Preface

We have learned from the teachers who use this book that they like our practice of letting the courts speak for themselves. We have extended this pattern in the fourth edition of Mass Communication Law. Two new and, we hope, helpful features of this edition are that we have tried to include more of the current law review literature than in the past, and we have added Media Law Reporter citations to all recent cases. The fourth edition retains the auxiliary portions of previous editions: diagrams of state and federal court systems with applicable changes, an expanded glossary of legal terms, and an outline on legal research are included. These should be of particular use to journalism, broadcast, and advertising students. We have also added the Constitution of the United States.

Changes in the organization of this edition are a response either to developments in the field or to comments and criticisms of colleagues and students who use the book. Thus, the libel chapter, Chapter II, has abandoned the retrospective approach to the New York Times v. Sullivan—Gertz case law which was used in the third edition. A straightforward chronological approach beginning with New York Times and proceeding to Gertz and later developments is used instead.

In place of a separate chapter, we have made obscenity the final section of Chapter VIII, Selected Problems of Law and Journalism. On the other hand, the material on public access to the print media, which comprised a section of the Selected Problems chapter in past editions, has been placed in a separate chapter in response to the comments of our users who find the combination of ethical and First Amendment issues which surround the access question to be a source of lively discussion and interest among their students.

The electronic media chapter, Chapter IX, has been substantially revised to reflect the increasing importance of cable. The deregulation activities of the Reagan-era FCC, in both cable and broadcasting, have been emphasized. Some general information about new technological developments in the electronic media and the problems these developments pose for governance are also discussed. A new section on the "reasonable access" case, CBS v. FCC, has also been included in the electronic media chapter.

As in past editions, this book remains a truly collaborative effort. Primary responsibility for authoring and editing the following chapters and sections is as follows—Professor Barron: Chapters I, VII, and IX and three sections of Chapter VIII: The Media and the Labor Laws, Copyright and the Electronic Media and Lobbying and Campaign Regulation; Professor Gillmor: Chapters II, III, IV, V, and VI and six sections of Chapter VIII: The Law and Regulation of Advertising, The Press and the Antitrust Laws, Copyright, Unfair Competition and the Print Media, Lotteries, Students and the First Amendment and Pornography. In this edition, each author critically edited the work of the other in an effort to present fairly and accurately both journalistic and legal views. Much of the book is written from the perspective of the potential media defendant.

The principal aim of the authors of this fourth edition has been to meet the needs of faculties and students in schools and departments of journalism and mass communication. For an undergraduate journalism school, a basic course might begin with a review of the first section of Chapter I, An Introduction To The Study Of The First Amendment.

After that, the following sequence is suggested: Chapter II (libel), Chapter III (privacy), Chapter IV (journalist's privilege), Chapter V (access to legislative and executive branches), Chapter VI (access to judicial process and the range of free press-fair trial problems), Chapter VIII (the sections on antitrust and labor laws and the two copyright sections), the problems of the electronic media dealing with equal time and the fairness doctrine discussed in Chapter IX. Advertising and public relations students ought to be assigned the appropriate sections of Chapter VIII. Advanced courses probably will want to begin with a study of the entire First Amendment chapter (Chapter I), and then move to questions of access to the print media discussed in Chapter VII, antitrust problems and advertising discussed in Chapter VIII and segments of the electronic media chapter, (Chapter IX).

This book can be and is used in law schools as well as in journalism programs. Its authors, a journalist and a lawyer, continue to try to indicate in each chapter the many ways in which law and journalism interact. Dean Barron suggests the following sequence of assignments for a survey course in media law in a law school: Ch. IX (electronic media), Ch. VIII, the section on copyright and the electronic media, Ch. VI (free press and fair trial), Ch. II (libel), Ch. III (privacy and the press), Ch. IV (journalist's privilege), and Ch. VII (public access to the print media). The suggested sequence of chapters is unlikely to repeat subjects found elsewhere in the law school curriculum and at the same time provide a survey of some of the most difficult and important issues in contemporary media law.

Professor Gillmor, ever indebted to former graduate and undergraduate students, wishes to acknowledge the very real contributions of each of the following to particular segments of the manuscript: Everette Dennis (long since a colleague and co-author), legal research and information as property; Richard Kielbowicz and Patrick Parsons, freedom of information; Kent Middleton, advertising and commercial speech; Robert Drechsel, libel, privacy, and freedom of information; Kermit Netteburg, copyright and camera in the courtroom; Herbert Terry and Arlette Soderberg, legal research and broadcast law and regulation; Robert Trager, student press law and free press-fair trial; Charles Whitney, libel; Peter Flanderka, antitrust; and Derek Cathcart for his "dissertation" on pragmatic logic. Most are now colleagues teaching their own courses in mass communication law.

Dean Barron wishes once again to express his thanks to La Mona Rivers, Executive Assistant to the Dean, for wondrous patience, skill, and care in working on the manuscript. He would also like to thank Mark A. Warnquist of the second year class at the National Law Center, George Washington University, for the high quality of his research assistance.

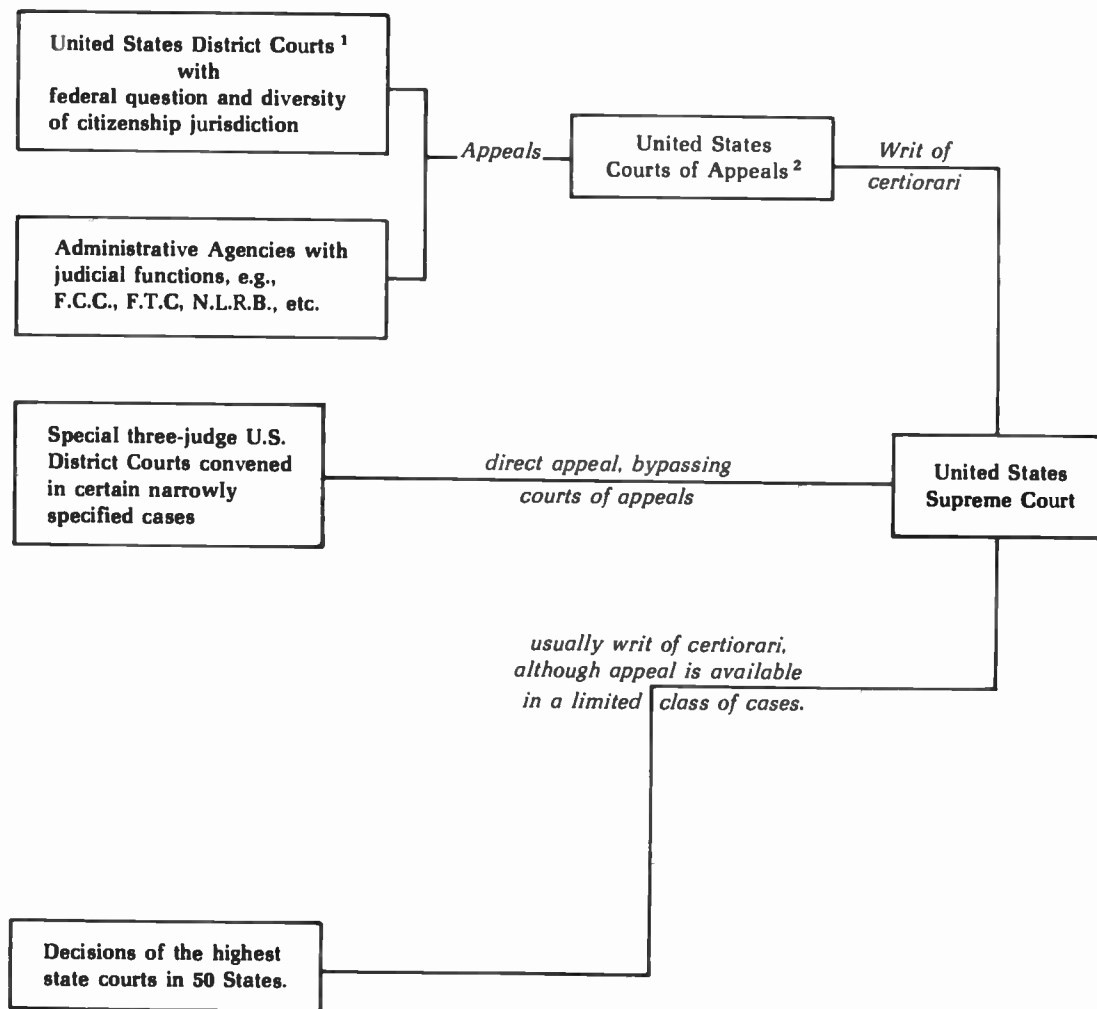

Invaluable to any student of press law are the annual meetings of the Communication Law section of the Practising Law Institute and their comprehensive handbooks, Communications Law, the Media Law Reporter of the Bureau of National Affairs, a must for schools without law libraries, and the publication of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, The News Media and the Law.

When a casebook proceeds from one edition to another, there is always the danger that the outdated furniture of earlier editions will remain in place in the new edition. We have tied hard to discard much of that old furniture. This edition is a substantial rewrite of its predecessor. Our goal has been not to write an encyclopedia of mass media law but rather to provide a book which will be informative and teachable at the same time. We shall hear from you, our students and colleagues, as to whether or not we have succeeded.

The Federal Court System

1. There is a least one federal district court in every state.

2. The United States is divided into eleven numbered federal judicial circuits, plus the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. In addition, there is the United States Courts of Appeals for the Federal Circuit which was established by the Congress in 1982. This court succeeded to the appellate jurisdiction of the United States Court of Claims and the United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, both of which were abolished. Another new court, the United States Claims Court, succeeded to the trial jurisdiction of the old United States Court of Claims.

A State Court System

The state court system outlined below is one example of a state court system. It is intended to provide a guide to the state judicial process for the student who is unfamiliar with the organization of state courts. There is substantial variation from state to state. The following figure illustrates the California Court system.

1. Has no obligatory appellate jurisdiction; that is, it reviews cases by granting petitions for writs of certiorari and thus retains complete discretionary control of its jurisdiction.

2. Consequently the great bulk of cases reach final decision in these five District Courts of Appeals.

3. Superior Court, the trial court of general jurisdiction, also has three special divisions: the General Trial Court, Probate Court, Conciliation Court and Juvenile Court.

3a. This court has jurisdiction over the administration of estates, wills, and related matters.

3b. The conciliation court is a rather unique institution that takes jurisdiction over family disputes that could lead to the dissolution of a marriage to the detriment of a minor child.

3c. The juvenile court considers certain types of cases involving persons under 18 years of age.

4. There is one Superior Court in each county. The Municipal and Justice Courts represent subdivisions of each county by population. These courts are trial courts with limited jurisdiction. Their civil jurisdiction is in cases involving generally less than $5000 in controversy. They also have original and exclusive criminal jurisdiction for violations of local ordinances within their districts.

4a. The small claims court is the familiar forum used to settle small disputes, here less than $500, using informal procedure and prohibiting lawyers for the disputing parties.

Note: Superior Court is usually the last state court to which a decision of these lowest courts can be appealed. It is possible that a case from one of these courts could be ineligible for further state review, and could have further review only in the U.S. Supreme Court.

A “Brief” on Legal Research for Journalists

Cases, statutes and constitutions are the primary stuff of the law. If you cannot retrieve and read them, you are forever doomed to secondary sources—someone else will have read and interpreted them for you.

Many campuses will not have law school libraries. There are alternatives. Metropolitan counties often have substantial law libraries in their courthouses or government centers. State capitols usually house law libraries. In addition, general public libraries, political science departments and private law firms may be able to assist you.

A new and invaluable resource for college, school or department is the Bureau of National Affairs Media Law Reporter (Med.L.Rptr.). On a weekly basis it reports almost all court cases having a bearing on journalism and communication law. Issues include news notes, occasional bibliographies, Supreme Court schedules or dockets, and special reports (for example, a 1977 report on the federal Freedom of Information Act). The heart of its content is the presentation of complete decisions or substantial case excerpts covering the broadest spectrum of mass communication law. Subscriptions are $358 per year, after an initial $413 first-year charge. The service is a must for schools and departments of journalism.

A more general predecessor is United States Law Week (U.S.L.W.) at $349 after an initial $364 first-year charge. It comes in two parts, one providing Supreme Court opinions shortly after they are rendered, the other federal statutes, administrative agency rulings, and significant lower court decisions.

If you have access to a law library, you have at your fingertips an ingenious information retrieval system, much of which is now, or soon will be, computerized and thereby accessible in less laborious ways. Two computer systems now in place are Lexis and Westlaw.

Abbreviations used in the following section are part of a Uniform System of Citation 13th ed. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard Law Review Ass'n., 1981), used in all legal writing and reporting, and designed for precise communication and for brevity.

Remember that constitutions, legislative enactments, and court decisions of the jurisdiction involved are primary authorities. Treatises, law reviews, the Restatements of the American Law Institute, for example, are secondary sources. These sources, however, are frequently cited and accepted as persuasive authority by all levels of courts in various jurisdictions and at the federal level throughout the country. Annotations, encyclopediae, loose-leaf services and dictionaries are primarily used to find references to primary materials such as court reporters, statutes or constitutional provisions. The primary materials may after thorough examination then be cited as actual authority for a legal proposition or definition. Digests, citators and indexes are used principally to lead a researcher to primary materials.

A first step in legal research might be to find the words, the legal vocabulary of your problem. Any one of a number of law dictionaries would serve this purpose (Black's, Ballentine's Gifis, or Oran's Law Dictionary for Non-Lawyers). Assuming some legal knowledge of your topic, you might prefer to begin with a resource that demonstrates how state and federal courts have construed your concept. Such a work is Words and Phrases, an alphabetical list of words and phrases followed by abstracts of judicial decisions using them. Pocket parts or supplements inside the back cover keep this and many other legal publications up to date. Don't overlook them.

Legal encyclopediae—notably Corpus Juris Secundum (CJS) and American Jurisprudence 2d (Am.Jur.2d)—provide yet wider sweeps of legal issues and principles. Use their general index volumes and, again, don't forget the updating pocket supplements. American Jurisprudence 2d will reference you to American Law Reports (ALR, ALR 2d, ALR 3d, ALR 4th and ALR Fed.) which contains brief essays or annotations on significant legal topics suggested by the approximately 10 per cent of state and federal appellate court decisions this service considers leading cases. A good annotation may discuss all previously reported decisions on your topic. There are topical Digests to the first two series and a Quick Index for each series. ALR and ALR 2d are updated by a Blue Book and a Later Case Service respectively, ALR 3d, ALR 4th and ALR Fed. by pocket supplements.

By now you have encountered a good many case citations and, in West Publishing Company's Words and Phrases and Corpus Juris Secundum, Key Numbers.

All reported cases can be found in West's National Reporter System, a description of which follows.

NATIONAL REPORTER SYSTEM

West Publishing Company's National Reporter System reprints decisions of all of the highest state courts, many state appellate courts, the U.S. Supreme Court, U.S. Courts of Appeals and selected decisions of U.S. District Courts.

Decisions of the Federal Court System

Decisions of the United States Supreme Court are found in the Supreme Court Reporter (S.Ct.). A second major unofficial publication of United States Supreme Court decisions is United States Supreme Court Reports (Lawyer's Edition—L.Ed. and L.Ed.2d), which annotates leading cases. The official publication of Supreme Court decision is United States Reports (U.S.). Thus a complete (sometimes called parallel) citation for a United State Supreme Court decision will include both official and unofficial publications and appear as: New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 245, 84 S.Ct. 710, 11 L.Ed.2d 686 (1964). The first number in a citation refers to a volume number, the second to a page number.

Secondary unofficial publications of Supreme Court decisions are United States Law Week and the Commerce Clearing House (CCH) United States Supreme Court Bulletin, the first publications to print the full text of Supreme Court decisions, normally within a few days, and the newer Media Law Reporter. Begun in 1978, Landmark Briefs and Arguments of the Supreme Court of the United States: Constitutional Law (Kurland & Casper, eds.) presents oral arguments and written briefs of landmark Supreme Court cases going back to 1793. Publisher is University Publications of America, Inc., Frederick, Md.

Summaries of lawyers written briefs are found in L.Ed.2d. Complete briefs can sometimes be obtained from law libraries or from the law firms on either side of a case. Their addresses can be found in a legal directory called Martindale Hubbell. Most large law libraries maintain microforms of U.S. Supreme Court records and briefs.

Cases, of course, can be cited as persuasive authority. But it is important in reading cases to learn to distinguish between what a court rules and what it says in passing (dicta), for example, concurring and dissenting opinions. Dicta, of course, can influence future decisions.

The next task is to find aids that will lead quickly to all the cases in point. For this purpose we use Digests, Indexes, and Citators. A Digest is a case finder or an index to the law. One of the best known Digests is West's American Digest System which cumulates all reported state and federal cases in 10-year segments or decennials, the most recent being the Ninth Decennial Digest, Part I, 1976–1981, cumulating five years of cases. Current cases are found in the General Digest and organized around the Key Number System.

Key Numbers represent principles or points of law. Once having found one or more key numbers relating to your problem, you should be able to find all the relevant cases in the American Digest System. Digests have been prepared for individual states, such as the Minnesota Digest, groups of neighboring states or regional digest, such as the Pacific Digest, single courts, such as the United States Supreme Court Digest, or for a court system, such as West's Federal Practice Digest, 2nd, which covers decisions of all federal courts including the U. S. Supreme Court. Each digest has a Descriptive Word Index to help you get started. A Cumulative Table of Key Numbers in the General Digest Descriptive Word Index will tell you which volumes of the set have digest material relating to the Key Numbers you have.

Citators trace the life history of a case, a statute, or an administrative ruling. Has it been modified, reversed, affirmed, superseded, criticized, distinguished, explained, limited, overruled or questioned? What have attorneys-general and law review writers said about a case? Is it still good authority? Has a statute been amended, appealed, or declared unconstitutional? How has it been treated by courts and periodical commentators? There are Shepard's Citations for every state, each region of West's National Reporter System, for lower federal courts and the U.S. Supreme Court, for federal administrative agencies, for the Code of Federal Regulations for state and federal constitutions, the U.S. and various state codes, municipal ordinances, labor law, and for the law reviews. Now to statutes.

If you know approximately when a federal statute or an amendment to a statute was passed, it can often be located in U.S. Code, Congressional and Administrative News. From it one can construct the legislative histories of federal statutes and review congressional committee reports. United States Code Annotated (U.S.C.A.) and United States Code Service (U.S.C.S.) are the best places to go for federal law. Both are updated by pocket parts and intervening pamphlets. Annotations include summaries of court decisions interpreting the laws, text of the Constitution and their interpretation, opinions of attorneys-general, and, occasionally, citations to law reviews or other secondary sources. There are also indexed, annotated codes for most states. Each compilation has a multi-volume index.

United States Code Congressional and Administrative News publishes the full text of Public Laws enacted, together with a selected legislative history. Of notable interest for some research purposes are the positions of various interest groups in relation to a bill.

The United States Congressional Record provides an edited transcript of Congressional debates. It has a Daily Digest. See also, the Commerce Clearing House (CCH) Congressional Index which provides a summary and the status of each bill, along with much useful information. The Congressional Information Service monthly Index and CIS Annual Abstracts provide much of the raw material of the legislative process. Full text is available on microfiche.

Rules and regulations of the federal administrative agencies, organized by subject matter, are found in the Code of Federal Regulations supplemented by the daily Federal Register. The latter includes official notices of each rulemaking and other proceedings to be conducted by agencies such as the Federal Communications Commission (FCC). In the rulemaking process FCC dockets or files, unfortunately located in Washington, D.C., often contain primary evidence in support of one regulatory position or another.<sup>1</sup>

One of the many loose-leaf services necessary to the study of administrative law is Pike and Fischer Radio Regulation (R.R. and R.R.2d). This is the most comprehensive source of FCC decisions and regulations, and statutes and court decisions pertaining to broadcasting and cable television.<sup>2</sup> The key to using Pike and Fischer expeditiously is to begin with the volume titled Finding Aids, which includes a "Master Index" to the Federal Communications Act paragraph numbers by which all materials are ordered. The Current Service volumes—presently six of them—contain up-to-date versions of laws and regulations and any pending proposals for change. The four Digest volumes contain subject matter digests of FCC and court actions and decisions, while the Cases volumes (now in Vol. 53) contain full texts. Index paragraphs in Pike and Fischer are referenced to sections of the amended Federal Communications Act of 1934 and to the Code of Federal Regulations.

If you do not find what you want in the Federal Register, the official FCC Annual Reports, Broadcasting Yearbook, Television Factbook, or Pike and Fischer, call the FCC's public information officer and specify what you are looking for.

After you have a Pike and Fischer or official FCC Reports citation, you can use Shepard's United States Administrative Citations to find all subsequent citations to that FCC action. Broadcasting magazine will keep you posted on pending FCC actions. Trade Regulation Reporter (CCH) provides a like service for advertising communication and the work of the Federal Trade Commission (FTC). Advertising Age is the most useful counterpart trade publication. Broadcasting and Advertising Age are indexed in Business Periodicals Index and Broadcasting has published its own comprehensive indexes for the years 1972–1981. Editor & Publisher is the newspaper industry's leading trade journal.

There is a monthly U.S. Catalog of Government Publications and a State Checklist of Government Documents. The U.S. Catalog is a monthly compilation of all federal executive, legislative and administrative documents open to the public. It has cumulative annual indexes and some cumulative multi-year indexes.

When primary research is completed, it is time to survey the Index to Legal Periodicals to see what others have written about your topic. Some advise beginning legal research with the Index in order to survey the boundaries of a topic. It is tempting, however, to rely too heavily on these secondary sources at too early a stage. There is also an Index to Foreign Legal Periodicals and a new (Jan. 1, 1980) more comprehensive Legal Resource Index on microfilm with paper edition counterpart, Current Law Index. LRI is much broader in coverage than the older Index to Legal Periodicals and includes the New York Times, Wall Street Journal, and Christian Science Monitor.

Books or textbooks on legal topics are called treatises and a library's holdings are indexed in its card catalogue. A Horn Book is a single volume summary of a field of law. A Nutshell is an even more drastic summary. There are a number of legal bibliographies, among them Harvard Law School Library and Current Publications in Legal and Related Fields.

The American Law Institute's Restatements of the Law are attempts to reorganize, simplify, and move case law toward comprehensible codes. Begin with the General Index to the Restatement of the Law.

The First Amendment Impact on Mass Communication: The Theory, the Practice, and the Problems

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE STUDY OF THE FIRST AMENDMENT

In 1791, the First Amendment to the United States Constitution was enacted:

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances.

The First Amendment wisely guarantees, but does not define, freedom of speech and press. It should be noted that the specific addressee of First Amendment protection is Congress. Nothing in the original Constitution which was ratified by the states imposed any limitations on state legislatures with regard to freedom of speech or press. Whether postrevolutionary America would follow the darker pages in colonial history and hold newspaper editors guilty of legislative contempt and whether the new state governors would follow the precedent set by the royal colonial governors and seek to have newspaper editors indicted for seditious libel were matters that the First Amendment was basically helpless to resolve. All such issues were governed by state rather than federal constitutions.

There the matter stood until 1925 when, in an otherwise insignificant case involving a now forgotten and ultimately repentant Communist, Benjamin Gitlow, the Supreme Court in Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652, 666 (1925), in a casual statement not necessary to the decision said:

For present purposes we may and do assume that freedom of speech and of the press—which are protected by the First Amendment from abridgment by Congress—are among the fundamental personal rights and “liberties” protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment from impairment by the states.

The textual justification in the Constitution for guaranteeing constitutional protection to freedom of speech and press under the federal constitution was achieved by interpretation of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment enacted in 1868 by the Reconstruction Congress to assure legal equality to the recently emancipated slaves. The second sentence of Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment stated:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. [Emphasis added.]

The consequence of saying that freedom of speech and of the press were protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment from infringement by the states was an important advance in securing liberty of the press. Although the state constitutions have provisions protecting freedom of expression, often their language offers more comfort to state regulation of the press than is the case with the more protective and encompassing language of the First Amendment. To be sure, it is possible to argue that since freedom of the press on the state level is based on the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment rather than on explicit language in the First Amendment, the latitude for state regulation of the press is greater than that allowed the federal government. This two-tiered First Amendment theory was advanced by Justice John Marshall Harlan in a special concurring opinion he wrote in Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957), the case in which the Court held that obscenity was not constitutionally protected speech.

The use of the Fourteenth Amendment to make constitutional limitations such as the guarantee of free speech and press binding on the states as well as the federal government has given that amendment an enormous role in the development of constitutional liberty in the United States. The extension of the constitutional guarantee of freedom of speech and press to the states has been of great significance. For a view that state constitutions themselves gave early nurture to freedom of speech, press and greatly influenced the federal courts, see Blanchard, "Filling in the Void: Speech and Press in State Courts Prior to Gitlow," in Chamberlin and Brown (eds.), The First Amendment Reconsidered (1982).

The First Amendment has rarely been used to invalidate federal legislation on the ground that the legislation is impermis-sibly restrictive of freedom of speech and press. Indeed when the most dangerous federal legislation limiting freedom of expression ever to come before the Supreme Court in peacetime, the anti-Communist Smith Act case, Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951) was reviewed, the Court held the challenged law valid, even though it undoubtedly restricted First Amendment values in the interest of governmental self-preservation.

But as the cases and comment on free speech and freedom of the press in this chapter illustrate, numerous state statutes have been declared invalid as violative of the First Amendment since that Amendment is now binding on the states through the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The determination on the part of the Framers of the American Constitution to assure protection for freedom of speech and press did not arise in a vacuum. English and American history prior to the American Revolution had persuaded the drafters of the First Amendment of the need for such assurance. Basic to an understanding of the First Amendment, both in terms of its origins and development, is John Milton's great essay in defense of a free press, The Areopagitica.

John Milton (1608–1674) was one of the great English poets. A republican in a monarchical age, the power of Milton's language and thought in his Areopagitica has made the essay a formidable obstacle to licensing and restraint of the press through the centuries. The Areopagitica was written as a protest to government licensing and censorship of the press; although Milton later was himself to serve as a censor for Oliver Cromwell.

In the middle of the seventeenth century, the Parliament of England passed a law licensing the press. The Order of the Lords and Commons, June 14, 1643, forbade the publication of any book, pamphlet, or paper which was published or imported without registration by the Stationers' Company. The Stationers' Company, formed in 1557, has been described as follows:

The exclusive privilege of printing and publishing in the English dominions was given to 97 London stationers and their successors by regular apprenticeship. All printing was thus centralised in London under the immediate inspection of the Government. No one could legally print, without special license, who did not belong to the Stationers' Company. The Company had power to search for and to seize publications which infringed their privilege. Jebb, ed., Introduction, Milton, Areopagitica, xxiii, (Cambridge University, 1918).

Later the licensing authority was divided between various royal and ecclesiastical authorities. The 1643 law, against which Milton directed his famous 1644 pamphlet in defense of freedom of the press, authorized official searches for unlicensed presses and prohibited the publication of anything unlicensed. The 1643 statute was designed to prevent the "defamation of Religion and Government." In Milton's view, truth in both the spheres of religion and government was more likely to emerge from free discussion than from repression. What follows is the most famous and widely quoted passage from The Areopagitica:

And though all the winds of doctrine were let loose to play upon the earth, so Truth be in the field, we do injuriously by licensing and prohibiting to misdoubt her strength. Let her and Falsehood grapple; who ever knew truth put to the worse, in a free and open encounter? Jebb, supra, p. 58.

This passage marked the beginnings of what has become an underlying theme of First Amendment theory. This is the marketplace of ideas theory which was given fresh life by Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes in a famous dissent after World War I in Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616 (1919). In this view, truth is best secured in the open marketplace of ideas. Therefore any government restraint which tends to distort or chill the free play of ideas and, thus, the quest for truth should not be permitted. The challenge that the idea of liberty of expression makes to the infirmity of the human condition should not be underestimated. Also we should remember that even Milton was not an absolutist with regard to freedom of expression. He did not believe in religious freedom for Roman Catholics. But Milton's hostility to the licensing of the press by government and his evident passion for a higher plateau of freedom of expression has been a powerful influence in the development of freedom of the press in the United States. See Siebert, Freedom of the Press in England, 1476-1776 (1952).

The licensing system ended in England in 1695, but licensing continued in the American colonies several decades thereafter. Gradually, prosecution for criminal or seditious libel supplanted licensing as the instrument for governmental restraint of the press in America in the period prior to the advent of the American Revolution. The common law crime of seditious libel made criticism of government a matter for criminal prosecution. While such prosecutions were not frequent in colonial America, they did occur.

The most famous such prosecution involved a New York printer, John Peter Zenger, editor of the New York Weekly Journal. Zenger's paper was used by politicians as a relentless forum for criticism of the colonial governor of New York, William Cosby. Zenger was arrested in 1734 on a charge of publishing seditious libels and jailed for eight months before trial. In August 1735, a jury, ignoring a judge's instructions, determined that Zenger was not guilty. The case thus became the most celebrated victory for freedom of the press in the pre-Revolutionary period.

It was no mean achievement for Zenger's attorney, Andrew Hamilton, to win the case, since, under the common law of seditious libel, the truth of the utterance was irrelevant.

The judge rather than the jury had the responsibility of deciding whether the publication complained of constituted seditious libel. The role of the jury was simply to ascertain whether the defendant had published the offending article. These features of the law of seditious libel gave freedom of expression little breathing space; and in England in 1792 Fox's Libel Act finally altered the law of seditious libel to make truth a defense and to give the jury rather than the judge the power to determine whether the publication was or was not seditious libel. See Emerson, The System Of Freedom Of Expression 99 (1970).

Unfortunately, seditious libel had proponents in the newly independent United States.

Congress in 1798 at the behest of the Federalist Party enacted four acts directed against the subversive activities of foreigners in the United States. These became known as the Alien and Sedition Acts. The Federalist fear of radical sympathizers with France, French agents, and hostility toward Republican journalist critics of the Federalist administration led to the passage of the laws. These Acts were the Naturalization Act, the Act Concerning Aliens, the Act Respecting Enemies, and the Act for the Punishment of Crimes. The last mentioned, known as the Sedition Act, has been of great interest to First Amendment historians. Unlike the common law crime of seditious libel, the new law permitted truth as a defense, proof of malice was required, and the jury was permitted to pass on both questions of law and fact. Punishment was set by the statute. Specifically the Act provided that the publishing or printing of any false, scandalous, or malicious writings to bring the government, Congress, or the president into contempt or disrepute, excite popular hostility to them, incite resistance to the law of the United States, or encourage hostile signs against the United States was a misdemeanor. Republicans led by Jefferson and Madison held the law to be a violation of the First Amendment, and among those convicted of violating the law were some of the leading Republican journalists. The Republicans contended that the law was being interpreted to punish and silence Republican critics of the Federalist Administration.

Federalists defended the statute as necessary to the right of government to self-preservation. The question of the constitutionality of the Act was never brought before the Supreme Court, although constitutional historians contend that it would have been upheld by the justices who sat on the Court during John Adams's presidency.

For those who viewed the First Amendment as a rejection of the English law of seditious libel, the enactment of the Sedition Act was obviously unconstitutional. For those who viewed the First Amendment as not promising an absolute protection of speech, the passing of the Act so soon after the Revolution and ratification of the Constitution was proof that not all governmental restraint of expression was prohibited by the First Amendment.

The question of whether the Sedition Act could be consistent with the First Amendment was not directly resolved because the issue of its validity never came to the Court. The Sedition Act expired on March 3, 1801.

One noted American constitutional scholar, Leonard Levy, has argued that the First Amendment was designed to prohibit only prior restraint of the press (administrative censorship, such as licensing), not seditious libel. See Levy, The Legacy Of Suppression 247-248 (1960).

The question of the constitutional status of the Alien and Sedition Acts was finally put to rest in the famous case of New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), in which the Supreme Court narrowly contracted the scope of libel law. In Sullivan, Justice William Brennan, speaking for the Court, declared: "Although the Sedition Act was never tested in this Court, the attack upon its validity has carried the day in the court of history." 376 U.S. 254 at 276.

For one commentator, the New York Times v. Sullivan statement on seditious libel was a crucial step in the continuous reinterpretation the First Amendment receives from the Supreme Court. The distinguished First Amendment scholar Professor Harry Kalven considered the crime of seditious libel incompatible with freedom of expression:

The concept of seditious libel strikes at the very heart of democracy. Political freedom ends when government can use its powers and its courts to silence the critics. See Kalven, The New York Times Cases: A Note On 'The Central Meaning of the First Amendment', Supreme Court Review 191 at 205 (1964).

Professor Kalven believed the repudiation of seditious libel had furnished a new key to understanding the meaning of First Amendment protection:

The Court did not simply, in the face of an awkward history, definitively put to rest the status of the Sedition Act. More important, it found in the controversy over seditious libel the clue "to the central meaning of the First Amendment." The choice of language was unusually apt.

The central meaning of the Amendment is that seditious libel cannot be made the subject of government sanction. * * * It is now not only the citizen's privilege to criticize his government, it is his duty. At this point in its rhetoric and sweep, the opinion almost literally incorporated the citizen as ruler, Alexander Meiklejohn's thesis that in a democracy the citizen as ruler is our most important public official. Kalven, supra, pp. 208-209.

In New York Times v. Sullivan, the Court cited John Stuart Mill as well as Milton for its view that even a false statement, so long as it is not calculated falsehood, merits First Amendment protection when the communication at issue involves criticism of elected government officials. The Court's citation to the work of John Stuart Mill is not surprising. Mill, along with Milton, has been one of the vital influences in First Amendment thought.

One of the great influences on modern First Amendment law was this English political philosopher and economist who lived long after the enactment of the First Amendment. John Stuart Mill (1806-1873), wrote widely on philosophy and economics, but it has been justly said that his essay, On Liberty Of Thought And Discussion (1859) was his "most lasting contribution to political thought." For Mill, "freedom of thought and investigation, freedom of discussion, and the freedom of self-controlled moral judgment were goods in their own right."

Actually, it is not surprising that Mill, like Milton, should be cited frequently in the vast literature that has arisen interpreting the meaning of freedom of speech and press, much of it in the form of the decisions of the justices of the United States Supreme Court. Modern First Amendment law did not get any extended or serious attention from the Supreme Court until cases involving a clash between governmental censorship and freedom of expression came about in the period after American involvement in World War I.

Constitutional scholars have more or less agreed with Professor Zechariah Chafee's observation that the Framers of the Constitution had no very clear idea of what they intended the guarantee of freedom of speech and press to mean. Chafee, Free Speech in the United States (1954). For thoughtful justices, like Justice Holmes, it became important to try to develop a rationale for constitutional protection of freedom of speech and press. In cases like Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616, (1919), Justice Holmes used the marketplace of ideas metaphor to give theoretical underpinning to the First Amendment. The similarity between the Holmesian marketplace of ideas concept of freedom of expression and Mill's rationale for liberty of thought and discussion is striking. It should be noted also that even when justices serving after Holmes returned to the marketplace of ideas theory, words used to describe the theory are very close to the language used by Mill.

Thus, Justice William O. Douglas wrote, dissenting in the Supreme Court decision validating the anti-Communist prosecutions of the fifties, Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 at 584 (1951):

When ideas compete in the market for acceptance, full and free discussion expiates the false and they gain few adherents. Full and free discussion even of ideas we hate encourages the testing of our own prejudices and preconceptions. Full and free discussion keeps a society from becoming stagnant and unprepared for the stresses and strains that work to tear all civilizations apart.

Mill had defended freedom of expression for very similar reasons nearly a century before in On Liberty Of Thought And Discussion:

But the peculiar evil of silencing the expression of an opinion is, that it is robbing the human race; posterity as well as the existing generation; those who dissent from the opinion, still more than those who hold it. If the opinion is right, they are deprived of the opportunity of exchanging error for truth; if wrong, they lose, what is almost as great a benefit, the clearer perception and livelier impression of truth, produced by its collision with error. See Lindsay, ed., Mill, Utilitarianism, Liberty and Representative Government 104 (1951).

The marketplace of ideas theory of freedom of speech, with its traditional aversion to governmental intervention, has been crucially and controversially altered in the case of the electronic media. See text, Chapter IX. But even in that area of First Amendment concern, the continuing impact and resiliency of Mill's thought is demonstrated by the Supreme Court's citation of Mill in 1969 when the Court sustained the FCC's fairness doctrine and personal attack rules against a claim of invalidity under the First Amendment. Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969). In Red Lion, Mill was cited by the Court in support of the governmental regulatory doctrines as follows:

The expression of views opposing those which broadcasters permit to be aired in the first place need not be confined solely to the broadcasters themselves as proxies. "Nor is it enough that he should hear the arguments of his own adversaries from his own teachers, presented as they state them, and accompanied by what they offer as refutations. That is not the way to do justice to the arguments, or bring them into real contact with his own mind. He must be able to hear them from persons who actually believe them; who defend them in earnest, and do their very utmost for them." J. S. Mill, On Liberty 32 (R. McCallum ed. 1947).

For some the citation of Mill to support any kind of governmental interference with the press will seem heretical. For others, it will be seen as entirely consistent with Mill's passion for liberty of discussion and hostility to censorship, whether that censorship is public or private.

Despite the emphasis which the foregoing discussion has given the principle of unfettered free discussion as advocated by thinkers such as Mill and Milton, it should not be thought there is any unanimity with regard to the principle of free discussion as an ultimate value.

Thus, the New Left political philosopher, Herbert Marcuse, believed Mill's writings assumed that rational beings participate in free discussion, while in reality most of contemporary humanity are not rational but are manipulated beings, manipulated by media for commercial purposes and by government for political ones. Thus, the glorious concept of tolerance for all ideas, advocated by Milton and Mill, is for Marcuse a repressive tolerance. Marcuse was hostile to the marketplace of ideas. He thought traditional tools for elaborating the proper claims of freedom of expression against the claims of the state for curtailment of expression in the interest of security, such as the clear and present danger doctrine, were unusable. Marcuse wanted to substitute "precensorship" for "the more or less hidden censorship that permeates the free media." See Marcuse, Repressive Tolerance in Wolff, Moore, and Marcuse, a Critique of Pure Tolerance (1965).

For still others the wisest course for the future would be to cleave to the following distillation of First Amendment experience as described by Justice Douglas:

What kind of First Amendment would best serve our needs as we approach the 21st century may be an open question. But the old fashioned First Amendment that we have is the Court's only guideline; and one hard and fast principle has served us through days of calm and eras of strife and I would abide by it until a new First Amendment is adopted. That means, as I view it, that TV and radio, as well as the more conventional methods for disseminating news, are all included in the concept of "press" as used in the First Amendment and therefore are entitled to live under the laissez faire regime which the First Amendment sanctions. Columbia Broadcasting System v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. 94 (1973).

The Supreme Court like most of the American bar, as the subsequent cases in this chapter will illustrate, has engaged in a long-standing practice of making interchangeable use of free speech cases in freedom of the press cases and vice versa.

Although the interchangeable use of the freedom of speech and freedom of the press clauses may have characterized constitutional adjudication in the past, new attention has now been directed to the question of whether the free speech and free press clauses have distinct missions. In 1975, Justice Potter Stewart gave a lecture at Yale Law School in what can now be seen in retrospect as a most significant launching of a new conception of the free press clause. Justice Stewart declared that alone among constitutional guarantees "the Free Press Clause extends protection to an institution." Justice Stewart observed: "The publishing business is, in short, the only organized private business that is given explicit constitutional protection." See Stewart, "Or of the Press," 26 Hastings L.J. 631, 633-34 (1975).

In the Stewart thesis, the freedom of the press clause is designed to protect the press qua press. In a sense, it is the antithesis of Justice Felix Frankfurter's conception of freedom of the press as reflected in his concurring opinion in Pennkamp v. Florida, 328 U.S. 331 (1946): "Freedom of the press, however, is not an end in itself but a means to the end of a free society." In the Stewart thesis, direct protection of the press is the function of the press clause. Justice Stewart interprets the freedom of the press clause as follows: "[The] primary purpose of the constitutional guarantee of a free press was * * * to create a fourth institution outside the Government as an additional check on the three official branches." Reactions to the ramifications of the Stewart conception of the press clause permeate recent First Amendment litigation. In the editorial privilege amendment to the New York Times v. Sullivan rule fashioned by the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in Herbert v. Lando, 568 F.2d 974 (2d Cir. 1977), reversed 441 U.S. 153 (1979), text, p. 289, Justice Stewart's idea that the press clause has a distinctive protective mission played a large role. The contention in Lando that the free press clause extends special First Amendment protection to editorial decision making to the point that journalists and editors may be deemed excused from some of the customary demands of civil discovery was rejected in the decision by six of the nine justices who passed on the issue.

The issue of whether the free press clause gave a special status to the press arose again to some extent in the so-called corporate speech case, First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765 (1978). In that case, the Supreme Court held that Massachusetts could not limit free speech because of the corporate identity of the speaker by attempting through a statutory prohibition against corporate efforts to influence voting in a state referendum on matters of public importance not affecting the property, business, or assets of the corporation. In what was possibly an oblique slap at the thesis that the press clause accords the press a special First Amendment status, Justice Lewis Powell observed for the Court that the inherent value of speech is not affected by the status of the speaker. Although the Court conceded that recent press cases had accorded the press a special "and constitutionally recognized role," Powell nevertheless observed: "But the press does not have a monopoly on either the First Amendment or the ability to enlighten." Chief Justice Warren Burger, in a concurring opinion in the corporate speech case, declared that the Supreme Court had not definitively decided the question of whether the press clause has a separate function distinct from that of the speech clause. However, the Chief Justice appeared to enter the lists against a view of the press clause of First Amendment protection which would accord the press a uniquely privileged status: "In short, the First Amendment does not 'belong' to any definable category of persons or entities: it belongs to all who exercise its freedoms."

What the student of the law of mass communications must recognize at the outset, however, is that the constitutional protection given to freedom of speech and press covers the whole spectrum of the means of communication. The First Amendment has been extended from its specific eighteenth-century addressees mentioned in the constitution itself—free speech and free press—to new media of communication undreamed of in the eighteenth century, such as the sound truck, radio, television, and the movies. Occasionally, the Supreme Court has tried to deal with each medium in terms of its own problems. For example Justice Tom Clark in Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495 (1952), observed that "To hold that liberty of expression by means of motion pictures is guaranteed by the First and Fourteenth Amendments, however, is not the end of our problem. * * * Each method [of expression] tends to present its own peculiar problems." 343 U.S. 495 at 502-503 (1952). Justice Robert Jackson in Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77 (1949), urged that each medium be considered a law unto itself. Justice Hugo Black rejected this kind of "favoritism." Justice Brennan has urged an approach which would recognize that there are two distinct First Amendment models—the "structural" model and the "speech" model—which do not and need not receive the same degree of protection. See text, p. 149.

On the whole, the Supreme Court and lesser courts in the American judicial system have approached problems of free speech and press rather broadly in terms of the conflicting social values working for and against a governmental restraint on a means of communication in a particular case.

Some commentators have tried to impose order on the Supreme Court's work in the First Amendment area. Professor Laurence Tribe identified two categories for First Amendment claims: "Track one" involves "government regulation" which is "aimed at the communication impact of an act." Regulations which fall into "track one" are unconstitutional unless government can meet the demands of doctrines to which the fact patterns of a case may be relevant, such as the clear and present danger doctrine or the public law of libel.

"Track two" is designed to cope with regulation which "is aimed at the noncommunicative impact of an act." Regulations which are exercised under "track two" will be valid even when applied "to expressive conduct so long as it does not unduly constrict the flow of information and ideas." Under "track two," a "balance" is struck "between the values of freedom of expression and the government's regulatory interests * * * on a case by case basis." See Tribe, American Constitutional Law, 582 (1978).

In this First Amendment chapter, as well as in other chapters, one confronts a continuous philosophical debate on the meaning of freedom of speech and press. Through concepts like "clear and present danger," "balancing," "symbolic speech," and "freedom from prior restraint," one begins to learn the constitutional law vocabulary of freedom of speech and press. Sometimes these doctrines disguise the sources of decision rather than illuminate them. It is also true that sometimes a Supreme Court decision owes more to the death or retirement of an old justice and the appointment of a new one than it does to the demands of any particular doctrine.

Nevertheless, the free speech and press doctrines collected in this chapter, in all their variety and contradiction, do reflect the considerable travail of Supreme Court justices in trying to discern the meaning of the First Amendment.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE LAW OF FREEDOM OF SPEECH AND PRESS IN THE SUPREME COURT

The Rise of the Clear and Present Danger Doctrine

The First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution must be the necessary starting point for any discussion of the extent and content of legal control of the press. The language of the amendment which has spawned innumerable cases, laws, books, and articles is remarkably stark, direct, and concise. See text, p. 1.

The words which attract our attention are the phrases "freedom of speech, or of the press." Because of the dynamic way in which this constitutional language has been interpreted by the courts, particularly the United States Supreme Court, the press has been held to mean all media of mass communication and not just newspapers. Whether this means that the First Amendment must be applied to all the media in exactly the same way is a question which will particularly concern us in the materials on legal control of broadcasting. But the basic point is that in American law the means of communication enjoy a protected status. The assumptions on which such protection is based and a critical examination of their functional validity is our first task if we are to understand the fundamental role played in the American communications process by the political, legal, and communications theories that have been spun around the First Amendment.

The American law of freedom of speech and press, as enunciated by the opinions of the United States Supreme Court, is in the main a post-World War I phenomenon. The introduction of conscription in the United States in World War I for the first time since the Civil War, the opposition of radical groups to participation in that struggle, and the anti-radical "red scare" of the early nineteen twenties combined to produce a collision between authority and libertarian values. That collision provoked the first significant efforts to develop some guidelines for the problem of reconciling majoritarian impatience, as expressed in an assortment of repressive laws, with constitutional guarantees. The purpose, of course, of a constitution is in a sense to confound a legislative majority. What a constitution does is to remove certain matters from the reach of legislation.

The following case arose out of socialist hostility to the draft and to American participation in World War I. The clash of a federal antiespionage statute with the political protest of the socialists provided a vehicle for an opinion by Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes.

Holmes became one of the principal architects of American free speech and free press theory. In Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919), Holmes launched a famous doctrine, the clear and present danger doctrine. As you read the opinion, ask yourself what function Holmes expected his clear and present danger doctrine to serve?

SCHENCK v. UNITED STATES

Justice HOLMES delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is an indictment in three counts. The first charges a conspiracy to violate the espionage act of June 15, 1917, by causing and attempting to cause insubordination, &c., in the military and naval forces of the United States, and to obstruct the recruiting and enlistment service of the United States, when the United States was at war with the German Empire, to-wit, that the defendant wilfully conspired to have printed and circulated to men who had been called and accepted for military service under the Act of May 18, 1917, a document set forth and alleged to be calculated to cause such insubordination and obstruction. The count alleges overt acts in pursuance of the conspiracy, ending in the distribution of the document set forth. The second count alleges a conspiracy to commit an offense against the United States, to-wit, to use the mails for the transmission of matter declared to be non-mailable by title 12, § 2, of the act of June 15, 1917, to-wit the above mentioned document, with an averment of the same overt acts. The third count charges an unlawful use of the mails for the transmission of the same matter and otherwise as above. The defendants were found guilty on all the counts. They set up the First Amendment to the Constitution forbidding Congress to make any law abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, and bringing the case here on that ground have argued some other points also of which we must dispose.

It is argued that the evidence, if admissible, was not sufficient to prove that the defendant Schenck was concerned in sending the documents. According to the testimony Schenck said he was general secretary of the Socialist party and had charge of the Socialist headquarters from which the documents were sent. He identified a book found there as the minutes of the Executive committee of the party. The book showed a resolution of August 13, 1917, that 15,000 leaflets should be printed on the other side of one of them in use, to be mailed to men who had passed exemption boards, and for distribution. Schenck personally attended to the printing. On August 20 the general secretary's report said "Obtained new leaflets from printer and started work addressing envelopes" &c.; and there was a resolve that Comrade Schenck be allowed $125 for sending leaflets through the mail. He said that he had about fifteen or sixteen thousand printed. There were files of the circular in question in the inner office which he said were printed on the other side of the one sided circular and were there for distribution. Other copies were proved to have been sent through the mails to drafted men. Without going into confirmatory details that were proved, no reasonable man could doubt that the defendant Schenck was largely instrumental in sending the circulars about. * * *

* * *

The document in question upon its first printed side recited the first section of the Thirteenth Amendment, said that the idea embodied in it was violated by the conscription act and that a conscript is little better than a convict. In impassioned language it intimated that conscription was despotism in its worst form and a monstrous wrong against humanity in the interest of Wall Street's chosen few. It said, "Do not submit to intimidation," but in form at least confined itself to peaceful measures such as a petition for the repeal of the act. The other and later printed side of the sheet was headed "Assert Your Rights." It stated reasons for alleging that any one violated the Constitution when he refused to recognize "your right to assert your opposition to the draft," and went on, "If you do not assert and support your rights, you are helping to deny or disparage rights which it is the solemn duty of all citizens and residents of the United States to retain." It described the arguments on the other side as coming from cunning politicians and a mercenary capitalist press, and even silent consent to the conscription law as helping to support an infamous conspiracy. It denied the power to send our citizens away to foreign shores to shoot up the people of other lands, and added that words could not express the condemnation such cold-blooded ruthlessness deserves, &c., &c., winding up, "You must do your share to maintain, support and uphold the rights of the people of this country." Of course the document would not have been sent unless it had been intended to have some effect, and we do not see what effect it could be expected to have upon persons subject to the draft except to influence them to obstruct the carrying of it out. The defendants do not deny that the jury might find against them on this point.

But it is said, suppose that that was the tendency of this circular, it is protected by the First Amendment to the Constitution. Two of the strongest expressions are said to be quoted respectively from well-known public men. It well may be that the prohibition of laws abridging the freedom of speech is not confined to previous restraints, although to prevent them may have been the main purpose, as intimated in Patterson v. Colorado, 205 U.S. 454, 462. We admit that in many places and in ordinary times the defendants in saying all that was said in the circular would have been within their constitutional rights. But the character of every act depends upon the circumstances in which it is done. The most stringent protection of free speech would not protect a man in falsely shouting fire in a theatre and causing a panic. It does not even protect a man from an injunction against uttering words that may have all the effect of force. The question in every case is whether the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent. [Emphasis added.] It is a question of proximity and degree. When a nation is at war many things that might be said in time of peace are such a hindrance to its effort that their utterance will not be endured so long as men fight and that no Court could regard them as protected by any constitutional right. It seems to be admitted that if an actual obstruction of the recruiting service were proved, liability for words that produced that effect might be enforced. The statute of 1917 * * * punishes conspiracies to obstruct as well as actual obstruction. If the act, (speaking, or circulating a paper,) its tendency and the intent with which it is done are the same, we perceive no ground for saying that success alone warrants making the act a crime. * * *

Judgments affirmed.

COMMENT

1. The most striking observation about the American law of freedom of speech and press is that the abridgment of these freedoms by Congress is not quite as unrestricted as a literal reading of the First Amendment might lead one to suppose. The Schenck case is an illustration of Congressional power over political freedom. After all, Schenck was convicted for disseminating a pamphlet urging resistance to the draft and the Supreme Court, in an opinion by one of its most libertarian judges, affirmed. In a companion case to Schenck, Justice Holmes remarked that "the First Amendment while prohibiting legislation against free speech as such cannot have been, and obviously was not, intended to give immunity for every possible use of language." Frohwerk v. United States, 249 U.S. 204 at 206 (1919). Justice Holmes made a similar observation in Schenck when he said that "free speech would not protect a man in falsely shouting fire in a theatre and causing a panic." In other words, there is no absolute freedom of expression, but rather the scope of protection for such freedom is a question of degree. Holmes authored the clear and present danger doctrine as a guide to indicate the boundaries of protection and non-protection. Under the rubric of the clear and present danger doctrine, political expression can be punished if circumstances exist to "create a clear and present danger" that the communication in controversy would "bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent."

2. Does Holmes indicate in Schenck whether the determination of circumstances which would present a "clear and present" danger is a legislative or a judicial responsibility?

3. Since the pamphlet issued by a minor group of socialists was found sufficiently objectionable to place its distributors in jail, should we conclude that the clear and present danger doctrine operates to give relatively little protection to unpopular communications? Or is there a special feature of the Schenck case which makes its holding of somewhat limited application?

ABRAMS v. UNITED STATES

[EDITORIAL NOTE

Abrams and others were accused of publishing and disseminating pamphlets attacking the American expeditionary force sent to Russia by President Woodrow Wilson to defeat the Bolsheviks. The pamphlets also called for a general strike of munitions workers. The majority of the Supreme Court, per Justice John Clarke, held that the publishing and distribution of the pamphlets during the war were not protected expression within the meaning of the First Amendment. Justice Clarke's opinion for the majority failed to make much impact on the law. But the dissent of Justice Holmes, in which he was joined by Justice Louis Brandeis, became one of the significant documents in the literature of the law of free expression.]

Justice HOLMES, dissenting.

This indictment is founded wholly upon the publication of two leaflets. * * * The first count charges a conspiracy pending the war with Germany to publish abusive language about the form of government of the United States, laying the preparation and publishing of the first leaflet as overt acts. The second count charges a conspiracy pending the war to publish language intended to bring the form of government into contempt, laying the preparation and publishing of the two leaflets as overt acts. The third count alleges a conspiracy to encourage resistance to the United States in the same war and to attempt to effectuate the purpose by publishing the same leaflets. The fourth count lays a conspiracy to incite curtailment of production of things necessary to the prosecution of the war and to attempt to accomplish it by publishing the second leaflet to which I have referred.

The first of these leaflets says that the President's cowardly silence about the intervention in Russia reveals the hypocrisy of the plutocratic gang in Washington. * *

The other leaflet, headed "Workers—Wake Up," with abusive language says that America together with the Allies will march for Russia to help the Czecko-Slovaks [sic] in their struggle against the Bolsheviks, and that this time the hypocrites shall not fool the Russian emigrants and friends of Russia in America. It tells the Russian emigrants that they now must spit in the face of the false military propaganda by which their sympathy and help to the prosecution of the war have been called forth and says that with the money they have lent or are going to lend "they will make bullets not only for the Germans but also for the Workers Soviets of Russia," and further, "Workers in the ammunition factories, you are producing bullets, bayonets, cannon to murder not only the Germans, but also your dearest, best, who are in Russia fighting for freedom." It then appeals to the same Russian emigrants at some length not to consent to the "inquisitionary expedition in Russia," and says that the destruction of the Russian revolution is "the politics of the march on Russia." The leaflet winds up by saying "Workers, our reply to this barbaric intervention has to be a general strike!" and after a few words on the spirit of revolution, exhortations not to be afraid, and some usual tall talk ends "Woe unto those who will be in the way of progress. Let solidarity live! The Rebels."

No argument seems to be necessary to show that these pronouncements in no way attack the form of government of the United States, or that they do not support either of the first two counts. What little I have to say about the third count may be postponed until I have considered the fourth. With regard to that it seems too plain to be denied that the suggestion to workers in the ammunition factories that they are producing bullets to murder their dearest, and the further advocacy of a general strike, both in the second leaflet, do urge curtailment of production of things necessary to the prosecution of the war within the meaning of the act of May 16, 1918, amending section 3 of the earlier act of 1917. But to make the conduct criminal that statute requires that it should be "within intent by such curtailment to cripple or hinder the United States in the prosecution of the war." It seems to me that no such intent is proved.

I never have seen any reason to doubt that the questions of law that alone were before this Court in the cases of Schenck, Frohwerk and Debs were rightly decided. I do not doubt for a moment that by the same reasoning that would justify punishing persuasion to murder, the United States constitutionally may punish speech that produces or is intended to produce a clear and imminent danger that it will bring about forthwith certain substantive evils that the United States constitutionally may seek to prevent. The power undoubtedly is greater in time of war than in time of peace because war opens dangers that do not exist at other times.

But as against dangers peculiar to war, as against others, the principle of the right to free speech is always the same. It is only the present danger of immediate evil or an intent to bring it about that warrants Congress in setting a limit to the expression of opinion where private rights are not concerned. [Emphasis added.] Congress certainly cannot forbid all effort to change the mind of the country. Now nobody can suppose that the surreptitious publishing of a silly leaflet by an unknown man, without more, would present any immediate danger that its opinions would hinder the success of the government arms or have any appreciable tendency to do so.

In this case sentences of twenty years imprisonment have been imposed for the publishing of two leaflets that I believe the defendants had as much right to publish as the Government has to publish the Constitution of the United States now vainly invoked by them. Even if I am technically wrong and enough can be squeezed from these poor and puny anonymities to turn the color of legal litmus paper; I will add, even if what I think the necessary intent were shown; the most nominal punishment seems to me all that possibly could be inflicted, unless the defendants are to be made to suffer not for what the indictment alleges but for the creed that they avow—a creed that I believe to be the creed of ignorance and immaturity when honestly held, as I see no reason to doubt that it was held here but which, although made the subject of examination at the trial, no one has a right even to consider in dealing with the charges before the Court.

Persecution for the expression of opinions seems to me perfectly logical. If you have no doubt of your premises or your power and want a certain result with all your heart you naturally express your wishes in law and sweep away all opposition. To allow opposition by speech seems to indicate that you think the speech impotent, as when a man says that he has squared the circle, or that you do not care whole heartedly for the result, or that you doubt either your power or your premises. But when men have realized that time has upset many fighting faiths, they may come to believe even more than they believe the very foundations of their own conduct that the ultimate good desired is better reached by free trade in ideas—that the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market, and that truth is the only ground upon which their wishes safely can be carried out. That at any rate is the theory of our Constitution. It is an experiment, as all life is an experiment. Every year if not every day we have to wager our salvation upon some prophecy based upon imperfect knowledge. While that experiment is part of our system I think that we should be eternally vigilant against attempts to check the expression of opinions that we loathe and believe to be fraught with death, unless they so imminently threaten immediate interference with the lawful and pressing purposes of the law that an immediate check is required to save the country. I wholly disagree with the argument of the Government that the First Amendment left the common law as to seditious libel in force. History seems to me against the notion. I had conceived that the United States through many years had shown its repentance for the Sedition Act of 1798 (act July 14, 1798, c. 73, 1 Stat. 596), by repaying fines that it imposed. Only the emergency that makes it immediately dangerous to leave the correction of evil counsels to time warrants making any exception to the sweeping command, "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech." Of course I am speaking only of expressions of opinion and exhortations, which were all that were uttered here, but I regret that I cannot put into more impressive words my belief that in their conviction upon this indictment the defendants were deprived of their rights under the Constitution of the United States.

The Marketplace of Ideas Theory

1. The reader should note that Holmes's theory of freedom of expression is basically a laissez-faire idea. The clash of political ideas is in this view a self-correcting and self-sustaining process. Under the marketplace of ideas theory the responsibility of government is neither to suppress nor to influence the process. This approach is reconciled with the clear and present danger test on the assumption that in a less than ideal world the application of the clear and present danger test permits only a minimum of governmental intervention into the opinion-making process. Holmes's Abrams dissent is a classic statement of the "marketplace of ideas" approach to First Amendment theory. In view of the rise of the electronic media, the information explosion, and the concentration of ownership in the mass media, what difficulties are presented in trying to make contemporary applications of statements such as "the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market?" The "market" Holmes is talking about is basically what we call today the mass media and their mass audiences. Is "free trade in ideas" the distinguishing characteristic of these media? If it is not, what deficiencies do you see in the "marketplace of ideas" theory?

2. For a view that a First Amendment model which posits a self-correcting marketplace of ideas is a romantic and unrealistic description of the opinion process in late twentieth-century America, see Barron, Access to the Press—A New First Amendment Right, 80 Harv.L.Rev. 1641 (1967).

There is inequality in the power to communicate ideas just as there is inequality in economic bargaining power; to recognize the latter and deny the former is quixotic. The "marketplace of ideas" has rested on the assumption that protecting the right of expression is equivalent to providing for it. But changes in the communications industry have destroyed the equilibrium in that marketplace. * * * A realistic view of the first amendment requires recognition that a right of expression is somewhat thin if it can be exercised only at the sufferance of the managers of mass communications.

In classic marketplace of ideas theory the role of government is nonintervention. The marketplace of ideas functions on a basis similar to the Darwinian theory of evolution. The assumption is that the best ideas will emerge, after combat, triumphant. But the unstated assumption from the quotation from Professor Barron is that if the marketplace of ideas is to be something more than a metaphor, some government intervention is required. See Red Lion v. FCC, text, p. 845.

3. Herbert Marcuse submitted the traditional marketplace of ideas concept of freedom of expression to the following Marxist critique:

The tolerance which was the great achievement of the liberal era is still professed and (with strong qualifications) practiced, while the economic and political process is subjected to an ubiquitous and effective administration in accordance with predominant interests. The result is an objective contradiction between the economic and political structure on the one side, and the theory and practice of toleration on the other. See Marcuse, Repressive Tolerance in Wolff, Moore, and Marcuse, A Critique Of Pure Tolerance 110 (1965).

Marcuse's evident wish to have an intellectual elite direct the media for predetermined social ends will not seem to many an improvement over the present situation. Yet there is disquiet as to whether a marketplace of ideas theory is meaningful when the marketplace is increasingly characterized by concentration of ownership and similarity of viewpoint.

4. Professor Edwin Baker rejects both the classic marketplace of ideas theory and what he calls the market failure model of the First Amendment. Advocates of the latter theory seek governmental intervention in the opinion process in order to correct the actual deficiencies or imbalances which they perceive in the actual workings of the communications marketplace (marketplace of ideas). Professor Baker argues: "If provision of adequate access is the goal, the lack of criteria for 'adequacy' undermines the legitimacy of government regulation. For the government to determine what access is adequate involves the government implicitly judging what is the correct resolution of the marketplace debates." See Baker, Scope of the First Amendment Freedom of Speech, 25 U.C.L.A. L.Rev. 964 at 986 (1978).

Professor Baker calls for adoption of a liberty model as the appropriate First Amendment model: "On the liberty theory, the purpose of the first amendment is not to guarantee adequate information. * * Speech is protected because without disrespecting the autonomy of other persons, it promotes both the speaker's self-fulfillment and the speaker's ability to participate in change." The liberty model transcends the speech/action dichotomy and would protect "self-chosen, nonverbal conduct" from certain governmental prohibitions as well as speech. See Baker, supra, p. 1039.

5. Professor Thomas M. Scanlon, Jr., advocates a positive role for government in the effort to achieve freedom of expression. Professor Scanlon says there may be reasonable disagreement on how best to "refine the right" of freedom of expression. See Scanlon Freedom of Expression and Categories of Expression, 40 U. of Pittsburgh L.Rev. 519 (1979). What is this disagreement about?

But as new threats arise—from, for example, changes in the form of ownership of dominant means of communication—it may be unclear, and a matter subject to reasonable disagreement, how best to refine the right in order to provide the relevant kinds of protection at a tolerable cost. This disagreement is partly empirical—a disagreement about what is likely to happen if certain powers are or are not granted to governments. It is also in part a disagreement at the foundational level over the nature and importance of audience and participant interests and, especially, over what constitutes a sufficiently equal distribution of the means to their satisfaction. The main role of a philosophical theory of freedom of expression, in addition to clarifying what it is we are arguing about, is to attempt to resolve these foundational issues.

GITLOW v. PEOPLE OF STATE OF NEW YORK

[EDITORIAL NOTE

Benjamin Gitlow, a member of the left-wing section of the Socialist Party, the revolutionary segment of the party, was indicted for the publication of a radical "manifesto" under the criminal anarchy statute of New York. Sixteen thousand copies of THE REVOLUTIONARY AGE, the house organ of the revolutionary section of the party which published the Manifesto, were printed. Some were sold; some were mailed. The New York Criminal Anarchy statute forbade the publication or distribution of material advocating, advising, or "teaching the duty, necessity or propriety of overthrowing or overturning organized government by force or violence." The Manifesto had urged mass strikes by the proletariat and repudiated the policy of the moderate Socialists of "introducing Socialism by means of legislative measures on the basis of the bourgeois state." The New York trial court convicted Gitlow under the Criminal Anarchy statute, and the state appellate courts affirmed. The United States Supreme Court also affirmed. The Court utilized as the measure of constitutionality the question of whether there was a reasonable basis for the legislature to have enacted the statute.]

The Court said, per Justice SANFORD:

For present purposes we may and do assume that freedom of speech and of the press—which are protected by the First Amendment from abridgment by Congress—are among the fundamental personal rights and “liberties” protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment from impairment by the States. [Emphasis added.] We do not regard the incidental statement in Prudential Ins. Co. v. Cheek, 259 U.S. 530, 543, that the Fourteenth Amendment imposes no restrictions on the States concerning freedom of speech, as determinative of this question.

We cannot hold that the present statute is an arbitrary or unreasonable exercise of the police power of the State unwarrantably infringing the freedom of speech or press; and we must and do sustain its constitutionality.

This being so it may be applied to every utterance—not too trivial to be beneath the notice of the law—which is of such a character and used with such intent and purpose as to bring it within the prohibition of the statute. * * * In other words, when the legislative body has determined generally, in the constitutional exercise of its discretion, that utterances of a certain kind involve such danger of substantive evil that they may be punished, the question whether any specific utterance coming within the prohibited class is likely, in and of itself, to bring about the substantive evil, is not open to consideration. It is sufficient that the statute itself be constitutional and that the use of the language comes within its prohibition.

It is clear that the question in such cases is entirely different from that involved in those cases where the statute merely prohibits certain acts involving the danger of substantive evil, without any reference to language itself, and it is sought to apply its provisions to language used by the defendant for the purpose of bringing about the prohibited results. There, if it be contended that the statute cannot be applied to the language used by the defendant because of its protection by the freedom of speech or press, it must necessarily be found, as an original question, without any previous determination by the legislative body, whether the specific language used involved such likelihood of bringing about the substantive evil as to deprive it of the constitutional protection. In such case it has been held that the general provisions of the statute may be constitutionally applied to the specific utterance of the defendant if its natural tendency and probable effect was to bring about the substantive evil which the legislative body might prevent. Schenck v. United States [249 U.S. 47]; Debs v. United States [249 U.S. 211]. And the general statement in the Schenck Case, [249 U.S. 47] that the “question in every case is whether the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils,”—upon which great reliance is placed in the defendant’s argument—was manifestly intended, as shown by the context, to apply only in cases of this class, and has no application to those like the present, where the legislative body itself has previously determined the danger of substantive evil arising from utterances of a specified character.

And finding, for the reasons stated that the statute is not in itself unconstitutional, and that it has not been applied in the present case in derogation of any constitutional right, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is affirmed.

Justice HOLMES (dissenting).

Justice Brandeis and I are of opinion that this judgment should be reversed. The general principle of free speech, it seems to me, must be taken to be included in the Fourteenth Amendment, in view of the scope that has been given to the word "liberty" as there used, although perhaps it may be accepted with a somewhat larger latitude of interpretation than is allowed to Congress by the sweeping language that governs or ought to govern the laws of the United States. If I am right then I think that the criterion sanctioned by the full Court in Schenck v. United States, applies:

"The question in every case is whether the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that [the State] has a right to prevent."

It is true that in my opinion this criterion was departed from in Abrams v. United States, but the convictions that I expressed in that case are too deep for it to be possible for me as yet to believe that it * * * has settled the law. If what I think the correct test is applied it is manifest that there was no present danger of an attempt to overthrow the government by force on the part of the admittedly small minority who shared the defendant's views. It is said that this manifesto was more than a theory, that it was an incitement. Every idea is an incitement. It offers itself for belief and if believed it is acted on unless some other belief outweighs it or some failure of energy stifles the movement at its birth. The only difference between the expression of an opinion and an incitement in the narrower sense is the speaker's enthusiasm for the result. Eloquence may set fire to reason. But whatever may be thought of the redundant discourse before us it had no chance of starting a present conflagration. If in the long run the beliefs expressed in a proletarian dictatorship are destined to be accepted by the dominant forces of the community, the only meaning of free speech is that they should be given their chance and have their way.

If the publication of this document had been laid as an attempt to induce an uprising against government at once and not at some indefinite time in the future it would have presented a different question. The object would have been one with which the law might deal, subject to the doubt whether there was any danger that the publication could produce any result, or in other words, whether it was not futile and too remote from possible consequences. But the indictment alleges the publication and nothing more. * * *

COMMENT

The Court, it should be observed, refused to apply the clear and present danger doctrine to the facts of the Gitlow case. The opinion apparently distinguishes the use of the clear and present danger doctrine in cases like Schenck and Abrams as espionage act cases. The Court asserts that a test of "reasonableness" of the legislative judgment will be used when the legislature itself has determined that certain utterances create a danger of a substantive evil. Such a circumstance, the Court says, differs from the situation in which the legislature has not specified certain utterances as forbidden. In the absence of such legislative specificity, the clear and present danger doctrine may be applied. Justice Brandeis's subsequent definition of the clear and present danger doctrine in his famous concurrence in Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927), infra, p. 22, stated a formulation of the clear and present danger doctrine which yields a far greater protection for freedom of expression than that afforded by Sanford's narrower view of the doctrine in Gitlow.

Under Justice Sanford's interpretation of clear and present danger, how could a legislature, determined to suppress a particular political heresy, effectively avoid application of the clear and present danger doctrine?

If the best measure of the constitutional tests of statutes alleged to offend freedom of expression is the latitude a test yields for freedom of expression, how does the "reasonableness" test compare to 1) the clear and present danger doctrine as understood by Sanford, and 2) as understood by Holmes in his dissent in Gitlow?

As Holmes discusses the clear and present danger doctrine in Gitlow, what would you say appears to be the heart of the doctrine as far as he is concerned?

The portions of the Gitlow opinion concerning appropriate tests for legislation affecting freedom of expression are at this point no longer authoritative. It is Brandeis's subsequent formulation of the clear and present danger doctrine rather than Sanford's which has prevailed. What has proved durable in the opinion were some dicta, or statements not actually necessary to the result reached by the Court, where Justice Sanford offhandedly extended the limitations on legislation curtailing freedom of expression binding on the federal government by reason of the First Amendment to the states by reason of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Previous dicta had indicated that the states were not bound by a federal constitutional guarantee of freedom of speech and press. Justice Sanford's statement to the contrary in Gitlow was, therefore, of great importance. As a constitutional matter it is not an exaggeration to say that freedom of speech and press in regard to the states is a judicial creation just sixty years old.

Were it not for his Gitlow dictum, Justice Sanford would be largely unremembered. However, the substance of his Gitlow opinion has found a champion. Professor Robert Bork argues that the opinion which should be praised in Gitlow is not the one authored by Justice Holmes, but the one authored by Justice Sanford. Why?

Professor (now Judge) Bork responds:

Speech advocating violent overthrow is * * * not "political speech." It is not political speech because it violates constitutional truths about processes and because it is not aimed at a new definition of political truth by a legislative majority. Violent overthrow of government breaks the premises of our system concerning the ways in which truth is defined, and yet those premises are the only reasons for protecting political speech. It follows that there is no constitutional reason to protect speech advocating forcible overthrow. See Bork, Neutral Principles and Some First Amendment Problems, 47 Ind. L.J. 1, 20 (1971).

For many, there will be concern whenever political freedom is limited to those who believe in "constitutional truth." The fear is that those not in control of government may make too narrow a definition of what constitutes "constitutional truth." Compare the views of Herbert Marcuse, text, p. 15, with those of Professor Bork. Are there any points of similarity? Any differences?

The Meiklejohn Theory of The First Amendment

The political philosopher, Alexander Meiklejohn, was a severe critic of the views articulated by Justice Holmes. Holmes's clear and present danger test sometimes permitted that which, in Meiklejohn's judgment, the First Amendment prohibited: congressional legislation abridging freedom of expression. See A. Meiklejohn, Free Speech and Its Relation to Self-Government 29 (1948). For Meiklejohn, the clear and present danger test was merely a verbal dodge for permitting restriction of free speech and press whenever the Congress was disposed to do so.

Did Professor Meiklejohn believe then that no manner of expression could be restricted by government—even "counseling to murder" or falsely shouting fire in a crowded theatre? Meiklejohn did not go this far either. What he urged was that it is necessary to distinguish between two kinds of expression, one of which has absolute protection and one of which does not. Expression with regard to issues which concern political self-government was in Meiklejohn's judgment absolutely protected by the language of the First Amendment, i.e., "Congress shall make no law abridging * * * freedom of speech, or of the press." But private discussion, discussion which is nonpolitical in character, i.e., falsely shouting fire in a crowded theatre, was not within the ambit of the First Amendment at all but rather within the ambit of the more flexible, and less restrictive, due process clause of the Fifth Amendment, i.e., " * * * nor shall any person * * * be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law."

The rationale of the absolute protection for freedom of speech in Meiklejohn's judgment was to assure that the general citizenry would have the necessary information to make the informed judgments on which a self-governing society is dependent. Speech unrelated to that end was therefore not public speech, and not within the scope of the First Amendment, and so within the regulatory power of legislatures.

Did Meiklejohn underestimate the influence of nonpolitical forms of speech on the process of self-government?

Meiklejohn and the Blasi Critique: The "Checking Value"

The heart of the Meiklejohn thesis was that the First Amendment should be interpreted to safeguard and protect individual self-governance in a free and democratic society. It is precisely this thesis which has recently been exposed to a comprehensive critique. See Blasi, The Checking Value in First Amendment Theory, 1977 American Bar Foundation Research Journal 523 at 561. Professor Vincent Blasi believes that the view that the First Amendment is designed essentially to protect individual democratic decision making is outmoded.

"[T]he Meiklejohn thesis vision of active, continued involvement by citizens fails to describe not only the reality but also the shared ideal of American politics."

Blasi instead suggests that the First Amendment should be viewed as a kind of counterpoise to government. The function of the press is to serve as the watchdog of government, and the purpose of the First Amendment is to provide the press with protection in its role of keeping government responsive and accountable. This checking function value in the First Amendment is described by Professor Blasi as follows:

The central premise of the checking value is that abuse of government is an especially serious evil—more serious than the abuse of private power, even by institutions such as large corporations which can affect the lives of millions of people.

The shift in emphasis on the ultimate purpose of First Amendment protection reflected between Meiklejohn's analysis as compared with that of Blasi is very clear. Protection of the media, rather than protection of the citizenry for purposes of self-expression and democratic decision making, becomes the fundamental First Amendment objective. The press becomes the focal point of First Amendment theory because the press and not the citizenry is seen as the essential "check" on government excess. The Blasi theory makes enduring constitutional interpretation out of the press role in Watergate.

The "checking value" sees the function of citizens in a regime ordered by the First Amendment in a very different light than Professor Meiklejohn perceived it. Professor Blasi acknowledges this difference in perspective and defends it:

The checking value is premised upon a different vision—one in which the government is structured in such a way that built-in counterforces make it possible for citizens in most, but not all, periods to have the luxury to concern themselves almost exclusively with private pursuits.

In the Meiklejohn theory, the individual is at the heart of First Amendment theory. In the Blasi theory, the media occupy that role. But is this a required substitution? First Amendment theory should be rich enough to give the media adequate protection and yet to continue to grant the citizen the pivotal role which Meiklejohn assigned him. The "checking value" theory quite properly recognizes the almost quasi-constitutional checking role the press plays vis-à-vis government. Yet the theory is perhaps somewhat defeatist since it posits the individual citizen as remote and helpless, at least when compared to the two major protagonists, government and the media.

Meiklejohn and Holmes: The Chafee View

Meiklejohn's theory had the advantage of attempting to deal textually with the perplexing latitude of the First Amendment. The dilemma of First Amendment interpretation is that the more generously its language is interpreted, oddly enough, the less protection it renders. This is due to the fact that as a practical and a political matter, legislative majorities are too often unwilling to tolerate unlimited expression. Both Meiklejohn and Holmes, then, were attempting to provide a guide for indicating that which is protected expression and that which is not. Meiklejohn criticized Holmes because Holmes did not segregate the most important aspect of expression, from a political view and immunize it from legislative assault.

ground that his attempt to immunize political speech—quite beyond the fact that separating that which is public and that which is private speech is no easy matter—was hopelessly unrealistic from a pragmatic point of view, and historically invalid as well.

Professor Chafee's basic point was that the question is not, ideally, how much speech ought to be protected but rather, politically and practically, how much expression can be protected by a court which is asked to defy "legislators and prosecutors." For Chafee, the merit of the clear and present danger doctrine was that it allowed the Congress some room to legislate in the area of public discussion but in such a way that the scope for such legislation was very restricted. For Chafee, the alternative to the Holmesian interpretation of the First Amendment was not Meiklejohn's absolute immunity for public discussion but rather no "immunity at all in the face of legislation." See Chafee, Book Review, 62 Harv.L.Rev. 891 at 898 (1949). It was obvious to Chafee that some concessions must be made to popular intolerance in periods of stress in the form of legislation. It was apparently very clear to him that, if some concessions were not made, the consequences for free expression in any time of turmoil and anxiety would necessarily be worse than if some relaxation of the absolute language of the First Amendment was not permitted.

For Professor Meiklejohn it was a matter of great significance that the First Amendment prohibited the abridgment of "freedom of speech" rather than "speech itself." This for him was the clue that the Framers intended to give absolute protection to public or political speech. That the historical background of the First Amendment by no means implies that the Framers contemplated that absolute freedom of expression championed by Professor Meiklejohn is suggested in Levy, Legacy of Suppression (1960). Even though Professor Levy's study suggests that the Framers had no experience with the broad-gauged theories of absolute freedom of expression, developed in different ways by Professor Meiklejohn, and Justice Black, he suggests that this does not mean that we should be bound by the Framers' understanding of the document which they authored. See Levy, supra, 309. A similar view was voiced by the distinguished political scientist Professor Harold Lasswell:

Suppose that historical research does succeed in disclosing the perspectives that prevailed in the eighteenth century, and which have been greatly modified since. What of it? * * * In the perspective of a comprehensive value oriented jurisprudence * * * the historical facts about the perspectives of the founding fathers, so briefly adhered to, are not binding on us.

See Lasswell's review of Crosskey, Politics and The Constitution in the History of The United States, 22 Geo.Wash.L.Rev. 383 (1953).

What are the comparative advantages and disadvantages for society and for those who work in the mass media of (1) the historical approach to the First Amendment, (2) the Meiklejohn approach, and (3) the Lasswellian approach?

WHITNEY v. CALIFORNIA

[EDITORIAL NOTE

Ms Anita Whitney participated in the convention which set up the Communist Labor Party of California and was elected an alternate member of its state executive committee. Ms Whitney was convicted under the California Criminal Syndicalism Act on the ground that the Communist Labor Party was formed to teach criminal syndicalism and, as a member of the party, she participated in the crime. The state Criminal Syndicalism Act defined criminal syndicalism "as any doctrine or precept advocating, teaching or aiding and abetting the commission of crime, sabotage * * * or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change."

Ms Whitney insisted, on review to the U.S. Supreme Court, that she had not intended to have the Communist Labor Party of California serve as an instrument of terrorism or violence. Ms Whitney argued that as the convention progressed it developed that the majority of the delegates entertained opinions about violence which she did not share. She asserted she should not be required to have foreseen that development and that her mere presence at the convention should not be considered to constitute a crime under the statute. The Court, per Justice Sanford, said that what Ms Whitney was really doing was asking the Supreme Court to review questions of fact which had already been determined against her in the courts below and that questions of fact were not open to review in the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court upheld Whitney's conviction on the ground that concerted action involved a greater threat to the public order than isolated utterances and acts of individuals.

But it was the concurrence of Justice Brandeis, joined by Justice Holmes, rather than Justice Sanford's opinion for the majority, which shaped the future development of the constitutional law of freedom of expression. Brandeis attempted to do two things in his concurrence in Whitney. First, he sought to clarify the clear and present danger doctrine in a sufficiently meaningful way so that the responsibilities of the judiciary and the legislature would be clearly outlined at the same time that the greatest possible protection was provided for freedom of expression. Second, Brandeis sought to analyze the rationale of constitutional protection for freedom of expression.

The student should read the Brandeis opinion in Whitney in an effort to state and analyze the conclusions Brandeis reached in trying to serve these two goals.]

Justice BRANDEIS (concurring). Ms Whitney was convicted of the felony of assisting in organizing, in the year 1919, the Communist Labor Party of California, of being a member of it, and of assembling with it. These acts are held to constitute a crime, because the party was formed to teach criminal syndicalism. The statute which made these acts a crime restricted the right of free speech and of assembly theretofore existing. The claim is that the statute, as applied, denied to Ms Whitney the liberty guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment.

The felony which the statute created is a crime very unlike the old felony of conspiracy or the old misdemeanor of unlawful assembly. The mere act of assisting in forming a society for teaching syndicalism, of becoming a member of it, or assembling with others for that purpose is given the dynamic quality of crime. There is guilt although the society may not contemplate immediate promulgation of the doctrine. Thus the accused is to be punished, not for attempt, incitement or conspiracy, but for a step in preparation, which, if it threatens the public order at all, does so only remotely. The novelty in the prohibition introduced is that the statute aims, not at the practice of criminal syndicalism, nor even directly at the preaching of it, but at association with those who propose to preach it.

Despite arguments to the contrary which had seemed to me persuasive, it is settled that the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment applies to matters of substantive law as well as to matters of procedure. Thus all fundamental rights comprised within the term liberty are protected by the federal Constitution from invasion by the states. The right of free speech, the right to teach and the right of assembly are, of course, fundamental rights. These may not be denied or abridged. But, although the rights of free speech and assembly are fundamental, they are not in their nature absolute. Their exercise is subject to restriction, if the particular restriction proposed is required in order to protect the state from destruction or from serious injury, political, economic or moral. That the necessity which is essential to a valid restriction does not exist unless speech would produce, or is intended to produce, a clear and imminent danger of some substantive evil which the state constitutionally may seek to prevent has been settled. See Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47, 52.

It is said to be the function of the Legislature to determine whether at a particular time and under the particular circumstances the formation of, or assembly with, a society organized to advocate criminal syndicalism constitutes a clear and present danger of substantive evil; and that by enacting the law here in question the Legislature of California determined that question in the affirmative. Compare Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652, 668, 671. The Legislature must obviously decide, in the first instance, whether a danger exists which calls for a particular protective measure. But where a statute is valid only in case certain conditions exist, the enactment of the statute cannot alone establish the facts which are essential to its validity. Prohibitory legislation has repeatedly been held invalid, because unnecessary, where the denial of liberty involved was that of engaging in a particular business. The powers of the courts to strike down an offending law are no less when the interests involved are not property rights, but the fundamental personal rights of free speech and assembly.

