Affirmative disclosure,
 Corrective advertising, compared, 624
 Children, advertising to, 617
 Commerce and property, as part of, 607
 Comparative advertising, 634
 Corrective advertising, 623-632
 Affirmative advertising, 624
 First amendment, 627-628
 Standard for imposition of, 629-630
 Counter advertising, 632-634
 Demonstrations, testimonials, and indorsements, 617-619
 Endorser of product, 632
 False, deceptive and unfair, 614-619
 Federal Trade Commission,
 Affirmative disclosure, 621, 628
 Burden of proof where speech is being hindered, 632
 Cease-and-desist orders, 621
 Congressional actions toward, 615
 Consent agreements, 620-622
 Injunctions, 622
 Least restrictive remedy, required by first amendment, 614
 Rule making, 619-620
 Rule violations, 620-621
 Standard for judicial review, 629
 Goals, 614
 History, 613-614
 "Reasonable" person standard vs. "ignorant" person standard, 616
 Regulatory process, 619-622
 Self regulations, 634-635
 State regulation, 622-623
 Substantiation of claims, 618-619
 Unfairness doctrine, 614, 615-616
 Uniqueness, claims of, 618
 Wheeler-Lea Amendments to FTC Act, 614
- Taxes on, 612
- ALIEN AND SEDITION ACTS
 See First Amendment; Freedom of Press
- ANTITRUST LAWS
 Generally, 637-663
 Advertising, 611, 660-662
 Blanketing, 662
 Boycotting, 611
 Conscious parallelism, 662
 Forced combination rates and refusals to deal, 660-661
 Newspaper and refused advertiser in direct competition, 611
 Rate differential for national and retail, 662
 Refusing to accept, 579
 Tying, 661
 Volume discounts, 661-662
 Zoned editions, 662
- Broadcasting, 659-660
 Application to, 691
 Not exempt as "regulated industry", 951
- Cable television, 658-659
- Clayton Act, 638-639, 644-646
 Text of, 638-639
- Copyright protection and, 682
- Distribution, 662-663
- "Failing company" doctrine,
 Newspaper Preservation Act, 648-649
- Feature syndicates, 658
- Free press and, 639-643
- Joint operating agreements, 648-657
- Mergers and concentration of ownership, 643-648
- Motion pictures, 657-658
- "Multitude of tongues" policy, 640
- New technologies, 659
- Newspaper Preservation Act, see Government, Access to; Newspapers
- Newspapers,
 Application to, 643
 Sherman Act, 639
 Freedom of the press, conflict with, 642-643
 Text of, 639
- ATTORNEYS
 Advertising, 164-167
- BALANCING APPROACH
 See First Amendment
- BROADCAST REGULATION
 See also Fairness Doctrine; Federal Communications Commission
 "Balanced" programming, 782-785, 799
 "Blue Book" requirements, 784
- Censorship,
 FCC inquiry into programming, 781-800
- Cigarette advertising, 855-858
- Congressional prohibition against advertising a certain product, 857
- Cross-ownership rules, 958-973
- Direct broadcast satellites, 779
- Enforcement powers of FCC, 900-908
- "Equal time" requirement, 800-843
 Broadcasters obligation and, 814-815
 Cable television, 801-802
 Equal "opportunity", 800
 Fairness doctrine compared, 848

- “Legally qualified” candidate, definition of, 800–801
  - News cast exemptions, 803–812
  - Non-political broadcasts, 814
  - Particular segments of time, right to buy, 813–814
  - Presidential elections, 803–805
  - Primary elections, 802–803
  - Private actions against broadcaster under § 315(a), pp. 812–813
  - Reasonable access requirement and, 834, 842–843
    - See also, Reasonable access requirement, this topic
  - Factors involved in choosing among qualified applicants, 785
  - Fairness doctrine,
    - See also Fairness Doctrine
    - Procedure,
      - Writing the fairness complaint, 881–893
  - First Amendment,
    - Mass media context,
      - Affirmative obligation vs. prohibition on government restraints, 856
  - Group defamation as fairness doctrine problem, 898–899
  - Licensee control and responsibility over programming, problem of, 781–782
  - Licensee libel law liability and “equal time” rules, 814–815
  - License renewal,
    - “Fairness doctrine” performance of licensee, review of, 853, 893–897
    - Obscenity as factor, 933–936
    - Representative community views on public issues, requirement that licensee present, 853
  - Low power television (LPTV), 780–781
  - Multipoint distribution service, 779–780
  - Networks, 777–778
  - Obscenity,
    - See also Obscenity
    - Enforcement role of federal courts, 936–937
  - Programming format, changes in, 785–800
  - “Public interest” standard, 769, 774, 778
    - Cigarette advertising, 856
  - Reasonable access requirement,
    - A limited right of access for federal political candidates, 815–832
    - Equal time requirement and, 834, 842–843
      - See also Equal time requirement, this topic.
    - Free time not required to be made available under, 834–843
    - Good faith exercise of editorial judgment, no deference to, 833
    - Public interest standard, compared, 834
  - Violence, 930
- BROADCASTING
- See also Cable Television; First Amendment; Obscenity; Radio; Television
  - Antitrust laws,
    - No exemption as “regulated industry”, 951
  - Citizen groups,
    - Agreements with, 947–948
  - Constitution applied to privately-owned media, 52
  - Diversification of ownership, 948–980
  - First amendment protection,
    - Limited, 924–925, 929
  - License,
    - Public trust subject to termination for breach of duty, 941
  - Mill’s theory used to defend regulation of, 5–6
  - Political debate and, 800 et seq.
  - Public broadcasting, see Public Broadcasting
  - State action, as, 866
  - Television networks not “quasi-public” institutions subject to First Amendment, 866
- CABLE TELEVISION
- Generally, 980–1017
  - Compulsory license system,
    - Generally, 692–699
    - Royalties, 693–694
  - Copyright Act of 1976, pp. 692–693
    - Background, 689–692
    - FCC repeal of distant signal and syndicated exclusivity rules not at variance with, 1007–1008
    - Retransmission of copyrighted works, liability for, 695–699
      - Exempt secondary transmissions, 696–699
      - Sanctions, 694–695
  - Copyright and, 689–699
  - Deregulation of, 1002–1012
    - Network opposition to, 1002–1012
  - Distant signal rules, FCC repeal of, 1002–1012
  - Equal time requirement, 801–802
  - Fairness doctrine, 855
  - FCC,
    - Jurisdiction,
      - Existence of, 981, 983, 993–994
      - “Advance effect” rationale, 984
      - Lack of jurisdiction to issue mandatory public access rules, 994–998
      - Scope of, 984–991
  - Franchising, FCC regulation of cable system, 1013
  - Local or state regulation, 1015–1017
    - Sherman Act violated by restrictive municipal ordinance, 1015
  - “Local” television broadcast signals, mandatory carriage of, 1013–1014
  - Mandatory public access rules, 991–999
    - Common carrier status, rules invalid on ground they relegated cable systems to, 994–998
  - Nonduplication protection of network programming, 1014
    - Exceptions to, 1015

Obscenity, FCC content control rules concerning, 929-930

Pay cable rules of FCC, invalidation of, 999-1002

Program origination requirement, 985-990

Scarcity rationale, inapplicability of, 1001

Subscription television rules of FCC, 999-1002

Syndicated program exclusivity rules, FCC repeal of, 1002-1012

CAMERA IN COURTROOM

See Free Press and Fair Trial

CAMPAIGN FINANCING

See Elections; Freedom of Speech, Monetary contributions to political candidates

CENSORSHIP

See Broadcast Regulation; Federal Communications Commission; First Amendment; Freedom of Press; Freedom of Speech, Schools, public; Obscenity, Film censorship; Taxation