This court has not yet fixed the standard by which to determine when a danger shall be deemed clear; how remote the danger may be and yet be deemed present; and what degree of evil shall be deemed sufficiently substantial to justify resort to abridgment of free speech and assembly as the means of protection. To reach sound conclusions on these matters, we must bear in mind why a state is, ordinarily, denied the power to prohibit dissemination of social, economic and political doctrine which a vast majority of its citizens believes to be false and fraught with evil consequence.

Those who won our independence believed that the final end of the state was to make men free to develop their faculties, and that in its government the deliberative forces should prevail over the arbitrary. They valued liberty both as an end and as a means. They believed liberty to be the secret of happiness and courage to be the secret of liberty. They believed that freedom to think as you will and to speak as you think are means indispensable to the discovery and spread of political truth; that without free speech and assembly discussion would be futile; that with them, discussion affords ordinarily adequate protection against the dissemination of noxious doctrine; that the greatest menace to freedom is an inert people; that public discussion is a political duty; and that this should be a fundamental principle of the American government. They recognized the risks to which all human institutions are subject. But they knew that order cannot be secured merely through fear of punishment for its infraction; that it is hazardous to discourage thought, hope and imagination; that fear breeds repression; that repression breeds hate; that hate menaces stable government; that the path of safety lies in the opportunity to discuss freely supposed grievances and proposed remedies; and that the fitting remedy for evil counsels is good ones. Believing in the power of reason as applied through public discussion, they eschewed silence coerced by law—the argument of force in its worst form. Recognizing the occasional tyrannies of governing majorities, they amended the Constitution so that free speech and assembly should be guaranteed.

Fear of serious injury cannot alone justify suppression of free speech and assembly. Men feared witches and burnt women. It is the function of speech to free men from the bondage of irrational fears. To justify suppression of free speech there must be reasonable ground to fear that serious evil will result if free speech is practiced. There must be reasonable ground to believe that the danger apprehended is imminent. There must be reasonable ground to believe that the evil to be prevented is a serious one. Every denunciation of existing law tends in some measure to increase the probability that there will be violation of it. Condonation of a breach enhances the probability. Expressions of approval add to the probability. Propagation of the criminal state of mind by teaching syndicalism increases it. Advocacy of lawbreaking heightens it still further. But even advocacy of violation, however reprehensible morally, is not a justification for denying free speech where the advocacy falls short of incitement and there is nothing to indicate that the advocacy would be immediately acted on. The wide difference between advocacy and incitement, between preparation and attempt, between assembling and conspiracy, must be borne in mind. In order to support a finding of clear and present danger it must be shown either that immediate serious violence was to be expected or was advocated, or that the past conduct furnished reason to believe that such advocacy was then contemplated.

Those who won our independence by revolution were not cowards. They did not fear political change. They did not exalt order at the cost of liberty. To courageous, self-reliant men, with confi- dence in the power of free and fearless reasoning applied through the processes of popular government, no danger flowing from speech can be deemed clear and present, unless the incidence of the evil apprehended is so imminent that it may befall before there is opportunity for full discussion. If there be time to expose through discussion the falsehood and fallacies, to avert the evil by the processes of education, the remedy to be applied is more speech, not enforced silence. [Emphasis added.] Only an emergency can justify repression. Such must be the rule if authority is to be reconciled with freedom. Such, in my opinion, is the command of the Constitution. It is therefore always open to Americans to challenge a law abridging free speech and assembly by showing that there was no emergency justifying it.

Moreover, even imminent danger cannot justify resort to prohibition of these functions essential to effective democracy, unless the evil apprehended is relatively serious. Prohibition of free speech and assembly is a measure so stringent that it would be inappropriate as the means for averting a relatively trivial harm to society. A police measure may be unconstitutional merely because the remedy, although effective as means of protection, is unduly harsh or oppressive. Thus, a state might, in the exercise of its police power, make any trespass upon the land of another a crime regardless of the results or of the intent or purpose of the trespasser. It might, also, punish an attempt, a conspiracy, or an incitement to commit the trespass. But it is hardly conceivable that this court would hold constitutional a statute which punished as a felony the mere voluntary assembly with a society formed to teach that pedestrians had the moral right to cross uninclosed, unposted, waste lands and to advocate their doing so, even if there was imminent danger that advocacy would lead to a trespass. The fact that speech is likely to result in some violence or in destruction of property is not enough to justify its suppression. There must be the probability of serious injury to the State. Among free men, the deterrents ordinarily to be applied to prevent crime are education and punishment for violations of the law, not abridgment of the rights of free speech and assembly.

* * * Whenever the fundamental rights of free speech and assembly are alleged to have been invaded, it must remain open to a defendant to present the issue whether there actually did exist at the time a clear danger, whether the danger, if any, was imminent, and whether the evil apprehended was one so substantial as to justify the stringent restriction interposed by the Legislature. The legislative declaration, like the fact that the statute was passed and was sustained by the highest court of the State, creates merely a rebuttable presumption that these conditions have been satisfied.

Whether in 1919, when Ms Whitney did the things complained of, there was in California such clear and present danger of serious evil, might have been made the important issue in the case. She might have required that the issue be determined either by the court or the jury. She claimed below that the statute as applied to her violated the federal Constitution; but she did not claim that it was void because there was no clear and present danger of serious evil, nor did she request that the existence of these conditions of a valid measure thus restricting the rights of free speech and assembly be passed upon by the court or a jury. On the other hand, there was evidence on which the court or jury might have found that such danger existed. I am unable to assent to the suggestion in the opinion of the court that assembling with a political party, formed to advocate the desirability of a proletarian revolution by mass action at some date necessarily far in the future, is not a right within the protection of the Fourteenth Amendment. In the present case, however, there was other testimony which tended to establish the existence of a conspiracy, on the part of members of the International Workers of the World, to commit present serious crimes, and likewise to show that such a conspiracy would be furthered by the activity of the society of which Ms Whitney was a member. Under these circumstances the judgment of the State court cannot be disturbed.

COMMENT ON THE BRANDEIS OPINION IN WHITNEY

1. It should be noted that Justice Brandeis only reluctantly agreed that the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment applied to matters of substantive law, i.e., imposed a freedom of speech and press limitation on state power. Law and journalism students should observe how the modern American law of speech and press rests on judicial interpretation and creativity and how relatively small a role is played by the formal text, the actual language of the constitutional document.

2. In his discussion of the clear and present danger doctrine, Brandeis stressed that the crucial factor is the immediacy of the danger legislated against. As he puts it, "Only an emergency can justify repression." The corrective for communications objectionable to the state is expression to the contrary. It is only when the "evil apprehended is so imminent that it may befall before there is opportunity for full discussion" that the legislature may act. Brandeis makes it very clear, however, that a legislative judgment that the danger is too immediate and too grave to justify reliance on corrective discussion is not conclusive. As he says, the "enactment of the statute alone cannot alone establish the facts which are essential to its validity." There must be a reasonable basis for the legislative conclusion or for the state's conclusion that a particular repressive statute should be applied because of the imminent danger of the occurrence of a prohibited substantive evil.

This insistence that the courts have the last word in analyzing whether the clear and present danger doctrine should be applied is of the utmost importance. Otherwise, all the legislature would have to do to comply formally with the clear and present danger doctrine would be to merely recite, as the California legislature did in its Criminal Syndicalism Act, that it is concerned with the "immediate preservation of the public peace and safety." By such a formalism, the supposed protection of a constitutional guarantee of freedom of speech and press would be effectively destroyed.

3. The Brandeis opinion in Whitney, as we have seen, was the charter for a revised clear and present danger doctrine. Yet, in the end, and despite the eloquence of Brandeis, the conviction of Anita Whitney was affirmed, a result which, it should be noted, was joined in by Justice Holmes.<sup>1</sup>

Functionally, how useful has the clear and present danger doctrine actually proven to be? Dean Robert McKay, in a study of the First Amendment, answered the question very pragmatically. Counting cases from 1919 to 1937, Professor McKay concluded: "In its first eighteen years the clear and present danger test amounted only to this: one majority opinion (upholding the conviction claimed to abridge the freedom of speech), one concurrence, and Ohio*, 395 U.S. 444 (1969). Brandenburg also reversed the decision of the Court in Whitney: "The contrary teaching of Whitney v. California, cannot be supported, and that decision is therefore overruled." See Brandenburg v. Ohio, this text, p. 74.

five dissents." See McKay, The Preference for Freedom, 34 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1182 at 1207 (1959).

The Preferred Position Theory

Courts have often declared that they grant a presumption of constitutionality to challenged legislation. In United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144 (1938), in which the issue was a federal statute concerning economic regulation, Chief Justice Harlan Stone, writing for the Court, voiced the familiar view that the legislative judgment should be accorded a presumption of constitutionality. But in a famous footnote Stone stated that he would exempt a certain class of legislation from the scope of such a presumption. 304 U.S. 144 at 152-153, fn. 4:

There may be narrower scope for operation of the presumption of constitutionality when legislation appears on its face to be within a specific prohibition of the Constitution, such as those of the first ten amendments, which are deemed equally specific when held to be embraced within the Fourteenth.

It is unnecessary to consider now whether legislation which restricts those political processes which can ordinarily be expected to bring about repeal of undesirable legislation, is to be subjected to more exacting judicial scrutiny under the general prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment than are most other types of legislation. On restrictions upon the right to vote, see Nixon v. Condon, 286 U.S. 73; on restraints upon the dissemination of information, see Near v. Minnesota ex rel. Olson, 283 U.S. 697, 713-714, 718-720, 722; Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233; on interferences with political organizations, see Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357, 373-378; and see Holmes, J., in Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652, 673; as to prohibition of peaceable assembly, see De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353, 365.

Nor need we inquire whether similar considerations enter into the review of statutes directed at particular religious, Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 368 U.S. 510, or national, Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, or racial minorities; Nixon v. Condon, supra: whether prejudice against discrete and insular minorities may be a special condition, which tends seriously to curtail the operation of those political processes ordinarily to be relied upon to protect minorities, and which may call for a correspondingly more searching judicial inquiry.

The essence of the preferred position theory stated in Carolene Products is that legislation restricting the political freedoms should be exposed to a more searching and exacting judicial review than other legislative challenges. Stone said there is a judicial responsibility to protect political freedom particularly. Restriction of political freedom, unlike other legislative restrictions, endangers the health of the political process. One of the reasons for affording considerable latitude to legislation in constitutional questions is because broad participation in decision making is a value of high dimension in a democratic society. Generally, the legislative process rather than the judicial process is considered more capable of demonstrating and providing such participation. But, if the legislature disenfranchises a segment of the electorate, or restrains freedom of expression so that the electorate is not sufficiently informed to be able to engage rationally in decision making, then the reason for extending the benefit of the doubt to contested legislation is removed. This theory, the "preferred position" or "preferred freedoms" theory of the First Amendment, declares that legislation concerning the political freedoms protected by the First Amendment shall not be able to claim the normal presumption of constitutionality afforded to legislation in general.

In appraising the preferred position along with the other First Amendment doctrines explored in this chapter, it should be noted that the clear and present danger doctrine and the preferred position theory have been thought to be "clearly related." Both theories, it has been said, give judges an active role in First Amendment interpretation and, though they do not provide the certainty of the absolutist approach, they do "in contrast to the pseudo-standards of the reasonableness and balancing doctrines" offer "positive and workable standards to guide judicial judgment." See Pritchett, The American Constitution, p. 429 (2d ed. 1968).

Professor C. H. Pritchett's preference for the clear and present danger and preferred position over balancing and reasonableness is that the latter tests offer no definition or presumption to make them applicable or meaningful. If competing interests are to be balanced, how do we know which interest is to be given what weight?

Professor Thomas Emerson has accurately referred to the Burger Court's "neglect of the preferred position doctrine." However, his criticism is directed to the fact that the Court has not yet applied the preferred position theory in a principled across-the-board fashion: "[W]here it feels inclined to defer to legislative judgment, or when it prefers another social interest, it does not feel bound by the preferred position doctrine." See Emerson, First Amendment Doctrine and the Burger Court, 68 Calif.L.Rev. 422 at 443 (1980). Although the preferred position doctrine is not to be found by name in the opinions of the Burger Court, its legacy is occasionally visible when the Court applies a more searching standard of review in a First Amendment case than it would otherwise. See discussion of balancing and standards of review, text, p. 82.

The "Fighting Words" Doctrine

Despite the popularity of the phrase "clear and present danger," it has never served as the exclusive judicial method by which to adjudicate First Amendment problems. First Amendment doctrine is rich and various. The abundance of First Amendment approaches is due primarily to the different contexts in which First Amendment problems arise. Thus, "the fighting words" doctrine is really a common sense response to one of the most fundamental of free speech problems: the situation where the exercise of free speech so endangers the public order as to transform protected speech into the illegal action of a riot.

CHAPLINSKY v. NEW HAMPSHIRE

[EDITORIAL NOTE

The "fighting words" doctrine was born in that frequent spawning ground of First Amendment litigation, the activities of the Jehovah's Witnesses.]

Justice Frank MURPHY stated the facts of the case for a unanimous court as follows: "Chaplinsky was distributing the literature of his sect on the streets of Rochester [New Hampshire] on a busy afternoon. Members of the local citizenry complained to the City Marshal * * * that Chaplinsky was denouncing all religion as a 'racket'. The Marshal told them that Chaplinsky was lawfully engaged, and then warned Chaplinsky that the crowd was getting restless."

The complaint charged that Chaplinsky made the following remarks to the Marshal outside City Hall: "You are a God-damned racketeer and a damned Fascist and the whole government of Rochester are Fascists or agents of Fascists."

Chaplinsky for his part said that he asked the Marshal to arrest those responsible for the disturbance. But the Marshal, according to Chaplinsky, instead cursed him and told Chaplinsky to come along with him. Chaplinsky was prosecuted under a New Hampshire statute, part of which forbade "addressing any offensive, derisive or annoying word to any other person who is lawfully in any street or other public place." The statute also forbade calling such a person "by any offensive or derisive name. * * *"

The state supreme court put a gloss on the statute saying no words were forbidden except such as had a "direct tendency to cause acts of violence by the persons to whom, individually, the remark is addressed," and that launched the "fighting words" concept as a First Amendment doctrine. The United States Supreme Court quoted the New Hampshire Supreme Court with approval: "The word 'offensive' is not to be defined in terms of what a particular addressee thinks. * * * The test is what men of common intelligence would understand to be words likely to cause an average addressee to fight. * * The English language has a number of words and expressions which by general consent are 'fighting words' when said without a disarming smile. * * * Such words, as ordinary men know, are likely to cause a fight. * * *

"The statute, as construed, does no more than prohibit the face-to-face words plainly likely to cause a breach of the peace by the speaker—including 'classical fighting words', words in current use less 'classical' but equally likely to cause violence, and other disorderly words, including profanity, obscenity and threats." [Emphasis added.]

The Supreme Court said that as limited the New Hampshire statute did not violate the constitutional right of free expression. The Court said "[a] statute punishing verbal acts, carefully drawn so as not unlikely to impair liberty of expression is not too vague for a criminal law." And it added: "Argument is unnecessary to demonstrate that the appellations 'damned racketeer' and 'damned Fascist' are epithets likely to provoke the average person to retaliation, and thereby cause a breach of the peace." [Emphasis added.]

COMMENT

1. The "fighting words" doctrine is very close to the "speech plus" doctrine. Speech plus is the phrase used in First Amendment law to describe the situation where speech or expression is intertwined with action as in the case of picketing, demonstrating, and parading. The admixture of action with expression renders reasonable state regulation permissible; where pure speech alone is involved, the First Amendment intervenes. Of course, the language Chaplinsky spoke to the Marshal was "pure" speech. But it was speech, in the Court's analysis, that was bound to provoke a physical reaction. In other words, "fighting words" are words which are on the verge of action. Speech plus is expression combined with action.

On the other hand, it is not clear that Chaplinsky himself was at a cross-over point to action when he made the controversial utterance to the Marshal. The anticipated reaction to so-called "fighting words" is on the part of the listener and the audience. Why should the audience be exempted from obeying the law, i.e., refraining from violence, when pure speech is engaged in by someone like Chaplinsky? By punishing Chaplinsky, doesn't the law sanction civil disobedience by arresting Chaplinsky rather than those whom the law assumes, because of their short tempers, will resort to violence? The Chaplinsky case is an unusual context for the birth of the "fighting words" doctrine. After all, the law should not presume that a police officer like the Marshal could ever be provoked to violence by mere words.

2. Overbreadth problems can arise in "fighting words" cases. Some prosecutions for "fighting words" have been struck down when the ordinance or statute is overbroad and punishes both "fighting words" as well as words which do not by their very utterance inflict damage or tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace. Thus a Georgia statute and a New Orleans ordinance punishing the use of "opprobrious language" were respectively invalidated by the Supreme Court on the ground that such language is, unless limited, unconstitutionally overbroad. Gooding v. Wilson, 405 U.S. 518 (1972); Lewis v. City of New Orleans, 408 U.S. 913 (1972) (Lewis I); Lewis v. City of New Orleans, 415 U.S. 130 (1974), (Lewis II).

3. In summary, although the "fighting words" exception to First Amendment protection is still paid formal homage in the Supreme Court, rigorous use of the overbreadth doctrine has diminished the importance of this exception. Indeed, in Lewis II, Justice Harry Blackmun, joined by Chief Justice Burger and Justice William Rehnquist, dissented and objected to the use of the overbreadth doctrine as a means of limiting the application of the "fighting words" doctrine:

Overbreadth and vagueness in the field of speech, as the present case and Gooding indicate, have become result-oriented rubber stamps attuned to the easy and imagined self-assurance that "one man's vulgarity is another's lyric." * * * The speech uttered by Mrs. Lewis to the arresting officer "plainly" was profane, "plainly" it was insulting, and "plainly" it was fighting. It therefore is within the reach of the ordinance, as narrowed by Louisiana's highest court. * * * The suggestion that the ordinance is open to selective enforcement is no reason to strike it down. Courts are capable of stemming abusive application of statutes.

The Swastika in Skokie: "Fighting Words"?

In the considerable litigation which was spawned from a planned march of the American Nazi Party through Skokie, Illinois, a predominantly Jewish suburb of Chicago, opponents of the march in one case attempted to take refuge in the "fighting words" doctrine. The Illinois Supreme Court held that the planned display of the swastika in a community containing thousands of concentration camp survivors did not constitute "fighting words." The Illinois Supreme Court overturned a lower court injunction against the display of the swastika on the ground that the display was protected symbolic political speech. Village of Skokie v. National Socialist Party, 373 N.E.2d 21 (Ill.1978). Enjoining such a display was deemed to be an unconstitutional prior restraint on the right to free speech of the American Nazi Party:

Plaintiff urges, and the appellate court has held, that the exhibition of the Nazi symbol, the swastika, addresses to ordinary citizens a message which is tantamount to fighting words. Plaintiff further asks this court to extend Chaplinsky, which upheld a statute punishing the use of such words, and hold that the fighting-words doctrine permits a prior restraint on defendants' symbolic speech. In our judgment we are precluded from doing so.

The display of the swastika, as offensive to the principles of a free nation as the memories it recalls may be, is symbolic political speech intended to convey to the public the beliefs of those who display it. It does not, in our opinion, fall within the definition of "fighting words," and that doctrine cannot be used here to overcome the heavy presumption against the constitutional validity of a prior restraint.

Nor can we find that the swastika, while not representing fighting words, is nevertheless so offensive and peace threatening to the public that its display can be enjoined. We do not doubt that the sight of this symbol is abhorrent to the Jewish citizens of Skokie, and that the survivors of the Nazi persecutions, tormented by their recollections, may have strong feelings regarding its display. Yet it is entirely clear that this factor does not justify enjoining defendants' speech.

In summary, as we read the controlling Supreme Court opinions, use of the swastika is a symbolic form of free speech entitled to first amendment protections. Its display on uniforms or banners by those engaged in peaceful demonstrations cannot be totally precluded solely because that display may provoke a violent reaction by those who view it. Particularly is this true where, as here, there has been advance notice by the demonstrators of their plans so that they have become, as the complaint alleges, "common knowledge" and those to whom sight of the swastika banner or uniforms would be offensive are forewarned and need not view them. A speaker who gives prior notice of his message has not compelled a confrontation with those who voluntarily listen.

The Hostile Audience Problem

In Feiner v. New York, 340 U.S. 315 (1951), a controversial speaker was interrupted in mid-sentence by a policeman who demanded that he step down from his soap box because the street corner audience appeared to be getting restless. When Feiner refused to step down, he was arrested for disturbing the peace. The Supreme Court per Chief Justice Fred Vinson upheld his conviction against a contention by Feiner that his arrest violated his First Amendment rights of free speech. Justice Felix Frankfurter, concurring in Feiner, thought that interruption of speech by the police was not unconstitutional when in the best judgment of the police the speech threatened to precipitate disorder:

It is true that breach-of-peace statutes, like most tools of government, may be misused. Enforcement of these statutes calls for public tolerance and intelligent police administration. These, in the long run, must give substance to whatever this Court may say about free speech.

Feiner raises the so-called "hostile audience" problem. If the audience menaces the speaker to the point where the physical safety of the speaker is at stake or a general melee is threatened, are the police ever justified in arresting the speaker even though the speaker is not intentionally inciting to violence? One way of resolving the problem would be to compare the size of the audience with the number of police. Presumably, if the latter were far outnumbered by potentially dangerous audience members and there was a possibility some of them were armed, simple logistics would dictate carting away the speaker rather than the audience. Would such an analysis be a permissible use of the balancing test?

Whom should the police protect? The speaker or the hostile audience.<sup>2</sup> In dissent in Feiner, Justice Black's answer was clear: the speaker should be protected.

The case for arresting the speaker in a situation where the speaker is using "fighting words," i.e., words which can be expected to enrage the audience and lead it to physical violence, is stronger than the situation where the speaker's words, on a reasonable analysis, ought not to engender hostility leading to physical violence. Would Justice Black have supported arresting the speaker in this variation of the hostile audience problem?

Justice Frankfurter's approach in Feiner was not unlike the logistics approach to the hostile audience problem discussed above. If speech threatens to precipitate disorder, then the police, acting on a non-discriminatory basis, might be justified in stopping the speech.

Justice Frankfurter's views were directly challenged by Justice Jackson in a dissenting opinion in a companion case, Kunz v. New York, 340 U.S. 290 (1951). Kunz had obtained a street-speaking permit in

2. See generally Note. Hostile Audience Confrontations: Police Conduct and First Amendment Rights, 75 Mich.L.Rev. 180 (1976).

New York City, but it was later revoked after many of his speeches aroused complaints and threats of violence from passers-by. His subsequent attempts to obtain a new permit were denied on the basis of the earlier revocation. The Supreme Court held that the denial of a new permit violated Kunz's First Amendment rights. In dissent, Justice Jackson pointed out the irony of the Court's position and especially that of Justice Frankfurter. Of what value, he said, is a rule against prior restraint if the Court is willing, as in Feiner, to sanction on-the-street arrests of volatile speakers while they are exercising their First Amendment rights? A fairly administered permit system, said Justice Jackson, "better protects freedom of speech than to let everyone speak without leave, but subject to surveillance and to being ordered to stop in the discretion of the police."

At least a permit system enables a potential speaker to present evidence on his own behalf and to appeal an administrative decision to a higher official. But in Feiner, the speaker's right to speak his mind was violated ex parte by a police officer who unilaterally decided that enough was enough. Which system, asked Justice Jackson, is more protective of First Amendment liberty?

Justice Frankfurter's analysis of free speech interests, prior restraint, and punishment after-the-fact was disputed by Justices Black, Douglas, and Sherman Minton, who dissented in Feiner. Even if Feiner's speech was arousing potential violence among the listening crowd, said Justice Black, the duty of the police was to protect Feiner's right to speak by arresting menacing hecklers, if necessary. In this view, silencing Feiner at the behest of the audience or because of the policeman's own personal prejudice against the speaker's views was not an appropriate alternative. Justice Black agreed with Justice Jackson's analysis of the effect of on-the-spot arrest upon the "freedom" guaranteed by rules against prior restraint. Feiner had criticized President Harry S. Truman.

The overbreadth doctrine has loomed large in hostile audience cases as it has in "fighting words" cases. Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U.S. 1 (1949), involved a speaker who by using racially discriminatory language angered a largely black crowd standing outside the hall where the speech took place. The speaker was convicted under a law prohibiting speech that "stirs the public to anger, invites dispute or brings about a condition of unrest." The Supreme Court overturned the conviction and declared that the statute was overbroad in that it punished expression which had not been shown to present a clear and present danger. In a famous sentence in his opinion for the Court, Justice Douglas observed: "[A] function of free speech under our system of government is to invite dispute." At least inferentially, Terminiello suggests that a hostile audience is no justification for taking away the agitator who arouses the audience—at least unless the exacting standards of the clear and present danger test can be met. Which speech situation seemed the more volatile, Feiner or Terminiello?

Suppose a prior restraint is based on the probability of a hostile crowd reaction? When American Nazis proposed a professedly peaceful march through Skokie, the Village of Skokie enacted ordinances designed to block parades such as that contemplated by the Nazis. In the federal case which dramatically divided the membership of the American Civil Liberties Union, the ACLU provided legal counsel to the Nazis who brought suit to challenge the ordinances. Counsel for Skokie argued that the prospect of swastikas carried by marching Nazis were the equivalent of "fighting" words to a community many of whose members were former inmates of Nazi concentration camps. Furthermore, it was again argued that the specter of Nazi insignia being displayed in public in such a community was bound to provoke a hostile reaction. The federal district court declared the ordinances to be unconstitutional, and the federal court of appeals affirmed. Collin v. Smith, 578 F.2d 1197 (7th Cir. 1978).

Speaking for the court of appeals, Judge Pell said:

It would be grossly insensitive to deny, as we do not, that the proposed demonstration would seriously disturb, emotionally and mentally, at least some, and probably many of the Village's residents. The problem with engrafting an exception on the First Amendment for such situations is that they are indistinguishable in principle from speech that invite[s] dispute * * * induces a condition of unrest, creates dissatisfaction with conditions as they are, or even stirs people to anger." Terminiello v. Chicago, * * * Yet these are among the "high" purposes of the First Amendment.

This case does not involve intrusion into people's homes. There need be no captive audience, as Village residents may, if they wish, simply avoid the Village Hall for thirty minutes on a Sunday afternoon, which no doubt would be their normal course of conduct on a day when the Village Hall was not open in the regular course of business. Absent such intrusion or captivity, there is no justifiable substantial privacy interest to save [the ordinance under consideration] from constitutional infirmity, when it attempts, by fiat, to declare the entire Village, at all times, a privacy zone that may be sanitized from the offensiveness of Nazi ideology and symbols.

In short, the federal court of appeals held that protected First Amendment activity could not be proscribed because of an anticipated hostile audience reaction particularly in circumstances where the audience involved could easily avoid the viewing of unwanted activity and where the audience was in no sense captive.<sup>3</sup> In such circumstances, the fact that a hostile audience reaction could be predicted as a result of the exercise of particular protected First Amendment activity could not authorize a prior restraint in the form of an ordinance prohibiting the parade in controversy: "Our decision that [the ordinance under consideration] cannot constitutionally be applied to the proposed march means that a permit for the march may not be denied on the basis of anticipated violations thereof." The decision of the federal court of appeals in the Collin case indicates that a heavy burden will have to be met by the state before a prior restraint on protected First Amendment expression is authorized out of fear that a hostile crowd will engage in disruptive activity as a result of permitting the expression in controversy.

The First Amendment and State Regulation of Pamphleteering, Solicitation, Parades, and Demonstrations

Alma Lovell, a Jehovah's Witness, was arrested in the town of Griffin, Georgia,

3. See Village of Skokie v. National Socialist Party, 373 N.E.2d 21 (Ill.1978), this text, p. 30, where a hostile audience to a Nazi parade was predicted but the Illinois Supreme Court, nonetheless, held that, in the circumstances, a prior restraint on the parade was not permissible:

Similarly, the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, in reversing the denial of defendant Collin's application for a permit to speak in Chicago's Marquette Park, noted that courts have consistently refused to ban speech because of the possibility of unlawful conduct by those opposed to the speaker's philosophy. Starting with Terminiello v. City of Chicago, 337 U.S. 1 (1949), and continuing to Gregory v. City of Chicago, 394 U.S. 111 (1969), it has become patent that a hostile audience is not a basis for restraining otherwise legal First Amendment activity. As with many of the cases cited herein, if the actual behavior is not sufficient to sustain a conviction under a statute, then certainly the anticipation of such events cannot sustain the burden necessary to justify a prior restraint. Collin v. Chicago Park District, 460 F.2d 746, 754 (7th Cir. 1972). For a discussion of the foregoing case in terms of the "fighting words" doctrine, see text, p. 30.

for violation of a city ordinance which banned any pamphleteering or leafletting without prior written permission from the Griffin city manager. She never sought permission from the Griffin city manager. She appealed her conviction under this ordinance and urged that it violated the First Amendment.

In a unanimous decision in Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U.S. 444 (1938), delivered by Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes, the United States Supreme Court found the Griffin ordinance invalid on its face as a violation of freedom of speech and freedom of the press.

The Chief Justice pointed out that the ordinance "prohibits the distribution of literature of any kind, at any time, at any place, and in any manner without a permit from the city manager." The Griffin ordinance made no distinctions but covered all "literature" in all circumstances. Again this First Amendment infirmity is called overbreadth.

If the town was concerned about a particular problem, such as litter, or scurrilous libels, it ought to have drafted the ordinance to meet that problem rather than embracing all forms of pamphleteering. Secondly, the ordinance as drafted created a one-man censorship board in the person of the city manager with no guidelines to direct decisions prohibiting or permitting circulation of a particular leaflet. The city manager of Griffin had total unquestioned discretion to regulate the flow of printed communication in the town. Under the doctrine of Lovell v. Griffin, the officials who administer a permit system must have their authority specified and articulated in the legislation creating the system.

In dictum in Lovell v. Griffin, Chief Justice Hughes noted that the First Amendment is not confined to protection of newspapers and magazines, but includes pamphlets and leaflets as well. "The press," he wrote, "in its historic connotation comprehends every sort of publication which affords a vehicle of information and opinion." Furthermore, freedom to distribute and circulate press materials is as protected under the First Amendment as freedom to publish in the first place.

In Lovell, the Court spoke in strong terms of the threat to a free press posed by a licensing scheme. If a statute or regulation is narrowly drawn and contains procedural safeguards (unlike the pamphleteering ordinance in Lovell), would it be upheld despite overtones of "licensing"? Would noncompliance with the statute then be justified if someone had doubts about the validity of the statute?

Since the ordinance in Lovell was found "void on its face," the Court held that it was not necessary for Alma Lovell "to seek a permit under it." The Court held that she was "entitled to contest its validity in answer to the charge against her."

Isn't the usual view that a court rather than an individual should decide the constitutionality of legislation? Why then didn't the Court insist that Alma Lovell first apply for a permit and show that she had been denied it before determining that the ordinance was invalid? See Walker v. Birmingham, this text p. 45.

State Regulation of Solicitation

Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940), was yet another case involving the imposition of state criminal penalties on Jehovah's Witnesses. The Cantwells, a father and two sons, were arrested in New Haven, Connecticut, for conducting door-to-door religious solicitation in a predominantly Catholic neighborhood of the city. They were charged with violating a Connecticut statute which provided in part that: "No person shall solicit money * * for any alleged religious * * * cause * * unless * * * approved by the [county] secretary of * * * public welfare." Any person seeking to solicit for a religious cause was required under the statute to file an application with the welfare secretary, who was empowered to decide whether the cause was "a bona fide object of charity" and whether it conformed to "reasonable standards of efficiency and integrity." The penalty for violating the statute was a $100 fine or thirty days' imprisonment or both.

The Cantwells' convictions were affirmed by the state courts of Connecticut. But the United States Supreme Court unanimously, per Justice Owen Roberts, declared the statute unconstitutional as applied to the Cantwells and other Jehovah's Witnesses.

The Cantwells argued that the Connecticut state statute was not regulatory but prohibitory, since it allowed a state official to ban religious solicitation from the streets of Connecticut entirely. Once a certificate of approval was issued by the state welfare secretary, solicitation could proceed without any restriction at all under the Connecticut statute. And once a certificate was denied, solicitation was banned.

The Supreme Court ruled that the Connecticut statute in effect established a prior restraint on First Amendment freedoms which was not alleviated by the availability of judicial review after the fact.

The Supreme Court also pointed out that if the state wished to protect its citizens against door-to-door solicitation for fraudulent "religious" or "charity" causes, it had the constitutional power to enact a regulation aimed at that problem. The present law, however, was not such a statute. The Court also noted that it is within the police power of the state to set regulatory limits on religious solicitation (as on other sorts of solicitation), such as the time of day or the right of a householder to terminate the solicitation by demanding that the visitor remove himself from the premises. The state may not, however, force people to submit to licensing of religious speech.

On the breach of the peace conviction, the Supreme Court held that the broad sweep of the common law offense was an infringement of First Amendment rights.

The state had argued that because the Cantwells' solicitation technique had been provocative, it tended to produce violence on the part of their listeners and, therefore, was an appropriate matter for sanction under the common law offense of disturbing the peace.

In the Court's view in Cantwell, if the state had defined what is considered to be a clear and present danger to the state in a precisely drawn breach of the peace statute, this might have presented a sufficiently substantial interest to make it appropriate to convict Cantwell under such a statute. But since the breach of the peace offense was an imprecise common law offense rather than an offense set forth in a tightly drawn statute, the Court set aside the breach of the peace conviction. Justice Roberts made the following observations in Cantwell:

When clear and present danger of riot, disorder, interference with traffic upon the public streets, or other immediate threat to public safety, peace, or order, appears, the power of the State to prevent or punish is obvious. Equally obvious is it that a State may not unduly suppress free communication of views, religious or other, under the guise of conserving desirable conditions.

Solicitation and Time, Place, and Manner Controls

VILLAGE OF SCHAUMBURG v. CITIZENS FOR A BETTER ENVIRONMENT

Justice WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

The issue in this case is the validity under the First and Fourteenth Amendments of a municipal ordinance prohibiting the solicitation of contributions by charitable organizations that do not use at least 75 percent of their receipts for "charitable purposes," those purposes being defined to exclude solicitation expenses, salaries, overhead and other administrative expenses. The Court of Appeals held the ordinance unconstitutional. We affirm that judgment.

Respondent Citizens for a Better Environment (CBE) is an Illinois not-for-profit corporation organized for the purpose of promoting "the protection of the environment." CBE is registered with the Illinois Attorney General's Charitable Trust Division pursuant to Illinois law, and has been afforded tax-exempt status by the United States Internal Revenue Service, and gifts to it are deductible for federal income tax purposes. CBE requested permission to solicit contributions in the Village of Schaumburg, but the Village denied CBE a permit because CBE could not demonstrate that 75 percent of its receipts would be used for "charitable purposes" as required by § 22-20(g) of the Village Code. CBE then sued the Village in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, charging that the 75 percent requirement of § 22-20(g) violated the First and Fourteenth Amendments. Declaratory and injunctive relief were sought.

The Village's answer to the complaint acknowledged that CBE employed "canvassers" to solicit funds, but alleged that "CBE is primarily raising funds for the benefit and salary of its employees and that its charitable purposes are negligible as compared with the primary objective of raising funds." The Village also alleged "that more than 60% of the funds collected [by CBE] have been spent for benefits of employees and not for any charitable purposes."

The District Court awarded summary judgment to CBE. The court recognized that although the "government may regulate solicitation in order to protect the community from fraud, [a]ny action impinging upon the freedom of expression and discussion must be minimal, and intimately related to an articulated, substantial government interest." The court concluded that the 75 percent requirement of § 22-20(g) of the Village Code on its face was "a form of censorship" prohibited by the First and Fourteenth Amendments. Section 22-20(g) was declared void on its face, its enforcement was enjoined, and the Village was ordered to issue a charitable solicitation permit to CBE.

The Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit affirmed.

It is urged that the ordinance should be sustained because it deals only with solicitation and because any charity is free to propagate its views from door to door in the Village without a permit as long as it refrains from soliciting money. But this represents a far too limited view of our prior cases relevant to canvassing and soliciting by religious and charitable organizations.

* * * This Court set aside the convictions [in Cantwell]. * * * Although Cantwell turned on the free exercise clause the Court has subsequently understood Cantwell to have implied that soliciting funds involves interests protected by the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of speech. Virginia Pharmacy Board v. Virginia Consumer Council; Bates v. State Bar of Arizona. * * *

Prior authorities, therefore, clearly establish that charitable appeals for funds, on the street or door to door, involve a variety of speech interests—communication of information, the dissemination and propagation of views and ideas, and the advocacy of causes—that are within the protection of the First Amendment. Soliciting financial support is undoubtedly subject to reasonable regulation but the latter must be undertaken with due regard for the reality that solicitation is characteristically intertwined with informative and perhaps persuasive speech seeking support for particular causes or for particular views on economic, political or social issues, and for the reality that without solicitation the flow of such information and advocacy would likely cease. Canvassers in such contexts are necessarily more than solicitors for money. Furthermore, because charitable solicitation does more than inform private economic decisions and is not primarily concerned with providing information about the characteristics and costs of goods and services, it has not been dealt with in our cases as a variety of purely commercial speech.

The issue before us, then, is not whether charitable solicitations in residential neighborhoods are within the protections of the First Amendment. It is clear that they are.

The issue is whether the Village has exercised its power to regulate solicitation in such a manner as not unduly to intrude upon the rights of free speech. In pursuing this question we must first deal with the claim of the Village that summary judgment was improper because there was an unresolved factual dispute concerning the true character of CBE's organization.

We agree with the Court of Appeals that CBE was entitled to its judgment of facial invalidity if the ordinance purported to prohibit canvassing by a substantial category of charities to which the 75-percent limitation could not be applied consistently with the First and Fourteenth Amendments, even if there was no demonstration that CBE itself was one of these organizations. Given a case or controversy, a litigant whose own activities are unprotected, may nevertheless challenge a statute by showing that it substantially abridges the First Amendment rights of other parties not before the court. In these First Amendment contexts, the courts are inclined to disregard the normal rule against permitting one whose conduct may validly be prohibited to challenge the proscription as it applies to others because of the possibility that protected speech or associative activities may be inhibited by the overly broad reach of the statute.

We have declared the overbreadth doctrine to be inapplicable in certain commercial speech cases, but that limitation does not concern us here. The Court of Appeals was thus free to inquire whether § 22-20(g) was overbroad, a question of law that involved no dispute about the characteristics of CBE. On this basis, proceeding to rule on the merits of the summary judgment was proper. As we have indicated, we also agree with the Court of Appeals' ruling on the motion.

We agree with the Court of Appeals that the 75-percent limitation is a direct and substantial limitation on protected activity that cannot be sustained unless it serves a sufficiently strong, subordinating interest that the Village is entitled to protect. We also agree that the Village's proffered justifications are inadequate and that the ordinance cannot survive scrutiny under the First Amendment.

The Village urges that the 75-percent requirement is intimately related to substantial governmental interests "in protecting the public from fraud, crime and undue annoyance." These interests are indeed substantial, but they are only peripherally promoted by the 75-percent requirement and could be sufficiently served by measures less destructive of First Amendment interests.

Prevention of fraud is the Village's principal justification for prohibiting solicitation by charities that spend more than one-quarter of their receipts on salaries and administrative expenses. The submission is that any organization using more than 25% of its receipts on fundraising, salaries and overhead is not a charitable, but a commercial, for profit enterprise and that to permit it to represent itself as a charity is fraudulent. But, as the Court of Appeals recognized, this cannot be true of those organizations that are primarily engaged in research, advocacy or public education and that use their own paid staff to carry out these functions as well as to solicit financial support. The Village, consistently with the First Amendment, may not label such groups "fraudulent" and bar them from canvassing on the streets and house to house. Nor may the Village lump such organizations with those that in fact are using the charitable label as a cloak for profit-making and refuse to employ more precise measures to separate one kind from the other. The Village may serve its legitimate interest, but it must do so by narrowly drawn regulations designed to serve those interests without unnecessarily interfering with First Amendment freedoms.

The Village's legitimate interest in preventing fraud can be better served by measures less intrusive than a direct prohibition on solicitation. Fraudulent misrepresentations can be prohibited and the penal laws used to punish such conduct directly. Efforts to promote disclosure of the finances of charitable organizations also may assist in preventing fraud by informing the public of the ways in which their contributions will be employed. Such measures may help make contribution decisions more informed, while leaving to individual choice the decision whether to contribute to organizations that spend large amounts on salaries and administrative expenses.

We also fail to perceive any substantial relationship between the 75-percent requirement and the protection of public safety or of residential privacy. There is no indication that organizations devoting more than one-quarter of their funds to salaries and administrative expenses are any more likely to employ solicitors who would be a threat to public safety than are other charitable organizations.

The 75-percent requirement is related to the protection of privacy only in the most indirect of ways. As the Village concedes, householders are equally disturbed by solicitation on behalf of organizations satisfying the 75-percent requirements as they are by solicitation on behalf of other organizations. The 75-percent requirement protects privacy only by reducing the total number of solicitors, as would any prohibition on solicitation. The ordinance is not directed to the unique privacy interests of persons residing in their homes because it applies not only to door-to-door solicitation, but also to solicitation on "public streets and public ways." Code § 22-20. Other provisions of the ordinance, which are not challenged here, such as the provision permitting homeowners to bar solicitors from their property by posting signs reading "No Solicitors or Peddlers Invited," Code § 22-24, suggest the availability of less intrusive and more effective measures to protect privacy. We find no reason to disagree with the Court of Appeals' conclusion that § 22-20(g) is unconstitutionally overbroad. Its judgment is therefore affirmed.

Justice Rehnquist, dissenting.

The central weakness of the Court's decision, I believe, is its failure to recognize, let alone confront, the two most important issues in this case: how does one define a "charitable" organization, and to which authority in our federal system is application of that definition confided? I would uphold Schaumburg's ordinance as applied to CBE because that ordinance, while perhaps too strict to suit some tastes, affects only door-to-door solicitation for financial contributions, leaves little or no discretion in the hands of municipal authorities to "censor" unpopular speech, and is rationally related to the community's collective desire to bestow its largess upon organizations that are truly "charitable." I therefore dissent.

---

COMMENT

In his dissent in Schaumburg, Justice Rehnquist says that the Court's precedents striking down regulations covering door-to-door solicitation activity turned upon factors not involved in Schaumburg. For example, he cited Cantwell for the proposition that where the discretion conferred by a regulation on a municipal official to grant or deny a permit was "on the basis of vague or even non-existent criteria," the regulation was invalid.

Furthermore, he pointed out that prior cases established a line between solicitations involving the dissemination of information and solicitations concerned with obtaining money. See Martin v. Struthers, 319 U.S. 141 (1943) with Breard v. Alexandria, 341 U.S. 622 (1951).

Rehnquist says that Schaumburg holds that municipalities cannot prohibit door-to-door solicitation for contributions by organizations "primarily engaged in research, advocacy, or public education and that use their own paid staff to carry out these functions as well as to solicit financial support." Such a standard, he adds, has three defects: 1) It reverses the unprotected status for commercial speech rejected by Virginia Pharmacy. See text, p. 159. 2) The standard provides no guidance to municipalities on how to identify organizations "whose primary purpose is * * * to * * * disseminate information * * * on matters of public concern." 3) The Court overestimates the constitutional value of door-to-door solicitation for financial contributions. "* * * [A] simple request for money lies far from the core protection of the First Amendment as heretofore interpreted." Is Justice Rehnquist just asking for a return to the pre-Virginia Pharmacy status of commercial speech?

In the Schaumburg case, an ordinance protecting door-to-door or street solicitation of contributions by charitable organizations not using at least 75 percent of their receipts for "charitable purposes" was held unconstitutional. The doctrine which was the basis of the holding in Schaumburg was the overbreadth doctrine.

However, a regulation on solicitation can also be supported by other First Amendment doctrines. "While protection of public, or political protest lies at the very core of the First Amendment, some regulation is permissible with respect to the regulation of the time, place, and manner of such protest." See Barron and Dienes, Handbook of Free Speech and Free Press 93 (1979).

Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104 (1972) provides a helpful guide to permissible time, place, and manner regulation:

The nature of the place, "the pattern of its normal activities, dictates the kinds of regulations of time, place and manner that are reasonable." Although a silent vigil may not unduly interfere with a public library, making a speech in the reading room almost certainly would. That same speech should be perfectly appropriate in a park. The crucial question is whether the manner of expression is basically compatible with the normal activity of a particular place at a particular time. Our cases make clear that in assessing the reasonableness of regulation, we must weigh heavily the fact that communication is involved; the regulation must be narrowly tailored to further the State's legitimate interest. "Access to [public places] for the purpose of exercising [First Amendment rights] cannot constitutionally be denied broadly." Free expression must not, in the guise of regulation, be abridged or denied.

The Heffron case which follows is an illustrative example of permissible time, place, or manner regulation.

HEFFRON v. INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS

[The Minnesota Agricultural Society conducts an annual state fair on a 125-acre tract of state land which attracts about 115,000 persons on weekdays and 160,000 on weekends. Pursuant to state law, the Society issued rules, including Rule 6.05 which requires that all persons or groups seeking to sell, exhibit, or distribute materials at the fair must do so only from fixed locations on the fairgrounds. While the rules do not bar walking around and communicating, all sales, distributions, and fund solicitations must be conducted from a booth rented from the fair authorities on a first-come, first-served basis.

[The International Society for Krishna Consciousness, Inc. (ISKCON) brought suit seeking to enjoin application of Rule 6.05 against the religion and its members. It was alleged that the Rule violated the First Amendment by suppressing ISKCON's religious practice of Sankirtan, a ritual requiring members to go into public places to distribute material and solicit donations for the Krishna religion.]

[The trial court upheld the constitutionality of Rule 6.05. The Minnesota Supreme Court reversed, holding Rule 6.05 unconstitutionally restricted the Krishnas' religious practice of Sankirtan.]

Justice WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

The State does not dispute that the oral and written dissemination of the Krishnas' religious views and doctrines is protected by the First Amendment. Nor does it claim that this protection is lost because the written materials sought to be distributed are sold rather than given away or because contributions or gifts are solicited in the course of propagating the faith.

It is also common ground, however, that the First Amendment does not guarantee the right to communicate one's views at all times and places or in any manner that may be desired. Adderley v. Florida. As the Minnesota Supreme Court recognized, the activities of ISKCON, like those of others protected by the First Amendment, are subject to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions. "We have often approved restrictions of that kind provided that they are justified without reference to the content of the regulated speech, that they serve a significant governmental interest, and that in doing so they leave open ample alternative channels for communication of the information." Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council. The issue here, as it was below, is whether Rule 6.05 is a permissible restriction on the place and manner of communicating the views of the Krishna religion, more specifically, whether the Society may require the members of ISKCON who desire to practice Sankirtan at the State Fair to confine their distribution, sales, and solicitation activities to a fixed location.

A major criterion for a valid time, place, and manner restriction is that the restriction "may not be based upon either the content or subject matter of the speech." Consolidated Edison Co. v. Public Service Commission [p. 59]. Rule 6.05 qualifies in this respect, since, as the Supreme Court of Minnesota observed, the rule applies even-handedly to all who wish to distribute and sell written materials or to solicit funds. No person or organization, whether commercial or charitable is permitted to engage in such activities except from a booth rented for those purposes.

Nor does Rule 6.05 suffer from the more covert forms of discrimination that may result when arbitrary discretion is vested in some governmental authority. The method of allocating space is a straightforward first-come, first-served system. The rule is not open to the kind of arbitrary application that this Court has condemned as inherently inconsistent with a valid time, place, and manner regulation because such discretion has the potential for becoming a means of suppressing a particular point of view. See Shuttlesworth v. Birmingham.

A valid time, place, and manner regulation must also "serve a significant governmental interest." Here, the principal justification asserted by the state in support of Rule 6.05 is the need to maintain the orderly movement of the crowd given the large number of exhibitors and persons attending the fair.

As a general matter, it is clear that a state's interest in protecting the "safety and convenience" of persons using a public forum is a valid governmental objective. Furthermore, consideration of a forum's special attributes is relevant to the constitutionality of a regulation since the significance of the governmental interest must be assessed in light of the characteristic nature and function of the particular forum involved. This observation bears particular import in the present case since respondents make a number of analogies between the fairgrounds and city streets, which have "immemorially been held in trust for the use of the public and have been used for purposes of assembly, communicating thoughts between citizens, and discussing public questions." But it is clear that there are significant differences between a street and the fairgrounds. A street is continually open, often uncongested, and constitutes not only a necessary conduit in the daily affairs of a locality's citizens, but also a place where people may enjoy the open air of the company of friends and neighbors in a relaxed environment. The Minnesota Fair is a temporary event attracting great numbers of visitors who come to the event for a short period to see and experience the host of exhibits and attractions at the fair. The flow of the crowd and demands of safety are more pressing in the context of the fair. As such, any comparisons to public streets are necessarily inexact.

The justification for the Rule should not be measured by the disorder that would result from granting an exemption solely to ISKCON. That organization and its ritual of Sankirtan have no special claim to First Amendment protection as compared to that of other religions who also distribute literature and solicit funds. None of our cases suggest that the inclusion of peripatetic solicitation as part of a church ritual entitles church members to solicitation rights in a public forum superior to those of members of other religious groups that raise money but do not purport to ritualize the process. Nor for present purposes do religious organizations enjoy rights to communicate, distribute, and solicit on the fairgrounds superior to those of other organizations having social, political, or other ideological messages to proselytize. The nonreligious organizations seeking support for their activities are entitled to rights equal to those of religious groups to enter a public forum and spread their views, whether by soliciting funds or by distributing literature.

ISKCON desires to proselytize at the fair because it believes it can successfully communicate and raise funds. In its view, this can be done only by intercepting fair patrons as they move about, and if success is achieved, stopping them momentarily or for longer periods as money is given or exchanged for literature. This consequence would be multiplied many times over if Rule 6.05 could not be applied to confine such transactions by ISKCON and others to fixed locations. Indeed, the court below agreed that without Rule 6.05 there would be widespread disorder at the fairgrounds. The court also recognized that some disorder would inevitably result from exempting the Krishnas from the rule. Obviously, there would be a much larger threat to the State's interest in crowd control if all other religious, nonreligious, and noncommercial organizations could likewise move freely about the fairgrounds distributing and selling literature and soliciting funds at will.

Given these considerations, we hold that the State's interest in confining distribution, selling, and fund solicitation activities to fixed locations is sufficient to satisfy the requirement that a place or manner restriction must serve a substantial state interest.

For similar reasons, we cannot agree with the Minnesota Supreme Court that Rule 6.05 is an unnecessary regulation because the State could avoid the threat to its interest posed by ISKCON by less restrictive means, such as penalizing disorder or disruption, limiting the number of solicitors, or putting more narrowly drawn restrictions on the location and movement of ISKCON's representatives. As we have indicated, the inquiry must involve not only ISKCON, but also all other organizations that would be entitled to distribute, sell or solicit if the booth rule may not be enforced with respect to ISKCON. Looked at in this way, it is quite improbable that the alternative means suggested by the Minnesota Supreme Court would deal adequately with the problems posed by the much larger number of distributors and solicitors that would be present on the fairgrounds if the judgment below were affirmed.

For Rule 6.05 to be valid as a place and manner restriction, it must also be sufficiently clear that alternative forums for the expression of respondents' protected speech exist despite the effects of the rule. Rule 6.05 is not vulnerable on this ground. First, the Rule does not prevent ISKCON from practicing Sankirtan anywhere outside the fairgrounds. More importantly, the rule has not been shown to deny access within the forum in question. Here, the rule does not exclude ISKCON from the fairgrounds, nor does it deny that organization the right to conduct any desired activity at some point within the forum. Its members may mingle with the crowd and orally propagate their views. The organization may also arrange for a booth and distribute and sell literature and solicit funds from that location on the fairgrounds itself. The Minnesota State Fair is a limited public forum in that it exists to provide a means for a great number of exhibitors temporarily to present their products or views, be they commercial, religious, or political, to a large number of people in an efficient fashion. Considering the limited functions of the fair and the combined area within which it operates, we are unwilling to say that Rule 6.05 does not provide ISKCON and other organizations with an adequate means to sell and solicit on the fairgrounds.

[Reversed.]

Justice BRENNAN, with whom Justice Marshall and Justice Stevens join, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

As the Court recognizes, the issue in this case is whether Minnesota State Fair Rule 6.05 constitutes a reasonable time, place, and manner restriction on respondents' exercise of protected First Amendment rights. In deciding this issue, the Court considers, inter alia, whether the regulation serves a significant governmental interest and whether that interest can be served by a less intrusive restriction. The Court errs, however, in failing to apply its analysis separately to each of the protected First Amendment activities restricted by Rule 6.05. Thus, the Court fails to recognize that some of the state's restrictions may be reasonable while others may not.

Rule 6.05 restricts three types of protected First Amendment activity: distribution of literature, sale of literature, and solicitation of funds.

I quite agree with the Court that the state has a significant interest in maintaining crowd control on its fairgrounds. I also have no doubt that the State has a significant interest in protecting its fairgoers from fraudulent or deceptive solicitation practices. Indeed, because I believe on this record that this latter interest is substantially furthered by a rule that restricts sales and solicitation activities to fixed booth locations, where the State will have the greatest opportunity to police and prevent possible deceptive practices, I would hold that Rule 6.05's restriction on those particular forms of First Amendment expression is justified as an antifraud measure. Accordingly, I join the judgment of the Court as far as it upholds rule 6.05's restriction on sales and solicitations. However, because I believe that the booth rule is an overly intrusive means of achieving the state's interest in crowd control, and because I cannot accept the validity of the state's third asserted justification [i.e., protection of fairgoers from annoyance and harassment], I dissent from the Court's approval of Rule 6.05's restriction on the distribution of literature.

As our cases have long noted, once a governmental regulation is shown to impinge upon basic First Amendment rights, the burden falls on the government to show the validity of its asserted interest and the absence of less intrusive alternatives. The challenged "regulation must be narrowly tailored to further the State's legitimate interest." Minnesota's Rule 6.05 does not meet this test.

[E]ach and every fairgoer, whether political candidate, concerned citizen, or member of a religious group, is free to give speeches, engage in face-to-face advocacy, campaign, or proselytize. No restrictions are placed on any fairgoer's right to speak at any time, at any place, or to any person. Thus, if on a given day 5,000 members of ISKCON came to the fair and paid their admission fees, all 5,000 would be permitted to wander throughout the fairgrounds, delivering speeches to whomever they wanted, about whatever they wanted. Moreover, because this right does not rest on Sankirtan or any other religious principle, it can be exercised by every political candidate, partisan advocate, and common citizen who has paid the price of admission. All share the identical right to move peripatetically and speak freely throughout the fairgrounds.

Because of Rule 6.05, however, as soon as a proselytizing member of ISKCON hands out a free copy of the Bhagavad-Gita to an interested listener, or a political candidate distributes his campaign brochure to a potential voter, he becomes subject to arrest and removal from the fairgrounds. This constitutes a significant restriction on First Amendment rights. By prohibiting distribution of literature outside the booths, the fair officials sharply limit the number of fairgoers to whom the proselytizers and candidates can communicate their messages. Only if a fairgoer affirmatively seeks out such information by approaching a booth does Rule 6.05 fully permit potential communicators to exercise their First Amendment rights.

In support of its crowd control justification, the state contends that if fairgoers are permitted to distribute literature, large crowds will gather, blocking traffic lanes and causing safety problems. But the state has failed to provide any support for these assertions. It has made no showing that relaxation of its booth rule would create additional disorder in a fair that is already characterized by the robust and unrestrained participation of hundreds of thousands of wandering fairgoers. If fairgoers can make speeches, engage in face-to-face proselytizing, and buttonhole prospective supporters, they can surely distribute literature to members of their audience without significantly adding to the state's asserted crowd control problem. The record is devoid of any evidence that the 125-acre fairgrounds could not accommodate peripatetic distributors of literature just as easily as it now accommodates peripatetic speechmakers and proselytizers.

Relying on a general, speculative fear of disorder, the State of Minnesota has placed a significant restriction on respondents' ability to exercise core First Amendment rights. This restriction is not narrowly drawn to advance the state's interests, and for that reason is unconstitutional.

Justice BLACKMUN, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

For the reasons stated by Justice Brennan, I believe that Minnesota State Fair

Rule 6.05 is unconstitutional as applied to the distribution of literature. I also agree, however, that the rule is constitutional as applied to the sale of literature and the solicitation of funds. I reach this latter conclusion by a different route than does Justice Brennan, for I am not persuaded that, under the Court's precedents, the state's interest in protecting fairgoers from fraudulent solicitation or sales practices justifies Rule 6.05's restrictions of those activities.

In Village of Schaumburg v. Citizens for a Better Environment, the Court stressed that a community's interest in preventing fraudulent solicitations must be met by narrowly drawn regulations that do not unnecessarily interfere with First Amendment freedoms. There is nothing in this record to suggest that it is more difficult to police fairgrounds for fraudulent solicitations than it is to police an entire community's streets; just as fraudulent solicitors may "melt into a crowd" at the fair, so also may door-to-door solicitors quickly move on after consummating several transactions in a particular neighborhood. Indeed, since respondents have offered to wear identifying tags, and since the fairgrounds are an enclosed area, it is at least arguable that it is easier to police the fairgrounds than a community's streets.

Nonetheless, I believe that the state's substantial interest in maintaining crowd control and safety on the fairgrounds does justify Rule 6.05's restriction on solicitation and sales activities not conducted from a booth. As the Court points out, "[t]he flow of the crowd and demands of safety are more pressing in the context of the Fair" than in the context of a typical street. While I agree with Justice Brennan that the State's interest in order does not justify restrictions upon distribution of literature, I think that common-sense differences between literature distribution, on the one hand, and solicitation and sales, on the other, suggest that the latter activities present greater crowd control problems than the former.

COMMENT

1. Heffron held that the restriction by a state entity on distribution, sales, and solicitation activities to a fixed site was a permissible time, place, and manner regulation. What are the characteristics of a valid time, place, and manner regulation?

Justice White identifies four such characteristics: 1) the restriction cannot be based on either the content or subject matter of the speech. 2) A valid time, place, and manner regulation must serve a significant governmental interest. (What significant governmental interest was served by the regulation in Heffron?) 3) A time, place, and manner regulation is not valid if the state could accomplish its purpose by less drastic means. (Were less drastic means open to the Minnesota State Fair?) 4) A time, place, and manner regulation is valid if alternative forums exist for the purpose of communicating the expression which is limited by the regulation in controversy. (Were such alternative forums present in the Heffron context?)

2. It should be borne in mind by the student that analysis of whether the characteristics of a valid time, place, and manner regulation will vary from context to context. In a dissent in Metromedia, Inc. v. City of San Diego, text, p. 174, Chief Justice Burger observed:

The uniqueness of the medium, the availability of alternative means of communication, and the public interest the regulation serves are important factors to be weighed; and the balance very well may shift when attention is turned from one medium to another. Heffron v. International Society for Krishna Consciousness, Inc. Regulating newspapers, for example, is vastly different from regulating billboards.

Is it likely that the characteristics of a valid time, place, and manner regulation will be found to be present more readily in a newspaper context or a billboard context? See Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Pittsburgh Commission on Human Relations, 413 U.S. 376 (1973), where a municipal regulation prohibiting sex-designated want ad columns in a newspaper was upheld.

Parades and Demonstrations and the Duty to Obey the Void Judicial Order

1. Walker v. City of Birmingham, 388 U.S. 307 (1967), an important First Amendment case, arose out of the black civil rights protest movement of the 1960s. Just before Easter 1963, eight black ministers, including the late Dr. Martin Luther King, were arrested and held in contempt for leading civil rights marches in Birmingham on Easter in defiance of an ex parte injunction banning all marches, parades, sit-ins, or other demonstrations in violation of the Birmingham parade ordinance. The petitioners contended that the ordinance required a grant of permission from city administrators who had made it clear no permission would be granted. The state courts held that petitioners could not violate the injunction and later challenge its validity. The Supreme Court, per Justice Potter Stewart, affirmed the conviction, 5-4. Justices Warren, Douglas, Brennan, and Abe Fortas dissented. All but Fortas wrote a separate dissent.

The heart of the holding in Walker is that even if both the ordinance and the injunction raised substantial constitutional issues, petitioners could only successfully raise those issues by moving to modify or dissolve the injunction, not by disobeying it and then defending against contempt charges on constitutional grounds.

Justice Stewart pointed out that "this is not a case where the injunction was transparently invalid or had only a frivolous pretense to validity." While the language of the Birmingham ordinance might present substantial First Amendment questions, it could not be held invalid on its face. If petitioners, instead of proceeding without a permit, had sought a judicial decree from the state courts interpreting the parade ordinance, the Court might have offered a narrow, "saving" construction, as had the state courts in Poulos v. New Hampshire.

A fundamental reason for the decision in Walker appears to be that initial obedience is required of even unconstitutional court decrees, like the injunction in Walker, even though the same is not required of an unconstitutional ordinance or statute. Chief Justice Warren observed in caustic dissent in Walker that petitioners are "convicted and sent to jail because the patently unconstitutional ordinance was copied into an injunction." Further, the injunction was ex parte and unlimited as to time.

We have seen cases where the Court has held that an unconstitutional statute need not be obeyed. This is so, even where an ordinance explicitly requires a permit to engage in some form of communication. See Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516 (1945), and Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U.S. 444 (1938), text, p. 34.

Justice Douglas, in his dissenting opinion, directly confronted the civil disobedience issue in Walker. An unconstitutional court decree, he said, is no less invalid than an unconstitutional statute. "It can and should be flouted in the manner of the ordinance itself." The facts of the Walker case, most of which were excluded from evidence during the hearing on contempt charges, indicated that the city officials had no intention of ever granting a permit to petitioners, said Justice Douglas. Not only was the parade ordinance probably invalid on its face, but it was enforced in a discriminatory manner to prevent civil rights advocates from exercising their right, guaranteed by the First Amendment, to assemble peacefully and petition for redress of grievances. Affirmance of contempt convictions in such a case, he concluded, could only undermine respect for law, since "[t]he 'constitutional freedom' of which the Court speaks can be won only if judges honor the Constitution."

Justice Brennan filed the third dissenting opinion in Walker. In Justice Brennan's view, the Court was faced with the collision between Alabama's interest in enforcing judicial decrees and the petitioners' First Amendment rights of speech and peaceful assembly. In such a conflict, Brennan said, the Supremacy Clause of the United States Constitution demands that the First Amendment interests be given greater weight. Furthermore, in safeguarding First Amendment rights from invalid prior restraints, the Court ought to be even more suspicious of prior restraints contained in ex parte injunctions than in "presumably carefully considered, even if hopelessly invalid," statutes. Instead, he said, the Court in Walker abandoned its protective function in the First Amendment area and threw its support to the Alabama court decree, a "devastatingly destructive weapon for suppression of cherished freedoms. * * *"

Justice Brennan also pointed to several weaknesses in the Court's argument. The Alabama decree contained no time limitation whatsoever. It was not really "temporary" at all. Secondly, the Court's insistence that petitioners challenge the injunction in court first and march later was in head-on conflict with the Court's own First Amendment doctrine that where an invalid prior restraint is imposed, freedom of speech can not be served if exercise of that freedom is forcibly deferred pending the outcome of lengthy judicial review. Brennan emphasized the factual context of the Walker case: a civil rights campaign was planned which was intended to have its climax in a series of marches on Easter weekend. To require petitioners to drop their organizing efforts and spend weeks, months, or years in state and federal courts was to blink at the realities of their situation.

Notice that despite the strong protests by the dissenting justices, the Walker majority refused to consider the parade ordinance invalid on its face. The Court's reliance on Howat v. Kansas, 258 U.S. 181 (1922), seems to indicate that even an injunction invalid on its face must be obeyed pending judicial review. If this is so, how does (or might) the Court answer the claim by the dissenting justices that such a ruling opens the door for local officials to impose prior restraint simply by incorporating unconstitutional ordinances into binding judicial decrees?

The Walker decision was 5-to-4. Justice Black, who had dissented in Poulos, cast a deciding vote in Walker to sustain contempt convictions in the face of the vague, overbroad, limitless injunction. Black may have considered the integrity of the judicial process, even when, as in Walker, it may have been greatly abused, to be of such a high importance that it outweighed even First Amendment interests. This point of view is in contrast with Justice Douglas's statement that judges, no less than legislators or administrators, must honor the Constitution.

2. Compare Walker v. City of Birmingham with Thomas v. Collins. In each case a statute which was arguably invalid formed the basis for an injunction which prohibited the exercise of free speech. In each, a person violated the injunction without first taking steps to have it modified or dissolved and without making a serious effort to comply with the requirements of the ordinance on which the injunction was based. When faced with contempt charges, each person sought to defend on the grounds that the underlying ordinance was unconstitutional. In Thomas, that argument succeeded; the Supreme Court held that statute invalid and ruled that the contempt conviction could not stand. In Walker, there was an opposite result. Why? The Texas statute challenged in Thomas sought to regulate pure speech, while the Birmingham statute in Walker purported to regulate the use of public streets. Would this difference be determinative? The majority opinion in Walker did not mention Thomas v. Collins.

Walker v. Birmingham raises, in a First Amendment context, the issue of whether an order of a lower court which almost certainly will be reversed on appeal must be obeyed by the parties subject to it until the order is set aside by a higher court. This is an issue of great significance to the journalist. In United States v. Dickinson, 465 F.2d 496 (5th Cir. 1972), cert. den. 414 U.S. 979 (1973), a federal court of appeals upheld a criminal contempt citation for violation of a "gag" rule imposed by a federal district judge despite the appeals court's view that the "gag" was a violation of the First Amendment. The court of appeals relied on Walker for its decision that even an unconstitutional court order must be obeyed until it is reversed. See discussion of the Dickinson case in this text, p. 499.

3. Two years after it decided Walker v. City of Birmingham, the Supreme Court considered a different case arising out of the identical facts. The case was Shuttlesworth v. City of Birmingham, 394 U.S. 147 (1969). This time, the question was whether Rev. Walker and Rev. Shuttlesworth, et al. could be convicted of violating Birmingham's parade ordinance, a part of the city's general code. Petitioners had knowingly violated the ordinance, but they claimed, as they had in Walker, that their action was not punishable because the ordinance itself was invalid on its face and discriminatorily applied to deny First Amendment rights. Nevertheless, they were found guilty of violating the parade ordinance and received stiff jail sentences (Rev. Shuttlesworth, for instance, was sentenced to 138 days at hard labor).

A state appeals court reversed, holding that the parade ordinance was an unconstitutional prior restraint upon First Amendment rights since it granted city officials unlimited discretion to grant or deny parade permits. However, the Alabama Supreme Court reinstated the convictions by providing a curative gloss to the parade ordinance. The parade ordinance, said the state supreme court, did not confer discretionary powers upon local officials to withhold parade permits on a discriminatory basis. Rather, it directed them merely to regulate use of the public streets consistent with the goal of insuring public access to public thoroughways.

This, despite the fact that the parade ordinance provided that the city commission could deny a permit whenever it determined that "the public welfare, peace, safety, health, decency, good order, morals or convenience require." The process by which this language was narrowed by the Supreme Court of Alabama to make the parade ordinance a traffic measure received a backhanded compliment from Justice Stewart in his opinion for the Court: "It is true that in affirming the petitioner's conviction in the present case, the Supreme Court of Alabama performed a remarkable job of plastic surgery upon the face of the ordinance."

By transforming the parade ordinance into a traffic-management ordinance, the Alabama court attempted to avert constitutional problems in much the same way that the New Hampshire court had done in Poulos v. New Hampshire, 345 U.S. 395 (1953). The Alabama court also acted on the suggestion of the Court in Walker v. City of Birmingham that a narrow interpretation of the parade ordinance might save it from First Amendment attack. However, even the strenuous effort of the Alabama court to rescue the Birmingham ordinance from constitutional infirmity failed to persuade the Supreme Court to uphold the convictions when Shuttlesworth came up for review.

Justice Stewart speaking for the Court, in an interesting twist from his opinion in

Walker, first pointed out that the parade ordinance was, as written, invalid on its face. This was precisely the contention which he had rejected in Walker. Now, however, Justice Stewart held:

There can be no doubt that the Birmingham ordinance, as it was written, conferred upon the city commission virtually unbridled and absolute power [to control the issuance of permits for marches or demonstrations in the city]. * * * This ordinance * * * fell squarely within the ambit of the many decisions of this Court over the last 30 years, holding that a law subjecting the exercise of First Amendment freedoms to the prior restraint of a license, without narrow, objective, and definite standards to guide the licensing authority, is unconstitutional.

Justice Stewart next dealt with the state's argument that that standard is not applicable where the regulation under challenge deals with speech plus, i.e., the use of public streets. Although recognizing the state interest in regulating the use of its public ways, the Court ruled that a licensing system implementing that interest must adhere to constitutional standards. An overbroad, vague licensing scheme vesting local officials with limitless discretion over the use of city streets does not square with those standards even though speech plus is involved.

The real question, said Stewart, was whether the parade ordinance was to be obeyed in 1963, notwithstanding the gloss which was put upon the ordinance by the state court four years later.

The Court concluded that Birmingham's parade ordinance, as it was implemented and enforced by Birmingham officials in 1963, was invalid and a denial of First Amendment rights. Petitioners were, therefore, entitled to ignore the parade ordinance and could not be criminally prosecuted for that decision. Justice Stewart described the ministers' unsuccessful efforts to obtain a parade permit from adamant city officials.

The petitioner was clearly given to understand that under no circumstance would he and his group be permitted to demonstrate in Birmingham, not that a demonstration would be approved if a time and place were selected that would minimize traffic problems. * * [I]t is evident that the ordinance was administered so as * * * "to deny or unwarrantedly abridge the right of assembly and the opportunities for the communication of thought * * * immemorially associated with resort to public places."

Because Birmingham city officials interpreted and implemented the parade ordinance in a fashion consistent with its broad discretionary language, Rev. Shuttlesworth was justified in taking them at their word and acting accordingly. Notwithstanding the state supreme court's effort to save the parade ordinance, it was unconstitutional in 1963, and petitioners could not be punished for violating it under those circumstances.

Justice John Marshall Harlan's concurring opinion took issue with what he called the "seeds of mischief" contained in the opinion of the Court.

The important point, said Harlan, was whether the petitioners could have had a prompt judicial remedy under the special circumstances of their civil rights protest. Harkening back to Justice Frankfurter's concurring opinion in Poulos, Justice Harlan noted that here, as contrasted with Poulos, a timely remedy to force issuance of the parade permit was probably out of the question. Had petitioners sought a writ of mandamus to require the Birmingham City Commission to issue a parade permit, they could not have succeeded in time for the Easter demonstrations, and under Alabama law there is no provision for expeditious review of such a petition:

Given the absence of speedy procedures, the Rev. Shuttlesworth and his associates were faced with a serious dilemma. * * * If they attempted to exhaust the administrative and judicial remedies provided by Alabama law, it was almost certain that no effective relief could be obtained by Good Friday. * * * With fundamental rights at stake, he was entitled to adopt the more probable meaning of the ordinance and act on his belief that the city's permit regulations were unconstitutional.

It was not enough, Justice Harlan argued, that petitioner should rely merely upon the attitude of a local official and his interpretation of the parade ordinance. If a speedy and effective remedy had been available, petitioners would have been obligated to pursue that remedy before breaking the law, Harlan said. But in this case, on these facts, such a course would have blocked the exercise of First Amendment rights with no promise of effective relief. It was therefore excused, and the convictions could not stand.

Unlike Justice Stewart and the rest of the Court, Justice Harlan was not prepared to concede that the principle of cases such as Lovell v. Griffin, text, p. 34, involving licensing of pure speech, should be extended to cover ordinances such as the Birmingham parade statute, which regulated speech plus conduct. Regulation of the use of city streets was "a particularly important state interest." Even if such a regulation were deemed invalid on its face or as applied, perhaps citizens should be less free to ignore that regulation entirely than they would be to ignore an ordinance regulating pure speech.

In Shuttlesworth, the Supreme Court vindicated at least some of the points advanced by the four dissenters in Walker. The Birmingham parade ordinance was unconstitutional on its face and as applied—a decision the Court had refused to make in Walker just two years earlier. In reversing the petitioners' convictions for violating the parade ordinance, the Court did precisely what Chief Justice Warren had envisioned: it ruled that punishment for violating the ordinance could not stand, but (because of Walker) disobedience to the command of an identical prohibition, in a court decree, could be punished as contempt. In Shuttlesworth, Justice Stewart contended in a brief footnote that "[t]he legal and constitutional issues involved in the Walker case were quite different from those involved here." How would you support or take issue with that assertion?

In Walker, Chief Justice Warren dissented pointing out that the Birmingham ordinance on its face directed local officials to refuse parade permits on any number of broad, discretionary, vague grounds. Thus, a state court could "save" the Birmingham ordinance only "by repealing some of its language." Is this in fact what the Alabama Supreme Court did in Shuttlesworth?

Picketing, Handbilling, and State Action: The Collision Points Between Freedom of Expression and Property Rights

THORNHILL v. ALABAMA

[EDITORIAL NOTE

Thornhill was a First Amendment case which arose out of a local labor dispute at an Alabama factory. Thornhill, a union organizer, was arrested and convicted of a misdemeanor for violating a state antipicketing law which made it a crime for:

* * * any person or persons * * * without a just cause or legal excuse therefore, [to] go near to or loiter about the * * * place of business of any other person, firm, corporation, [etc.] * * * for the purpose, or with the intent of influencing, or inducing other persons not to trade with, buy from, sell to, have business dealings with or be employed by [that business] * * * State Code of 1923, § 3448.

The same section also prohibited picketing under the same circumstances.

Thornhill's conviction was upheld by the Alabama courts. The United States Supreme Court reversed his conviction and held the right to picket protected by the First Amendment. Justice James McReynolds was the lone dissenter.

Thornhill was arrested when, as part of a small picket line, he peacefully advised would-be strikebreakers to go home and not to cross the picket line. The plant where this took place was part of a company town in which most plant employees lived. The picket line was on private property, as was most of the town].

Justice MURPHY delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * The existence of such a statute, which readily lends itself to harsh and discriminatory enforcement by local prosecuting officials, against particular groups deemed to merit their displeasure, results in a continuous and pervasive restraint on all freedom of discussion that might reasonably be regarded as within its purview. It is not any less effective or, if the restraint is not permissible, less pernicious than the restraint on freedom of discussion imposed by the threat of censorship. An accused, after arrest and conviction under such a statute, does not have to sustain the burden of demonstrating that the State could not constitutionally have written a different and specific statute covering his activities as disclosed by the charge and the evidence introduced against him. * *

The vague contours of the term "picket" are nowhere delineated. Employees or others, accordingly, may be found to be within the purview of the term and convicted for engaging in activities identical with those proscribed by the first offense. In sum, whatever the means used to publicize the facts of a labor dispute, whether by printed sign, by pamphlet, by word of mouth or otherwise, all such activity without exception is within the inclusive prohibition of the statute so long as it occurs in the vicinity of the scene of the dispute.

* * * We think that Section 3448 is invalid on its face.

In the circumstances of our times the dissemination of information concerning the facts of a labor dispute must be regarded as within that area of free discussion that is guaranteed by the Constitution. * * * Free discussion concerning the conditions in industry and the causes of labor disputes appears to us indispensable to the effective and intelligent use of the processes of popular government to shape the destiny of modern industrial society. * * *

The range of activities proscribed by Section 3448, whether characterized as picketing or loitering or otherwise, embraces nearly every practicable, effective means whereby those interested—including the employees directly affected—may enlighten the public on the nature and causes of a labor dispute. The safeguarding of these means is essential to the securing of an informed and educated public opinion with respect to a matter which is of public concern. It may be that effective exercise of the means of advancing public knowledge may persuade some of those reached to refrain from entering into advantageous relations with the business establishment which is the scene of the dispute. Every expression of opinion on matters that are important has the potentiality of inducing action in the interests of one rather than another group in society. But the group in power at any moment may not impose penal sanctions on peaceful and truthful discussion of matters of public interest merely on a showing that others may thereby be persuaded to take action inconsistent with its interests. Abridgment of the liberty of such discussion can be justified only where the clear danger of substantive evils arises under circumstances affording no opportunity to test the merits of ideas by competition for acceptance in the market of public opinion. We hold that the danger of injury to an industrial concern is neither so serious nor so imminent as to justify the sweeping proscription of freedom of discussion embodied in Section 3448.

COMMENT

1. If Alabama desired to guard against violent picketing or harassment of potential customers by union threats, the state could under the First Amendment draft a statute designed to meet such situations. The Alabama antipicketing law made no attempt to consider factors which would distinguish the Thornhill picket line from other, more dangerous situations, nor did it consider the number of people gathered at the picket line, the potentiality of violence and harm to passersby, the accuracy of the information which the union was imparting to the public, and the nature of the union dispute.

The statute covered all situations indiscriminately. Since some activities covered by the statute were unquestionably examples of peaceful expression, the statute in its broad sweep could not stand. Enforcement of the statute only in special cases could not repair the fatal defect which the statute bore on its face. And selective enforcement with its potential for discrimination poses a special threat to First Amendment freedom.

2. It is a principle of due process adjudication that criminal statutes should be drawn so that the class affected by them are sufficiently apprised of the conduct expected of them in order that they may comply with the statute and avoid its sanction. This principle is sometimes called the "vagueness" doctrine. See generally, Amsterdam, The Void for Vagueness Doctrine, 109 U.Pa.L.Rev. 67 (1960).

Thornhill demonstrates the use of a related constitutional principle: the doctrine of overbreadth. A statute is defectively overbroad when it reaches and proscribes activities which are constitutionally protected as well as activities which are not. The statute in Thornhill is also defectively vague. Note that the Court observed that the term "picket" was inadequately defined. Vagueness is a major First Amendment doctrine, but it has its roots in the notice requirements of procedural due process. If people do not know what is expected of them, it is not fair to punish them. Furthermore, if they do not know what is expected of them, they may fear to engage in the vigorous exercise of First Amendment rights. In a sense, the First Amendment concern to prevent restraints which inhibit freedom of expression and the concern for fairness which is implemented by the constitutional doctrine of procedural due process coalesce in the vagueness doctrine. A Roman law maxim was "Nulla poena sine lege" (no penalty without a law). Does this ancient legal concept help explain the vagueness doctrine? Is it possible for a statute to be defectively overbroad but not overly vague?

3. The thrust of Thornhill was that the antipicketing section of the Alabama Code was overly broad but that a more narrowly drawn statute might pass constitutional muster under the First Amendment:

We are not now concerned with picketing en masse or otherwise conducted which might occasion such imminent and aggravated danger to state interests in preventing breaches of the peace * * * as to justify a statute narrowly drawn to cover the precise situation giving rise to the danger.

But the Alabama antipicketing law made no attempt to balance the First Amendment against any state interest. The valuable contribution of Thornhill to First Amendment law was that it made clear, by extending First Amendment protection to picketing, that nonverbal communication merited First Amendment protection, albeit in a nonabsolute form.

Picketing, Private Property, and the Public Forum: The State Action Problem

1. In Amalgamated Food Employees Local 590 v. Logan Valley Plaza, Inc., 391 U.S. 308 (1968), the Supreme Court refused, per Justice Thurgood Marshall, to enjoin informational picketing in a private shopping center. Logan Valley, therefore, subjected privately owned property to First Amendment obligation as the Supreme Court had done only once before in Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501 (1946). In Marsh, the exercise of First Amendment rights had been recognized in a company-owned town where alternative means of communication for the matter to be communicated were not available. Speaking for the Court in Logan Valley, Justice Marshall said:

All we decide here is that because the shopping center serves as the community business block "and is freely accessible and open to the people in the area and those passing through," Marsh v. State of Alabama, 326 U.S., at 508, the state may not delegate the power through the use of its trespass laws, wholly to exclude those members of the public wishing to exercise their First Amendment rights on the premises in a manner and for a purpose generally consonant with the use to which the property is actually put.

The classic idea of American constitutionalism is the view that the constitution runs against government. If one relies on the Bill of Rights directly, one encounters the language, for example, of the First Amendment ("Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press * * *"). If, on the other hand, one relies on the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, one meets the following language: "* * * nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." This introduces the need for "State action" if a Fourteenth Amendment violation is to be found. This also explains the effort of the Supreme Court in both Marsh and Amalgamated to view the company-town street and the shopping center parking lot as "quasi-public." (Why is the Court reluctant to come right out and say that First Amendment considerations apply to private property?)

Private concentrations of power, such as the nationwide chains of daily newspapers (most papers are located in one newspaper towns), and the networks which supply the programming for much of radio and television broadcasting throughout the country are, therefore, in the classic view, immune from constitutional obligation altogether. This idea, as applied to the privately owned media, was given renewed life in CBS v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. 94 (1973). See text, p. 858.

But decisions like Marsh and Amalgamated suggest that the capacity of "private governments" to elude constitutional obligation to provide freedom of expression is not infinite after all. The Marsh case in 1946 was a surprising breakthrough, but, in a sense, it was ahead of its time. It never blossomed forth into an important or pioneering constitutional doctrine in any meaningful way until the decision of the Amalgamated Food Employees case in 1968.

2. For Justice Black, the First Amendment is meant to state what government cannot do, not what a private individual or corporation must do. As a matter of history this view is probably accurate. As a matter of making the goals of freedom of expression and community enlightenment a reality, the question is does such an approach any longer have contemporary relevance? See Justice Douglas's concurring opinion in CBS v. Democratic Nation- al Committee, 412 U.S. 94 (1973). See this text, p. 865.

In Justice Marshall's opinion for the Court in Amalgamated, the following observations appear:

The picketing carried on by petitioners was directed specifically at patrons of the Weis Market located within the shopping center and the message sought to be conveyed to the public concerned the manner in which that particular market was being operated. We are, therefore, not called upon to consider whether respondents' property rights could, consistently with the First Amendment, justify a bar on picketing which was not thus directly related in its purpose to the use to which the shopping center property was being put.

Did the distinction Justice Marshall attempted to draw between protest picketing where the site of the protest is related to the object of the protest and where the site is unrelated to the object of the protest make sense? Note that the Supreme Court in Amalgamated Food Employees did not rule on the constitutional significance of this distinction.

3. Lloyd Corp., Limited v. Tanner, 407 U.S. 551 (1972), answered the question which Justice Marshall raised but did not answer in Amalgamated Food Employees: Could the owner of a private shopping center prohibit protest in the form of distribution of handbills on his premises when the object of the protest (hostility to the Vietnam War) did not have a direct relationship to the shopping center? The Supreme Court in Lloyd Corp. held that there must be a relationship between the object of the protest and the site of the protest before there can be any right to use private property for purposes of free expression.

In Lloyd Corp., the four Nixon appointees to the Supreme Court, Powell, Blackmun, Rehnquist, and Burger, joined with Kennedy appointee, White, to hold that there must be a relationship between object and site of the protest. The Lloyd Corp. case marks a retreat from what had previously been a steady extension by the courts of the state action concept to the exercise of First Amendment rights on private property.

4. In Amalgamated Food Employees, Justice Marshall, speaking for the Court, had made a fairly radical statement: "[P]roperty that is privately owned may at least, for First Amendment purposes, be treated as though it were publicly held." The Lloyd Corp. case took much of the force out of this statement. It is true that Logan Valley was not reversed in Lloyd Corp., and that the Court professed allegiance to the doctrine of Amalgamated Food Employees insofar as, under its facts, it authorized the exercise of First Amendment rights on private property so long as the exercise of those rights related to the site of the protest. Nevertheless, the concept that First Amendment obligations only run to governmental institutions received new vigor as a result of the Lloyd Corp. case. Consider the following analysis of the Lloyd Corp. case:

* * * [F]ree expression is now likely to be considered less important than whether the site chosen (for its exercise) is private or public property. The majority of the Court denied that the property of a large shopping center is "open to the public" in the same way as is the "business district" of a city, and that a member of the public could exercise the same rights of free expression in a shopping mall that he could in "similar public facilities in the streets of a city or town." Barron, Freedom Of The Press For Whom? 106 (1973).

5. The Lloyd case left the Logan Valley case just barely alive. However, in Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507 (1976), the Supreme Court overruled Logan Valley.

The Hudgens Court buried Justice Marshall's attempted distinction in Logan Valley between situations where the object of the protest was related to the site and situations where the object of the protest was unrelated to the site. The key to understanding the decision of the Court in Hudgens appears to be that First Amendment obligation does not run to private property. As the Hudgens Court conceived it, if the fact that a particular protest was related to the site of protest imposed First Amendment obligations on the owner of the site, then First Amendment determinations were being made on the basis of analyzing the content of the protest. The Court proclaimed that First Amendment adjudication had to be content-neutral.

In Hudgens, the Court, in order to maintain a content-neutral approach to the First Amendment, approved a prohibition by the owner of a shopping center against labor union picketing on its premises. Professor Redish has observed that "the equality principle and the values of free expression conflict." Why? Consider the following:

Those with greater resources and more power will invariably possess greater access to the media, and therefore to the public, than will those less well situated. These factors may be cited as reasons why a seemingly neutral restriction on picketing should in reality be found to discriminate (and, therefore, constitute a violation of the equality principle). Those with greater resources and power do not need to picket to express their views; those lacking such advantages do. But it would be absurd to think that allowing individuals to picket produces anything approaching equality.

Do you think Marsh v. Alabama, text, p. 52, survives Hudgens? Probably, Marsh does survive Hudgens since the Hudgens Court relied on Justice Black's dissent in Logan Valley. In Logan Valley, Justice Black distinguished Marsh, a decision which he had authored, on the ground that in Marsh, unlike the shopping center situations, the private property involved was truly quasi public in that there the company town had "taken all the attributes of a town."

In a conflict between property rights and the exercise of First Amendment rights, shouldn't the edge be given to the exercise of First Amendment rights? Does the Hudgens decision reflect the new deference shown to property values as against free expression values on the part of the Burger Court—at least as compared to the Warren Court?

A Logan Valley-type response to whether private property can be used as a public response still endures in California on the basis of the state constitutional guarantee of freedom of expression. See PruneYard Shopping Center v. Robins, text, p. 179.

CAREY v. BROWN

Justice BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

At issue in this case is the constitutionality under the First and Fourteenth Amendments of a state statute that bars all picketing of residences or dwellings, but exempts from its prohibition "the peaceful picketing of a place of employment involved in a labor dispute."

On September 7, 1977, several of the appellees, all of whom are members of a civil rights organization entitled the Committee Against Racism, participated in a peaceful demonstration on the public sidewalk in front of the home of Michael Bilandic, then Mayor of Chicago, protesting his alleged failure to support the busing of school children to achieve racial integration. They were arrested and charged with Unlawful Residential Picketing in violation of Ill.Rev.Stat., ch. 38, § 21.1-2, which provides:

It is unlawful to picket before or about the residence or dwelling of any person, except when the residence or dwelling is used as a place of business. However, this article does not apply to a person peacefully picketing his own residence or dwelling and does not prohibit the peaceful picketing of a place of employment involved in a labor dispute or the place of holding a meeting or assembly on premises commonly used to discuss subjects of general public interest.

Appellees pleaded guilty to the charge and were sentenced to periods of supervision ranging from 6 months to a year.

In April 1978, appellees commenced this lawsuit in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, seeking a declaratory judgment that the Illinois Residential Picketing Statute is unconstitutional on its face and as applied, and an injunction prohibiting appellants—various state, county, and city officials—from enforcing the statute.

* * * (T)his Court has had occasion to consider the constitutionality of an enactment selectively proscribing peaceful picketing on the basis of the placard's message. Police Department of Chicago v. Mosley [408 U.S. 92 (1972)], arose out of a challenge to a Chicago ordinance that prohibited picketing in front of any school other than one "involved in a labor dispute." We held that the ordinance violated the Equal Protection Clause because it impermissibly distinguished between labor picketing and all other peaceful picketing without any showing that the latter was "clearly more disruptive" than the former. [W]e find the Illinois Residential Picketing Statute at issue in the present case constitutionally indistinguishable from the ordinance invalidated in Mosley.

There can be no doubt that in prohibiting peaceful picketing on the public streets and sidewalks in residential neighborhoods, the Illinois statute regulates expressive conduct that falls within the First Amendment's preserve.

Nor can it be seriously disputed that in exempting from its general prohibition only the "peaceful picketing of a place of employment involved in a labor dispute," the Illinois statute discriminates between lawful and unlawful conduct based upon the content of the demonstrator's communications. On its face, the act accords preferential treatment to the expression of views on one particular subject; information about labor disputes may be freely disseminated, but discussion of all other issues is restricted. The permissibility of residential picketing under the Illinois statute is thus dependent solely on the nature of the message being conveyed.

In these critical respects, then, the Illinois statute is identical to the ordinance in Mosley, and it suffers from the same constitutional infirmities. When government regulation discriminates among speech-related activities in a public forum, the Equal Protection Clause mandates that the legislation be finely tailored to serve substantial state interests, and the justifications offered for any distinctions it draws must be carefully scrutinized. Yet here, under the guise of preserving residential privacy, Illinois has flatly prohibited all nonlabor picketing even though it permits labor picketing that is equally likely to intrude on the tranquility of the home.

Moreover, it is the content of the speech that determines whether it is within or without the statute's blunt prohibition. What we said in Mosley has equal force in the present case:

Necessarily, then, under the Equal Protection Clause, not to mention the First Amendment itself, government may not grant the use of a forum to people whose views it finds acceptable, but deny use to those wishing to express less favored or more controversial views. And it may not select which issues are worth discussing or debating in public facilities. There is an "equality of status in the field of ideas," and government must afford all points of view an equal opportunity to be heard.

Once a forum is opened up to assembly or speaking by some groups, government may not prohibit others from assembling or speaking on the basis of what they intend to say. Selective exclusions from a public forum may not be based on content alone, and may not be justified by reference to content alone.

Appellants nonetheless contend that this case is distinguishable from Mosley. They argue that the state interests here are especially compelling and particularly well-served by a statute that accords differential treatment to labor and nonlabor picketing. We explore in turn each of these interests, and the manner in which they are said to be furthered by this statute.

Appellants explain that whereas the Chicago ordinance sought to prevent disruption of the schools, concededly a "substantial" and "legitimate" governmental concern, the Illinois statute was enacted to ensure privacy in the home, a right which appellants view as paramount in our constitutional scheme. For this reason, they contend that the same content-based distinctions held invalid in the Mosley context may be upheld in the present case.

We find it unnecessary, however, to consider whether the state's interest in residential privacy outranks its interest in quiet schools in the hierarchy of societal values. For even the most legitimate goal may not be advanced in a constitutionally impermissible manner. And though we might agree that certain state interests may be so compelling that where no adequate alternatives exist a content-based distinction—if narrowly drawn—would be a permissible way of furthering those objectives, this is not such a case.

First, the generalized classification which the statute draws suggests that Illinois itself has determined that residential privacy is not a transcendent objective: While broadly permitting all peaceful labor picketing notwithstanding the disturbances it would undoubtedly engender, the statute makes no attempt to distinguish among various sorts of nonlabor picketing on the basis of the harms they would inflict on the privacy interest. The apparent over- and underinclusiveness of the statute's restriction would seem largely to undermine appellants' claim that the prohibition of all nonlabor picketing can be justified by reference to the state's interest in maintaining domestic tranquility.

More fundamentally, the exclusion for labor picketing cannot be upheld as a means of protecting residential privacy for the simple reason that nothing in the content-based labor-nonlabor distinction has any bearing whatsoever on privacy. Appellants can point to nothing inherent in the nature of peaceful labor picketing that would make it any less disruptive of residential privacy than peaceful picketing on issues of broader social concern. Standing alone, then, the state's asserted interest in promoting the privacy of the home is not sufficient to save the statute.

The second important objective advanced by appellants in support of the statute is the state's interest in providing special protection for labor protests. The central difficulty with this argument is that it forthrightly presupposes that labor picketing is more deserving of First Amendment protection than are public protests over other issues, particularly the important economic, social, and political subjects which these appellees wish to demonstrate. We reject that proposition.

Appellants' final contention is that the statute can be justified by some combination of the preceding objectives. This argument is fashioned on two different levels. In its elemental formulation, it posits simply that a distinction between labor and nonlabor picketing is uniquely suited to furthering the legislative judgment that residential privacy should be preserved to the greatest extent possible without also compromising the special protection owing to labor picketing. In short, the statute is viewed as a reasonable attempt to accommodate the competing rights of the homeowner to enjoy his privacy and the employee to demonstrate over labor disputes. But this attempt to justify the statute hinges on the validity of both of these goals, and we have already concluded that the latter—the desire to favor one form of speech over all others—is illegitimate.

The second and more complex formulation of appellants' position characterizes the statute as a carefully drafted attempt to prohibit that picketing which would impinge on residential privacy while permitting that picketing which would not. In essence, appellants assert that the exception for labor picketing does not contravene the State's interest in preserving residential tranquility because of the unique character of a residence that is a "place of employment." By "inviting" a worker into his home and converting that dwelling into a place of employment, the argument goes, the resident has diluted his entitlement to total privacy.

The flaw in this argument is that it proves too little. Numerous types of peaceful picketing other than labor picketing would have but a negligible impact on privacy interests, and numerous other actions of a homeowner might constitute "nonresidential" uses of his property and would thus serve to vitiate the right to residential privacy.

We therefore conclude the appellants have not successfully distinguished Mosley. We are not to be understood to imply, however, that residential picketing is beyond the reach of uniform and nondiscriminatory regulation. For the right to communicate is not limitless.

Preserving the sanctity of the home, the one retreat to which men and women can repair to escape from the tribulations of their daily pursuits, is surely an important value. Our decisions reflect no lack of solicitude for the right of an individual "to be let alone" in the privacy of the home, "sometimes the last citadel of the tired, the weary, and the sick." The State's interest in protecting the well-being, tranquility, and privacy of the home is certainly of the highest order in a free and civilized society. "The crucial question, however, is whether [Illinois' statute] advances that objective in a manner consistent with the command of the Equal Protection Clause." Reed v. Reed, 404 U.S. [71], 76 (1971)." And because the statute discriminates among pickets based on the subject matter of their expression, the answer must be "No."

The complete language of the statute, set out accurately in the text of the Court's opinion, reveals a legislative scheme quite different from that described by the Court in its narrative paraphrasing of the enactment.

The statute provides that residential picketing is prohibited, but goes on to exempt four categories of residences from this general ban. First, if the residence is used as a "place of business" all peaceful picketing is allowed. Second, if the residence is being used to "hold[] a meeting or assembly on premises commonly used to discuss subjects of general public interest" all peaceful picketing is allowed. Third, if the residence is also used as a "place of employment" which is involved in a labor dispute, labor-related picketing is allowed. Finally, the statute provides that a resident is entitled to picket his own home. Thus it is clear that information about labor disputes may not be "freely disseminated" since labor picketing is restricted to a narrow category of residences. And Illinois has not "flatly prohibited all nonlabor picketing" since it allows nonlabor picketing at residences used as a place of business, residences used as public meeting places, and at an individual's own residence.

Only through this mischaracterization of the Illinois statute may the Court attempt to fit this case into the Mosley rule prohibiting regulation on the basis of "content alone." In contrast, the principal determinant of a person's right to picket a residence in Illinois is not content, as the Court suggests, but rather the character of the residence sought to be picketed. Content is relevant only in one of the categories established by the legislature.

The cases appropriate to the analysis therefore are those establishing the limits on a state's authority to impose time, place, and manner restrictions on speech activities. Under this rubric, even taking into account the limited content distinction made by the statute, Illinois has readily satisfied its constitutional obligation to draft statutes in conformity with First Amendment and equal protection principles. In fact, the very statute which the Court today cavalierly invalidates has been hailed by commentators as "an excellent model" of legislation achieving a delicate balance among rights to privacy, free expression, and equal protection. See Kamin, Residential Picketing and the First Amendment, 61 Nw.U.L.Rev. 177, 207 (1966); Comment, 34 U.Chi.L.Rev. 106, 139 (1966). The state legislators of the Nation will undoubtedly greet today's decision with nothing less than exasperation and befuddlement. Time after time, the states have been assured that they may properly promote residential privacy even though free expression must be reduced. To be sure, our decisions have adopted a virtual laundry list of "Don'ts" that must be adhered to in the process. Heading up that list of course is the rule that legislatures must curtail free expression through the "least restrictive means" consistent with the accomplishment of their purpose, and they must avoid standards which are either vague or capable of discretionary application. But somewhere, the Court says in these cases (with a reassuring pat on the head of the legislature) there is the constitutional pot of gold at the end of the rainbow of litigation.

Here, whether Illinois has drafted such a statute, avoiding an outright ban on all residential picketing, avoiding reliance on any vague or discretionary standards, and permitting categories of permissible picketing activity at residences where the state has determined the resident's own action have substantially reduced his interest in privacy, the Court in response confronts the state with the Catch-22 that the less-restrictive categories are constitutionally infirm under principles of equal protection. Under the Court's approach today, the state would fare better by adopting more restrictive means, a judicial incentive I had thought this Court would hesitate to afford. Either that, or uniform restrictions will be found invalid under the First Amendment and categorical exceptions found invalid under the Equal Protection Clause, with the result that speech and only speech will be entitled to protection. This can only mean that the hymns of praise in prior opinions celebrating carefully drawn statutes are no more than sympathetic clucking, and in fact the state is damned if it does and damned if it doesn't.

COMMENT

1. Is the statute in Carey invalid because residential picketing infringes on constitutionally protected privacy values? The statute is invalid, according to the Court, because it exempts from its general ban the peaceful picketing of a place of employment involved in a labor dispute. The Court criticized the preferential treatment by the legislature of a particular subject. Justice Rehnquist in dissent says this is not a content regulation. Why? Is it a subject category regulation?

2. Should a private residence ever be viewed as a public forum when picketing is the mode of expression chosen by the "speakers"?

3. In Consolidated Edison, the case which follows, the privacy values of the unwilling recipients—those who received inserts in their billing envelopes from a utility praising nuclear energy—were subordinated to the value of protecting the liberty of the speaker, the regulated utility. Why was the privacy value weighted so much more heavily by the Court in Carey? Was it that residential picketing presents a much greater burden on privacy values than does including an insert in a billing envelope?

CONSOLIDATED EDISON CO. v. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION

Justice POWELL delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question in this case is whether the First Amendment, as incorporated by the Fourteenth Amendment, is violated by an order of the Public Service Commission of the State of New York that prohibits the inclusion in monthly electric bills of inserts discussing controversial issues of public policy.

The Consolidated Edison Company of New York, appellant in this case, placed written material entitled "Independence Is Still a Goal, and Nuclear Power Is Needed To Win The Battle" in its January 1976 billing envelope. The bill insert stated Consolidated Edison's views on "the benefits of nuclear power," saying that they "far outweigh any potential risk" and that nuclear power plants are safe, economical, and clean. The utility also contended that increased use of nuclear energy would further this country's independence from foreign energy sources.

In March 1976, the Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc. (NRDC) requested Consolidated Edison to enclose a rebuttal prepared by NRDC in its next billing envelope. When Consolidated Edison refused, NRDC asked the Public Service Commission of the State of New York to open Consolidated Edison's billing envelopes to contrasting views on controversial issues of public importance.

On February 17, 1977, the commission, appellee here, denied NRDC's request but prohibited "utilities from using bill inserts to discuss political matters, including the desirability of future development of nuclear power." The commission explained its decision in a Statement of Policy on Advertising and Promotion Practices of Public Utilities issued on February 25, 1977. The commission concluded that Consolidated Edison customers who receive bills containing inserts are a captive audience of diverse views who should not be subjected to the utility's beliefs. Accordingly, the commission barred utility companies from including bill inserts that express "their opinions or viewpoints on controversial issues of public policy." The commission did not, however, bar utilities from sending bill inserts discussing topics that are not "controversial issues of public policy." The commission later denied petitions for rehearing filed by Consolidated Edison and other utilities.

The [New York] Court of Appeals held that the order did not violate the Constitution because it was a valid time, place, and manner regulation designed to protect the privacy of Consolidated Edison's customers. We noted probable jurisdiction. We reverse. The restriction on bill inserts cannot be upheld on the ground that Consolidated Edison is not entitled to freedom of speech. In First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti we rejected the contention that a state may confine corporate speech to specified issues.

In the mailing that triggered the regulation at issue, Consolidated Edison advocated the use of nuclear power. The commission has limited the means by which Consolidated Edison may participate in the public debate on this question and other controversial issues of national interest and importance. Thus, the commission's prohibition of discussion of controversial issues strikes at the heart of the freedom to speak.

The commission's ban on bill inserts is not, of course, invalid merely because it imposes a limitation upon speech. We must consider whether the state can demonstrate that its regulation is constitutionally permissible. The commission's arguments require us to consider three theories that might justify the state action. We must determine whether the prohibition is (i) a reasonable time, place, or manner restriction, (ii) a permissible subject-matter regulation, or (iii) a narrowly tailored means of serving a compelling state interest.

A restriction that regulates only the time, place or manner of speech may impose so long as it's reasonable. But when regulation is based on the content of speech, governmental action must be scrutinized more carefully to ensure that communication has not been prohibited "merely because public officials disapprove the speaker's views." As a consequence, we have emphasized that time, place, and manner regulations must be "applicable to all speech regardless of content."

The commission does not pretend that its action is unrelated to the content or subject matter of bill inserts. Indeed, it has undertaken to suppress certain bill inserts precisely because they address issues of public policy. The commission allows inserts that present information to consumers on certain subjects, such as energy conservation measures, but it forbids the use of inserts that discuss public controversies. The commission, with commendable candor, justifies its ban on the ground that consumers will benefit from receiving "useful" information, but not from the prohibited information. The commission's own rationale demonstrates that its action cannot be upheld as a content-neutral time, place, or manner regulation.

The commission next argues that its order is acceptable because it applies to all discussion of nuclear power, whether pro or con, in bill inserts. The prohibition, the commission contends, is related to subject matter rather than to the views of a particular speaker. Because the regulation does not favor either side of a political controversy, the commission asserts that it does not unconstitutionally suppress freedom of speech.

The First Amendment's hostility to content-based regulation extends not only to restrictions on particular viewpoints, but also to prohibition of public discussion of an entire topic. To allow a government the choice of permissible subjects for public debate would be to allow that government control over the search for political truth.

Nevertheless, governmental regulation based on subject matter has been approved in narrow circumstances. The court below relied upon two cases in which this Court has recognized that the government may bar from its facilities certain speech that would disrupt the legitimate governmental purpose for which the property has been dedicated. In Greer v. Spock [p. 65], we held that the Federal Government could prohibit partisan political speech on a military base even though civilian speakers had been allowed to lecture on other subjects. In Lehman v. Shaker Heights [p. 64], a plurality of the Court similarly concluded that a city transit system that rented space in its vehicle for commercial advertising did not have to accept partisan political advertising.

Greer and Lehman properly are viewed as narrow exceptions to the general prohibition against subject-matter distinctions. In both cases, the Court was asked to decide whether a public facility was open to all speakers. The plurality in Lehman and the Court in Greer concluded that partisan political speech would disrupt the operation of governmental facilities even though other forms of speech posed no such danger.

The analysis of Greer and Lehman is not applicable to the Commission's regulation of bill inserts. In both cases, a private party asserted a right of access to public facilities. Consolidated Edison has not asked to use the offices of the commission as a forum from which to promulgate its views. Rather, it seeks merely to utilize its own billing envelopes to promulgate its views on controversial issues of public policy. The commission asserts that the billing envelope, as a necessary adjunct to the operations of a public utility, is subject to the state's plenary control. To be sure, the state has a legitimate regulatory interest in controlling Consolidated Edison's activities, just as local governments always have been able to use their police powers in the public interest to regulate private behavior. But the commission's attempt to restrict the free expression of a private party cannot be upheld by reliance upon precedent that rests on the special interests of a government in overseeing the use of its property.

Where a government restricts the speech of a private person, the state action may be sustained only if the government can show that the regulation is a precisely drawn means of serving a compelling state interest. The commission argues finally that its prohibition is necessary (i) to avoid forcing Consolidated Edison's views on a captive audience, (ii) to allocate limited resources in the public interest, and (iii) to ensure that rate-payers do not subsidize the cost of the bill inserts.

Even if a short exposure to Consolidated Edison's views may offend the sensibilities of some consumers, the ability of government "to shut off discourse solely to protect others from hearing it [is] dependent upon a showing that substantial privacy interests are being invaded in an essentially intolerable manner. Where a single speaker communicates to many listeners, the First Amendment does not permit the government to prohibit speech as intrusive unless the "captive" audience cannot avoid objectionable speech.

But customers who encounter an objectionable billing insert may "effectively avoid further bombardment of their sensibilities simply by averting their eyes." The customer of Consolidated Edison may escape exposure to objectionable material simply by transferring the bill insert from envelope to wastebasket.

The commission contends that because a billing envelope can accommodate only a limited amount of information, political messages should not be allowed to take the place of inserts that promote energy conservation or safety, or that remind customers of their legal rights. The commission relies upon Red Lion Broadcasting v. Federal Communications Commission [p. 845], in which the Court held that the regulation of radio and television broadcast frequencies permit the Federal Government to exercise unusual authority over speech. But billing envelopes differ from broadcast frequencies in two ways. First, a broadcaster communicates through use of a scarce, publicly owned resource. No person can broadcast without a license, whereas all persons are free to send correspondence to private homes through the mails. Thus, it cannot be said that billing envelopes are a limited resource comparable to the broadcast spectrum. Second, the commission has not shown on the record before us that the presence of the bill inserts at issue would preclude the inclusion of other inserts that Consolidated Edison might be ordered lawfully to include in the billing envelope. Unlike radio or television stations broadcasting on a single frequency, multiple bill inserts will not result in a "cacophony of competing voices."

Finally, the commission urges that its prohibition would prevent ratepayers from subsidizing the costs of policy-oriented bill inserts. But the commission did not base its order on an inability to allocate costs between the shareholders of Consolidated Edison and the ratepayers. Rather, the commission stated "that using bill inserts to proclaim a utility's viewpoint on controversial issues (even when the stockholder pays for it in full.) is tantamount to taking advantage of a captive audience." Accordingly, there is no basis on this record to assume that the commission could not exclude the cost of these bill inserts from the utility's rate base. Mere speculation of harm does not constitute a compelling state interest.

Any student of history who has been reprimanded for talking about the World Series during a class discussion of the First Amendment knows that it is incorrect to state that a "time, place, or manner restriction may not be based upon either the content or subject matter of speech." And every lawyer who has read our rules, or our cases upholding various restrictions on speech with specific reference to subject matter must recognize the hyperbole in the dictum, "But, above all else, the First Amendment means that government has no power to restrict expression because of its message, its ideas, its subject matter or its content." Indeed, if that were the law, there would be no need for the Court's detailed rejection of the justifications put forward by the state for the restriction involved in this case.

There are, in fact, many situations in which the subject matter, or, indeed, even the point of view of the speaker, may provide a justification for a time, place and manner regulation. Perhaps the most obvious example is the regulation of oral argument in this Court; the appellant's lawyer precedes his adversary solely because he seeks reversal of a judgment. As is true of many other aspects of liberty, some forms of orderly regulation actually promote freedom more than would a state of total anarchy.

The only justification for the regulation relied on by the New York Court of Appeals is that the utilities' bill inserts may be "offensive" to some of their customers. But a communication may be offensive in two different ways. Independently of the message the speaker intends to convey, the form of his communication may be offensive—perhaps because it is too loud or too ugly in a particular setting. Other speeches, even though elegantly phrased in dulcet tones, are offensive simply because the listener disagrees with the speaker's message. The fact that the offensive form of some communication may subject it to appropriate regulation surely does not support the conclusion that the offensive character of an idea can justify an attempt to censor its expression. Since the Public Service Commission has candidly put forward this impermissible justification for its censorial regulation, it plainly violates the First Amendment.

Accordingly, I concur in the judgment of the Court.

Justice BLACKMUN, with whom Justice Rehnquist [in part] joins, dissenting.

I cannot agree with the Court that the New York Public Service Commission's ban on the utility bill insert somehow deprives the utility of its First and Fourteenth Amendment rights. Because of Consolidated Edison's monopoly status and its rate structure, the use of the insert amounts to an exaction from the utility's customers by way of forced aid for the utility's speech. And, contrary to the Court's suggestion, an allocation of the insert's cost between the utility's shareholders and the ratepayers would not eliminate this coerced subsidy.

I might observe, additionally, that I am hopeful that the Court's decision in this case has not completely tied a state's hands in preventing this type of abuse of monopoly power. The Court's opinion appears to turn on the particular facts of this case, and slight differences in approach might permit a state to achieve its proper goals.

First, it appears that New York and other States might use their power to define property rights so that the billing envelope is the property of the ratepayers and not of the utility's shareholders. If, under state law, the envelope belongs to the customers, I do not see how restricting the utility from using it could possibly be held to deprive the utility of its rights.

Second, the opinion leaves open the issue of cost allocation. The commission could charge the utility's shareholders all the costs of the envelopes and postage and of creating and maintaining the mailing list, and charge the consumers only the cost of printing and inserting the bill and the consumer service insert. Such an allocation would eliminate the most offensive aspects of the forced subsidization of the utility's speech.

Because I agree with the Appellate Division of the New York Supreme Court, that "[i]n the battle of ideas, the utilities are not entitled to require the consumers to help defray their expenses," I respectfully dissent.

COMMENT

1. Suppose the Public Utilities Commission had ordered Consolidated Edison to include a rebuttal prepared by an antinuclear energy group in its future billing envelopes. Suppose Consolidated Edison had challenged such an order on First Amendment grounds. Would the order be valid?

Professor Emerson has argued in favor of the validity, in the context of Consolidated Edison, of such an order. See Emerson, The Affirmative Side of the First Amendment, 15 Georgia L.Rev. 795 at 827-828 (1981):

The Court did not have before it, and hence did not decide, the latent affirmative promotion issue involved in the case. * * *

There is much to be said for the proposition that the first amendment rights of the third parties should be given recognition here. As a result of the monopoly granted by the government, the utility possessed a unique facility for communication, namely, a ready-made audience that was forced to open the billing envelope when it arrived in the home or office. Access to that facility, in a manner compatible with the primary function served by the billing apparatus, plainly would advance the discussion of important issues. Granting access to all comers might not be compatible with effective operation of the billing process. But imposition of a fairness doctrine, under which the utility was required to make adequate provision for the presentation of opposing views, surely would be feasible. The use of the first amendment in such a manner would promote significantly the system of freedom of expression.

2. Should the inclusion of inserts in its bills by Consolidated Edison be viewed as a form of impermissible compelled speech on the part of Con Ed's customers? See Wooley v. Maynard, text, p. 177. Justices Blackmun and Rehnquist make a similar argument: "Because of Consolidated Edison's monopoly status and its rate structure, the use of the insert amounts to an exaction from the utility's customers by way of forced aid for the utility's speech." Justice Powell makes it clear in Consolidated Edison that Bellotti protects Consolidated Edison's right to speak: "* * * [A] state may confine corporate speech to specified issues." On the other hand, if Consolidated Edison is not allowed to speak, i.e., include inserts on policy issues in its billing envelope, this, too, would be a form of impermissible compulsion, i.e., enforced silence. In the Consolidated Edison situation, therefore, free speech rights are in conflict. To assure the free speech of the corporate speaker, Consolidated Edison, is to compel the speech of some of its thousands of customers who have a desire to communicate a different message in the same forum. Suppose the billing envelope is made, as Blackmun suggests, the property of the rate payers and not of the utilities shareholders, how would that affect the compelled speech problem? Would such a device make the inclusion of policy issue inserts in the billing envelope dependent on the consent of the utility's rate payers?

3. Suppose the activities of Con Ed had been deemed so involved with governmental sponsorship as to be deemed the equivalent of government action? Could the inserts have been included over the objection of recipients by Con Ed in that event? See Muir v. Alabama Educational Television Commission, 688 F.2d 1033 (5th Cir. 1982), text, p. 1022.

Would the case for rebuttal inserts by antinuclear energy citizen groups have been stronger if the action of Con Ed were seen as governmental or state action? See Lehman v. City of Shaker Heights, below and Greer v. Spock, text, p. 65.

Public Facilities and the Public Forum

1. What about the exercise of First Amendment rights on public property? To what extent may a public facility be used as a public forum? In a decision which appeared to suggest an unwillingness by the Supreme Court to recognize a general right of nondiscriminatory access to publicly owned media facilities, the Court, 5-4, upheld a lower court decision, Lehman v. City of Shaker Heights, 296 N.E.2d 683 (Ohio 1973), approving a city's right to prohibit political advertising on city buses. Lehman v. City of Shaker Heights, 418 U.S. 298 (1974). In the Lehman case, the Court denied access to publicly owned media to a political candidate who wished to display his political messages along with commercial ads on city owned buses in Shaker Heights, Ohio. Justice Blackmun wrote the Court's opinion in Lehman, joined by Justices Burger, White, and Rehnquist. These justices declared that a city had a right as the owner of a commercial venture like a public transportation system to accept ads only for "innocuous" commercial advertising and to prohibit political messages on buses.

The Court denied that the car cards in controversy constituted a "public forum" protected by the First Amendment. Similarly, the Court rejected the contention "that there is a guarantee of nondiscriminatory access to such publicly owned and controlled areas of communication regardless of the primary purpose for which the area is dedicated." Although the Court conceded that American constitutional law had been "jealous to preserve access to public places for purposes of free speech," what is dispositive in such cases is "the nature of the forum and the conflicting interests involved. * * *" Under the circumstances, the claim for the exercise of First Amendment expression in Lehman would be rejected:

Here we have no open spaces, no meeting hall, park, street corner, or other public thoroughfare. Indeed, the city is engaged in commerce. * * * [C]ar card space, although incidental to the provision of public transportation, is a part of the commercial venture. In much the same way that a newspaper or periodical, or even a radio or television station, need not accept every proffer of advertising from the general public, a city transit system had discretion to develop and make reasonable choices concerning the type of advertising that may be displayed in its vehicles.

No First Amendment forum is here to be found. The city consciously has limited access to its transit system advertising space in order to minimize chances of abuse, the appearance of "favoritism" and the risk of imposing upon a captive audience. These are reasonable legislative objectives advanced by the city in a proprietary capacity.

2. By means of a separate concurring opinion, Justice Douglas supplied the critical fifth vote. He thought that a bus, from a public forum point of view, was more like a newspaper than a park. On the very day the Court decided Lehman, it had decided the Miami Herald case, text, p. 584. Relying on Miami Herald, Douglas appeared to suggest that the owner of a bus (even though it was a public owner) was equivalent to the owner of a private newspaper: "[The] newspaper owner cannot be forced to include in his offerings news or other items which outsiders may desire but which the owner abhors." If the bus or newspaper was turned into a park for purposes of the public forum concept, then public facilities such as publicly owned buses would be "transformed into forums for the dissemination of ideas upon [a] captive audience."

3. Four justices, Brennan, Stewart, Marshall, and Powell, dissented on the ground that the city's actions denying access violated equal protection in that the city had improperly preferred commercial advertising on its buses to the exclusion of political advertising. The dissenters said that Shaker Heights had opened up its advertising space on its buses as a "public forum." Having done so, the dissenters said the city could not exclude the category of political advertising:

Having opened a forum of communication, the city is barred by the First and Fourteenth Amendments from discriminating among forum users solely on the basis of message content.

Once a public forum for communication has been established, both free speech and equal protection principles prohibit discrimination based solely upon subject matter or content. * * * [D]iscrimination among entire classes of ideas, rather than among points of view within a particular class, does not render it any less odious. Subject matter or content censorship in any form is forbidden.

Is the Lehman case a severe defeat for the whole idea of public property as a public forum? Or is the case merely a holding that the car cards were not a public forum? Note that there is a major difference in the force of a claim for the exercise of free expression rights in public property as compared with such a claim with respect to private property. In the private property area, there is no state action problem. In such a context, the mandate of First Amendment theory that the state act in an ideologically neutral manner combines with equal protection concepts to ensure that a public facility cannot favor one political viewpoint and banish another.

In Lehman, all political viewpoints in the form of political ads were banned. Therefore, arguably, there was no equal protection violation; Justice Brennan was of a contrary opinion, however, wasn't he? Why?

4. The necessity that the public facility which is sought to be used for public forum purposes be consistent with the primary purposes of the facility was emphasized once again by the Supreme Court in Greer v. Spock, 424 U.S. 828 (1976). The Court, per Justice Stewart, in Greer rejected an attack on military post regulations which prohibited partisan political activity as well as the dissemination of pamphlets without the prior approval of military authorities. The Court denied that "whenever members of the public are permitted freely to visit a place owned or operated by the Government then that place becomes a public forum for the purposes of the First Amendment." Adderley v. Florida, 385 U.S. 39 (1966), a 5-4 Supreme Court decision denying public forum treatment to jailhouse grounds, was relied on by the Greer Court for the idea that the First Amendment did not mean that "people who want to propagandize protests or views have a constitutional right to do so whenever and however and wherever they please." The purpose of military reservations was to "train soldiers, not to provide a public forum." Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Marshall, dissented in Greer and expressed grave concern that a narrow approach to whether "the form of expression is compatible with the activities occurring at the locale" might lead to a "rigid characterization" that "a given locale is not a public forum." The result would be that "certain forms of public speech at the locale" would be suppressed even though the expression involved was entirely compatible with the principal purposes of the public facility in question.

5. In United States Postal Service v. Council of Greenburgh Civic Associations, 453 U.S. 114 (1981), the Court, per Justice Rehnquist, upheld a federal statute which prohibited mailboxes belonging to the government and used in the postal system from being used by civic associations without paying postage. Rehnquist rejected the idea "of a letter box as a public forum" and observed "that the First Amendment does not guarantee access to property simply because it is owned or controlled by the government." Rehnquist appeared to suggest, says Professor Emerson, that no new public forums "would be recognized beyond those that had been considered traditionally to be such."

Despite the result in Greenburgh Civic Associations, Emerson believes that "the constitutional right to use public facilities [as a public forum] on a compatible basis seems well-established." What merit is there in generally viewing public facilities as broadly hospitable to public forum purposes? Professor Emerson offers this rationale: "It forces the relevant community to listen to the expression of grievances rather than allowing them to be swept under the rug." See Emerson, The Affirmative Side of the First Amendment, 15 Georgia L.Rev. 809 (1981).

Justice Rehnquist objected that applying the test for valid time, place, and manner controls to the question of whether a letter box was a public forum would impose a difficult and impractical task on the Postal Service: "[The] authority to impose regulations cannot be made to depend on all of the variations of climate, population, density, and other factors that may vary significantly within a distance of less than 100 miles."

6. The public forum concept received its classic expression in Kalven, The Concept of the Public Forum, 1965 Supreme Ct.Rev. 1. The public forum concept became a vehicle for providing First Amendment-based legitimacy to the civil rights protests of the sixties. Is the absence of a similar movement today one of the reasons for the relative decline of the public forum concept?

DENNIS v. UNITED STATES

341 U.S. 494, 71 S.CT. 857, 95 L.ED. 1137 (1951).

Chief Justice Fred VINSON announced the judgment of the Court and an opinion in which Justice Reed, Justice Burton and Justice Minton join.

Petitioners were indicted in July, 1948, for violation of the conspiracy provisions of the Smith Act, 54 Stat. 671, 18 U.S.C.A. § 11, during the period of April, 1945, to July, 1948. * * * A verdict of guilty as to all the petitioners was returned by the jury on October 14, 1949. The Court of Appeals affirmed the convictions. 183 F.2d 201. We granted certiorari, 340 U.S. 863, limited to the following two questions: (1) Whether either § 2 or § 3 of the Smith Act, inherently or as construed and applied in the instant case, violates the First Amendment and other provisions of the Bill of Rights; (2) whether either § 2 or § 3 of the act, inherently or as construed and applied in the instant case, violates the First and Fifth Amendments because of indefiniteness.

Sections 2 and 3 of the Smith Act, 54 Stat. 671, 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 10, 11 (see present 18 U.S.C.A. § 2385), provide as follows:

"(a) It shall be unlawful for any person—

"(1) to knowingly or willfully advocate, abet, advise, or teach the duty, necessity, desirability, or propriety of overthrowing or destroying any government in the United States by force or violence, or by the assassination of any officer of any such government; * * *

"(3) to organize or help to organize any society, group, or assembly of persons who teach, advocate, or encourage the overthrow or destruction of any government in the United States by force or violence; or to be or become a member of, or affiliate with, any such society, group, or assembly of persons, knowing the purposes thereof.

"Sec. 3. It shall be unlawful for any person to attempt to commit, or to conspire to commit, any of the acts prohibited by the provisions of * * * this title."

The indictment charged the petitioners with wilfully and knowingly conspiring (1) to organize as the Communist Party of the United States of America a society, group and assembly of persons who teach and advocate the overthrow and destruction of the Government of the United States by force and violence, and (2) knowingly and wilfully to advocate and teach the duty and necessity of overthrowing and destroying the Government of the United States by force and violence. The indictment further alleged that § 2 of the Smith Act proscribes these acts and that any conspiracy to take such action is a violation of § 3 of the act.

Our limited grant of the writ of certiorari has removed from our consideration any question as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the jury's determination that petitioners are guilty of the offense charged. Whether on this record petitioners did in fact advocate the overthrow of the Government by force and violence is not before us, and we must base any discussion of this point upon the conclusions stated in the opinion of the Court of Appeals, which treated the issue in great detail. That court held that the record amply supports the necessary finding of the jury that petitioners, the leaders of the Communist Party in this country, * * * intended to initiate a violent revolution whenever the propitious occasion appeared.

The obvious purpose of the statute is to protect existing government, not from change by peaceable, lawful and constitutional means, but from change by violence, revolution and terrorism. That it is within the power of the Congress to protect the government of the United States from armed rebellion is a proposition which requires little discussion. Whatever theoretical merit there may be to the argument that there is a "right" to rebellion against dictatorial governments is without force where the existing structure of the government provides for peaceful and orderly change. We reject any principle of governmental helplessness in the face of preparation for revolution, which principle, carried to its logical conclusion, must lead to anarchy. No one could conceive that it is not within the power of Congress to prohibit acts intended to overthrow the government by force and violence. The question with which we are concerned here is not whether Congress has such power, but whether the means which it has employed conflict with the First and Fifth Amendments to the Constitution.

One of the bases for the contention that the means which Congress has employed are invalid takes the form of an attack on the face of the statute on the grounds that by its terms it prohibits academic discussion of the merits of Marxism-Leninism, that it stifles ideas and is contrary to all concepts of a free speech and a free press. * * *

The very language of the Smith Act negates the interpretation which petitioners would have us impose on that act. It is directed at advocacy, not discussion. Thus, the trial judge properly charged the jury that they could not convict if they found that petitioners did "no more than pursue peaceful studies and discussions or teaching and advocacy in the realm of ideas." He further charged that it was not unlawful "to conduct in an American college and university a course explaining the philosophical theories set forth in the books which have been placed in evidence." Such a charge is in strict accord with the statutory language, and illustrates the meaning to be placed on those words. Congress did not intend to eradicate the free discussion of political theories, to destroy the traditional rights of Americans to discuss and evaluate ideas without fear of governmental sanction. Rather Congress was concerned with the very kind of activity in which the evidence showed these petitioners engaged.

But although the statute is not directed at the hypothetical cases which petitioners have conjured, its application in this case has resulted in convictions for the teaching and advocacy of the overthrow of the government by force and violence, which, even though coupled with the intent to accomplish that overthrow, contains an element of speech. For this reason, we must pay special heed to the demands of the First Amendment marking out the boundaries of speech. * * *

have involved direct limitations on speech, however, will demonstrate that both the majority of the Court and the dissenters in particular cases have recognized that this is not an unlimited, unqualified right, but that the societal value of speech must, on occasion, be subordinated to other values and considerations.

The rule we deduce from these cases [following Schenck] is that where an offense is specified by a statute in non-speech or nonpress terms, a conviction relying upon speech or press as evidence of violation may be sustained only when the speech or publication created a "clear and present danger" of attempting or accomplishing the prohibited crime, e.g., interference with enlistment. The dissents, * * * in emphasizing the value of speech, were addressed to the argument of the sufficiency of the evidence. Speech is not an absolute, above and beyond control by the legislature when its judgment, subject to review here, is that certain kinds of speech are so undesirable as to warrant criminal sanction. * * *

In this case we are squarely presented with the application of the "clear and present danger" test, and must decide what that phrase imports. We first note that many of the cases in which this Court has reversed convictions by use of this or similar tests have been based on the fact that the interest which the State was attempting to protect was itself too insubstantial to warrant restriction of speech. * * * Overthrow of the Government by force and violence is certainly a substantial enough interest for the Government to limit speech. Indeed this is the ultimate value of any society, for if a society cannot protect its very structure from armed internal attack, it must follow that no subordinate value can be protected. If, then, this interest may be protected, the literal problem which is presented is what has been meant by the use of the phrase "clear and present danger" of the utterances bringing about the evil within the power of Congress to punish.

Obviously, the words cannot mean that before the Government may act, it must wait until the putsch is about to be executed, the plans have been laid and the signal is awaited. If Government is aware that a group aiming at its overthrow is attempting to indoctrinate its members and to commit them to a course whereby they will strike when the leaders feel the circumstances permit, action by the Government is required. * * * Certainly an attempt to overthrow the Government by force, even though doomed from the outset because of inadequate numbers or power of the revolutionists, is a sufficient evil for Congress to prevent. The damage which such attempts create both physically and politically to a nation makes it impossible to measure the validity in terms of the probability of success, or the immediacy of a successful attempt. In the instant case the trial judge charged the jury that they could not convict unless they found that petitioners intended to overthrow the Government "as speedily as circumstances would permit." This does not mean, and could not properly mean, that they would not strike until there was certainty of success. What was meant was that the revolutionists would strike when they thought the time was ripe. We must therefore reject the contention that success or probability of success is the criterion.

The situation with which Justices Holmes and Brandeis were concerned in Gitlow was a comparatively isolated event, bearing little relation in their minds to any substantial threat to the safety of the community. * * * They were not confronted with any situation comparable to the instant one—the development of an apparatus designed and dedicated to the overthrow of the Government, in the context of world crisis after crisis.

Chief Judge Learned Hand, writing for the majority below, interpreted the phrase as follows: "In each case [courts] must ask whether the gravity of the 'evil,' discounted by its improbability, justifies such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger." 183 F.2d at 212. We adopt this statement of the rule. [Emphasis added.] As articulated by Chief Judge Hand, it is as succinct and inclusive as any other we might devise at this time. It takes into consideration those factors which we deem relevant, and relates their significances. More we cannot expect from words.

We hold that §§ 2(a)(1), 2(a)(3) and 3 of the Smith Act, do not inherently, or as construed or applied in the instant case, violate the First Amendment and other provisions of the Bill of Rights, or the First and Fifth Amendments because of indefiniteness. Petitioners intended to overthrow the Government of the United States as speedily as the circumstances would permit. Their conspiracy to organize the Communist Party and to teach and advocate the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force and violence created a "clear and present danger" of an attempt to overthrow the Government by force and violence. They were properly and constitutionally convicted for violation of the Smith Act. The judgments of conviction are affirmed.

Affirmed.

Justice Clark took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

Justice FRANKFURTER:

But even the all-embracing power and duty of self-preservation are not absolute. Like the war power, which is indeed an aspect of the power of self-preservation, it is subject to applicable constitutional limitations. See Hamilton v. Kentucky Distill- eries Co., 251 U.S. 146, 156. Our Constitution has no provision lifting restrictions upon governmental authority during periods of emergency, although the scope of a restriction may depend on the circumstances in which it is invoked.

The First Amendment is such a restriction. It exacts obedience even during periods of war; it is applicable when war clouds are not figments of the imagination no less than when they are. * * * The right of a man to think what he pleases, to write what he thinks, and to have his thoughts made available for others to hear or read has an engaging ring of universality. The Smith Act and this conviction under it no doubt restrict the exercise of free speech and assembly. Does that, without more, dispose of the matter?

Absolute rules would inevitably lead to absolute exceptions, and such exceptions would eventually corrode the rules. The demands of free speech in a democratic society as well as the interest in national security are better served by candid and informed weighing of the competing interests, within the confines of the judicial process, than by announcing dogmas too inflexible for the non-Euclidian problems to be solved.

But how are competing interests to be assessed? Since they are not subject to quantitative ascertainment, the issue necessarily resolves itself into asking, who is to make the adjustment?—who is to balance the relevant factors and ascertain which interest is in the circumstances to prevail? Full responsibility for the choice cannot be given to the courts. Courts are not representative bodies. They are not designed to be a good reflex of a democratic society. Their judgment is best informed, and therefore most dependable, within narrow limits. Their essential quality is detachment, founded on independence. History teaches that the independence of the judiciary is jeopardized when courts become embroiled in the passions of the day and assume primary responsibility in choosing between competing political, economic and social pressures.

Primary responsibility for adjusting the interests which compete in the situation before us of necessity belongs to the Congress. The nature of the power to be exercised by this Court has been delineated in decisions not charged with the emotional appeal of situations such as that now before us. We are to set aside the judgment of those whose duty it is to legislate only if there is no reasonable basis for it. We are to determine whether a statute is sufficiently definite to meet the constitutional requirements of due process, and whether it respects the safeguards against undue concentration of authority secured by separation of power. We must assure fairness of procedure, allowing full scope to governmental discretion but mindful of its impact on individuals in the context of the problem involved. And, of course, the proceedings in a particular case before us must have the warrant of substantial proof. Beyond these powers we must not go; we must scrupulously observe the narrow limits of judicial authority even though self-restraint is alone set over us. Above all we must remember that this Court's power of judicial review is not "an exercise of the powers of a super-Legislature."

In all fairness, the argument cannot be met by reinterpreting the Court's frequent use of "clear" and "present" to mean an entertainable "probability." In giving this meaning to the phrase "clear and present danger," the Court of Appeals was fastidiously confining the rhetoric of opinions to the exact scope of what was decided by them. We have greater responsibility for having given constitutional support, over repeated protests, to uncritical libertarian generalities. * * *

Justice Black, dissenting.

The vice of treating speech as the equivalent of overt acts of a treasonable or seditious character is emphasized by a concurring opinion, [Justice Jackson] which by invoking the law of conspiracy makes speech do service for deeds which are dangerous to society. The doctrine of conspiracy has served diverse and oppressive purposes and in its broad reach can be made to do great evil. But never until today has anyone seriously thought that the ancient law of conspiracy could constitutionally be used to turn speech into seditious conduct. Yet that is precisely what is suggested. I repeat that we deal here with speech alone, not with speech plus acts of sabotage or unlawful conduct. Not a single seditious act is charged in the indictment. To make a lawful speech unlawful because two men conceive it is to raise the law of conspiracy to appalling proportions. That course is to make a radical break with the past and to violate one of the cardinal principles of our constitutional scheme.

Free speech has occupied an exalted position because of the high service it has given our society. Its protection is essential to the very existence of a democracy. The airing of ideas releases pressures which otherwise might become destructive. When ideas compete in the market for acceptance, full and free discussion exposes the false and they gain few adherents. Full and free discussion even of ideas we hate encourages the testing of our own prejudices and preconceptions. Full and free discussion keeps a society from becoming stagnant and unprepared for the stresses and strains that work to tear all civilizations apart.

Full and free discussion has indeed been the first article of our faith. We have founded our political system on it. It has been the safeguard of every religious, political, philosophical, economic, and racial group amongst us. We have counted on it to keep us from embracing what is cheap and false; we have trusted the common sense of our people to choose the doctrine true to our genius and to reject the rest. This has been the one single outstanding tenet that has made our institutions the symbol of freedom and equality. We have deemed it more costly to liberty to suppress a despised minority than to let them vent their spleen. We have above all else feared the political censor. We have wanted a land where our people can be exposed to all the diverse creeds and cultures of the world.

There comes a time when even speech loses its constitutional immunity. Speech innocuous one year may at another time fan such destructive flames that it must be halted in the interests of the safety of the Republic. That is the meaning of the clear and present danger test. When conditions are so critical that there will be no time to avoid the evil that the speech threatens, it is time to call a halt. Otherwise, free speech which is the strength of the Nation will be the cause of its destruction.

COMMENT

1. Functionally speaking, Vinson really follows the old "reasonableness" test of Justice Sanford in Gitlow. Vinson's formulation of the clear and present danger doctrine is hardly the same as that articulated by Brandeis in his concurrence in Whitney. Vinson said he endorsed the test employed by Judge Learned Hand which was "whether the gravity of the 'evil,' discounted by its improbability, justifies such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger." Vinson said that the clear and present danger test, thus understood, could not mean that the government action is prohibited "until the putsch is about to be executed." Reasoning that "success or probability of success is not the criterion," Vinson disregarded the factor of time in applying the clear and present danger test.

2. For Brandeis, time was the key factor in determining whether legislation designed to protect the security of the state was constitutional. See Pritchett, The American Constitution (2d ed. 1968). In the Brandeis view, the integrity of the public order was strengthened by free discussion. As Brandeis put it in Whitney: "the path of safety lies in the opportunity to discuss freely supposed grievances and proposed remedies."

The crucial inquiry, according to Brandeis, was whether the "evil apprehended is so imminent that it may befall before there is opportunity for discussion." But inquiry into the imminence of the danger—the factor of time—is precisely what Vinson excluded from his reformulation of clear and present danger. In Dennis, Chief Justice Vinson professedly used the clear and present danger doctrine to assess the constitutionality of the Smith Act, but, in truth, he completely revised it so that it provided far less protection to freedom of expression than the Brandeis conception of clear and present danger. If the imminence of a danger is quite remote, then in the weighing process which constitutional adjudication involves, the value of freedom of expression should not be subordinated to the value of national security. Arguably, under such an approach the Smith Act should be held unconstitutional since the Smith Act had been interpreted by the Justice Department to proscribe "advocacy." But surely advocacy should be protected from federal legislative restriction under the First Amendment in the absence of an imminent danger under the clear and present danger formulation. Vinson changed the clear and present danger doctrine to the "clear danger" or "clear and improbable danger" doctrine. Vinson's "clear danger" rationale, however, merely asked whether a grave threat was posed to the state in the future if not now. Obviously, under such a weighing process the likelihood of a statute's being held violative of the First Amendment was far less likely.

3. Frankfurter's long concurrence in Dennis argued for a balancing approach for cases where the values of freedom of expression and national security are in conflict. But Frankfurter intended the balancing to be done by the Congress rather than by the Court. What difference does it make? It is Congress which has passed the law which is under attack as violative of the First Amendment. If the congressional determination is to be upheld on the theory that the congressional balancing decision should be respected, there is no place for judicial review. Unless it can be said Congress engaged in no balancing process whatever, the congressional determination controls. Frankfurter extolled his approach as implementing the popular or democratic will. Further, he said his approach would cause no lasting damage to civil liberties.

4. Did Frankfurter's opinion in Dennis overlook the point that majoritarianism and constitutionalism are not necessarily synonymous? The idea of constitutional limitation, after all, is to protect certain values from legislative repression, to limit the majority. Therefore, it is somewhat anomalous to make majoritarianism the dominant value in a consideration of the meaning of a constitutional limitation.

Contrast Chief Justice Stone's differing view on the impermissibility of democratic repression (limitation on basic freedoms enacted by freely elected legislatures) in the famous footnote in United States v. Carolene Products, 304 U.S. 144 at 152, n. 4 (1938). In that opinion, Stone raised but deferred consideration of the question "whether legislation which restricts those political processes which can ordinarily be expected to bring about repeal of undesirable legislation, is to be subjected to more exacting judicial scrutiny under the general prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment than are most other types of legislation." According special judicial scrutiny to legislation restricting freedom of expression has been called the "preferred position" theory of freedom of expression. How does this theory differ from Frankfurter's balancing approach in Dennis? Frankfurter appeared to be saying that a presumption of validity should be given to the preference of the majority as reflected in an enacted statute, while Stone appeared to be saying that in freedom of expression cases the presumption should be against the legislative judgment.

5. Of the law of conspiracy Justice Jackson, in a concurring opinion, said that "Congress may make it a crime to conspire with others to do what an individual may lawfully do on his own."

What does this statement mean for the law of freedom of expression? Assume that an editor of a radical newspaper had published an editorial stating that the war in Vietnam was unconstitutional and illegal and that draft resisters merited the approval of the people. Such a statement is presumably not unlawful but rather reflects that criticism of government which it is the purpose of the First Amendment to protect. Suppose, however, that the editor had published the editorial as a member of a group united to frustrate the efforts of the government to conduct the war in Vietnam. Arguably it now becomes a conspiracy and what on an individual basis was lawful becomes transformed into unlawful activity.

"The law of conspiracy," Jackson concluded, "has been the chief means at the Government's disposal to deal with the growing problems created by such organizations. I happen to think it is an awkward and inept remedy, but I find no constitutional authority for taking this weapon from the Government. There is no constitutional right to 'gang up' on the Government."

6. Chief Justice Vinson reformulated the clear and present danger doctrine in such a way as to make it an entirely new test. He said that the government can act before the putsch is executed, and the Court rejected the "contention that success or probability of success is the criterion." What this approach does is to remove the factor of time from the clear and present danger formula. The danger must be grave (serious), but apparently, under the Dennis case, it is no longer necessary that it be immediate (present). However, the function of time or imminence in the clear and present danger doctrine was to justify legislation restricting freedom of expression where there is reason to believe that there was not enough time for normal debate to counteract the dangers feared by the legislature. By removing time from the clear and present danger equation, Vinson removed the most significant protection the doctrine provided for freedom of expression.

Vinson adopted Learned Hand's formulation in the Court of Appeals: "whether the gravity of the evil discounted by its improbability justifies such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger." 183 F.2d at 212. Substituting a test of probability for a test of imminence greatly broadened the scope of governmental power over freedom of expression. Such an approach focuses attention on the gravity of the problem (the "evil") with which the legislature is concerned. The Court said the Smith Act, under which the Communist party leaders were prosecuted, was concerned with the "ultimate value of our society." The nature of this ultimate value? The governmental interest in self-preservation.

7. The Vinson view as to what is the ultimate societal value contrasted sharply with that of Justice Black, who in his dissent argued that free speech and press are the preferred values, the ultimate values, in the American constitutional system.

8. As a result of the Dennis decision, the government brought many prosecutions under the Smith Act against minor Communist party leaders. The Supreme Court refused to review any of these cases until 1955 when it finally granted certiorari in Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1957). The Court's decision per Justice Harlan, two years later ostensibly clarified the Dennis holding. Actually, it contracted the scope of the Dennis case, revived the constitutional law of freedom of expression from its low point in Dennis six years before, and made it far more difficult for the government to obtain convictions under the Smith Act. Of the fourteen defendants whose convictions were before the Supreme Court in Yates, five convictions were reversed, and new trials were ordered for the rest.

The most authoritative portion of the Yates case is certainly Justice Harlan's statement that the "essence of the Dennis holding" only sanctioned the restriction of "advocacy found to be directed to 'action for the accomplishment of forcible overthrow.'" In his dissent, Justice Tom Clark said, as he read Chief Justice Vinson's opinion in Dennis, that he saw no basis for the distinction between advocacy of unlawful action and advocacy of abstract doctrine which Harlan said was the heart of the Dennis case. For Justice Clark's point of view at least this much can be said: the two lower federal courts in Yates also joined him in "misconceiving" the Dennis case. Justice Harlan's "reading" of Dennis in Yates may have been merely an indirect way of reversing Dennis.

How does the distinction between advocacy of abstract doctrine and advocacy of unlawful action expand the area of expression the government may not restrict?

The Dennis case was decided in 1951 during the beginning of the red-baiting years that have since been called the "McCarthy" era after Senator Joseph McCarthy of Wisconsin. By 1957, the reaction against "McCarthyism" had set in. What explanation could be used to place Dennis and Yates in a political perspective? What does such a perspective contribute to the discussion in Dennis about whether it is more appropriate for the judiciary or the legislature to make ultimate political choices?

In his dissent Justice Black said that the "First Amendment provides the only kind of security system which can preserve a free government." This remark was designed to rebut Vinson's contention in Dennis that self-preservation is the ultimate value of a society and Frankfurter's contention that self-preservation is an independent constitutional value which competes with freedom of expression. What is the nature of Justice Black's argument here?

What was the status of the "clear and present" danger doctrine after Dennis and Yates? No clear answer to this question was provided by the Supreme Court until 1969 when the Court quietly resurrected the "clear and present danger" doctrine in Brandenburg v. Ohio.

BRANDENBURG v. OHIO

23 L.Ed.2d 430 (1969).

PER CURIAM.

The appellant, a leader of a Ku Klux Klan group, was convicted under the Ohio Criminal Syndicalism statute for "advocat[ing] * * * the duty, necessity, or propriety of crime, sabotage, violence, or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing industrial or political reform" and for "voluntarily assembl[ing] with any society, group, or assemblage of persons formed to teach or advocate the doctrines of criminal syndicalism." Ohio Rev.Code Ann. § 2923.13. He was fined $1,000 and sentenced to one to 10 years' imprisonment. The appellant challenged the constitutionality of the criminal syndicalism statute under the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution, but the intermediate appellate court of Ohio affirmed his conviction without opinion. The Supreme Court of Ohio dismissed his appeal, sua sponte, "for the reason that no substantial constitutional question exists herein." It did not file an opinion or explain its conclusions. Appeal was taken to this Court, and we noted probable jurisdiction. 393 U.S. 948 (1968). We reverse.

The record shows that a man, identified at trial as the appellant, telephoned an announcer-reporter on the staff of a Cincinnati television station and invited him to come to a Ku Klux Klan "rally" to be held at a farm in Hamilton County. With the cooperation of the organizers, the reporter and a cameraman attended the meeting and filmed the events. Portions of the films were later broadcast on the local station and on a national network.

The prosecution's case rested on the films and on testimony identifying the appellant as the person who communicated with the reporter and who spoke at the rally. The state also introduced into evidence several articles appearing in the film, including a pistol, a rifle, a shotgun, ammunition, a Bible, and a red hood worn by the speaker in the films.

One film showed 12 hooded figures, some of whom carried firearms. They were gathered around a large wooden cross, which they burned. No one was present other than the participants and the newsmen who made the film. Most of the words uttered during the scene were incomprehensible when the film was projected, but scattered phrases could be understood that were derogatory of Negroes and, in one instance, of Jews.<sup>1</sup> Another scene on the same film showed the appellant, in Klan regalia, making a speech. The speech, in full, was as follows:

"This is an organizers' meeting. We have had quite a few members here today which are—we have hundreds, hundreds of members throughout the State of Ohio. I can quote from a newspaper clipping from the Columbus, Ohio Dispatch, five weeks ago Sunday morning. The Klan has more members in the State of Ohio than does any other organization. We're not a revengent organization, but if our President, our Congress, our Supreme Court, continues to suppress the white, Caucasian race, it's possible that there might have to be some revengeance taken.

"We are marching on Congress July the Fourth, four hundred thousand strong. From there we are dividing into two groups, one group to march on St. Augustine, Florida, the other group to march into Mississippi. Thank you."

The second film showed six hooded figures one of whom, later identified as the appellant, repeated a speech very similar to that recorded on the first film. The reference to the possibility of "revengeance" was omitted, and one sentence was added: "Personally, I believe the nigger should be returned to Africa, the Jew returned to Israel." Though some of the figures in the films carried weapons, the speaker did not.

The Ohio Criminal Syndicalism Statute was enacted in 1919. From 1917 to 1920, identical or quite similar laws were adopted by 20 States and two territories. E. Dowell, A History of Criminal Syndicalism Legislation in the United States 21 (1939). * * * [L]ater decisions have fashioned the principle that the constitutional guarantees of free speech and free press do not permit a State to forbid or proscribe advocacy of the use of force or of law violation except where such advocacy is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such actions. * * * A statute which fails to draw this distinction impermissibly intrudes upon the freedoms guaranteed by the First and Fourteenth Amendments. It sweeps within its condemnation speech which our Constitution has immunized from governmental control. * * *

1. The significant portions that could be understood were:

"How far is the nigger going to—yeah."; "This is what we are going to do to the niggers."; "A dirty nigger."; "Send the Jews back to Israel."; "Let's give them back to the dark garden."; "Save America."; "Let's go back to constitutional betterment."; "Bury the niggers."; "We intend to do our part."; "Give us our state rights."; "Freedom for the whites."; "Nigger will have to fight for every inch he gets from now on."

Measured by this test, Ohio's Criminal Syndicalism Act cannot be sustained. The act punishes persons who "advocate or teach the duty, necessity, or propriety" of violence "as a means of accomplishing industrial or political reform"; or who publish or circulate or display any book or paper containing such advocacy; or who "justify" the commission of violent acts "with intent to exemplify, spread or advocate the propriety of the doctrines of criminal syndicalism"; or who "voluntarily assemble" with a group formed "to teach or advocate the doctrines of criminal syndicalism." Neither the indictment nor the trial judge's instructions to the jury in any way refined the statute's bald definition of the crime in terms of mere advocacy not distinguished from incitement to imminent lawless action.

Accordingly, we are here confronted with a statute which, by its own words and as applied, purports to punish mere advocacy and to forbid, on pain of criminal punishment, assembly with others merely to advocate the described type of action. Such a statute falls within the condemnation of the First and Fourteenth Amendments. * * *

BRANDENBURG and the Revival of the Danger Doctrine

1. In Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969), the Supreme Court held the Ohio criminal syndicalism statute void on its face for failing to distinguish between mere advocacy of ideas and incitement to unlawful conduct. Nearly half a century earlier, a California criminal anarchy statute suffering an identical weakness had been upheld by the Court in the case of Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927). In Brandenburg, the Supreme Court turned a corner in its approach to the legislative suppression of politically unpopular speech. Brandenburg expressly overruled Whitney.

Yet the Court's approach to the Brandenburg decision was perfunctory. The Supreme Court issued its Brandenburg decision as an anonymous per curiam opinion. Further, in purporting to summarize and clarify fifty years of free speech doctrine, the Court in Brandenburg issued a relatively short opinion.

2. Consider the following summary of the holding in Brandenburg:

The per curiam opinion summarized past decisions by saying that legislative proscription of advocacy is not constitutional except: where such advocacy (1) is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action, and (2) is likely to incite or produce such action. The Court thus established a two-part test: one, the subjection of the speaker; the other, the objective likelihood that the speaker will succeed in carrying out that intent before time for further dialogue, i.e., imminently.

See Barron and Dienes, Constitutional Law: Principles and Policy (2d Ed. 1982), p. 734-35.

3. Is the Brandenburg per curiam decision an attempt to abandon or revise the clear and present danger doctrine? Does the Brandenburg decision even mention the clear and present danger doctrine by name?

Professor Be Vier appears to argue that the Brandenburg test is a different test than the clear and present danger test.

[The Brandenburg] rule avoids the institutional limitations of the clear and present danger test by both limiting the range of external circumstances and providing some criteria for judging those circumstances. Subversive speech is protected unless it is likely to produce imminent lawless action. Implicitly irrelevant, now, is the question of the gravity of the threatened evil; implicitly inappropriate is any effort to discount the gravity of the evil by its improbability; implicitly settled is the issue of whether a "remote" danger can ever be "clear"; implicitly dictated is a relatively confined factual finding of the likelihood that the speech would incite imminent lawless action.

See Be Vier, The First Amendment and Political Speech: An Inquiry Into the Substance and Limits of Principle, 30 Stan.L. Rev. 299 at 341 (1978).

4. Oregon Supreme Court Justice Hans Linde perceives in the Brandenburg test several new and disturbing elements. Linde, "Clear and Present Danger" Re-examined: Dissonance in the Brandenburg Concerto, 22 Stan.L.Rev. 1163 (1970). If proscription of free speech is to be judged, as Brandenburg suggests, by the actual danger posed by the advocacy, does this not render useless an examination of the statute on its face? Under such a standard of review, Professor Linde is concerned that a criminal anarchy statute "might well be unconstitutional now but might be constitutional in the light of diverse events in 1945, in 1951, in 1957, and in 1961, perhaps not in 1966, but again in 1968." But is such a result necessarily objectionable? If the American system of judicial review amounts to a continuous constitutional convention, isn't the situation Linde describes inevitable?

Note that Brandenburg, a Ku Klux Klan organizer, was tried and convicted under a criminal syndicalism statute which was enacted in the early 1900s to guard against nihilists, anarchists, and wobblies. Ohio was one of many states which passed such laws to meet a particular threat perceived at the time but long since lost in oblivion. Yet the Ohio statute remained on the books, to be resurrected in Brandenburg to meet a situation far afield from the subject of its origins. Would a standard of review which required constitutional judgment of a statute on its face improve this situation?

5. Justices Black and Douglas concurred in Brandenburg, joining in the decision to overrule Whitney and strike down the Ohio criminal syndicalism statute. But they added separate opinions urging abandonment of the "clear and present danger" test for review of laws proscribing speech (as opposed to conduct). They also stressed their long-held belief that Dennis was not good law.

Justice Douglas objected to the "clear and present danger" test because he felt the test had, in the crunch, failed to provide sufficient protection to First Amendment interests.

6. While believing that the drift of recent Court decisions appears to toll the "end of the line" for the doctrine of "clear and present danger," Professor Frank Strong urges that before we bid our "tearless farewells" to that doctrine, we consider its potential usefulness in developing a new, more sensitive approach to First Amendment freedoms. Fifty years of "Clear and Present Danger": From Schenck to Brandenburg—And Beyond, 1969 Sup.Ct.Rev. 41.

Professor Strong suspects that the emerging test for legislation proscribing freedom of expression is the definitional balancing test. Definitional balancing, unlike the ad hoc approach espoused by Justices Frankfurter and Harlan, starts with a heavy presumption in favor of First Amendment freedoms. It incorporates, in other words, Justice Black's notion of "preferred freedom." Definitional balancing would impose a heavier burden of proof upon a legislature for laws infringing First Amendment freedoms than for laws regulating commercial activity, for example.

The reason is that the Court regards a First Amendment infringement as more than the infringement of the rights of an individual person; rather, it considers, as did Meiklejohn, the threat to free self-government which any First Amendment infringement entails. We are still balancing, but the scales are weighted in favor of the First Amendment.

In this view, however, adoption of definitional balancing would just be the first step in judicial review of legislation which proscribes freedom of expression. The second step is a determination of whether the law under challenge is sufficiently tailored to meet the specific harm it seeks to avert. Even if the objective of the legislation is constitutionally permissible, its validity is not assured without this second determination.

It is here, in the second stage of definitional balancing, that Professor Strong advocates a role for a revived and revised "clear and present danger" test. How much of a "nexus" must exist between the legitimate governmental purpose and the sweep of the legislative scheme proposed to implement that purpose? If all that is required is a "reasonable" connection, Professor Strong suggests, the test is diluted enough to sanction virtually any governmental incursion into First Amendment freedoms. A tighter "nexus" is required.

Present Uses of the Clear and Present Danger Doctrine

The clear and present danger doctrine has since been relied on in the Supreme Court to resolve a variety of First Amendment issues which arise out of press reporting of judicial proceedings.

In Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539 (1976), the Supreme Court, per Chief Justice Burger, invalidated a "gag order" prohibiting reporting or commentary on judicial proceedings held in public. See text, p. 505. The Court held that although there was not an absolute prohibition against "gag orders" under the First Amendment, the general presumption against prior restraints, which would include "gag orders," remained intact. An interesting feature of the case is that the Court indicated that the clear and present danger doctrine should be applied to determine whether "gag orders" are warranted in particular situations:

We turn now to the record in the case to determine whether, as Learned Hand put it, "the gravity of the 'evil,' discounted by its improbability, justifies such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger." Dennis v. United States. To do so, we must examine the evidence before the trial judge when the order was entered to determine (a) the nature and extent of pretrial news coverage; (b) whether other measures would be likely to mitigate the effects of unrestrained pretrial publicity; (c) how effectively a restraining order would operate to prevent the threatened danger. The precise terms of the restraining order are also important. We must then consider whether the record supports the entry of a prior restraint on publication, one of the most extraordinary remedies known to our jurisprudence.

If the foregoing passage is examined, it will be seen that the formulation of the clear and present danger doctrine used by the Court appears to be a pre-Yates formulation, i.e., a formulation giving less protection to the free expression interest. On the other hand, the exact doctrinal formulation of the clear and present danger doctrine made no difference in the Nebraska Press Association case. After all, the Court upheld the free press interest and invalidated the "gag order." Barrett Prettymann, press counsel in the Nebraska Press Association case, expressed some misgivings about the use of the clear and present danger doctrine in the case. He argued that although the Court used the danger doctrine to enforce the freedom of the press, lower courts may use the clear and present danger doctrine, particularly in its Dennis formulation, to validate "gag orders." Do you agree? It may also be argued that if the clear and present danger doctrine is applied to the dramatic facts of the Nebraska Press Association case, the "gag order" should have been upheld—rather than invalidated—a consequence which may merely illustrate the unsuitability of the clear and present danger doctrine as a means to resolve free press-fair trial problems.

In a related context, the clear and present danger doctrine also made an appearance in Landmark Communications, Inc. v. Virginia, 435 U.S. 829 (1978). See text, p. 510. In Landmark, the Court refused to uphold a criminal prosecution against a publisher who violated a state law making it criminal to breach the confidentiality of proceedings before a state judicial disciplinary commission. A portion of Chief Justice Burger's opinion for the Court dealing with the clear and present danger doctrine follows:

The Supreme Court of Virginia relied on the clear and present danger test in rejecting Landmark's claim. We question the relevance of that standard here; moreover we cannot accept the mechanical application of the test which led that court to its conclusion. * * * Properly applied, the test requires a court to make its own inquiry into the imminence and magnitude of the danger said to flow from the particular utterance and then to balance the character of the evil as well as its likelihood, against the need for free and unfettered expression. The possibility that other measures will serve the State's interests should also be weighed.

* * * [T]he legislature itself had made the requisite finding "that a clear and present danger to the orderly administration of justice would be created by divulgence of the confidential proceedings of the commission." This legislative declaration coupled with the stipulated fact that Landmark published the disputed article was regarded by the court as sufficient to justify imposition of criminal sanctions.

Deference to a legislative finding cannot limit judicial inquiry when First Amendment rights are at stake. * * * A legislature appropriately inquires into and may declare the reasons impelling legislative action but the judicial function commands analysis of whether the specific conduct charged falls within the reach of the statute and if so whether the legislation is consonant with the Constitution. Were it otherwise, the scope of freedom of speech and of the press would be subject to legislative definition and the function of the First Amendment as a check on legislative power would be nullified.

It was thus incumbent upon the Supreme Court of Virginia to go behind the legislative determination and examine for itself "the particular utterance here in question and the circumstances of [its] publication to determine to what extent the substantive evil of unfair administration of justice was a likely consequence, and whether the degree of likelihood was sufficient to justify [subsequent] punishment." Bridges v. California. Our precedents leave little doubt as to the proper outcome of such an inquiry.

In a series of cases raising the question of whether the contempt power could be used to punish out of court comments concerning pending cases or grand jury investigations, this Court has consistently rejected the argument that such commentary constituted a clear and present danger to the administration of justice. See Bridges v. California, 314 U.S. 252; Pennekamp v. Florida, 328 U.S. 331; Craig v. Harney, 331 U.S. 367; Wood v. Georgia, 370 U.S. 375. What emerges from these cases is the "working principle that the substantive evil must be extremely serious and the degree of imminence extremely high before utterances can be punished," and that a "solidity of evidence" is necessary to make the requisite showing of imminence. "The danger must not be remote or even probable: it must immediately imperil."

The efforts of the Supreme Court of Virginia to distinguish those cases from this case are unpersuasive. The threat to the administration of justice posed by the speech and publications in prior cases was, if anything, more direct and substantial than the threat posed by Landmark's article. If the clear and present danger test could not be satisfied in the more extreme circumstances of those cases, it would seem to follow that the test cannot be met here. It is true that some risk of injury to the judge under inquiry, to the system of justice, or to the operation of the Judicial Inquiry Commission may be posed by premature disclosure, but the test requires that the danger be "clear and present" and in our view the risk here falls far short of that requirement. Moreover, much of the risk can be eliminated through careful internal procedures to protect the confidentiality of commission proceedings.

Why did the Supreme Court say that it questioned "the relevance" of the clear and present danger doctrine? Perhaps this was because in Landmark, unlike Nebraska Press, there was no free press-fair trial issue. The clear and present danger doctrine has been used, as Bridges evidences, in the contempt area where the performance of judges was criticized. The Court might have been referring to the impropriety of using the danger doctrine where there appears to be on the face of the facts no clear and present danger or threat to the administration of criminal justice. The Court may also have been implying that the clear and present danger should be confined to the political and security context where it was born.

The insistence in the Landmark case that a court must probe for itself the validity of a legislative "finding" that a particular area presents a "clear and present danger to the administration of justice" shows the continuing wisdom and vitality of Justice Brandeis's insistence on such an approach in his concurring opinion in Whitney.

The "Balancing" Approach and Standards of Review

1. A year after the decision in Yates, Justice Harlan wrote the decision for the Court in Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109 (1959). The United States House of Representatives Committee on Un-American Activities was investigating Communist infiltration in education. Lloyd Barenblatt, who had been a graduate student at the University of Michigan, refused to answer questions as to whether he was or ever had been a member of the Communist party. He refused to answer any inquiry into his political beliefs on the ground of reliance on the First Amendment. For such refusal he was convicted of violation of a federal statute which makes it a misdemeanor for a witness before a congressional committee to refuse to answer any questions pertinent to the matter under inquiry. See 2 U.S.C.A. § 192. On review to the Supreme Court of the United States, Justice Harlan sustained the conviction using the "balancing" test:

Where First Amendment rights are asserted to bar governmental interrogation, resolution of the issue always involves a balancing by the courts of the competing private and public interests at stake in the particular circumstances shown. 360 U.S. 109 at 126.

Relying on the need of Congress to inform itself in order to enact legislation and on the point that for purposes of national security, the Communist party could not be viewed as an ordinary political party, Harlan concluded for the Court that "the balance must be struck in favor of the latter, and that therefore the provisions of the First Amendment have not been offended." 360 U.S. 109 at 134 (1959). See Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178 (1957).

Justice Black dissented in Barenblatt on the ground he had asserted before and since, i.e., speech is absolutely protected by the express words of the First Amendment. But in the course of his dissent, Justice Black, 360 U.S. 109 at 144-145, made a critique of the "balancing" test:

But even assuming what I cannot assume, that some balancing is proper in this case, I feel that the Court after stating the test ignores it completely. At most it balances the right of the government to preserve itself, against Barenblatt's right to refrain from revealing Communist affiliations. Such a balance, however, mistakes the factors to be weighed. In the first place, it completely leaves out the real interest in Barenblatt's silence, the interest of the people as a whole in being able to join organizations, advocate causes and make political "mistakes" without later being subjected to governmental penalties for having dared to think for themselves. It is this right, the right to err politically, which keeps us strong as a Nation. For no number of laws against communism can have as much effect as the personal conviction which comes from having heard its arguments and rejected them, or from having once accepted its tenets and later recognized their worthlessness. Instead, the obloquy which results from investigations such as this not only stifles "mistakes" but prevents all but the most courageous from hazarding any views which might at some later time become disfavored. This result, whose importance cannot be overestimated, is doubly crucial when it affects the universities, on which we must largely rely for the experimentation and development of new ideas essential to our country's welfare. It is these interests of society, rather than Barenblatt's own right to silence, which I think the Court should put on the balance against the demands of the government, if any balancing process is to be tolerated. Instead they are not mentioned, while on the other side the demands of the Government are vastly overstated and called "self preservation." It is admitted that this committee can only seek information for the purpose of suggesting laws, and that Congress' power to make laws in the realm of speech and association is quite limited, even on the Court's test. Its interest in making such laws in the field of education, primarily a state function, is clearly narrower still. Yet the Court styles this attenuated interest self-preservation and allows it to overcome the need our country has to let us all think, and associate politically as we like and without fear of reprisal. Such a result reduces "balancing" to a mere play on words and is completely inconsistent with the rules this Court has previously given for applying a "balancing test," where it is proper: "[T]he courts should be astute to examine the effect of the challenged legislation. Mere legislative preferences or beliefs * * * may well support regulation directed at other personal activities, but be insufficient to justify such as diminishes the exercise of rights so vital to the maintenance of democratic institutions."

2. Justice Black criticized Harlan's use of the "balancing" test on the ground that the wrong things were balanced. This is another way of saying that the result one gets from the "balancing" test will be determined by how one weights the scale. How useful and how objective is such a test? Assuming that Barenblatt follows any of the First Amendment approaches outlined in the various opinions in Dennis, one would suppose that Harlan's rationale bears the closest possible relationship to Justice Frankfurter's concurrence in Dennis. But Frankfurter's "balancing" test and Harlan's were really not quite the same. Harlan said the courts must balance "the competing private and public interests at stake." But Frankfurter insisted that the legislature carried the primary responsibility for such "balancing."

3. Justice Black said in dissent in Barenblatt that "balancing" was only to be applied to conduct incidentally involving speech, never to speech itself. Further, Justice Black said, the Court had not properly applied the balancing test, even assuming its validity. Black said the Court posed the issue as the government's right of self-preservation against Barenblatt's right to refrain from revealing Communist affiliations. The real issue, said Justice Black, is the government's interest in its security against the constitutionally protected rights of association and expression. If "balancing" is capable of such different interpretations, is it not fairly useless as a test for constitutional adjudication? Or as Laurent Frantz put it: "How is the judge to convert balancing into something that does not merely give him back whatever answer he feeds into it?" See Frantz, Is the First Amendment Law?—A Reply to Professor Mendelson, 51 Calif.L.Rev. 729 (1963).

4. Is balancing still a significant doctrine in First Amendment law? Increasingly, the Supreme Court appears to be saying that legislation implicating First Amendment interests must meet a more exacting standard of review than legislation does generally. There are three standards of review now being applied by the Supreme Court today in equal protection litigation. 1) First is the traditional standard of review where legislation under constitutional attack is examined for the purpose of determining whether there is any rational basis to justify the legislation. If there is such a basis, the legislation stands. 2) Second is the intermediate standard of review whereby legislation will survive constitutional attack only if the legislation serves important governmental objectives and is substantially related to the achievement of these objectives. 3) Third is the strict scrutiny standard of review whereby legislation will survive constitutional attack only if the state can show a compelling state interest for the legislation under review. The highest type of judicial scrutiny is the strict standard of review. The latter two standards are beginning to influence First Amendment litigation.

Is the defect of old-fashioned "balancing" that a court which applies this test usually ends up using the traditional standard of review—a result which usually works to the disadvantage of First Amendment rights? Certainly, a case can be made that this is so. Has the Supreme Court now adopted a higher standard of review for First Amendment cases?

Has balancing been abandoned by the Burger Court? On this issue, the Court, as might be expected, is ambiguous—even explicitly so! In Minneapolis Star & Tribune Co. v. Minnesota Commissioner of Revenue, 103 S.Ct. 1365 at 1372 (1983), text, p. 142, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor says for the Court:

Differential taxation of the press, then, places such a burden on the interests protected by the First Amendment that we cannot countenance such treatment unless the State asserts a counterbalancing interest of compelling importance that it cannot achieve without differential taxation.

Reading this quotation, a student might properly conclude that the Court is now using the strict scrutiny standard of review in First Amendment litigation. But on the same page that this standard is set forth in the Minneapolis Star case, Justice O'Connor says in a footnote that the problem presented is a First Amendment problem in which the balancing test is applied:

The appropriate method of analysis thus is to balance the burden implicit in singling out the press against the interest asserted by the State. Under a long line of precedent, the regulation can survive only if the governmental interest outweighs the burden and cannot be achieved by means that do not infringe First Amendment rights as significantly.