CHAIN BROADCASTING REGULATION

See Radio

CIGARETTE ADVERTISING

See Advertising; Federal Communications Commission

CITIZEN GROUPS

See Federal Communications Commission, License renewal proceedings

CLAYTON ACT

See Antitrust Laws

CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER

See First Amendment

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

See Freedom of Press

COLLEGE AND HIGH SCHOOL

See First Amendment, various subtopics; Freedom of Press; Schools, Public

COMMERCIAL SPEECH

See Freedom of Speech

COMMUNISM

See First Amendment

COMMUNITY ANTENNA TELEVISION (CATV)

See generally, Cable Television

CONSENT

See Libel, Defenses; Privacy, various subtopics

CONSPIRACY LAW

Use by government to deal with dissident groups, 73

CONTEMPT OF COURT

See also Free Press and Fair Trial; Freedom of Press; Journalists Privilege

Generally, 497-503

Constructive or out-of-court, 496, 497-498

Court order, refusal to obey without testing its validity, 499-501

State vs. federal courts, orders of, 501

CONVERSION

See Trover and Conversion

COPYRIGHT

Generally, 676-703

Advertisements, 684, 686

Antitrust laws and, 682

Cable television, 689-699

Compulsory license system, 692-699

FCC repeal of distant signal and syndicated exclusivity rules not at variance with 1976

Copyright Act, 1007-1008

Copyright Act of 1976, pp. 676-678

"Copyright clause" in Constitution, text of, 676

Electronic media and, 689-703

Fair use, 683-686

Television and home video recorders, 699-703

Freedom of Information Act, 682-683

Ideas and facts, 681-683

News, 686

Obscene works, copyrightability of, 678-681

Research, 681-682

Television and home video recorders, 699-703

Works made for hire, 677-678

CORPORATIONS

See Libel

CRIMES

See also Free Press and Fair Trial

Crime reporting, 491-496

Grand jury investigations, 379-401

Exclusion of press from, 384-385

Receiving stolen property,

Journalists' receipt of illegally obtained information, 355, 357-358, 359-362

Wiretap, 362-365

CRIMINAL LIBEL

See Seditious libel under following topics: First Amendment; Freedom of Press; Freedom of Speech

DATA PRIVACY

See Privacy

DISPARAGEMENT

See Libel

DIVERSIFICATION OF OWNERSHIP

See Federal Communications Commission

ELECTIONS

Contributions to political candidates, limitations on, 709-710

Disclosure of political candidate's financial support, 710

Minority parties, 711

- Expenditures by contributors to political candidates, limitations on, 709–710
- Federal regulation of campaign financing, 709–713
- Monetary contributions to political candidates, regulation of,
     "Proxy" speech, 711, 712
- Newspaper editorials on election day, statutory prohibition of, 706–707
- Organizations vs. individuals, impermissible distinction between with respect to contributions and spending, 711–712
- Presidential Election Campaign Fund Act ceiling on group expenditures, 712
- Subsidy of political candidates through public funding, Significant public support, requirement of, 711
- ELECTRONIC MEDIA
     See also Broadcasting; Radio; Television
- Copyright and, 689–703
- Union jurisdictional disputes, 675
- EMPIRICAL STUDIES
     Constitutional decision making and, 398
- EQUAL TIME
     See Broadcast Regulation; Federal Communications Act
- ETHICS
     See Privacy, Press
- FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT
     See Labor Law
- FAIR TRIAL
     See Free Press and Fair Trial
- FAIR USE
     See Copyright
- FAIRNESS DOCTRINE
     See also Access to Print Media; Broadcast Regulations; First Amendment
- Generally, 844–900
- Access to the media,
         Generally, 858–867
         Used to block right of, 865
- Accurate reporting,
- Cable television and, 855
- Cigarette advertising, 856
- Commercial advertising, 868–873
         New FCC policy,
             Constitutionality of, 869–870
             Statutory challenges to, 870–871
- Constitutionality of, 844–853
- Documentaries, application to, 876–881
- Editorial advertising, 863, 866
- Editorialize, right to, 876
- Encourages debate, 853
- Entertainment, application to, 875–876
- "Equal time" requirement, compared, 848
- Fairness Report of 1974,
         Generally, 867–873
         Judicial reaction to, 868–872
- First amendment goals,
         Use of fairness doctrine questioned, 896–897
- Free response, right of, 853–854
- Group defamation, 898–899
- Investigative journalism, application to, 876–881
- License renewal,
         Fairness performance of licensee, review of, 853, 893–897
- "Personal attack" rule, 844–853
         Abortion issue, 875–876
         Television "comedy", 899–900
         Text of, 846–847
- "Political editorial" rule, 846 et seq.
         Text of, 846–847
- Procedure,
         Writing the fairness complaint, 881–893
- Public issues, coverage of (Part 1 of fairness doctrine), Enforcement of, 873–875
         Right-of-access system vs., 864
- "Seek out" rule, 865
- Specific access scheme to be deemed presumptive compliance, 872
- Standing to enforce Federal Communications Act and, 939, 942
- FALSE LIGHT
     See Privacy
- FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS ACT
     See also Federal Communications Commission
- Aim of, 774
- Censorship, prohibited by § 326, pp. 908, 921–922
- Criminal statute proscribing obscenity in radio, Incorporation in FCA, 909
- "Equal time" requirement, 800–843
         Fairness doctrine inhered in public interest standard, 848
         Private actions against broadcaster under § 315(a), pp. 812–813
         Text of, § 315, p. 800
- "Reasonable access" requirement,
         A limited right of access for federal political candidates, 815–832
- Standing to enforce,
         Generally, 938–948
         Audience, 940
         Competitors of licensee, 938
         Economic injury doctrine,
             Industry vs. consumer orientation, 938
             Rejection of, 940
         Fairness doctrine and, 939, 942
- FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