From the foregoing, it appears that the student should not conclude that "balancing" is dead. But the student should remember, at the same time, that standards of review have become quite important in First Amendment litigation. The strict scrutiny standard and the intermediate standard of review direct courts on the proper weighting to give the interests at stake. In this respect, higher standards of review applied to First Amendment litigation may remedy the deficiencies of the old, open-ended "balancing" test.

The Speech-Action Dichotomy Today and the Problem of "Symbolic" Speech

A distinction which has been advocated as essential to an understanding of the scope of First Amendment protection is the distinction between speech and action. Out of this speech-action dichotomy has arisen the so-called "absolutist" interpretation of the First Amendment. Justice Black was the foremost judicial exponent of the "absolutist" test, and Professor Thomas I. Emerson has been its foremost academic exponent. Professor Emerson has described the test as follows:

The so-called "absolute" test is somewhat more unsettled in meaning than the other tests proposed, in part because its opponents have seemingly misunderstood it and in part because its supporters are not in full agreement among themselves. * * * The test is not that all words, writing and other communications are, at all times and under all circumstances, protected from all forms of government restraint.

Actually, the absolute test involves two components:

(1) The command of the first amendment is "absolute" in the sense that "no law" which "abridges" "the freedom of speech" is constitutionally valid. * * * [T]he point being stressed is by no means inconsequential. For it insists on focusing the inquiry upon the definition of "abridge," "the freedom of speech," and if necessary "law," rather than on a general de novo balancing of interests in each case. * * *

(2) The absolute test includes another component. It is intended to bring a broader area of expression within the First Amendment than the other tests do.

See Emerson, Toward A General Theory of the First Amendment, 72 Yale L.J. 877 at 914-915 (1963). See generally, Emerson, The System of Freedom of Expression (1970).

Some scholars have recently attacked the usefulness of the speech-action dichotomy. Professor Baker has written: "Unfortunately, neither identifying protected 'expression' by determining the conduct's contribution to the purposes of the system nor by using common sense to distinguish between expression and action works." See, Baker, Scope of the First Amendment Freedom of Speech, 25 U.C.L.A. L.Rev. 964 at 1010 (1978). Professor Emerson has responded in defense as follows:

The principal objection to the expression-action dichotomy has been that, since the conduct to be protected almost always consists of both speech and action—verbal as well as nonverbal conduct—the category to be protected cannot be defined in terms of one or the other.

* * * The criticism might be justified if the attempt being made were to frame a definition in strictly literal terms of "verbal" as opposed to "non-verbal" conduct, or simply in a loose sense of "expressing" rather than "doing." The expression-action dichotomy is, of course, not that simple. It attempts to formulate a definition of the kind of conduct that merits special protection under the first amendment.

See Emerson, First Amendment Doctrine and the Burger Court, 68 Calif. L.Rev. 422 at 478 (1980).

Judicial Reaction to the Speech-Action Distinction

COHEN v. CALIFORNIA

29 L.Ed.2d 284 (1971).

Justice HARLAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case may seem at first blush too inconsequential to find its way into our books, but the issue it presents is of no small constitutional significance.

Appellant Paul Robert Cohen was convicted in the Los Angeles Municipal Court of violating that part of California Penal Code § 415 which prohibits "maliciously and willfully disturb[ing] the peace or quiet of any neighborhood or person, * * * by * * * offensive conduct. * * *" He was given 30 days' imprisonment. The facts upon which his conviction rests are detailed in the opinion of the Court of Appeal of California, Second Appellate District, as follows:

"On April 26, 1968 the defendant was observed in the Los Angeles County Courthouse in the corridor outside of Division 20 of the Municipal Court wearing a jacket bearing the words "Fuck the Draft" which were plainly visible. There were women and children present in the corridor. The defendant was arrested. The defendant testified that he wore the jacket as a means of informing the public of the depth of his feelings against the Vietnam War and the draft.

"The defendant did not engage in, nor threaten to engage in, nor did anyone as the result of his conduct in fact commit or threaten to commit any act of violence. The defendant did not make any loud or unusual noise, nor was there any evidence that he uttered any sound prior to his arrest." 1 Cal.App.3d 94, 97-98, 81 Cal. Rptr. 503, 505 (1969).

In affirming the conviction the Court of Appeal held that "offensive conduct" means "behavior which has a tendency to provoke others to acts of violence or to in turn disturb the peace," and that the State had proved this element because, on the facts of this case, "[i]t was certainly reasonably foreseeable that such conduct might cause others to rise up to commit a violent act against the person of the defendant or attempt to forceably remove his jacket." 1 Cal.App.3d, at 99-100, 81 Cal.

Rptr., at 506. The California Supreme Court declined review by a divided vote. * * * We now reverse.

In order to lay hands on the precise issue which this case involves, it is useful first to canvass various matters which this record does not present.

The conviction quite clearly rests upon the asserted offensiveness of the words Cohen used to convey his message to the public. The only "conduct" which the state sought to punish is the fact of communication. Thus, we deal here with a conviction resting solely upon "speech," cf. Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359 (1931), not upon any separately identifiable conduct which allegedly was intended by Cohen to be perceived by others as expressive of particular views but which, on its face, does not necessarily convey any message and hence arguably could be regulated without effectively repressing Cohen's ability to express himself. Cf. United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968). Further, the state certainly lacks power to punish Cohen for the underlying content of the message the inscription conveyed. At least so long as there is no showing of an intent to incite disobedience to or disruption of the draft, Cohen could not, consistently with the First and Fourteenth Amendments, be punished for asserting the evident position on the inutility or immorality of the draft his jacket reflected. Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1957).

Appellant's conviction, then, rests squarely upon his exercise of the "freedom of speech" protected from arbitrary governmental interference by the Constitution and can be justified, if at all, only as a valid regulation of the manner in which he exercised that freedom, not as a permissible prohibition on the substantive message it conveys. This does not end the inquiry, of course, for the First and Fourteenth Amendments have never been thought to give absolute protection to every individual to speak whenever or wherever he pleases or to use any form of address in any circumstances that he chooses. In this vein, too, however, we think it important to note that several issues typically associated with such problems are not presented here.

In the first place, Cohen was tried under a statute applicable throughout the entire state. Any attempt to support this conviction on the ground that the statute seeks to preserve an appropriately decorous atmosphere in the courthouse where Cohen was arrested must fail in the absence of any language in the statute that would have put appellant on notice that certain kinds of otherwise permissible speech or conduct would nevertheless, under California law, not be tolerated in certain places. * * * No fair reading of the phrase "offensive conduct" can be said sufficiently to inform the ordinary person that distinctions between certain locations are thereby created.

In the second place, as it comes to us, this case cannot be said to fall within those relatively few categories of instances where prior decisions have established the power of government to deal more comprehensively with certain forms of individual expression simply upon a showing that such a form was employed. This is not, for example, an obscenity case. Whatever else may be necessary to give rise to the States' broader power to prohibit obscene expression, such expression must be, in some significant way erotic. Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957). It cannot plausibly be maintained that this vulgar allusion to the Selective Service System would conjure up such psychic stimulation in anyone likely to be confronted with Cohen's crudely defaced jacket.

This Court has also held that the States are free to ban the simple use, without a demonstration of additional justifying circumstances, of so-called "fighting words," those personally abusive epithets which, when addressed to the ordinary citizen, are, as a matter of common knowledge, inherently likely to provoke violent reaction. Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568 (1942). While the four-letter word displayed by Cohen in relation to the draft is not uncommonly employed in a personally provocative fashion, in this instance it was clearly not "directed to the person of the hearer." Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 309 (1940). No individual actually or likely to be present could reasonably have regarded the words on appellant's jacket as a direct personal insult. Nor do we have here an instance of the exercise of the State's police power to prevent a speaker from intentionally provoking a given group to hostile reaction. Cf. Feiner v. New York, 340 U.S. 315 (1951); Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U.S. 1 (1949). There is, as noted above, no showing that anyone who saw Cohen was in fact violently aroused or that appellant intended such a result.

Finally, in arguments before this Court much has been made of the claim that Cohen's distasteful mode of expression was thrust upon unwilling or unsuspecting viewers, and that the State might therefore legitimately act as it did in order to protect the sensitive from otherwise unavoidable exposure to appellant's crude form of protest. Of course, the mere presumed presence of unwitting listeners or viewers does not serve automatically to justify curtailing all speech capable of giving offense. While this Court has recognized that government may properly act in many situations to prohibit intrusion into the privacy of the home of unwelcome views and ideas which cannot be totally banned from the public dialogue, e.g., Rowan v. United States Post Office Dept., 397 U.S. 728 (1970), we have at the same time consistently stressed that "we are often 'captives' outside the sanctuary of the home and subject to objectionable speech." Id., at 738. The ability of government, consonant with the Constitution, to shut off discourse solely to protect others from hearing it is, in other words, dependent upon a showing that substantial privacy interests are being invaded in an essentially intolerable manner. Any broader view of this authority would effectively empower a majority to silence dissidents simply as a matter of personal predilections.

In this regard, persons confronted with Cohen's jacket were in a quite different posture than, say, those subjected to the raucous emissions of sound trucks blaring outside their residences. Those in the Los Angeles courthouse could effectively avoid further bombardment of their sensibilities simply by averting their eyes. And, while it may be that one has a more substantial claim to a recognizable privacy interest when walking through a courthouse corridor than, for example, strolling through Central Park, surely it is nothing like the interest in being free from unwanted expression in the confines of one's own home. Given the subtlety and complexity of the factors involved, if Cohen's "speech" was otherwise entitled to constitutional protection, we do not think the fact that some unwilling "listeners" in a public building may have been briefly exposed to it can serve to justify this breach of the peace conviction where, as here, there was no evidence that persons powerless to avoid appellant's conduct did in fact object to it, and where that portion of the statute upon which Cohen's conviction rests evinces no concern, either on its face or as construed by the California courts, with the special plight of the captive auditor, but, instead, indiscriminately sweeps within its prohibitions all "offensive conduct" that disturbs "any neighborhood or person."

Against this background, the issue flushed by this case stands out in bold relief. It is whether California can excise, as "offensive conduct," one particular scurrilous epithet from the public discourse, either upon the theory of the court below that its use is inherently likely to cause violent reaction or upon a more general assertion that the states, acting as guardians of public morality, may properly remove this offensive word from the public vocabulary.

The rationale of the California court is plainly untenable. At most it reflects an "undifferentiated fear or apprehension of disturbance [which] is not enough to overcome the right to freedom of expression." Tinker v. Des Moines Indep. Community School Dist., 393 U.S. 503, 508 (1969). We have been shown no evidence that substantial numbers of citizens are standing ready to strike out physically at whoever may assault their sensibilities with execrations like that uttered by Cohen. There may be some persons about with such lawless and violent proclivities, but that is an insufficient base upon which to erect, consistently with constitutional values, a governmental power to force persons who wish to ventilate their dissident views into avoiding particular forms of expression. The argument amounts to little more than the self-defeating proposition that to avoid physical censorship of one who has not sought to provoke such a response by a hypothetical coterie of the violent and lawless, the states may more appropriately effectuate that censorship themselves. * *

Admittedly, it is not so obvious that the First and Fourteenth Amendments must be taken to disable the states from punishing public utterance of this unseemly expletive in order to maintain what they regard as a suitable level of discourse within the body politic. We think, however, that examination and reflection will reveal the shortcomings of a contrary viewpoint.

At the outset, we cannot overemphasize that, in our judgment, most situations where the state has a justifiable interest in regulating speech will fall within one or more of the various established exceptions, discussed above but not applicable here, to the usual rule that governmental bodies may not prescribe the form or content of individual expression. Equally important to our conclusion is the constitutional backdrop against which our decision must be made. The constitutional right of free expression is powerful medicine in a society as diverse and populous as ours. It is designed and intended to remove governmental restraints from the arena of public discussion, putting the decision as to what views shall be voiced largely into the hands of each of us, in the hope that use of such freedom will ultimately produce a more capable citizenry and more perfect polity and in the belief that no other approach would comport with the premise of individual dignity and choice upon which our political system rests.

Against this perception of the constitutional policies involved, we discern certain more particularized considerations that peculiarly call for reversal of this conviction. First, the principle contended for by the state seems inherently boundless. How is one to distinguish this from any other offensive word? Surely the state has no right to cleanse public debate to the point where it is grammatically palatable to the most squeamish among us. Yet no readily ascertainable general principle exists for stopping short of that result were we to affirm the judgment below. For, while the particular four-letter word being litigated here is perhaps more distasteful than most others of its genre, it is nevertheless often true that one man's vulgarity is another's lyric. Indeed, we think it is largely because governmental officials cannot make principled distinctions in this area that the Constitution leaves matters of taste and style so largely to the individual.

Additionally, we cannot overlook the fact, because it is well illustrated by the episode involved here, that much linguistic expression serves a dual communicative function: it conveys not only ideas capable of relatively precise, detached explication, but otherwise inexpressible emotions as well. In fact, words are often chosen as much for their emotive as their cognitive force. We cannot sanction the view that the Constitution, while solicitous of the cognitive content of individual speech has little or no regard for that emotive function which practically speaking, may often be the more important element of the overall message sought to be communicated. * * *

Finally, and in the same vein, we cannot indulge the facile assumption that one can forbid particular words without also running a substantial risk of suppressing ideas in the process. Indeed, governments might soon seize upon the censorship of particular words as a convenient guise for banning the expression of unpopular views. We have been able, as noted above, to discern little social benefit that might result from running the risk of opening the door to such grave results.

It is, in sum, our judgment that, absent a more particularized and compelling reason for its actions, the state may not, consistently with the First and Fourteenth Amendments, make the simple public display here involved of this single four-letter expletive a criminal offense. Because that is the only arguably sustainable rationale for the conviction here at issue, the judgment below must be reversed.

Reversed.

Justice BLACKMUN, with whom The Chief Justice and Justice Black join.

I dissent, and I do so for two reasons:

Cohen's absurd and immature antic, in my view, was mainly conduct and little speech. * * * The California Court of Appeal appears so to have described it, 1 Cal.App.3d, at 100, 81 Cal.Rptr., at 503, and I cannot characterize it otherwise. Further, the case appears to me to be well within the sphere of Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568 (1942), where Justice Murphy, a known champion of First Amendment freedoms, wrote for a unanimous bench. As a consequence, this Court's agonizing over First Amendment values seem misplaced and unnecessary.

COMMENT

For the civil libertarian, an annoying feature of Cohen v. California is that its result is entirely consistent with the view that there should be absolute First Amendment protection for pure speech. Yet the Court deliberately eschewed taking such a view. The slogan Cohen wore on his jacket was treated by the Court as pure speech. The basis of Cohen's conviction was that the wearing of the jacket bearing the slogan in controversy constituted "offensive conduct" prohibited by the California Penal Code. Although the conviction was reversed, it was not reversed on the view endorsed by Justice Black and Professor Emerson that pure speech must receive absolute protection under the First Amendment. Justice Harlan for the Court very carefully rejected any such approach by pointing out that "the First and Fourteenth Amendments have never been thought to give absolute protection."

Symbolic Speech

The speech-action test proceeds on the assumption that speech or communication is entitled to full First Amendment protection. But sometimes action has a communicative or expressive element. In such circumstances, should function or form control? If a particular kind of activity is essentially communicative in character, then perhaps it should be viewed for what it is—symbolic speech. As symbolic speech, such activity is entitled to full First Amendment protection fully as much as if it were as communicative in substance as it is in form.

Embryonic recognition by the Supreme Court that some modes of activity should be treated as symbolic expression is found as early as Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359 (1931), where the Supreme Court struck down on First Amendment grounds a state statute that prohibited "the display of a red flag as a symbol of opposition by peaceful and legal means to organized government." A fuller and more famous statement which contained the roots of the symbolic speech idea may be found in West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943), where Justice Jackson said:

There is no doubt that * * * the [compulsory] flag salute is a form of utterance. Symbolism is a primitive but effective way of communicating ideas. The use of an emblem or flag to symbolize some system, idea, institution, or personality is a short cut from mind to mind.

If action is "symbolic," shouldn't it really be treated as "speech" for First Amendment purposes?

Is a speech-action dichotomy too mechanical an approach, or is it a useful way of thinking about and resolving First Amendment problems?

The following case, which arose out of the "draft card" burnings which occurred in different parts of the country during the controversy about the Vietnam war, shows how the symbolic speech doctrine fared before the Supreme Court when its advocates tried to use it literally under fire.

UNITED STATES v. O'BRIEN

20 L.ED.2D 672 (1968).

Chief Justice WARREN delivered the opinion of the Court.

On the morning of March 31, 1966, David Paul O'Brien and three companions burned their Selective Service registration certificates on the steps of the South Boston Courthouse. * * *

For this act, O'Brien was indicted, tried, convicted, and sentenced in the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts. He did not contest the fact that he had burned the certificate. He stated in argument to the jury that he burned the certificate publicly to influence others to adopt his antiwar beliefs, as he put it, "so that other people would reevaluate their positions with Selective Service, with the armed forces, and reevaluate their place in the culture of today, to hopefully consider my position."

The indictment upon which he was tried charged that he "wilfully and knowingly did mutilate, destroy, and change by burning * * * [his] Registration Certificate (Selective Service System Form No. 2); in violation of Title 50, App., United States Code, Section 462(b)." Section 462(b) is part of the Universal Military Training and Service Act of 1948. Section 462(b)(3), one of six numbered subdivisions of § 462(b), was amended by Congress in 1965, 79 Stat. 586 (adding the words italicized below), so that at the time O'Brien burned his certificate an offense was committed by any person, "who forges, alters, knowingly destroys, knowingly mutilates, or in any manner changes any such certificate. * * *" [Italics supplied.]

By the 1965 Amendment, Congress added to § 12(b)(3) of the 1948 act the provision here at issue, subjecting to criminal liability not only one who "forges, alters, or in any manner changes" but also one who "knowingly destroys [or] knowingly mutilates" a certificate. We note at the outset that the 1965 Amendment plainly does not abridge free speech on its face, and we do not understand O'Brien to argue otherwise. Amended § 12(b)(3) on its face deals with conduct having no connection with speech. It prohibits the knowing destruction of certificates issued by the Selective Service System, and there is nothing necessarily expressive about such conduct. The Amendment does not distinguish between public and private destruction, and it does not punish only destruction engaged in for the purpose of expressing views. A law prohibiting destruction of Selective Service certificates no more abridges free speech on its face than a motor vehicle law prohibiting the destruction of drivers' licenses, or a tax law prohibiting the destruction of books and records.

O'Brien nonetheless argues that the 1965 Amendment is unconstitutional in its application to him, and is unconstitutional as enacted because what he calls the "purpose" of Congress was "to suppress freedom of speech." We consider these arguments separately.

O'Brien first argues that the 1965 Amendment is unconstitutional as applied to him because his act of burning his registration certificate was protected "symbolic speech" within the First Amendment. His argument is that the freedom of expression which the First Amendment guarantees includes all modes of "communication of ideas by conduct," and that his conduct is within this definition because he did it in "demonstration against the war and against the draft."

We cannot accept the view that an apparently limitless variety of conduct can be labelled "speech" whenever the person engaging in the conduct intends thereby to express an idea. However, even on the assumption that the alleged communicative element in O'Brien's conduct is sufficient to bring into play the First Amendment, it does not necessarily follow that the destruction of a registration certificate is constitutionally protected activity. This Court has held that when "speech" and "nonspeech" elements are combined in the same course of conduct, a sufficiently important governmental interest in regulating the nonspeech element can justify incidental limitations on First Amendment freedoms. To characterize the quality of the governmental interest which must appear, the Court has employed a variety of descriptive terms: compelling; substantial; subordinating; paramount; cogent; strong. Whatever imprecision inheres in these terms, we think it clear that a government regulation is sufficiently justified if it is within the constitutional power of the government; if it furthers an important or substantial governmental interest; if the governmental interest is unrelated to the suppression of free expression; and if the incidental restriction on alleged First Amendment freedom is no greater than is essential to the furtherance of that interest. We find that the 1965 Amendment to § 462(b)(3) of the Universal Military Training and Service Act meets all of these requirements, and consequently that O'Brien can be constitutionally convicted for violating it. [Emphasis added.]

The many functions performed by Selective Service certificates establish beyond doubt that Congress has a legitimate and substantial interest in preventing their wanton and unrestrained destruction and assuring their continuing availability by punishing people who knowingly and wilfully destroy or mutilate them.

We think it apparent that the continuing availability to each registrant of his Selective Service certificates substantially furthers the smooth and proper functioning of the system that Congress has established to raise armies. We think it also apparent that the Nation has a vital interest in having a system for raising armies that functions with maximum efficiency and is capable of easily and quickly responding to continually changing circumstances. For these reasons, the Government has a substantial interest in assuring the continuing availability of issued Selective Service certificates.

It is equally clear that the 1965 Amendment specifically protects this substantial governmental interest. We perceive no alternative means that would more precisely and narrowly assure the continuing availability of issued Selective Service certificates than a law which prohibits their wilful mutilation or destruction. * * * The 1965 Amendment prohibits such conduct and does nothing more. In other words, both the governmental interest and the operation of the 1965 Amendment are limited to the noncommunicative aspect of O'Brien's conduct. The governmental interest and the scope of the 1965 Amendment are limited to preventing a harm to the smooth and efficient functioning of the Selective Service System. When O'Brien deliberately rendered unavailable his registration certificate, he wilfully frustrated this governmental interest. For this noncommunicative impact of his conduct, and for nothing else, he was convicted.

O'Brien finally argues that the 1965 Amendment is unconstitutional as enacted because what he calls the "purpose" of Congress was "to suppress freedom of speech." We reject this argument because under settled principles the purpose of Congress, as O'Brien uses that term, is not a basis for declaring this legislation unconstitutional.

* * *

Since the 1965 Amendment to § 12(b)(3) of the Universal Military Training and Service Act is constitutional as enacted and as applied, the Court of Appeals should have affirmed the judgment of conviction entered by the District Court. Accordingly, we vacate the judgment of the Court of Appeals, and reinstate the judgment and sentence of the District Court. This disposition makes unnecessary consideration of O'Brien's claim that the Court of Appeals erred in affirming his conviction on the basis of the nonpossession regulation.

It is so ordered.

Justice Marshall took no part in the consideration or decision of these cases.

Justice Harlan, concurred.

[Justice Douglas dissented on the ground that the basic but undecided constitutional issue in the case was whether conscription was unconstitutional in the absence of a declaration of war.]

COMMENT

1. Perhaps O'Brien can be viewed as a failure for the speech-action approach to First Amendment problems—a failure because the definition of “speech” employed is too rigid and formalistic. One observer, writing of the 1968 Boston trial which resulted in the conviction of Dr. Benjamin Spock and three others for conspiracy to aid in the violation of the draft law, urged that a distinction be drawn between isolated acts of “draft card” destruction and systematic destruction of Selective Service files. See Sax, Civil Disobedience—The Law Is Never Blind, Saturday Review (September 28, 1968), p. 22. But it is this observer's view that the formal legal system failed to make such distinctions. Professor Sax said of the O'Brien case, for instance, that the case illustrates this failure, since, in his view, the draft card burning in O'Brien was “an act overwhelmingly of protest content, with only the most trivial justification of need for possession of selective service documents by individual registrants.”

Professor Sax argued that a “constructive goal” behind constitutionally unprotected conduct should distinguish such activity from behavior which is directed at “active obstruction of a matter adequately settled through some political or legal institution.”

2. Did Chief Justice Earl Warren reject the whole symbolic speech concept in O'Brien? It appears that Warren's test in O'Brien was just another form of the balancing test frequently used in speech plus cases. Warren pointed out that “when ‘speech’ and ‘non-speech’ elements are combined in the same course of conduct, a sufficiently important governmental interest in regulating the nonspeech element can justify incidental limitation on First Amendment freedoms.” This test, of course, implicitly rejects the symbolic speech defense because the whole point of that defense is to have conduct for purposes of constitutional litigation conceived as speech and, therefore, immune from governmental restriction under the First Amendment.

Note Warren's formulation of the balancing test he used in O'Brien:

We think it clear that a government regulation is sufficiently justified if it is within the constitutional power of the government; if it furthers an important or substantial governmental interest; if the governmental interest is unrelated to the suppression of free expression; and if the incidental restriction on alleged First Amendment freedom is no greater than is the furtherance of that interest.

Is this “balancing” test particularly weighted in favor of the government? Professor Emerson would say that it is.

Wearing Armbands: Pure Speech?

In Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969), the Supreme Court reviewed the controversy which ensued when public school children wore black armbands to school to protest the Vietnam war. The Des Moines school system had prohibited the wearing of the armbands in advance. The Court held that wearing the armband was a “symbolic act” protected under the free speech provision of the First Amendment. Since only seven out of 18,000 students actually wore armbands to school, Justice Fortas held that a more positive showing of interference with normal school operations would have to be shown before the prohibition on wearing armbands could be sustained.

TINKER v. DES MOINES INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DISTRICT

21 L.Ed.2d 731 (1969).

Justice FORTAS delivered the opinion of the Court

The District Court recognized that the wearing of an armband for the purpose of expressing certain views is the type of symbolic act that is within the Free Speech Clause of the First Amendment. * * * As we shall discuss, the wearing of armbands in the circumstances of this case was entirely divorced from actually or potentially disruptive conduct by those participating in it. It was closely akin to "pure speech" which, we have repeatedly held, is entitled to comprehensive protection under the First Amendment. * * *

First Amendment rights, applied in light of the special characteristics of the school environment, are available to teachers and students. It can hardly be argued that either students or teachers shed their constitutional rights to freedom of speech or expression at the schoolhouse gate. This has been the unmistakable holding of this Court for almost 50 years. * * *

In West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, this Court held that under the First Amendment, the student in public school may not be compelled to salute the flag.

On the other hand, the Court has repeatedly emphasized the need for affirming the comprehensive authority of the states and of school officials, consistent with fundamental constitutional safeguards, to prescribe and control conduct in the schools. Our problem lies in the area where students in the exercise of First Amendment rights collide with the rules of the school authorities.

The problem posed by the present case does not relate to regulation of the length of skirts or the type of clothing, to hair style, or deportment. It does not concern aggressive, disruptive action or even group demonstrations. Our problem involves direct, primary First Amendment rights akin to "pure speech."

The school officials banned and sought to punish petitioners for a silent, passive expression of opinion, unaccompanied by any disorder or disturbance on the part of petitioners. There is here no evidence whatever of petitioners' interference, actual or nascent, with the school's work or of collision with the rights of other students to be secure and to be let alone. Accordingly, this case does not concern speech or action that intrudes upon the work of the schools or the rights of other students.

Only a few of the 18,000 students in the school system wore the black armbands. Only five students were suspended for wearing them. There is no indication that the work of the schools or any class was disrupted. Outside the classrooms, a few students made hostile remarks to the children wearing armbands, but there were no threats or acts of violence on school premises.

The District Court concluded that the action of the school authorities was reasonable because it was based upon their fear of a disturbance from the wearing of the armbands. But, in our system, undifferentiated fear or apprehension of disturbance is not enough to overcome the right to freedom of expression. Any departure from absolute regimentation may cause trouble. Any variation from the majority's opinion may inspire fear. Any word spoken, in class, in the lunchroom, or on the campus, that deviates from the views of another person may start an argument or cause a disturbance.

In order for the state in the person of school officials to justify prohibition of a particular expression of opinion, it must be able to show that its action was caused by something more than a mere desire to avoid the discomfort and unpleasantness that always accompany an unpopular viewpoint. Certainly where there is no finding and no showing that engaging in the forbidden conduct would "materially and substantially interfere with the requirements of appropriate discipline in the operation of the school," the prohibition cannot be sustained.

In the present case, the District Court made no such finding, and our independent examination of the record fails to yield evidence that the school authorities had reason to anticipate that the wearing of the armbands would substantially interfere with the work of the school or impinge upon the rights of other students. Even an official memorandum prepared after the suspension that listed the reasons for the ban on wearing the armbands made no reference to the anticipation of such disruption.

On the contrary, the action of the school authorities appears to have been based upon an urgent wish to avoid the controversy which might result from the expression, even by the silent symbol of armbands, of opposition to this Nation's part in the conflagration in Vietnam. It is revealing, in this respect, that the meeting at which the school principals decided to issue the contested regulation was called in response to a student's statement to the journalism teacher in one of the schools that he wanted to write an article on Vietnam and have it published in the school paper. (The student was dissuaded.)

It is also relevant that the school authorities did not purport to prohibit the wearing of all symbols of political or controversial significance. The record shows that students in some of the schools wore buttons relating to national political campaigns, and some even wore the Iron Cross, traditionally a symbol of Nazism. The order prohibiting the wearing of armbands did not extend to these. Instead, a particular symbol—black armbands worn to exhibit opposition to this Nation's involvement in Vietnam—was singled out for prohibition. Clearly, the prohibition of expression of one particular opinion, at least without evidence that it is necessary to avoid material and substantial interference with schoolwork or discipline, is not constitutionally permissible.

In our system, state-operated schools may not be enclaves of totalitarianism. School officials do not possess absolute authority over their students. Students in school as well as out of school are "persons" under our Constitution. They are possessed of fundamental rights which the state must respect, just as they themselves must respect their obligations to the State. In our system, students may not be regarded as closed-circuit recipients of only that which the state chooses to communicate. They may not be confined to the expression of those sentiments that are officially approved. In the absence of a specific showing of constitutionally valid reasons to regulate their speech, students are entitled to freedom of expression of their views. * * *

Under our Constitution, free speech is not a right that is given only to be so circumscribed that it exists in principle but not in fact. Freedom of expression would not truly exist if the right could be exercised only in an area that a benevolent government has provided as a safe haven for crackpots. The Constitution says that Congress (and the states) may not abridge the right to free speech. This provision means what it says. We properly read it to permit reasonable regulation of speech-connected activities in carefully restricted circumstances. But we do not confine the permissible exercise of First Amendment rights to a telephone booth or the four corners of a pamphlet, or to supervised and ordained discussion in a school classroom.

If a regulation were adopted by school officials forbidding discussion of the Vietnam conflict, or the expression by any student of opposition to it anywhere on school property except as part of a prescribed classroom exercise, it would be obvious that the regulation would violate the constitutional rights of students, at least if it could not be justified by a showing that the students' activities would materially and substantially disrupt the work and discipline of the school. Cf. Hammond v. South Carolina State College, 272 F.Supp. 947 (D.C.S.C.1967) (orderly protest meeting on state college campus); Dickey v. Alabama State Board of Education, 273 F.Supp. 613 (D.C.M.D.Ala.1967) (expulsion of student editor of college newspaper). In the circumstances of the present case, the prohibition of the silent, passive "witness of the armbands," as one of the children called it, is no less offensive to the constitution's guarantees.

As we have discussed, the record does not demonstrate any facts which might reasonably have led school authorities to forecast substantial disruption of or material interference with school activities, and no disturbances or disorders on the school premises in fact occurred. These petitioners merely went about their ordained rounds in school. Their deviation consisted only in wearing on their sleeve, a band of black cloth, not more than two inches wide. They wore it to exhibit their disapproval of the Vietnam hostilities and their advocacy of a truce, to make their views known, and, by their example, to influence others to adopt them. They neither interrupted school activities nor sought to intrude in the school affairs or the lives of others. They caused discussion outside of the classrooms, but no interference with work and no disorder. In the circumstances, our Constitution does not permit officials of the state to deny their form of expression.

We express no opinion as to the form of relief which should be granted, this being a matter for the lower courts to determine. We reverse and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.
Justice Stewart, concurring.

Justice White, concurring.

* * *

* * * The truth is that a teacher of kindergarten, grammar school, or high school pupils no more carries into a school with him a complete right to freedom of speech and expression than an anti-Catholic or anti-Semite carries with him a complete freedom of speech and religion into a Catholic church or Jewish synagogue. Nor does a person carry with him into the United States Senate or House, or into the Supreme Court, or any other court, a complete constitutional right to go into those places contrary to their rules and speak his mind on any subject he pleases. It is a myth to say that any person has a constitutional right to say what he pleases, where he pleases, and when he pleases. Our Court has decided precisely the opposite. * * *

COMMENT

1. Is Tinker a symbolic speech case because its facts reveal no disruptive conduct? In Street v. New York, 394 U.S. 576 (1969), a case involving the burning of an American flag on a street corner, there appeared to be no disruptive conduct in the sense that no one in Street's immediate audience was offended by his action. If anyone was offended, it was presumably the police officer who arrested him.

In O'Brien, on the other hand, members of the crowd at the South Boston courthouse attacked O'Brien and his cohorts after O'Brien burned the flag. Under this approach all the cases are in line. Street is consistent with Tinker at least in result. Tinker is consistent with O'Brien in that the draft card burning provoked disruptive conduct, making the symbolic act less pure speech than was the case in Tinker.

Whether conduct will be adjudicated a punishable criminal act or protected symbolic speech depends in Tinker on whether the conduct involved will materially interfere with the operation of the school.

How material is it that flag and draft card burning were both illegal under pre-existing statutes, but armband wearing was not illegal until school officials became aware of the plan to protest the war? Only then did school officials issue a regulation prohibiting armband wearing.

The Court in the Tinker case did not cite or discuss O'Brien. Is this defensible? Explicable?

2. The majority went to great lengths in Street to avoid confronting the question whether flag burning is speech. Harlan found Street to have been punished for engaging in speech, i.e., he was punished for his words. Yet Harlan applied a balancing test even to pure speech.

Justice Black believed that flag burning was not constitutionally protected. Does this show the limitation of the speech-action distinction at least as mechanically applied? Flag burning is an act. Therefore, the state may regulate it. But the flag was burned to express and communicate disrespect for the state. Isn't punishing flag burning in these circumstances a form of seditious libel?

3. Professor Emerson believes that expression was the basic element in Street's flag burning and O'Brien's draft card burning. Moreover, it was precisely the element of expression which the law sought to punish. Therefore, as expression (utilizing the speech-action distinction), Emerson argues that the flag burning in Street should not be punished but should be defined as expression under the First Amendment. The System of Freedom of Expression 88 (1970). Emerson is persuasive on this point.

4. The rationale of the Court in Cohen v. California appears to be very close to that taken in Tinker, i.e., "absent a more particularized and compelling reason for its actions," the state may not proscribe the wearing of the jacket bearing a "single four-letter expletive."

Why is Cohen close to Tinker? Tinker makes the key to whether symbolic protest is constitutionally protected depend on whether the protest unduly interferes with other legitimate activity. The wearing of the jacket bearing the crude slogan was even less of an obstacle to the activities of the courthouse, the forum of the protest in Cohen, than was the wearing of the black armbands to the activities of the school, the forum of the protest in Tinker. If the Court concludes that symbolic protest is no obstacle to the normal activities of school or courthouse, is this equivalent in a balancing approach to a conclusion that the state has provided no "particularized and compelling reason" for proscribing the particular symbolic protest in controversy? See the last paragraph of Justice Harlan's opinion for the Court in Cohen.

5. Taking Street and Cohen together, don't the deficiencies of the speech-action theory become vividly clear? Street which seemed to involve the act of flag burning was viewed by the majority of the Supreme Court as a prosecution for the utterance of words, i.e., speech. Cohen, on the other hand, which appeared to the majority to involve pure speech was seen by Justice Blackmun, Chief Justice Burger, and, of all people, Justice Black as "mainly conduct and little speech."

Is the abiding difficulty with the speech-action distinction that in the crunch there is too little agreement on what constitutes "speech" and what constitutes "action"? Or is it the most sensible First Amendment "theory" so far proposed?

6. In Spence v. Washington, 418 U.S. 405 (1974), the Court, per curiam, overturned a conviction under a flag misuse statute. In Spence, the accused had affixed a peace symbol to an American flag and then displayed the flag upside down from his window. On the basis of the factual context of this protest activity, the Court concluded that the accused had "engaged in a form of protected expression." In Spence, the Court evidenced a willingness to consider action in certain circumstances the equivalent of communication. For the Court to treat action or conduct in such a fashion, however, it is necessary that there be intent on the part of the speaker to make a particular communication. It is likewise necessary that the context of the protest makes it likely that it would be received and comprehended as a message by those to whom it was addressed. Context may be a key point in distinguishing speech and action.

7. Is there an operational symbolic speech doctrine which is operative in contemporary First Amendment law? If one analyzes O'Brien, Tinker, and Spence on an overall basis, the outlines of a functional symbolic speech doctrine are discernible. Once the Court has determined that a particular mode of activity is in fact communicative, i.e., constitutes symbolic speech, full First Amendment protection should be extended to the activity.<sup>5</sup> If the state regulation in controversy is directed at the message being communicated, then the state interest, absent a clear and present danger, should not be sufficient to withstand the First Amendment interest favoring protection of the communicative activity. If the regulation is designed to effectuate a substantial governmental interest, is not directed toward repressing of the content of the communicative activity involved, and if the governmental interest would be significantly thwarted by the continuance of the activity at issue, then the regulation should be upheld despite the incidental burden on First Amendment interests.

THE LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL MEANING OF FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

The Doctrine of Prior Restraint

NEAR v. MINNESOTA

75 L.ED. 1357 (1931).

The Legal and Factual Background of the NEAR Case

[EDITORIAL NOTE

The previous cases we have examined in studying the constitutional development of freedom of expression as a concept have dealt with what might be called subsequent punishment, i.e., punishing the speaker or the publisher after the act of communication because of state objection to the contents of the communication. This kind of legal sanction over communication obviously performs a certain censorship function. But press censorship, in the sense of being required by law to submit copy to a state official before publication is allowed, is another very significant and even more direct method by which freedom of expression can be restricted. At common law this kind of censorship was known as prior restraint. In Near v. Minnesota, the Supreme Court of the United States produced a very valuable precedent for the law of the press because the Court dealt with the constitutionality of press censorship and specifically with prior restraint.

5. For an example of a case recognizing the symbolic speech concept, see Village of Skokie v. National Socialist Party, 373 N.E.2d 21 (Ill.1978), text, p. 30 where the planned display of the swastika by a group of American Nazis was upheld as protected symbolic speech.

As you read the opinion of the Court in Near, be careful to note that the Court did not say prior restraints were absolutely forbidden by the constitutional guarantee of freedom of the press, but rather that they were prohibited except in certain areas. According to Chief Justice Hughes, what are the areas of exception where apparently prior restraints are permitted? Do these exceptions merely repeat the law of the "subsequent punishment" cases previously considered in earlier cases in this chapter.

The factual setting of the Near case was as follows. A Minnesota statute provided for the abating as a public nuisance of "malicious, scandalous, and defamatory" newspapers or periodicals. The statute provided that all persons guilty of such a nuisance could be enjoined. Mason's Minnesota Statutes, 1927, §§ 10123-1 to 10123-3.

The county attorney of Hennepin County (Minneapolis), later Populist Governor Floyd Olson, brought an action under the statute to enjoin the publication of a "malicious, scandalous, and defamatory newspaper, magazine, or other periodical" known as The Saturday Press. The complaint filed by the county attorney asserted that The Saturday Press had accused the law enforcement agencies and officials of Minneapolis with failing to expose and punish gambling, bootlegging, and racketeering, which activities, The Saturday Press alleged, were in control of a "Jewish gangster."

The state trial court found that the editors of The Saturday Press had violated the statute, and the court "perpetually enjoined" the defendants from conducting "said nuisance under the title of The Saturday Press or any other name or title." The state supreme court affirmed, and the defendant Near appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States. For an interesting and lively account of the background of the case, See Friendly, Minnesota Rag (1981)].

Chief Justice HUGHES delivered the opinion of the Court: * * *

This statute, for the suppression as a public nuisance of a newspaper or periodical, is unusual, if not unique, and raises questions of grave importance transcending the local interests involved in the particular action. It is no longer open to doubt that the liberty of the press and of speech is within the liberty safeguarded by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment from invasion by state action. It was found impossible to conclude that this essential personal liberty of the citizen was left unprotected by the general guaranty of fundamental rights of person and property. * * * In maintaining this guaranty, the authority of the state to enact laws to promote the health, safety, morals, and general welfare of its people is necessarily admitted. The limits of this sovereign power must always be determined with appropriate regard to the particular subject of its exercise. * * * Liberty of speech and of the press is also not an absolute right, and the state may punish its abuse. Liberty, in each of its phases, has its history and connotation, and, in the present instance, the inquiry is as to the historic conception of the liberty of the press and whether the statute under review violates the essential attributes of that liberty.

First. The statute is not aimed at the redress of individual or private wrongs.

Remedies for libel remain available and unaffected. The statute, said the state court (174 Minn. 457, 219 N.W. 770, 772, 58 A.L.R. 607), "is not directed at threatened libel but at an existing business which, generally speaking, involves more than libel." It is aimed at the distribution of scandalous matter as "detrimental to public morals and to the general welfare," tending "to disturb the peace of the community" and "to provoke assaults and the commission of crime." In order to obtain an injunction to suppress the future publication of the newspaper or periodical, it is not necessary to prove the falsity of the charges that have been made in the publication condemned. In the present action there was no allegation that the matter published was not true. It is alleged, and the statute requires the allegation that the publication was "malicious." But, as in prosecutions for libel, there is no requirement of proof by the state of malice in fact as distinguished from malice inferred from the mere publication of the defamatory matter. The judgment in this case proceeded upon the mere proof of publication. The statute permits the defense, not of the truth alone, but only that the truth was published with good motives and for justifiable ends. * * *

Second. The statute is directed not simply at the circulation of scandalous and defamatory statements with regard to private citizens, but at the continued publication by newspapers and periodicals of charges against public officers of corruption, malfeasance in office, or serious neglect of duty. Such charges by their very nature create a public scandal. They are scandalous and defamatory within the meaning of the statute, which has its normal operation in relation to publications dealing prominently and chiefly with the alleged derelictions of public officers.

Third. The object of the statute is not punishment, in the ordinary sense, but suppression of the offending newspaper or periodical. The reason for the enactment, as the state court has said, is that prosecutions to enforce penal statutes for libel do not result in "efficient repression or suppression of the evils of scandal." Describing the business of publication as a public nuisance does not obscure the substance of the proceeding which the statute authorizes. It is the continued publication of scandalous and defamatory matter that constitutes the business and the declared nuisance. In the case of public officers, it is the reiteration of charges of official misconduct, and the fact that the newspaper or periodical is principally devoted to that purpose, that exposes it to suppression. * * *

This suppression is accomplished by enjoining publication, and that restraint is the object and effect of the statute.

Fourth. The statute not only operates to suppress the offending newspaper or periodical, but to put the publisher under an effective censorship. When a newspaper or periodical is found to be "malicious, scandalous and defamatory," and is suppressed as such, resumption of publication is punishable as a contempt of court by fine or imprisonment. Thus, where a newspaper or periodical has been suppressed because of the circulation of charges against public officers of official misconduct, it would seem to be clear that the renewal of the publication of such charges would constitute a contempt, and that the judgment would lay a permanent restraint upon the publisher, to escape which he must satisfy the court as to the character of a new publication. Whether he would be permitted again to publish matter deemed to be derogatory to the same or other public officers would depend upon the court's ruling. In the present instance the judgment restrained the defendants from "publishing, circulating, having in their possession, selling or giving away any publication whatsoever which is a malicious, scandalous or defamatory newspaper, as defined by law." The law gives no definition except that covered by the words "scandalous and defamatory," and publications charging official misconduct are of that class. While the court, answering the objection that the judgment was too broad, saw no reason for construing it as restraining the defendants "from operating a newspaper in harmony with the public welfare to which all must yield," and said that the defendants had not indicated "any desire to conduct their business in the usual and legitimate manner," the manifest inference is that, at least with respect to a new publication directed against official misconduct, the defendant would be held, under penalty of punishment for contempt as provided in the statute, to a manner of publication which the court considered to be "usual and legitimate" and consistent with the public welfare.

If we cut through mere details of procedure, the operation and effect of the statute in substance is that public authorities may bring the owner or publisher of a newspaper or periodical before a judge upon a charge of conducting a business of publishing scandalous and defamatory matter—in particular that the matter consists of charges against public officers of official dereliction—and, unless the owner or publisher is able and disposed to bring competent evidence to satisfy the judge that the charges are true and are published with good motives and for justifiable ends, his newspaper or periodical is suppressed and further publication is made punishable as a contempt. This is of the essence of censorship.

The question is whether a statute authorizing such proceedings in restraint of publication is consistent with the conception of the liberty of the press as historically conceived and guaranteed. In determining the extent of the constitutional protection, it has been generally, if not universally, considered that it is the chief purpose of the guaranty to prevent previous restraints upon publication. The struggle in England, directed against the legislative power of the licenser, resulted in renunciation of the censorship of the press. The liberty deemed to be established was thus described by Blackstone: "The liberty of the press is indeed essential to the nature of a free state; but this consists in laying no previous restraints upon publications, and not in freedom from censure for criminal matter when published. Every freeman has an undoubted right to lay what sentiments he pleases before the public; to forbid this, is to destroy the freedom of the press; but if he publishes what is improper, mischievous or illegal, he must take the consequence of his own temerity." 4 Bl.Com. 151, 152. See Story on the Constitution, §§ 1884, 1889. The distinction was early pointed out between the extent of the freedom with respect to censorship under our constitutional system and that enjoyed in England. Here, as Madison said, "the great and essential rights of the people are secured against legislative as well as against executive ambition. They are secured, not by laws paramount to prerogative, but by constitutions paramount to laws. This security of the freedom of the press requires that it should be exempt not only from previous restraint by the Executive, as in Great Britain, but from legislative restraint also." Report on the Virginia Resolutions, Madison's Works, vol. IV, p. 543. This Court said, in Patterson v. Colorado, 205 U.S. 454, 462: "In the first place, the main purpose of such constitutional provisions is 'to prevent all such previous restraints upon publications as had been practiced by other governments,' and they do not prevent the subsequent punishment of such as may be deemed contrary to the public welfare. Commonwealth v. Blanding, 3 Pick. [Mass.] 304, 313, 314 [15 Am. Dec. 214]; Respublica v. Oswald, 1 Dall. 319, 325. The preliminary freedom extends as well to the false as to the true; the subsequent punishment may extend as well to the true as to the false. This was the law of criminal libel apart from statute in most cases, if not in all. Commonwealth v. Blanding, ubi supra; 4 Bl.Com. 150."

The criticism upon Blackstone's statement has not been because immunity from previous restraint upon publication has not been regarded as deserving of special emphasis, but chiefly because that immunity cannot be deemed to exhaust the conception of the liberty guaranteed by state and federal Constitutions. The point of criticism has been "that the mere exemption from previous restraints cannot be all that is secured by the constitutional provisions," and that "the liberty of the press might be rendered a mockery and a delusion, and the phrase itself a byword, if, while every man was at liberty to publish what he pleased, the public authorities might nevertheless punish him for harmless publications." 2 Cooley, Const. Lim. (8th Ed.) p. 885. But it is recognized that punishment for the abuse of the liberty accorded to the press is essential to the protection of the public, and that the common-law rules that subject the libeler to responsibility for the public offense, as well as for the private injury, are not abolished by the protection extended in our Constitutions. Id. pp. 883, 884. The law of criminal libel rests upon that secure foundation. There is also the conceded authority of courts to punish for contempt when publications directly tend to prevent the proper discharge of judicial functions. * * * We have no occasion to inquire as to the permissible scope of subsequent punishment. For whatever wrong the appellant has committed or may commit, by his publications, the state appropriately affords both public and private redress by its libel laws. As has been noted, the statute in question does not deal with punishments; it provides for no punishment, except in case of contempt for violation of the court's order, but for suppression and injunction—that is, for restraint upon publication.

The objection has also been made that the principle as to immunity from previous restraint is stated too broadly, if every such restraint is deemed to be prohibited. That is undoubtedly true; the protection even as to previous restraint is not absolutely unlimited. But the limitation has been recognized only in exceptional cases. * * * No one would question but that a government might prevent actual obstruction to its recruiting service or the publication of the sailing dates of transports or the number and location of troops. On similar grounds, the primary requirements of decency may be enforced against obscene publications. The security of the community life may be protected against incitements to acts of violence and the overthrow by force of orderly government. * * * These limitations are not applicable here. Nor are we now concerned with questions as to the extent of authority to prevent publications in order to protect private rights according to the principles governing the exercise of the jurisdiction of courts of equity. [Emphasis added.]

The exceptional nature of its limitations places in a strong light the general conception that liberty of the press, historically considered and taken up by the federal Constitution, has meant, principally although not exclusively, immunity from previous restraints or censorship. The conception of the liberty of the press in this country had broadened with the exigencies of the colonial period and with the efforts to secure freedom from oppressive administration. That liberty was especially cherished for the immunity it afforded from previous restraint of the publication of censure of public officers and charges of official misconduct.

The fact that for approximately one hundred and fifty years there has been almost an entire absence of attempts to impose previous restraints upon publications relating to the malfeasance of public officers is significant of the deep-seated conviction that such restraints would violate constitutional right. Public officers, whose character and conduct remain open to debate and free discussion in the press, find their remedies for false accusations in actions under libel laws not in proceedings to restrain the publication of newspapers and periodicals. The general principle that the constitutional guaranty of the liberty of the press gives immunity from previous restraints has been approved in many decisions under * * * state constitutions.

The importance of this immunity has not lessened. While reckless assaults upon public men, and efforts to bring obloquy upon those who are endeavoring faithfully to discharge official duties, exert a baleful influence and deserve the severest condemnation in public opinion, it cannot be said that this abuse is greater, and it is believed to be less, than that which characterized the period in which our institutions took shape. Meanwhile, the administration of government has become more complex, the opportunities for malfeasance and corruption have multiplied, crime has grown to most serious proportions, and the danger of its protection by unfaithful officials and of the impairment of the fundamental security of life and property by criminal alliances and official neglect, emphasizes the primary need of a vigilant and courageous press, especially in great cities. The fact that the liberty of the press may be abused by miscreant purveyors of scandal does not make any the less necessary the immunity of the press from previous restraint in dealing with official misconduct. Subsequent punishment for such abuses as may exist is the appropriate remedy, consistent with constitutional privilege.

In attempted justification of the statute, it is said that it deals not with publication per se, but with the "business" of publishing defamation. If, however, the publisher has a constitutional right to publish, without previous restraint, an edition of his newspaper charging official derelictions, it cannot be denied that he may publish subsequent editions for the same purpose. He does not lose his right by exercising it. If his right exists, it may be exercised in publishing nine editions, as in this case, as well as in one edition. If previous restraint is permissible, it may be imposed at once; indeed, the wrong may be as serious in one publication as in several. Characterizing the publication as a business, and the business as a nuisance, does not permit an invasion of the constitutional immunity against restraint. Similarly, it does not matter that the newspaper or periodical is found to be "largely" or "chiefly" devoted to the publication of such derelictions. If the publisher has a right, without previous restraint, to publish them, his right cannot be deemed to be dependent upon his publishing something else, more or less, with the matter to which objection is made.

Nor can it be said that the constitutional freedom from previous restraint is lost because charges are made of derelictions which constitute crimes. With the multiplying provisions of penal codes, and of municipal charters and ordinances carrying penal sanctions, the conduct of public officers is very largely within the purview of criminal statutes. The freedom of the press from previous restraint has never been regarded as limited to such animadversions as lay outside the range of penal enactments. Historically, there is no such limitation; it is inconsistent with the reason which underlies the privilege, as the privilege so limited would be of slight value for the purposes for which it came to be established.

The statute in question cannot be justified by reason of the fact that the publisher is permitted to show, before injunction issues, that the matter published is true and is published with good motives and for justifiable ends. If such a statute, authorizing suppression and injunction on such a basis, is constitutionally valid, it would be equally permissible for the Legislature to provide that at any time the publisher of any newspaper could be brought before a court, or even an administrative officer (as the constitutional protection may not be regarded as resting on mere procedural details), and required to produce proof of the truth of his publication, or of what he intended to publish and of his motives, or stand enjoined. If this can be done, the Legislature may provide machinery for determining in the complete exercise of its discretion what are justifiable ends and restrain publication accordingly. And it would be but a step to a complete system of censorship. The recognition of authority to impose previous restraint upon publication in order to protect the community against the circulation of charges of misconduct, and especially of official misconduct, necessarily would carry with it the admission of the authority of the censor against which the constitutional barrier was erected. The preliminary freedom, by virtue of the very reason for its existence, does not depend, as this court has said, on proof of truth.

Equally unavailing is the insistence that the statute is designed to prevent the circulation of scandal which tends to disturb the public peace and to provoke assaults and the commission of crime. Charges of reprehensible conduct, and in particular of official malfeasance, unquestionably create a public scandal, but the theory of the constitutional guaranty is that even a more serious public evil would be caused by authority to prevent publication. "To prohibit the intent to excite those unfavorable sentiments against those who administer the Government, is equivalent to a prohibition of the actual excitement of them; and to prohibit the actual excitement of them is equivalent to a prohibition of discussions having that tendency and effect; which again, is equivalent to a protection of those who administer the Government, if they should at any time deserve the contempt or hatred of the people, against being exposed to it by free animadversions on their characters and conduct." There is nothing new in the fact that charges of reprehensible conduct may create resentment and the disposition to resort to violent means of redress, but this well-understood tendency did not alter the determination to protect the press against censorship and restraint upon publication. * * *

For these reasons we hold the statute, so far as it authorized the proceedings in this action * * * to be an infringement of the liberty of the press guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. We should add that this decision rests upon the operation and effect of the statute, without regard to the question of the truth of the charges contained in the particular periodical. The fact that the public officers named in this case, and those associated with the charges of official dereliction, may be deemed to be impeccable, cannot affect the conclusion that the statute imposes an unconstitutional restraint upon publication.

Justice BUTLER (dissenting).

The Minnesota statute does not operate as a previous restraint on publication within the proper meaning of that phrase. It does not authorize administrative control in advance such as was formerly exercised by the licensers and censors, but prescribes a remedy to be enforced by a suit in equity. In this case there was previous publication made in the course of the business of regularly producing malicious, scandalous, and defamatory periodicals. The business and publications unquestionably constitute an abuse of the right of free press. The statute denounces the things done as a nuisance on the ground, as stated by the State Supreme Court, that they threaten morals, peace, and good order. There is no question of the power of the state to denounce such transgressions. The restraint authorized is only in respect of continuing to do what has been duly adjudged to constitute a nuisance. * * * There is nothing in the statute purporting to prohibit publications that have not been adjudged to constitute a nuisance. It is fanciful to suggest similarity between the granting or enforcement of the decree authorized by this statute to prevent further publication of malicious, scandalous, and defamatory articles and the previous restraint upon the press by licensers as referred to by Blackstone and described in the history of the times to which he alludes.

It is well known, as found by the state Supreme Court, that existing libel laws are inadequate effectively to suppress evils resulting from the kind of business and publications that are shown in this case. The doctrine that measures such as the one before us are invalid because they operate as previous restraints to infringe freedom of press exposes the peace and good order of every community and the business and private affairs of every individual to the constant and protracted false and malicious assaults of any insolvent publisher who may have purpose and sufficient capacity to contrive and put into effect a scheme or program for oppression, blackmail or extortion.

The judgment should be affirmed.

Justice Van Devanter, Justice McReynolds, and Justice Sutherland concur in this opinion.

COMMENT

1. Chief Justice Hughes said in Near that freedom from prior restraint was the general principle. But he also made it clear that it was not an absolute principle. The areas of exception were apparently three: 1) cases where national security was involved in time of war; 2) cases where the "primary requirements of decency" were involved, i.e., the problem of obscene publications; 3) cases where the public order was endangered by the incitement to violence and overthrow by force of orderly government.

The Near case produced a sharp 5-4 division in the Court. The narrow majority supporting the opinion of Chief Justice Hughes was accused by Justice Pierce Butler, a Minnesotan, of reaching out to decide the constitutional status of prior restraints which were not involved in the case at bar. Technically, Justice Butler was right. The prior restraint known at common law empowered administrative officials rather than judges to review in the first instance the material to be published. In Near, The Saturday Press had been able to publish what it chose in the first instance. Moreover, no requirement of submitting future copy to a court as a prerequisite to publication was asked of the editors. Yet, more broadly viewed, the court order probably did create a prior restraint.

Prior restraint has not entirely vanished from the American legal scene. However, prior restraints today appear to be more common in the obscenity field than they are in the area of political freedom. An example is Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan, 372 U.S. 58 (1963). In that case the Rhode Island legislature established a state-supported commission to "advise" magazine and book distributors when a publication was obscene. The advisory letter informed the distributor that if a publication was designated by the commission as obscene and was not removed from circulation, the matter would be turned over to law enforcement authorities for criminal prosecution. The commission itself had no law enforcement powers, and it could not require the regular law enforcement authorities to take action. In what ways did this procedure conform to and differ from the prior restraint known to English common law and described in the opinions in the Near case? Could it be fairly said of the Rhode Island procedure litigated in Bantam Books that its effect might be even more restrictive of press freedom than the classic form of prior restraint? Why?

With regard to this question, it should be noted that the Supreme Court described the Rhode Island procedure as a "form of regulation that creates hazards to press freedom markedly greater than those that attend reliance upon the criminal law." Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan, 372 U.S. 58, 70 (1963).

2. In the landmark case of New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), the Supreme Court sharply limited the ability of public officials to successfully sue newspapers for libel. For an extended discussion of the impact of the Times case on the law of libel, see Chapter II, text, infra, p. 213. In the Times case, the Court cited the statements in Near and other cases that the "Constitution does not protect libelous utterances." But the Court pointed out that neither Near nor any other case cited for this proposition actually involved use of the libel laws to restrain expression "critical of the official conduct of public officials." 376 U.S. 254 at 268. In a decision of far-reaching scope, the Court proclaimed the latter kind of expression to be protected by the First Amendment. Justice Brennan said for the Court in New York Times that the case of a public official suing a newspaper for libel must be considered "against the background of a profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust and wide-open, and that it may well include vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials." 376 U.S. 254 at 270.

If The Saturday Press were to publish in Minneapolis today an attack on the members of the municipal government of that city—an attack, which, let us assume, until the New York Times case would have been actionably libelous—would an injunction now be available to restrain further publications of the attack?

Has the New York Times case further restricted the already limited range of prior restraints?

3. From the point of view of freedom of the press, the legal concept of prior restraint is of the greatest importance. If, as a constitutional matter, freedom of the press included nothing else than prior restraint, considerable protection would still have been afforded the printed word. This is because freedom from prior restraint allows the material to be disseminated in the first place. Ideas, no matter how disturbing to established authority, are thus given legal protection in their emergent state. This freedom from prior restraint against the printed word contrasts with the legal concept of subsequent punishment which refers to the imposition of legal sanctions on those who authored the offending words. Punishing Gitlow after the publication of his revolutionary newspaper is an example of subsequent punishment. Under what set of facts would Gitlow have been a prior restraint case?

It is the contribution of Chief Justice Hughes's opinion in Near v. Minnesota that it enriched in a formative case the constitutional interpretation of freedom of the press to include both freedom from prior restraint and freedom from subsequent punishment. However, as between the two forms of repression of the press, prior restraint and subsequent punishment, which is the more dangerous in damaging the values for which freedom of press exists as a constitutional guarantee? Why?

For an excellent discussion of prior restraint, see generally Emerson, The Doctrine of Prior Restraint, 20 Law & Contemp.Prob. 648 (1955); Symposium, Near v.

Minnesota, 50th Anniversary, 66 Minn.L. Rev. 1-208 (November 1981).

The PENTAGON PAPERS Case

The Pentagon Papers or the New York Times case of the summer of 1971 brought forth suddenly and with no particular warning one of the great First Amendment and one of the most dramatic prior restraint cases in American constitutional history. For students of the law of mass communication the case can be approached under at least three familiar categories: 1) prior restraint, 2) journalists' privilege to protect their sources, and 3) the public's right to know. All the judges who considered the case had to weigh claims of freedom from prior restraint and freedom of information against claims of government interest and security advanced by the Justice Department lawyers. Was Dr. Daniel Ellsberg, one of the thirty-six authors of the Papers, justified, legally or ethically, in taking classified papers to which he had access and turning them over to the New York Times?

The sequence of events which created the Pentagon Papers case came about as follows: In June 1971, the New York Times, after much soul searching, decided to publish a secret, classified Pentagon Report outlining the process by which America went to war in Vietnam. At the request of the United States government, a temporary restraining order was issued against the New York Times by a newly appointed federal judge, Murray Gurfein, of the Federal District Court for the Southern District of New York. A few days later Judge Gurfein in a stirring decision refused to grant the United States government a permanent injunction to restrain the New York Times from publishing the Pentagon Papers:

"A cantankerous press, an obstinate press, a ubiquitous press," said the judge, "must be suffered by those in authority in order to preserve the even greater values of freedom of expression and the right of the people to know."

But the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reversed this decision, holding that the issue of whether the materials should be published should be decided in further hearings where the government could develop and support its position that the publication of the papers presented a threat to the security of the United States. In the interim, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit ruled that the restraints on publication be continued. Meanwhile, the Washington Post entered the fray. The government requested an injunction against the Post in the United States District Court in the District of Columbia, but Judge Gerhard Gesell denied the government's attempt to restrain publication of the Pentagon Papers by the Post. The government appealed, and the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia came down on the side of the press.

The Washington Post and New York Times were not the only papers to publish the Pentagon Papers. The Boston Globe and the St. Louis Post Dispatch had each published one article on the Papers. The government sought and obtained a restraining order against the papers in Boston and St. Louis. The Chicago Sun Times and the Los Angeles Times published stories based on the Pentagon Papers, but these papers were never the subject of lawsuits by the government. Because of the inconsistent actions with regard to the Pentagon Papers in the federal courts of appeals in New York and Washington, the Washington Post was free to publish papers, but the New York Times was not.

The federal courts of appeals had given judgment on the matter on June 23, 1971. The New York Times filed a petition for a writ of certiorari along with a motion for accelerated consideration of the petition on June 24. On June 30, 1971, the great case, a historic confrontation between government and the press, was decided by the Supreme Court. The result was clear—every newspaper in the land was free to publish the Pentagon Papers. The excitement of victory for the press, however, clouded appreciation by the press of the fact that the bitter struggle between freedom of information and national security had hardly been given a clear resolution by the Supreme Court. The Court's actual order merely held that the government had not met the heavy burden which must be met to justify any government prior restraint on the press. As for the myriad issues raised by the momentous case, nine separate opinions (it would have been impossible to have more) reflected the ambiguities, contradictions, and fundamental disagreements among the justices on basic issues concerning the role of the press in American society.

For a detailed account of the events leading to the Supreme Court's action see Ungar, The Papers & The Papers (1973).

NEW YORK TIMES v. UNITED STATES

29 L.Ed.2d 822 (1971).

Per Curiam.

We granted certiorari in these cases in which the United States seeks to enjoin the New York Times and the Washington Post from publishing the contents of a classified study entitled "History of U. S. Decision-Making Process on Viet Nam Policy." * * *

"Any system of prior restraints of expression comes to this Court bearing a heavy presumption against its constitutional validity." Bantam Books, Inc. v. Sullivan, 372 U.S. 58, 70 (1963); see also Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931). The government "thus carries a heavy burden of showing justification for the enforcement of such a restraint." Organization for a Better Austin v. Keefe, 402 U.S.

415 (1971). The District Court for the Southern District of New York in the New York Times case and the District Court for the District of Columbia and the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit in the Washington Post case held that the government had not met that burden. We agree. [Emphasis added.]

Justice BLACK, with whom Justice Douglas joins, concurring.

* * * I believe that every moment's continuance of the injunctions against these newspapers amounts to a flagrant, indefensible, and continuing violation of the First Amendment. * * * In my view it is unfortunate that some of my Brethren are apparently willing to hold that the publication of news may sometimes be enjoined. Such a holding would make a shambles of the First Amendment.

Our government was launched in 1789 with the adoption of the Constitution. The Bill of Rights, including the First Amendment, followed in 1791. Now, for the first time in the 182 years since the founding of the Republic, the federal courts are asked to hold that the First Amendment does not mean what it says, but rather means that the government can halt the publication of current news of vital importance to the people of this country.

In seeking injunctions against these newspapers and in its presentation to the Court, the executive branch seems to have forgotten the essential purpose and history of the First Amendment. When the Constitution was adopted, many people strongly opposed it because the document contained no Bill of Rights to safeguard certain basic freedoms. They especially feared that the new powers granted to a central government might be interpreted to permit the government to curtail freedom of religion, press, assembly, and speech. In response to an overwhelming public clamor, James Madison offered a series of amendments to satisfy citizens that these great liberties would remain safe and beyond the power of government to abridge. Madison proposed what later became the First Amendment in three parts, two of which are set out below, and one of which proclaimed: "The people shall not be deprived or abridged of their right to speak, to write, or to publish their sentiments; and the freedom of the press, as one of the great bulwarks of liberty, shall be inviolable." The amendments were offered to curtail and restrict the general powers granted to the executive, legislative, and judicial Branches two years before in the original Constitution. The Bill of Rights changed the original Constitution into a new charter under which no branch of government could abridge the people's freedoms of press, speech, religion, and assembly. Yet the solicitor general argues and some members of the Court appear to agree that the general powers of the government adopted in the original Constitution should be interpreted to limit and restrict the specific and emphatic guarantees of the Bill of Rights adopted later. I can imagine no greater perversion of history. Madison and the other Framers of the First Amendment able men that they were, wrote in language they earnestly believed could never be misunderstood: "Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom of the press. * * *" Both the history and language of the First Amendment support the view that the press must be left free to publish news, whatever the source, without censorship, injunctions, or prior restraints.

In the First Amendment the Founding Fathers gave the free press the protection it must have to fulfill its essential role in our democracy. The press was to serve the governed, not the governors. The government's power to censor the press was abolished so that the press would remain forever free to censure the government. The press was protected so that it could bare the secrets of government and inform the people. Only a free and unrestrained press can effectively expose deception in government. And paramount among the responsibilities of a free press is the duty to prevent any part of the government from deceiving the people and sending them off to distant lands to die of foreign fevers and foreign shot and shell. In my view, far from deserving condemnation for their courageous reporting, the New York Times, the Washington Post, and other newspapers should be commended for serving the purpose that the Founding Fathers saw so clearly. In revealing the workings of government that led to the Viet Nam war, the newspapers nobly did precisely that which the Founders hoped and trusted they would do.

The government's case here is based on premises entirely different from those that guided the Framers of the First Amendment. The solicitor general has carefully and emphatically stated:

"Now, Mr. Justice [Black], your construction of * * * [the First Amendment] is well known, and I certainly respect it. You say that no law means no law, and that should be obvious. I can only say, Mr. Justice that to me it is equally obvious that 'no law' does not mean 'no law', and I would seek to persuade the Court that that is true. * * * [T]here are other parts of the Constitution that grant power and responsibilities to the Executive and * * * the First Amendment was not intended to make it impossible for the Executive to function or to protect the security of the United States."

And the government argues in its brief that in spite of the First Amendment, "[t]he authority of the Executive Department to protect the nation against publication of information whose disclosure would endanger the national security stems from two interrelated sources: the constitutional power of the president over the conduct of foreign affairs and his authority as Commander-in-Chief."

In other words, we are asked to hold that despite the First Amendment's emphatic command, the executive branch, the Congress, and the Judiciary can make laws enjoining publication of current news and abridging freedom of the press in the name of "national security." The government does not even attempt to rely on any act of Congress. Instead it makes the bold and dangerously far-reaching contention that the courts should take it upon themselves to "make" a law abridging freedom of the press in the name of equity, presidential power and national security, even when the representatives of the people in Congress have adhered to the command of the First Amendment and refused to make such a law. See concurring opinion of Justice Douglas. * * * To find that the president has "inherent power" to halt the publication of news by resort to the courts would wipe out the First Amendment and destroy the fundamental liberty and security of the very people the government hopes to make "secure." No one can read the history of the adoption of the First Amendment without being convinced beyond any doubt that it was injunctions like those sought here that Madison and his collaborators intended to outlaw in this Nation for all time.

The word "security" is a broad, vague generality whose contours should not be invoked to abrogate the fundamental law embodied in the First Amendment. The guarding of military and diplomatic secrets at the expense of informed representative government provides no real security for our Republic. The Framers of the First Amendment, fully aware of both the need to defend a new nation and the abuses of the English and Colonial governments, sought to give this new society strength and security by providing that freedom of speech, press, religion, and assembly should not be abridged.

While I join the opinion of the Court I believe it necessary to express my views more fully.

It should be noted at the outset that the First Amendment provides that "Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." That leaves, in my view, no room for governmental restraint on the press.

There is, moreover, no statute barring the publication by the press of the material which the Times and Post seek to use. 18 U.S.C.A. § 793(e) provides that "whoever having unauthorized possession of, access to, or control over any document, writing, * * * or information relating to the national defense which information the possessor has reason to believe could be used to the injury of the United States or to the advantage of any foreign nation, wilfully communicates * * * the same to any person not entitled to receive it * * * shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than ten years or both."

The government suggests that the word "communicates" is broad enough to encompass publication.

There are eight sections in the chapter on espionage and censorship, §§ 792-799. In three of those eight "publish" is specifically mentioned: § 794(b) provides "Whoever in time of war, with the intent that the same shall be communicated to the enemy, collects records, publishes, or communicates * * * [the disposition of armed forces]."

Section 797 prohibits "reproduces, publishes, sells, or gives away" photos of defense installations.

Section 798 relating to cryptography prohibits: "communicates, furnishes, transmits, or otherwise makes available * * * or publishes."

Thus it is apparent that Congress was capable of and did distinguish between publishing and communication in the various sections of the Espionage Act.

The other evidence that § 793 does not apply to the press is a rejected version of § 793. That version read: "During any national emergency resulting from a war to which the U.S. is a party or from threat of such a war, the president may, by proclamation, prohibit the publishing or communicating of, or the attempting to publish or communicate any information relating to the national defense, which in his judgment is of such character that it is or might be useful to the enemy." During the debates in the Senate the First Amendment was specifically cited and that provision was defeated. 55 Cong.Rec. 2166.

Judge Gurfein's holding in the Times case that this act does not apply to this case was therefore preeminently sound. Moreover, the Act of September 23, 1950, in amending 18 U.S.C.A. § 793 states in § 1(b) that:

"Nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize, require, or establish military or civilian censorship or in any way to limit or infringe upon freedom of the press or of speech as guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States and no regulation shall be promulgated hereunder having that effect." 64 Stat. 987. Thus Congress has been faithful to the command of the First Amendment in this area.

So any power that the government possesses must come from its "inherent power."

The power to wage war is "the power to wage war successfully." See Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81, 93. But the war power stems from a declaration of war. The Constitution by Article I, § 8, gives Congress, not the president, power "to declare war." Nowhere are presidential wars authorized. We need not decide therefore what leveling effect the war power of Congress might have.

These disclosures may have a serious impact. But that is no basis for sanctioning a previous restraint on the press.

As we stated only the other day in Organization for a Better Austin v. Keefe, 402 U.S. 415, "any prior restraint on expression comes to this Court with a 'heavy presumption' against its constitutional validity."

The government says that it has inherent powers to go into court and obtain an injunction to protect that national interest, which in this case is alleged to be national security.

Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697, repudiated that expansive doctrine in no uncertain terms.

The dominant purpose of the First Amendment was to prohibit the widespread practice of governmental suppression of embarrassing information. It is common knowledge that the First Amendment was adopted against the widespread use of the common law of seditious libel to punish the dissemination of material that is embarrassing to the powers-that-be. See Emerson, The System of Freedom of Expression, c. V (1970); Chafee, Free Speech in the United States, c. XIII (1941). The present cases will, I think, go down in history as the most dramatic illustration of that principle. A debate of large proportions goes on in the Nation over our posture in Vietnam. That debate antedated the disclosure of the contents of the present documents. The latter are highly relevant to the debate in progress.

Secrecy in government is fundamentally anti-democratic, perpetuating bureaucratic errors. Open debate and discussion of public issues are vital to our national health. On public questions there should be "open and robust debate." New York Times, Inc. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 269-270.

I would affirm the judgment of the court of appeals in the Post case, vacate the stay of the court of appeals in the Times case and direct that it affirm the district court.

The stays in these cases that have been in effect for more than a week constitute a flouting of the principles of the First Amendment as interpreted in Near v. Minnesota.

Justice BRENNAN, concurring.

I write separately in these cases only to emphasize what should be apparent:

that our judgment in the present cases may not be taken to indicate the propriety in the future, of issuing temporary stays and restraining orders to block the publication of material sought to be suppressed by the government. So far as I can determine, never before has the United States sought to enjoin a newspaper from publishing information in its possession. The relative novelty of the questions presented, the necessary haste with which decisions were reached, the magnitude of the interests asserted, and the fact that all the parties have concentrated their arguments upon the question whether permanent restraints were proper may have justified at least some of the restraints heretofore imposed in these cases. Certainly it is difficult to fault the several courts below for seeking to assure that the issues here involved were preserved for ultimate review by this Court. But even if it be assumed that some of the interim restraints were proper in the two cases before us, that assumption has no bearing upon the propriety of similar judicial action in the future. To begin with, there has now been ample time for reflection and judgment; whatever values there may be in the preservation of novel questions for appellate review may not support any restraints in the future. More important, the First Amendment stands as an absolute bar to the imposition of judicial restraints in circumstances of the kind presented by these cases.

The error which has pervaded these cases from the outset was the granting of any injunctive relief whatsoever, interim or otherwise. The entire thrust of the government's claim throughout these cases has been that publication of the material sought to be enjoined "could," or "might," or "may" prejudice the national interest in various ways. But the First Amendment tolerates absolutely no prior judicial restraints of the press predicated upon surmise or conjecture that untoward consequences may result. Our cases, it is true, have indicated that there is a single, extremely narrow class of cases in which the First Amendment's ban on prior judicial restraint may be overridden. Our cases have thus far indicated that such cases may arise only when the Nation "is at war," Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47, 52 (1919), during which times "no one would question but that a government might prevent actual obstruction to its recruiting service or the publication of the sailing dates of transports or the number and location of troops." Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697, 716 (1931). Even if the present world situation were assumed to be tantamount to a time of war, or if the power of presently available armaments would justify even in peacetime the suppression of information that would set in motion a nuclear holocaust, in neither of these actions has the government presented or even alleged that publication of items from or based upon the material at issue would cause the happening of an event of that nature. "The chief purpose of [the First Amendment's] guarantee [is] to prevent previous restraints upon publication." Near v. Minnesota, supra, at 713. Thus, only governmental allegation and proof that publication must inevitably, directly and immediately cause the occurrence of an event kindred to imperiling the safety of a transport already at sea can support even the issuance of an interim restraining order. In no event may mere conclusions be sufficient: for if the executive branch seeks judicial aid in preventing publication, it must inevitably submit the basis upon which that aid is sought to scrutiny by the judiciary. And therefore, every restraint issued in this case, whatever its form, has violated the First Amendment—and none the less so because that restraint was justified as necessary to afford the court an opportunity to examine the claim more thoroughly. Unless and until the government has clearly made out its case, the First Amendment commands that no injunction may issue.

Justice STEWART, with whom Justice White joins, concurring.

In the governmental structure created by our Constitution, the executive is endowed with enormous power in the two related areas of national defense and international relations. This power, largely unchecked by the legislative and judicial branches, has been pressed to the very hilt since the advent of the nuclear missile age. For better or for worse, the simple fact is that a president of the United States possesses vastly greater constitutional independence in these two vital areas of power than does, say a prime minister of a country with a parliamentary form of government.

In the absence of the governmental checks and balances present in other areas of our national life, the only effective restraint upon executive policy and power in the areas of national defense and international affairs may lie in an enlightened citizenry—in an informed and critical public opinion which alone can here protect the values of democratic government. For this reason, it is perhaps here that a press that is alert, aware, and free most vitally serves the basic purpose of the First Amendment. For without an informed and free press there cannot be an enlightened people.

Yet it is elementary that the successful conduct of international diplomacy and the maintenance of an effective national defense require both confidentiality and secrecy. * * *

I think there can be but one answer to this dilemma, if dilemma it be. The responsibility must be where the power is. If the Constitution gives the executive a large degree of unshared power in the conduct of foreign affairs and the maintenance of our national defense, then under the Constitution the executive must have the largely unshared duty to determine and preserve the degree of internal security necessary to exercise that power successfully. It is an awesome responsibility, requiring judgment and wisdom of a high order. I should suppose that moral, political, and practical considerations would dictate that a very first principle of that wisdom would be an insistence upon avoiding secrecy for its own sake. For when everything is classified, then nothing is classified, and the system becomes one to be disregarded by the cynical or the careless, and to be manipulated by those intent on self-protection or self-promotion. I should suppose, in short, that the hallmark of a truly effective internal security system would be the maximum possible disclosure, recognizing that secrecy can best be preserved only when credibility is truly maintained. But be that as it may, it is clear to me that it is the constitutional duty of the executive—as a matter of sovereign prerogative and not as a matter of law as the courts know law—through the promulgation and enforcement of executive regulations, to protect the confidentiality necessary to carry out its responsibilities in the fields of international relations and national defense. [Emphasis added.]

This is not to say that Congress and the courts have no role to play. Undoubtedly Congress has the power to enact specific and appropriate criminal laws to protect government property and preserve government secrets. Congress has passed such laws, and several of them are of very colorable relevance to the apparent circumstances of these cases. And if a criminal prosecution is instituted, it will be the responsibility of the courts to decide the applicability of the criminal law under which the charge is brought. Moreover, if Congress should pass a specific law authorizing civil proceedings in this field, the courts would likewise have the duty to decide the constitutionality of such a law as well as its applicability to the facts proved.

But in the cases before us we are asked neither to construe specific regulations nor to apply specific laws. We are asked, instead, to perform a function that the Constitution gave to the executive, not the judiciary. We are asked, quite simply, to prevent the publication by two newspapers of material that the executive branch insists should not, in the national interest, be published. I am convinced that the executive is correct with respect to some of the documents involved. But I cannot say that disclosure of any of them will surely result in direct, immediate, and irreparable damage to our Nation or its people. That being so, there can under the First Amendment be but one judicial resolution of the issues before us. I join the judgments of the Court.

Justice WHITE, with whom Justice Stewart joins, concurring.

I concur in today's judgments, but only because of the concededly extraordinary protection against prior restraints enjoyed by the press under our constitutional system. I do not say that in no circumstances would the First Amendment permit an injunction against publishing information about government plans or operations. Nor, after examining the materials the government characterizes as the most sensitive and destructive, can I deny that revelation of these documents will do substantial damage to public interests. Indeed, I am confident that their disclosure will have that result. But I nevertheless agree that the United States has not satisfied the very heavy burden which it must meet to warrant an injunction against publication in these cases, at least in the absence of express and appropriately limited congressional authorization for prior restraints in circumstances such as these.

The government's position is simply stated: The responsibility of the executive for the conduct of the foreign affairs and for the security of the Nation is so basic that the president is entitled to an injunction against publication of a newspaper story whenever he can convince a court that the information to be revealed threatens "grave and irreparable" injury to the public interest; and the injunction should issue whether or not the material to be published is classified, whether or not publication would be lawful under relevant criminal statutes enacted by Congress and regardless of the circumstances by which the newspaper came into possession of the information.

At least in the absence of legislation by Congress, based on its own investigations and findings, I am quite unable to agree that the inherent powers of the executive and the courts reach so far as to authorize remedies having such sweeping potential for inhibiting publications by the press. Much of the difficulty inheres in the "grave and irreparable danger" standard suggested by the United States. If the United States were to have judgment under such a standard in these cases, our decision would be of little guidance to other courts in other cases, for the material at issue here would not be available from the Court's opinion or from public records, nor would it be published by the press. Indeed, even today where we hold that the United States has not met its burden, the material remains sealed in court records and it is properly not discussed in today's opinions. Moreover, because the material poses substantial dangers to national interests and because of the hazards of criminal sanctions, a responsible press may choose never to publish the more sensitive materials. To sustain the government in these cases would start the courts down a long and hazardous road that I am not willing to travel at least without congressional guidance and direction.

It is not easy to reject the proposition urged by the United States and to deny relief on its good-faith claims in these cases that publication will work serious damage to the country. But that discomfort is considerably dispelled by the infrequency of prior restraint cases. Normally, publication will occur and the damage be done before the government has either opportunity or grounds for suppression. So here, publication has already begun and a substantial part of the threatened damage has already occurred. The fact of a massive breakdown in security is known, access to the documents by many unauthorized people is undeniable and the efficacy of equitable relief against these or other newspapers to avert anticipated damage is doubtful at best.

What is more, terminating the ban on publication of the relatively few sensitive documents the government now seeks to suppress does not mean that the law either requires or invites newspapers or others to publish them or that they will be immune from criminal action if they do. Prior restraints require an unusually heavy justification under the First Amendment; but failure by the government to justify prior restraints does not measure its constitutional entitlement to a conviction for criminal publication. That the government mistakenly chose to proceed by injunction does not mean that it could not successfully proceed in another way.

When the Espionage Act was under consideration in 1917, Congress eliminated from the bill a provision that would have given the president broad powers in time of war to proscribe, under threat of criminal penalty, the publication of various categories of information related to the national defense. Congress at that time was unwilling to clothe the president with such far-reaching powers to monitor the press, and those opposed to this part of the legislation assumed that a necessary concomitant of such power was the power to "filter out the news to the people through some man." 55 Cong.Rec. 2008 (1917) [remarks of Senator Ashurst]. However, these same members of Congress appeared to have little doubt that newspapers would be subject to criminal prosecution if they insisted on publishing information of the type Congress had itself determined should not be revealed. Senator Ashurst, for example, was quite sure that the editor of such a newspaper "should be punished if he did publish information as to the movements of the fleet, the troops, the aircraft, the location of powder factories, the location of defense works, and all that sort of thing." 55 Cong.Rec. 1009 (1917).

The criminal code contains numerous provisions potentially relevant to these cases. Section 797 makes it a crime to publish certain photographs or drawings of military installations. Section 798, also in precise language, proscribes knowing and willful publications of any classified information concerning the cryptographic systems or communication intelligence activities of the United States as well as any information obtained from communication intelligence operations. If any of the material here at issue is of this nature, the newspapers are presumably now on full notice of the position of the United States and must face the consequences if they publish. I would have no difficulty in sustaining convictions under these sections on facts that would not justify the intervention of equity and the imposition of a prior restraint.

The same would be true under those sections of the criminal code casting a wider net to protect the national defense. Section 793(e) makes it a criminal act for any unauthorized possessor of a document "relating to national defense" either (1) willfully to communicate or cause to be communicated that document to any person not entitled to receive it or (2) willfully to retain the document and fail to deliver it to an officer of the United States entitled to receive it. The subsection was added in 1950 because pre-existing law provided no penalty for the unauthorized possessor unless demand for the documents was made. "The dangers surrounding the unauthorized possession of such items are self-evident, and it is deemed advisable to require their surrender in such a case, regardless of demand, especially since their unauthorized possession may be unknown to the authorities who would otherwise make the demand." S.Rep.No.2369, 81st Cong., 2d Sess., 9 (1950). Of course, in the cases before us, the unpublished documents have been demanded by the United States and their import has been made known at least to counsel for the newspapers involved. In Gorin v. United States, 312 U.S. 19, 28 (1941), the words "national defense" as used in a predecessor of § 793 were held by a unanimous court to have "a well understood connotation"—a "generic concept of broad connotations, referring to the military and naval establishments and the related activities of national preparedness"—and to be "sufficiently definite to apprise the public of prohibited activities" and to be consonant with due process. 312 U.S., at 28. Also, as construed by the Court in Gorin, information "connected with the national defense" is obviously not limited to that threatening "grave and irreparable" injury to the United States.

It is thus clear that Congress has addressed itself to the problems of protecting the security of the country and the national defense from unauthorized disclosure of potentially damaging information. Cf. Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 585–586 (1952); see also id., at 593–628 (Frankfurter, J., concurring). It has not, however, authorized the injunctive remedy against threatened publication. It has apparently been satisfied to rely on criminal sanctions and their deterrent effect on the responsible as well as the irresponsible press. I am not, of course, saying that either of these newspapers has yet committed a crime or that either would commit a crime if they published all the material now in their possession. That matter must await resolution in the context of a criminal proceeding if one is instituted by the United States. In that event, the issue of guilt or innocence would be determined by procedures and standards quite different from those that have purported to govern these injunctive proceedings.

Justice MARSHALL, concurring.

The government contends that the only issue in this case is whether in a suit by the United States, "the First Amendment bars a court from prohibiting a newspaper from publishing material whose disclosure would pose a grave and immediate danger to the security of the United States." Brief of the government, at 6. With all due respect, I believe the ultimate issue in this case is even more basic than the one posed by the solicitor general. The issue is whether this Court or the Congress has the power to make law.

In this case there is no problem concerning the president's power to classify information as "secret" or "top secret." Congress has specifically recognized presidential authority, which has been formally exercised in Executive Order 10501, to classify documents and information. See, e.g., 18 U.S.C.A. § 798; 50 U.S.C.A. § 783. Nor is there any issue here regarding the president's power as chief executive and commander in chief to protect national security by disciplining employees who disclose information and by taking precautions to prevent leaks.

The problem here is whether in this particular case the Executive Branch has authority to invoke the equity jurisdiction of the courts to protect what it believes to be the national interest. See In re Debs, 158 U.S. 564, 584 (1895). The government argues that in addition to the inherent power of any government to protect itself, the president's power to conduct foreign affairs and his position as commander in chief give him authority to impose censorship on the press to protect his ability to deal effectively with foreign nations and to conduct the military affairs of the country. Of course, it is beyond cavil that the president has broad powers by virtue of his primary responsibility for the conduct of our foreign affairs and his position as commander in chief. * * * And in some situations it may be that under whatever inherent powers the government may have, as well as the implicit authority derived from the president's mandate to conduct foreign affairs and to act as commander in chief, there is a basis for the invocation of the equity jurisdiction of this Court as an aid to prevent the publication of material damaging to "national security," however that term may be defined.

It would, however, be utterly inconsistent with the concept of separation of power for this Court to use its power of contempt to prevent behavior that Congress has specifically declined to prohibit. There would be a similar damage to the basic concept of these coequal branches of government if when the executive has adequate authority granted by Congress to protect "national security" it can choose instead to invoke the contempt power of a court to enjoin the threatened conduct. The Constitution provides that Congress shall make laws, the president execute laws, and courts interpret law. Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579 (1952). It did not provide for government by injunction in which the courts and the Executive can "make law" without regard to the action of Congress. It may be more convenient for the executive if it need only convince a judge to prohibit conduct rather than to ask the Congress to pass a law and it may be more convenient to enforce a contempt order than seek a criminal conviction in a jury trial. Moreover, it may be considered politically wise to get a court to share the responsibility for arresting those who the executive has probable cause to believe are violating the law. But convenience and political considerations of the moment do not justify a basic departure from the principles of our system of government.

In this case we are not faced with a situation where Congress has failed to provide the executive with broad power to protect the Nation from disclosure of damaging state secrets. Congress has on several occasions given extensive consideration to the problem of protecting the military and strategic secrets of the United States. This consideration has resulted in the enactment of statutes making it a crime to receive, disclose, communicate, withhold, and publish certain documents, photographs, instruments, appliances, and information. The bulk of these statutes are found in chapter 37 of U.S.C.A. Title 18, entitled Espionage and Censorship. In that chapter, Congress has provided penalties ranging from a $10,000 fine to death for violating the various statutes.

Thus it would seem that in order for this Court to issue an injunction it would require a showing that such an injunction would enhance the already existing power of the government tract. See Bennett v. Laman, 277 N.Y. 368, 14 N.E.2d 439 (1938). It is a traditional axiom of equity that a court of equity will not do a useless thing just as it is a traditional axiom that equity will not enjoin the commission of a crime. Here there has been no attempt to make such a showing. The solicitor general does not even mention in his brief whether the government considers there to be probable cause to believe a crime has been committed or whether there is a conspiracy to commit future crimes.

If the government had attempted to show that there was no effective remedy under traditional criminal law, it would have had to show that there is no arguably applicable statute. Of course, at this stage this Court could not and cannot determine whether there has been a violation of a particular statute nor decide the constitutionality of any statute. Whether a good-faith prosecution could have been instituted under any statute could, however, be determined. * * *

It is true that Judge Gurfein found that Congress had not made it a crime to publish the items and material specified in § 793(e): He found that the words "communicates, delivers, transmits * * *" did not refer to publication of newspaper stories. And that view has some support in the legislative history and conforms with the past practice of using the statute only to prosecute those charged with ordinary espionage. But see 103 Cong.Rec. 10449 [remarks of Sen. Humphrey]. Judge Gurfein's view of the statute is not, however, the only plausible construction that could be given. See my Brother White's concurring opinion.

Even if it is determined that the government could not in good faith bring criminal prosecutions against the New York Times and the Washington Post, it is clear that Congress has specifically rejected passing legislation that would have clearly given the president the power he seeks here and made the current activity of the newspapers unlawful. When Congress specifically declines to make conduct unlawful it is not for this Court to redecide those issues—to overrule Congress. See Youngstown Sheet & Tube v. Sawyer, 345 U.S. 579 (1952).

On at least two occasions Congress has refused to enact legislation that would have made the conduct engaged in here unlawful and given the president the power that he seeks in this case. In 1917 during the debate over the original Espionage Act, still the basic provisions of § 793, Congress rejected a proposal to give the president in time of war or threat of war authority to directly prohibit by proclamation the publication of information relating to national defense that might be useful to the enemy. * * *

Congress rejected this proposal after war against Germany had been declared even though many believed that there was a grave national emergency and that the threat of security leaks and espionage were serious. The Executive has not gone to Congress and requested that the decision to provide such power be reconsidered. Instead, the executive comes to this Court and asks that it be granted the power Congress refused to give.

* * * Senator Cotton, proposed that "Congress enact legislation making it a crime for any person willfully to disclose without proper authorization, for any purpose whatever, information classified 'secret' or 'top secret,' knowing, or having reasonable grounds to believe, such information to have been so classified." Report of Commission on Government Security 619-620 (1957). After substantial floor discussion on the proposal, it was rejected. See 103 Cong.Rec. 10447-10450. If the proposal that Senator Cotton championed on the floor had been enacted, the publication of the documents involved here would certainly have been a crime. Congress refused, however, to make it a crime. * * *

Either the government has the power under statutory grant to use traditional criminal law to protect the country or, if there is no basis for arguing that Congress has made the activity a crime, it is plain that Congress has specifically refused to grant the authority the government seeks from this Court. In either case this Court does not have authority to grant the requested relief. It is not for this Court to fling itself into every breach perceived by some government official nor is it for this Court to take on itself the burden of enacting law, especially law that Congress has refused to pass.

I believe that the judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia should be affirmed and the judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit should be reversed insofar as it remands the case for further hearings.

Chief Justice BURGER, dissenting.

So clear are the constitutional limitations on prior restraint against expression, that from the time of Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931), until recently in Organization for a Better Austin v. Keefe, 402 U.S. 415 (1971), we have had little occasion to be concerned with cases involving prior restraints against news reporting on matters of public interest. There is, therefore, little variation among the members of the Court in terms of resistance to prior restraints against publication. Adherence to this basic constitutional principle, however, does not make this case a simple one. In this case, the imperative of a free and unfettered press comes into collision with another imperative, the effective functioning of a complex modern government and specifically the effective exercise of certain constitutional powers of the executive. Only those who view the First Amendment as an absolute in all circumstances—a view I respect, but reject—can find such a case as this to be simple or easy.

This case is not simple for another and more immediate reason. We do not know the facts of the case. No district judge knew all the facts. No court of appeals judge knew all the facts. No member of this Court knows all the facts.

Why are we in this posture, in which only those judges to whom the First Amendment is absolute and permits of no restraint in any circumstances or for any reason, are really in a position to act?

I suggest we are in this posture because these cases have been conducted in unseemly haste. Justice Harlan covers the chronology of events demonstrating the hectic pressures under which these cases have been processed and I need not restate them. The prompt setting of these cases reflects our universal abhorrence of prior restraint. But prompt judicial action does not mean unjudicial haste.

Here, moreover, the frenetic haste is due in large part to the manner in which the Times proceeded from the date it obtained the purloined documents. It seems reasonably clear now that the haste precluded reasonable and deliberate judicial treatment of these cases and was not warranted. The precipitous action of this Court aborting a trial not yet completed is not the kind of judicial conduct which ought to attend the disposition of a great issue.

The newspapers make a derivative claim under the First Amendment; they denominate this right as the public right-to-know; by implication, the Times asserts a sole trusteeship of that right by virtue of its journalist "scoop." The right is asserted as an absolute. Of course, the First Amendment right itself is not an absolute, as Justice Holmes so long ago pointed out in his aphorism concerning the right to shout of fire in a crowded theater. There are other exceptions, some of which Chief Justice Hughes mentioned by way of example in Near v. Minnesota. There are no doubt other exceptions no one has had occasion to describe or discuss. Conceivably such exceptions may be lurking in these cases and would have been flushed had they been properly considered in the trial courts, free from unwarranted deadlines and frenetic pressures. A great issue of this kind should be tried in a judicial atmosphere conducive to thoughtful, reflective deliberation, especially when haste, in terms of hours, is unwarranted in light of the long period the Times, by its own choice, deferred publication.

It is not disputed that the Times has had unauthorized possession of the documents for three to four months, during which it has had its expert analysts studying them, presumably digesting them and preparing the material for publication. During all of this time, the Times, presumably in its capacity as trustee of the public's "right to know," has held up publication for purposes it considered proper and thus public knowledge was delayed. No doubt this was for a good reason; the analysis of 7,000 pages of complex material drawn from a vastly greater volume of material would inevitably take time and the writing of good news stories takes time. But why should the United States Government, from whom this information was illegally acquired by someone, along with all the counsel, trial judges, and appellate judges be placed under needless pressure? After these months of deferral, the alleged right-to-know has somehow and suddenly become a right that must be vindicated instantler.

Would it have been unreasonable, since the newspaper could anticipate the government's objections to release of secret material, to give the government an opportunity to review the entire collection and determine whether agreement could be reached on publication? Stolen or not, if security was not in fact jeopardized, much of the material could no doubt have been declassified, since it spans a period ending in 1968. With such an approach—one that great newspapers have in the past practiced and stated editorially to be the duty of an honorable press—the newspapers and government might well have narrowed the area of disagreement as to what was and was not publishable, leaving the remainder to be resolved in orderly litigation if necessary. To me it is hardly believable that a newspaper long regarded as a great institution in American life would fail to perform one of the basic and simple duties of every citizen with respect to the discovery or possession of stolen property or secret government documents. That duty, I had thought—perhaps naively—was to report forthwith, to responsible public officers. This duty rests on taxi drivers, Justices and the New York Times. The course followed by the Times whether so calculated or not, removed any possibility of orderly litigation of the issues. If the action of the judges up to now has been correct, that result is sheer happenstance.

Our grant of the writ before final judgment in the Times case aborted the trial in the District Court before it had made a complete record pursuant to the mandate of the Court of Appeals, Second Circuit.

The consequence of all this melancholy series of events is that we literally do not know what we are acting on. As I see it we have been forced to deal with litigation concerning rights of great magnitude without an adequate record, and surely without time for adequate treatment either in the prior proceedings or in this Court. It is interesting to note that counsel in oral argument before this Court were frequently unable to respond to questions on factual points. Not surprisingly they pointed out that they had been working literally "around the clock" and simply were unable to review the documents that give rise to these cases and were not familiar with them. This Court is in no better posture. I agree with Justice Harlan and Justice Blackmun but I am not prepared to reach the merits.<sup>2</sup>

I would affirm the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit and allow the district court to complete the trial aborted by our grant of certiorari meanwhile preserving the status quo in the Post case. I would direct that the district court on remand give priority to the Times case to the exclusion of all other business of that court but I would not set arbitrary deadlines.

I should add that I am in general agreement with much of what Justice White has expressed with respect to penal sanctions concerning communication or retention of documents or information relating to the national defense.

We all crave speedier judicial processes but when judges are pressured as in these cases the result is a parody of the judicial process.

2. With respect to the question of inherent power of the executive to classify papers, records and documents as secret, or otherwise unavailable for public exposure, and to secure aid of the courts for enforcement, there may be an analogy with respect to this Court. No statute gives this Court express power to establish and enforce the utmost security measures for the secrecy of our deliberations and records. Yet I have little doubt as to the inherent power of the Court to protect the confidentiality of its internal operations by whatever judicial measures may be required.

Justice HARLAN, with whom the Chief Justice and Justice Blackmun join, dissenting.

With all respect, I consider that the Court has been almost irresponsibly feverish in dealing with these cases.

Both the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit and the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit rendered judgment on June 23. The New York Times' petition for certiorari, its motion for accelerated consideration thereof, and its application for interim relief were filed in this Court on June 24 at about 11 a.m. The application of the United States for interim relief in the Post case was also filed here on June 24, at about 7:15 p.m. This Court's order setting a hearing before us on June 26 at 11 a.m., a course which I joined only to avoid the possibility of even more peremptory action by the Court, was issued less than 24 hours before. The record in the Post case was filed with the Clerk shortly before 1 p.m. on June 25; the record in the Times case did not arrive until 7 or 8 o'clock that same night. The briefs of the parties were received less than two hours before argument on June 23.

This frenzied train of events took place in the name of the presumption against prior restraints created by the First Amendment. Due regard for the extraordinarily important and difficult questions involved in these litigations should have led the Court to shun such a precipitate timetable. In order to decide the merits of these cases properly, some or all of the following questions should have been faced:

1. Whether the attorney general is authorized to bring these suits in the name of the United States. Compare In re Debs, 158 U.S. 564 (1895), with Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579 (1952). This question involves as well the construction and validity of a singularly opaque statute—the Espionage Act, 18 U.S.C.A. § 793(e).

2. Whether the First Amendment permits the federal courts to enjoin publication of stories which would present a serious threat to national security. See Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697, 716 (1931) (dictum).

3. Whether the threat to publish highly secret documents is of itself a sufficient implication of national security to justify an injunction on the theory that regardless of the contents of the documents harm enough results simply from the demonstration of such a breach of secrecy.

4. Whether the unauthorized disclosure of any of these particular documents would seriously impair the national security.

5. What weight should be given to the opinion of high officers in the executive branch of the government with respect to questions 3 and 4.

6. Whether the newspapers are entitled to retain and use the documents notwithstanding the seemingly uncontested facts that the documents, or the originals of which they are duplicates, were purloined from the government's possession and that the newspapers received them with knowledge that they had been feloniously acquired. Cf. Liberty Lobby, Inc. v. Pearson, 390 F.2d 489 (C.A.D.C.1968).

7. Whether the threatened harm to the national security or the government's possessory interest in the documents justifies the issuance of an injunction against publication in light of—

- a. The strong First Amendment policy against prior restraints on publication;
- b. The doctrine against enjoining conduct in violation of criminal statutes; and
- c. The extent to which the materials at issue have apparently already been otherwise disseminated.

These are difficult questions of fact, of law, and of judgment; the potential consequences of erroneous decision are enormous. The time which has been available to us, to the lower courts, and to the parties has been wholly inadequate for giving these cases the kind of consideration they deserve. It is a reflection on the stability of the judicial process that these great issues—as important as any that have arisen during my time on the Court—should have been decided under the pressures engendered by the torrent of publicity that has attended these litigations from their inception.

Forced as I am to reach the merits of these cases, I dissent from the opinion and judgments of the Court. Within the severe limitations imposed by the time constraints under which I have been required to operate, I can only state my reasons in telescoped form, even though in different circumstances I would have felt constrained to deal with the cases in the fuller sweep indicated above.

It is a sufficient basis for affirming the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in the Times litigation to observe that its order must rest on the conclusion that because of the time elements the government had not been given an adequate opportunity to present its case to the district court. At the least this conclusion was not an abuse of discretion.

In the Post litigation the government had more time to prepare; this was apparently the basis for the refusal of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit on rehearing to conform its judgment to that of the second circuit. But I think there is another and more fundamental reason why this judgment cannot stand—a reason which also furnishes an additional ground for not reinstating the judgment of the district court in the Times litigation, set aside by the court of appeals. It is plain to me that the scope of the judicial function in passing upon the activities of the executive branch of the government in the field of foreign affairs is very narrowly restricted. This view is, I think, dictated by the concept of separation of powers upon which our constitutional system rests.

In a speech on the floor of the House of Representatives, Chief Justice John Marshall, then a member of that body, stated:

The president is the sole organ of the nation in its external relations, and its sole representative with foreign nations. Annals, 6th Cong., col. 613 (1800).

* * * From that time, shortly after the founding of the Nation, to this, there has been no substantial challenge to this description of the scope of executive power.

The power to evaluate the “pernicious influence” of premature disclosure is not, however, lodged in the executive alone. I agree that, in performance of its duty to protect the values of the First Amendment against political pressures, the judiciary must review the initial executive determination to the point of satisfying itself that the subject matter of the dispute does lie within the proper compass of the president’s foreign relations power. Constitutional considerations forbid “a complete abandonment of judicial control.” Cf. United States v. Reynolds, 345 U.S. 1, 8 (1953). Moreover, the judiciary may properly insist that the determination that disclosure of the subject matter would irreparably impair the national security be made by the head of the executive department concerned—here the secretary of state or the secretary of defense—after actual personal consideration by that officer. This safeguard is required in the analogous area of executive claims of privilege for secrets of state. See United States v. Reynolds, supra, at 8 and n. 20; Duncan v. Cammell, Laird & Co., [1942] A.C. 624, 638 (House of Lords).

But in my judgment the judiciary may not properly go beyond these two inquiries and redetermine for itself the probable impact of disclosure on the national security.

Even if there is some room for the judiciary to override the executive determination, it is plain that the scope of review must be exceedingly narrow. I can see no indication in the opinions of either the district court or the court of appeals in the Post litigation that the conclusions of the executive were given even the deference owing to an administrative agency, much less that owing to a coequal branch of the government operating within the field of its constitutional prerogative.

Accordingly, I would vacate the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit on this ground and remand the case for further proceedings in the district court. Before the commencement of such further proceedings, due opportunity should be afforded the government for procuring from the secretary of state or the secretary of defense or both an expression of their views on the issue of national security. The ensuing review by the district court should be in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion. And for the reasons stated above I would affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

Pending further hearings in each case conducted under the appropriate ground rules, I would continue the restraints on publication. I cannot believe that the doctrine prohibiting prior restraints reaches to the point of preventing courts from maintaining the status quo long enough to act responsibly in matters of such national importance as those involved here.

Justice BLACKMUN.

I join Justice Harlan in his dissent. I also am in substantial accord with much that Justice White says, by way of admonition, in the latter part of his opinion.

At this point the focus is on only the comparatively few documents specified by the government as critical. So far as the other material—vast in amount—is concerned, let it be published and published forthwith if the newspapers, once the strain is gone and the sensationalism is eased, still feel the urge so to do.

But we are concerned here with the few documents specified from the 47 volumes. * * *

The New York Times clandestinely devoted a period of three months examining the 47 volumes that came into its unauthorized possession. Once it had begun publication of material from those volumes, the New York case now before us emerged. It immediately assumed, and ever since has maintained, a frenetic pace and character. Seemingly, once publication started, the material could not be made public fast enough. Seemingly, from then on, every deferral or delay, by restraint or otherwise, was abhorrent and was to be deemed violative of the First Amendment and of the public's "right immediately to know." Yet that newspaper stood before us at oral argument and professed criticism of the government for not lodging its protest earlier than by a Monday telegram following the initial Sunday publication.

The District of Columbia case is much the same.

Two federal district courts, two United States courts of appeals, and this Court—within a period of less than three weeks from inception until today—have been pressed into hurried decision of profound constitutional issues on inadequately developed and largely assumed facts without the careful deliberation that hopefully, should characterize the American judicial process. There has been much writing about the law and little knowledge and less digestion of the facts. In the New York case the judges, both trial and appellate, had not yet examined the basic material when the case was brought here. In the District of Columbia case, little more was done, and what was accomplished in this respect was only on required remand, with the Washington Post, on the excuse that it was trying to protect its source of information, initially refusing to reveal what material it actually possessed, and with the district court forced to make assumptions as to that possession.

With such respect as may be due to the contrary view, this, in my opinion, is not the way to try a lawsuit of this magnitude and asserted importance. It is not the way for federal courts to adjudicate, and to be required to adjudicate, issues that allegedly concern the Nation's vital welfare. The country would be none the worse off were the cases tried quickly, to be sure, but in the customary and properly deliberative manner. The most recent of the material, it is said, dates no later than 1968, already about three years ago, and the Times itself took three months to formulate its plan of procedure and, thus, deprived its public for that period.

The First Amendment, after all, is only one part of an entire Constitution. Article II of the great document vests in the executive branch primary power over the conduct of foreign affairs and places in that branch the responsibility for the Nation's safety. Each provision of the Constitution is important, and I cannot subscribe to a doctrine of unlimited absolutism for the First Amendment at the cost of downgrading other provisions. First Amendment absolutism has never commanded a majority of this Court. See, for example, Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697, 708 (1931), and Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47, 52 (1919). What is needed here is a weighing, upon properly developed standards, of the broad right of the press to print and of the very narrow right of the Government to prevent. Such standards are not yet developed. The parties here are in disagreement as to what those standards should be. But even the newspapers concede that there are situations where restraint is in order and is constitutional. Justice Holmes gave us a suggestion when he said in Schenck,

"It is a question of proximity and degree. When a nation is at war many things that might be said in time of peace are such a hindrance to its effort that their utterance will not be endured so long as men fight and that no Court could regard them as protected by any constitutional right." 249 U.S., at 52.

I therefore would remand these cases to be developed expeditiously, of course, but on a schedule permitting the orderly presentation of evidence from both sides, with the use of discovery, if necessary, as authorized by the rules, and with the preparation of briefs, oral argument and court opinions of a quality better than has been seen to this point. In making this last statement, I criticize no lawyer or judge. I know from past personal experience the agony of time pressure in the preparation of litigation. But these cases and the issues involved and the courts, including this one, deserve better than has been produced thus far.

It may well be that if these cases were allowed to develop as they should be developed, and to be tried as lawyers should try them and as courts should hear them, free of pressure and panic and sensationalism, other light would be shed on the situation and contrary considerations, for me, might prevail. But that is not the present posture of the litigation.

The Court, however, decides the cases today the other way. I therefore add one final comment.

I strongly urge, and sincerely hope, that these two newspapers will be fully aware of their ultimate responsibilities to the United States of America. Judge Wilkey, dissenting in the District of Columbia case, after a review of only the affidavits before his court (the basic papers had not then been made available by either party), concluded that there were a number of examples of documents that if in the possession of the Post, and if published, "could clearly result in great harm to the nation," and he defined "harm" to mean "the death of soldiers, the destruction of alliances, the greatly increased difficulty of negotiation with our enemies, the inability of our diplomats to negotiate * * *." I, for one, have now been able to give at least some cursory study not only to the affidavits, but to the material itself. I regret to say that from this examination I fear that Judge Wilkey's statements have possible foundation. I therefore share his concern. I hope that damage already has not been done. If, however, damage has been done, and if, with the Court's action today, these newspapers proceed to publish the critical documents and there results therefrom "the death of soldiers, the destruction of alliances, the greatly increased difficulty of negotiation with our enemies, the inability of our diplomats to negotiate," to which list I might add the factors of prolongation of the war and of further delay in the freeing of United States prisoners, then the Nation's people will know where the responsibility for these sad consequences rests.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit is therefore affirmed. The order of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit is reversed and the case is remanded with directions to enter a judgment affirming the judgment of the District Court for the Southern District of New York. The stays entered June 25, 1971, by the Court are vacated. The judgments shall issue forthwith.

So ordered.

COMMENT

1. The doctrine urged by the government was that the president has the right to enjoin publication of a news story when the context of the story threatens "grave and irreparable" injury to the public interest. Justice White denied both the existence and the validity of this doctrine at least in the absence of legislation authorizing the courts to grant injunctions in such circumstances.

Freedom of the press can be viewed as providing two modes of protection. One is freedom from prior restraint. The second is freedom from subsequent punishment. Criminal prosecution of Sulzberger or Graham, publishers respectively of the New York Times and the Washington Post, after publication of the Pentagon Papers would be an example of subsequent punishment. Apparently Justice White was of the opinion that the "extraordinary protection" granted the press by the First Amendment against prior restraints is to be distinguished from the protection afforded the press by the First Amendment in the case of subsequent punishments. The greater protection from prior restraint presumably is based on the premise that a restraint on publication prior to publication deprives society of the benefit of the idea. The punishment of the writer or publisher subsequent to publication still has not hindered the dissemination of the idea. Is this a persuasive distinction?

If the publishers of newspapers are free from prior restraint prior to publication but know that after publication they may go to jail, doesn't this effectively restrain publication in the first place? The lesser protection against subsequent punishment itself may act as a prior restraint. In effect, the lesser freedom from subsequent punishment forces publishers and journalists to become martyrs when they want to publish information the government desires to suppress.

For Justice White, as for Justice Stewart, the case for criminal convictions against those publishing the Pentagon Papers was much stronger than the case for preventing by injunction the publication of the papers: "I would have no difficulty in sustaining convictions under these sections on facts that would not justify the intervention of equity and the imposition of a prior restraint." Why? Apparently because, in White's view, Congress had authorized criminal prosecutions, but it had not authorized the "injunctive remedy against threatened publication." The journalist and the civil libertarian at this point might wonder whether the 1971 New York Times case is a victory or a trap for freedom of information and freedom from prior restraint. The newsperson is being told that he or she may publish but will have to put their bodies on the line if they do. Four of the nine justices would seem to condone criminal penalties if indeed United States interests have been gravely injured.

2. Congress had not by statute authorized the injunctions against the press to prevent publication of material posing a danger to the security interests of the nation, even though it had been asked to do so in two world wars. This single fact was determinative for Justice Marshall, as it had been for Justices White and Stewart. The issue, said Justice Marshall, was whether the Court or the Congress should make law. But the Supreme Court has not hesitated to make law before.

3. Perhaps more squarely than any of the other opinions, Burger's dissent raises the issue of accountability: who should make the ultimate decisions about how far the reach of a free press can extend and to what extent should the demands of government for confidentiality in its dealings be honored? Chief Justice Burger was greatly disturbed by the fact that in the haste of decision the Court had neither time to study the documents themselves nor to consider soberly the great issues presented.

Describing the public right to know as a derivative First Amendment claim, Burger protested the Times' apparent position that it was the absolute trustee of the public right to know. He argued that the First Amendment itself was not an absolute, much less were any radiations the Amendment might throw off such as the public's right to know.

Burger's reactions to the issues of the Times case are at once protective of the information process and sympathetic to the need of government for confidentiality. The Chief Justice says that the government should have been given an opportunity to review the papers in possession of the Times in the hope that agreement about publication could have been reached. On the other hand, the fact that the papers were stolen was in Burger's view no bar to declassification of some of them.

Burger thought it was anomalous that the Times would not allow the government to examine the Pentagon Papers in the Times' possession for fear this might jeopardize the paper's sources. Yet, said Burger, the Times denies the government the right to keep the papers secret. But is the government really interested in protecting sources in the same way the New York Times was interested in protecting its sources? Certainly, there was a respectable body of opinion in the country which believed that the government was anxious to protect the identity of participants in decisions on the Vietnam involvement as well as the nature of some of the decisions themselves. The Times, however, was anxious to protect the sources which made it possible to learn the identity of participants in vital national decisions. In other words, the interest of the Times in protecting its sources was procedural in nature. From whom the newspapers receive information is, informationally speaking, much less significant than the information obtained. Secrecy over such sources is designed to protect the future of the information flow. The government, on the other hand, was interested in protecting confidentiality to shield prior decisions of the highest substantive character. As a First Amendment matter, doesn't this distinction support the Times and not the government?

Chief Justice Burger is truly astonished that the Times did not report to the government that papers stolen from the government were in its possession. But the responsibilities to government in this regard were surely overshadowed in the Times' judgment by its obligations to the information process, a duty which it believed had First Amendment significance. In the last analysis, the question presented was a choice between a newspaper's determination of the legitimate demands of the public's right to know and the executive's conception of what must remain secret. Which determination should prevail?

4. Is a consequence of Justice Black's absolute view of the First Amendment that there is no recourse if the newspapers are not aware of their responsibilities? It is argued that at least the executive is subject to popular election and may be turned out of office if it is faithless to its responsibilities, but the press is not similarly accountable to the people.

5. A majority of the Court appeared to agree with Justice Brennan's observation that the basic error in the entire proceeding was Judge Gurfein's issuance of the temporary restraining order against the New York Times. Why then were there so many opinions in the case? In an interview, Chief Justice Burger answered this question by saying that it was decided that if each justice wrote his own opinion that would make it easier to get an expedited decision of the case.

6. Justice Black emphasized the unprecedented character of the judicial restraint on the press. The Pentagon Papers case was the first time an American newspaper had been restrained by a court order from publishing articles and documents the content of which could only be surmised by the government and whose damaging properties therefore could only be assumed. Viewed from that perspective, the 6-3 Supreme Court determination that the issuance of a restraining order in such circumstances was unconstitutional was a victory for freedom of information and freedom of the press. In this regard, the victory was more than an abstract vindication of constitutional theory. The decision unquestionably would deprive the whole government classification program of its legitimacy and its mystery, developments which are in the long term interest of opening up the information process.

7. See the material on the Freedom of Information Act set forth in the text at p. 439. How could the Freedom of Information Act have been used to declassify the Pentagon Papers?

8. The Times agonized for three months over whether to publish the Pentagon Papers. They chose to publish and thereby invited a bitter conflict with government. Why? Perhaps the Times was still feeling the burn it got when it "cooperated" with the Administration prior to the Bay of Pigs fiasco and, therefore, decided never to get caught in that situation again. Five years after the abortive invasion it was disclosed that the New York Times had prior knowledge of the project but had declined to publish it, at the request of President John F. Kennedy, because of national security considerations. Clifton Daniel, then managing editor of the paper, combined this disclosure with his conclusion that the Bay of Pigs operation "might well have been canceled, and the country would have been saved enormous embarrassment, if the New York Times and other newspapers had been more diligent in the performance of their duty."

Finally, there is a minor but important theme in the whole Pentagon Papers case—the issue of whether government ought to be able to imprison history.

9. In the bizarre Progressive case, the federal government sought to prevent The Progressive magazine from publishing an article on how to make a hydrogen bomb. The article was based on material that was publicly available. At first, the federal district court granted the government's request for a temporary injunction restraining publication of the article by The Progressive on the ground that the article fell "within the narrow area recognized by the court in Near v. Minnesota in which a prior restraint on publication is appropriate." Which Near exception was the court relying on? The federal district court also cited Justice Stewart's opinion in the Pentagon Papers case as support for its view that a temporary injunction should be issued. The Atomic Energy Act contained a provision authorizing the issuance of injunctive relief to prevent disclosure of particular types of information. Assuming that that provision applied to The Progressive article, would the existence of such a statutory provision distinguish The Progressive case from the Pentagon Papers case? Arguably, it would, because the fact that there was no statutory basis for the granting of injunctive relief in the Pentagon Papers case was relied on by a number of justices as ground for not granting relief for the government.

Assuming that the statutory provision did apply to the article in The Progressive case, would the statutory provision be valid under the First Amendment? This is a matter of speculation since other newspapers began to publish material similar to that contained in The Progressive article and the government decided not to go forward in its effort to secure permanent injunctive relief concerning The Progressive article. See United States v. Progressive, Inc., 467 F.Supp. 990 (W.D.Wis.1979), appeal dismissed 610 F.2d 819 (7th Cir.).

Progressive editor Erwin Knoll is on record as saying that the greatest moral error of his life was not to have published the original article. Disobey a court injunction, University of Michigan law Professor Vincent Blasi has argued in rebuttal, and you escalate the totalitarian dynamic. The government, as has been noted, based its arguments primarily on provisions of the Atomic Energy Act prohibiting communication, transmission, and disclosure of certain categories of information which, the government contended, were either "classified at birth" or of a technical nature not protected by the First Amendment.

Judge Warren in his opinion for the federal district court saw the issue as one between freedom of speech and press and the freedom to live. If our right to live is extinguished, he said, the right to publish becomes moot. His test would have been that of Justices White and Stewart in their Pentagon Papers opinions—"immediate, direct, irreparable harm to the interests of the United States * * * to our nation and its people."

Abandonment of the case by the government was another lost opportunity for appellate courts to face the ultimate and still unresolved question of what is to be the constitutional relationship between prior restraints and national security. In answering that question, the courts will eventually have to define both prior restraints and national security, two complex concepts in precarious balance.

NEBRASKA PRESS and the Future of Prior Restraint

A major case involving the issue of the constitutional validity of prior restraints against the press is the so-called "gag order" case, Nebraska Press Ass'n v. Stuart, text, p. 505. Although the case is discussed primarily in the free press-fair trial materials, text, Chapter VI, it has authoritative significance on the present status of prior restraints against the press.

1. The decision of the Court in Nebraska Press Ass'n stretched the thesis advanced in earlier cases that there is a presumption against prior restraints and that the state must meet a heavy burden before such a restraint can issue. In result, the Nebraska Press case reached the same conclusion as had its predecessors—Near and the Pentagon Papers case. In each case, the Supreme Court refused to issue a prior restraint against the press.

And yet, although the press was victorious on each occasion, the Court appeared determined to keep alive the possibility that in some undescribed circumstances a prior restraint against the press might be permissible. In short, although the Court has erected the strongest possible obstacles to the issuance of a prior restraint in the context of a "gag order" case, it still appeared resolved to reject "the proposition that a prior restraint can never be employed." Justice White, in a concurring opinion, suggested that if the consequence of the Court's Nebraska Press decision is to refuse to issue "gag orders" against the press in case after case on the ground that they are invalid prior restraints, then "we should at some point announce a more general rule and avoid the interminable litigation that our failure to do so would necessarily entail."

2. Justice Brennan's passionate distaste for prior restraints against the press is made vividly clear in his concurring opinion in Nebraska Press. He comments proudly on "the rarity of prior restraint cases of any type in this Court's jurisprudence." Analyzing the prior case law, he finds only one occasion where the exception to the presumption against prior restraints against the press might be deemed sufficient to authorize suppression before publication, i.e., the so-called military security exception in Near. This would be the situation where a newspaper plans to publish the sailing date of a troop ship in war, or its modern counterpart. The "overriding countervailing" interests that justify such suppression in wartime were, in his view, hardly comparable to the case for a prior restraint against the press in the interests of a fair trial.

Does the following state the essence of the Brennan concurrence? Although prior restraints are not always invalid, prior restraints in the form of "gag orders" against the press in the free press-fair trial context are always invalid. Perhaps the difference between Chief Justice Burger and Justice Brennan on this point is that the Burger opinion kept open the possibility, no matter how remote, that some "gag orders" against the press were yet conceivable while the Brennan view would remove that possibility. Brennan would adhere to the military security exception, despite the general freedom he would accord the press from prior restraint, but would not grant a new exception in the interest of fair trial. Yet the latter is a constitutional value, enshrined in the Sixth Amendment, while secrecy in wartime, although it may be a societal value of great importance, is not mentioned in the constitution.

3. On balance, if one compares Near and New York Times with the decision in Nebraska Press, the conclusion appears clear that never in American constitutional history has the barrier posed by the First Amendment to the issuance of prior restraints against the press been higher and more difficult to surmount. See the discussion in the Access to the Judicial Process: Free Press and Fair Trial chapter on new efforts to circumvent these developments, text, p. 511.

Censorship of the Press by Conditioning the Use of the Mails: The Doctrine of Unconstitutional Conditions

UNITED STATES, ex rel., MILWAUKEE SOCIAL DEMOCRATIC PUBLISHING CO.
v. BURLESON

255 U.S. 407, 41 S.C.T. 352, 65 L.ED. 704 (1921).

Justice CLARKE delivered the opinion of the Court.

After a hearing on September 22, 1917, by the third assistant postmaster general, of the time and character of which the relator [plaintiff in error] had due notice and at which it was represented by its president, an order was entered, revoking the second-class mail privilege granted to it in 1911 as publisher of the Milwaukee Leader. * * *

[The Milwaukee Social Democratic Publishing Company then instituted suit asking for mandamus to command the postmaster general to restore the newspaper's second-class mailing privilege.]

* * *

The grounds upon which the relator relies are, in substance, that to the extent that the Espionage Act confers power upon the postmaster general to make the order entered against it, that act is unconstitutional, because it does not afford relator a trial in a court of competent jurisdiction; that the order deprives relator of the right of free speech, is destructive of the rights of a free press, and deprives it of its property without due process of law.

* * *

The Espionage Act, one of the first of the national defense laws enacted by Congress after the entry of the United States into the World War (approved June 15, 1917, 40 Stat. 217), provided severe punishment for any person who "when the United States is at war" shall willfully make or convey false reports or false statements with intent to interfere with the operation and success of the military or naval forces of the country, or with the intent to promote the success of its enemies, or who shall cause, or attempt to cause insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny or refusal of duty in such forces, or who shall willfully obstruct the recruiting and enlistment service of the United States (section 3, tit. 1 [Comp.St.1918, Comp.St.Ann.Supp.1919, § 10212c]). One entire title of this act (title 12) is devoted to "Use of the Mails," and in the exercise of its practically plenary power over the mails, Congress therein provided that any newspaper published in violation of any of the provisions of the act should be "nonmailable" and should not be "conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier."

Without further discussion of the articles, we cannot doubt that they conveyed to readers of them false reports and false statements, with intent to promote the success of the enemies of the United States, and that they constituted a willful attempt to cause disloyalty and refusal of duty in the military and naval forces, and to obstruct the recruiting and enlistment service of the United States, in violation of the Espionage Law (Schenck v. United States), and that therefore their publication brought the paper containing them within the express terms of title 12 of that law, declaring that such a publication shall be "nonmailable" and "shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier."

* * * The order of the postmaster general not only finds reasonable support in this record, but is amply justified by it.

Government is a practical institution, adapted to the practical conduct of public affairs. It would not be possible for the United States to maintain a reader in every newspaper office of the country, to approve in advance each issue before it should be allowed to enter the mails, and when, for more than five months, a paper had contained, almost daily, articles which, under the express terms of the statute, rendered it "nonmailable," it was reasonable to conclude that it would continue its disloyal publications, and it was therefore clearly within the power given to the postmaster general by R.S. § 396, "to execute all laws relating to the postal service," to enter, as was done in this case, an order suspending the privilege until a proper application and showing should be made for its renewal. The order simply withdrew from the relator the second-class privilege, but did not exclude its paper from other classes, as it might have done, and there was nothing in it to prevent reinstatement at any time. It was open to the relator to mend its ways, to publish a paper conforming to the law, and then to apply anew for the second-class mailing privilege. This it did not do, but for reasons not difficult to imagine, it preferred this futile litigation, undertaken upon the theory that a government competent to wage war against its foreign enemies was powerless against its insidious foes at home. Whatever injury the relator suffered was the result of its own choice and the judgment of the court of appeals is affirmed.

Justice Brandeis, dissenting. This case arose during the World War; but it presents no legal question peculiar to war. It is important, because what we decide may determine in large measure whether in times of peace our press shall be free.

The question presented is: Did Congress confer upon the postmaster general authority to deny second-class postal rates on that ground? The question is one of statutory construction. No such authority is granted in terms in the statutes which declare what matter shall be unmailable. Is there any provision of the postal laws from which the intention of Congress to grant such power may be inferred? The specific reason why the postmaster general deemed these editorials and news items unmailable was that he considered them violative of title 12 of the Espionage Act. But it is not contended that this specific reason is of legal significance. The scope of the postmaster general's alleged authority is confessedly the same whether the reason for the nonmailable quality of the matter inserted in a newspaper is that it violates the Espionage Act, or the copyright laws, or that it is part of a scheme to defraud, or concerns lotteries, or is indecent, or is in any other respect matter which Congress has declared shall not be admitted to the mails.

It thus appears that the Postmaster General, in the exercise of a supposed discretion, refused to carry at second-class mail rates all future issues of the Milwaukee Leader, solely because he believed it had systematically violated the Espionage Act in the past. It further appears that this belief rested partly upon the contents of past issues of the paper filed with the return and partly upon "representations and complaints from sundry good and loyal citizens", whose statements are not incorporated in this record and which do not appear to have been called to the attention of the publisher of the Milwaukee Leader at the hearing or otherwise. It is this general refusal thereafter to accept the paper for transmission at the second-class mail rates which is challenged as being without warrant in law.

In discussing whether Congress conferred upon the postmaster general the authority which he undertook to exercise in this case, I shall consider, first, whether he would have had the power to exclude the paper altogether from all future mail service on the ground alleged; and, second, whether he had power to deny the publisher the second-class rate.

First. Power to exclude from the mails has never been conferred in terms upon the postmaster general. * * *

Until recently, at least, this appears never to have been questioned and the Post Office Department has been authoritatively advised that the power of excluding matter from the mail was limited to such specific matter as upon examination was found to be unmailable and that the postmaster general could not make an exclusion order operative upon future issues of a newspaper.

If such power were possessed by the postmaster general, he would, in view of the practical finality of his decisions, become the universal censor of publications. For a denial of the use of the mail would be for most of them, tantamount to a denial of the right of circulation. Congress has not granted to the postmaster general power to deny the right of sending matter by mail even to one who has been convicted by a jury and sentenced by a court for unlawful use of the mail and who has been found by the postmaster general to have been habitually using the mail for frauds or lotteries and is likely to do so in the future. It has, in order to protect the public, directed postmasters to return to the sender mail addressed to one found by the postmaster general to be engaged in a scheme to defraud or in a lottery enterprise. But beyond this Congress has never deemed it wise, if, indeed, it has considered it constitutional to interfere with the civil right of using the mail for lawful purposes.

The postmaster general does not claim here the power to issue an order directly denying a newspaper all mail service for the future. Indeed, he asserts that the mail is still open to the Milwaukee Leader upon payment of first, third, or fourth class rates. He contends, however, that in regard to second-class rates special provisions of law apply under which he may deny that particular rate at his discretion. This contention will now be considered.

It is insisted that a citizen uses the mail at second-class rates, not as of right, but by virtue of a privilege or permission, the granting of which rests in the discretion of the postmaster general. Because the payment made for this governmental service is less than it costs, it is assumed that a properly qualified person has not the right to the service so long as it is offered, and may not complain if it is denied to him. The service is called the second-class privilege. The certificate evidencing such freedom is spoken of as a permit. But, in fact, the right to the lawful postal rates is a right independent of the discretion of the postmaster general. The right and conditions of its existence are defined and rest wholly upon mandatory legislation of Congress. It is the duty of the postmaster general to determine whether the conditions prescribed for any rate exist. This determination in the case of the second-class rate may involve more subjects of inquiry, some of them, perhaps, of greater difficulty, than in cases of other rates. But the function of the postmaster general is the same in all cases. In making the determination he must, like a court or a jury, form a judgment whether certain conditions prescribed by Congress exist, on controverted facts or by applying the law. The function is a strictly judicial one, although exercised in administering an executive office. And it is not a function which either involves or permits the exercise of discretionary power.

It clearly appears that there was no express grant of power to the postmaster general to deny second-class mail rates to future issues of a newspaper because in his opinion it had systematically violated the Espionage Act in the past, and it seems equally clear that there is no basis for the contention that such power is to be implied. In respect to newspapers mailed by a publisher at second-class rates there is clearly no occasion to imply this drastic power. For a publisher must deposit with the local postmaster, before the first mailing of every issue, a copy of the publication which is now examined for matter subject to a higher rate and in order to determine the portion devoted to advertising.

* * *

If there is illegal material in the newspaper, here is ample opportunity to discover it and remove the paper from the mail. Indeed, of the four classes of mail, it is the second alone which affords to the postal official full opportunity of ascertaining, before deposit in the mail, whether that which it is proposed to transmit is mailable matter. * * * [T]he construction urged by the postmaster general would raise not only a grave question, but a "succession of constitutional doubts." * *

It would in practice seriously abridge the freedom of the press. Would it not also violate the First Amendment? It would in practice deprive many publishers of their property without due process of law. Would it not also violate the Fifth Amendment? It would in practice subject publishers to punishment without a hearing by any court. * * *

In conclusion I say again—because it cannot be stressed too strongly—that the power here claimed is not a war power. There is no question of its necessity to protect the country from insidious domestic foes. To that end Congress conferred upon the postmaster general the enormous power contained in the Espionage Act of entirely excluding from the mails any letter, picture or publication which contained matter violating the broad terms of that act. But it did not confer—and the postmaster general concedes that it did not confer—the vague and absolute authority practically to deny circulation to any publication which in his opinion is likely to violate in the future any postal law. * * *

* * * The United States may give up the post office when it sees fit, but while it carries it on, the use of the mails is almost as much a part of free speech as the right to use our tongues and it would take very strong language to convince me that Congress ever intended to give such a practically despotic power to any one man. There is no pretence that it has done so. Therefore I do not consider the limits of its constitutional power.

To refuse the second-class rate to a newspaper is to make its circulation impossible and has all the effect of the order that I have supposed. I repeat. When I observe that the only powers expressly given to the postmaster general to prevent the carriage of unlawful matter of the present kind are to stop and to return papers already existing and posted, when I notice that the conditions expressly attached to the second-class rate look only to wholly different matters, and when I consider the ease with which the power claimed by the postmaster could be used to interfere with very sacred rights, I am of opinion that the refusal to allow the rate to which it was entitled whenever its newspaper was carried, on the ground that the paper ought not to be carried at all, was unjustified by statute and was a serious attack upon liberties that not even the war induced Congress to infringe.

HANNEGAN v. ESQUIRE, INC.

Justice DOUGLAS delivered the opinion of the Court.

Congress has made obscene material nonmailable, 35 Stat. 1129, 18 U.S.C.A. § 334, and has applied criminal sanctions for the enforcement of that policy. It has divided mailable matter into four classes, periodical publications constituting the second-class. And it has specified four conditions upon which a publication shall be admitted to the second-class. The Fourth condition, which is the only one relevant here,<sup>2</sup> provides:

2. The first three conditions are:

"First. It must regularly be issued at stated intervals as frequently as four times a year, and bear a date of issue, and be numbered consecutively. Second. It must be issued from a known office of publication. Third. It must be formed of printed paper sheets, without board, cloth, leather, or other substantial binding, such as

"Except as otherwise provided by law, the conditions upon which a publication shall be admitted to the second class are as follows * * * Fourth. It must be originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character, or devoted to literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry, and having a legitimate list of subscribers. Nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to admit to the second class rate regular publications designed primarily for advertising purposes, or for free circulation, or for circulation at nominal rates."

Respondent is the publisher of Esquire Magazine, a monthly periodical which was granted a second-class permit in 1933. In 1943, pursuant to the Act of March 3, 1901, 31 Stat. 1107, 39 U.S.C.A. § 232, a citation was issued to respondent by the then Postmaster General (for whom the present Postmaster General has now been substituted as petitioner) to show cause why that permit should not be suspended or revoked. A hearing was held before a board designated by the then Postmaster General. The board recommended that the permit not be revoked. Petitioner's predecessor took a different view. He did not find that Esquire Magazine contained obscene material and therefore was non-mailable. He revoked its second-class permit because he found that it did not comply with the Fourth condition. The gist of his holding is contained in the following excerpt from his opinion:

"The plain language of this statute does not assume that a publication must in fact be 'obscene' within the intendment of the postal obscenity statutes before it can be found not to be 'originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character, or devoted to literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry.'

* * *

"A publication to enjoy these unique mail privileges and special preferences is bound to do more than refrain from disseminating material which is obscene or bordering on the obscene. It is under a positive duty to contribute to the public good and the public welfare."

* * *

The issues of Esquire Magazine under attack are those for January to November inclusive of 1943. The material complained of embraces in bulk only a small percentage of those issues. Regular features of the magazine (called "The Magazine for Men") include articles on topics of current interest, short stories, sports articles or stories, short articles by men prominent in various fields of activities, articles about men prominent in the news, a book review department headed by the late William Lyon Phelps, a theatrical department headed by George Jean Nathan, a department on the lively arts by Gilbert Seldes, a department devoted to men's clothing, and pictorial features, including war action paintings, color photographs of dogs and water colors or etchings of game birds and reproductions of famous paintings, prints and drawings. There was very little in these features which was challenged. But petitioner's predecessor found that the objectionable items, though a small percentage of the total bulk, were regular recurrent features which gave the magazine its dominant tone or characteristic. These include jokes, cartoons, pictures, articles, and poems. They were said to reflect the smoking-room type of humor, featuring, in the main, sex. Some witnesses found the challenged items highly objectionable, calling them salacious distinguish printed books for preservation from periodical publications: Provided, That publications produced by the stencil, mimeograph, or hectograph process or in imitation of typewriting shall not be regarded as printed within the meaning of this clause."

and indecent. Others though they were only racy and risqué. Some condemned them as being merely in poor taste. Other witnesses could find no objection to them.

An examination of the items makes plain, we think, that the controversy is not whether the magazine publishes "information of a public character" or is devoted to "literature" or to the "arts." It is whether the contents are "good" or "bad." To uphold the order of revocation would, therefore, grant the postmaster general a power of censorship. Such a power is so abhorrent to our traditions that a purpose to grant it should not be easily inferred.

The second-class privilege is a form of subsidy. From the beginning Congress has allowed special rates to certain classes of publications. * * *

The postal laws make a clear-cut division between mailable and nonmailable material. The four classes of mailable matter are generally described by objective standards which refer in part to their contents, but not to the quality of their contents. The more particular descriptions of the first, third, and fourth classes follow the same pattern, as do the first three conditions specified for second-class matter. If, therefore, the fourth condition is read in the context of the postal laws of which it is an integral part, it too, must be taken to supply standards which relate to the format of the publication and to the nature of its contents, but not to their quality, worth, or value. In that view, "literature" or the "arts" mean no more than productions which convey ideas by words, pictures, or drawings.

If the fourth condition is read in that way, it is plain that Congress made no radical or basic change in the type of regulation which it adopted for second-class mail in 1879. The inauguration of even a limited type of censorship would have been such a startling change as to have left some traces in the legislative history. But we find none. Congressman Money, a member of the Postal Committee who defended the bill on the floor of the House, stated that it was "nothing but a simplification of the postal code. There are no new powers granted to the Department by this bill, none whatever." 8 Cong.Rec. 2134. The bill contained registration provisions which were opposed on the ground that they might be the inception of a censorship of the press. These were deleted. It is difficult to imagine that the Congress, having deleted them for fear of censorship, gave the Postmaster General by the Fourth condition discretion to deny periodicals the second-class rate, if in his view they did not contribute to the public good. * * *

The policy of Congress has been clear. It has been to encourage the distribution of periodicals which disseminated "information of a public character" or which were devoted to "literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry," because it was thought that those publications as a class contributed to the public good. The standards prescribed in the Fourth condition have been criticized, but not on the ground that they provide for censorship. * * *

We may assume that Congress has a broad power of classification and need not open second-class mail to publications of all types. The categories of publications entitled to that classification have indeed varied through the years. And the Court held in Ex parte Jackson, 96 U.S. 727, that Congress could constitutionally make it a crime to send fraudulent or obscene material through the mails. But grave constitutional questions are immediately raised once it is said that the use of the mails is a privilege which may be extended or withheld on any grounds whatsoever. See the dissents of Justice Brandeis and Justice Holmes in United States ex rel. Milwaukee Social Democratic Publishing Co. v. Burle-

son. Under that view the second-class rate could be granted on condition that certain economic or political ideas not be disseminated. The provisions of the fourth condition would have to be far more explicit for us to assume that Congress made such a radical departure from our traditions and undertook to clothe the Postmaster General with the power to supervise the tastes of the reading public of the country.

It is plain, as we have said, that the favorable second-class rates were granted periodicals meeting the requirements of the fourth condition, so that the public good might be served through a dissemination of the class of periodicals described. * * * The validity of the obscenity laws is recognition that the mails may not be used to satisfy all tastes, no matter how perverted. But Congress has left the postmaster general with no power to prescribe standards for the literature or the art which a mailable periodical disseminates.

This is not to say that there is nothing left to the postmaster general under the fourth condition. It is his duty to "execute all laws relative to the Postal Service." Rev.Stat. § 396, 5 U.S.C.A. § 369. For example questions will arise * * * whether the publication which seeks the favorable second-class rate is a periodical as defined in the fourth condition or a book or other type of publication. And it may appear that the information contained in a periodical may not be of a "public character." But the power to determine whether a periodical (which is mailable) contains information of a public character, literature or art does not include the further power to determine whether the contents meet some standard of the public good or welfare.

Affirmed.

COMMENT

1. In the Hannegan case, Justice Douglas said in an opinion for the majority that serious constitutional issues were raised if the proposition was accepted that "the use of the mails is a privilege which may be extended or withheld on any grounds whatever." This statement may be taken to mean that the use of the mails may not be subjected to conditions which are themselves unconstitutional, conditions, for example, which would require newspapers to hue to a particular political philosophy if they are to remain eligible for the second-class mail rate. To support the proposition that unconstitutional conditions cannot be imposed on the press which uses the mails, Justice Douglas relied on the dissents of Justice Brandeis and Justice Holmes in Milwaukee Social Democratic Publishing Co. v. Burleson, 255 U.S. 467 (1921). Yet the Court in Hannegan does not reverse the majority opinion in the Milwaukee Social Democratic Publishing Co. case, although the cases are profoundly inconsistent.

In a dissenting opinion in the famous obscenity case, Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957), Justice Harlan made the following observation on conditioning the use of the mails, p. 731, fn. 5:

The hoary dogma of Ex Parte Jackson, 96 U.S. 726, and Public Clearing House of Coyne, 194 U.S. 497, that the use of the mails is a privilege on which the government may impose such conditions as it chooses, has long since evaporated. See Brandeis, J., dissenting in Milwaukee Social Democratic Publishing Co. v. Burleson, 255 U.S. 407, 430-433; Holmes, J., dissenting, in Leach v. Carlile, 259 U.S. 138, 140; Cates v. Haderline, 342 U.S. 804, reversing 189 F.2d 369; Door v. Donaldson, 90 U.S.App.D.C. 188, 195 F.2d 764.

In the light of this information, what do you think is the status of the Milwaukee Social Democratic Publishing Co. case today?

To what extent under the existing case law can government condition the availability of the second-class mail rate on requirements which have regard to press content?

2. Should government really be as neutral in terms of aiding the press as it is supposed to be with regard to religion? If so, do special mailing rates for the press infringe on such neutrality? If special mailing rates really function as a governmental subsidy of the press, would the withdrawal of this subsidy be free of First Amendment implications? See Grosjean v. American Press, 297 U.S. 233 (1936).

If special mailing rates for the press exist to aid in the dissemination of information in the service of public enlightenment, does this suggest that other affirmative governmental action with similar aims can be considered consistent with the First Amendment?

3. A more recent example of an attempt to use the mails for censorship purposes was the Lamont case which follows. In Lamont, the Supreme Court invalidated a federal statute which permitted the mail delivery of "communist political propaganda" which originated in a foreign country only if the addressee specifically requested such delivery. The Court unanimously invalidated the statute. But the Court was not unanimous in the rationalization offered for this conclusion. The absolutist First Amendment rationale employed by the Court in Lamont demonstrates the lively existence of alternative theories of First Amendment protection. Often, as in Lamont, the Court uses these competing First Amendment theories concurrently, using one First Amendment theory to resolve one set of problems and another for a different set of problems. The student will also note that the Court ignored the clear and present danger doctrine as a rationalization in Lamont.

LAMONT v. POSTMASTER GENERAL

Justice DOUGLAS delivered the opinion of the Court.

These appeals present the same question: is § 305(a) of the Postal Service and Federal Employees Salary Act of 1962, 76 Stat. 840, constitutional as construed and applied? The statute provides in part:

"Mail matter, except sealed letters, which originates or which is printed or otherwise prepared in a foreign country and which is determined by the secretary of the treasury pursuant to rules and regulations to be promulgated by him to be 'communist political propaganda,' shall be detained by the postmaster general upon its arrival for delivery in the United States, or upon its subsequent deposit in the United States domestic mails, and the addressee shall be notified that such matter has been received and will be delivered only upon the addressee's request, except that such detention shall not be required in the case of any matter which is furnished pursuant to subscription or which is otherwise ascertained by the postmaster general to be desired by the addressee." 39 U.S.C.A. § 4008(a).

The statute defines "communist political propaganda" as political propaganda (as that term is defined in § 1(j) of the Foreign Agents Registration Act of 1938) which is issued by or on behalf of any country with respect to which there is in effect a suspension or withdrawal of tariff concessions or from which foreign assistance is withheld pursuant to certain specified statutes. 39 U.S.C.A. § 4008(b). The statute contains an exemption from its provisions for mail addressed to government agencies and educational institutions, or officials thereof, and for mail sent pursuant to a reciprocal cultural international agreement. 39 U.S.C.A. § 4008(c).

To implement the statute the Post Office maintains 10 or 11 screening points through which is routed all unsealed mail from the designated foreign countries. At these points the nonexempt mail is examined by customs authorities. When it is determined that a piece of mail is "communist political propaganda," the addressee is mailed a notice identifying the mail being detained and advising that it will be destroyed unless the addressee requests delivery by returning an attached reply card within 20 days.

Prior to March 1, 1965, the reply card contained a space in which the addressee could request delivery of any "similar publication" in the future. A list of the persons thus manifesting a desire to receive "communist political propaganda" was maintained by the Post Office. The government in its brief informs us that the keeping of this list was terminated, effective March 15, 1965. Thus, under the new practice, a notice is sent and must be returned for each individual piece of mail desired. The only standing instruction which it is now possible to leave with the Post Office is not to deliver any "communist political propaganda." And the solicitor general advises us that the Post Office Department "intends to retain its assumption that those who do not return the card want neither the identified publication nor any similar one arriving subsequently."

[This case] arose out of the Post Office's detention in 1963 of a copy of the Peking Review # 12 addressed to appellant, Dr. Corliss Lamont, who is engaged in the publishing and distributing of pamphlets. Lamont did not respond to the notice of detention which was sent to him but instead instituted this suit to enjoin enforcement of the statute, alleging that it infringed his rights under the First and Fifth Amendments. The Post Office thereupon notified Lamont that it considered his institution of the suit to be an expression of his desire to receive "communist political propaganda" and therefore none of his mail would be detained. Lamont amended his complaint to challenge on constitutional grounds the placement of his name on the list of those desiring to receive "communist political propaganda." The majority of the three-judge district court nonetheless dismissed the complaint as moot, 229 F.Supp. 913, because Lamont would now receive his mail unimpeded. Insofar as the list was concerned, the majority thought that any legally significant harm to Lamont as a result of being listed was merely a speculative possibility, and so on this score the controversy was not yet ripe for adjudication. * * *

Like Lamont, appellee Heilberg, * * * when his mail was detained, refused to return the reply card and instead filed a complaint in the district court for an injunction against enforcement of the statute. The Post Office reacted to this complaint in the same manner as it had to Lamont's complaint, but the district court declined to hold that Heilberg's action was thereby mooted. Instead the district court reached the merits and unanimously held that the statute was unconstitutional under the First Amendment. * * *

There is no longer even a colorable question of mootness in these cases, for the new procedure, as described above, requires the postal authorities to send a separate notice for each item as it is received and the addressee to make a separate request for each item. Under the new system, we are told, there can be no list of persons who have manifested a desire to receive "communist political propaganda" and whose mail will therefore go through relatively unimpeded. The government concedes that the changed procedure entirely precludes any claim of mootness and leaves for our consideration the sole question of the constitutionality of the statute.

We conclude that the act as construed and applied is unconstitutional because it requires an official act (viz., returning the reply card) as a limitation on the unfettered exercise of the addressee's First Amendment rights. As stated by Justice Holmes in Milwaukee Pub. Co. v. Burleson, 255 U.S. 407, 437 (dissenting): "The United States may give up the Post Office when it sees fit, but while it carries it on the use of the mails is almost as much a part of free speech as the right to use our tongues. * * **

We struck down in Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105, a flat license tax on the exercise of First Amendment rights. A registration requirement imposed on a labor union organizer before making a speech met the same fate in Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516. A municipal licensing system for those distributing literature was held invalid in Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U.S. 444. * * *

* * *

Here the congress—expressly restrained by the First Amendment from “abridging” freedom of speech and of press—is the actor. The act sets administrative officials astride the flow of mail to inspect it, appraise it, write the addressee about it, and await a response before dispatching the mail. Just as the licensing or taxing authorities in the Lovell, Thomas, and Murdock cases sought to control the flow of ideas to the public, so here federal agencies regulate the flow of mail. We do not have here, any more than we had in Hannegan v. Esquire, Inc., 327 U.S. 146, any question concerning the extent to which Congress may classify the mail and fix the charges for its carriage. Nor do we reach the question whether the standard here applied could pass constitutional muster. Nor do we deal with the right of Customs to inspect material from abroad for contraband. We rest on the narrow ground that the addressee in order to receive his mail must request in writing that it be delivered. This amounts in our judgment to an unconstitutional abridgment of the addressee’s First Amendment rights. The addressee carries an affirmative obligation which we do not think the Government may impose on him. This requirement is almost certain to have a deterrent effect, especially as respects those who have sensitive positions. Their livelihood may be dependent on a security clearance. Public officials, like schoolteachers who have no tenure, might think they would invite disaster if they read what the federal government says contains the seeds of treason. Apart from them, any addressee is likely to feel some inhibition in sending for literature which federal officials have condemned as “communist political propaganda.” The regime of this act is at war with the “uninhibited, robust, and wide-open” debate and discussion that are contemplated by the First Amendment. New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 270.

We reverse the judgment in [Lamont] and affirm that in [Heilberg].

It is so ordered.

COMMENT

1. Justice Douglas used the so-called absolutist or plain meaning approach to First Amendment interpretation: The statute is a direct restraint by official act of the government on freedom of expression; the First Amendment protects freedom of expression, ergo, the statute is invalid.

2. The remarkable extent to which Justice Holmes’s dissents have become the law is illustrated by the Lamont decision. Thus, Justice Douglas quotes Holmes’s dissent in Milwaukee Publishing Co. v. Burleson, 255 U.S. 407 (1921), rather than the majority opinion for the Court in that case. Insofar as there are two lines of cases with regard to the power of Congress to censor the mails, the later liberal Hannegan approach was expressly endorsed in Lamont in 1965. Perhaps it can be argued that Milwaukee Pub. Co. v. Burleson has at least, implicitly, been overruled. On the other hand, Milwaukee Pub. Co. arose in the context of war and First Amendment rights. During wartime, First Amendment liberties, like other constitutionally protected civil liberties, have sometimes been subordinated to other governmental interests. It should be remembered that in Schenck Justice Holmes, writing the opinion for the Court, used the clear and present danger doctrine and still affirmed a conviction under the Espionage Act for the distribution of a pamphlet, during wartime, which advocated to drafted soldiers opposition to the war and the draft.

Taxation of the Press and Censorship

GROSJEAN v. AMERICAN PRESS CO.

80 L.ED. 660 (1936).

[Editorial Note

On July 12, 1934, the Louisiana legislature enacted a law which provided in essence that any newspaper selling advertisements, which had a circulation of more than 20,000 copies, would be required to pay a license tax of 2 percent on its gross receipts. The law was passed at the behest of Governor Huey Long and was aimed at the New Orleans Times-Picayune, a New Orleans daily which had been critical of the Long regime. Nine newspaper publishers, publishing thirteen newspapers, brought suit to enjoin the enforcement of the statute.]

Justice SUTHERLAND delivered the opinion of the Court.

The nine publishers who brought the suit publish thirteen newspapers; and these thirteen publications are the only ones within the state of Louisiana having each a circulation of more than 20,000 copies per week, although the lower court finds there are four other daily newspapers each having a circulation of "slightly less than 20,000 copies per week" which are in competition with those published by appellees both as to circulation and as to advertising. In addition, there are 120 weekly newspapers published in the state, also in competition, to a greater or less degree, with the newspapers of appellees.

The revenue derived from appellees' newspapers comes almost entirely from regular subscribers or purchasers thereof and from payments received for the insertion of advertisements therein.

The act requires every one subject to the tax to file a sworn report every three months showing the amount and the gross receipts from the business. * * * The resulting tax must be paid when the report is filed. Failure to file the report or pay the tax as thus provided constitutes a misdemeanor and subjects the offender to a fine not exceeding $500, or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both, for each violation. Any corporation violating the acts subjects itself to the payment of $500 to be recovered by suit. All of the appellees are corporations.

The validity of the act is assailed as violating the Federal Constitution in two particulars: (1) That it abridges the freedom of the press in contravention of the due process clause contained in section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment; (2) that it denies appellees the equal protection of the laws in contravention of the same amendment.

1. The first point presents a question of the utmost gravity and importance; for, if well made, it goes to the heart of the natural right of the members of an organized society, united for their common good, to impart and acquire information about their common interests. The First Amendment to the Federal Constitution provides that "Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press." While this provision is not a restraint upon the powers of the states, the states are precluded from abridging the freedom of speech or of the press by force of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. * * *

That freedom of speech and of the press are rights of the same fundamental character, safeguarded by the due process of law clause of the Fourteenth Amendment against abridgment by state legislation, has likewise been settled by a series of decisions of this court beginning with Gitlow v. People of State of New York, and ending with Near v. State of Minnesota. The word "liberty" contained in that amendment embraces not only the right of a person to be free from physical restraint, but the right to be free in the enjoyment of all his faculties as well.

The tax imposed is designated a "license tax for the privilege of engaging in such business," that is to say, the business of selling, or making any charge for, advertising. As applied to appellees, it is a tax of 2 percent on the gross receipts derived from advertisements carried in their newspapers when, and only when, the newspapers of each enjoy a circulation of more than 20,000 copies per week. It thus operates as a restraint in a double sense. First, its effect is to curtail the amount of revenue realized from advertising; and, second, its direct tendency is to restrict circulation. This is plain enough when we consider that, if it were increased to a high degree, as it could be if valid, it well might result in destroying both advertising and circulation.

A determination of the question whether the tax is valid in respect of the point now under review requires an examination of the history and circumstances which antedated and attended the adoption of the abridgment clause of the First Amendment, since that clause expresses one of those "fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions," and, as such, is embodied in the concept "due process of law" and, therefore, protected against hostile state invasion by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. * * * for many years thereafter—history discloses a persistent effort on the part of the British government to prevent or abridge the free expression of any opinion which seemed to criticize or exhibit in an unfavorable light, however truly, the agencies and operations of the government. The struggle between the proponents of measures to that end and those who asserted the right of free expression was continuous and unceasing. As early as 1644, John Milton, in an "Appeal for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing," assailed an act of Parliament which had just been passed providing for censorship of the press previous to publication. He vigorously defended the right of every man to make public his honest views "without previous censure"; and declared the impossibility of finding any man base enough to accept the office of censor and at the same time good enough to be allowed to perform its duties. Collett, History of the Taxes on Knowledge, vol. I, pp. 4-6. The act expired by its own terms in 1695. It was never renewed; and the liberty of the press thus became, as pointed out by Wickwar (The Struggle for the Freedom of the Press, p. 15), merely "a right or liberty to publish without a license what formerly could be published only with one." But mere exemption from previous censorship was soon recognized as too narrow a view of the liberty of the press.

In 1712, in response to a message from Queen Anne (Hansard's Parliamentary History of England, vol. 6, p. 1063), Parliament imposed a tax upon all newspapers and upon advertisements. Collett, vol. I, pp. 8-10. That the main purpose of these taxes was to suppress the publication of comments and criticisms objectionable to the Crown does not admit of doubt. Stewart, Lennox and the Taxes on Knowledge, 15 Scottish Historical Review, 322-327. There followed more than a century of resistance to, and evasion of, the taxes, and of agitation for their repeal. * * *

Citations of similar import might be multiplied many times; but the foregoing is enough to demonstrate beyond peradventure that in the adoption of the English newspaper stamp tax and the tax on advertisements, revenue was of subordinate concern; and that the dominant and controlling aim was to prevent, or curtail the opportunity for, the acquisition of knowledge by the people in respect of their governmental affairs. It is idle to suppose that so many of the best men of England would for a century of time have waged, as they did, stubborn and often precarious warfare against these taxes if a mere matter of taxation had been involved. The aim of the struggle was not to relieve taxpayers from a burden, but to establish and preserve the right of the English people to full information in respect of the doings or misdoings of their government. Upon the correctness of this conclusion the very characterization of the exactions as "taxes on knowledge" sheds a flood of corroborative light. In the ultimate, an informed and enlightened public opinion was the thing at stake; for, as Erskine, in his great speech in defense of Paine, has said, "The liberty of opinion keeps governments themselves in due subjection to their duties." Erskine's Speeches, High's Ed., vol. I, p. 525. See May's Constitutional History of England (7th Ed.) vol. 2, pp. 238-245.

In 1785, only four years before Congress had proposed the First Amendment, the Massachusetts Legislature, following the English example, imposed a stamp tax on all newspapers and magazines. The following year an advertisement tax was imposed. Both taxes met with such violent opposition that the former was repealed in 1786, and the latter in 1788. Duniway, Freedom of the Press in Massachusetts, pp. 136, 137.

The framers of the First Amendment were familiar with the English struggle, which then had continued for nearly eighty years and was destined to go on for another sixty-five years, at the end of which time it culminated in a lasting abandonment of the obnoxious taxes. The framers were likewise familiar with the then recent Massachusetts episode; and while that occurrence did much to bring about the adoption of the amendment (see Pennsylvania and the Federal Constitution, 1888, p. 181), the predominant influence must have come from the English experience. It is impossible to concede that by the words "freedom of the press" the framers of the amendment intended to adopt merely the narrow view then reflected by the law of England that such freedom consisted only in immunity from previous censorship; for this abuse had then permanently disappeared from English practice. It is equally impossible to believe that it was not intended to bring within the reach of these words such modes of restraint as were embodied in the two forms of taxation already described. Such belief must be rejected in the face of the then well-known purpose of the exactions and the general adverse sentiment of the colonies in respect of them. Undoubtedly, the range of a constitutional provision phrased in terms of the common law sometimes may be fixed by recourse to the applicable rules of that law.

In the light of all that has now been said, it is evident that the restricted rules of the English law in respect of the freedom of the press in force when the Constitution was adopted were never accepted by the American colonists, and that by the First Amendment it was meant to preclude the national government, and by the Fourteenth Amendment to preclude the states, from adopting any form of previous restraint upon printed publications, or their circulation, including that which had theretofore been effected by these two well-known and odious methods.

This court had occasion in Near v. State of Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697, at pages

713 et seq., to discuss at some length the subject in its general aspect. The conclusion there stated is that the object of the constitutional provisions was to prevent previous restraints on publication; and the court was careful not to limit the protection of the right to any particular way of abridging it. Liberty of the press within the meaning of the constitutional provision, it was broadly said (283 U.S. 697, 716), meant "principally although not exclusively, immunity from previous restraints or [from] censorship."

Judge Cooley has laid down the test to be applied: "The evils to be prevented were not the censorship of the press merely, but any action of the government by means of which it might prevent such free and general discussion of public matters as seems absolutely essential to prepare the people for an intelligent exercise of their rights as citizens." 2 Cooley's Constitutional Limitations (8th Ed.) p. 886.

It is not intended by anything we have said to suggest that the owners of newspapers are immune from any of the ordinary forms of taxation for support of the government. But this is not an ordinary form of tax, but one single in kind, with a long history of hostile misuse against the freedom of the press.

The predominant purpose of the grant of immunity here invoked was to preserve an untrammelled press as a vital source of public information. The newspapers, magazines, and other journals of the country, it is safe to say, have shed and continue to shed, more light on the public and business affairs of the nation than any other instrumentality of publicity; and since informed public opinion is the most potent of all restraints upon misgovernment, the suppression or abridgment of the publicity afforded by a free press cannot be regarded otherwise than with grave concern. The tax here involved is bad not because it takes money from the pockets of the appellees. If that were all, a wholly different question would be presented. It is bad because, in the light of its history and of its present setting, it is seen to be a deliberate and calculated device in the guise of a tax to limit the circulation of information to which the public is entitled in virtue of the constitutional guaranties. A free press stands as one of the great interpreters between the government and the people. To allow it to be fettered is to fetter ourselves.

In view of the persistent search for new subjects of taxation, it is not without significance that, with the single exception of the Louisiana statute, so far as we can discover, no state during the one hundred fifty years of our national existence has undertaken to impose a tax like that now in question.

The form in which the tax is imposed is in itself suspicious. It is not measured or limited by the volume of advertisements. It is measured alone by the extent of the circulation of the publication in which the advertisements are carried, with the plain purpose of penalizing the publishers and curtailing the circulation of a selected group of newspapers. [Emphasis added.]

Having reached the conclusion that the act imposing the tax in question is unconstitutional under the due process of law clause because it abridges the freedom of the press, we deem it unnecessary to consider the further ground assigned, that it also constitutes a denial of the equal protection of the laws.

Decree affirmed.

COMMENT

Grosjean makes clear that stamp taxes on newspapers and taxes on advertisements were similar practices and as such abhorrent to the eighteenth-century American. Grosjean illustrates why a larger definition of freedom of the press than one limited merely to freedom from prior restraint was necessary if the objectives of freedom of the press, as outlined by Justice George Sutherland, were to be secured, i.e., ("In the ultimate, an informed and enlightened public opinion was the thing at stake."'). Discriminatory taxes, like licensing on the basis of content and prior restraints, were all forbidden by the constitutional guarantee of freedom of the press. But see United States ex rel. Milwaukee Social Democratic Publishing Co. v. Burleson, 255 U.S. 407 (1921).

Note how helpful Hughes's opinion in Near proved to the decision of the Court in Grosjean. Hughes's willingness to make the prior restraint concept cover various modes of advance governmental press censorship contributed to the general understanding, made clear in the Hannegan case in 1946, that the whole panoply of direct restraints on the press was prohibited by the constitutional phrase "freedom of the press."

Which is more destructive of the purposes of freedom of the press: a prior restraint on printed matter itself or a tax on circulation of daily newspapers? How does Sutherland deal with the state defense that newspapers are a business and as a business, the press, like other businesses, has no constitutional immunity from taxation?

Because of the constitutional guarantees of freedom of the press and freedom of speech, does engagement in such pursuits make governmental regulation unconstitutional? When freedom of expression is really at stake and when some other governmental interest, which is a matter of valid governmental concern, is at stake is a particularly perplexing problem in First Amendment cases. What kind of expression is protected? Political expression or commercial advertisements as well? See Virginia Pharmacy, text, p. 159, with Lehman v. City of Shaker Heights, text, p. 64.

MINNEAPOLIS STAR AND TRIBUNE CO. v. MINNESOTA COMMISSIONER OF REVENUE

Justice O'CONNOR delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case presents the question of a state's power to impose a special tax on the press and, by enacting exemptions, to limit its effect to only a few newspapers.

Since 1967, Minnesota has imposed a sales tax on most sales of goods for a price in excess of a nominal sum. * * * In general, the tax applies only to retail sales. * * * This use tax applies to any nonexempt tangible personal property unless the sales tax was paid on the sales price. * * * Like the classic use tax, this use tax protects the State's sales tax by eliminating the residents' incentive to travel to States with lower sales taxes to buy goods rather than buying them in Minnesota. * * *

The appellant, Minneapolis Star and Tribune Company "Star Tribune", is the publisher of a morning newspaper and an evening newspaper in Minneapolis. From 1967 until 1971, it enjoyed an exemption from the sales and use tax provided by Minnesota for periodic publications. * * * In 1971, however, while leaving the exemption from the sales tax in place, the legislature amended the scheme to impose a "use tax" on the cost of paper and ink products consumed in the production of a publication. * * * Ink and paper used in publications became the only items subject to the use tax that were components of goods to be sold at retail. In 1974, the legislature again amended the statute, this time to exempt the first $100,000 worth of ink and paper consumed by a publication in any calendar year, in effect giving each publication an annual tax credit of $4,000. * * * Publications remained exempt from the sales tax. * * *

After the enactment of the $100,000 exemption, 11 publishers, producing 14 of the 388 paid circulation newspapers in the state, incurred a tax liability in 1974. Star Tribune was one of the 11, and, of the $893,355 collected, it paid $608,634, or roughly two-thirds of the total revenue raised by the tax. See 314 N.W.2d 201, 203 and n. 4 (1981). In 1975, 13 publishers, producing 16 out of 374 paid circulation papers, paid a tax. That year, Star Tribune again bore roughly two-thirds of the total receipts from the use tax on ink and paper.

Star Tribune instituted this action to seek a refund of the use taxes it paid from January 1, 1974 to May 31, 1975. It challenged the imposition of the use tax on ink and paper used in publications as a violation of the guarantees of freedom of the press and equal protection in the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The Minnesota Supreme Court upheld the tax against the federal constitutional challenge. * * * We noted probable jurisdiction, — U.S. —, 102 S.Ct. 2955, 73 L.Ed.2d 1347 (1982), and we now reverse.

Star Tribune argues that we must strike this tax on the authority of Grosjean v. American Press Co., Inc. * * * Although there are similarities between the two cases, we agree with the State that Grosjean is not controlling.

In Grosjean, the State of Louisiana imposed a license tax of 2% of the gross receipts from the sale of advertising on all newspapers with a weekly circulation above 20,000. Out of at least 124 publishers in the State, only 13 were subject to the tax. * * * All but one of the large papers subject to the tax had "ganged up" on Senator Huey Long, and a circular distributed by Long and the governor to each member of the state legislature described "lying newspapers" as conducting "a vicious campaign" and the tax as "a tax on lying, 2c [sic] a lie." Although the Court's opinion did not describe this history, it stated, "[The tax] is bad because, in the light of its history and of its present setting, it is seen to be a deliberate and calculated device in the guise of a tax to limit the circulation of information," * * * an explanation that suggests that the motivation of the legislature may have been significant.

Our subsequent cases have not been consistent in their reading of Grosjean on this point. Compare United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367, 384–385 (1968) (stating that legislative purpose was irrelevant in Grosjean) with Houchins v. KQED, Inc., * * * (plurality opinion) (suggesting that purpose was relevant in Grosjean); Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Pittsburgh Commission on Human Relations, 413 U.S. 376, 383 * * (1973) (same). Commentators have generally viewed Grosjean as dependent on the improper censorial goals of the legislature. See T. Emerson, The System of Freedom of Expression 419 (1970); L. Tribe, American Constitutional Law 592 n. 8, 724 n. 10 (1978). We think that the result in Grosjean may have been attributable in part to the perception on the part of the Court that the state imposed the tax with an intent to penalize a selected group of newspapers. In the case currently before us, however, there is no legislative history and no indication, apart from the structure of the tax itself, of any impermissible or censorial motive on the part of the legislature. We cannot resolve the case by simple citation to Grosjean. Instead, we must analyze the problem anew under the general principles of the First Amendment.

Clearly, the First Amendment does not prohibit all regulation of the press. It is beyond dispute that the states and the federal government can subject newspapers to generally applicable economic regulations without creating constitutional problems. [Citations omitted.] Minnesota, however, has not chosen to apply its general sales and use tax to newspapers. Instead, it has created a special tax that applies only to certain publications protected by the First Amendment. Although the state argues now that the tax on paper and ink is part of the general scheme of taxation, the use tax provision, quoted in note 2, supra, is facially discriminatory, singling out publications for treatment that is, to our knowledge, unique in Minnesota tax law.

Minnesota's treatment of publications differs from that of other enterprises in at least two important respects: it imposes a use tax that does not serve the function of protecting the sales tax, and it taxes an intermediate transaction rather than the ultimate retail sale. A use tax ordinarily serves to complement the sales tax by eliminating the incentive to make major purchases in states with lower sales taxes; it requires the resident who shops out-of-state to pay a use tax equal to the sales tax savings. * * * Minnesota designed its overall use tax scheme to serve this function. As the regulations state, "The 'use tax' is a compensatory or complementary tax." * * * Thus, in general, items exempt from the sales tax are not subject to the use tax, for, in the event of a sales tax exemption, there is no "complementary function" for a use tax to serve. * * * But the use tax on ink and paper serves no such complementary function; it applies to all uses, whether or not the taxpayer purchased the ink and paper in-state, and it applies to items exempt from the sales tax.