- See also Broadcast Regulation; Cable Television; Fairness Doctrine; Federal Communications Act
- "Balanced" programming, 782-785, 799
- "Blue Book" requirements, 784
- Broadcasting,
Scope of authority over, 769-778
- Cable television regulations, see Cable Television
- Censorship,
Regulation of program content, 781-800
- Chain broadcasting regulations, 770-778
- Cigarette advertising,
First Amendment considerations, 856
Prohibition of, 857-858
Regulation by, 855-858
- Comparative hearings,
Petition to deny compared, 956
- Concentration of ownership,
Denial of license based on monopolistic practices not specifically violations of antitrust laws, 950
- Cross ownership rules, 958-973
Antitrust policy, not derived from, 971, 972
First Amendment policy, derived from, 971-972
"Grandfathering" of existing combinations, 967
Petition for waiver procedure, 970
- Direct broadcast satellites, 779
- Diversification of ownership, 948-980
- Enforcement powers, 900-908
Cease and desist order, 900-901
Denial of license renewal, 901-908 Letter, 900
- Factors involved in choosing among qualified applicants, 785
- Fairness doctrine,
Procedure,
Writing the fairness complaint, 881-893
- License renewal proceedings,
Automatic renewal process,
Decline of, 954-955
Reestablishment of, 957-958
Burden of proof on licensee, 943
Case-by-case approach, 958
Citizen group standing,
Limits on, 944-946
Recognition of, 938-944
Commission and hearing examiner,
Affirmative duty to develop meaningful record, 943
Comparative factors, weight afforded, 952-953
Comparative renewals, factors weighed in, 973-980
Diversity of ownership criterion, 955
"Fairness doctrine" performance of licensee, review of, 853, 893-897
Guidelines for weighing claims of incumbent against challenger, 973-980
Obscenity as factor in, 933-936
Petition to deny,
Citizen group and, 946-948
Comparative hearing, compared, 956
In terrorem effect of, 947
Substantial issue of fact required for, 946
Policy statement on renewals, 954
"Public interest" standard,
Requires encouragement of minority entry into broadcasting, 956
Public participation in, 941
Renewal expectancy as factor to be weighed in, 974-980
"Superior service" shown by incumbent,
New entries and racial minorities, barrier to, 956
Non-existence of standard, 956
"Substantial" service, compared, 957
Sympathy to licensees, 943, 957
Licensee "trusteeship" vs. access,
Licensee discretion over programming, 858
Low power television (LPTV), 780-781
Multiple, ownership rules,
Cross-media ownership and, 948-949, 958-973
No mention of, in, 951
Inadequacies in, 951
Underlying assumption examined, 972
Validity upheld, 948
Multipoint distribution service, 779-780
Networks,
Regulation of, 777-778
Obscenity,
Enforcement by federal courts, 936-937
License renewal process, related to, 933-936
Regulation of,
See Obscenity
One-to-a-market rule, 948-949
Combinations involving radio and UHF television stations, 972-973
Newspapers exempted, 949
Programming,
Format changes and broadcasting in the "public interest", 785-800
Responsibility of licensee, 781-782
"Public interest" standard, 769, 774, 778
Does not require access to media, 826
Public issues,
See also Fairness Doctrine
Requirement that licensee present representative community views, 853
Rulemaking authority and fairness doctrine, 847-848
"Substantial service",
See License renewal proceeding, this topic
"Superior service",
See License renewal proceeding, this topic
TV networks not required to sell time for political broadcasts, 858
- FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION
See Advertising, Regulation of
- FIFTH AMENDMENT
See Journalist's Privilege
- FIRST AMENDMENT

- See also Freedom of Press; Freedom of Speech; Journalist's Privilege; Libel; Obscenity
- Generally, 1-184
- Absolutist theory, 83, 88, 137
- Justice Black, 83, 106-108
- Academic freedom, 722
- Access to the media,
- Autonomy and diversity, reconciliation of, 593-594
- Alien and Sedition Acts, constitutionality of, 4-5
- Balancing approach, 72, 80-83
- Critique of, 80-81, 82
  - Draft card burning, 91
  - Present use, 82
  - Usefulness of, 82
- Belief, freedom of, 179
- Breach-of-peace statutes, 35, 84-88
- Broadcasting, limited protection of, 924-925, 929
- Cancellation of public television program because it presented point of view disagreeable to foreign country,
- Freedom of press vs. freedom of speech, 1027-1028
- Censorship by Postmaster General in excluding publications from the mails, 133-135
- Civil Rights demonstrations, 45-49
- Clear and present danger doctrine,
- Generally, 66-80
  - Balancing and reasonableness tests, compared, 28
  - Black and Douglas attack on, 77
  - Brandeis formulation, 22-26, 72
  - Decline of, 77
  - Gag orders, applied to, 78-80
  - Gravity of evil, discounted by its improbability, 71
  - Holmes formulation of, 12
  - Judicial disciplinary proceeding, breach of confidentiality of, 79-80
  - Learned Hand test, 71
  - Legislature,
    - Judgment not conclusive, 26
    - Legislative formalism, 26  - Linde critique, 77
  - Marketplace of ideas, reconciled with, 15
  - Opportunity for discussion, 72
  - Present uses, 78-80
  - Revived, 74-78
  - Rise of, 9-14
  - Usefulness of doctrine, 26
- Commercial advertising,
- Protection of, 158
- Commercial speech doctrine, see Freedom of Speech
- Communist activities under, 66-74, 80
- Mails, use of, 135-137
- Conspiracy, 73
- Constitutional truth, 19
- Criminal syndicalism, 22-26, 74
- Criminal trials, right of public and press to attend, 512-531
- Definitional balancing test, compared to balancing approach, 77-78
- Development of, in Supreme Court, 9-96
- Draft resistance,
- Draft card burning, 88-91
  - "Fuck the Draft" slogan on jacket, 84-88
- Fairness doctrine and, 896-897
- Fighting words doctrine, 28-30, 85
- Criticized, 30
  - Overbreadth doctrine,
    - Means of limiting application of fighting words doctrine, 29-30  - Speech-plus doctrine, compared, 29
  - Swastika display, not fighting words, 30-31
- Fourteenth amendment,
- Due process clause of,
    - First amendment applied to states by, 1-2, 16-19
    - Federal legislative power under, 567
- Freedom of speech and freedom of press clauses,
- Interchangeable use of, debated, 8-9
- Handbills, distribution of, 34
- Licensing, 35
- History of, 139-140
- Hostile audience,
- Prior restraint based on probability of, 32-33
- Interpretation, 19-22
- Intent of the framers, impact of upon modern theories, 22
- Lasswell, 22
- Meiklejohn,
- Blasi's critique, 20-21
  - Chaffee's critique, 21-22
  - Theory, 19-20
- Jehovah's Witnesses,
- See Jehovah's Witnesses
- Ku Klux Klan activities under, 74-76
- Labor union,
- Journalist, forced membership, 666-668
- Majoritarianism vs. constitutionalism, 72
- Marketplace of ideas theory, 3, 6
- Access to the press, related to, 559, 560, 569
  - Access to the print media and, 569
  - Baker's call, for liberty model, 15-16
  - Clear and present danger doctrine, reconciled with, 15
  - Communications industry changes destroying equilibrium, 560
  - Electronic media and, 15
  - Government intervention required, 15
  - Laissez-faire* theory, as, 14-15
  - Marcuse's concept, 15
  - Scanlon's call for positive government role, 16
- Mass media,
- Affirmative obligation vs. prohibition of government restraints, 856
  - Applied to, 9
- Mill, John Stuart,