Further, the ordinary rule in Minnesota, as discussed above, is to tax only the ultimate, or retail, sale rather than the use of components like ink and paper. "The statutory scheme is to devise a unitary tax which exempts intermediate transactions and imposes it only on sales when the finished product is purchased by the ultimate user." * * * Publishers, however, are taxed on their purchase of components, even though they will eventually sell their publications at retail.

By creating this special use tax, which, to our knowledge, is without parallel in the State's tax scheme, Minnesota has singled out the press for special treatment. We then must determine whether the First Amendment permits such special taxation. A tax that burdens rights protected by the First Amendment cannot stand unless the burden is necessary to achieve an overriding governmental interest. See, e.g., United States v. Lee, 455 U.S. 252 (1982). Any tax that the press must pay, of course, imposes some "burden." But, as we have observed, this Court has long upheld economic regulation of the press. The cases approving such economic regulation, however, emphasized the general applicability of the challenged regulation to all businesses, * * * suggesting that a regulation that singled out the press might place a heavier burden of justification on the state, and we now conclude that the special problems created by differential treatment do indeed impose such a burden. [Emphasis added.]

There is substantial evidence that differential taxation of the press would have troubled the Framers of the First Amendment. The role of the press in mobilizing sentiment in favor of independence was critical to the Revolution. When the Constitution was proposed without an explicit guarantee of freedom of the press, the Antifederalists objected. Proponents of the Constitution, relying on the principle of enumerated powers, responded that such a guarantee was unnecessary because the Constitution granted Congress no power to control the press. The remarks of Richard Henry Lee are typical of the rejoinders of the Antifederalists:

"I confess I do not see in what cases the congress can, with any pretence of right, make a law to suppress the freedom of the press; though I am not clear, that congress is restrained from laying any duties whatever on printing, and from laying duties particularly heavy on certain pieces printed." R. Lee, Observation Leading to a Fair Examination of the System of Government, Letter IV, reprinted in 1 B. Schwartz, The Bill of Rights: A Documentary History 466, 474 (1971).

See also A Review of the Constitution Proposed by the Late Convention by a Federal Republican, reprinted in 3 H. Storing, The Complete Anti-Federalist 65, 81-82 (1981); M. Smith, Address to the People of New York on the Necessity of Amend- ments to the Constitution, reprinted in 1 B. Schwartz, supra, 566, 575–576; cf. The Federalist No. 84, p. 440 and n. 1 (A. Hamilton) (M. Beloff ed. 1948) (recognizing and attempting to refute the argument). The concerns voiced by the Antifederalists led to the adoption of the Bill of Rights. See 1 B. Schwartz, supra, at 527.

The fears of the Antifederalists were well-founded. A power to tax differentially, as opposed to a power to tax generally, gives a government a powerful weapon against the taxpayer selected. When the state imposes a generally applicable tax, there is little cause for concern. We need not fear that a government will destroy a selected group of taxpayers by burdensome taxation if it must impose the same burden on the rest of its constituency. * * When the state singles out the press, though, the political constraints that prevent a legislature from passing crippling taxes of general applicability are weakened, and the threat of burdensome taxes becomes acute. That threat can operate as effectively as a censor to check critical comment by the press, undercutting the basic assumption of our political system that the press will often serve as an important restraint on government. See generally, Stewart, "Or of the Press," 26 Hastings L.J. 631, 634 (1975). "[A]n untrammelled press [is] a vital source of public information," Grosjean, * * * and an informed public is the essence of working democracy.

Further, differential treatment, unless justified by some special characteristic of the press, suggests that the goal of the regulation is not unrelated to suppression of expression, and such a goal is presumptively unconstitutional. See, e.g., Police Department of the City of Chicago v. Mosely, 408 U.S. 92, 95–96 (1972); cf. Brown v. Hartlage, 456 U.S. 45 (1982) (First Amendment has its "fullest and most urgent" application in the case of regulation of the content of political speech). Differential taxation of the press, then, places such a burden on the interests protected by the First Amendment that we cannot countenance such treatment unless the state asserts a counterbalancing interest of compelling importance that it cannot achieve without differential taxation.

The main interest asserted by Minnesota in this case is the raising of revenue. Of course that interest is critical to any government. Standing alone, however, it cannot justify the special treatment of the press, for an alternative means of achieving the same interest without raising concerns under the First Amendment is clearly available: the state could raise the revenue by taxing businesses generally, avoiding the censorial threat implicit in a tax that singles out the press.

Addressing the concern with differential treatment, Minnesota invites us to look beyond the form of the tax to its substance. The tax is, according to the state, merely a substitute for the sales tax, which, as a generally applicable tax, would be constitutional as applied to the press. There are two fatal flaws in this reasoning. First, the state has offered no explanation of why it chose to use a substitute for the sales tax rather than the sales tax itself. The court below speculated that the state might have been concerned that collection of a tax on such small transactions would be impractical. 314 N.W.2d, at 207. That suggestion is unpersuasive, for sales of other low-priced goods are not exempt, see note 1, supra. If the real goal of this tax is to duplicate the sales tax, it is difficult to see why the state did not achieve that goal by the obvious and effective expedient of applying the sales tax.

Further, even assuming that the legislature did have valid reasons for substituting another tax for the sales tax, we are not persuaded that this tax does serve as a substitute. The state asserts that this scheme actually favors the press over other businesses, because the same rate of tax is applied, but, for the press, the rate applies to the cost of components rather than to the sales price. We would be hesitant to fashion a rule that automatically allowed the state to single out the press for a different method of taxation as long as the effective burden was not different from that on other taxpayers or the burden on the press was lighter than that on other businesses. One reason for this reluctance is that the very selection of the press for special treatment threatens the press not only with the current differential treatment, but with the possibility of subsequent differentially more burdensome treatment. Thus, even without actually imposing an extra burden on the press, the government might be able to achieve censorial effects, for "[t]he threat of sanctions may deter [the] exercise of [First Amendment] rights almost as potently as the actual application of sanctions." NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 433 (1963).

A second reason to avoid the proposed rule is that courts as institutions are poorly equipped to evaluate with precision the relative burdens of various methods of taxation. The complexities of factual economic proof always present a certain potential for error, and courts have little familiarity with the process of evaluating the relative economic burden of taxes. In sum, the possibility of error inherent in the proposed rule poses too great a threat to concerns at the heart of the First Amendment, and we cannot tolerate that possibility.<sup>13</sup> Minnesota, therefore, has offered no adequate justification for the special treatment of newspapers.

Minnesota's ink and paper tax violates the First Amendment not only because it singles out the press, but also because it targets a small group of newspapers. The effect of the $100,000 exemption enacted in 1974 is that only a handful of publishers pay any tax at all, and even fewer pay any significant amount of tax.<sup>15</sup> The state explains this exemption as part of a policy favoring an "equitable" tax system, although there are no comparable exemptions for small enterprises outside the press. Again, there is no legislative history supporting the state's view of the purpose of the amendment. Whatever the motive of the legislature in this case, we think that recognizing a power in the state not only to single out the press but also to tailor the tax so that it singles out a few members of the press presents such a potential for abuse that no interest suggested by Minnesota can justify the scheme. It has asserted no interest other than its desire to have an "equitable" tax system. The current system, it explains, promotes equity because it places the burden on large publications that impose more social costs than do smaller publications and that are more likely to be able to bear the burden of the tax. Even if we were willing to accept the premise that large businesses are more profitable and therefore better able to bear the burden of the tax, the state's commitment to this "equity" is questionable, for the concern has not led

13. If a state employed the same method of taxation but applied a lower rate to the press, so that there could be no doubt that the legislature was not singling out the press to bear a more burdensome tax, we would, of course, be in a position to evaluate the relative burdens. And, given the clarity of the relative burdens, as well as the rule that differential methods of taxation are not automatically permissible if less burdensome, a lower tax rate for the press would not raise the threat that the legislature might later impose an extra burden that would escape detection by the courts, * * *. Thus, our decision does not, as the dissent suggests, require Minnesota to impose a greater tax burden on publications.

15. In 1974, 11 publishers paid the tax. Three paid less than $1,000, and another three paid less than $8,000. Star Tribune, one of only two publishers paying more than $100,000, paid $608,634. In 1975, 13 publishers paid the tax. Again, three paid less than $1,000, and four more paid less than $3,000. For that year, Star Tribune paid $636,113 and was again one of only two publishers incurring a liability greater than $100,000. See 314 N.W.2d, at 203-204 and nn. 4, 5.

the state to grant benefits to small businesses in general. And when the exemption selects such a narrowly defined group to bear the full burden of the tax, the tax begins to resemble more a penalty for a few of the largest newspapers than an attempt to favor struggling smaller enterprises.

We need not and do not impugn the motives of the Minnesota legislature in passing the ink and paper tax. Illicit legislative intent is not the sine qua non of a violation of the First Amendment. See NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. at 439; NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449, 461 (1958); Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U.S. 444, 451 (1938). We have long recognized that even regulations aimed at proper governmental concerns can restrict unduly the exercise of rights protected by the First Amendment. E.g., Schneider v. State, 308 U.S. 147 (1939). A tax that singles out the press, or that targets individual publications within the press, places a heavy burden on the State to justify its action. Since Minnesota has offered no satisfactory justification for its tax on the use of ink and paper, the tax violates the First Amendment, and the judgment below is Reversed.

Justice White, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

Justice REHNQUIST, dissenting:

Today we learn from the Court that a state runs afoul of the First Amendment proscription of laws "abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press" where the state structures its taxing system to the advantage of newspapers. This seems very much akin to protecting something so overzealously that in the end it is smothered. While the Court purports to rely on the intent of the "Framers of the First Amendment," I believe it safe to assume that in 1791 "abridge" meant the same thing it means today: to diminish or curtail. Not until the Court's decision in this case, nearly two centuries after adoption of the First Amendment has it been read to prohibit activities which in no way diminish or curtail the freedoms it protects.

I agree with the Court that the First Amendment does not per se prevent the State of Minnesota from regulating the press even though such regulation imposes an economic burden. It is evident from the numerous cases relied on by the Court, which I need not repeat here, that this principle has been long settled. I further agree with the Court that application of general sales and use taxes to the press would be sanctioned under this line of cases. Therefore, I also agree with the Court to the extent it holds that any constitutional attack on the Minnesota scheme must be aimed at the classifications used in that taxing scheme. But it is at this point that I part company with my colleagues.

The Court recognizes in several parts of its opinion that the State of Minnesota could avoid constitutional problems by imposing on newspapers the 4% sales tax that it imposes on other retailers. Rather than impose such a tax however, the Minnesota legislature decided to provide newspapers with an exemption from the sales tax and impose a 4% use tax on ink and paper; thus, while both taxes are part of one "system of sales and use taxes," 314 N.W.2d 201, 203 (1981), newspapers are classified differently within that system. The problem the Court finds too difficult to deal with is whether this difference in treatment results in a significant burden on newspapers. * * * To state it in terms of the freedoms at issue here, no First Amendment issue is raised unless First Amendment rights have been infringed; for if there has been no infringement, then there has been no "abridgment" of those guaranties. See Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972).

Today the Court departs from this rule, refusing to look at the record and determine whether the classifications in the Minnesota use and sales tax statutes significantly burden the First Amendment rights of petitioner and its fellow newspapers. * * *

Wisely not relying solely on inability to weigh the burdens of the Minnesota tax scheme, the Court also says that even if the resultant burden on the press is lighter than on others:

"[T]he very selection of the press for special treatment threatens the press not only with the current differential treatment, but with the possibility of subsequent differentially more burdensome treatment. Thus, even without actually imposing an extra burden on the press, the government might be able to achieve censorial effects, for '[t]he threat of sanctions may deter [the] exercise of [First Amendment] rights almost as potently as the actual application of sanctions.'"

Surely the Court does not mean what it seems to say. The Court should be well aware from its discussion of Grosjean v. American Press Co., Inc., 297 U.S. 233 (1936), that this Court is quite capable of dealing with changes in state taxing laws which are intended to penalize newspapers. * * *

* * * In summary, so long as the state can find another way to collect revenue from the newspapers, imposing a sales tax on newspapers would be to no one's advantage; not the newspaper and its distributors who would have to collect the tax, not the state who would have to enforce collection, and not the consumer who would have to pay for the paper in odd amounts. The reasonable alternative Minnesota chose was to impose the use tax on ink and paper. "There is no reason to believe that this legislative choice is insufficiently tailored to achieve the goal of raising revenue or that it burdens the first amendment in any way whatsoever." 314 N.W.2d, at 207. Cf. Minnesota v. Clover Leaf Creamery Co., 449 U.S. 456 (1981).

The court finds in very summary fashion that the exemption newspapers receive for the first $100,000 of ink and paper used also violates the First Amendment because the result is that only a few of the newspapers actually pay a use tax. I cannot agree. As explained by the Minnesota Supreme Court, the exemption is in effect a $4,000 credit which benefits all newspapers. 314 N.W.2d, at 203. Minneapolis Star & Tribune was benefited to the amount of $16,000 in the two years in question; $4,000 each year for its morning paper and $4,000 each year for its evening paper. Ibid. Absent any improper motive on the part of the Minnesota legislature in drawing the limits of this exemption, it cannot be construed as violating the First Amendment. * * * There is no reason to conclude that the State, in drafting the $4,000 credit, acted other than reasonably and rationally to fit its sales and use tax scheme to its own local needs and usages.

To collect from newspapers their fair share of taxes under the sales and use tax scheme and at the same time avoid abridging the freedoms of speech and press, the Court holds today that Minnesota must subject newspapers to millions of additional dollars in sales tax liability. Certainly this is a hollow victory for the newspapers and I seriously doubt the Court's conclusion that this result would have been intended by the "Framers of the First Amendment."

For the reasons set forth above, I would affirm the judgment of the Minnesota Supreme Court.

COMMENT

1. Does the rejection of special tax legislation for the press in Minneapolis Star constitute a rejection of the Stewart thesis that the freedom of the press clause warrants a special constitutional status for the press? See Stewart, text, p. 7. Perhaps the majority should have faced up to the implications of the Grosjean rationale—a rationale which they profess to accept:

Legislation is unconstitutional if the motive of the legislation is to penalize the press. The Court in Minneapolis Star professes not to follow Grosjean even though its result led to the invalidation of the challenged legislation, as was the case in Grosjean.

It may be argued that in a sense the majority in Minneapolis Star does in fact follow Grosjean but just expands its approach. Thus, reading Grosjean and Minneapolis Star together, if the motive of legislation is either to hinder or to help the press, then the motive is impermissible. With respect to the press, the motive of the legislature must be neutral or indifferent. In response to this it may be argued that that was not what was held in Minneapolis Star. The test the Court referred to a number of times is that a legislative tax that treats the press differently cannot stand, unless the purpose of the legislation is designed to accomplish an overriding governmental interest. In other words, the strict scrutiny approach to legislation involving the press was used. In short, since Minnesota could not advance any overriding governmental reason for the tax in question, its differential aspect as far as the press was concerned required its invalidation, under the strict standard of judicial review now accorded to legislation challenged on First Amendment grounds.

2. Justice Rehnquist, in dissent, criticized a particular sentence in Justice O'Connor's opinion in Minneapolis Star: "The very selection of the press for special treatment threatens the press not only with the current differential treatment, but with the possibility of subsequent differentially more burdensome treatment." Does this approach have unwelcome ramifications for the First Amendment? The Newspaper Preservation Act exempts newspapers from the antitrust laws in significant respects. See text, p. 647. Newspapers and magazines are allowed to use the mails on a special and economically advantageous basis, at least compared to the mailing rates charged to ordinary individuals. Is the constitutionality of this kind of special favorable legislative treatment for the press now thrown into doubt as a result of Minneapolis Star?

3. In October 1979, Justice Brennan gave a provocative speech in which he identified two First Amendment models conveying differing degrees of constitutional protection. In this view, the "structural" model grants less constitutional protection to the press than does the "speech model":

Under one model—which I call the "speech" model—the press requires and is accorded the absolute protection of the First Amendment. In the other model—I call it the "structural" model—the press' interests may conflict with other societal interests and adjustment of the conflict on occasion favors the competing claim.

The "speech" model is familiar. It is as comfortable as a pair of old shoes, and the press, in its present conflict with the Court, most often slips into the language and rhetorical stance with which this model is associated even when only the "structural" model is at issue. According to this traditional "speech" model, the primary purpose of the First Amendment is more or less absolutely to prohibit any interference with freedom of expression. The "speech" model thus readily lends itself to the heady rhetoric of absolutism.

The "speech" model, however, has its limitations. It is a mistake to suppose that the First Amendment protects only self-expression, only the right to speak out. I believe that the First Amendment in addition fosters the values of democratic self-government.

Another way of saying this is that the First Amendment protects the structure of communications necessary for the existence of our democracy. This insight suggests the second model to describe the role of the press in our society. This second model is structural in nature. It focuses on the relationship of the press to the communicative functions required by our democratic beliefs. To the extent the press makes these functions possible, this model requires that it receive the protection of the First Amendment. A good example is the press' role in providing and circulating the information necessary for informed public discussion. To the extent the press, or, for that matter, to the extent that any institution uniquely performs this role, it should receive unique First Amendment protection.

This "structural" model of the press has several important implications. It significantly extends the umbrella of the press' constitutional protections. The press is not only shielded when it speaks out, but when it performs all the myriad tasks necessary for it to gather and disseminate the news. As you can easily see, the stretch of this protection is theoretically endless. Any imposition of any kind on the press will in some measure affect its ability to perform protected functions. Therefore this model requires a Court to weigh the effects of the imposition against the social interests which are served by the imposition. This inquiry is impersonal, almost sociological in nature. But it does not fit comfortably with the absolutist rhetoric associated with the first model of the press I have discussed. For here, I repeat, the Court must weigh the effects of the imposition inhibiting press access against the social interests served by the imposition.

Does the Court apply the "speech" mode or the "structural" model to the facts in the Minneapolis Star case? Which model should it have applied?

The Meaning of the Press Clause: A Special Status For The Press?

In First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765 (1978), the Supreme Court invalidated a Massachusetts statute prohibiting corporations from attempting to influence the vote on referendum proposals on issues of public importance which materially affect the property, business, or assets of the corporation. The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court upheld the statute and accorded corporations seeking to influence elections on matters not directly concerning such corporations less than full First Amendment protection by validating the statute. The Supreme Court, however, reversed the Massachusetts court. See text, p. 151.

The case did not directly answer the question of whether the free speech rights of corporations are protected, but it did hold that speech should be protected without reference to the identity of the speaker. Since Bellotti involved the free expression rights of business corporations, the question of whether media corporations, i.e., the institutional press, could make a greater claim to First Amendment protection than ordinary business corporations also arose. Justice Stewart, it will be recalled, had advanced the idea in a 1974 lecture that the press clause of the First Amendment had accorded a special status to the institutional press. See text, p. 7.

Under this theory, it would be possible to argue that media corporations could make a claim for fuller First Amendment protection than could ordinary business corporations. Indeed, in Stewart's 1974 lecture he had observed: "If the free speech clause guarantee meant no more than freedom of expression, it would be a constitutional redundancy." Justice Powell, who wrote the opinion for the Court, agreed that the press had a special and constitutionally recognized role: "The press cases emphasize the special and constitutionally recognized role of that institution in informing and educating the public, offering criticism, and providing a forum for discussion and debate." But Powell was, nonetheless, not disposed to take a hierarchical view of the First Amendment:

If the speakers here were not corporations, no one would suggest that the state could validate silence of their proposed speech. It is the type of speech indispensable to decision-making in a democracy, and this is no less true because the speech comes from a corporation rather than an individual. The inherent worth of the speech in terms of its capacity for informing the public does not depend upon the identity of its source, whether corporation, association, union or individual.

Although Chief Justice Burger agreed with both the opinion and the result reached by the Court in Bellotti, he wrote a separate concurring opinion in order to pose some questions which he thought likely to arise in the future. The issue he particularly wished to discuss was "whether the press clause confers upon the 'institutional press' any freedom from governmental restraint not enjoyed by others."

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF BOSTON v. BELLOTTI

Chief Justice BURGER, concurring.

A disquieting aspect of Massachusetts' position is that it may carry the risk of impinging on the First Amendment rights of those who employ the corporate form—as most do—to carry on the business of mass communications, particularly the large media conglomerates. This is so because of the difficulty, and perhaps impossibility, of distinguishing, either as a matter of fact or constitutional law, media corporations from corporations such as the appellants in this case.

Making traditional use of the corporate form, some media enterprises have amassed vast wealth and power and conduct many activities, some directly related—and some not—to their publishing and broadcasting activities. See Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo. Today, a corporation might own the dominant newspaper in one or more large metropolitan centers, television and radio stations in those same centers and others, a newspaper chain, news magazines with nationwide circulation, national or worldwide wire news services, and substantial interests in book publishing and distribution enterprises. Corporate ownership may extend, vertically, to pulp mills and pulp timber lands to insure an adequate, continuing supply of newsprint and to trucking and steamship lines for the purpose of transporting the newsprint to the presses. Such activities would be logical economic auxiliaries to a publishing conglomerate. Ownership also may extend beyond to business activities unrelated to the task of publishing newspapers and magazines or broadcasting radio and television programs. Obviously, such far-reaching ownership would not be possible without the state-provided corporate form and its "special rules relating to such matters as limited liability, perpetual life, and the accumulation, distribution, and taxation of assets. * * **"

In terms of "unfair advantage in the political process" and "corporate domination of the electoral process," it could be argued that such media conglomerates as I describe pose a much more realistic threat to valid interests than do appellants and similar entities not regularly concerned with shaping popular opinion on public issues. See Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, supra. In Tornillo, for example, we noted the serious contentions advanced that a result of the growth of modern media empires "has been to place in a few hands the power to inform the American people and shape public opinion." 418 U.S., at 250, 94 S.Ct., at 2836.

In terms of Massachusetts' other concern, the interests of minority shareholders, I perceive no basis for saying that the managers and directors of the media conglomerates are more or less sensitive to the views and desires of minority shareholders than are corporate officers generally.<sup>1</sup> Nor can it be said, even if relevant to First Amendment analysis—which it is not—that the former are more virtuous, wise or restrained in the exercise of corporate power than are the latter. Cf. Columbia Broadcasting System v. Democratic National Committee, 14 The Writings of Thomas Jefferson 46 (A. Libscomb ed. 1904) (letter to Walter Jones, Jan. 2, 1814). Thus, no factual distinction has been identified as yet that would justify government restraints on the right of appellants to express their views without, at the same time, opening the door to similar restraints on media conglomerates with their vastly greater influence.

Despite these factual similarities between media and nonmedia corporations, those who view the press clause as somehow conferring special and extraordinary privileges or status on the “institutional press”—which are not extended to those who wish to express ideas other than by publishing a newspaper—might perceive no danger to institutional media corporations flowing from the position asserted by Massachusetts. Under this narrow reading of the press clause, government could perhaps impose on nonmedia corporations restrictions not permissible with respect to “media” enterprises. Cf. Bezanson, The New Free Press Guarantee, 63 Va.L.Rev. 731, 767–770 (1977).<sup>2</sup> The Court has not yet squarely resolved whether the press clause confers upon the “institutional press” any freedom from government restraint not enjoyed by all others.<sup>3</sup>

I perceive two fundamental difficulties with a narrow reading of the press clause. First, although certainty on this point is not possible, the history of the clause does not suggest that the authors contemplated a “special” or “institutional” privilege. See Lange, the Speech and Press Clauses, 23 U.C.L.A.L.Rev. 77, 88–99 (1975). The common 18th century understanding of freedom of the press is suggested by Andrew Bradford, a colonial American newspaperman. In defining the nature of the liberty he did not limit it to a particular group:

“But, by the Freedom of the Press, I mean a Liberty, within the Bounds of Law, for any Man to communicate to the Public, his sentiments on the Important Points of Religion and Government; of proposing any Laws, which he apprehends may be for the Good of his Country, and of applying for the Repeal of such, as he Judges pernicious. * * *

“This is the Liberty of the Press, the great Palladium of all our other Liberties, which I hope the good People of this Province, will forever enjoy. * * *
A. Bradford, Sentiments on the Liberty of the Press, in L. Levy, Freedom of the Press from Zenger to Jefferson 41–42 (1966) [emphasis deleted] [first published in Bradford’s The American Weekly Mercury, a Philadelphia newspaper, April 25, 1734].

1. It may be that a nonmedia corporation, because of its nature, is subject to more limitations on political expression than a media corporation whose very existence is aimed at political expression. For example, the charter of a nonmedia corporation may be so framed as to tender such activity or expression ultra vires: or its shareholders may be much less inclined to permit expenditure for corporate speech. Moreover, a nonmedia corporation may find it more difficult to characterize its expenditures as ordinary and necessary business expenses for tax purposes.

2. It is open to question whether limitations can be placed on the free expression rights of some without undermining the guarantees of all. Experience with statutory limitations on campaign expenditures on behalf of candidates or parties may shed some light on this issue. Cf. Buckley v. Valeo.

3. Language in some cases perhaps may be read as assuming or suggesting no independent scope to the Press Clause, see Pell v. Procunier, or the contrary, see Bigelow v. Virginia. The Court, however, has not yet focused on the issue. See Lange, The Speech and Press Clauses, 23 U.C.L.A.L.Rev. 77 (1975); Nimmer, Is Freedom of the Press a Redundancy: What Does It Add to Freedom of Speech?, 26 Hastings L.J. 639 (1975); cf. Bezanson, The New Free Press Guarantee, 63 Va.L.Rev. 731 (1977).

Indeed most pre-First Amendment commentators "who employed the term 'freedom of speech' with great frequency, used it synonymously with freedom of the press." L. Levy, Legacy of Suppression: Freedom of Speech and Press in Early American History 174 (1963).

Those interpreting the press clause as extending protection only to, or creating a special role for, the "institutional press" must either (a) assert such an intention on the part of the Framers for which no supporting evidence is available, cf. Lange, supra, at 89–91; (b) argue that events after 1791 somehow operated to "constitutionalize" this interpretation, see Benzanson, The New Free Press Guarantee, 63 Va.L. Rev. 731, 788 (1977); or (c) candidly acknowledging the absence of historical support, suggest that the intent of the Framers is not important today. See Nimmer, Is Freedom of the Press a Redundancy: What Does It Add To Freedom of Speech?, 26 Hastings L.J. 639, 640–641 (1975).

To conclude that the Framers did not intend to limit the freedom of the press to one select group is not necessarily to suggest that the Press Clause is redundant. The speech clause standing alone may be viewed as a protection of the liberty to express ideas and beliefs,<sup>4</sup> while the press clause focuses specifically on the liberty to disseminate expression broadly and "comprehends every sort of publication which affords a vehicle of information and opinion." Lovell v. Griffin.<sup>5</sup> Yet there is no fundamental distinction between expression and dissemination. The liberty encompassed by the press clause, although complementary to and a natural extension of Speech Clause liberty, merited special mention simply because it had been more often the object of official restraints. Soon after the invention of the printing press, English and continental monarchs, fearful of the power implicit in its use and the threat to establishment thought and order—political and religious—devised restraints, such as licensing, censors, indices of prohibited books, and prosecutions for seditious libel, which generally were unknown in the pre-printing press era. Official restrictions were the official response to the new, disquieting idea that this invention would provide a means for mass communication.

The second fundamental difficulty with interpreting the press clause as conferring special status on a limited group is one of definition. See Lange, supra. The very task of including some entities within the

4. The simplest explanation of the speech and press clauses might be that the former protects oral communications; the latter, written. But the historical evidence does not strongly support this explanation. The first draft of what became the free expression provisions of the First Amendment, one proposed by Madison on May 5, 1789, as an addition to Art. 1, § 9, read:

"The people shall not be deprived or abridged of their right to speak, to write, or to publish their sentiments; and the freedom of the press, as one of the great bulwarks of liberty, shall be inviolable." 1 Annals of Cong. 451 (1789) (published as 1 Debates of Congress).

The language was changed to its current form, "freedom of speech, or of the press," by the Committee of Eleven to which Madison's amendments were referred. [There is no explanation for the change and the language was not altered thereafter.] It seems likely that the Committee shortened Madison's language preceding the semi-colon in his draft to "freedom of speech" without intending to diminish the scope of protection contemplated by Madison's phrase; in short, it was a stylistic change.

Cf. Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U.S. 168, 26 L.Ed. 377 (1881); Doe v. McMillan, 412 U.S. 306, 93 S.Ct. 2018, 36 L.Ed.2d 912 (1973) [Speech or Debate Clause extends to both spoken and written expressions within the legislative function].

5. It is not strange that "press," the word for what was then the sole means of broad dissemination of ideas and news, would be used to describe the freedom to communicate with a large, unseen audience.

Changes wrought by 20th century technology, of course, have rendered the printing press as it existed in 1791 as obsolete as Watt's copying or letter press. It is the core meaning of "press" as used in the constitutional text which must govern.

"institutional press" while excluding others, whether undertaken by legislature, court or administrative agency, is reminiscent of the abhorred licensing system of Tudor and Stuart England—a system the First Amendment was intended to ban from this country. Lovell v. Griffin. Further, the officials undertaking that task would be required to distinguish the protected from the unprotected on the basis of such variables as content of expression, frequency or fervor of expression, or ownership of the technological means of dissemination. Yet nothing in this Court's opinions supports such a confining approach to the scope of press clause protection.<sup>6</sup> Indeed, the Court has plainly intimated the contrary view:

"Freedom of the press is a 'fundamental personal right' which 'is not confined to newspapers and periodicals. It necessarily embraces pamphlets and leaflets. * * * The press in its historic connotation comprehends every sort of publication which affords a vehicle of information and opinion.' * * * The information function asserted by representatives of the organized press * * * is also performed by lecturers, political pollsters, novelists, academic researchers, and dramatists. Almost any author may quite accurately assert that he is contributing to the flow of information to the public. * * *" Branzburg v. Hayes, quoting Lovell v. Griffin.

The meaning of the press clause, as a provision separate and apart from the speech clause, is implicated only indirectly by this case. Yet Massachusetts' position poses serious questions. The evolution of traditional newspapers into modern corporate conglomerates in which the daily dissemination of news by print is no longer the major part of the whole enterprise suggests the need for caution in limiting the First Amendment rights of corporations as such. Thus, the tentative probings of this brief inquiry are wholly consistent, I think, with the Court's refusal to sustain § 8's serious and potentially dangerous restriction on the freedom of political speech.

Because the First Amendment was meant to guarantee freedom to express and communicate ideas, I can see no difference between the right of those who seek to disseminate ideas by way of a newspaper and those who give lectures or speeches and seek to enlarge the audience by publication and wide dissemination. "[T]he purpose of the Constitution was not to erect the press into a privileged institution but to protect all persons in their right to print what they will as well as to utter it. * * * [T]he liberty of the press is no greater and no less * * *" than the liberty of every citizen of the Republic." Pennekamp v. Florida (Frankfurter, J., concurring).

In short, the First Amendment does not "belong" to any definable category of persons or entities: it belongs to all who exercise its freedoms.

COMMENT

1. Did Bellotti really deal with whether corporate speech merits full First Amendment protection? That issue really was not considered. Powell, instead, said the issue was whether the corporate identity of the speech should affect its status under the First Amendment. What is Powell's attitude toward inequality in communicating power? From a First Amendment point of view, in Powell's view, all speakers have an equal claim to liberty of expression. In 1975, Professor Karst wrote: "'Equality of status in the field of ideas' is not merely a first amendment value; it is the heart of the amendment." See Karst, Equality as a Central Principle in the First Amendment, 43 U.Chi.L.Rev. 20 at 43 (1975).

2. In footnote 4 of his concurring opinion, Chief Justice Burger provides the historical background for his argument that the Framers, by making specific references to freedom of speech and press, did not intend to give a uniquely privileged constitutional status to the press. On the other hand, the Chief Justice agreed that the explicit mention of freedom of speech followed by the explicit mention of freedom of the press has some significance. The press clause is not redundant. Burger described the matter as follows: "To conclude that the Framers did not intend to limit the freedom of the press to one select group is not necessarily to suggest that the Press Clause is redundant." The fact that the press clause does not create a special First Amendment caste does not mean that the press clause, like the speech clause, cannot have separate purposes. The speech clause protects the freedom to express ideas, and the press clause protects the freedom to disseminate those ideas.

Burger mentioned some of the difficulties in accepting the thesis that the press clause accords a special protective status to the "institutional press" under the First Amendment. Such a theory would involve the courts in the difficult task of identifying who was a journalist and what publications should be deemed part of the "institutional press." Indeed, the Chief Justice pointed out that the Near case, one of the landmarks of the American law of free press, did not involve a "traditional institutionalized newspaper but rather an occasional newspaper." Moreover, it will be remembered that in Branzburg, the journalist's privilege case, text, p. 379, one of the reasons the Court refused to create a qualified First Amendment-based privilege was because of its aversion to deciding who was a journalist.

3. Burger wanted general business corporations to have First Amendment protection equivalent to that which would be accorded to media corporations alone under a "special status" theory. Was his purpose to provide a countervailing force to media power in the opinion process by arming business corporations with equivalent First Amendment protection? See Chief Justice Burger's opinion for the Court in Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, text p. 584. Does the "special status" theory have its origins in the Tornillo decision?

THE MEANING OF PROTECTED SPEECH UNDER THE FIRST AMENDMENT

Anonymous Speech

TALLEY v. CALIFORNIA

362 U.S. 60, 80 S.Ct. 536, 4 L.Ed.2d 559 (1960).

Justice BLACK delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question presented here is whether the provisions of a Los Angeles City ordinance restricting the distribution of handbills "abridge the freedom of speech and of the press secured against state invasion by the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution." The ordinance * * * provides:

"No person shall distribute any handbill in any place under any circumstances, which does not have printed on the cover, or the face thereof, the name and address of the following:

"(a) The person who printed, wrote, compiled or manufactured the same.

"(b) The person who caused the same to be distributed; provided, however, that in the case of a fictitious person or club, in addition to such fictitious name, the true names and addresses of the owners, managers or agents of the person sponsoring said hand-bill shall also appear thereon."

The petitioner was arrested and tried in a Los Angeles Municipal Court for violating this ordinance. It was stipulated that the petitioner had distributed handbills in Los Angeles, and two of them were presented in evidence. Each had printed on it the following:

National Consumers Mobilization
Box 6533
Los Angeles 55, Calif.
PLEasant 9-1576.

The handbills urged readers to help the organization carry on a boycott against certain merchants and businessmen, whose names were given, on the ground that, as one set of handbills said, they carried products of "manufacturers who will not offer equal employment opportunities to Negroes, Mexicans, and Orientals." There also appeared a blank, which, if signed, would request enrollment of the signer as a "member of National Consumers Mobilization," and which was preceded by a statement that "I believe that every man should have an equal opportunity for employment no matter what his race, religion, or place of birth."

The Municipal Court held that the information printed on the handbills did not meet the requirements of the ordinance, found the petitioner guilty as charged, and fined him $10. The Appellate Department of the Superior Court of the County of Los Angeles affirmed the conviction, rejecting petitioner's contention, timely made in both state courts, that the ordinance invaded his freedom of speech and press in violation of the Fourteenth and First Amendments to the Federal Constitution. 172 Cal.App.2d Supp. 797, 332 P.2d 447. Since this was the highest state court available to petitioner, we granted certiorari to consider this constitutional contention. 360 U.S. 928.

The broad ordinance now before us, barring distribution of "any hand-bill in any place under any circumstances," falls precisely under the ban of our prior cases unless this ordinance is saved by the qualification that handbills can be distributed if they have printed on them the names and addresses of the persons who prepared, distributed or sponsored them. * * * [T]he ordinance here is not limited to handbills whose content is "obscene or offensive to public morals or that advocates unlawful conduct." Counsel has urged that this ordinance is aimed at providing a way to identify those responsible for fraud, false advertising and libel. Yet the ordinance is in no manner so limited, nor have we been referred to any legislative history indicating such a purpose. Therefore we do not pass on the validity of an ordinance limited to prevent these or any other supposed evils. This ordinance simply bars all handbills under all circumstances anywhere that do not have the names and addresses printed on them in the place the ordinance requires.

There can be no doubt that such an identification requirement would tend to restrict freedom to distribute information and thereby freedom of expression. "Liberty of circulating is as essential to that freedom as liberty of publishing; indeed, without the circulation, the publication would be of little value." Lovell v. City of Griffin, 303 U.S. at page 452.

Anonymous pamphlets, leaflets, brochures and even books have played an important role in the progress of mankind. Persecuted groups and sects from time to time throughout history have been able to criticize oppressive practices and laws either anonymously or not at all.

Even the Federalist Papers, written in favor of the adoption of our Constitution, were published under fictitious names. It is plain that anonymity has sometimes been assumed for the most constructive purposes.

We have recently had occasion to hold in two cases that there are times and circumstances when states may not compel members of groups engaged in the dissemination of ideas to be publicly identified. The reason for those holdings was that identification and fear of reprisal might deter perfectly peaceful discussions of public matters of importance. This broad Los Angeles ordinance is subject to the same infirmity. We hold that it, like the Griffin, Georgia, ordinance, is void on its face.

The judgment of the Appellate Department of the Superior Court of the State of California is reversed and the cause is remanded to it for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

* * *

Justice Clark, whom Justice Frankfurter and Justice Whittaker join, dissenting.

1. The Talley case reveals the dilemma of reconciling freedom of information (interpreting that term to mean that all information on an issue ought to be put before the public) with a right of privacy (interpreting that term to mean, among many other things, the right to enter the opinion process anonymously). Phrasing the dilemma in this way, does the decision in Talley appear less satisfactory to you?

2. Justice Clark in dissent discerned the problems presented by blanket constitutional protection for anonymous speech in view of the requirement of the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act that lobbyists divulge their identities and in view of the many states which have enacted corrupt practices legislation prohibiting among other matters the distribution of anonymous printed matter concerning political candidates. How can some regulation of anonymous speech be permitted, and, at the same time, how can the political rights of those whom identification would endanger be protected? Justice Clark suggested a means to accomplish these two objectives. He referred to N.A.A.C.P. v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449 (1958). That was a case where the Court held that the N.A.A.C.P. could not constitutionally be required to divulge its membership lists to the state of Alabama because of the economic reprisal and physical jeopardy that such disclosure might mean for N.A.A.C.P. members. Clark argued that Talley made no showing that similar restraints would befall him. Did Justice Black respond to Clark's argument that anonymity can claim constitutional protection only when it is indispensable to the exercise of political rights? What counterarguments might be made to Clark's position?

3. Would a less broad statute than the one in Talley be constitutional? For a case which held that a New York statute making it a crime to distribute anonymous literature in connection with a political election campaign violated the First Amendment, see Zwickler v. Koota, 290 F.Supp. 244 (E.D.N.Y.1968), reversed on other grounds, Golden v. Zwickler, 394 U.S. 103 (1969).

VALENTINE v. CHRESTENSEN

316 U.S. 52, 62 S.Ct. 920, 86 L.Ed. 1262 (1942).

Justice ROBERTS delivered the opinion of the Court.

The respondent, a citizen of Florida, owns a former United States Navy submarine which he exhibits for profit. In 1940 he brought it to New York City and moored it at a state pier in the East River. He prepared and printed a handbill advertising the boat and soliciting visitors for a stated admission fee. On his attempting to distribute the bill in the city streets, he was advised by the petitioner, as police commissioner, that this activity would violate § 318 of the Sanitary Code which forbids distribution in the streets of commercial and business advertising matter, but was told that he might freely distribute handbills solely devoted to "information or a public protest."

Respondent thereupon prepared and showed to the petitioner, in proof form, a double-faced handbill. On one side was a revision of the original, altered by the removal of the statement as to admission fee but consisting only of commercial advertising. On the other side was a protest against the action of the City Dock Department in refusing the respondent wharfage facilities at a city pier for the exhibition of his submarine, but no commercial advertising. The Police Department advised that distribution of a bill containing only the protest would not violate § 318, and would not be restrained, but that distribution of the double-faced bill was prohibited. The respondent, nevertheless, proceeded with the printing of his proposed bill and started to distribute it. He was restrained by the police.

The question is whether the application of the ordinance to the respondent's activity, was, in the circumstances, an unconstitutional abridgement of the freedom of the press and of speech.

1. This Court has unequivocally held that the streets are proper places for the exercise of the freedom of communicating information and disseminating opinion and that, though the states and municipalities may appropriately regulate the privilege in the public interest, they may not unduly burden or proscribe its employment in these public thoroughfares. We are equally clear that the Constitution imposes no such restraint on government as respects purely commercial advertising. [Emphasis added.] Whether, and to what extent, one may promote or pursue a gainful occupation in the streets, to what extent such activity shall be adjudged a derogation of the public right of user, are matters for legislative judgment. The question is not whether the legislative body may interfere with the harmless pursuit of a lawful business, but whether it must permit such pursuit by what it deems an undesirable invasion of, or interference with, the full and free use of the highways by the people in fulfillment of the public use to which streets are dedicated. If the respondent was attempting to use the streets of New York by distributing commercial advertising, the prohibition of the code provision was lawfully invoked against his conduct.

2. The respondent contends that, in truth, he was engaged in the dissemination of matter proper for public information, none the less so because there was inextricably attached to the medium of such dissemination commercial advertising matter. The court below appears to have taken this view since it adverts to the difficulty of apportioning, in a given case, the contents of the communication as between what is of public interest and what is for private profit. We need not indulge nice appraisal based upon subtle distinctions in the present instance nor assume possible cases not now presented. It is enough for the present purpose that the stipulated facts justify the conclusion that the affixing of the protest against official conduct to the advertising circular was with the intent, and for the purpose, of evading the prohibition of the ordinance. If that evasion were successful, every merchant who desires to broadcast advertising leaflets in the streets need only append a civic appeal, or a moral platitude, to achieve immunity from the law's command.

The decree is reversed.

Reversed.

COMMENT

In Valentine v. Chrestensen, the Supreme Court held that commercial speech was outside the ambit of First Amendment protection and therefore subject to regulation by government. The Court believed that Chrestensen printed his noncommercial message solely to evade the regulatory provision. Chrestensen's subjective intent, in other words, belied his claim for First Amendment protection because it was merely a ploy to escape a lawful regulation of the City of New York. If Chrestensen were permitted to distribute his flyers, so could every merchant, simply by affixing to his advertising copy some expression of opinion or protest. The streets of New York would be filled with litter, the sanitary code provision to the contrary notwithstanding.

There may be a Keystone Kops air about Valentine v. Chrestensen, but the case for a time sowed the seeds of a constitutional doctrine of significance: the theory that the First Amendment does not embrace what Justice Roberts referred to as "purely" commercial speech. This would come to be called the commercial speech doctrine.

2. Note that Valentine v. Chrestensen was a unanimous decision. Why do you think Justice Black, for instance, agreed with the decision?

3. Did the Chrestensen doctrine establish a hierarchy for expression, i.e., some communications merit a greater claim to constitutional protection than others? Was the core of the Chrestensen doctrine that, if there is a "preference" for speech, the speech "preferred" is political rather than commercial speech? Is the process of distinguishing between such categories necessarily one that must be chiefly responsive to motive? If that is the case, doesn't the Grosjean (text, supra, p. 138) case forbid such considerations?

The Decline of the Commercial Speech Doctrine

The first in a series of cases which dealt a body blow to the idea that commercial speech is beyond the pale of First Amendment protection occurred in 1975. In Bigelow v. Virginia, 421 U.S. 809 (1975), the Court set aside the conviction of an editor of a weekly newspaper who had violated a Virginia state law by accepting an advertisement which announced placements in hospitals and clinics for low-cost abortions could be obtained in New York. The Virginia state law which forbade the circulation of publications encouraging the procuring of abortions was held unconstitutional.

Bigelow set forth a ground-breaking doctrine. The Court repudiated the idea that a category of commercial speech such as commercial advertising was "stripped of First Amendment protection merely because it appears in that form." The significance of Bigelow has been analyzed as follows:

[I]t was no longer adequate, in dealing with commercial speech, merely to say that any reasonable state regulation would be permissible. With the advent of a new First Amendment status for commercial speech, the interests of the publisher, the reader, and the consumer would be weighed against any arguments advanced in favor of the statute by the state. The statute proscribed activity [abortion] which was now clearly legal, and the state was held to have failed to justify the ban on publication in view of the overriding interests urged by the editor on behalf of the readers. Therefore, in upholding the right of the editor to publish the advertisement in controversy in Bigelow, the Court's approach to commercial speech followed a traditional First Amendment balancing test technique.

See Barron and Dienes, Handbook of Free Speech and Free Press 168 (1979).

Bigelow was merely the first development in the waning of the commercial speech doctrine set forth in Valentine v. Chrestensen. The coup de grâce to the traditional doctrine was dealt by Virginia

State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748 (1976) which follows.

VIRGINIA STATE BOARD OF PHARMACY v.
VIRGINIA CITIZENS
CONSUMER COUNCIL, INC.

425 U.S. 748, 96 S.Ct. 1817, 48 L.Ed.2d 346 (1976).

Justice BLACKMUN delivered the opinion of the Court.

The plaintiff-appellees in this case attack, as violative of the First and Fourteenth Amendments, that portion of § 54-524.35 of Va. Code Ann. (1974), which provides that a pharmacist licensed in Virginia is guilty of unprofessional conduct if he "(3) publishes, advertises or promotes, directly or indirectly, in any manner whatsoever, any amount, price, fee, premium, discount, rebate or credit terms for any drugs which may be dispensed only by prescription." The three-judge district court declared the quoted portion of the statute "void and of no effect," and enjoined the defendant-appellants, the Virginia State Board of Pharmacy and the individual members of that Board, from enforcing it.

The plaintiffs are an individual Virginia resident who suffers from diseases that require her to take prescription drugs on a daily basis, and two nonprofit organizations. Their claim is that the First Amendment entitles the user of prescription drugs to receive information, that pharmacists wish to communicate to them through advertising and other promotional means, concerning the prices of such drugs.

Certainly that information may be of value. Drug prices in Virginia, for both prescription and nonprescription items, strikingly vary from outlet to outlet even within the same locality. It is stipulated, for example, that in Richmond "the cost of 40 Achromycin tablets ranges from $2.59 to $6.00, a difference of 140% [sic]," and that in the Newport News-Hampton area the cost of tetracycline ranges from $1.20 to $9.00, a difference of 650%.

The question first arises whether, even assuming that First Amendment protection attaches to the flow of drug price information, it is a protection enjoyed by the appellees as recipients of the information, and not solely, if at all, by the advertisers themselves who seek to disseminate that information.

Freedom of speech presupposes a willing speaker. But where a speaker exists, as is the case here, the protection afforded is to the communication, to its source and to its recipients both. This is clear from the decided cases. If there is a right to advertise, there is a reciprocal right to receive the advertising, and it may be asserted by these appellees.

The appellants contend that the advertisement of prescription drug prices is outside the protection of the First Amendment because it is "commercial speech." There can be no question that in past decisions the Court has given some indication that commercial speech is unprotected.

Our question is whether speech which does "no more than propose a commercial transaction," Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Pittsburgh Comm'n on Human Relations, is so removed from any "exposition of ideas," Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, and from "'truth, science, morality, and arts in general, in its diffusion of liberal sentiments on the administration of Government.'" Roth v. United States, that it lacks all protection. Our answer is that it is not.

Focusing first on the individual parties to the transaction that is proposed in the commercial advertisement, we may assume that the advertiser's interest is a purely economic one. That hardly disqualifies him for protection under the First Amendment.

As to the particular consumer's interest in the free flow of commercial information, that interest may be as keen, if not keener by far, than his interest in the day's most urgent political debate. Appellees' case in this respect is a convincing one. Those whom the suppression of prescription drug price information hits the hardest are the poor, the sick, and particularly the aged. A disproportionate amount of their income tends to be spent on prescription drugs; yet they are the least able to learn, by shopping from pharmacist to pharmacist, where their scarce dollars are best spent.

Advertising, however tasteless and excessive it sometimes may seem, is nonetheless dissemination of information as to who is producing and selling what product, for what reason, and at what price. So long as we preserve a predominantly free enterprise economy, the allocation of our resources in large measure will be made through numerous private economic decisions. It is a matter of public interest that those decisions, in the aggregate, be intelligent and well informed. To this end, the free flow of commercial information is indispensable. And if it is indispensable to the proper allocation of resources in a free enterprise system, it is also indispensable to the formation of intelligent opinions as to how that system ought to be regulated or altered. Therefore, even if the First Amendment were thought to be primarily an instrument to enlighten public decisionmaking in a democracy, we could not say that the free flow of information does not serve that goal.

Arrayed against these substantial individual and societal interests are a number of justifications for the advertising ban. These have to do principally with maintaining a high degree of professionalism on the part of licensed pharmacists. Indisputably, the state has a strong interest in maintaining that professionalism.

It appears to be feared that if the pharmacist who wishes to provide the low cost, and assertedly low quality, services is permitted to advertise, he will be taken up on his offer by too many unwitting customers. They will choose the low-cost, low-quality service and drive the "professional" pharmacist out of business. They will respond only to costly and excessive advertising, and end up paying the price. They will go from one pharmacist to another, following the discount, and destroy the pharmacist-customer relationship. They will lose respect for the profession because it advertises. All this is not in their best interests, and all this can be avoided if they are not permitted to know who is charging what.

There is, of course, an alternative to this highly paternalistic approach. That alternative is to assume that this information is not in itself harmful, that people will perceive their own best interests if only they are well enough informed, and that the best means to that end is to open the channels of communication rather than to close them. If they are truly open, nothing prevents the "professional" pharmacist from marketing his own assertedly superior product, and contrasting it with that of the low-cost, high-volume prescription drug retailer. But the choice among these alternative approaches is not ours to make or the Virginia General Assembly's. It is precisely this kind of choice, between the dangers of suppressing information, and the dangers of its misuse if it is freely available, that the First Amendment makes for us. Virginia is free to require whatever professional standards it wishes of its pharmacists; it may subsidize them or protect them from competition in other ways. But it may not do so by keeping the public in ignorance of the entirely lawful terms that competing pharmacists are offering. In this sense, the justifications Virginia has offered for suppressing the flow of prescription drug price information, far from persuading us that the flow is not protected by the First Amendment, have re-enforced our view that it is. We so hold.

In concluding that commercial speech, like other varieties, is protected, we of course do not hold that it can never be regulated in any way. Some forms of commercial speech regulation are surely permissible. We mention a few only to make clear that they are not before us and therefore are not foreclosed by this case.

There is no claim, for example, that the prohibition on prescription drug price advertising is a mere time, place, and manner restriction. We have often approved restrictions of that kind provided that they are justified without reference to the content of the regulated speech, that they serve a significant governmental interest, and that in so doing they leave open ample alternative channels for communication of the information. Whatever may be the proper bounds of time, place, and manner restrictions on commercial speech, they are plainly exceeded by this Virginia statute, which singles out speech of a particular content and seeks to prevent its dissemination completely.

Nor is there any claim that prescription drug price advertisements are forbidden because they are false or misleading in any way. Untruthful speech, commercial or otherwise, has never been protected for its own sake. Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc. Obviously, much commercial speech is not provably false, or even wholly false, but only deceptive or misleading. We foresee no obstacle to a State's dealing effectively with this problem.<sup>24</sup> The First Amendment, as we construe it today, does not prohibit the state from insuring that the stream of commercial information flows cleanly as well as freely.

Also, there is no claim that the transactions proposed in the forbidden advertisements are themselves illegal in any way. Cf. Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Pittsburgh Comm'n on Human Relations. Finally, the special problems of the electronic broadcast media are likewise not in this case.

What is at issue is whether a state may completely suppress the dissemination of concededly truthful information about entirely lawful activity, fearful of that information's effect upon its disseminators and its recipients. Reserving other questions, we conclude that the answer to this one is in the negative.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

Justice Stevens took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

Justice Stewart, concurring.

The advertiser's access to the truth about his product and its price substantially eliminates any danger that governmental regulation of false or misleading price or product advertising will chill accurate and nondeceptive commercial expression. There is, therefore, little need to sanction "some falsehood in order to protect speech that matters." Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc.

Justice Rehnquist, dissenting.

Under the Court's opinion the way will be open not only for dissemination of price information but for active promotion of prescription drugs, liquor, cigarettes and other products the use of which it has

24. In concluding that commercial speech enjoys First Amendment protection, we have not held that it is wholly undifferentiable from other forms. There are commonsense differences between speech that does "no more than purpose a commercial transaction," and other varieties. Even if the differences do not justify the conclusion that commercial speech is valueless, and thus subject to complete suppression by the state, they nonetheless suggest that a different degree of protection is necessary to insure that the flow of truthful and legitimate commercial information is unimpaired. The truth of commercial speech, for example, may be more easily verifiable by its disseminator than, let us say, news reporting or political commentary, in that ordinarily the advertiser seeks to disseminate information about a specific product or service that he himself provides and presumably knows more about than anyone else. Also, commercial speech may be more durable than other kinds. Since advertising is the sine qua non of commercial profits, there is little likelihood of its being chilled by proper regulation and foregone entirely.

Attributes such as these, the greater objectivity and hardness of commercial speech, may make it less necessary to tolerate inaccurate statements for fear in silencing the speaker. They may also make it appropriate to require that a commercial message appear in such a form, or include such additional information, warnings and disclaimers, as are necessary to prevent it being deceptive.

previously been thought desirable to discourage. Now, however, such promotion is protected by the First Amendment so long as it is not misleading or does not promote an illegal product or enterprise.

There are undoubted difficulties with an effort to draw a bright line between "commercial speech" on the one hand and "protected speech" on the other, and the Court does better to face up to these difficulties than to attempt to hide them under labels. In this case, however, the Court has unfortunately substituted for the wavering line previously thought to exist between commercial speech and protected speech a no more satisfactory line of its own—that between "truthful" commercial speech, on the one hand, and that which is "false and misleading" on the other. The difficulty with this line is not that it wavers, but on the contrary that it is simply too Procrustean to take into account the congeries of factors which I believe could, quite consistently with the First and Fourteenth Amendments, properly influence a legislative decision with respect to commercial advertising.

COMMENT

1. Professor Edwin Baker has argued, based on his individual liberty model of the First Amendment, that "a complete denial of first amendment protection for commercial speech is not only consistent with, but is required by, first amendment theory." See Baker, Commercial Speech: A Problem In The Theory of Freedom, 62 Iowa L.Rev. 1 at 3 (1976). Baker provides the following argument against a protected status for commercial speech:

[I]n our present historical setting, commercial speech is not a manifestation of individual freedom or choice. * * * [P]rofit-motivated or commercial speech lacks the crucial connections with individual liberty and self-realization which exist for speech generally, and which are central to justifications for the constitutional protection of speech, justifications which in turn define the proper scope of protection under the first amendment.

What values emphasized in Virginia Pharmacy does this analysis omit? It could be argued, certainly, that an individual with little in the way of economic resources and dependent for life on an expensive prescription drug might well find information as to the price of these drugs central to "self-realization."

2. Although Virginia Pharmacy gave new constitutional protection to commercial speech, it was still, to steal a phrase from George Orwell, a little less equal than other kinds of speech. (See fn. 24) and this text, p. 162. Part of the Court's problem was presented by the perceived need to regulate false and misleading advertising. Professor Redish has challenged some of the Court's reasoning for continuing to validate some regulation of commercial advertising. See Redish, The Value of Free Speech, 130 U.Pa.L.Rev. 591 at 633 (1982). Professor Redish questioned whether commercial claims are more easily verified than political ones. "[M]any statements made in the course of political debate—particularly by the press—are simply assertions of fact, which are presumably verifiable. * * * [M]any claims about commercial products, are, in reality, assertions of scientific fact. * * *"

Further, commercial and political expression are not easily distinguished in terms of relative "hardihood" in Professor Redish's view on the supposed "inherent profit nature" of commercial expression. But the press would not stop publishing either if it were requested. "Fear of regulation" might deter the press from dealing with controversy, but it would still publish. Similarly, "the possibility of regulation" would not cause the commercial advertiser to stop advertising, "but it might deter him from making controversial claims for his product."

The distinction between commercial and political speech, according to Professor Redish, has another rationale:

We presumably find such regulation in the political process so abhorrent not because we wish to condone misleading political claims, but rather because of the dangers inherent in allowing the government to regulate on the basis of the misleading nature of assertions made in the political process. The fear is that those in power will use such authority as a weapon with which to intimidate or defeat the political opposition, a result that has been all too common in our political history. * * * In contrast, there is no reason to believe that much regulation of misleading advertising is similarly motivated.

Do you agree?

Another significant development in the line of cases according a higher degree of First Amendment protection to commercial speech is Bates v. State Bar of Arizona.

The case arose out of the following facts. Two members of the Arizona bar were charged with violating a state supreme court disciplinary rule which prohibited lawyers from advertising in newspapers as well as other media. The two lawyers, John Bates and Van O'Steen, opened up a "legal clinic" to serve people of moderate means. The clinic limited itself to "routine" legal services. In order to obtain a sufficient volume of business to make low-cost legal services possible, the two lawyers decided to advertise. They took out an ad in the Phoenix daily newspaper, Arizona Republic, where they listed the type of services which they could provide and the fees which they would charge, e.g., uncontested divorces—$100, uncontested adoptions—$225 plus a $10 publications fee. The state bar concluded that the two lawyers had violated the disciplinary rule against lawyer advertising, and the Arizona Supreme Court upheld that determination. The United States Supreme Court affirmed in part and reversed in part.

BATES v. STATE BAR OF ARIZONA

Justice BLACKMUN delivered the opinion of the Court.

[The Court held that the state ban on lawyer advertising did not violate the Sherman Antitrust Act.]

* * *

[T]he conclusion that Arizona's disciplinary rule is violative of the First Amendment might be said to flow a fortiori from [the Virginia Pharmacy decision]. Like the Virginia statutes, the disciplinary rule serves to inhibit the free flow of commercial information and to keep the public in ignorance. Because of the possibility, however, that the differences among professions might bring different constitutional considerations into play, we specifically reserved judgment as to other professions.

In the instant case we are confronted with the arguments directed explicitly toward the regulation of advertising by licensed attorneys.

The issue presently before us is a narrow one. First, we need not address the peculiar problems associated with advertising claims relating to the quality of legal services. Such claims probably are not susceptible to precise measurement or verification and, under some circumstances, might well be deceptive or misleading to the public, or even false. Appellee does not suggest, nor do we perceive, that appellants' advertisement contained claims, extravagant or otherwise, as to the quality of services. Accordingly, we leave that issue for another day. Second, we also need not resolve the problems associated with in-person solicitation of clients—at the hospital room or the accident site, or in any other situation that breeds undue influence—by attorneys or their agents or "runners." Activity of that kind might well pose dangers of over-reaching and misrepresentation not encountered in newspaper announcement advertising. Hence, this issue also is not before us. Third, we note that appellee's criticism of advertising by attorneys does not apply with much force to some of the basic factual content of advertising: information as to the attorney's name, address, and telephone number, office hours, and the like. The American Bar Association itself has a provision in its current Code of Professional Responsibility that would allow the disclosure of such information, and more, in the classified section of the telephone directory. DR2-102(A)(6) (1976). We recognize, however, that an advertising diet limited to such spartan fare would provide scant nourishment.

The heart of the dispute before us today is whether lawyers also may constitutionally advertise the prices at which certain routine services will be performed. Numerous justifications are proffered for the restriction of such price advertising. [The Court considered each of these policy justifications and rejected them.] * * *

In the usual case involving a restraint on speech, a showing that the challenged rule served unconstitutionally to suppress speech would end our analysis. In the First Amendment context, the Court has permitted attacks on overly broad statutes without requiring that the person making the attack demonstrate that in fact his specific conduct was protected. * * * Having shown that the disciplinary rule interferes with protected speech, appellants ordinarily could expect to benefit regardless of the nature of their acts.

The First Amendment overbreadth doctrine, however, represents a departure from the traditional rule that a person may not challenge a statute on the ground that it might be applied unconstitutionally in circumstances other than those before the court. * * * The reason for the special rule in First Amendment cases is apparent: an overbroad statute might serve to chill protected speech. First Amendment interests are fragile interests, and a person who contemplates protected activity might be discouraged by the in terrorem effect of the statute. See NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 433 (1963). Indeed, such a person might choose not to speak because of uncertainty whether his claim of privilege would prevail if challenged. The use of overbreadth analysis reflects the conclusion that the possible harm to society from allowing unprotected speech to go unpunished is outweighed by the possibility that protected speech will be muted.

But the justification for the application of overbreadth analysis applies weakly, if at all, in the ordinary commercial context. As was acknowledged in Virginia Pharmacy Board v. Virginia Consumer Council, there are "commonsense differences" between commercial speech and other varieties. Since advertising is linked to commercial well-being it seems unlikely that such speech is particularly susceptible to being crushed by overbroad regulation. Moreover, concerns for uncertainty in determining the scope of protection are reduced; the advertiser seeks to disseminate information about a product or service that he provides, and presumably he can determine more readily than others whether his speech is truthful and protected. Ibid. Since overbreadth has been described by this Court as "strong medicine," which "has been employed * * * sparingly and only as a last resort," we decline to apply it to professional advertising, a context where it is not necessary to further its intended objective.

We conclude that it has not been demonstrated that the advertisement at issue could be suppressed. [The Court concludes that the advertising in question is not misleading and "hence unprotected."]

In holding that advertising by attorneys may not be subjected to blanket suppression, and that the advertisement at issue is protected, we, of course, do not hold that advertising by attorneys may not be regulated in any way. We mention some of the clearly permissible limitations in advertising not foreclosed by our holding.

Advertising that is false, deceptive, or misleading of course is subject to restraint. See Virginia Pharmacy Board v. Virginia Citizens Council. Since the advertiser knows his product and has a commercial interest in its dissemination, we have little worry that regulation to assure truthfulness will discourage protected speech. And any concern that strict requirements for truthfulness will undesirably inhibit spontaneity seems inapplicable because commercial speech generally is calculated. Indeed, the public and private benefits from commercial speech derive from confidence in its accuracy and reliability. Thus, the leeway for untruthful or misleading expression that has been allowed in other contexts has little force in the commercial arena. * * * In fact, because the public lacks sophistication concerning legal services, misstatements that might be overlooked or deemed unimportant in other advertising may be found quite inappropriate in legal advertising. For example, advertising claims as to the quality of services—a matter we do not address today—are not susceptible to measurement or verification; accordingly, such claims may be so likely to be misleading as to warrant restriction. Similar objections might justify restraints on in-person solicitation. We do not foreclose the possibility that some limited supplementation, by way of warning or disclaimer or the like, might be required of even an advertisement of the kind ruled upon today so as to assure that the consumer is not misled. In sum, we recognize that many of the problems in defining the boundary between deceptive and nondeceptive advertising remain to be resolved, and we expect that the bar will have a special role to play in assuring that advertising by attorneys flows both freely and cleanly.

As with other varieties of speech, it follows as well that there may be reasonable restrictions on the time, place, and manner of advertising. See Virginia Pharmacy Board v. Virginia Consumer Council. Advertising concerning transactions that are themselves illegal obviously may be suppressed. See Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Human Relations Comm'n. And the special problems of advertising on the electronic broadcast media will warrant special consideration. * * *

The constitutional issue in this case is only whether the state may prevent the publication in a newspaper of appellant's truthful advertisement concerning the availability and terms of routine legal services. We rule simply that the flow of such information may not be restrained, and we, therefore hold the present application of the disciplinary rule against appellants to be violative of the First Amendment.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Arizona is therefore affirmed in part and reversed in part.

It is so ordered.

Chief Justice Burger, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

* * *

Justice POWELL, with whom Justice Stewart joins, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

[T]he Court fails to give appropriate weight to the two fundamental ways in which the advertising of professional services differs from that of tangible products: the vastly increased potential for deception and the enhanced difficulty of effective regulation in the public interest.

Although I disagree strongly with the Court's holding as to price advertisements of undefined—and I believe undefinable—routine legal services, there are reservations in its opinion worthy of emphasis since they may serve to narrow its ultimate reach. First, the Court notes that it had not addressed "the peculiar problems associated with advertisements containing claims as to the quality of legal services." * * * Nevertheless the Court's reservation in this respect could be a limiting factor.

Second, as in Virginia Pharmacy, the Court again notes that there may be reasonable restrictions on the time, place, and manner of commercial price advertising. In my view, such restrictions should have a significantly broader reach with respect to professional services than as to standardized products. This Court long has recognized the important state interests in the regulation of professional advertising.

* * * Although the opinion today finds these interests insufficient to justify prohibition of all price advertising, the state interests recognized in these cases should be weighed carefully in any future consideration of time, place and manner restrictions.

Finally, the Court's opinion does not "foreclose the possibility that some limited supplementation, by way of warning or disclaimer or the like, might be required of even an advertisement of the kind ruled upon today so as to assure that the consumer is not misled." I view this as at least some recognition of the potential for deception inherent in fixed price advertising of specific legal services. This recognition, though ambiguous in light of other statements in the opinion, may be viewed as encouragement to those who believe—as I do—that if we are to have price advertisement of legal services, the public interest will require the most particular regulation.

Justice REHNQUIST, dissenting.

I continue to believe that the First Amendment speech provision, long regarded by this Court as a sanctuary for expressions of public importance or intellectual interest, is demeaned by invocation to protect advertisements of goods and services. I would hold quite simply that the appellants' advertisement, however truthful or reasonable it may be, is not the sort of expression that the Amendment was adopted to protect.

* * * Once the exception of commercial speech from the protection of the First Amendment which had been established by Valentine v. Chrestensen was abandoned, the shift to case-by-case adjudication of First Amendment claims of advertisers was a predictable consequence.

While I agree with my Brother Powell that the effect of today's opinion on the professions is both unfortunate and not required by the First and Fourteenth Amendments, I cannot join the implication in his opinion that some forms of legal advertising may be constitutionally protected. The Valentine distinction was constitutionally sound and practically workable, and I am still unwilling to take even one step down the slippery slope away from it.

COMMENT

1. Bates made a distinction between "routine" legal advertising which could not be validly prohibited and bans on "quality" advertising, the validity of which the Court postponed for resolution for another day. Bates left room for the state to regulate some kinds of professional advertising. Moreover, the Court limited its ruling to the type of advertising involved in Bates, e.g., print media advertising. Bates suggested that the case for regulation of professional advertising on the electronic media would be stronger than in the case of the print media. Why?

2. Further illustration that the First Amendment status of commercial speech is inferior to that of other forms of protected speech was found in the Court's discussion of the overbreadth doctrine. Ordinarily, if some protected speech had been regulated by an invalid regulation, a person affected would have been free to have taken advantage of the invalidation of the regulation. But in Bates the Court still examined whether the advertisements in question were entitled to First Amendment protection.

3. In Bates, the Court reiterated that "[a]dvertising that is false, deceptive or misleading of course is subject to restraint." The Court specifically referred to the fact that "some limited supplementation, by way of warning or disclaimer" might be required even with respect to "routine" legal advertising. In Warner-Lambert Co. v. FTC, 562 F.2d 749 (D.C.Cir. 1977), an FTC order requiring the makers of Listerine to purchase future advertising to correct deceptive advertising resulting from its prior advertising was upheld. See this text, p. 594. See Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974). If publishers cannot be compelled against their will, why can advertisers be compelled to speak against their will? Does the answer lie in the fact that commercial speech still occupies a lesser First Amendment status than does political speech?

In the Listerine case, the FTC-imposed remedy of mandatory corrective advertising was deemed to present no First Amendment problem on the ground that absent the corrective advertising "current and future" Listerine ads would "themselves [be] part of a continuing deception of the public." For the text of the decision in the Warner-Lambert case, see text, p. 625. The FTC order required Warner-Lambert, manufacturer of Listerine, to assert that Listerine would not help to "prevent colds or sore throats or lessen their severity." Judge J. Skelly Wright presented the issue for the Court in the Listerine case as follows: "Advertising which fails to rebut the prior claims as to Listerine's efficacy inevitably builds upon those claims; continued advertising continues the deception, albeit implicitly rather than explicitly."

As a result of Warner-Lambert, advertisers are now aware that the FTC may, in Listerine-type circumstances, compel them to include specific disclaimers in future advertising. The First Amendment justification for this, of course, is that false and deceptive advertising is not accorded full First Amendment protection. But won't the fear of mandatory corrective advertising in the future have a chilling effect on fully protected truthful speech? An advertiser may fear to make "true" claims for fear they may be called "false." See discussion of "overbreadth" in the Bates case, text, p. 164.

In Warner-Lambert, Judge Wright responded to this criticism by asserting that verifying the truth or falsity of commercial messages was easier than was the case with other kinds of expression. If the First Amendment were interpreted to permit the FTC only to force a cessation of further false advertising, advertisers, Judge Wright feared, would not be deterred since the public would already have been misled.

4. Another development in the general overhaul of the commercial speech doctrine which began with the Bigelow case was found in Linmark Associates, Inc. v. Township of Willingboro, 431 U.S. 85 (1977). The town of Willingboro, New Jersey had issued an ordinance forbidding the posting of "For Sale" or "Sold" signs. The point of the ordinance was to prevent a so-called "white" flight from a community whose black population was rapidly increasing. The Supreme Court, per Justice Marshall, ruled that the ordinance was unconstitutional.

The Linmark case showed that the First Amendment interest in providing both the buyer and society with an unrestricted flow of commercial information was of high dimension. State concern that use of the "For Sale" sign might cause the community to act irrationally would not justify restricting the most effective option for communication of a particular kind of commercial information—the use of the “For Sale” sign in front of the house to communicate a homeowner’s desire to sell his house.

Linmark showed that the status of commercial speech is significant. Although commercial speech may not yet have attained the status of noncommercial speech, a case like Linmark demonstrates that the marketplace is worthy of inclusion in a constitutionally protected marketplace of ideas.

As a First Amendment matter, even when expression is protected, time, place, and manner regulations are, in appropriate circumstances, nevertheless permissible. Was the restriction on “For Sale” signs merely a restriction on the manner of expression? After all, other opportunities for advertising the sale of houses were available such as the classified columns of the newspapers. The Court refused to view the ordinance prohibiting “For Sale” signs as manner restrictions. The ordinance in the Court’s opinion was concerned with restricting the content of a particular mode of communication. Since the Willingboro ordinance was not content-neutral and was designed to restrict a class of expression, even though the expression involved was commercial in character, the ordinance violated the First Amendment.

5. In Carey v. Population Services International, 431 U.S. 678 (1977), the Court invalidated a state ban on advertising or display of contraceptives. A justification offered for the ban was to limit illicit sexual behavior among youth. Neither the interest in protection of the young nor the commercial character of the expression regulated were sufficient to warrant validating the restriction in question.

Carey emphasized an important point about the new approach to commercial speech begun in Virginia Pharmacy—the invalidity of state efforts to abolish an entire class of advertising: “Just as in [Virginia Pharmacy] the statute challenged here seeks to suppress completely any information about the availability and price of contraceptives.”<sup>6</sup> The Court recalled that in Virginia Pharmacy, it had held that “a state may not ‘completely suppress the dissemination of concededly truthful information about entirely lawful activity,’ even when that information could be categorized as ‘commercial speech’.”

The student should also consult the advertising section of this text where some of these cases are discussed from a regulation, instead of a First Amendment, point of view. See text, p. 605.

CENTRAL HUDSON GAS & ELECTRIC CORP. v. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION

447 U.S. 557, 100 S.Ct. 2343, 65 L.Ed.2d 341 (1980).

Justice POWELL delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case presents the question whether a regulation of the Public Service Commission of the State of New York violates the First and Fourteenth Amendments because it completely bans promotional advertising by an electrical utility.

In December 1973, the commission, appellee here, ordered electric utilities in New York State to cease all advertising that “promot[es] the use of electricity.”

6. The Virginia Pharmacy and Bates decisions should not, however, be thought to have sounded the death knell for all governmental prohibitions directed against entire categories of advertising. The validation of the federal legislation prohibiting all cigarette advertising on television discussed in connection with the Capital Broadcasting Co. case, text, p. 857, has survived the new commercial speech decisions. In Bates, the Court remarked on the point as follows: “[S]pecial problems of advertising on the electronic broadcast media will warrant special consideration. Cf. Capital Broadcasting Co. v. Mitchell.”

The order was based on the commission's finding that "the interconnected utility system in New York State does not have sufficient fuel stocks or sources of supply to continue furnishing all customer demands for the 1973–1974 winter."

Three years later, when the fuel shortage had eased, the commission requested comments from the public on its proposal to continue the ban on promotional advertising. Central Hudson Gas & Electric Corporation, the appellant in this case, opposed the ban on First Amendment grounds. After reviewing the public comments, the commission extended the prohibition in a policy statement issued on February 25, 1977.

The policy statement divided advertising expenses "into two broad categories: promotional—advertising intended to stimulate the purchase of utility services—and institutional and informational, a broad category inclusive of all advertising not clearly intended to promote sales." The commission declared all promotional advertising contrary to the national policy of conserving energy. It acknowledged that the ban is not a perfect vehicle for conserving energy. Still, the commission adopted the restriction because it was deemed likely to "result in some dampening of unnecessary growth" in energy consumption.

The commission's order explicitly permitted "informational" advertising designed to encourage "shifts of consumption" from peak demand times to periods of low electricity demand. [Emphasis in original.] Informational advertising would not seek to increase aggregate consumption, but would invite a leveling of demand throughout any given 24-hour period. The agency offered to review "specific proposals by the companies for specifically described [advertising] programs that meet these criteria."

Appellant challenged the order in state court, arguing that the commission had restrained commercial speech in violation of the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The commission's order was upheld by the trial court and at the intermediate appellate level. The New York Court of Appeals affirmed.

The commission's order restricts only commercial speech, that is, expression related solely to the economic interests of the speaker and its audience. In applying the First Amendment to this area, we have rejected the "highly paternalistic" view that government has complete power to suppress or regulate commercial speech. Even when advertising communicates only an incomplete version of the relevant facts, the First Amendment presumes that some accurate information is better than no information at all.

Nevertheless, our decisions have recognized "the 'common-sense' distinction between speech proposing a commercial transaction, which occurs in an era traditionally subject to government regulation, and other varieties of speech." The Constitution therefore accords a lesser protection to commercial speech than to other constitutionally guaranteed expression. The protection available for particular commercial expression turns on the nature both of the expression and of the governmental interests served by its regulation.

The First Amendment's concern for commercial speech is based on the informational function of advertising. Consequently, there can be no constitutional objection to the suppression of commercial messages that do not accurately inform the public about lawful activity. The government may ban forms of communications more likely to deceive the public than to inform it.

If the communication is neither misleading nor related to unlawful activity, the government's power is more circumscribed. The state must assert a substantial interest to be achieved by restrictions on commercial speech. Moreover, the regulatory technique must be in proportion to that interest. The limitation on expression must be designed carefully to achieve the state's goal. Compliance with this requirement may be measured by two criteria. First, the restriction must directly advance the state interest involved: the regulation may not be sustained if it provides only ineffective or remote support for the government's purpose. Second, if the governmental interest could be served as well by a more limited restriction on commercial speech, the excessive restrictions cannot survive.

Under the first criterion, the court has declined to uphold regulations that only indirectly advance the state interest involved.

The second criterion recognizes that the First Amendment mandates that speech restrictions be "narrowly drawn." The regulatory technique may extend only as far as the interest it serves. The state cannot regulate speech that poses no danger to the asserted state interest, nor can it completely suppress information when narrower restrictions on expression would serve its interest as well.

In commercial speech cases, then, a four-part analysis has developed. At the outset, we must determine whether the expression is protected by the First Amendment. For commercial speech to come within that provision, it at least must concern lawful activity and not be misleading. Next, we ask whether the asserted governmental interest is substantial. If both inquiries yield positive answers, we must determine whether the regulation directly advances the governmental interest asserted, and whether it is not more extensive than is necessary to serve that interest.

We now apply this four-step analysis for commercial speech to the commission's arguments in support of its ban on promotional advertising.

The commission does not claim that the expression at issue either is inaccurate or relates to unlawful activity. Yet the New York Court of Appeals questioned whether Central Hudson's advertising is protected commercial speech. Because appellant holds a monopoly over the sale of electricity in its service area, the state court suggested that the commission's order restricts no commercial speech of any worth. The court stated that advertising in a "noncompetitive market" could not improve the decision making of consumers. The court saw no constitutional problem with barring commercial speech that it viewed as conveying little useful information.

We come finally to the critical inquiry in this case: whether the commission's complete suppression of speech ordinarily protected by the First Amendment is no more extensive than necessary to further the state's interest in energy conservation. The commission's order reaches all promotional advertising, regardless of the impact of the touted service on overall energy use. But the energy conservation rationale, as important as it is, cannot justify suppressing information about electric devices or services that would cause no net increase in total energy use. In addition, no showing has been made that a more limited restriction on the content of promotional advertising would not serve adequately the state's interests.

The commission also had not demonstrated that its interest in conservation cannot be protected adequately by more limited regulation of appellant's commercial expression. To further its policy of conservation, the commission could attempt to restrict the format and content of Central Hudson's advertising. It might, for example, require that the advertisements include information about the relative efficiency and expense of the offered service, both under current conditions and for the foreseeable future. In the absence of a showing that more limited speech regulations would be ineffective, we cannot approve the complete suppression of Central Hudson's advertising.

The Court asserts, that "a four-part analysis has developed" from our decisions concerning commercial speech. Under this four-part test a restraint on commercial "communication [that] is neither misleading nor related to unlawful activity" is subject to an intermediate level of scrutiny, and suppression is permitted whenever it "directly advance[s]" a "substantial" governmental interest and is "not more extensive than is necessary to serve that interest." I agree with the Court that this level of intermediate scrutiny is appropriate for a restraint on commercial speech designed to protect consumers from misleading or coercive speech, or a regulation related to the time, place, or manner of commercial speech. I do not agree, however, that the Court's four-part test is the proper one to be applied when a state seeks to suppress information about a product in order to manipulate a private economic decision that the state cannot or has not regulated or outlawed directly.

It appears that the Court would permit the state to ban all direct advertising of air conditioning, assuming that a more limited restriction on such advertising would not effectively deter the public from cooling its homes. In my view, our cases do not support this type of suppression. If a governmental unit believes that use or overuse of air conditioning is a serious problem, it must attack that problem directly, by prohibiting air conditioning or regulating thermostat levels. Just as the Commonwealth of Virginia may promote professionalism of pharmacists directly, so too New York may not promote energy conservation "by keeping the public in ignorance." Virginia Pharmacy Board.

Because "commercial speech" is afforded less constitutional protection than other forms of speech, it is important that the commercial speech concept not be defined too broadly lest speech deserving of greater constitutional protection be inadvertently suppressed. The issue in this case is whether New York's prohibition on the promotion of the use of electricity through advertising is a ban on nothing but commercial speech.

In my judgment one of the two definitions the Court uses in addressing that issue is too broad and the other may be somewhat too narrow. The Court first describes commercial speech as "expression related solely to the economic interests of the speaker and its audience." Although it is not entirely clear whether this definition uses the subject matter of the speech or the motivation of the speaker as the limiting factor, it seems clear to me that it encompasses speech that is entitled to the maximum protection afforded by the First Amendment. Neither a labor leader's exhortation to strike, nor an economist's dissertation on the money supply, should receive any lesser protection because the subject matter concerns only the economic interests of the audience. Nor should the economic motivation of a speaker qualify his constitutional protection: even Shakespeare may have been motivated by the prospect of pecuniary reward. Thus, the Court's first definition of commercial speech is unquestionably too broad.

The Court's second definition refers to "speech proposing a commercial transaction." A salesman's solicitation, a broker's offer, and a manufacturer's publication of a price list or the terms of his standard warranty would unquestionably fit within this concept. Whatever the precise contours of the concept, and perhaps it is too early to enunciate an exact formulation, I am persuaded that it should not include the entire range of communication that is embraced within the term "promotional advertising."

This case involves a governmental regulation that completely bans promotional advertising by an electric utility. This ban encompasses a great deal more than mere proposals to engage in certain kinds of commercial transactions. It prohibits all advocacy of the immediate or future use of electricity. It curtails expression by an informed and interested group of persons of their point of view on questions relating to the production and consumption of electrical energy—questions frequently discussed and debated by our political leaders. The breadth of the ban thus exceeds the boundaries of the commercial speech concept, however that concept may be defined.

I concur in the result because I do not consider this to be a "commercial speech" case. Accordingly, I see no need to decide whether the Court's four-part analysis, adequately protects commercial speech—as properly defined—in the face of a blanket ban of the sort involved in this case.

Justice REHNQUIST, dissenting.

The Court's analysis in my view is wrong in several respects. Initially, I disagree with the Court's conclusion that the speech of a state-created monopoly, which is the subject of a comprehensive regulatory scheme, is entitled to protection under the First Amendment. I also think that the Court errs here in failing to recognize that the state law is most accurately viewed as an economic regulation and that the speech involved (if it falls within the scope of the First Amendment at all) occupies a significantly more subordinate position in the hierarchy of First Amendment values than the Court gives it today. Finally, the Court in reaching its decision improperly substitutes its own judgment for that of the state in deciding how a proper ban on promotional advertising should be drafted. With regard to this latter point, the Court adopts as its final part of a four-part test a "no more extensive than necessary" analysis that will unduly impair a state legislature's ability to adopt legislation reasonably designed to promote interests that have always been rightly thought to be of great importance to the state.

I think New York's ban on such advertising falls within the scope of permissible state regulation of an economic activity by an entity that could not exist in corporate form, say nothing of enjoy monopoly status, were it not for the laws of New York.

This Court has previously recognized that although commercial speech may be entitled to First Amendment protection, that protection is not as extensive as that accorded to the advocacy of ideas.

The test adopted by the Court elevates the protection accorded commercial speech that falls within the scope of the First Amendment to a level that is virtually indistinguishable from that of noncommercial speech. I think the Court in so doing has effectively accomplished the "devitalization" of the First Amendment that it counseled against in Ohralik. I think it has also by labeling economic regulation of business conduct as a restraint on "free speech" gone far to resurrect the discredited doctrine of cases such as Lochner. New York's order here is in my view more akin to an economic regulation to which virtually complete deference should be accorded by this Court.