- Influence of, 5–7
- “On Liberty of Thought and Discussion”, 6
- National security vs. freedom of information, 106–108, 123–126
- Newspapers,
  - Nondiscriminatory access to, 566–568
  - Right of reply statutes, 581–596
  - Constitutionality of, 590
- Not absolute, 4–5, 12, 23, 88
- Overbreadth doctrine, 51, 165
  - Commercial context, 165, 167
- Parades and demonstrations,
  - Duty to obey the void judicial order, 45–49
- Petition, right to,
  - Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act, effect of, 703
- Picketing,
  - Protection of, 49–51
  - Site of protest related to object of protest, 53–54
- Preferred position theory, 27–28
  - Balancing and reasonableness tests, compared, 72
  - Clear and present danger doctrine, compared, 28
  - Defined, 27
- Prior restraint, 4, 11
  - Presumption of constitutionality, and, 106
- Protection of speaker, 31
- Public broadcasting, 1018–1019
- Public forum, 64–66
  - Mailbox not a public forum, 66
  - Municipal bus likened to newspaper instead of park, 64–65
- Public’s “right to know”, 105
  - Press as trustee, 124
- Reasonableness test, 16–19, 71
- Schools, private, 721
- Schools, public,
  - Censorship by, 716–718
  - College vs. high school, 719
  - Secondary schools,
    - Higher vs. lower grades, 719
  - Student publications,
    - Instrumental tools, characterization as, 720
    - “Unofficial” publications, 720
- Seditious libel, 1
  - See also Libel
- Self-preservation of government, 66–67, 69–70
- Shopping centers, see Shopping Centers
- Smith Act, 66–70, 74
- Socialist activities under, 16–18
- Solicitation,
  - Religious group, by, 40–44
  - Specified percentage of receipts, required to be used for charitable purposes, 36–39
  - Time, place, and manner controls, 35–45
- Solicitation, regulation of,
  - Commercial solicitation, 34
- State action, 52
  - Picketing, 52
  - Private broadcast media, 866
  - State limitation on discretion of state-owned/operated television authority,
    - Absence of private speech, 1030–1031
  - States applied to, 1–2, 16–19
  - Statute or ordinance invalid on its face,
    - Court decree based thereon, need to obey, 45–47, 49
    - Need to obey, 45–47
  - “Structural” vs. “speech” models, 149–150
  - Students, 716–722
  - Students and teachers, applied to, 91–94
  - Text of, 1
  - Tribe’s categories, 8–9
  - Two-tiered theory of, 2
  - Unconstitutional conditions doctrine, 134
  - Unconstitutional court decrees, need to obey, 45
  - Uninhibited, robust, wide-open debate, need for, 104
  - Utility bill inserts discussing controversial issues of public policy, ban on, 59–64
  - Vagueness doctrine, 50–51
  - War, effect upon rights, 137
  - War resistance, applied to, 12–14
- FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT
  - See also Access to Print Media; First Amendment
  - State action, 52
- FOURTH AMENDMENT
  - Privacy, see Privacy
- FREE PRESS AND FAIR TRIAL
  - See also Contempt of Court
  - Generally, 485–557
  - Cameras in the courtroom,
    - Generally, 542–555
    - Experiments, 547–550
    - Judicial canons or codes,
      - Canon of Judicial Ethics, 547
    - No constitutional rule against televising if defendant objects, 549, 553–555
  - Carnival atmosphere during trial, 494
  - Clear and present danger doctrine, unsuitability of, 78–80
  - Closed courtrooms, 511–542
    - Right of public and press to attend criminal trials, 512–531
    - Sex offense trials, 534–538
    - Tests for motions to clear courtroom or seal records, 532
  - Crime reporting, 491–496
  - Criminal trials, right of public and press to attend, 512–531
  - Gag orders, 126–127, 502–511
    - ABA guidelines, 502–503
    - Alternatives to gag orders against the press, 510–511
    - Clear and present danger doctrine, use of, 78–80

- Exclusionary order, as substitute for gag order, 511
- Judicial records,
  - Common law right of access to, 533-534
- Juror challenges, usefulness of, 497
- Prejudicial news reporting, 486-497
- Pretrial suppression hearings, no Sixth Amendment right of access by press and public to, 511-512, 530
- Reardon report, 496-497, 499
- Restrictive or restraining orders,
  - See Gag orders, this topic
- Social science findings, 486-487
- "Trial by newspaper", 492
- Venue, change of,
  - Community prejudice, 488-490, 492, 496
- Voluntary reporting guidelines,
  - Authors' views on, 556-557
  - Order conditioning access to pretrial proceedings on compliance with, 539-542
- FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION
- Mandatory union dues, 176-177
- FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION
  - See also First Amendment; Freedom of Press; Freedom of Speech
  - Generally, 214
- FREEDOM OF INFORMATION
  - See also Freedom of Information Act
  - Generally, 439-471
- Freedom of Information Act and Pentagon Papers, 125
- Pentagon Papers case,
  - Victory or trap? 124, 125
- Right of privacy, related to, 157
- FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACT
  - See also Government, Access To
- FREEDOM OF PRESS
  - See also First Amendment; Free Press and Fair Trial; Freedom of Speech; Journalist's Privilege; Libel; Privacy
  - Generally, 96-155
- Advertisements,
  - Right to refuse to publish, 573-579, 597-603
- Alien and Sedition Acts, 4
- Antitrust policy and, 639-643
- Business aspects of publishing, 101, 142
- Censorship,
  - By conditioning use of the mails, 127-137
  - By state, 99
- Collective bargaining,
  - Journalists right to, 663-666
- Conflicting social values, 8
- Corporate speech case, 8
- Criminal trials, right of public and press to attend, 512-531
  - Criminal prosecution, and, 101, 123-124
- Editorial autonomy, 572, 599, 602
- Election day editorials,
  - Statutory prohibition of, 706-707
- England, compared with United States, 99
- Espionage Act, and, 108-109
  - Applied to make newspaper "nonmailable", 128
- Function of freedom of press clause,
  - Protection of press as means to end of a free society, 7
  - Protection of press qua press, 7, 150-155
- Speech clause, relation to, 154-155
- Stewart thesis, 7
  - Compared with Frankfurter thesis, 7
- Gag orders,
  - See Prior restraint, this topic
- History of, 1-9
- Hydrogen bomb, publication of article on how to make, 125-126
- Ink and paper tax which exempted first $100,000 used, 142-148
- Institutional press, 150-155
- Interchangeability of reasoning with freedom of speech, debate over, 8-9
- Liberty of the press,
  - Blackstone's description, 99
- Licensing, 2-3, 4
- Marcuse's theory, 6-7
- Milton, John,
  - "Aeropagitica," 2
- Monopoly and concentration in the press,
  - Positive characteristics of, 708
- National security, and, 106-108, 119-121, 123-126
- News,
  - Injunction against publication of, 106, 500
- Obscene magazines, exclusion from the mails by Postmaster General, 132-134
- Press, defined, 9
- Prior restraint,
  - Generally, 96-126
  - Censorship, as, 99
  - Contempt of court,
    - Court order, refusal to obey without testing its validity, 499-501
  - Defined, 96-97, 99
  - Falsity of statements sought to be restrained, effect of, 103
- Gag orders, 126-127, 502-511
  - Clear and present danger doctrine, use of, 78-80
  - New York Times v. Sullivan, effect of, 104
  - Not absolutely forbidden, 97, 100, 103, 110, 518-519
  - Nuisance statute, 96-103
  - Obscenity, 103-104
  - Pentagon papers case, 106 et seq.
  - Permitted prior restraints, 100, 103

- Presumption against restraints, heavy burden of overcoming, 106, 109, 126, 508-509, 518
 Public officials, character and conduct of,
     Libel action the appropriate remedy for false accusations, 101
 Schools, public, 718
 State obscenity advisory board and, 103-104
 Subsequent punishment, compared, 97, 101, 104, 123-124
 Warrant authorizing search of newspaper premises for criminal evidence, 428-430
 Privacy, 318-320
 Right of reply statutes, 582, 584-585
 Schools, public,
     Censorship by, 716-718
 Seditious libel, 3-5
     Jury, role of, 4
     Prior restraint, relation to, 100
     Truth as a defense, 4
 Special status for press, 148-155
     Special constitutional status for press, 148-149
     Special legislative treatment for press, 149
 Taxation and censorship, 138-150
FREEDOM OF SPEECH
     See also First Amendment; Freedom of Press
 Absolutist Theory,
     See First Amendment
 Advertising,
     Abortions, 159
     Billboards, 174-175
     Electrical utility, ban on promotional advertising by, 169-174
     Entire class of, efforts to abolish, 169
     Lawyers, 164-167
         Electronic broadcast media, 166, 167
         Routine vs. quality ads, 167
     Mandatory corrective advertising, 168
     Pharmacists, 159-162
     Professions, 164
     Realty, 168-169
 Alien and Sedition Acts,
     See First Amendment
 Anonymous speech, 155-157
     Related to political rights, 157
 Balancing test,
     See First Amendment
 Commercial speech doctrine, 157-176
     Advertising, 605-612
     Decline of, 159-176, 605-606
     Entire class of advertising, efforts to abolish, 169
     False and misleading, 165-166, 167-168
     Four-part test, 608-609
     Political speech, compared, 163-164
     Return to, 609
     Sex discrimination in classified advertising, 605
     Subordinated position of commercial speech, 605-606, 627-628
     Time, place and manner of advertising, reasonable restrictions on, 166, 169
 Compelled speech, 176-184
     Ideological message, 177-179
     Mandatory union dues,
         Use for political or ideological purposes, 176-177
     Refrain from speaking, right to, 177
     Shopping centers, 179-184
 Conflicting social values, 8
 Congress' power over, 12
 Corporations, 150, 154
     Business,
         Debate on public issues, 708-709
 Criminal trials, right of public and press to attend, 512-531
 Due process clause of fourteenth amendment,
     First amendment applied to states by, 1-2, 16-19
 Editorial advertisements, 204
 Fighting words doctrine, 28-30, 85
     See First Amendment
 "Fuck the Draft" slogan on jacket, 84-88
 Government,
     Ideological neutrality, 179
     History of, 1-9
 Hostile audiences, 31-33
     Overbreadth doctrine,
         Use of in cases involving hostile audiences, 32
 Interchangeability of reasoning with freedom of the press, debate over, 8-9
 Marcuse's theory, 6-7
 Monetary contributions to political candidates, regulation of, 709-713
     "Money" contrasted to speech, 711
 Picketing,
     Residential privacy, 54-58
 Political speech,
     Commercial speech, compared, 163-164
 Political vs. commercial advertising,
     Equal protection, 65
 Preferred position theory and commercial speech, 159
 Privacy, 318-320
 Private and public speech distinguished, 20
 Protected speech, 155-184
 Public facility,
     Primary purpose of the facility, effect on use as public forum, 65-66
     Right of nondiscriminatory access, failure to recognize, 64-65
 Public forum, 64-66
     Mailbox not a public forum, 66
     Municipal bus likened to newspaper instead of park, 64-65
 Schools, public,
     Censorship by, 716-718
     Who is considered publisher of school newspaper, 721-722
 Seditious libel, 4-5

- Smith Act, 2
- Social equality, confrontation with, 210–211
- Speech-action dichotomy,
     Criticism of usefulness of, 83
     Pure speech, 84
- Subject matter or message, 54–64
- Symbolic speech, 88–96
     Draft card burning rejected as, 91
     Flag misuse, 96
     Swastika display, 30–31
     Wearing armbands as, 91–94
- GAG ORDERS
 See Free Press and Fair Trial; Freedom of Press,
     Prior restraint
- GAMBLING
 See generally Lotteries
- GOVERNMENT, ACCESS TO
     Generally, 433–483
 Access, right of, 438–439
 Courtroom and court records, 438, 500–542
 Data privacy, conflict with openness, 479–483
 Executive privilege,
     Freedom of Information Act, relation to, 439
     Federal Advisory Committee Act of 1972 (FACA), 471
     Freedom of Information Act,
         Generally, 439–471
         Agencies and information covered, 440–442
         Amendments, 440
         Copyright protection and, 682–683
         Exemptions, 443–471
             Agency's internal personnel rules and practices, 453–456
             Commercial or financial information, 457–459
             Executive security classification, 443–453
             Financial institutions, reports about condition of, 470–471
             Geological and geophysical information, 471
             Law enforcement, investigatory records compiled for, 464–470
             Personnel, medical or related files, intimate personal details in, 461–464
             Predecisional communications, 459–461
             Statutory preclusion of disclosure, 451–452, 456–457
             Trade secrets, 457–459
             How to use, 442–443
             Underlying principles, 439
         Know, right to, 438–439
         Legislatures, access to, 435–437
         Presidential Recordings and Materials Preservation Act, 533
         Presidential tapes, 437
         Press pass, qualification for, 434–435
         Prior restraint, 438, 502
         Receiving stolen property,
             Journalist's receipt of illegally obtained information, 355, 357–358
         Right to gather news,
             Existence of right, 433–439
             Prisons and jails, press access to, 433–434
- GRAND JURIES
 See Crimes; Journalist's Privilege
- HANDBILLS
 Distribution,
     Anonymous handbills, 155
     First Amendment protection of, 34
     Regulation of, 34
- HIGH SCHOOL AND COLLEGE
 See Access to Print Media; First Amendment, various subtopics; Freedom of Press; Newspapers;
     Schools, Public
- INDECENCY
 See Obscenity, Broadcasting
- INSURANCE
 Libel and, 281–282
- INTRUSION
 See Privacy
- INVESTIGATIVE JOURNALISM
 See Fairness Doctrine; Libel
- JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES
 First Amendment,
     Fighting words doctrine, 28–29
 Handbills, distribution, 34
 Solicitation for funds by, 34–35
- JOURNALIST'S PRIVILEGE
     See also Newspapers; Search and Seizure
     Generally, 377–432
 Civil litigation, 426–428
     Heart of the claim, 428
 Common law privilege, 402–404
 Criminal context, 413–428
 Criminal proceedings, 413–426
 Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure,
     Rule 17(c) governing subpoenas, 414–419
     Text, 417
 Federal Rules of Evidence, 414
 Fifth Amendment, 378
 First Amendment, 389–398
 Gather information beyond ordinary citizen, right of journalist to, 398
 Grand juries, 378–395, 413–414, 421–422
 In camera disclosure, 422–426
 Journalist,
     Inquiry into who is qualified, legitimate or respectable, 388, 401
 Justice department's guidelines on news media subpoenas, 414