[I]n a number of instances government may constitutionally decide that societal interests justify the imposition of restrictions on the free flow of information. When the question is whether a given commercial message is protected, I do not think this Court's determination that the information will "assist" consumers justifies judicial invalidation of a reasonable drafted state restriction on such speech when the restriction is designed to promote a concededly substantial state interest. I consequently disagree with the Court's conclusion that the societal interest in the dissemination of commercial information is sufficient to justify a restriction on the State's authority to regulate promotional advertising by utilities; indeed, in the case of a regulated monopoly, it is difficult for me to distinguish "society" from the state legislature and the Public Service Commission. Nor do I think there is any basis for concluding that individual citizens of the state will recognize the need for and act to promote energy conservation to the extent the government deems appropriate, if only the channels of communication are left open. Thus, even if I were to agree that commercial speech is entitled to some First Amendment protection, I would hold here that the state's decision to ban promotional advertising, in light of the substantial state interest at stake, is a constitutionally permissible exercise of its power to adopt regulations designed to promote the interests of its citizens.

The notion that more speech is the remedy to expose falsehood and fallacies is wholly out of place in the commercial bazaar, where if applied logically the remedy of one who was defrauded would be merely a statement, available upon request, reciting the Latin maxim "caveat emptor." But since "fraudulent speech" in this area is to be remediable under Virginia Board, the remedy of one defrauded is a lawsuit or an agency proceeding based on common law notions of fraud that are separated by a world of difference from the realm of politics and government. What time, legal decisions, and common sense have so widely severed, I declined to join in Virginia Board, and regret now to see the Court reaping the seeds that it there sowed. For in a democracy, the economic is subordinate to the political, a lesson that our ancestors learned long ago, and that our descendants will undoubtedly have to relearn many years hence.

It is [in] my view inappropriate for the Court to invalidate the state's ban on commercial advertising here based on its speculation that in some cases the advertising may result in a net savings in electrical energy use, and in the cases in which it is clear a net energy savings would result from utility advertising the Public Service Commission would apply its ban so as to proscribe such advertising. Even assuming that the Court's speculation is correct, I do not think it follows that facial invalidation of the ban is the appropriate course.

COMMENT

Does Central Hudson take the commercial speech doctrine back to the Valentine v. Chrestensen era? This probably would be an unjustified conclusion. Valentine suggested that a rational basis asserted by the state to support regulation of commercial speech would be valid. The four-part test of Central Hudson, after all, does make it possible to regulate some commercial speech. On the other hand, the four-part test of Central Hudson limits the state's incursion into commercial speech.

Is Central Hudson a departure from the broad protection for commercial speech promised by Virginia Pharmacy? Justice Blackmun observed in Virginia Pharmacy: "Some forms of commercial speech regulation are surely permissible." Blackmun mentioned as examples time, place, and manner restrictions, false and misleading advertising, or advertising proposing transactions which are illegal. But the Central Hudson doctrine cuts deeper into the fabric of commercial speech than do the examples cited by Justice Blackmun. Isn't the teaching of Central Hudson that a "narrowly drawn" statute regulating commercial speech is valid against First Amendment attack? In short, if the criteria of the four-part test are met, the state may regulate.

In Metromedia, Inc. v. San Diego, 453 U.S. 490 (1981), a San Diego ordinance barring most types of billboard advertising was invalidated, but no common rationale attracted a majority of the Court. A plurality opinion for the court, written by Justice White and joined by three others, found the constitutional infirmity of the ordinance to be that while on-site commercial billboard advertising was permitted, other commercial billboard advertising, as well as noncommercial advertising (with some exceptions), was not permitted. The ban on noncommercial advertising was deemed impermissible by Justice White:

"With respect to noncommercial speech, the city may not choose the appropriate subjects for public discourse. Because some noncommercial messages may be conveyed on billboards throughout the commercial and industrial zones, San Diego must similarly allow billboards conveying other noncommercial messages throughout those zones."

What of the distinction San Diego made between on-site commercial billboards which were permitted and off-site commercial advertising which was not? Was the distinction valid? Justice White said that it was:

As we see it, the city could reasonably conclude that a commercial enterprise—as well as the interested public—has a stronger interest in identifying its place of business and advertising the products or services available there than it has in using or leasing its available space for the purpose of advertising commercial enterprises located elsewhere. It does not follow from the fact that the city has concluded that some commercial interests outweigh its municipal interests in this context that it must give similar weight to all other commercial advertising. Thus, off-site commercial billboards may be prohibited while on-site commercial billboards are permitted.

The constitutional problem in this area requires resolution of the conflict between the city's land-use interests and the commercial interests of those seeking to purvey goods and services within the city. In light of the above analysis, we cannot conclude that the city has drawn an ordinance broader than is necessary to meet its interests, or that it fails directly to advance substantial government interests. In sum, insofar as it regulates commercial speech the San Diego ordinance meets the constitutional requirements of Central Hudson.

A majority of the justices did agree, however, that an ordinance which was drawn with sufficient precision to prohibit only commercial billboard advertising could be valid. In a concurring opinion, Justice Brennan disagreed with that conclusion:

More importantly, I cannot agree with the plurality's view that an ordinance totally banning commercial billboards but allowing noncommercial billboards would be constitutional. For me, such an ordinance raises First Amendment problems at least as serious as those raised by a total ban, for it gives city officials the right—before approving a billboard—to determine whether the proposed message is "commercial" or "noncommercial." Of course the plurality is correct when it observes that "our cases have consistently distinguished between the constitutional protection afforded commercial as opposed to noncommercial speech," but it errs in assuming that a governmental unit may be put in the position in the first instance of deciding whether the proposed speech is commercial or noncommercial. In individual cases, this distinction is anything but clear. Because making such determinations would entail a substantial exercise of discretion by city's officials, it presents a real danger of curtailing noncommercial speech in the guise of regulating commercial speech.

In a recent article, Professor Martin Redish has characterized Metromedia as an example of a case where the Court confused subject matter categorizations with content regulation. See, Redish, The Content Distinction in First Amendment Analysis, 34 Stan.L.Rev. 1 at 128 (1981):

[I]t is significant that, in response to the Chief Justice's argument (in dissent) that the Court's function should be limited to assuring governmental neutrality in regulating speech (Burger, C.J., dissenting), the Court did not argue that even such content-neutral regulations could significantly impair first amendment interests. Rather, Justice White's plurality opinion merely noted that the traditional concern for neutrality "is applicable to the facts of this case" because "San Diego has chosen to favor certain kinds of messages—such as on-site commercial advertising and temporary political campaign advertisements—over others." The dissent failed to explain, Justice White said, "why San Diego should not be held to have violated this concept of First Amendment neutrality." The decision, then, appears to be nothing more than another instance—like Mosley [Police Department v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92 (1972)]—in which the Court aberrationally decides to view subject matter categorization as a form of content regulation and therefore subject to a stricter form of scrutiny.

Why is subject matter categorization less dangerous from a First Amendment point of view than content regulation?

Compelled Speech

In Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, 431 U.S. 209 (1977), in an opinion by Justice Stewart, the Court cautioned that the state in a regime ordered by the First Amendment could not require an individual to express or support an ideology he did not share. The Court was not altogether consistent in its holding in Abood. The Court first held that a law imposing service charges, equivalent to union dues, assessed against nonmembers of the union "to finance expenditures by the union for the purposes of collective bargaining, contract administration, and grievance adjustment" was valid. The Court summarized its position on this point as follows:

To be required to help finance the union as a collective-bargaining agent may well be thought, therefore, to interfere in some way with an employee's freedom to associate for the advancement of ideas, or to refrain from doing so, as he sees fit. But the judgment * * * is that such interference as exists is constitutionally justified by the legislative assessment of the important contribution of the union shop to the system of labor relations established by Congress. * * *

In a separate concurrence, Justice Powell, joined by Chief Justice Burger and Justice Blackmun, disagreed with the Court on the foregoing point. See Buckley v. AFTRA, 496 F.2d 305 (2d Cir. 1974), cert. den. 419 U.S. 1093 (1975), text, p. 666.

However, the Court took a different view in the case of compulsory service charges which were to be used for political or ideological purposes not related to the union's role as a collective bargaining representative.

ABOOD v. DETROIT BOARD OF EDUCATION

431 U.S. 209, 97 S.C.T. 1782, 52 L.ED.2D 261 (1977).

Justice STEWART delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * Our decisions establish with unmistakable clarity that the freedom of an individual to associate for the purpose of advancing beliefs and ideas is protected by the First and Fourteenth Amendments. Equally clear is the proposition that a government may not require an individual to relinquish rights guaranteed him by the First Amendment as a condition of public employment. The appellants argue that they fall within the protection of these cases because they have been prohibited not from actively associating, but rather from refusing to associate. They specifically argue that they may constitutionally prevent the Union's spending a part of their required service fees to contribute to political candidates and to express political views unrelated to its duties as exclusive bargaining representative. We have concluded that this argument is a meritorious one.

One of the principles underlying the Court's decision in Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, was that contributing to an organization for the purpose of spreading a political message is protected by the First Amendment. Because "[m]aking a contribution * * * enables like-minded persons to pool their resources in furtherance of common political goals," the Court reasoned that limitations upon the freedom to contribute "implicate fundamental First Amendment interests."

The fact that the appellants are compelled to make, rather than prohibited from making, contributions for political purposes works no less an infringement of their constitutional rights. For at the heart of the First Amendment is the notion that an individual should be free to believe as he will, and that in a free society one's beliefs should be shaped by his mind and his conscience rather than coerced by the State. And the freedom of belief is no incidental or secondary aspect of the First Amendment's protections:

If there is any fixed star in our constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty, can prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein." West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624.

These principles prohibit a State from compelling any individual to affirm his belief in God, Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488, or to associate with a political party, Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S. at 363-364, n. 17, 95 S.Ct. at 2685, as a condition of retaining public employment. They are no less applicable to the case at bar, and they thus prohibit the appellees from requiring any of the appellants to contribute to the support of an ideological cause he may oppose as a condition of holding a job as a public school teacher.

We do not hold that a union cannot constitutionally spend funds for the expression of political views, on behalf of political candidates, or towards the advancement of other ideological causes not germane to its duties as collective bargaining representative. Rather, the Constitution requires only that such expenditures be financed from charges, dues, or assessments paid by employees who do not object to advancing those ideas and who are not coerced into doing so against their will by the threat of loss of governmental employment.

There will, of course, be difficult problems in drawing lines between collective bargaining activities, for which contributions may be compelled, and ideological activities unrelated to collective bargaining, for which such compulsion is prohibited.

WOOLEY v. MAYNARD

[EDITORIAL NOTE

In Wooley, the Court encountered the following fact pattern. A married couple, Jehovah's Witnesses, had covered up the state motto "Live Free or Die" on their New Hampshire automobile license plate. The couple had covered up the motto because it was contrary to their religious and moral beliefs. Could New Hampshire constitutionally enforce criminal sanctions against the couple for so doing? The Court held that New Hampshire could not.]

Chief Justice BURGER delivered the opinion of the Court.

We are thus faced with the question of whether the state may constitutionally require an individual to participate in the dissemination of an ideological message by displaying it on his private property in a manner and for the express purpose that it be observed and read by the public. We hold that the state may not do so.

We begin with the proposition that the right of freedom of thought protected by the First Amendment against state action includes both the right to speak freely and the right to refrain from speaking at all. See West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, (1943). A system which secures the right to proselytize religious, political, and ideological causes must also guarantee the concomitant right to decline to foster such concepts. The right to speak and the right to refrain from speaking are complementary components of the broader concept of "individual freedom of mind." This is illustrated by the recent case of Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241, (1974), where we held unconstitutional a Florida statute placing an affirmative duty upon newspapers to publish the replies of political candidates whom they had criticized. We concluded that such a requirement deprived a newspaper of the fundamental right to decide what to print or omit. * * * [See text, p. 584.]

The Court in Barnette, supra, was faced with a state statute which required public school students to participate in daily public ceremonies by honoring the flag both with words and traditional salute gestures. In overruling its prior decision in Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940), the Court held that "a ceremony so touching matters of opinion and political attitude may [not] be imposed upon the individual by official authority under powers committed to any political organization under our Constitution." Compelling the affirmative act of a flag salute involved a more serious infringement upon personal liberties than the passive act of carrying the state motto on a license plate, but the difference is essentially one of degree. Here, as in Barnette, we are faced with a state measure which forces an individual, as part of his daily life—indeed constantly while his automobile is in public view—to be an instrument for fostering public adherence to an ideological point of view he finds unacceptable. In doing so, the state "invades the sphere of intellect and spirit which it is the purpose of the First Amendment to our Constitution to reserve from all official control."

New Hampshire's statute in effect requires that appellees use their private property as a "mobile billboard" for the state's ideological message—or suffer a penalty, as Maynard already has. As a condition to driving an automobile—a virtual necessity for most Americans—the Maynards must display "Live Free or Die" to hundreds of people each day. The fact that most individuals agree with the thrust of New Hampshire's motto is not the test; most Americans also find the flag salute acceptable. The First Amendment protects the right of individuals to hold a point of view different from the majority and to refuse to foster, in the way New Hampshire commands, an idea they find morally objectionable.

Identifying the Maynards' interests as implicating First Amendment protections does not end our inquiry however. We must also determine whether the state's countervailing interest is sufficiently compelling to justify requiring appellees to display the state motto on their license plates. The two interests advanced by the state are that display of the motto (1) facilitates the identification of passenger vehicles, and (2) promotes appreciation of history, individualism and state pride.

The state first points out that only passenger vehicles, but not commercial, trailer, or other vehicles are required to display the state motto. Thus, the argument proceeds, officers of the law are more easily able to determine whether passenger vehicles are carrying the proper plates. However the record here reveals that New Hampshire passenger license plates normally consist of a specific configuration of letters and numbers, which makes them readily distinguishable from other types of plates, even without reference to state motto. Even were we to credit the state's reasons and "even though the governmental purpose be legitimate and substantial, that purpose cannot be pursued by means that broadly stifle fundamental personal liberties when the end can be more narrowly achieved. The breadth of legislative abridgment must be viewed in the light of less drastic means for achieving the same basic purpose." Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479 (1960).

The state's second claimed interest is not ideologically neutral. The state is seeking to communicate to others an official view as to proper "appreciation of history, state pride, [and] individualism." Of course, the state may legitimately pursue such interests in any number of ways. However, where the state's interest is to disseminate an ideology, no matter how acceptable to some, such interest cannot outweigh an individual's First Amendment right to avoid becoming the courier for such message.

We conclude that the State of New Hampshire may not require appellees to display the state motto upon their vehicle license plates, and accordingly, we affirm the judgment of the district court.

Affirmed.

COMMENT

1. Wooley sets forth an important principle—the right to refrain from speaking or the right not to be compelled to speak. This freedom from compelled speech derives from an assumption the Court makes about the impact of the First Amendment on government. An aspect of that impact is that the state cannot require its citizens to advertise against their will an official view of things. Where ideology is concerned, must the state be neutral?

Does the fact that government may not restrict freedom of belief mean that government cannot add its views to that of others? The view expressed in Wooley v. Maynard appeared to suggest that the state must be ideologically neutral. Some commentators contend that government, under the First Amendment, may add its voice to that of others even though it may not compel the speech or expression of others. See Tribe, American Constitutional Law, 588–589 (1978).

2. In Wooley v. Maynard, the Court found in the First Amendment a source of protection for individuals compelled to speak by the state. In Abood, the Court found in the First Amendment a source of protection for individuals compelled unwillingly to make political contributions. The two cases may be seen as aspects of an important objective of First Amendment protection—freedom of belief.

PRUNEYARD SHOPPING CENTER v. ROBBINS

Justice REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

We postponed jurisdiction of this appeal from the Supreme Court of California to decide the important federal constitutional questions it presented. Those are whether state constitutional provisions, which permit individuals to exercise free speech and petition rights on the property of a privately owned shopping center to which the public is invited, violate the shopping center owner's property rights under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments or his free speech rights under the First and Fourteenth Amendments.

Appellant PruneYard is a privately owned shopping center in the city of Campbell, Cal. It covers approximately 21 acres—five devoted to parking and 16 occupied by walkways, plazas, sidewalks, and buildings that contain more than 65 specialty shops, 10 restaurants, and a movie theater. The PruneYard is open to the public for the purpose of encouraging the patronizing of its commercial establishments. It has a policy not to permit any visitor or tenant to engage in any publicly expressive activity, including the circulation of petitions, that is not directly related to its commercial purposes. This policy has been strictly enforced in a non-discriminatory fashion. The PruneYard is owned by appellant Fred Sahadi.

Appellees are high school students who sought to solicit support for their opposition to a United Nations resolution against "Zionism." On a Saturday afternoon they set up a card table in a corner of PruneYard's central courtyard. They distributed pamphlets and asked passersby to sign petitions, which were to be sent to the president and members of Congress. Their activity was peaceful and orderly and so far as the record indicates was not objected to by PruneYard's patrons.

Soon after appellees had begun soliciting signatures, a security guard informed them that they would have to leave because their activity violated PruneYard regulations. The guard suggested that they move to the public sidewalk at the PruneYard's perimeter. Appellees immediately left the premises and later filed this lawsuit in the California Superior Court of Santa Clara County. They sought to enjoin appellants from denying them access to the PruneYard for the purpose of circulating their petitions.

The Superior Court held that appellees were not entitled under either the Federal or California Constitution to exercise their asserted rights on the shopping center property. [See Hudgens v. NLRB, p. 424 U.S. 507 (1976).] It concluded that there were "adequate, effective channels of communication for [appellees] other than soliciting on the private property of the [PruneYard]." The California Court of Appeal affirmed.

The California Supreme Court reversed, holding that the California Constitution protects "speech and petitioning, reasonably exercised, in shopping centers even when the centers are privately owned." 23 Cal.3d 899, 910 (1979). It concluded that appellees are entitled to conduct their activity on PruneYard property.<sup>2</sup> Before this Court, appellants contend that their "constitutionally established rights under the Fourteenth Amendment to exclude appellees from adverse use of appellants' property cannot be denied by invocation of a state constitutional provision or by judicial reconstruction of a state's laws of private property."

Appellants first contend that Lloyd v. Tanner [407 U.S. 551 (1972)] prevents the state from requiring a private shopping center owner to provide access to persons exercising their state constitutional rights of free speech and petition when adequate alternative avenues of communication are available.

Our reasoning in Lloyd, however, does not ex proprio vigore limit the authority of the state to exercise its police power or its sovereign right to adopt in its own Constitution individual liberties more expansive than those conferred by the Federal Constitution. In Lloyd, there was no state constitutional or statutory provision that had been construed to create rights to the use of private property by strangers, comparable to those found to exist by the California Supreme Court here. It is, of course, well-established that a state in the exercise of its police power may adopt reasonable restrictions on private property so long as the restrictions do not amount

2. Art. I, § 2, of the California Constitution provides:

Every person may freely speak, write and publish his or her sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of this right. A law may not restrain or abridge liberty of speech or press.

Art. I, § 3, of the California Constitution provides:

[P]eople have the right to petition government for redress of grievances.

to a taking without just compensation or contravene any other federal constitutional provision.

Appellants next contend that a right to exclude others underlies the Fifth Amendment guarantee against the taking of property without just compensation and the Fourteenth Amendment guarantee against the deprivation of property without due process of law.

Here the requirement that appellants permit appellees to exercise state-protected rights of free expression and petition on shopping center property clearly does not amount to an unconstitutional infringement of appellants' property rights under the taking clause. There is nothing to suggest that preventing appellants from prohibiting this sort of activity will unreasonably impair the value or use of their property as a shopping center.

There is also little merit to appellants' argument that they have been denied their property without due process of law. Nebbia v. New York.

Appellants finally contend that a private property owner has a First Amendment right not to be forced by the state to use his property as a forum for the speech of others. They state that in Wooley v. Maynard this Court concluded that a state may not constitutionally require an individual to participate in the dissemination of an ideological message by displaying it on his private property in a manner and for the express purpose that it be observed and read by the public. This rationale applies here, they argue, because the message of Wooley is that the state may not force an individual to display any message at all.

Wooley, however, was a case in which the government itself prescribed the message, required it to be displayed openly on appellee's personal property that was used "as part of his daily life," and refused to permit him to take any measures to cover up the motto even though the Court found that the display of the motto served no important state interest. Here, by contrast, there are a number of distinguishing factors. Most important, the shopping center by choice of its owner is not limited to the personal use of appellants. It is instead a business establishment that is open to the public to come and go as they please. The views expressed by members of the public in passing out pamphlets or seeking signatures for a petition thus will not likely be identified with those of the owner. Second, no specific message is dictated by the state to be displayed on appellants' property. There consequently is no danger of governmental discrimination for or against a particular message. Finally, as far as appears here appellants can expressly disavow any connection with the message by simply posting signs in the area where the speakers or handbillers stand. Such signs, for example, could disclaim any sponsorship of the message and could explain that the persons are communicating their own messages by virtue of state law.

Appellants also argue that their First Amendment rights have been infringed in light of West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943) and Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, [p. 584]. Barnette is inapposite because it involved the compelled recitation of a message containing an affirmation of belief. This Court held such compulsion unconstitutional because it "require[d] the individual to communicate by word and sign his acceptance" of government dictated political ideas, whether or not he subscribed to them. Appellants are not similarly being compelled to affirm their belief in any governmentally prescribed position or view, and they are free to publicly dissociate themselves from the views of the speakers or handbillers.

Tornillo struck down a Florida statute requiring a newspaper to publish a political candidate's reply to criticism previously published in that newspaper. It rests on the principle that the state cannot tell a newspaper what it must print. The Florida statute contravened this principle in that it "exact[ed] a penalty on the basis of the content of a newspaper." There also was a danger in Tornillo that the statute would "dampen the vigor and limit the variety of public debate" by deterring editors from publishing controversial political statements that might trigger the application of the statute. Thus, the statute was found to be an "intrusion into the function of editors." These concerns obviously are not present here.

We conclude that neither appellants' federally recognized property rights nor their First Amendment rights have been infringed by the California Supreme Court's decision recognizing a right of appellees to exercise state protected rights of expression and petition on appellants' property. The judgment of the Supreme Court of California is therefore

Affirmed.

Justice MARSHALL, concurring.

Appellants' claim in this case amounts to no less than a suggestion that the common law of trespass is not subject to revision by the state, notwithstanding the California Supreme Court's finding that state-created rights of expressive activity would be severely hindered if shopping centers were closed to expressive activities by members of the public. If accepted, that claim would represent a return to the era of Lochner v. New York, [198 U.S. 45 (1905)], when common-law rights were also found immune from revision by state or federal government. Such an approach would freeze the common law as it has been constructed by the courts, perhaps at its 19th century state of development. It would allow no room for change in response to changes in circumstance. The due process clause does not require such a result.

On the other hand, I do not understand the Court to suggest that rights of property are to be defined solely by state law, or that there is no federal constitutional barrier to the abrogation of common-law rights by Congress or a state government. The constitutional terms "life, liberty, and property" do not derive their meaning solely from the provisions of positive law. They have a normative dimension as well, establishing a sphere of private autonomy which government is bound to respect. Quite serious constitutional questions might be raised if a legislature attempted to abolish certain categories of common-law rights in some general way. Indeed, our cases demonstrate that there are limits on governmental authority to abolish "core" common-law rights, including rights against trespass, at least without a compelling showing of necessity or a provision for a reasonable alternative remedy.

That "core" has not been approached in this case. The California Supreme Court's decision is limited to shopping centers, which are already open to the general public. The owners are permitted to impose reasonable restrictions on expressive activity. There has been no showing of interference with appellants' normal business operations. The California court has not permitted an invasion of any personal sanctuary. No rights of privacy are implicated. In these circumstances there is no basis for strictly scrutinizing the intrusion authorized by the California Supreme Court.

I join the opinion of the Court.

Justice POWELL with whom Justice White joins, concurring in part and in the judgment.

The selection of material for publication is not generally a concern of shopping centers. But similar speech interests are affected when listeners are likely to identify opinions expressed by members of the public on commercial property as the views of the owner. If a state law mandated public access to the bulletin board of a freestanding store, hotel, office, or small shopping center, customers might well conclude that the messages reflect the view of the proprietor. The same would be true if the public were allowed to solicit or pamphleteer in the entrance area of a store or in the lobby of a private building. The property owner or proprietor would be faced with a choice: he either could permit his customers to receive a mistaken impression or he could disavow the messages. Should he take the first course, he effectively has been compelled to affirm someone else's belief. Should he choose the second, he has been forced to speak when he would prefer to remain silent. In short, he has lost control over his freedom to speak or not to speak on certain issues. The mere fact that he is free to dissociate himself from the views expressed on his property, cannot restore his "right to refrain from speaking at all."

A property owner also may be faced with speakers who wish to use his premises as a platform for views that he finds morally repugnant. Numerous examples come to mind. A minority-owned business confronted with leafleteers from the American Nazi Party or the Ku Klux Klan, a church-operated enterprise asked to host demonstrations in favor of abortion, or a union compelled to supply a forum to right-to-work advocates could be placed in an intolerable position if state law requires it to make its private property available to anyone who wishes to speak. The strong emotions evoked by speech in such situations may virtually compel the proprietor to respond.

One easily can identify other circumstances in which a right of access to commercial property would burden the owner's First and Fourteenth Amendment right to refrain from speaking. But appellants have identified no such circumstance.

Appellants have not alleged that they object to the ideas contained in the appellees' petitions. Nor do they assert that some groups who reasonably might be expected to speak at the PruneYard will express views that are so objectionable as to require a response even when listeners will not mistake their source. The record contains no evidence concerning the numbers or types of interest groups that may seek access to this shopping center, and no testimony showing that the appellants strongly disagree with any of them.

Because appellants have not shown that the limited right of access held to be afforded by the California Constitution burdened their First and Fourteenth Amendment rights in the circumstances presented. I join the judgment of the Court. I do not interpret our decision today as a blanket approval for state efforts to transform privately owned commercial property into public forums. Any such state action would raise substantial federal constitutional questions not present in this case.

COMMENT

The shopping center owner in PruneYard sought refuge in the principle of Wooley. The state could not require the Jehovah's Witnesses to use their private property to publicize the ideas of the state. In the Wooley case, New Hampshire had mandated that motorists carry the state motto on their license plates. In PruneYard, the message in question was not being ordered by the state. Moreover, unlike the private automobile in Wooley, the shopping center in PruneYard was not used by the owners alone.

By definition, the shopping center's very existence constituted an invitation to the public to come and do business. Messages that are publicized by a shopping center are not necessarily to be identified with the owners of the shopping center. First Amendment law as now interpreted by the Supreme court does not require a shopping center owner to permit the dissemination of news to which he is opposed on his property. See Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507 (1976). Justice Marshall, joined by Justice Brennan, dissented in Hudgens. The emphasis on property rights by the majority in Hudgens arose "from an overly formalistic view of the relationship between the institution of private ownership of property and the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of expression."

In Wooley, protection of a right to be free from compelled speech protected the individual against the state. In PruneYard, was the First Amendment analysis equally consistent with maximizing individual self-expression? Protection of the individual property owner's right to be free from compelled speech in that context works to exclude other individuals seeking an audience for their ideas on premises which may be uniquely suitable for the exchange of ideas.

The rights of free speech and petition, if reasonably exercised, of the public who use privately owned shopping centers were also protected under the California state constitutional guarantee of freedom of expression. The California courts, therefore, did not grant absolute priority to the property owner's claim of self-expression as the Supreme Court has done in interpreting the First Amendment in similar circumstances. The PruneYard case illustrates that state and federal constitutional law may occasionally yield divergent results on free expression problems. PruneYard also illustrates that transposition of the principle of freedom from compelled speech to a corporate context involving modern patterns of land use may yield quite different results than flow from the less complex but classic conflict in Wooley between the state and the individual. It has also been suggested that PruneYard, consistent with the decentralist tendencies of the Burger Court, is rooted in federalism: a state court may, if it chooses, read its state constitution more expansively than the United States Supreme Court has read the federal Constitution.

Libel and the Journalist

LIBEL DEFINED

1. Libel is essentially a false and defamatory attack in written form on a person's reputation or character. Slander is oral or spoken defamation. Since most courts have come to define broadcast defamation as libel (a written script usually precedes the spoken word), slander is now of less importance to the journalist.

Reputation measures one's standing in the community, the respect and goodwill one has earned from one's peers. Defamation is anything which tends to injure that reputation and good name by generating adverse, derogatory, or unpleasant feelings against a person. If it's written or in the form of a picture, photograph,<sup>1</sup> cartoon, caricature, film, tape, phonograph, sign, symbol, sticker, effigy, or advertisement—the list is not exhaustive—it's libel.

Words, images, or representations, then, "which tend to expose one to public hatred, shame, obloquy, contumely, odium, contempt, ridicule, aversion, ostracism, degradation or disgrace, or to induce an evil opinion of one in the minds of right-thinking persons, and to deprive one of their confidence and friendly intercourse in society."<sup>2</sup>

A direct and obvious libel is a publication falsely charging that a person has committed a crime, especially a felony. Accusations of moral turpitude, although subject to a wider range of possible interpretation, may also be libelous. Imputations of bad character, vicious motives, or antisocial behavior fall in the same category as do publications suggesting incompetency or lack of integrity in one's profession, trade, business, or calling.

In a sentence, libel is essentially a defamatory, false, malicious, and/or negligent publication which tends to hold a person up to hatred, contempt, or ridicule causing him or her to be shunned or avoided.

The problem with these definitions is the room they leave for ambiguity. Ambiguity is usually a problem for a jury to resolve, and jurors differ depending upon time, place, context, and the current state of community attitudes. It would have seemed strange twenty years ago to construe as defamatory one's activities on behalf of the CIA. Yet in 1976 a New York

1. See Burda, Photographic Libel: An Inquiry Into the Rights of Photographers (unpublished M.S. thesis, California State University, San Jose, 1973) for a compilation and analysis of nineteen federal cases between 1850 and 1972 where photographs were involved in libel suits.

2. Kimmerle v. New York Evening Journal, 186 N.E. 217 (N.Y.1933). A newspaper article which said a woman was "courted" by a "murderer" was held not to be libelous. "Courting" did not "imply immoral conduct," and the paper didn't say the woman knew precisely who or what her suitor was.

federal judge found it arguable, "given the current political climate and the sensitive nature of plaintiff's employment, that allegations of CIA involvement are defamatory."<sup>3</sup>

The true connotation of words should be cast in our own times, for the harmless word of yesterday may today be one of reproach and odium,<sup>4</sup> or, in the words of Oliver Wendell Holmes, "A word is not a crystal, transparent and unchanged; it is the skin of a living thought and may vary greatly in color and content according to the circumstances and the time in which it is used."<sup>5</sup>

In a Vermont case, a plaintiff was characterized by a political opponent as a "horse's ass," a "jerk," an "idiot," and "paranoid." Words used in the context of a political skirmish between two candidates for mayor, said the court, could not reasonably have been believed in their literal sense or with a willful or malicious intent to denigrate or ridicule the plaintiff in his profession as an accountant. Such words, the court added, may be insulting, abusive, unpleasant, and objectionable, but they are not defamatory in and of themselves, and they reflect more on the character of the user than on the person for whom they are intended.<sup>6</sup>

Vermont and a number of other states obviously condone the use of such epithets on the premise that a certain amount of vulgar name calling, because it is nothing more than that, ought to be tolerated.

South Carolina, for example. Although the plaintiff in a slander action there charged that he was called a "bastard" and a "son-of-a-bitch," the court ruled that such words amounted only to vulgar name calling and were understood as merely being uttered in anger.<sup>7</sup>

Libel may lurk in irony, sarcasm, and even in well intentioned humor. "The principle is clear," said a New York court long ago, "that a person shall not be allowed to murder another's reputation in jest. * * *"<sup>8</sup> In 1957 a columnist in a small town newspaper observed with tongue in cheek that George Powers, a local paper mill employee, was a "classic example of typical Yankee thrift": he was building his own casket and would soon be digging a hole for it. Powers objected to being ridiculed and sued the newspaper for libel, testifying that he was neither building his own casket nor digging his own grave. It was true that he had said to someone in a passing conversation that prices were getting so high that a man would soon have to build his own casket. Turning a metaphor into an economic stereotype caused a court to conclude that Powers had stated a claim for libel.<sup>9</sup>

It is not possible to list all typically libelous expressions, nor is it useful to do so. Empathy is one's guide. What words, allegations, charges would you consider a hurtful attack on your reputation and personality? Make your own list and think of

3. Oliver v. The Village Voice, Inc., 417 F.Supp. 235 (S.D.N.Y.1976). The Village Voice escaped liability because the "public figure" plaintiff failed to show the requisite "actual malice." See text, pp. 190-191.

7. Smith v. Phoenix Furniture Co., 339 F.Supp. 969 (D.S.C.1972). Some states, Alabama, Mississippi, and Virginia, for example, have passed "insulting words" laws which are meant to punish insults before they reach the level of defamation. See Hanson, Libel and Related Torts, Vol. 1, Case and Comment, 1969, § 17.

8. Triggs v. Sun Printing & Publishing Association, 71 N.E. 739 (N.Y.1904). See also Middlebrooks v. Curtis Publishing Co., 413 F.2d 141 (4th Cir. 1969). In Middlebrooks, although agreeing that a reputation may be libeled in jest or in fiction, the court rejected a contention that a fictional portrayal in a book was libelous in view of marked dissimilarities between the fictional character and the plaintiff.

9. Powers v. Durgin-Snow Publishing Co., 144 A.2d 294 (Me.1958).

it as comprising the vocabulary which forms the boundaries of a legal mine field.

But remember that supposedly libelous words are to be considered in their ordinary, commonly accepted meanings. Courts consider the effects of language on ordinary readers and average persons among whom they are intended to circulate.<sup>10</sup>

A letter to the editor of a weekly newspaper referred to a campaign manager of candidates for municipal office as being influenced "by a foreign philosophy alien to the American way" and as using "un-American tactics." A New Jersey court ruled that where a substantial number of respectable people in the community concluded from the letter that the campaign manager was a Communist or a Communist sympathizer, the publication was defamatory as a matter of law, even though other segments of public opinion might disagree and reach contrary conclusions.<sup>11</sup>

In 1976 the U.S. Supreme court declined to review a $485,000 libel award in favor of a former state attorney general against The Arizona Republic. The paper had charged in an editorial that the state attorney general had Communist sympathies. Ironically the newspaper had appealed an initial $50,000 judgment against it to the state supreme court and had won a retrial. The newspaper lost and appealed again. But this time a nearly tenfold harsher judgment was upheld by an intermediate appeals court, and the state supreme court refused to review.<sup>12</sup>

On the other hand there is precedent to suggest that calling a person a "bigot" or any other name descriptive of political, racial, economic, or social philosophy generally affords no cause for a libel action.<sup>13</sup>

2. A number of states subscribe to what New York calls the single-instance rule. Under this rule, "language charging a professional person with ignorance or error on a single occasion only and not accusing that person of general ignorance or lack of skill is not actionable unless special damages are pleaded."<sup>14</sup>

The rule is premised on the notion that sooner or later everyone makes a mistake. The trick is to avoid an implication of general ignorance or lack of skill applicable to past, present, and future.

3. Idiosyncrasy in state libel laws creates legal booby traps for the unwary communicator. A first rule is that the reporter discover the peculiarities and perplexities of the libel laws of the state in which he or she works. If there are special hazards in that jurisdiction, be alert to them.

Libel may hinge upon colloquialisms and connotations. But when a plaintiff attaches an unfamiliar or a special meaning to a word or expression, the burden rests on that person to prove its defamatory nature. If the plaintiff succeeds, the defendant then has an opportunity to rebut by showing that the words could not have been taken in a defamatory sense, were not intended to be taken that way, and had their meaning stretched beyond the obvious understanding of readers and listeners.

Some jurisdictions have written the above proposition into a rule known as the "innocent construction rule." If language is capable of an innocent construction, it should be interpreted that way. Although a statement may lend itself to a neurotic interpretation, courts following the rule are more interested in ordinary, commonly accepted interpretations rather than convoluted, strained, or otherwise unusual meanings.

13. Raible v. Newsweek, Inc. 341 F.Supp. 804 (D.C.Pa. 1972). Where a Newsweek magazine article concerning the "white majority" ascribed certain views to that group, the plaintiff as a member of that group was deemed not to have been libeled by the article: " * * * the article, if libelous, libels more than half of the people in the United States and not the plaintiff in particular."

Illinois has such a rule. A newspaper editorial paraphrasing a village trustee's argument for higher trustee salaries chose to interpret the trustee's remarks as an expression of his belief that good government had to be paid for. The trustee, however, read the editorial as suggesting that he, the trustee, regarded the alternative to adequate salaries to be the illegal practice of taking money under the table. In a subsequent libel suit against a Niles newspaper, the trustee contended that the editorial constituted a published attack on his ability to perform his duties and on his integrity. An Illinois court preferred to attach an innocent construction to the editorial and denied relief to the trustee.<sup>15</sup>

Not capable of an innocent construction, however, was a city clerk's statement, concerning the city's award of a garbage collection contract, that "I think 240 pieces of silver changed hands—30 for each alderman." When an alderman brought suit, the Illinois Supreme Court held the words to be a defamatory statement of fact, not a constitutionally protected expression of opinion.<sup>16</sup>

It is sometimes a fine line. A New York court said, "It is not libelous to assert that a public official was appointed to a high paying but unnecessary public office as a political reward, without consideration of merit or competence. Such charges are commonplace in the political arena. Whether or not they are true, they are not actionable."<sup>17</sup>

Far more assured of punishment was the newspaper article that, by repeated use of words such as "fix, bribe, payoff," and "improper offers," led average readers to conclude that an attorney had solicited a high legal fee from a drug defendant in order to bribe the judge and "fix" the case. Such language was clearly defamatory, said the Kentucky Supreme Court.<sup>18</sup>

Illustrations and headlines may be libelous by innuendo even when nothing false or defamatory is stated. The Boston Herald-Traveler printed a picture of a witness before a congressional committee on its front page. Although the witness had testified as to how he had refused to take part in an alleged fraud, his picture appeared under the banner headline—"Settlement Upped $2,000: $400 Kickback Told." Though no reference was made to the witness in an accompanying article, the court said the innuendo was capable of being defamatory and that the plaintiff was entitled to a jury trial to prove that he was defamed.<sup>19</sup>

In a much discussed case a photograph of the plaintiff's home in a story about how a gang of thieves used the basement of one of their homes as a warehouse for stolen property was declared to state a claim for defamation. The case was Troman v. Wood.<sup>20</sup> Similarly an article about trucking companies going out of business was illustrated with an auction notice announcing public sale of trucking equipment owned by the plaintiff. Since the trucking company was not going out of business and nothing in the story said it was, use of the firm's name in the context of the illustration was held to state a claim for libel.<sup>21</sup>

Since reporters seldom write headlines for their stories, they don't feel responsible when headline and story are mismatched. Courts, however, sensitive to the fact that often only the headline is read, have upheld libel judgments on the basis of headlines alone. For example, in Sprouse v. Clay Communication, Inc., 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1695, 211 S.E. 2d 674 (W.Va.1975) a state supreme court upheld a $250,000 award in actual damages against a newspaper which had libeled an unsuccessful gubernatorial candidate by what the court called "misleading words in oversized headlines." Said the court:

Where oversized headlines are published which reasonably lead the average reader to an entirely different conclusion than the facts cited in the body of the story, and where the plaintiff can demonstrate that it was the intent of the publisher to use such misleading headlines to create a false impression on the normal reader, the headline may be considered separately with regard to whether a known falsehood was published.

The United States Supreme Court declined to review that holding, and the successful plaintiff went on to become a justice of the very court that had upheld his claim.

Similarly in McNair v. Hearst Corp., 494 F.2d 1309 (9th Cir. 1974) a federal appeals court said that if a newspaper publisher knew of the false impression which the headline and first two paragraphs of an article would make upon the reader, fifty subsequent paragraphs countering that impression would not keep the headline and first two paragraphs from constituting libel.

On the other hand, courts have held that a headline must be read in context with an entire article before a judgment can be made about libel.<sup>22</sup>

4. What we are noting, then, is that some publications are directly libelous, others indirectly so. Direct libels—for example, referring to someone as a felon, or discrediting a person in his or her business or profession by charging unethical conduct, incompetence, fraud, or bankruptcy—are called libels per se, libels on their face.

Indirect libels, libel by innuendo, by implication, by omission, or libel due to extrinsic circumstances over which the writer may have no knowledge or control (the legal term for the latter is inducement), have traditionally been called libels per quod. They can present troublesome surprises for reporters and editors.

In libel per quod the plaintiff has traditionally had the burden of proving the defamatory sense of the publication and, in almost every jurisdiction, special damages and/or actual malice as well,<sup>23</sup> especially where a reasonably prudent publisher had no warning of defamatory potential or the libel per quod was newsworthy matter of public interest. Recent developments in libel law, however, have blurred the distinction between libel per se and libel per quod.<sup>24</sup> Nevertheless, the peculiar hazards of libel by indirection should be noted.

22. Gambuzza v. Time, Inc., 239 N.Y.S.2d 466 (1963).

23. In his 1974 dissent in Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc. [see text, p. 236], Justice White reported that in the mid-60s all courts except Virginia were in agreement that any libel which is defamatory on its face (libelous per se) would be actionable without proof of special damages. Twenty-four jurisdictions held, at that time, that libel not defamatory on its face (libel per quod) would require a showing of special damages to be actionable. In 1971, Dean William Prosser, an authority on tort law, earlier identified thirty-five such states. Justice White in 1974 found ten states supporting an older rule that libel per quod did not require proof of special damages, and in six jurisdictions it wasn't clear what the rule was.

In 1968 a woman author and television personality brought a libel action against TV Guide for its publication of a promotional blurb which said: "From Party Girl to Call Girl. Scheduled Guest: TV Personality Pat Montandon and Author of How To Be a Party Girl." The original promo submitted to the magazine had a considerably different implication. It read: "From Party Girl to Call Girl? How Far Can the Party Girl Go Until She Becomes a Call Girl is Discussed with TV Personality Pat Montandon, Author (How To Be a Party Girl) and a Masked-Anonymous Prostitute!"

Witnesses testified that the average reader would conclude from the edited notice that Montandon had progressed from being a woman who liked to give and go to parties to being a call girl or prostitute. The rewrite was found by both jury and appeals court to be libelous, and the plaintiff was awarded $150,000 in compensatory and $1,000 in punitive damages. Montandon v. Triangle Publications, Inc., 120 Cal.Rptr. 186, (1975), cert. den. 423 U.S. 893.

In the preceding case, careless—the court used the word "reckless"—editing was costly to the magazine. Sometimes a story is libelous not for what it says but for what it fails to say. Suppose, for example, that all members of a city council are indicted for graft except Smith, Jones, and Brown and in the morning paper, Brown's name is omitted. This could be libel by omission. A case will illustrate.

The Village Voice carried a series of four articles by Jack Newfield highly critical of a New York judge's performance of his official duties. The newspaper then used excerpts from the articles to promote its subscriptions by means of an advertisement in the New York Times. The judge sued for invasion of privacy and for libel. A New York court denied a summary judgment (a ruling made only when the facts are undisputed, where the judge decides the case as a matter of law in favor of one or the other parties) to the Village Voice. Aside from the risks of the advertising excerpts misrepresenting the original stories, it was argued by the plaintiff-judge that between the date of publication of the original articles and the advertisement, the Village Voice received information that its original publication was inaccurate, incomplete, and in many respects totally false. The effect of the omissions on the libel issue, said the court, was a question of fact for a jury.<sup>25</sup> On appeal the omissions question was left open for trial,<sup>26</sup> until New York's highest court, finding that the judge had failed to set forth enough evidence to generate a triable is-

24. In all jurisdictions, slander to be actionable has required a showing of special damages unless the slander was a slander per se, that is, one imputing a crime involving moral turpitude, loathsome disease, incompetency or lack of integrity in business, trade, or profession, or unchastity in a woman. It is at this point that the distinction among slander, slander per se, libel per se, and libel per quod become blurred and confusing. Prosser in his Law of Torts (4th ed., 1971), 764-66, recommended combining libel and slander into a single tort in which the primary consideration would be the degree of defamation. Widely disseminated defamation (radio, television, newspaper) would be actionable without proof of special damages. Defamation by postcard, private letter, or in conversation, because of its lesser potential for harm, would require proof of special damages.

Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., the landmark libel ruling of 1974, does not suggest a merging of slander and libel, but it does, in its outcomes and by implication, combine libel per se and libel per quod. At least the distinction between them will be less important in the future.

25. Rinaldi v. Village Voice, 365 N.Y.S.2d 199 (1975).

sue of fact as to defendant's actual malice, dismissed the suit.

6. Special damages must also be shown in cases of trade libel. Trade libel may be considered a form of unfair competition whereby property, goods, products, or services are disparaged falsely to the financial disadvantage of their owner. Since personal reputation may not be at stake, trade libel or disparagement is simply defined as falsity, although the plaintiff must also demonstrate identification and publication. In addition, he or she must also prove either actual or implied common law malice (ill will, spite, or hostility) and special damages in the form of monetary loss.

A federal district court in Bose Corp. v. Consumers Union, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2481, 529 F.Supp. 357 (D.Mass.1981) defined trade libel:

The tort of product disparagement, as distinguished from individual or corporate defamation, is a narrow cause of action. The interests protected are not those of the reputation of the corporation or the intangible concerns peculiar to individual reputation such as community standing, privacy and psychic well-being. * * * A cause of action for product disparagement is made out only when the plaintiff has satisfactorily proved that it suffered special damages flowing from a false statement concerning the nature or quality of plaintiff's product. * * * The tort exists to provide redress only for tangible and direct pecuniary loss, a purely economic injury to which society accords a lesser value than reputational interests. * * * In a product disparagement case, the plaintiff must prove that special damages resulted from the publication and that the disparagement was a substantial factor in inducing others not to buy the plaintiff's product.

The First Circuit Court of Appeals, finding no actual malice in Consumer Report's criticism of Bose speakers, even though its evaluation may have been "imprecise," reversed the trial court's finding of liability. Bose Corp. v. Consumers Union, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 2391, 692 F.2d 189 (1st Cir. 1982). Bose's petition for review was accepted by the Supreme Court in mid-1983 and major press groups joined to urge the Court to affirm the Court of Appeals holding consistent with New York Times v. Sullivan and progeny. Bose sought review on the ground that the scope of appellate review of evidence of actual malice in a public figure libel case should be extremely limited. Bose claimed that independent review by the appellate court of the facts behind the actual malice constructions of the trial court is objectionable. Resolution of this issue by the Supreme Court could be extremely important to the future of libel law. [cert. granted 103 S.Ct. 1872 (1983)]

In National Dynamics Corp. v. Petersen Publishing Co., 185 F.Supp. 573 (S.D.N.Y. 1960) a federal district court said that where a publication states that the construction of a manufacturer's product is not as good as that of a competitor, there is a libel of the product only. No inference can be drawn that the manufacturer is practicing a deceit on the public simply because he is selling a product which is not the best in its field. The court added that, under New York law, disparagement of a product, even to the extent of saying it is completely worthless, is not sufficient to make out a case of libel per se of the manufacturer.

On the other hand, when Jerry Lewis said on a television program that a product called "Snooze," a sleep aid, was full of habit-forming drugs, that nothing short of a hospital cure could make one stop taking it, and that one would feel like "a run-down hound dog" and would lose weight under its effects, the New York Court of Appeals ruled that such an aspersion could readily be understood as charging the manufacturer, even though his name was not mentioned, with fraud and deceit in putting unwholesome and dangerous products on the market. The statement was libelous per se, and a showing of special damages was unnecessary. Harwood Pharmacal Co. v. National Broadcasting Co., Inc., 214 N.Y.S.2d 725, 174 N.E.2d 602 (1961).

The distinction between an attack on a product and an attack on its producer must be carefully drawn by the publisher who would avoid litigation. See Note, Corporate Defamation and Product Disparagement: Narrowing the Analogy to Personal Defamation, 75 Colum.L.Rev. 963 (1975).

7. As has been implied, a corporation may sue for libel damages if its credit or financial soundness is impugned, although courts are divided on whether corporations possess defensible reputations.<sup>27</sup> Similarly union officers may bring suits to preserve their union's reputation. Until 1966, civil suits for libel generated by union activities and governed by the National Labor Relations Act were barred in the interests of a single, uniform federal rule allowing a wide latitude of speech and counterspeech to competing parties.

In 1966 the United States Supreme Court lifted the constraint. The Court noted that unions when vying for membership are prone to denounce one another: "[B]oth labor and management often speak bluntly and recklessly, embellishing their respective positions with imprecatory language."<sup>28</sup> An example of the latter was the successful libel suit brought by a fruit company against a labor union for a false assertion in a film that the company maintained substandard housing for its migrant workers.<sup>29</sup>

Nonprofit organizations, foundations, and special interest groups can likewise attempt libel actions on behalf of their collective membership and their organiza-

Gannett Co., Inc.*, 361 N.Y.S.2d 276 (1974); Transworld Accounts v. Associated Press, 425 F.Supp. 814 (N.D.Cal.1977). In the latter case the court declared that there is no meaningful distinction between the protectible interest in reputation of corporations and individuals, given the fact that many enterprises which are corporations in form are in economic reality actually conducted as individual proprietorships or partnerships. For purposes of libel the court was prepared to treat corporations as private persons in some circumstances.

A year earlier, another federal district court had held otherwise. In Martin Marietta Corp. v. Evening Star Newspaper, 417 F.Supp. 947, 956 (D.D.C.1976)—a newspaper had alleged that prostitutes were being provided government officials by defense contractors—the federal district court said: "[T]he values considered important enough to merit accommodation with interests protected by the first amendment are associated solely with natural persons, and that corporations, while legal persons for some purposes, possess none of the attributes the (Gertz) Court sought to protect." Martin Marietta, by providing an atmosphere in which, it was also alleged, a naked lady could swing from a stuffed moose head, had become a public figure by thrusting itself into a matter of public controversy. So what would come to be called a Rosenbloom test was appropriate in trying the libel case.

But then again the Marietta approach was expressly rejected in Reliance Insurance Co. v. Barron's, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1033, 442 F.Supp. 1341 (S.D.N.Y.1977). So courts must determine on the basis of facts and circumstances whether a corporation is a public or private entity in applying the rules of Gertz. In Bruno & Stillman v. Globe Newspaper, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2057, 633 F.2d 583 (1st Cir. 1980), for example, a successful corporation not involved in a public controversy was held not to be a public figure.

8. Units of government, political parties, and political interest groups cannot sue for libel because the citizen's right to criticize such groups and entities, no matter how abusive the criticism, is held to be of overriding importance. A municipal corporation, furthermore, has been held to have no legal personality capable of being defamed. Similarly, utterances or publications directed against a government or city have been considered absolutely privileged.<sup>31</sup>

In 1920 the City of Chicago sued the Chicago Tribune for libeling its credit in the bond market and impairing its functioning as a municipality. The Illinois Supreme Court ruled against the city noting that "no court of last resort in this country has ever held, or even suggested, that prosecutions for libel on government have any place in the American system of jurisprudence;" * * * and * * * "assuming that there was a temporary damage to the city and a resultant increase in taxes, it is better that an occasional individual or newspaper that is so perverted in judgment or so misguided in his or its civic duty should go free than that all of the citizens should be put in jeopardy of imprisonment or economic subjugation if they venture to criticize an inefficient or corrupt government." City of Chicago v. Tribune Co., 139 N.E. 86 (Ill.1923). That sentiment was perhaps ahead of its time.<sup>32</sup>

9. It is not libelous to accuse a person of something that person has a legal right to do. A news report that John Chaloner shot John Gillard "while the latter was abusing his wife * * *" was held to be nondefamatory in 1919.<sup>33</sup> It would probably still be nondefamatory today.

10. Misdemeanors reported in print do not ordinarily constitute actionable libels because no moral turpitude is implied. If surrounding circumstances make a reference unexpectedly damaging and if special damages can be proven, we may have a different, and actionable, case.

11. Carelessness is undoubtedly the greatest enemy of the journalist. Nothing substitutes for accuracy, corroborative sources, and documentation where it might be needed. Sensitivity to language is no less important. The differences between "he said" and "he admitted" and between "she fell" and "she jumped" ought to be obvious, but writers do have mental lapses.

Speaking of mental lapses, imagine, if you can, the consternation of an Indiana newspaper when it discovered after a press run that a young reporter had confused the name of a judge with the name of a defendant in a story of a criminal trial for assault and battery with intent to satisfy sexual desires on a fourteen-year-old girl. The last paragraph of the flawed story reported that the judge was pleading an alibi defense.

Despite prayer, the article came to the attention of the judge who thereupon wrote the following letter to the newspaper:

31. Johnson City v. Cowles Communications, Inc., 477 S.W.2d 750 (Tenn.1972). Johnson City, Tenn. sued the now vanished Look magazine for libel. The state supreme court of Tennessee held that Johnson City, a municipal corporation, was not a "person" within the meaning of the state's libel statute and Look could not be sued for defamation. The same court held that any citizen, individual, or corporate body is absolutely privileged ("excepting only treasonable utterances") to make any statements about a city or government.

32. See also State v. Time, Inc., 249 So.2d 328 (La.1971), where it was held that the state of Louisiana could not sue a magazine for libel even if the charges made in the offending article were false and malicious.

33. Washington Post Co. v. Chaloner, 250 U.S. 290 (1919).

I enclose a Xerox copy from your paper which has just been handed to me. I appreciate the fact that, because of bad circulation, your paper is understaffed and your writers are poorly trained. The subject matter of this article was highly technical and, therefore, the writer of this article could not be expected to get it right the very first time. I, therefore, am going to point out some of the idiom used in court and identify the cast of characters.

First, the judge (that's me) sits up in front of the courtroom on a raised dais with a robe on and scowls at people. Secondly, the defendant is the fellow sitting at counsel table with his lawyer, with an apprehensive look on his face. Thirdly, the prosecutor is the young man sitting at the other counsel table representing truth and justice. The press are those people sitting over at the side of the courtroom with long hair, whiskers, and barefooted.

Now, in criminal proceedings, the judge is not charged with crime. The defendant is charged with crime. The judge does not claim alibi. He is the head honcho.

I am sure that if your writer carefully reviews the above information he may eventually be able to get his article correct.

I wish you to know, in passing, that I am a great admirer of the Fourth Estate, and sometimes get very emotional when I observe their crusade for truth and justice. Therefore, you have my permission to pass these instructions on to other newspapers who are in like situations so that they may benefit from these simple instructions.

Be assured that not all judges<sup>34</sup> have this well developed a sense of humor. His "instructions" were duly disseminated.

The judge, of course, is a public person and, as we shall see, that makes a difference. Where purely private persons are concerned, these kinds of errors can have devastating effects on the press. When the media have been negligent, they will be required to pay damages to those they have libeled.

Supreme Court Justice Wiley Rutledge showed sympathetic understanding of the press when he wrote in a concurring opinion:

There is perhaps no area of news more inaccurately reported factually, on the whole, though with some notable exceptions, than legal news. Some part of this is due to carelessness, often induced by the haste with which news is gathered and published, a smaller portion to bias or more blameworthy causes. But a great deal of it must be attributed, in candor, to ignorance which frequently is not at all blameworthy. For newspapers are conducted by men who are laymen to the law. With rare exceptions their capacity for misunderstanding the significance of legal events and procedures, not to speak of opinions, is great. But this is neither remarkable nor peculiar to newsmen. For the law, as lawyers best know, is full of perplexities. Pennekamp v. Florida, 328 U.S. 331, 371 (1946).

Libel is unusually full of perplexities. Yet ignorance of the law and carelessness do not keep journalists out of court. Our purpose here is to become more than laymen to the law of mass communication.

Damages

1. In passing we have mentioned three kinds of damages—compensatory, special, and punitive.

Compensatory or general damages are intended as a monetary compensation for injury to reputation. Until recently, as we shall see, compensatory damages were presumed in cases of libel per se. The jury would fix the amount, the court would review and sometimes reduce excessive awards when they appeared to be out of proportion to the injury inflicted. Compensatory damages are based on injured feelings, humiliation, shame or insult, mental and physical anguish, and injury to business or occupation. In reaching a decision on compensatory damages a jury will consider the degree of negligence or fault on the part of the press, the nature of the publication, the character, condition, and status of the parties to the suit, the peculiar circumstances of the case, the breadth of publication, and the intensity of the pain suffered as a consequence.

Special or actual damages have traditionally been meant to compensate one for real, tangible monetary loss which is provable, for example the loss of one's income or employment due to a false and defamatory publication. They must also be proven in cases of trade libel and slander. Since the Supreme Court's landmark ruling in the 1974 case Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323 (1974), the distinction between general and special damages has become blurred. Part of the problem may be semantic. Actual injury, the Court said in Gertz, need not encompass only financial loss, but may include impairment of reputation and standing in the community, personal humiliation, and mental anguish and suffering.

Actual damages as compensation for actual injury seem to have taken the place of the older concept of compensatory or general damages as payment for presumed injury to reputation resulting from libel per se, although the idea of per se defamation persists in the lexicon of the courts. The following paragraph from a 1981 ruling of the Virginia Supreme Court reflects the confusion which may be attributed to Gertz:

Moore did not allege or prove that he suffered any monetary loss. He did allege, however, that he had been insulted, mortified, held up to ridicule, and humiliated by the statement. We conclude that in libel actions not based upon per se defamation, where knowing falsity or reckless disregard for the truth [the Gertz rule] is not shown, the compensatory damages should be limited to the actual damages proved to have been sustained, but such damages should not necessarily be restricted to out-of-pocket loss * * * [but based] upon proof of actual injury, including such elements as damage to * * * reputation and standing in the community, embarrassment, humiliation, and mental suffering. "Special damages," which under the common-law rule must be shown as a prerequisite to recovery where the defamatory words are not actionable per se, are not to be limited to pecuniary loss.<sup>35</sup>

The key to understanding what the Court intended in Gertz may be that no compensation of any kind in a libel suit was envisioned unless the plaintiff could show actual injury. Actual injury warrants actual damages. Therefore actual damages now cover matters which used to be called general or compensatory damages. The significant difference is that mere presumptions about injury to reputation are no longer enough to establish grounds for damages.

For these reasons, it may be helpful to distinguish between special and actual damages, terms that have heretofore been interchangeable, reserving the term special damages for demonstrated financial loss.

Punitive or exemplary damages—what lawyers sometimes call "smart" money because they hurt—are meant to punish and make an example of libelers in order to discourage similar behavior in others. Additional semantic "noise" has resulted from the fact that courts have come to call punitive damages "presumed" damages, a term that has in the past been synonymous with general damages. Use of the word "presumed" may be inappropriate in that no presumed or punitive damages are permitted by Gertz, absent a showing by clear and convincing evidence of actual malice, that is, knowing falsehood or reckless disregard for truth. A question of intent of course, may always be somewhat more presumptive than a question of actual injury.

Punitive damages are controversial. However much the Supreme Court in Gertz sought to discourage them, New York and other courts have been protective of large punitive awards. California courts, in comparison, guard against excessive punitive damages by requiring that they be reasonably proportionate to the award of actual or general damages.<sup>36</sup> And, if excessive, they will be reduced or fashioned to what an impecunious defendant can afford.<sup>37</sup>

The proper relationship between compensatory and punitive damages will remain an issue of some significance. Justice Harlan provided a guideline in his concurring opinion in Rosenbloom v. Metro-media, 403 U.S. 29, 75, n. 4 (1971):

A carefully and properly instructed jury should ordinarily be able to arrive at damage awards that are self-validating. * * * [T]o the extent that supervision of jury verdicts would be required * * * defendant's resources, the actual harm suffered by the plaintiff, and the publication's potential for actual harm are all susceptible of more or less objective measurement. * * * I would hold unconstitutional, in a private libel case, jury authority to award punitive damages which is unconfined by the requirement that these awards bear a reasonable and purposeful relationship to the actual harm done.

Justices Marshall and Stewart in dissent thought no such objective measurement possible. In their view, punitive damages would remain a threat to the First Amendment. The Supreme Court may still have to resolve this question.

Nine states including Massachusetts, Oregon, and Washington,<sup>38</sup> prohibit punitive damages under any circumstances. A small number of additional states have laws or rules which discourage punitive damages. Most states, however, will allow juries to go beyond Gertz in finding reasons for punitive damages, e.g., an intent to harm or evidence of an insensitive response to a request for retraction. Some state laws allow punitive damages only on proof by plaintiff of a refusal to print a retraction when one has been requested.

Punitive damages greatly concern media lawyers because of their destructive potential. And "chilling effect" arguments may appeal to appellate judges more often than to jurors. In Carol Burnett's libel case against the National Enquirer, the court took into consideration the assets and profits of the defendant so as to punish and deter rather than destroy.<sup>39</sup> But, as we shall see, such judicial concern is not always the rule. Eventually the United States Supreme Court may have to consider the connection between publication, bankruptcy, and prior restraint.

Nominal or token damages represent a moral victory (a six cent or one dollar award) where there has been no real, substantial, or serious harm to a plaintiff's reputation or financial standing. Because Gertz requires a showing of actual injury in libel suits, nominal damages may no longer be available.

39. Burnett v. National Enquirer, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1321 (Cal.Super.Ct.1981). A California Court of Appeal held the initial punitive damages award of $750,000 too high and ordered a new trial on that question unless Burnett would accept a reduced award of $150,000. See 9 Med.L.Rptr. 1921 (1983).

The Traditional Threshold Elements of Actionable Libel: Defamation, Identification, and Publication

1. No libel action can succeed unless the plaintiff can prove that the defamatory meaning discussed in the previous section applies to him or her, that is, that there is specific identification. Someone must understand that the reference is to the plaintiff, even though identification is by nickname, pseudonym, or circumstance. One authority elaborates:

It is sufficient if he is described by his initial letters, or by the first and last letters of his name, or even by asterisks, or blanks, or if he be referred to under the guise of an allegorical, historical, fictitious or fanciful name, or by means of a description of his physical peculiarities, or by the places which he has visited on his travels. Gatley, Libel and Slander (4th ed. 1953), 113.

Circumstances may pinpoint identification. An example from the past. In 1906 the borough of Manhattan had four coroners, and each coroner had a deputy who was a qualified physician. One of the coroners was convicted of attempted bribery in the performance of his duties. He would threaten bereaved survivors or commercial establishments, such as hotels, with unnecessary autopsies. A newspaper, in a broad exposé of the entire department, described how the shakedown worked and concluded that corruption pervaded the entire system. The convicted coroner's deputy-physician brought a successful libel action, although he had not been named in the news story.<sup>40</sup>

Note here that the group was small enough to permit individual identification. An article which referred to a "parking lot racket" in Washington, D.C., however, was held to be too broad to permit the operator of one of the lots to sue.<sup>41</sup> And when Time magazine charged that western officials of a union were conspiring with Seattle gamblers to control Portland's law enforcement agencies, the Oregon representative of the union was not sufficiently identified with the libel, said a federal court, to warrant his bringing an action.<sup>42</sup>

A radio-television actor named Joe Julian faced the same problem when he brought a libel action against a black-listing "anti-Communist" organization. Its publication, Red Channels, correctly reported that the actor had participated in Communist-front meetings in the 40s and in its introduction used words like "Communist dupe, tool, sucker, part of a transmission belt, fellow traveler, and red channel" to describe those of whom it disapproved. There were 151 such persons mentioned in the publication, but no indication as to which category applied to Julian. The actor couldn't overcome the problem of proving that the alleged libelous material was published of and concerning him.<sup>43</sup> A subsequent case—Faulk v. Aware, Inc., 155 N.Y.S.2d 726 (1956)—demonstrated that calling an entertainer a Communist or a pro-Communist could be an expensive indulgence. The case and the events leading up to it were described in detail in John Henry Faulk's book, Fear on Trial (1963), and in a subsequent CBS documentary. Attorney Louis Nizer won a $550,000 judgment for his client, although 41. Service Parking Corp. v. Washington Times Co., 92 F.2d 502 (D.C.Cir.1937).

42. Crosby v. Time, Inc., 254 F.2d 927 (7th Cir. 1958).

43. Julian v. American Business Consultants, Inc., 155 N.Y.S.2d 1, 137 N.E.2d 1 (1956).

Faulk was never able to collect from his bankrupt adversaries.

Someone other than the plaintiff or defendant, then, must reasonably infer from the publication that the defamatory reference is to the plaintiff. And that someone may be a single person.<sup>44</sup> But there must be a third party. If a name is not used, the plaintiff must show, by what lawyers call colloquium, that the defamatory reference is to him or her.

Mistaken identity can ensnare the press. Time magazine found itself in libel litigation when, in an article on the unprofessional conduct of some lawyers, it confused attorney Richard J. Ryder with attorney Richard R. Ryder. The U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia granted Time's motion for summary judgment on grounds that the attorney as a public official or public figure appeared not to be able to prove actual malice. Disagreeing that the plaintiff was either a public figure or public official, the D.C. Court of Appeals reversed and remanded. "A modicum of care would have provided the correct identity" in terms of both name and address, said the appeals court. Ryder v. Time, Inc., 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1221, 557 F.2d 824 (D.C.Cir.1976). On remand a U.S. magistrate granted Time summary judgment again because the report, though erroneous, dealt with a matter of "public or general concern" and under Virginia law at the time this required a showing of actual malice.

"No one at Time, involved in writing, checking, or editing the Essay," said the court, "had ever heard of plaintiff or had any reason to believe that there might be more than one attorney named Richard Ryder in Virginia. * * * Time followed its standard procedures in preparing the Essay, and those procedures do not include a requirement for adding middle initials or local addresses." Ryder v. Time, Inc., 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1170 (D.D.C.1977).

Obviously more care with the name and address would have saved Time considerable trouble.

2. In libel the real harm is in the publication, in throwing the defamation to the four winds. Print media because of their permanence, radio and television because of their reach and impact can convey libels with devastating effect.

For there to be a libel, or a slander, there must be publication to a third person. The third person may be anyone, including a member of the plaintiff's family, although publication to one's spouse, attorney, physician, or priest is generally insufficient, since these are frequently privileged relationships.

In Avery Corp. v. Peterson, 178 F.Supp. 132 (D.Pa.1959), dictation of a defamatory letter to a corporation secretary by an officer of the firm was ruled a publication.

Printing, posting, circulating, or disseminating is the first step in publication; someone reading, viewing, or hearing the message is the second step. The third person, of course, must know to whom the defamatory publication refers for there to be identification.

3. Some states, including California, Illinois, and Pennsylvania, either by case law or by adoption of the Uniform Single Publication Act (13 U.L.A. 517), subscribe to what is called the single publication rule: an entire edition of a newspaper is treated as a single publication, rather than every single copy constituting a distinct publication and therefore a separate basis for a libel suit. In other words, the initial publication is one libel, one offense, one tort regardless of how many persons read it or how often they read it. The number of readers neither increases the magnitude of the libel nor allows for multiple causes of action, although a plaintiff is permitted to plead and prove extent of circulation as evidence bearing on damages.<sup>45</sup>

The Supreme Court of Georgia said in 1964: "To allow a suit for damages each time a different person sees the newspaper would unreasonably shackle the press and might quickly bankrupt it, thus doing great harm to both the publisher and the readers."<sup>46</sup>

In spite of California's Uniform Single Publication Act, a new libel action based on the paperback edition of a book was permitted, even though identical passages in the original hardcover edition had already been litigated.<sup>47</sup>

In cases of multistate circulation of newspapers or magazines, the single publication rule dictates that a cause of action for libel be absolutely complete at the time of first publication. Later circulation is relevant only in computing damages.<sup>48</sup> The rule obviously protects a publisher from the perpetual harassment of multiple and never-ending libel actions.<sup>49</sup>

A suit may be brought in the place where the defendant resides or does business, and this is frequently the point of publication; or in the place of largest circulation of the offending publication; or where the greatest harm was done the plaintiff—generally the plaintiff's place of residence. What lawyers call long-arm statutes can be applied to publishers of national newspapers without violating due process. So the Los Angeles Times and other news media could be sued in Wyoming for a story on organized crime that was researched in Wyoming by three Times reporters and had its major impact there. Anselmi v. Denver Post, Inc., 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1530, 552 F.2d 316 (10th Cir. 1977).

Generally, however, a newspaper published in a distant place must have sufficient business and professional impact or activity where the alleged libel has occurred to trigger a long-arm statute.

"[T]o sustain jurisdiction over a non-resident newspaper," said a court of appeals in 1964, "plaintiff must show more than 'mere circulation of a periodical through the mail to subscribers * * * and sporadic news gathering by reporters.'" Buckley v. New York Times Co., 338 F.2d 470, 474 (5th Cir. 1964).

In dismissing a libel suit for want of jurisdiction, a United States district court in Texas concluded that twenty-eight daily copies of the Detroit Free Press (.0044 percent of the paper's total daily circulation) were insufficient to constitute the minimum contacts necessary to sustain jurisdiction under the due process clause. Kersh v. Angelosante, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1282 (N.D.Tex.1982).

Where the single publication rule is in effect, the libel suit may have to be brought in the place here the libel was published or where publication first occurred. Several courts have refused to let the single publication rule cross state lines and have allowed a separate cause of action in each state where publication took place. A Pennsylvania rule recognized one aggregate cause of action for all single publication states plus additional causes of action for libels committed in multiple publication states.<sup>50</sup>

46. Ibid., p. 398. See also Waskow v. Associated Press, 462 F.2d 1173 (D.C.Cir. 1972). Waskow, a "public figure" under the New York Times v. Sullivan doctrine, see text, p. 203, had argued that "back issues" of the Washington Star were sold subsequent to the date of the appearance of the original item in the Star libeling him and that as a result the libel was "republished" under the New York Times malice test. In view of the deadline under which metropolitan newspapers operate and the predetermined distribution system that they use once an edition is printed, the court rejected the libel plaintiff's republication theory: "[F]or purposes of the Times rule, a daily newspaper is 'published' once only—when it is printed and placed in the distribution system—unless it is redistributed outside the normal channels with the specific intent to convey the libelous information."

4. As has been noted, the second step in publication is taken when the libel effectively reaches those readers, listeners, viewers for whom publication is intended. In Zuck v. Interstate Publishing Corp., 317 F.2d 727 (2d Cir. 1963), it was decided that mere delivery of bundles of a periodical designed as an insert for a newspaper to a carrier or distributor did not constitute publication. There was no publication until the newspaper went on sale or began to circulate to the great mass of its subscribers. In such cases, the third party to publication is defined as the bulk of readers rather than a small or atypical segment of them.<sup>51</sup>

On the other hand, a number of courts have held that publication is effected when the libelous matter is delivered to common carriers for distribution. See Konigsberg v. Long Island Daily Press Publishing Co., 293 N.Y.S.2d 861 (1968); Novel v. Garrison, 294 F.Supp. 825 (D.Ill.1969). Whatever the rule, there is no necessity to prove that any part of the content of a publication has been read. See Hornby v. Hunter, 385 S.W.2d 473 (Tex.Civ.App. 1964).

Every purposive repetition of a defamation—picking up a libel from another publication, a new edition of a book, a re-broadcast—is a new publication. Identifying the source and leaving room for disbelief by an attribution such as "it is alleged" is no defense,<sup>52</sup> although it could mitigate damages. There is no liability, however, if a libelous article or statement is reprinted or rebroadcast without the original author's participation or consent,<sup>53</sup> or reprinted accidentally, unintentionally, or in a distorted form.<sup>54</sup>

The main point to remember is that for a libel action to proceed three conditions must be met by plaintiff: there must be defamation, identification, and intentional publication. Absent any one of these elements, no successful libel action can be brought.

5. Everyone who takes a conscious part in a publication is theoretically liable for damages. Usually the corporation—the party capable of paying hefty damages—is named defendant. A news source who generates a libel and authorizes its publication may also be liable.<sup>55</sup> Innocent coworkers such as carrier boys, vendors, broadcast engineers are generally not liable.<sup>56</sup> Reporters are often named as defendants by angry plaintiffs.

Plaintiffs in a minority of states—including New York and California where a high proportion of publishing takes place—must show actual malice on the part of executives higher up for punitive damages. For example, in Dresbach v. Doubleday Co., 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2105, 518 F.Supp. 1285 (D.D.C.1981), a United States district court held that a book publisher is not responsible for the independent verification of everything a reputable author writes. In most states, however, higher-ups are responsible for libel committed by permanent or free-lance employees. This proposition is known as the complicity rule.

Under the complicity rule, editors or publishers could deny knowing what their reporters were doing; but this is hardly the mark of a responsible newspaper and could redound to the disadvantage of defendant when a court or jury considers the question of fault. Conversely, in New York or California a plaintiff might argue that a reporter is operating at a managerial level with a full mandate from a publisher. In the Alton, Illinois case, which will be referred to subsequently in the context of "megaverdicts," plaintiff could not show that the publisher knew of the defamatory memo sent by Telegraph reporters to a federal prosecutor, and, as it turned out, he didn't have to.

It is not a defense to say that the libel came from a regular and usually reliable news service. A Georgia court put it well:

While the Associated Press no doubt deserves all that is said for it as being a trustworthy, honest, and accurate news gatherer, a newspaper, in publishing Associated Press news reports, cannot justify itself as publishing a privileged communication. * * * <sup>57</sup>

Again, the offense is in the publication, in the spreading of the defamatory falsehood.

COMMON LAW LIBEL AND THE ORIGINS OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL DEFENSE

Strict Liability

Under the common law rule of strict liability, libel per se was defined as defamatory words published in reference to a plaintiff with obvious and substantial damage to reputation. Falsity as to fact, lack of justification as to opinion, malice on the part of the publisher, and injury to the plaintiff were all presumed. Plaintiff having met the three threshold elements of actionable libel, the burden of proof then shifted to the defendant to present an affirmative defense of truth, privilege, or fair comment and criticism. Since these three common law defenses are still available to defendants, they will be discussed in more detail in later sections.

The problem with the rule of strict liability was that it took no account of a publisher's intent, degree of negligence, or level of professionalism, nor did it consider the extent of injury suffered by plaintiff. Indeed a publisher could be liable even where there was no apparent fault on his or her part. The rule begged timidity and self-censorship, although there is little evidence that such occurred.

Constitutionalizing the Law of Libel

1. Influenced by Alexander Meiklejohn's thesis that speech in the public realm is crucial to self-government and therefore warrants near absolute protection, Justice William Brennan in his 1964 opinion for the Court in New York Times v. Sullivan made libel of public officials a constitutional matter. But for the qualification of actual malice, Brennan would have reached the Meiklejohnian summit of protection for public speech.<sup>58</sup>

2. The New York Times case rose out of the turmoil of the Black Revolution. On March 29, 1960, a full-page editorial advertisement appeared in the New York Times under the headline, "Heed Their Rising Voices." The ad copy began by stating that the nonviolent civil rights movement in the South was being met by a wave of terror. The ad concluded with an appeal for funds in support of the student movement, voting rights, and the legal defense of Martin Luther King, Jr. In addition to the signatures of sixty-four prominent Americans, sixteen southern clergymen were purported to have signed the ad. Segments of two paragraphs of the text became the focal points of subsequent litigation:

In Montgomery, Alabama, after students sang "My Country 'Tis of Thee" on the State Capitol steps, their leaders were expelled from school, and truckloads of police armed with shotguns and tear-gas ringed the Alabama State College Campus. When the entire student body protested to state authorities by refusing to re-register, their dining hall was padlocked in an attempt to starve them into submission. * * *

Again and again the Southern violators have answered Dr. King's peaceful protests with intimidation and violence. They have bombed his home almost killing his wife and child. They have assaulted his person. They have arrested him seven times—for "speeding," "loitering" and similar "offenses." And now they have charged him with "perjury"—a felony under which they could imprison him for ten years. * *

L. B. Sullivan, one of three elected commissioners of Montgomery, brought a civil libel action against four black Alabama clergymen, whose names had appeared in the ad, and the Times. In accordance with Alabama law, Sullivan, before bringing action, demanded in writing a public retraction from the clergymen and the newspaper. The clergymen did not respond on the grounds that use of their names was unauthorized. The Times did not publish a retraction but wrote Sullivan asking how the statements in the ad reflected on him. The commissioner filed suit without answering the query.

Although not mentioned by name, Sullivan contended that he represented the "police" referred to in the ad; therefore he was being accused of ringing the campus with police and starving the students into submission. He also claimed that the term "Southern violators" was meant to apply to him; therefore he was being accused of "intimidation and violence," bombing Dr. King's home, assaulting his person, and charging the civil rights leader with perjury. Witnesses testified that they identified the commissioner in the ad.

With the elements of libel thus established, Sullivan proceeded to show that most of the charges could not in fact have applied to him because they referred to incidents which had occurred before his election. Moreover, there were serious inaccuracies in the ad, creating a presumption of general damages under Alabama law.

In its defense, the Times pointed out that the ad had come to it from a New York advertising agency representing the signatory committee. A letter from A. Philip Randolph accompanied the ad and certified that the persons whose names appeared in it had given their permission. It was not considered necessary to confirm the accuracy of the ad by the manager of the Advertising Acceptability Department or anyone else at the Times. Nor were there any doubts about the authorization of the ad by the individual southern clergymen (they were later absolved of any responsibility because they were unaware of the ad).

The Times could not see how any of the language of the ad referred to Sullivan.

The trial judge submitted the case to the jury under instructions that the statements in the ad were libelous per se and without privilege. He also left the door open for punitive damages by an imprecise definition of what was required to support them.

The Circuit Court awarded $500,000 to Sullivan. The Supreme Court of Alabama affirmed, and the Times appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

At the heart of the brief submitted to the Court on behalf of Sullivan was the argument that "the Constitution has never required that states afford newspapers the privilege of leveling false and defamatory 'facts' at persons simply because they hold public office. The great weight of American authority has rejected such a plea by newspapers." See Brief for the Respondent, 376 United States Supreme Court Records and Briefs 254-314 (Vol. 12), p. 23.

The argument for the Times was more provocative and, as it turned out, more persuasive. In part it stated:

Under the doctrine of libel per se applied below a public official is entitled to recover "presumed" and punitive damages for a publication found to be critical of the official conduct of a governmental agency under his general supervision if a jury thinks the publication "tends" to "injure" him "in his reputation" to "bring" him "into public contempt" as an official. The publisher has no defense unless he can persuade the jury that the publication is entirely true in all its factual, material particulars. The doctrine not only dispenses with proof of injury by the complaining official, but presumes malice and falsity as well. Such a rule of liability works an abridgement of the freedom of the press. Brief for the Petitioner, 376 United States Supreme Court Records and Briefs 254-314 (Vol. 12), pp. 28-29.

Attorneys for the Times had deftly raised the specter of seditious libel, and the Court responded.

NEW YORK TIMES CO. v. SULLIVAN

Justice BRENNAN delivered the Opinion of the Court: * * *

Because of the importance of the constitutional issues involved, we granted the separate petitions for certiorari of the individual petitioners and of the Times. * * * We reverse the judgment. We hold that the rule of law applied by the Alabama courts is constitutionally deficient for failure to provide the safeguards for freedom of speech and of the press that are required by the First and Fourteenth Amendments in a libel action brought by a public official against critics of his official conduct. We further hold that under the proper safeguards the evidence presented in this case is constitutionally insufficient to support the judgment for respondent.

We may dispose at the outset of two grounds asserted to insulate the judgment of the Alabama courts from constitutional scrutiny. The first is the proposition relied on by the State Supreme Court—that "The Fourteenth Amendment is directed against State action and not private action." That proposition has no application to this case. Although this is a civil lawsuit between private parties, the Alabama courts have applied a state rule of law which petitioners claim to impose invalid restrictions on their constitutional freedoms of speech and press. * * *

The second contention is that the constitutional guarantees of freedom of speech and of the press are inapplicable here, at least so far as the Times is concerned, because the allegedly libelous statements were published as part of a paid, "commercial" advertisement. The argument relies on Valentine v. Chrestensen, 316 U.S. 52 (1942), where the Court held that a city ordinance forbidding street distribution of commercial and business advertising matter did not abridge the First Amendment freedoms, even as applied to a handbill having a commercial message on one side but a protest against certain official action on the other. The reliance is wholly misplaced. The Court in Chrestensen reaffirmed the constitutional protection for "the freedom of communicating information and disseminating opinion"; its holding was based upon the factual conclusions that the handbill was "purely commercial advertising" and that the protest against official action had been added only to evade the ordinance.

The publication here was not a "commercial" advertisement in the sense in which the word was used in Chrestensen. It communicated information, expressed opinion, recited grievances, protested claimed abuses, and sought financial support on behalf of a movement whose existence and objectives are matters of the highest public interest and concern. That the Times was paid for publishing the advertisement is as immaterial in this connection as is the fact that newspapers and books are sold. Any other conclusion would discourage newspapers from carrying "editorial advertisements" of this type, and so might shut off an important outlet for the promulgation of information and ideas by persons who do not themselves have access to publishing facilities—who wish to exercise their freedom of speech even though they are not members of the press. The effect would be to shackle the First Amendment in its attempt to secure "the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources." To avoid placing such a handicap upon the freedoms of expression, we hold that if the allegedly libelous statements would otherwise be constitutionally protected from the present judgment, they do not forfeit that protection because they were published in the form of a paid advertisement.