- "Legitimate" demand for disclosure of sources, defined, 421
- Libel and,
 Required showing of actual malice, 289-303, 406-413
 Shield laws exception for defamation actions, 405
 Notes, tapes, and identity of sources, protection of, 377-402
 Qualified privilege, 431-432
 Privilege for the communicator and not for the source, 431
 Relevance of information, 422
 Search and seizure,
 Federal law governing searches of persons engaged in news dissemination, 430
- Shield laws,
 Federal law,
 Constitutionality of, 389
 Efforts to enact, 399
 State laws,
 Generally, 402-406
 Constitutionality of, 389
 Defamation actions, exception for, 405
 Minnesota act, text of, 404-406
- Sources, confidentiality of,
 See generally Shield laws, this topic
- Tests, 393, 399-400
- Three-part test of Stewart's dissent in Branzburg, 393, 399-400
- KU KLUX KLAN
 First Amendment, and 74-76
- LABOR LAW
 Generally, 663-676
- Blacklisting, 668-669
- Code of ethics unilaterally adopted by employer, refusal to bargain collectively regarding, 674-675
- Electronic media,
 Union jurisdictional disputes, 675
- Fair Labor Standards Act,
 Press and, 669-672
- Forced union membership, 666-668
- Journalist's right to collective bargaining, 663-666
- Mergers of newspaper unions, 675-676
- National Labor Relations Act,
 Broadcasting, 667
- Newspapers,
 Applied to, 665
- Secondary boycotts, 669
- Union jurisdictional disputes, 675
- LABOR UNION
 See Electronic Media, Union jurisdictional disputes;
 First Amendment; Solicitation
- LAWYERS
 Advertising, 164-167
- LIBEL
 See also Journalist's Privilege; Trover and Conversion
 Generally, 185-310
 Actual malice, see Liability, standards of, this topic
 Ambiguity, 185-186
 Bigot, being called a, 372
 Broadcast defamation, 185
 Broadcaster's liability and "equal time", requirement, 814-815
 Colloquialism, 187
 Complicity rule, 201
 Connotation, 187
 Corporation,
 Credit or financial soundness, impugning of, 192
 Criminal libel, 210-213
 Civil libel laws, compared, 212
 Damages,
 Compensatory, 194-195, 241, 283, 308-309
 Humiliation and mental anguish and suffering, 241
 Mitigating factors, relation of, 282
 Nominal, 196-197
 Presumed, 234
 Punitive or exemplary, 195-196, 234, 309-310
 Special or actual, 195, 282-283
 Dead, of the, 280-281
 Defendants named, 200
 Defenses,
 Generally, 259-282
 Absolute privilege,
 Qualified privilege, compared, 274-275
 Burden of proof, 259, 266
 Community of interests privilege, 270
 Consent, 272-273
 Fair comment and criticism, 266-270
 Insurance, 281-282
 Neutral reportage, 270-272
 Qualified privilege, 261-266
 Crime, reports on, 264
 Judicial proceedings, 261-262, 264, 265
 Balanced, fair and substantially accurate, 264
 Public meetings, 261
 Sealed records and documents, 263
 Statute of limitations, 273-274
 Truth, 210, 260-261
 Defined, 185-194
 Discovery, 411-413
 Editorial process of media defendant, 289-303, 411-412
 Disparagement, 191-192
 Equal time in political broadcasts, 274-278
 Fairness doctrine,
 Group defamation, 898-899
 Fault, requirement of, 227, 234, 241, 242
 Future of, 303-310
 Group libel, 278-280
 Fairness doctrine problem, 898-899
 Headline, misleading, 189

- Hot news, 216, 219
- Humor, irony or sarcasm, 186
- Identification, 197–198
  - Colloquium, 198
  - Of and concerning, 208–209
- Injury, types of, 258
- Innocent construction rule, 187–188
- Innuendo, 188–189
- Insurance, 281–282
- Journalist,
  - Carelessness, 193–194
  - Ethical responsibilities, 236–287
- Jurisdiction, 199–200
  - Long-arm statutes, 197
- Legal act, accusation of, 193
- Liability, standards of,
  - Actual malice, 206–207, 212, 225–226, 244, 246–248
    - Discovery of editorial process of media defendant, 289–303, 411–412
  - Knowledge of falsity or reckless disregard for truth, see Actual malice, this subtopic
  - Negligence, 227, 243, 246
  - States, latitude of, 234, 244–246
  - Strict liability, 201, 231, 236
- Libel per quod, 189–190
- Libel per se, 189, 201, 204
- Megaverdicts, 303, 305
- Mitigating factors, 282–287
  - Previous bad reputation, proof of, 285–286
  - Reliance on usually reliable source, 286
  - Retraction and correction, 282–285, 307–308
- New York Times v. Sullivan* doctrine,
  - Expanding the doctrine, 210–220
  - Origins and developments, 201–210
  - Public issue test, 210–220
- Newspapers,
  - Public officials,
    - Right to respond or demand retraction, 563–564
- Omission, libel by, 190
- Opinion vs. fact, statements of, 258–259, 267–269
- Ordinary, commonly accepted meanings, 187
- Organized crime, 224
- Political skirmish, words used in context of, 186
- Political units, parties or interest groups, 193
- Present state of law, summary of, 225–243
- Private persons, 226–243, 256–258
- Prudent publisher test, 216, 245
- Public figure or official, 206–207, 210, 214–218, 221–223, 248–256
- Public or general interest test, 220–225
- Public realm, speech in,
  - Meiklejohn's thesis, 201
- Publication, 198–201
  - Collectivity of readers vs. atypical segment, 200
  - Single publication rule, 198–200
  - Third person, to a, 198
- Reputation,
  - Crime, charge of commission of, 185
  - Injury of, 185
    - Moral turpitude, accusation of, 185
- Res judicata, 285
- Retraction and correction, see Mitigating factors, this topic
- Retraction statutes, 284–285
- Schools, public, 720–721
- Seditious or criminal libel,
  - Freedom of the press from prior restraint, relation to, 100
- Settlement, 284
- Single-instance rule, 187
- Slander, compared, 185
- State libel laws,
  - Idiosyncrasy in, 187
  - Liability standards, latitude in fixing, 234
- Summary judgment,
  - Same principles applicable to other summary judgment motions, 288
  - Shield press from harassment, 288
- Trade libel, 191–192
- Truth,
  - Defense, 210, 260–261
  - Lack of, 206, 213, 243–244
- LICENSE RENEWAL
- See Broadcast Regulation; Federal Communications Commission; Obscenity
- LOBBYING
- Generally, 703–706
- Congressional distinctions between lobbying organization, constitutionality of, 704–705
- Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act,
  - Supreme Court's "rewriting" of, 703
- Veterans' organizations, tax exempt status for, 704–705
- LOTTERIES
- Generally, 713–716
- Anti-lottery laws,
  - News vs. promotion, 715
- Elements of, 713
- MAIL
- See also Newspapers, Postmaster General; Obscenity
- Power to exclude "communist political propaganda" from, 135–137
- Second-class mailing privilege for press as a government subsidy, 134–135
- Use of as a privilege, 134
- MALICE (ACTUAL)
- See Libel; Privacy, False light
- MASS MEDIA
- See First Amendment
- MEETINGS AND RECORDS
- Federal Open Meetings Law, 471–475
- State statutes,

- Open meetings, 478–479
- Open records, 475–478
- MONOPOLY
- See Antitrust Laws; Newspapers
- MULTIPLE OWNERSHIP RULES
- See Federal Communications Commission
- NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT
- See Labor Law
- NATIONAL SECURITY
- See Freedom of Press
- NETWORKS
- Regulation of, 777–778
- NEW YORK TIMES DOCTRINE
- See Libel
- NEWSGATHERING
- See, generally, Government, Access To
- NEWSMAN'S PRIVILEGE
- See Journalist's Privilege
- NEWSPAPER PRESERVATION ACT
- See Newspapers
- NEWSPAPERS
- See also Access to Print Media; Antitrust Laws; First Amendment; Free Press and Fair Trial; Journalist's Privilege; Libel
- Advertisements,
  - Right of access, 566, 571–581, 597–603
- Affirmative responsibilities,
  - Under First Amendment, 559
- Bay of Pigs invasion, newspaper cooperation in, 125
- Business aspects of, 101, 142
- Chain and conglomerate ownership, trend toward, 637–638
- College and high school,
  - See Schools, Public
- Community newspaper,
  - Nondiscriminatory access to, 566
- Copyright questions, 678
- Cross-media affiliation, trend toward, 637–638
- Cross-ownership rules, 958–973
  - Discrimination against newspaper owners, lack of, 965
  - "Grandfathering" of existing combinations, 967
- Fair Labor Standards Act, 669–672
- Feature syndicates and antitrust activities, 658
- Joint operating agreements, 648–657
- Joint ownership of TV stations and FCC multiple ownership rules, 949
- Labor laws, 664 et seq.
- Labor-management relations in the industry, 672–675
- Letter-to-the-editor column, 566
- Libel law,
  - Applied to public officials, 104
- License refusal,
  - Monopolistic practices not specifically violations of antitrust laws, 950
  - License tax on gross receipts, 138
  - Loss of second-class mailing privilege, 127–131
  - Mergers and concentration of ownership, 637–638, 643–647
  - Minimum wage and maximum hour legislation (Fair Labor Standards Act), 669–672
  - Monopoly power, and, 559, 568, 580–581, 588
  - Newspaper Preservation Act, 647–657
    - Constitutionality of, 655–656
    - History of, 649
    - Joint operating agreement,
      - History, 649–651
    - Labor problems, 672–673
    - Scope and operation of, 651
  - Pentagon Papers case, history of, 105–106
  - Postmaster General, power to exclude from the mails, 129, 133
  - Public nuisance, state statute, 96–103
  - Regulation of, 565–566
    - Radio and television compared, 565–566
  - Right of reply statutes, 581–596
    - Constitutionality of, 590
    - Retraction statutes, compared, 592–593
  - Search and seizure,
    - Federal law governing searches of persons engaged in news dissemination, 430
    - Warrant authorizing search of newspaper premises for criminal evidence, 428–430
  - Sources, privilege to protect, 105
    - See also Journalist's Privilege
    - National security secrecy, compared, 124
  - Special status,
    - Institutional press, special status under press clause, 150–155
    - Special constitutional status for press, 148–149
    - Special legislative treatment for press, 149
  - Technological changes,
    - Labor-management relations, effect on, 672
  - Unfair competition,
    - News copy, appropriation of, 687
  - Unions,
    - Merger of newspaper unions, 675–676
- NEWSPERSON'S PRIVILEGE
- See Journalist's Privilege
- NEWSWORTHINESS
- See Privacy
- OBSCENITY
- See also Broadcast Regulation; Federal Communications Commission
- Generally, 722–768
- "Adult" movies,
  - No right to watch obscene movies in places of public accommodation, 756–757
- Broadcasting,

- Children, effect of impossibility to exclude from audience, 916, 921, 925-928
  - Criminal vs. FCC proceedings, 937
  - Cultural or geographic differences, effect of, 914
  - Gratuitous or unwarranted language, censorship of, 911
  - Indecency,
    - Alternative standard in broadcast field, 910-911, 912, 916, 919-930
    - Context, function of, 923-924
    - Obscenity vs., 926, 928-929
    - Violence as, 930
  - Interview show, 914-919
  - License renewal process, use of as regulatory device, 933-936
  - Pandering, 916-919
  - Public interest standard, 911
  - Variable obscenity approach, 913
  - Cable television,
    - FCC content control rules concerning obscenity and, 929-930
  - Captive audiences, protection of, 767
  - Children, 739-743
  - Community standards,
    - Indistinct concept, 766
    - Local vs. national, 734-735, 751, 753, 755-756, 764-766
  - Comstock Act, 725, 728
  - Content of speech, regulation because of, 923-924
  - Customs Bureau, 727, 763
  - "Dominant theme" requirement, function of, 912
  - Empirical support for underlying propositions, lack of, 768
  - Federal statutes,
    - Anticensorship provision, 908, 921-922
      - Inapplicable to obscenity or indecency prohibition, 908, 921-922
    - Obscenity or indecency prohibition, 908, 921
  - Film censorship, 735-744
    - Due process, 737-738
    - Procedural safeguards, 737
  - First amendment, no protection under, 728-730
  - "Fuck the Draft" slogan worn on jacket not applicable as, 84
  - Hicklin* test, 725-726
  - Home, privacy of, 750-751
  - Ideas, advocacy of, 733
  - Indecency,
    - See Broadcasting, this topic
  - Literary, artistic, political or scientific value, absence of, 752-754
  - Lockhart, report, 751-752
    - Sex education program, proposal of, 752
  - Lord Campbell's Act of 1857, p. 724
  - Mail, summary seizure of, 726
  - Pandering, 746-748
    - Estoppel, 748
  - Pandering Advertisement Act, 727
  - Patent offensiveness, 734, 745, 749, 754, 765, 766
  - Post Office, 728-727
  - Postmaster General, exclusion of obscene materials from the mails, 132-134
  - Print and broadcast media,
    - Different standards for, 910-911
  - Prior censorship, 103-104, 763-764
    - Adversary hearing, requirement of, 734
  - Privacy,
    - Home, 750-751
    - Place of public accommodation, 756
  - Prurient interest, 734, 744-746, 748-750, 766-767
    - Average person, 765, 766-767
  - Redeeming social value,
    - Literary, artistic, political or scientific value, substitution for, 752-754
    - Social value vs. social importance, 744-746
    - Utterly without, 734, 744-746
  - Regulating in broadcast programming,
    - Generally, 908-937
    - Basis for regulation, 908-919
    - Federal courts, enforcement role of, 936-937
    - License renewal process, 933-936
    - Roth-Memoirs* test, 749-750, 752-753
      - Abandonment of, 753-754
    - Roth-Miller* test, 752-768
  - Scienter, 731, 733
  - Sex and, 729-730
  - State vs. federal powers, 731-732
  - Statutes,
    - Overbreadth, chilling effect of, 919
  - Supreme Court's role, 757-763
  - Tariff Act of 1842, p. 725
  - Thoughts, purity of, 729, 732
  - Ulysses* or "community standards" test, 725-726
  - Variable obscenity approach, 913
    - Constant definition vs., 767
  - Words alone, 763
  - Zoning, 743
- PAY TELEVISION
See Cable Television
- PERSONAL ATTACK RULES
See Fairness Doctrine: Television, Comedy
- PETITION, RIGHT TO
See First Amendment
- PICKETING
See also First Amendment
- Labor unions, 49-51
  - Private property and the public forum,
    - State action problem, 52-64
  - Protected by First Amendment, 49-51
  - Residential privacy, 54-58
  - Site of protest related to object of protest, 53-54

- State action, 52-64
 State regulation of, 51
- POLITICAL CANDIDATES
 See Elections
- PORNOGRAPHY
 See Obscenity
- PREFERRED POSITION THEORY
 See First Amendment
- PRIOR RESTRAINT
 See Freedom of Press
- PRIVACY
 See also Freedom of Information; Government, Access To; Obscenity; Trover and Conversion
 Generally, 311-375
 Abortion decision, 315
 Appropriation, 365-375
   See also Publicity, Right of Consent,
     Newsworthiness and, 368
   Newsworthiness, 366-368
   Rights of publicity, appropriation of, 366, 368
 Areas not discussed, 316
 Brandeis and Warren, law review article by, 313-314
 Celebrities,
   Paparazzo, 349-353
 Data privacy, conflict with openness, 479-483
   Federal Privacy Act of 1974, pp. 479-482
   State statutes, 482-483
 Definitions, 311-313
 Embarrassing private facts,
   Generally, 331-346
   Actual malice not an issue, 336
   Community standards test, 332-337
   Criminal events, connection with, 345
   Rehabilitation, 343
 Examples of actionable situations, 345-346
 Newsworthiness, defense of, 331-337, 341
   Voluntariness, 346
 Public figures,
   Subsequent history of, 332
 Public interest, 341
   Passage of time, 342, 344
 Public records, 337-340
 Truth as defense, 338, 341-342
 Unconscionability rule, 332-337
 False light,
   Generally, 316-322
   Actual malice, 317, 319-322, 336
   Libel law, merge or distinguish, 320-322
   Negligence test, 319-320, 321
   Private person libel rule, 321
   Public interest or issue, 330
     Involuntary involvement, 321
   Truth as defense, 331
 Federal Privacy Act of 1974, pp. 479-482
 Fictionalization, 322-331
 Disclaimers, 322
 Identification, 322, 323, 324-325, 327-329
 Public interest, 322, 330
 Freedom of information, related to, 157
 Governmental privacy, 106
 How information is obtained, 345
 Intrusion, 321
   See also Trespass
   Generally, 347-365
   Consent, 366
   Improperly intrusive means, obtaining information by, 357
   Journalists, no immunity while newsgathering, 348
   Public official suspected of corruption, 342-354
   Publication, not required, 347, 357
   Shadowing and observation, freedom from, 352
   Surveillance, 347-353
   Trespass, compared, 347
   Wiretap, 363-365
 Left alone, right to be, 352
 Newsworthiness, 317, 331-337, 341, 361-362, 366-368
 Origins of, 313-316
 Pandering Advertisement Act, 727
 "Penumbras" of first, third, fourth and ninth amendments, 314-315 Press,
   Ethics and good taste, 316
   Privacy Act of 1974, p. 316
   Public disclosure, 321
- PRIVATE PROPERTY
 First amendment applied to, 52-58
 Picketing, 52-64
 Right of reply statutes,
   Property, unconstitutional taking of, 584
- PRIVILEGE
 See Journalist's Privilege; Libel, Defenses
- PROGRAMMING
 See Federal Communications Commission
- PUBLIC BROADCASTING
 Generally, 1017-1031
 Access problems, 1022-1028
 Cancellation of program because it presented point of view disagreeable to foreign country, 1022-1027
 Censorship claim involving public television decision to cancel program, 1024-1026
 Corporation for Public Broadcasting, 1017
 Editorial discretion, 1022-1028
   Government-facility model, 1028
   Government-speech model, 1028
   State limitation on discretion of state-owned/operated television authority, 1029
 Editorializing by public broadcasters,
   Constitutionality of ban on, 1021-1022
   Procedural due process standards, call for, 1022
 First amendment and, 1018-1019

Objectivity and balance standard, 1019–1020
 Public Broadcasting Act of 1967, pp. 1017–1018
 Public forum theory.

Right of access and 1024, 1030
 State regulation of, 1029–1031

PUBLIC FIGURES

See Access to Print Media; Libel; Privacy

PUBLIC INTEREST

See Fairness Doctrine; Federal Communications Commission; Libel; Privacy

PUBLIC OFFICIALS

See Access to Print Media; Libel; Privacy

PUBLICATION

See Libel; Privacy, Intrusion

PUBLICITY, RIGHT OF

Generally, 366–375
 Consent, 372–373
 Death, effect on right to recover, 366, 374–375
 Entire performance, unauthorized display of, 368–371

PUBLIC'S RIGHT TO KNOW

Freedom of information, see Freedom of Information
 Journalist's privilege, see Journalist's Privilege
 Privacy, see Privacy

RADIO

See also Broadcast Regulation; Broadcasting; Federal Communications Commission; Public Broadcasting
 Chain broadcasting regulation, 770–778
 Newspapers,
 Cross-ownership rules, 958–973

REARDON REPORT

See Free Press and Fair Trial

RECORDS

See Meetings and Records

RETRACTION STATUTES

See Access to Print Media; Newspapers, Right of reply statutes

RIGHT-OF-REPLY STATUTES

See Access to Print Media; Freedom of Press; Newspapers

SCHOOLS, PUBLIC

See also First Amendment
 Disciplinary proceedings,
 Due process, 720

SCIENTER

See Obscenity

SEARCH AND SEIZURE

See also Newspapers

Federal law governing searches of persons engaged in news dissemination, 430

Innocent persons,

Subjects of search, 430

Newspapers,

Warrant authorizing search of newspaper premises for criminal evidence, 428–430

SEDITIONOUS LIBEL

See First Amendment; Freedom of Speech; Freedom of Press

SELF PRESERVATION OF GOVERNMENT

Constitutional rights, compared to, 66–67, 69–70

SHERMAN ACT

See Antitrust Laws

SHIELD LAWS

See Journalist's Privilege

SHOPPING CENTERS

Compelled speech, 179–184
 Picketing, 52–54
 Informational, 53
 Relation between picketing and use of property, 53–54
 State action, 52

SLANDER

See Libel

SMITH ACT

See First Amendment; Freedom of Speech

SOLICITATION

See also First Amendment
 Jehovah's Witnesses, 34–35
 State power to regulate, 34–35

SOURCES

See Journalist's Privilege; Newspapers; Shield Laws

STATE ACTION

See First Amendment; Picketing; Shopping Centers

STUDENTS

See First Amendment (Schools, public); Freedom of Speech (Schools, public); Schools, Public

SUBSCRIPTION TELEVISION

See Cable Television

SUNSHINE LAWS

See also Meetings and Records
 Generally, 471–475

SYMBOLIC SPEECH

See Freedom of Speech

TAXATION

See also Advertising
 Censorship of press and, 138–150

Ink and paper tax which exempted first $100,000 used, 142-148

TECHNOLOGY

See Access to Print Media

TELEVISION

See also Broadcasting; Cable Television; Federal Communications Commission; Public Broadcasting

Comedy,

“Personal attack” rule under fairness doctrine, application to, 899-900

Home video recorders and copyright infringement, 699-703

Low power television (LPTV), 780-781

Multipoint distribution service, 779-780

Networks not required to sell time for political programming, 858

Newspapers,

Cross-ownership rules, 958-973

Tort liability of television broadcasters, 930-933

UHF television,

One-to-a-market ownership rule of FCC waived as to radio and UHF television combinations, 972-973

Violence, regulation of, 930

TORT LIABILITY

Television broadcasters, of, 930-933

TRADE-MARK

Newspaper's name, 688-689

TRESPASS

See also Privacy, Intrusion

Generally, 353-362

Common usage, custom and practice,

Implied consent by, 353

Newsgathering,

Apartment of arrested murder suspect, entering of, 353

Restaurant, filming scene of alleged health code violations, 353-354

Police,

Exclusion of others during criminal search, 353

Possessory interest, absence of, 353

Wiretap, 362-365

TROVER AND CONVERSION

Defined, 354

Information or ideas,

Extension to, criticized, 356

Journalists' receipt of illegally obtained information, 355, 357-358, 359-362

Libel, substitute for, 355, 358

Privacy, substitute for, 355, 357 et seq.

TRUTH

See Libel, Defenses; Privacy, False light

UNFAIR COMPETITION

Generally, 683-689

News copy, appropriation of, 687

UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION

Applies to government only, 52

VIOLENCE

See Obscenity, Broadcasting; Television

WIRETAP

See Crimes