Under Alabama law as applied in this case, a publication is "libelous per se" if the words "tend to injure a person * * * in his reputation" or to "bring [him] into public contempt"; the trial court stated that the standard was met if the words are such as to "injure him in his public office, or impute misconduct to him in his office, or want of official integrity, or want of fidelity to a public trust * * *." The jury must find that the words were published "of and concerning" the plaintiff, but where the plaintiff is a public official his place in the governmental hierarchy is sufficient evidence to support a finding that his reputation has been affected by statements that reflect upon the agency of which he is in charge. Once "libel per se" has been established, the defendant has no defense as to stated facts unless he can persuade the jury that they were true in all their particulars. * * * His privilege of "fair comment" for expressions of opinion depends on the truth of the facts upon which the comment is based. * * * Unless he can discharge the burden of proving truth, general damages are presumed, and may be awarded without proof of pecuniary injury. A showing of actual malice is apparently a prerequisite to recovery of punitive damages, and the defendant may in any event forestall a punitive award by a retraction meeting the statutory requirements. Good motives and belief in truth do not negate an inference of malice, but are relevant only in mitigation of punitive damages if the jury chooses to accord them weight. * * *

The general proposition that freedom of expression upon public questions is secured by the First Amendment has long been settled by our decisions. The constitutional safeguard, we have said, "was fashioned to assure unfettered interchange of ideas for the bringing about of political and social changes desired by the people." "The maintenance of the opportunity for free political discussion to the end that government may be responsive to the will of the people and that changes may be obtained by lawful means, an opportunity essential to the security of the Republic, is a fundamental principle of our constitutional system." "[I]t is a prized American privilege to speak one's mind, although not always with perfect good taste, on all public institutions," and this opportunity is to be afforded for "vigorous advocacy" no less than "abstract discussion." * * *

The First Amendment, said Judge Learned Hand, "presupposes that right conclusions are more likely to be gathered out of a multitude of tongues, than through any kind of authoritative selection. To many this is, and always will be, folly; but we have staked upon it our all." United States v. Associated Press, 52 F.Supp. 362, 372 (S.D.N.Y.1943).

Thus we consider this case against the background of a profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open, and that it may well include vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials. [Emphasis added.] The present advertisement, as an expression of grievance and protest on one of the major public issues of our time, would seem clearly to qualify for the constitutional protection. The question is whether it forfeits that protection by the falsity of some of its factual statements and by its alleged defamation of respondent.

Authoritative interpretations of the First Amendment guarantees have consistently refused to recognize an exception for any test of truth—whether administered by judges, juries, or administrative officials—and especially one that puts the burden of proving truth on the speaker. * * *

[E]rroneous statement is inevitable in free debate, and * * * it must be protected if the freedoms of expression are to have the "breathing space" that they "need * * * to survive." * * *

Just as factual error affords no warrant for repressing speech that would otherwise be free, the same is true of injury to official reputation. Where judicial officers are involved, this Court has held that concern for the dignity and reputation of the courts does not justify the punishment as criminal contempt of criticism of the judge or his decision. This is true even though the utterance contains "half-truths" and "misinformation." Such repression can be justified, if at all, only by a clear and present danger of the obstruction of justice. If judges are to be treated as "men of fortitude, able to thrive in a hardy climate," surely the same must be true of other government officials, such as elected city commissioners. Criticism of their official conduct does not lose its constitutional protection merely because it is effective criticism and hence diminishes their official reputations.

If neither factual error nor defamatory content suffices to remove the constitutional shield from criticism of official conduct, the combination of the two elements is no less inadequate. This is the lesson to be drawn from the great controversy over the Sedition Act of 1798, 1 Stat. 596, which first crystallized a national awareness of the central meaning of the First Amendment. See Levy, Legacy of Suppression (1960), at 258 et seq. * * * That statute made it a crime, punishable by a $5,000 fine and five years in prison, "if any person shall write, print, utter or publish * * * any false, scandalous and malicious writing or writings against the government of the United States, or either house of the Congress * * * or the President * * * with intent to defame * * * or to bring them * * * into contempt or disrepute; or to excite against them, or either or any of them, the hatred of the good people of the United States." The Act allowed the defendant the defense of truth, and provided that the jury were to be judges both of the law and the facts. Despite these qualifications, the Act was vigorously condemned as unconstitutional in an attack joined in by Jefferson and Madison. * * * Although the Sedition Act was never tested in this Court, the attack upon its validity has carried the day in the court of history. Fines levied in its prosecution were repaid by Act of Congress on the ground that it was unconstitutional. * * *

is likewise beyond the reach of its civil law of libel. The fear of damage awards under a rule such as that invoked by the Alabama courts here may be markedly more inhibiting than the fear of prosecution under a criminal statute. * * * Alabama, for example, has a criminal libel law which subjects to prosecution "any person who speaks, writes, or prints of and concerning another any accusation falsely and maliciously importing the commission by such person of a felony, or any other indictable offense involving moral turpitude," and which allows as punishment upon conviction a fine not exceeding $500 and a prison sentence of six months. * * * Presumably a person charged with violation of this statute enjoys ordinary criminal-law safeguards such as the requirements of an indictment and of proof beyond a reasonable doubt. These safeguards are not available to the defendant in a civil action. The judgment awarded in this case—without the need for any proof of actual pecuniary loss—was one thousand times greater than the maximum fine provided by the Alabama criminal statute, and one hundred times greater than that provided by the Sedition Act. And since there is no double-jeopardy limitation applicable to civil lawsuits, this is not the only judgment that may be awarded against petitioners for the same publication.<sup>18</sup> Whether or not a newspaper can survive a succession of such judgments, the pall of fear and timidity imposed upon those who would give voice to public criticism is an atmosphere in which the First Amendment freedoms cannot survive. * *

The state rule of law is not saved by its allowance of the defense of truth. A defense for erroneous statements honestly made is no less essential here than was the requirement of proof of guilty knowledge which, in Smith v. California, we held indispensable to a valid conviction of a bookseller for possessing obscene writings for sale. * * * A rule compelling the critic of official conduct to guarantee the truth of all his factual assertions—and to do so on pain of libel judgments virtually unlimited in amount—leads to a comparable "self-censorship." Allowance of the defense of truth, with the burden of proving it on the defendant, does not mean that only false speech will be deterred. Even courts accepting this defense as an adequate safeguard have recognized the difficulties of adducing legal proofs that the alleged libel was true in all its factual particulars. * * * Under such a rule, would-be critics of official conduct may be deterred from voicing their criticism, even though it is believed to be true and even though it is in fact true, because of doubt whether it can be proved in court or fear of the expense of having to do so. They tend to make only statements which "steer far wider of the unlawful zone." * * * The rule thus dampens the vigor and limits the variety of public debate. It is inconsistent with the First and Fourteenth Amendments.

The constitutional guarantees require, we think, a federal rule that prohibits a public official from recovering damages for a defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless he proves that the statement was made with "actual malice" —that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not. [Emphasis added.] * *

Such a privilege for criticism of official conduct is appropriately analogous to the protection accorded a public official when he is sued for libel by a private citizen. In

18. The Times states that four other libel suits based on the advertisement have been filed against it by others who have served as Montgomery City Commissioners and by the Governor of Alabama; that another $500,000 verdict has been awarded in the only one of these cases that has yet gone to trial; and that the damages sought in the other three total $2,000,000.

Barr v. Matteo, 360 U.S. 564, 575 (1959), this Court held the utterance of a federal official to be absolutely privileged if made "within the outer perimeter" of his duties. [Emphasis added.] The States accord the same immunity to statements of their highest officers, although some differentiate their lesser officials and qualify the privilege they enjoy. But all hold that all officials are protected unless actual malice can be proved. The reason for the official privilege is said to be that the threat of damage suits would otherwise "inhibit the fearless, vigorous, and effective administration of policies of government" and "dampen the ardor of all but the most resolute, or the most irresponsible, in the unflinching discharge of their duties." Barr v. Matteo. Analogous considerations support the privilege for citizen-critic of government. It is as much his duty to criticize as it is the official's duty to administer. As Madison said, "the censorial power is in the people over the Government, and not in the Government over the people." It would give public servants an unjustified preference over the public they serve, if critics of official conduct did not have a fair equivalent of the immunity granted to the officials themselves.

We conclude that such a privilege is required by the First and Fourteenth Amendments.

We hold today that the Constitution delimits a State's power to award damages for libel in actions brought by public officials against critics of their official conduct. Since this is such an action, the rule requiring proof of actual malice is applicable. While Alabama law apparently requires proof of actual malice for an award of punitive damages, where general damages are concerned malice is "presumed." Such a presumption is inconsistent with the federal rule. * * * Since the trial judge did not instruct the jury to differentiate between general and punitive damages, it may be that the verdict was wholly an award of one or the other. But it is impossible to know, in view of the general verdict returned. Because of this uncertainty, the judgment must be reversed and the case remanded. * * *

Since respondent may seek a new trial, we deem that considerations of effective judicial administration require us to review the evidence in the present record to determine whether it could constitutionally support a judgment for respondent. This Court's duty is not limited to the elaboration of constitutional principles; we must also in proper cases review the evidence to make certain that those principles have been constitutionally applied. This is such a case, particularly since the question is one of alleged trespass across "the line between speech unconditionally guaranteed and speech which may legitimately be regulated." In cases where that line must be drawn, the rule is that we "examine for ourselves the statements in issue and the circumstances under which they were made to see * * * whether they are of a character which the principles of the First Amendment, as adopted by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, protect." * * * We must "make an independent examination of the whole record," * * * so as to assure ourselves that the judgment does not constitute a forbidden intrusion on the field of free expression.

Applying these standards, we consider that the proof presented to show actual malice lacks the convincing clarity which the constitutional standard demands, and hence that it would not constitutionally sustain the judgment for respondent under the proper rule of law. The case of the individual petitioners requires little discussion. Even assuming that they could constitutionally be found to have authorized the use of their names on the advertisement, there was no evidence whatever that they were aware of any erroneous statements or were in any way reckless in that regard. The judgment against them is thus without constitutional support. [Emphasis added.]

As to the Times, we similarly conclude that the facts do not support a finding of actual malice. The statement by the Times' Secretary that, apart from the padlocking allegation, he thought the advertisement was "substantially correct," affords no constitutional warrant for the Alabama Supreme Court's conclusion that it was a "cavalier ignoring of the falsity of the advertisement [from which], the jury could not have but been impressed with the bad faith of the Times, and its maliciousness inferable therefrom." The statement does not indicate malice at the time of the publication; even if the advertisement was not "substantially correct"—although respondent's own proofs tend to show that it was—that opinion was at least a reasonable one, and there was no evidence to impeach the witness' good faith in holding it. The Times' failure to retract upon respondent's demand, although it later retracted upon the demand of Governor Patterson, is likewise not adequate evidence of malice for constitutional purposes. Whether or not a failure to retract may ever constitute such evidence, there are two reasons why it does not here. First, the letter written by the Times reflected a reasonable doubt on its part as to whether the advertisement could reasonably be taken to refer to respondent at all. Second, it was not a final refusal, since it asked for an explanation on this point—a request that respondent chose to ignore. * * *

Finally, there is evidence that the Times published the advertisement without checking its accuracy against the news stories in the Times' own files. The mere presence of the stories in the files does not, of course, establish that the Times "knew" the advertisement was false, since the state of mind required for actual malice would have to be brought home to the persons in the Times' organization having responsibility for the publication of the advertisement. With respect to the failure of those persons to make the check, the record shows that they relied upon their knowledge of the good reputation of many of those whose names were listed as sponsors of the advertisement, and upon the letter from A. Philip Randolph, known to them as a responsible individual, certifying that the use of the names was authorized. There was testimony that the persons handling the advertisement saw nothing in it that would render it unacceptable under the Times' policy of rejecting advertisements containing "attacks of a personal character"; their failure to reject it on this ground was not unreasonable. We think the evidence against the Times supports at most a finding of negligence in failing to discover the misstatements, and is constitutionally insufficient to show the recklessness that is required for a finding of actual malice.

We also think the evidence was constitutionally defective in another respect: it was incapable of supporting the jury's finding that the allegedly libelous statements were made "of and concerning" respondent. Respondent relies on the words of the advertisement and the testimony of six witnesses to establish a connection between it and himself. * * * There was no reference to respondent in the advertisement, either by name or official position. A number of the allegedly libelous statements—the charges that the dining hall was padlocked and that Dr. King's home was bombed, his person assaulted, and a perjury prosecution instituted against him—did not even concern the police; despite the ingenuity of the arguments which would attach this significance to the word "They," it is plain that these statements could not reasonably be read as accusing respondent of personal involvement in the acts in question. The statements upon which respondent principally relies as referring to him are the two allegations that did concern the police or police functions: that "truckloads of police * * * ringed the Alabama State College Campus" after the demonstration on the State Capitol steps, and that Dr. King had been "arrested * * * seven times." These statements were false only in that the police had been "deployed near" the campus but had not actually "ringed" it and had not gone there in connection with the State Capitol demonstration, and in that Dr. King had been arrested only four times. The ruling that these discrepancies between what was true and what was asserted were sufficient to injure respondent's reputation may itself raise constitutional problems, but we need not consider them here. Although the statements may be taken as referring to the police, they did not on their face make even an oblique reference to respondent as an individual. Support for the asserted reference must, therefore, be sought in the testimony of respondent's witnesses. But none of them suggested any basis for the belief that respondent himself was attacked in the advertisement beyond the bare fact that he was in overall charge of the Police Department and thus bore official responsibility for police conduct; to the extent that some of the witnesses thought respondent to have been charged with ordering or approving the conduct or otherwise being personally involved in it, they based this notion not on any statements in the advertisement, and not on any evidence that he had in fact been so involved, but solely on the unsupported assumption that, because of his official position, he must have been. This reliance on the bare fact of respondent's official position was made explicit by the Supreme Court of Alabama. That court, in holding that the trial court "did not err in overruling the demurrer [of the Times] in the aspect that the libelous matter was not of and concerning the [plaintiff,]" based its ruling on the proposition that:

"We think it common knowledge that the average person knows that municipal agents, such as police and firemen, and others, are under the control and direction of the city governing body, and more particularly under the direction and control of a single commissioner. In measuring the performance or deficiencies of such groups, praise or criticism is usually attached to the official in complete control of the body."

This proposition has disquieting implications for criticism of governmental conduct. For good reason, "no court of last resort in this country has ever held, or even suggested, that prosecutions for libel on government have any place in the American system of jurisprudence." * * * The present proposition would sidestep this obstacle by transmuting criticism of government, however impersonal it may seem on its face, into personal criticism, and hence potential libel, of the officials of whom the government is composed. There is no legal alchemy by which a State may thus create the cause of action that would otherwise be denied for a publication which, as respondent himself said of the advertisement, "reflects not only on me but on the other Commissioners and the community." Raising as it does the possibility that a good-faith critic of government will be penalized for his criticism, the proposition relied on by the Alabama courts strikes at the very center of the constitutionally protected area of free expression. We hold that such a proposition may not constitutionally be utilized to establish that an otherwise impersonal attack on governmental operations was a libel of an official responsible for those operations. Since it was relied on exclusively here, and there was no other evidence to connect the statements with respondent, the evidence was constitutionally insufficient to support a finding that the statements referred to respondent.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Alabama is reversed and the case is remanded to that court for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

Justice BLACK, with whom Justice Douglas joins (concurring).

* * * In reversing, the Court holds that "the Constitution delimits a State's power to award damages for libel in actions brought by public officials against critics of their official conduct." I base my vote to reverse on the belief that the First and Fourteenth Amendments not merely "delimit" a State's power to award damages to "public officials against critics of their official conduct" but completely prohibit a State from exercising such a power. The Court goes on to hold that a State can subject such critics to damages if "actual malice" can be proved against them. "Malice," even as defined by the Court, is an elusive, abstract concept, hard to prove and hard to disprove. The requirement that malice be proved provides at best an evanescent protection for the right critically to discuss public affairs and certainly does not measure up to the sturdy safeguard embodied in the First Amendment. Unlike the Court, therefore, I vote to reverse exclusively on the ground that the Times and the individual defendants had an absolute, unconditional constitutional right to publish in the Times advertisement their criticisms of the Montgomery agencies and officials. * * *

Expanding the New York Times Doctrine

1. Later the same year, the Court expanded the New York Times doctrine to reach criminal libel prosecutions. Historically, criminal libel laws were intended to protect the public peace and good order. Mob violence or other breaches of the peace, it was asserted, would be created by defamations against social groups (religious, racial, family, etc.) or government officials. The distinction between criminal and seditious libels was less than clear.

So the state became plaintiff on behalf of the public. Truth, or truth published with good motives and for justifiable ends, was a defense. Privilege was a defense in some jurisdictions. As a result of Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64 (1964), actual malice had to be proven by the prosecution beyond a reasonable doubt in criminal libel cases.

Because of its closeness to sedition, criminal libel has not found favor in American courts. It reached its high-water mark in 1952 when the United States Supreme Court decided Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U.S. 250 (1952).

Beauharnais, a hater who circulated pamphlets designed to pit white against black, was convicted under a 1949 Illinois criminal libel law, a law that would reappear in the Skokie cases twenty-five years later. The law made it a crime to exhibit in any public place any publication which "portrays depravity, criminality, unchastity, or lack of virtue of a class of citizens, or any race, color, creed or religion."

Its constitutionality was upheld in a 5-4 decision in which Justice Felix Frankfurter for the Court said no to the question, Is speech devoted to racial hatred so high on the scale of constitutional values that it cannot be abridged by lawmakers?

Frankfurter argued that the importance of protecting groups from harassment and vilification was so important that it justified some limitation on free speech. Furthermore, the Court had held in Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568 (1942) that "fighting words"—those which by their very utterance inspire violence or tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace—are not constitutionally protected; such expression forms no essential part of the exposition of ideas and has slight social value.

Black and Douglas in dissent contended that free speech is too important a part of the democratic commitment to be sacrificed to the comfort and protection of any single social group. And they advanced a shoe-on-the-other-foot argument: tomorrow, under a criminal libel law, advocacy of rejection of the Ku Klux Klan might be declared illegal.

This confrontation between free speech and social equality remains an interesting one. Which value do we risk? Do some of us need protection from the wrath of the bigot?<sup>59</sup>

Beauharnais has neither been followed nor reversed, but its minority opinions would seem to have carried the day. The fear that criminal libel laws would eventually suppress unpopular expression has prevailed.

For example, a labor organizer was sentenced to six months and fined $3,000 under Kentucky's common law of criminal libel for printing a pamphlet in support of striking miners and defamatory of law enforcement officials and a newspaper publisher.

On appeal, Justice Douglas, writing for the Court, said "that to make an offense of conduct which is 'calculated to create disturbances of the peace' leaves wide open the standard of responsibility. It involves calculations as to the boiling point of a particular person or a particular group, not an appraisal of the nature of the comments per se. This kind of criminal libel 'makes a man a criminal simply because his neighbors have no self-control and cannot refrain from violence.'"<sup>60</sup>

It has been suggested that bad motives should never be assumed where public speech is concerned, and rather than limit discussion about minority groups, we should facilitate discussion by minority groups.<sup>61</sup>

The coup de grâce for criminal libel in the United States may have come when the once notorious District Attorney Jim Garrison took it upon himself to criticize eight New Orleans judges.

GARRISON v. STATE OF LOUISIANA

379 U.S. 64, 85 S.Ct. 209, 3 L.Ed.2d 125 (1964).

Justice BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

Appellant is the District Attorney of Orleans Parish, Louisiana. During a dispute with the eight judges of the Criminal District Court of the Parish, he held a press conference at which he issued a statement disparaging their judicial conduct. As a result, he was tried without a jury before a judge from another parish and convicted of criminal defamation under the Louisiana Criminal Defamation Statute. * * * The principal charges alleged to be defamatory were his attribution of a large backlog of pending criminal cases to the inefficiency, laziness, and excessive vacations of the judges, and his accusation that, by refusing to authorize disbursements to cover the expenses of undercover investigations of vice in New Orleans, the judges had hampered his efforts to enforce the vice laws. In impugning their motives, he said:

"The judges have now made it eloquently clear where their sympathies lie in regard to aggressive vice investigations by refusing to authorize use of the DA's funds to pay for the cost of closing down the Canal Street clip joints.

"* * * This raises interesting questions about the racketeer influences on our eight vacation-minded judges."

The Supreme Court of Louisiana affirmed the conviction. * * * The trial

59. David Riesman in Democracy and Defamation: Control of Group Libel, 42 Columbia L.Rev. 727 (1942) relates how the Nazis used group defamation to purge their opposition, set up Jewish scapegoats, and prepare the way for the Holocaust.

60. Ashton v. Kentucky, 384 U.S. 195 (1966).

61. Beth, Group Libel and Free Speech, 39 Minn.L.Rev. 167 (1955).

court and the State Supreme Court both rejected appellant's contention that the statute unconstitutionally abridged his freedom of expression. * * *

* * * At the outset, we must decide whether, in view of the differing history and purposes of criminal libel, the New York Times rule also limits state power to impose criminal sanctions for criticism of the official conduct of public officials. We hold that it does.

Where criticism of public officials is concerned, we see no merit in the argument that criminal libel statutes serve interests distinct from those secured by civil libel laws, and therefore, should not be subject to the same limitations. * * * At common law, truth was no defense to criminal libel. Although the victim of a true but defamatory publication might not have been unjustly damaged in reputation by the libel, the speaker was still punishable since the remedy was designed to avert the possibility that the utterance would provoke an enraged victim to a breach of peace. * * * [P]reference for the civil remedy, which enabled the frustrated victim to trade chivalrous satisfaction for damages, had substantially eroded the breach of the peace justification for criminal libel laws. In fact, in earlier, more violent, times, the civil remedy had virtually pre-empted the field of defamation; except as a weapon against seditious libel, the criminal prosecution fell into virtual desuetude. Changing mores and the virtual disappearance of criminal libel prosecutions lend support to the observation that " * * * under modern conditions, when the rule of law is generally accepted as a substitute for private physical measures, it can hardly be urged that the maintenance of peace requires a criminal prosecution for private defamation."

* * * In any event, where the criticism is of public officials and their conduct of public business, the interest in private reputation is overborne by the larger public interest, secured by the Constitution, in the dissemination of truth.

We held in New York Times that a public official might be allowed the civil remedy only if he establishes that the utterance was false and that it was made with knowledge of its falsity or in reckless disregard of whether it was false or true. The reasons which led us so to hold in New York Times apply with no less force merely because the remedy is criminal. The constitutional guarantees of freedom of expression compel application of the same standard to the criminal remedy. Truth may not be the subject of either civil or criminal sanctions where discussion of public affairs is concerned. And since " * * * erroneous statement is inevitable in free debate, and * * * it must be protected if the freedoms of expression are to have the 'breathing space' that they 'need * * * to survive' * * *," only those false statements made with the high degree of awareness of their probable falsity demanded by New York Times may be the subject of either civil or criminal sanctions. [Emphasis added.] For speech concerning public affairs is more than self-expression; it is the essence of self-government.

The use of calculated falsehood, however, would put a different cast on the constitutional question. Although honest utterance, even if inaccurate, may further the fruitful exercise of the right of free speech, it does not follow that the lie, knowingly and deliberately published about a public official, should enjoy a like immunity. At the time the First Amendment was adopted, as today, there were those unscrupulous enough and skillful enough to use the deliberate or reckless falsehood as an effective political tool to unseat the public servant or even topple an administration. * * * That speech is used as a tool for political ends does not automatically bring it under the protective mantle of the Constitution. For the use of the known lie as a tool is at once at odds with the premises of democratic government and with the orderly manner in which economic, social, or political change is to be effected. Calculated falsehood falls into that class of utterances which "are no essential part of any exposition of ideas, and are of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality." * * * Hence the knowingly false statement and the false statement made with reckless disregard of the truth, do not enjoy constitutional protection.

We do not think, however, that appellant's statement may be considered as one constituting only a purely private defamation. The accusation concerned the judges' conduct of the business of the Criminal District Court. Of course, any criticism of the manner in which a public official performs his duties will tend to affect his private, as well as his public, reputation. The New York Times rule is not rendered inapplicable merely because an official's private reputation, as well as his public reputation, is harmed. The public-official rule protects the paramount public interest in a free flow of information to the people concerning public officials, their servants. To this end, anything which might touch on an official's fitness for office is relevant. [Emphasis added.] Few personal attributes are more germane to fitness for office than dishonesty, malfeasance, or improper motivation, even though these characteristics may also affect the official's private character. * *

Applying the principles of the New York Times case, we hold that the Louisiana statute, as authoritatively interpreted by the Supreme Court of Louisiana, incorporates constitutionally invalid standards in the context of criticism of the official conduct of public officials. For contrary to the New York Times rule, which absolutely prohibits punishment of truthful criticism, the statute directs punishment for true statements made with "actual malice." * * * The statute is also unconstitutional as interpreted to cover false statements against public officials. The New York Times standard forbids the punishment of false statements, unless made with knowledge of their falsity or in reckless disregard of whether they are true or false. But the Louisiana statute punishes false statements without regard to that test if made with ill-will; even if ill-will is not established, a false statement concerning public officials can be punished if not made in the reasonable belief of its truth. * * * The reasonable-belief standard applied by the trial judge is not the same as the reckless-disregard-of-truth standard. According to the trial court's opinion, a reasonable belief is one which "an ordinarily prudent man might be able to assign a just and fair reason for"; the suggestion is that under this test the immunity from criminal responsibility in the absence of ill-will disappears on proof that the exercise of ordinary care would have revealed that the statement was false. The test which we laid down in New York Times is not keyed to ordinary care; defeasance of the privilege is conditioned, not on mere negligence, but on reckless disregard for the truth.

Reversed.

COMMENT

1. Justice Douglas in a concurring opinion rejected "actual malice" as a constitutional standard, and of criminal libel he said:

Beauharnais v. Illinois, * * * a case decided by the narrowest of margins, should be overruled as a misfit in our constitutional system and as out of line with the dictates of the First Amendment. I think it is time to face the fact that the only line drawn by the Constitution is between "speech" on the one side and conduct or overt acts on the other. The two often do blend. I have expressed the idea before: "Freedom of expression can be suppressed if, and to the extent that, it is so closely brigaded with illegal action as to be an inseparable part of it * * *."

Is this essentially the theory of freedom of expression articulated by Thomas I. Emerson in Toward a General Theory of the First Amendment (1967) and in The System of Freedom of Expression (1970)?

It should be noted that state constitutions may in some cases provide greater protection to free press than the U.S. Constitution, and the U.S. Supreme Court will be reluctant to review state court rulings based on those constitutions.

2. Having extended the New York Times rule to criminal libel, the next step in the onward march of the doctrine for the Supreme Court was to define, and by defining to expand, the term "public official."

In Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75 (1966), Justice Brennan, speaking for the Court, held "that the 'public official' designation applies at the very least to those among the hierarchy of government employees who have, or appear to the public to have, substantial responsibility for government operations * * * lest criticism of government itself be penalized." No matter that plaintiff in the case was a former supervisor of a county recreation area whose policy-making responsibilities were modest.

Within a few years, scores of unsuccessful libel plaintiffs in both state and federal courts learned that a public official could be anyone, past or present, who belonged or had belonged to, a bureaucracy. Officials and quasi officials on the periphery of power were included.<sup>62</sup>

3. There was a prophetic intimation in Justice Douglas's concurring opinion in Rosenblatt that the central question in such cases should not be who is a public official but whether a public issue is being discussed. The Court would come to that, but there was to be a prior step.

One of the fathers of the atomic bomb and a vocal pacifist, Dr. Linus Pauling, brought unsuccessful suits against the New York Daily News and William Buckley's National Review. Both had charged him with Communist and pro-Soviet sympathies. A federal court of appeals in the Daily News case upheld a district court's characterization of Pauling as a public figure, open to the same comment and criticism as a public official. Pauling v. News Syndicate Co., Inc., 335 F.2d 659 (2d Cir. 1964).

Two cases decided together, one involving a football coach and the other a retired army general, brought to fruition the public figure test and for a time provided a formula for measuring "reckless disregard of the truth."

The case of the coach began with an article entitled "The Story of a College Football Fix" in the March 23, 1963, issue of the Saturday Evening Post. The article reported a telephone conversation between Wally Butts, athletic director at the University of Georgia, and Paul Bryant, then head football coach at the University of Alabama, in which the two allegedly conspired to "fix" a football game between the two schools.

Notes had been taken on the conversation by an insurance salesman of questionable character, who, due to an electronic quirk, cut into the conversation when he picked up a telephone receiver at a pay station. Some of his notes appeared in the article, which compared this "fix" to the Chicago "Black Sox" scandal of 1919. The article went on to describe the game, the subsequent presentation of the salesman's notes to Georgia head coach, Johnny Griffith, and Butts's resignation. There was nothing subtle about the Post's charges against Butts.

Butts sued for $5 million compensatory and $5 million punitive damages. The Post tried to use truth as its defense, but the evidence contradicted its version of what had occurred. Expert witnesses supported Butts by analyzing the salesman's notes and films of the game. The jury returned a verdict of $60,000 in general damages and $3 million in punitive damages.

Soon after the trial, the New York Times decision was handed down, and the Post sought a new trial under its rules. The motion was rejected by the trial judge. He held Times inapplicable because Butts was not a "public official," and he ruled there was ample evidence of "reckless disregard" of the truth in the researching of the article. His judgment was affirmed by the United States Court of Appeals. From there the case went to the Supreme Court.

Justice Harlan who wrote the opinion for the Court focused on the public interest in the circulation of the Post and in the activities of Butts. Did Butts, therefore, qualify as a "public figure"? The opinion was a study in the problems presented by the forward motion of New York Times, and it defined a separate test for public figures.

CURTIS PUBLISHING CO. v.
BUTTS and ASSOCIATED PRESS v. WALKER

388 U.S. 130, 87 S.Ct. 1975, 18 L.Ed.2d 1094 (1967).

Justice HARLAN delivered the opinion of the Court: * * *

These similarities and differences between libel actions involving persons who are public officials and libel actions involving those circumstanced as were Butts and Walker, viewed in light of the principles of liability which are of general applicability in our society, lead us to the conclusion that libel actions of the present kind cannot be left entirely to state libel laws, unlimited by any overriding constitutional safeguard, but that the rigorous federal requirements of New York Times are not the only appropriate accommodation of the conflicting interests at stake. We consider and would hold that a "public figure" who is not a public official may also recover damages for a defamatory falsehood whose substance makes substantial danger to reputation apparent, on a showing of highly unreasonable conduct constituting an extreme departure from the standards of investigation and reporting ordinarily adhered to by responsible publishers. [Emphasis added.]

Nothing in this opinion is meant to affect the holdings in New York Times and its progeny. * * *

Having set forth the standard by which we believe the constitutionality of the damage awards in these cases must be judged, we turn now, as the Court did in New York Times, to the question whether the evidence and findings below meet that standard. * * *

The Butts jury was instructed, in considering punitive damages, to assess "the reliability, the nature of the sources of the defendant's information, its acceptance or rejection of the sources, and its care in checking upon assertions." These considerations were said to be relevant to a determination whether defendant had proceeded with "wanton and reckless indifference." In this light we consider that the jury must have decided that the investigation undertaken by the Saturday Evening Post, upon which much evidence and argument was centered, was grossly inadequate in the circumstances. * * *

This jury finding was found to be supported by the evidence by the trial judge and the majority in the Fifth Circuit. * *

The evidence showed that the Butts story was in no sense "hot news" and the editors of the magazine recognized the need for a thorough investigation of the serious charges. Elementary precautions were, nevertheless, ignored. The Saturday Evening Post knew that Burnett had been placed on probation in connection with bad check charges, but proceeded to publish the story on the basis of his affidavit without substantial independent support. Burnett's notes were not even viewed by any of the magazine's personnel prior to publication. John Carmichael who was supposed to have been with Burnett when the phone call was overheard was not interviewed. No attempt was made to screen the films of the game to see if Burnett's information was accurate, and no attempt was made to find out whether Alabama had adjusted its plans after the alleged divulgence of information.

The Post writer assigned to the story was not a football expert and no attempt was made to check the story with someone knowledgeable in the sport. At trial such experts indicated that the information in the Burnett notes was either such that it would be evident to any opposing coach from game films regularly exchanged or valueless. Those assisting the Post writer in his investigation were already deeply involved in another libel action, based on a different article, brought against Curtis Publishing Co. by the Alabama coach and unlikely to be the source of a complete and objective investigation. The Saturday Evening Post was anxious to change its image by instituting a policy of "sophisticated muckraking," and the pressure to produce a successful exposé might have induced a stretching of standards. In short, the evidence is ample to support a finding of highly unreasonable conduct constituting an extreme departure from the standards of investigation and reporting ordinarily adhered to by responsible publishers.

COMMENT

Chief Justice Earl Warren concurred in the result but objected to the Court's making a distinction between "public official" and "public figure." Consistent with their absolutist rejection of libel actions against the press, Justices Black and Douglas dissented in Butts but concurred in the result in Walker.

But four members of the Court—Harlan, Clark, Fortas, and Stewart—adopted a new standard, albeit a shaky one, for public figures. It would come to be known as the prudent publisher test, and it would reappear in Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc. in modified form (this text, p. 228).

The Walker case did not divide the Court as did Butts. General Edwin Walker was clearly an actor in the tumultuous events surrounding the entry of James Meredith into the University of Mississippi. An Associated Press report stated that Walker, who was present on the campus, had taken command of the violent crowd and had personally led a charge against federal marshals. It also described Walker as encouraging rioters to use violence and providing them technical advice on combating the effects of tear gas.

Walker was a private citizen at the time of the riot but, since his resignation from the army, had become a political activist. There was little evidence relating to the preparation of the news dispatch. It was clear, however, that Van Savell, the reporter, was actually present during the events he described and had communicated them almost immediately to the Associated Press office in Atlanta.

Walker sought to collect millions in a chain suit against newspapers and broadcasting stations which had carried the AP reports. The present case began in Texas when a trial court awarded Walker $500,000 in general damages and $300,000 in exemplary or punitive damages. The trial judge, finding no actual malice to support the punitive damages, entered a final judgment of $500,000. The Texas Court of Civil Appeals, agreeing that the defense of fair comment did not apply because the press reports constituted "statements of fact," affirmed the judgment of the trial court. The Texas Supreme Court declined to review the case, and the case went up to the United States Supreme Court. Associated Press v. Walker, 388 U.S. 130 (1967).

Certainly Walker was a public figure, said the Court, for he had cast his personality into the whirlpool of an important public controversy. Moreover, "in contrast to the Butts article, the dispatch which concerns us in Walker was news which required immediate dissemination. The Associated Press received the information from a correspondent who was present at the scene of the events and gave every indication of being trustworthy and competent. His dispatches in this instance, with one minor exception, were internally consistent and would not have seemed unreasonable to one familiar with General Walker's prior publicized statements on the underlying controversy. Considering the necessity for rapid dissemination, nothing in this series of events gives the slightest hint of a severe departure from accepted publishing standards. We therefore conclude that General Walker should not be entitled to damages from the Associated Press." [Emphasis added.]

3. A further attempt to define "reckless disregard" generated language which has persisted in court opinions. The case is St. Amant v. Thompson, 390 U.S. 727 (1968), and it involved defamatory charges made during the heat of a political campaign.

There Justice Byron White for the Court pointed out that "the defendant in a defamation action brought by a public official cannot * * * automatically insure a favorable verdict by testifying that he published with a belief that the statements were true. The finder of fact must determine whether the publication was indeed made in good faith. Professions of good faith will be unlikely to prove persuasive, for example, where a story is fabricated by the defendant, is the product of his imagination, or is based wholly on an unverified anonymous telephone call. Nor will they be likely to prevail when the publisher's allegations are so inherently improbable that only a reckless man would have put them in circulation. Likewise, recklessness may be found where there are obvious reasons to doubt the veracity of the informant or the accuracy of his reports."

Justice White went on to say that "reckless conduct is not measured by whether a reasonably prudent man would have published, or would have investigated before publishing. There must be sufficient evidence to permit the conclusion that the defendant in fact entertained serious doubts as to the truth of his publication." [Emphasis added.]

"The occupation of public officeholder," said Justice Abe Fortas in an acerbic dissent, "does not forfeit one's membership in the human race."

4. Public official-public figure designations were to do yeoman service for the press in this period.

The Ocala (Fla.) Star-Banner may have come close to the outer limits of permissible comment when it confused a mayor who was a candidate for the office of county tax assessor with his brother and charged falsely that he had been indicted for perjury in a civil rights suit.

A new editor, who had never heard of the mayor's brother, changed the first name when a reporter phoned in the story. A jury awarded the mayor $22,000, but a precise application of the New York Times rule of knowing falsehood or reckless disregard of the truth had not been made and the judgment was reversed. Ocala Star-Banner Co. v. Damron, 401 U.S. 295 (1971).

A deputy chief of detectives sued Time magazine when it implied in a story about a Civil Rights Commission report that the police officer was guilty of brutality. Although the news magazine had confused a complainant's testimony with the independent findings of the Commission itself, the Supreme Court ruled that in the circumstances of the case the magazine had not engaged in a "falsification" sufficient in itself to sustain a jury finding of "actual malice."

"The author of the Time article," said Justice Potter Stewart for the Court, "testified in substance, that the context of the report of the * * * incident indicated to him that the Commission believed that the incident had occurred as described. He therefore denied that he had falsified the report when he omitted the word 'alleged.' The Time researcher, who had read the newspaper stories about the incident and two reports from a Time reporter in Chicago, as well as the accounts of [the deputy chief's] earlier career, had even more reason to suppose that the Commission took the charges to be true. * * *

"These considerations apply with even greater force to the situation where the alleged libel consists in the claimed misinterpretation of the gist of a lengthy government document. Where the document reported on is so ambiguous as this one was, it is hard to imagine a test of 'truth' that would not put the publisher virtually at the mercy of the unguided discretion of a jury." [Emphasis added.] Time, Inc. v. Pape, 401 U.S. 279 (1971).

5. These examples are not meant to suggest that a libel case couldn't be won by a plaintiff in the period following New York Times v. Sullivan.

As far back as 1964, a Kentucky court had disallowed application of the New York Times rule where it appeared that the published attack was not on the "official" conduct of a policeman.<sup>71</sup> And an Illinois appeals court would not accept the contention that a society columnist's remarks about the marital affairs of a prominent industrial family were privileged because the plaintiffs were "public" people.<sup>72</sup> The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania would not permit application of the rule when a defendant admitted that he knew his defamatory comments were false.<sup>73</sup>

Senator Barry Goldwater, the most notable plaintiff of the period, won a $75,000 judgment against Ralph Ginzburg, publisher of Fact magazine. Ginzburg had attempted to put together a "psychobiography" on Goldwater so as to alert the American people to what he perceived to be the potential danger of his presidency. Facts and comments on Goldwater were carefully selected to support Ginzburg's assumptions, including responses from more than 2,000 psychiatrists who had received a manifestly "loaded" questionnaire. The simplistic conclusion from all of this was that Goldwater was mentally ill—his "infantile fantasies of revenge and dreams of total annihilation of his adversaries," his "paralyzing, deep-seated, irrational fear," his "fantasy of a final conflagration" which Ginzburg compared with the "death-fantasy of another paranoiac woven in Berchtesgaden and realized in a Berlin bunker."

At trial Ginzburg was unable to identify a single source for his statements. Nor could he document, in any medical sense, his reports that Goldwater had suffered two nervous breakdowns.

In upholding the judgment, a federal court of appeals relied on the "hot news" premise of the Butts and Walker cases and the less stringent actual malice definition of St. Amant. Goldwater v. Ginzburg, 414 F.2d 324 (2d Cir. 1969).

There were those, nevertheless, who wondered how a candidate for the nation's highest office could argue that any part of his private life, particularly his psyche, be immune from public comment, no matter how willfully distorted and inaccurate.

In dissenting vigorously to a denial of certiorari, Justice Black, joined by Justice Douglas, agreed.

"This suit," wrote Black, "was brought by a man who was then the nominee of his party for the [p]residency of the United States. In our times, the person who holds that high office has an almost unbounded power for good or evil. The public has an unqualified right to have the character and fitness of anyone who aspires to the [p]residency held up for the closest scrutiny. Extravagant, reckless statements and even claims which may not be true seem to me an inevitable and perhaps essential part of the process by which the voting public informs itself of the qualities of a man who would be [p]resident. The decisions of the [d]istrict [c]ourt and the [c]ourt of [a]ppeals in this case can only have the effect of dampening political debate by making fearful and timid those who should under our Constitution feel totally free openly to criticize Presidential candidates. * * *

"Another reason for the particular offensiveness of this case is that the damages awarded Senator Goldwater were, except for $1.00, wholly punitive. Goldwater neither pleaded nor proved any special damages and the jury's verdict of $1.00 nominal compensatory damages establishes that he suffered little if any actual harm. * * * It is bad enough when the First Amendment is violated to compensate a person who has actually suffered a provable injury as a result of libelous statements; it is incomprehensible that a person who has suffered no provable harm can recover libel damages imposed solely to punish a defendant who has exercised his First Amendment rights.

"I would grant certiorari and reverse the [c]ourt of [a]ppeals summarily." Ginzburg v. Goldwater, 396 U.S. 1049 (1970).

In 1970 an equally divided Indiana Supreme Court affirmed a libel judgment in favor of a former sheriff who had been falsely and, said the court, maliciously accused by a newspaper of intimidating a grand jury witness and of being an accessory after the fact of murder as a result of a beating in a jail cell. The newspaper, said the court, recklessly failed to check known sources of information and thereby gave evidence of its own doubts as to the truth of the libelous publication.<sup>74</sup>

A physician, a drugstore manager, and a restaurant owner won libel awards when a radio station, which invited the public to call in on an "open-mike" program and used no delay device to edit out defamatory statements, implied the illicit sale and distribution of narcotics. The station was liable, said the court, even though it had no actual knowledge of the falsity of the statements made by an unidentified caller. Liability, however, did not include the unsuspecting sponsor of the program.<sup>75</sup>

A Doctrine Stretched To its Limits: The Public Issue Test

1. Justice Douglas's notion that any matter of legitimate public interest, that is, any public issue, should be the standard for application of the Times doctrine was reminiscent of philosopher Alexander Meiklejohn's premise that the people of the United States are both the governors and the governed, and therefore "those activities of thought and communication by which we 'govern' must be free from interference."<sup>76</sup> Speech having social importance, whether of a political nature or not, must be free, said Meiklejohn, not because persons "desire to speak," but because people "need to hear."

That constitutional doctrine was strengthened in 1968 when the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, noting the escalation from public official to public figure to public issue in applications of the Times doctrine, ruled against a medical laboratory which had brought a trade libel suit against CBS for a network program exposing faulty laboratory testing and the lack of federal supervision. In part the court said:

If some analogy were to be looked for here, in caution against an uncertain extension of First Amendment immunity being made, this aspect would exist sufficiently in the elements of the field in which United Labs was engaged being, from the nature and extent of its capacity to affect health, as naturally entitled to public gaze and interest, and as inherently subject to right of public information and discussion. * * *

It is, of course, not possible to say just how far the Court will continue to carry such extensions. But unless all other areas, not merely those of legitimate general interest but also those affecting personal concern to the public, are to be artificially ignored, we are not able to see how the path upon which the Court has been moving can be regarded as having reached an end. United Medical Laboratories, Inc. v. CBS, Inc., 404 F.2d 706, 710, 711 (9th Cir. 1968), cert. den. 394 U.S. 921 (1969).

There was still room for expansion. The Supreme Court held in 1970 that the term "blackmail," when used in characterizing the negotiating position of a real estate developer, was not slander when spoken in the heated public meetings of a city council and not actionable libel when subsequently reported accurately in newspaper articles.

75. Snowden v. Pearl River Broadcasting Corp., 251 So.2d 405 (La.1971). But see Adams v. Frontier Broadcasting Co., 555 P.2d 556 (Wyo.1976) in which a state supreme court ruled that a radio station's failure to use a tape delay system, resulting in defamation concerning a public figure, did not demonstrate "reckless disregard" within the meaning of New York Times since a delay system would reduce "uninhibited, robust, and wide-open" public debate.

The plaintiff in the case had entered into agreements with the city for zoning exemptions in the past and was again seeking such favors to expedite the construction of high density housing units. At the same time, the city was trying to obtain from the plaintiff land for the purpose of building a school.

In addition, the trial judge's instructions to the jury, reflecting confusion in his mind as to what the Supreme Court had meant by "actual malice" in earlier cases, was considered by Justice Stewart to be an "error of constitutional magnitude." A trial court judgment against the newspaper was reversed. Greenbelt Co-op Publishing Association v. Bresler, 398 U.S. 6 (1970).

2. Final extension of the New York Times doctrine—and it would prove the breaking point—came in 1971 when a badly divided Court upheld a court of appeals reversal of a $275,000 trial court judgment in favor of a magazine distributor. Rosenbloom had been called a "smut distributor" and "girlie-book peddler" in a radio news report, although he was subsequently acquitted of criminal obscenity charges.

ROSENBLUM v. METROMEDIA

403 U.S. 29. 91 S.Ct. 1811. 29 L.Ed.2d 296 (1971).

Justice BRENNAN announced the judgment of the Court and an opinion in which The Chief Justice and Justice Blackmun join.

* * * The instant case presents the question whether the New York Times' knowing or reckless falsity standard applies in a state civil libel action brought not by a "public official" or a "public figure" but by a private individual for a defamatory falsehood uttered in a news broadcast by a radio station about the individual's involvement in an event of public or general interest. * * *

* * *

Petitioner concedes that the police campaign to enforce the obscenity laws was an issue of public interest, and, therefore, that the constitutional guarantees for freedom of speech and press imposed limits upon Pennsylvania's power to apply its libel laws to compel respondent to compensate him in damages for the alleged defamatory falsehoods broadcast about his involvement. As noted, the narrow question he raises is whether, because he is not a "public official" or a "public figure" but a private individual, those limits required that he prove that the falsehoods resulted from a failure of respondent to exercise reasonable care, or required that he prove that the falsehoods were broadcast with knowledge of their falsity or with reckless disregard of whether they were false or not. That question must be answered against the background of the functions of the constitutional guarantees for freedom of expression.

Self-governance in the United States presupposes far more than knowledge and debate about the strictly official activities of various levels of government. The commitment of the country to the institution of private property, protected by the Due Process and Just Compensation Clauses in the Constitution, places in private hands vast areas of economic and social power that vitally affect the nature and quality of life in the Nation. Our efforts to live and work together in a free society not completely dominated by governmental regulation necessarily encompass far more than politics in a narrow sense. * * *

Although the limitations upon civil libel actions, first held in New York Times to be required by the First Amendment, were applied in that case in the context of defamatory falsehoods about the official conduct of a public official, later decisions have disclosed the artificiality, in terms of the public's interest, of a simple distinction between "public" and "private" individuals or institutions. * * *

Moreover, the constitutional protection was not intended to be limited to matters bearing broadly on issues of responsible government. "[T]he Founders * * * felt that a free press would advance 'truth, science, morality, and arts in general' as well as responsible government." * * *

If a matter is a subject of public or general interest, it cannot suddenly become less so merely because a private individual is involved, or because in some sense the individual did not "voluntarily" choose to become involved. The public's primary interest is in the event; the public focus is on the conduct of the participant and the content, effect, and significance of the conduct, not the participant's prior anonymity or notoriety. [Emphasis added.] The present case illustrates the point. The community has a vital interest in the proper enforcement of its criminal laws, particularly in an area such as obscenity where a number of highly important values are potentially in conflict: the public has an interest both in seeing that the criminal law is adequately enforced and in assuring that the law is not used unconstitutionally to suppress free expression. Whether the person involved is a famous large scale magazine distributor or a "private" businessman running a corner newsstand has no relevance in ascertaining whether the public has an interest in the issue. We honor the commitment to robust debate on public issues, which is embodied in the First Amendment, by extending constitutional protection to all discussion and communication involving matters of public or general concern, without regard to whether the persons involved are famous or anonymous.

* * * Drawing a distinction between "public" and "private" figures makes no sense in terms of the First Amendment guarantees. The New York Times standard was applied to libel of a public official or public figure to give effect to the Amendment's function to encourage ventilation of public issues, not because the public official has any less interest in protecting his reputation than an individual in private life. While the argument that public figures need less protection because they can command media attention to counter criticism may be true for some very prominent people, even then it is the rare case where the denial overtakes the original charge. Denials, retractions, and corrections are not "hot" news, and rarely receive the prominence of the original story. When the public official or public figure is a minor functionary, or has left the position which put him in the public eye, see Rosenblatt v. Baer, the argument loses all of its force. In the vast majority of libels involving public officials or public figures, the ability to respond through the media will depend on the same complex factor on which the ability of a private individual depends: the unpredictable event of the media's continuing interest in the story. Thus the unproven, and highly improbable, generalization that an as yet undefined class of "public figures" involved in matters of public concern will be better able to respond through the media than private individuals also involved in such matters seems too insubstantial a reed on which to rest a constitutional distinction. Furthermore, in First Amendment terms, the cure seems far worse than the disease. If the States fear that private citizens will not be able to respond adequately to publicity involving them, the solution lies in the direction of ensuring their ability to respond, rather than in stifling public discussion of matters of public concern.<sup>15</sup>

Further reflection over the years since New York Times was decided persuades us that the view of the "public official" or "public figure" as assuming the risk of defamation by voluntarily thrusting himself into the public eye bears little relationship either to the values protected by the First Amendment or to the nature of our society. We have recognized that "[e]xposure of the self to others in varying degrees is a concomitant of life in a civilized community." Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374, 388 (1967). Voluntarily or not, we are all "public" men to some degree. Conversely, some aspects of the lives of even the most public men fall outside the area of matters of public or general concern. * * * Thus, the idea that certain "public" figures have voluntarily exposed their entire lives to public inspection, while private individuals have kept theirs carefully shrouded from public view is, at best, a legal fiction. In any event, such a distinction could easily produce the paradoxical result of dampening discussion of issues of public or general concern because they happen to involve private citizens while extending constitutional encouragement to discussion of aspects of the lives of "public figures" which are not in the area of public or general concern.

We are aware that the press has, on occasion, grossly abused the freedom it is given by the Constitution. All must deplore such excesses. In an ideal world, the responsibility of the press would match the freedom and public trust given it. But from the earliest days of our history, this free society, dependent as it is for its survival upon a vigorous free press, has tolerated some abuse. * * * We thus hold that a libel action, as here, by a private individual against a licensed radio station for a defamatory falsehood in a newscast relating to his involvement in an event of public or general concern may be sustained only upon clear and convincing proof that the defamatory falsehood was published with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not. * * *

Petitioner argues finally that WIP's failure to communicate with him to learn his side of the case and to obtain a copy of the magazine for examination, sufficed to support a verdict under the Times standard. But our "cases are clear that reckless conduct is not measured by whether a reasonably prudent man would have published, or would have investigated before publishing. [Emphasis added.] There must be sufficient evidence to permit the conclusion that the defendant in fact entertained serious doubts as to the truth of his publication." St. Amant v. Thompson, 390 U.S., at 731. Respondent here relied on information supplied by police officials. Following petitioner's complaint about the accuracy of the broadcasts, WIP checked its last report with the judge who presided in the case. While we may assume that 15. Some States have adopted retraction statutes or right of reply statutes. See Donnelly, The Right of Reply: An Alternative to an Action for Libel, 34 Va.L.Rev. 367 (1948); Note, Vindication of the Reputation of a Public Official, 80 Harv.L.Rev. 1730 (1967). Cf. Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969).

One writer, in arguing that the First Amendment itself should be read to guarantee a right of access to the media not limited to a right to respond to defamatory falsehoods, has suggested several ways the law might encourage public discussion. Barron, Access to the Press—A New First Amendment Right, 80 Harv.L.Rev. 1641, 1666-1678 (1967). [See also, Barron, Freedom of the Press for whom? 1973.] It is important to recognize that the private individual often desires press exposure either for himself, his ideas, or his causes. Constitutional adjudication must take into account the individual's interest in access to the press as well as the individual's interest in preserving his reputation, even though libel actions by their nature encourage a narrow view of the individual's interest since they focus only on situations where the individual has been harmed by undesired press attention. A constitutional rule that deters the press from covering the ideas or activities of the private individual thus conceives the individual's interest too narrowly.

the District Court correctly held to be defamatory respondent's characterizations of petitioner's business as "the smut literature racket," and of those engaged in it as "girlie-book peddlers," there is no evidence in the record to support a conclusion that respondent "in fact entertained serious doubts as to the truth" of its reports.

Affirmed.

COMMENT

1. In retrospect it was to be Justice Harlan's dissenting opinion in Rosenbloom v. Metromedia which would undo the public issue standard.

"It is * * * my judgment," said Harlan, "that the reasonable care standard adequately serves those First Amendment values that must inform the definition of actionable libel and that those special considerations that made even this standard an insufficiently precise technique when applied to plaintiffs who are 'public officials' or 'public figures' do not obtain where the litigant is a purely private individual."

Justice Thurgood Marshall, joined by Justice Stewart in dissent, framed propositions which were also to reappear in Gertz. Agreeing with Harlan, he said that the plurality's doctrine would threaten society's interest in protecting private individuals from being thrust into the public eye by the distorting light of defamation.

But beyond that he saw a formidable danger in punitive and presumed damages, and so a proposal:

The threats to society's interest in freedom of the press that are involved in punitive and presumed damages can largely be eliminated by restricting the award of damages to proven, actual injuries. The jury's wide ranging discretion will largely be eliminated since the award will be based on essentially objective, discernible factors. * * * [S]elf-censorship resulting from the fear of large judgments themselves would be reduced. At the same time society's interest in protecting individuals from defamation will still be fostered.

2. In the interim the press enjoyed a respite from libel laws. For a time, organized crime constituted the largest category of cases in which a Rosenbloom standard was applied.<sup>77</sup> Of other categories only a few less obvious examples will be cited: the size of an estate left by a church elder;<sup>78</sup> the practice of credit bureaus;<sup>79</sup> the instant minister racket;<sup>80</sup> attendance of a bishop at the night club performance of a singer in his church choir;<sup>81</sup> the quality of a restaurant's food;<sup>82</sup> competence of a trucking firm's president;<sup>83</sup> and the behavior and appearance of American youth living in a cave in Crete.<sup>84</sup>

Yet even under Rosenbloom a suit could be won if the plaintiff could demonstrate actual malice. In 1972 a federal district court declared that once a publisher has undertaken an investigation, he should not be permitted to ignore with impunity the fruits of that investigation.

Here the late Washington Star had either ignored or overlooked information it had gathered which refuted earlier allega-

In a telephone conversation with an editor, the CIA director had emphatically denied any such connection. The story was published anyway.

There was evidence, said the court, that the publisher entertained serious doubts as to the truth of his report and had engaged in the selective reporting of facts. Original jury awards of $418,800 to the Foundation and $100,000 to its director in compensatory damages were said to be excessive and reduced to $50,000 and $10,000 respectively.

The breadth of application of Justice Brennan's test in Rosenbloom was Meiklejohnian. The test itself was not. Rosenbloom was Brennan's watershed in libel as Ginzburg (see this text, p. 746) had been in obscenity. The Court was ready for Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc.

THE PRESENT STATE OF LIBEL: GERTZ AND BEYOND

1. By removing libel from its ancestral home in tort law and putting it under the protection of the Constitution, New York Times v. Sullivan was truly a landmark case. Simply put, the Court had decided that in the interests of a vigorous social dialogue public officials would have to surrender their sensitivity to "vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp" verbal assaults. But the Court left an opening to remedy injury to reputation. If the public official could with convincing clarity<sup>85</sup> prove actual malice, that is, that the statement was published with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not a libel suit could still be pursued and won. The major burden of proof, however, was now on the public-person plaintiff, and libel would be governed by a national, First Amendment-based standard of fault. Reviewing courts would make an independent examination of the record to assure that the plaintiff had satisfied the constitutional standard.

Much was made of New York Times I, as it would be called, to distinguish it from the Pentagon Papers case of 1971. Harry Kalven, Jr. saw it as laying to rest for all time sedition or libel of government—"an impossible notion for a democracy."<sup>86</sup> And Kalven reported Meiklejohn as exclaiming that the ruling was "an occasion for dancing in the streets."

Justices Black, Douglas, and Goldberg, however, had serious reservations, and Black, in a concurring opinion, said of New York Times: "The requirement that malice be proved provides at best an evanescent protection for the right critically to discuss public affairs and does not measure up to the sturdy safeguard embodied in the First Amendment."

85. "Convincing clarity" is a standard of evidence which falls somewhere between "preponderance of evidence" and "beyond reasonable doubt," the latter the test in criminal cases. Under the standard, proof must be strong, positive, free from doubt, clear, precise, unmistakable, proof that persuades. State court applications of the Gertz standard of negligence to private plaintiffs suggest that the "preponderance of evidence" burden of proof will now be sufficient. This is also suggested in the Restatement of Torts (Second) § 580B, Comment i (Tent.Draft No. 21, April 5, 1975). The three standards are discussed by the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court in Callahan v. Westinghouse Broadcasting Co. Inc., 2 Med.L.Rptr. 2226, 363 N.E.2d 240 (1977).

86. Kalven, The New York Times Case: A Note on the Central Meaning of the First Amendment, 1964 Sup.Ct.Rev. 205.

First Amendment theorist Thomas Emerson rejected the ruling for failing to take into account the value of even intentional falsehood in forcing people to defend, justify, and rethink their positions. Emerson referred to Brennan's actual malice test as a "relapse to the two level theory [the idea that certain forms of speech are exempt from First Amendment protection]," and he added:

[S]uper-refined attempts to separate statements of fact from opinions, to winnow truth out of a mass of conflicting evidence * * * to probe into intents, motives and purposes—all these do not fit into the dynamics of a system of freedom of expression * * *. The health and vitality of the system depend more upon untrammelled freedom of discussion, in which all citizens contend vigorously, than in judicial attempts to establish the motives of participants.<sup>87</sup>

Perennial concern is that because of New York Times fewer people will choose to participate in public affairs as officeholders. This is based partly on the assumption that public persons have no superior access to publicity,<sup>88</sup> an assumption of doubtful validity.

2. In the decade following New York Times, the Court stretched the application of its actual malice rule to public figures in Butts and Walker and finally, in the 1971 Rosenbloom case, to private persons caught up in matters of public interest, even though involuntarily.

"We honor the commitment to robust debate on public issues," said Justice Brennan in his plurality opinion for the Rosenbloom Court, "* * *" by extending constitutional protection to all discussion and communication involving matters of public or general concern, without regard to whether the persons involved are famous or anonymous."

But the Court was bitterly fragmented on the question of how far the First Amendment ought to go in protecting libel. Dissenting Justice John Marshall Harlan, because he preferred a less severe proof than actual malice for private persons in pursuit of libel damages, was to have the last word. But for three years the press enjoyed a near immunity to libel laws. Whatever was published was, at least by an editor's definition, a matter of public interest and therefore subject to the actual malice test.

3. Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc. swung the pendulum back, not all the way to the position of strict liability but to a point of recognizing the private person in libel law. The onward rush of New York Times had ended.

The family of a youth shot by a policeman had retained Elmer Gertz, a nationally known attorney and self-defined public person, to represent them in a civil suit for damages against the policeman. The policeman had already been convicted of second-degree murder. Meanwhile, the editor of the John Birch Society magazine American Opinion saw as his patriotic duty the publication of an article discrediting Gertz by identifying him with a "conspiracy" to undermine law enforcement in order to effect a Communist takeover of the United States.<sup>89</sup>

In order to heap opprobrium upon Gertz, the article stated falsely that he had a criminal record, that he had planned the 1968 Chicago demonstrations, and that he was a Leninist and Communist-frontier.

What he was in fact was one of Chicago's best-known lawyers, a legal expert on libel, censorship, civil rights, free speech, the death penalty, and housing. He was also the author of books, pamphlets, magazine articles, book reviews, and radio plays; a professor of law; a civil rights leader; and a founder and member of countless organizations ranging from the Civil War Roundtable to the Henry Miller Literary Society.

Hardly a private person, Gertz was instrumental in writing a new Illinois constitution, having been elected to the post. He was a dedicated theater buff and literary dilettante. He founded the George Bernard Shaw Society. In 1931 he wrote his first book on Frank Harris, the renegade literary-libertine. He won a parole for Nathan Leopold and a death sentence commutation for Jack Ruby.

Poet and historian Carl Sandburg once said that "Elmer Gertz fears no dragons." Probably true. More likely, though, he knew his libel law and had clearly discerned the divided nature of the Court in Rosenbloom and the significant changes in its membership since 1971.

Gertz sued American Opinion and a sympathetic jury awarded him $50,000. A federal district court disallowed the award, agreeing with the magazine that the public issue rule of Rosenbloom protected it against that kind of judgment. The court of appeals affirmed, and Gertz sought review in the Supreme Court.

In an imprecise but significant opinion by Justice Lewis Powell the Supreme Court reversed, declaring the very public Mr. Gertz to be a private person in the circumstances of the case. The Court pointed out that Gertz, unknown to the jury, was simply a lawyer serving a client. On the assumption that private persons don't have the same access to the media that public officials and public figures have—although it was doubtful that this was true of Elmer Gertz—the Court essentially rejected the public issue rule of Rosenbloom and held that henceforth purely private or nonpublic persons, to succeed as plaintiffs in a libel suit, need only show negligence on the part of the defendant, a much lighter burden than actual malice.

The Court said a lot more, however, and not all of it unfavorable to the press. No longer was it enough for a plaintiff to be falsely defamed (the traditional libel per se where falsity, malice, and damages are presumed). There now must be a showing of negligence for, said Powell, there can be "no liability without fault." And the separate states would be allowed "substantial latitude" in determining the standard of care required of publishers.

Moreover, to discourage damages which may be destructive of unpopular ideas and of the press itself, private-person plaintiffs, said Powell, would have to come all the way up to the actual malice standard to claim punitive damages, which too often in the past had been out of all proportion to the harm inflicted by publication. Awards, then, in private person suits would henceforth be restricted to actual damages for demonstrated injury, whether personal humiliation, mental anguish, or whatever. (Note how Powell's notion of actual damages appears to subsume what we referred to earlier as compensatory or general damages.) A jury would assess injury on the basis of relevant testimony. In addition, there would be no punishment for opinions, no matter how pernicious. Under the First Amendment, said the Court, there is no such thing as a false idea. Facts and opinion would be distinguished whenever possible. Gertz governs the present law of libel. The plaintiff in April 1981 was awarded $100,000 in compensatory and $300,000 in punitive damages, and that result was affirmed by the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals on June 16, 1982 (Gertz v. Welch, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1769, 680 F.2d 527 [7th Cir. 1982].) Gertz had proven actual malice to the satisfaction of the district court jury, although there was some disagreement between trial and appeals courts as to whether quotations from public documents of a time past required such proof. More than a decade of litigation finally ended in early 1983 when the Supreme Court declined to review the seventh circuit holding.

WELCH, INC.

418 U.S. 323, 94 S.Ct. 2997, 41 L.Ed.2d 789 (1974).

Justice POWELL delivered the opinion of the Court:

The principal issue in this case is whether a newspaper or broadcaster that publishes defamatory falsehoods about an individual who is neither a public official nor a public figure may claim a constitutional privilege against liability for the injury inflicted by those statements. The Court considered this question on the rather different set of facts presented in Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, Inc., 403 U.S. 29 * * * (1971). Rosenbloom, a distributor of nudist magazines, was arrested for selling allegedly obscene material while making a delivery to a retail dealer. The police obtained a warrant and seized his entire inventory of 3,000 books and magazines. He sought and obtained an injunction prohibiting further police interference with his business. He then sued a local radio station for failing to note in two of its newscasts that the 3,000 items seized were only "reportedly" or "allegedly" obscene and for broadcasting references to "the smut literature racket" and to "girlie-book peddlers" in its coverage of the court proceeding for injunctive relief. He obtained a judgment against the radio station, but the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit held the New York Times privilege applicable to the broadcast and reversed. 415 F.2d 892 (1969).

This Court affirmed the decision below, but no majority could agree on a controlling rationale. The eight Justices who participated in Rosenbloom announced their views in five separate opinions, none of which commanded more than three votes. The several statements not only reveal disagreement about the appropriate result in that case, they also reflect divergent traditions of thought about the general problem of reconciling the law of defamation with the First Amendment. One approach has been to extend the New York Times test to an expanding variety of situations. Another has been to vary the level of constitutional privilege for defamatory falsehood with the status of the person defamed. And a third view would grant to the press and broadcast media absolute immunity from liability for defamation. To place our holding in the proper context, we preface our discussion of this case with a review of the several Rosenbloom opinions and their antecedents.

In affirming the trial court's judgment in the instant case, the Court of Appeals relied on Justice Brennan's conclusion for the Rosenbloom plurality that "all discussion and communication involving matters of public or general concern," warrant the protection from liability for defamation accorded by the rule originally enunciated in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 * * * (1964). There this Court defined a constitutional privilege intended to free criticism of public officials from the restraints imposed by the common law of defamation. The Times ran a political advertisement endorsing civil rights demonstrations by black students in Alabama and impliedly condemning the performance of local law-enforcement officials. A police commissioner established in state court that certain misstatements in the advertisement referred to him and that they constituted libel per se under Alabama law. This showing left the Times with the single defense of truth, for under Alabama law neither good faith nor reasonable care would protect the newspaper from liability. This Court concluded that a "rule compelling the critic of official conduct to guarantee the truth of all his factual assertions" would deter protected speech, and announced the constitutional privilege designed to counter that effect:

"The constitutional guarantees require, we think, a federal rule that prohibits a public official from recovering damages for a defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless he proves that the statement was made with 'actual malice'—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not."<sup>6</sup>

Three years after New York Times, a majority of the Court agreed to extend the constitutional privilege to defamatory criticism of "public figures." This extension was announced in Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts and its companion, Associated Press v. Walker, 388 U.S. 130 * * * (1967). The first case involved the Saturday Evening Post's charge that Coach Wally Butts of the University of Georgia had conspired with Coach "Bear" Bryant of the University of Alabama to fix a football game between their respective schools. Walker involved an erroneous Associated Press account of former Major General Edwin Walker's participation in a University of Mississippi campus riot. Because Butts was paid by a private alumni association and Walker had resigned from the Army, neither could be classified as a "public official" under New York Times. Although Justice Harlan announced the result in both cases, a majority of the Court agreed with Mr. Chief Justice Warren's conclusion that the New York Times test should apply to criticism of "public figures" as well as "public officials."<sup>7</sup> The

6. New York Times and later cases explicated the meaning of the new standard. In New York Times the Court held that under the circumstances the newspaper's failure to check the accuracy of the advertisement against news stories in its own files did not establish reckless disregard for the truth. 376 U.S., at 287-288, * *. In St. Amant v. Thompson, 390 U.S. 727, 731 * * * (1968), the Court equated reckless disregard of the truth with subjective awareness of probable falsity: "There must be sufficient evidence to permit the conclusion that the defendant in fact entertained serious doubts as to the truth of his publication." In Beckley Newspapers Corp. v. Hanks, 389 U.S. 81 * * * (1967), the Court emphasized the distinction between the New York Times test of knowledge of falsity or reckless disregard of the truth and "actual malice" in the traditional sense of ill-will. Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64, * * * (1964), made plain that the new standard applied to criminal libel laws as well as to civil actions and that it governed criticism directed at "anything which might touch on an official's fitness for office." Id., at 77 85 S.Ct., at 217. Finally, in Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75, 85 * * * (1966), the Court stated that "the 'public official' designation applies at the very least to those among the hierarchy of government employees who have, or appear to the public to have, substantial responsibility for or control over the conduct of governmental affairs."

In Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374 * * * (1967), this text, p. 318, the Court applied the New York Times standard to actions under an unusual state statute. The statute did not create a cause of action for libel. Rather, it provided a remedy for unwanted publicity. Although the law allowed recovery of damages for harm caused by exposure to public attention rather than by factual inaccuracies, it recognized truth as a complete defense. Thus, nondefamatory factual errors could render a publisher liable for something akin to invasion of privacy. The Court ruled that the defendant in such an action could invoke the New York Times privilege regardless of the fame or anonymity of the plaintiff. Speaking for the Court, Justice Brennan declared that this holding was not an extension of New York Times but rather a parallel line of reasoning applying that standard to this discrete context: "This is neither a libel action by a private individual nor a statutory action by a public official. Therefore, although the First Amendment principles pronounced in New York Times guide our conclusion, we reach that conclusion only by applying these principles in this discrete context. It therefore serves no purpose to distinguish the facts here from those in New York Times. Were this a libel action, the distinction which has been suggested between the relative opportunities of the public official and the private individual to rebut defamatory charges might be germane. And the additional state interest in the protection of the individual against damage to his reputation would be involved. * * *"

7. Professor Kalven once introduced a discussion of these cases with the apt heading, "You Can't Tell the Players without a Score Card." Kalven, The Reasonable Man and the First Amendment: Hill, Butts, and Walker, 1967 Sup.Ct.Rev. 267, 275. Only three other Justices joined Justice Harlan's analysis of the issues involved. In his concurring opinion, Chief Justice Warren stated the principle for which these cases stand—that

Court extended the constitutional privilege announced in that case to protect defamatory criticism of nonpublic persons who "are nevertheless intimately involved in the resolution of important public questions or, by reason of their fame, shape events in areas of concern to society at large."

In his opinion for the plurality in Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, Inc., Justice Brennan took the New York Times privilege one step further. He concluded that its protection should extend to defamatory falsehoods relating to private persons if the statements concerned matters of general or public interest. He abjured the suggested distinction between public officials and public figures on the one hand and private individuals on the other. He focused instead on society's interest in learning about certain issues: "If a matter is a subject of public or general interest, it cannot suddenly become less so merely because a private individual is involved, or because in some sense the individual did not 'voluntarily' choose to become involved." Thus, under the plurality opinion, a private citizen involuntarily associated with a matter of general interest has no recourse for injury to his reputation unless he can satisfy the demanding requirements of the New York Times test.

Two Members of the Court concurred in the result in Rosenbloom but departed from the reasoning of the plurality. Justice Black restated his view, long shared by Justice Douglas, that the First Amendment cloaks the news media with an absolute and indefeasible immunity from liability for defamation. Justice White concurred on a narrower ground. He concluded that "the First Amendment gives the press and the broadcast media a privilege to report and comment upon the official actions of public servants in full detail, with no requirement that the reputation or the privacy of an individual involved in or affected by the official action be spared from public view." He therefore declined to reach the broader questions addressed by the other Justices.

Justice Harlan dissented. Although he had joined the opinion of the Court in New York Times, in Curtis Publishing Co. he had contested the extension of the privilege to public figures. There he had argued that a public figure who held no governmental office should be allowed to recover damages for defamation "on a showing of highly unreasonable conduct constituting an extreme departure from the standards of investigation and reporting ordinarily adhered to by responsible publishers." In his Curtis Publishing Co. opinion Justice Harlan had distinguished New York Times primarily on the ground that defamation actions by public officials "lay close to seditious libel. * * *" Recovery of damages by one who held no public office, however, could not "be viewed as a vindication of governmental policy." Additionally, he had intimated that, because most public officials enjoyed absolute immunity from liability for their own defamatory utterances under Barr v. Matteo, 360 U.S. 564 * * * (1959), they lacked a strong claim to the protection of the courts.

In Rosenbloom Justice Harlan modified these views. He acquiesced in the application of the privilege to defamation of public figures but argued that a different rule should obtain where defamatory falsehood harmed a private individual. He noted that a private person has less likelihood "of securing access to channels of communication sufficient to rebut falsehoods concerning him" than do public officials and public figures, and has not voluntarily placed himself in the public spotlight. Justice Harlan concluded that the States could constitutionally allow private individuals to recover damages for defamation on the basis of any standard of care except liability without fault.

the New York Times test reaches both public figures and public officials. Justice Brennan and Justice White agreed with the Chief Justice on that question. Justice Black and Justice Douglas reiterated their view that publishers should have an absolute immunity from liability for defamation, but they acquiesced in the Chief Justice's reasoning in order to enable a majority of the Justices to agree on the question of the appropriate constitutional privilege for defamation of public figures.

Justice Marshall dissented in Rosenbloom in an opinion joined by Justice Stewart. He thought that the plurality's "public or general interest" test for determining the applicability of the New York Times privilege would involve the courts in the dangerous business of deciding "what information is relevant to self-government." He also contended that the plurality's position inadequately served "society's interest in protecting private individuals from being thrust into the public eye by the distorting light of defamation." Justice Marshall therefore reached the conclusion, also reached by Justice Harlan, that the States should be "essentially free to continue the evolution of the common law of defamation and to articulate whatever fault standard best suits the State's need," so long as the States did not impose liability without fault. The principal point of disagreement among the three dissenters concerned punitive damages. Whereas Justice Harlan thought that the States could allow punitive damages in amounts bearing "a reasonable and purposeful relationship to the actual harm done * * *." Justice Marshall concluded that the size and unpredictability of jury awards of exemplary damages unnecessarily exacerbated the problems of media self-censorship and that such damages should therefore be forbidden.

We begin with the common ground. Under the First Amendment there is no such thing as a false idea. However pernicious an opinion may seem, we depend for its correction not on the conscience of judges and juries but on the competition of other ideas. But there is no constitutional value in false statements of fact. Neither the intentional lie nor the careless error materially advances society's interest in "uninhibited, robust, and wide-open" debate on public issues. New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S., at 270 * * *. They belong to that category of utterances which "are no essential part of any exposition of ideas, and are of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality." Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568, 572 * * * (1942). [Emphasis added.]

Although the erroneous statement of fact is not worthy of constitutional protection, it is nevertheless inevitable in free debate. As James Madison pointed out in the Report on the Virginia Resolutions of 1798: "Some degree of abuse is inseparable from the proper use of every thing; and in no instance is this more true than in that of the press." 4 J. Elliot, Debates on the Federal Constitution of 1787, p. 571 (1876). And punishment of error runs the risk of inducing a cautious and restrictive exercise of the constitutionally guaranteed freedoms of speech and press. Our decisions recognize that a rule of strict liability that compels a publisher or broadcaster to guarantee the accuracy of his factual assertions may lead to intolerable self-censorship. Allowing the media to avoid liability only by proving the truth of all injurious statements does not accord adequate protection to First Amendment liberties. As the Court stated in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, "Allowance of the defense of truth with the burden of proving it on the defendant, does not mean that only false speech will be deterred." The First Amendment requires that we protect some falsehood in order to protect speech that matters. [Emphasis added.]

The need to avoid self-censorship by the news media is, however, not the only societal value at issue. If it were, this Court would have embraced long ago the view that publishers and broadcasters enjoy an unconditional and indefeasible immunity from liability for defamation. Such a rule would, indeed, obviate the fear that the prospect of civil liability for injurious falsehood might dissuade a timorous press from the effective exercise of First Amendment freedoms. Yet absolute protection for the communications media requires a total sacrifice of the competing value served by the law of defamation.

The legitimate state interest underlying the law of libel is the compensation of individuals for the harm inflicted on them by defamatory falsehood. We would not lightly require the State to abandon this purpose, for, as Justice Stewart has reminded us, the individual's right to the protection of his own good name "reflects no more than our basic concept of the essential dignity and worth of every human being—a concept at the root of any decent system of ordered liberty. The protection of private personality, like the protection of life itself, is left primarily to the individual States under the Ninth and Tenth Amendments. But this does not mean that the right is entitled to any less recognition by this Court as a basic of our constitutional system." Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75, 92 (1966) (concurring opinion).

The New York Times standard defines the level of constitutional protection appropriate to the context of defamation of a public person. Those who, by reason of the notoriety of their achievements or the vigor and success with which they seek the public's attention, are properly classed as public figures and those who hold governmental office may recover for injury to reputation only on clear and convincing proof that the defamatory falsehood was made with knowledge of its falsity or with reckless disregard for the truth. This standard administers an extremely powerful antidote to the inducement to media self-censorship of the common-law rule of strict liability for libel and slander. And it exacts a correspondingly high price from the victims of defamatory falsehood. Plainly many deserving plaintiffs, including some intentionally subjected to injury, will be unable to surmount the barrier of the New York Times test. Despite this substantial abridgment of the state law right to compensation for wrongful hurt to one's reputation, the Court has concluded that the protection of the New York Times privilege should be available to publishers and broadcasters of defamatory falsehood concerning public officials and public figures. We think that these decisions are correct, but we do not find their holdings justified solely by reference to the interest of the press and broadcast media in immunity from liability. Rather, we believe that the New York Times rule states an accommodation between this concern and the limited state interest present in the context of libel actions brought by public persons. For the reasons stated below, we conclude that the state interest in compensating injury to the reputation of private individuals requires that a different rule should obtain with respect to them.

* * * The first remedy of any victim of defamation is self-help—using available opportunities to contradict the lie or correct the error and thereby to minimize its adverse impact on reputation. Public officials and public figures usually enjoy significantly greater access to the channels of effective communication and hence have a more realistic opportunity to counteract false statements than private individuals normally enjoy. Private individuals are therefore more vulnerable to injury, and the state interest in protecting them is correspondingly greater.

More important than the likelihood that private individuals will lack effective opportunities for rebuttal, there is a compelling normative consideration underlying the distinction between public and private defamation plaintiffs. An individual who decides to seek governmental office must accept certain necessary consequences of that involvement in public affairs. He runs the risk of closer public scrutiny than might otherwise be the case. And society's interest in the officers of government is not strictly limited to the formal discharge of official duties. As the Court pointed out in Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S., at 77 * * *, the public's interest extends to "anything which might touch on an official's fitness for office. * * * Few personal attributes are more germane to fitness for office than dishonesty, malfeasance, or improper motivation, even though these characteristics may also affect the official's private character."

Those classed as public figures stand in a similar position. Hypothetically, it may be possible for someone to become a public figure through no purposeful action of his own, but the instances of truly involuntary public figures must be exceedingly rare. For the most part those who attain this status have assumed roles of especial prominence in the affairs of society. Some occupy positions of such persuasive power and influence that they are deemed public figures for all purposes. More commonly, those classed as public figures have thrust themselves to the forefront of particular public controversies in order to influence the resolution of the issues involved. In either event, they invite attention and comment. [Emphasis added.]

Even if the foregoing generalities do not obtain in every instance, the communications media are entitled to act on the assumption that public officials and public figures have voluntarily exposed themselves to increased risk of injury from defamatory falsehood concerning them. No such assumption is justified with respect to a private individual. He has not accepted public office or assumed an "influential role in ordering society." He has relinquished no part of his interest in the protection of his own good name, and consequently he has a more compelling call on the courts for redress of injury inflicted by defamatory falsehood. Thus, private individuals are not only more vulnerable to injury than public officials and public figures; they are also more deserving of recovery.

For these reasons we conclude that the States should retain substantial latitude in their efforts to enforce a legal remedy for defamatory falsehood injurious to the reputation of a private individual. The extension of the New York Times test proposed by the Rosenbloom plurality would abridge this legitimate state interest to a degree that we find unacceptable. And it would occasion the additional difficulty of forcing state and federal judges to decide on an ad hoc basis which publications address issues of "general or public interest" and which do not—to determine, in the words of Justice Marshall, "what information is relevant to self-government." Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, Inc., 403 U.S., at 79 * * *. We doubt the wisdom of committing this task to the conscience of judges. Nor does the Constitution require us to draw so thin a line between the drastic alternatives of the New York Times privilege and the common law of strict liability for defamatory error. The "public or general interest" test for determining the applicability of the New York Times standard to private defamation actions inadequately serves both of the competing values at stake. On the one hand, a private individual whose reputation is injured by defamatory falsehood that does concern an issue of public or general interest has no recourse unless he can meet the rigorous requirements of New York Times. This is true despite the factors that distinguish the state interest in compensating private individuals from the analogous interest involved in the context of public persons. On the other hand, a publisher or broadcaster of a defamatory error which a court deems unrelated to an issue of public or general interest may be held liable in damages even if it took every reasonable precaution to ensure the accuracy of its assertions. And liability may far exceed compensation for any actual injury to the plaintiff, for the jury may be permitted to presume damages without proof of loss and even to award punitive damages.

We hold that, so long as they do not impose liability without fault, the states may define for themselves the appropriate standard of liability for a publisher or broadcaster of defamatory falsehood injurious to a private individual. This approach provides a more equitable boundary between the competing concerns involved here. It recognizes the strength of the legitimate state interest in compensating private individuals for wrongful injury to reputation, yet shields the press and broadcast media from the rigors of strict liability for defamation. At least this conclusion obtains where, as here, the substance of the defamatory statement "makes substantial danger to reputation apparent." This phrase places in perspective the conclusion we announce today. Our inquiry would involve considerations somewhat different from those discussed above if a State purported to condition civil liability on a factual misstatement whose content did not warn a reasonably prudent editor or broadcaster of its defamatory potential. Such a case is not now before us, and we intimate no view as to its proper resolution. [Emphasis added.]

Our accommodation of the competing values at stake in defamation suits by private individuals allows the States to impose liability on the publisher or broadcaster of defamatory falsehood on a less demanding showing than that required by New York Times. This conclusion is not based on a belief that the considerations which prompted the adoption of the New York Times privilege for defamation of public officials and its extension to public figures are wholly inapplicable to the context of private individuals. Rather, we endorse this approach in recognition of the strong and legitimate state interest in compensating private individuals for injury to reputation. But this countervailing state interest extends no further than compensation for actual injury. For the reasons stated below, we hold that the States may not permit recovery of presumed or punitive damages, at least when liability is not based on a showing of knowledge of falsity or reckless disregard for the truth. [Emphasis added.]

The common law of defamation is an oddity of tort law, for it allows recovery of purportedly compensatory damages without evidence of actual loss. Under the traditional rules pertaining to actions for libel, the existence of injury is presumed from the fact of publication. Juries may award substantial sums as compensation for supposed damage to reputation without any proof that such harm actually occurred. The largely uncontrolled discretion of juries to award damages where there is no loss unnecessarily compounds the potential of any system of liability for defamatory falsehood to inhibit the vigorous exercise of First Amendment freedoms. Additionally, the doctrine of presumed damages invites juries to punish unpopular opinion rather than to compensate individuals for injury sustained by the publication of a false fact. More to the point, the States have no substantial interest in securing for plaintiffs such as this petitioner gratuitous awards of money damages far in excess of any actual injury.

We would not, of course, invalidate state law simply because we doubt its wisdom, but here we are attempting to reconcile state law with a competing interest grounded in the constitutional command of the First Amendment. It is therefore appropriate to require that state remedies for defamatory falsehood reach no farther than is necessary to protect the legitimate interest involved. It is necessary to restrict defamation plaintiffs who do not prove knowledge of falsity or reckless disregard for the truth to compensation for actual injury. We need not define "actual injury," as trial courts have wide experience in framing appropriate jury instructions in tort actions. Suffice it to say that actual injury is not limited to out-of-pocket loss. Indeed, the more customary types of actual harm inflicted by defamatory falsehood include impairment of reputation and standing in the community, personal humiliation, and mental anguish and suffering. Of course, juries must be limited by appropriate instructions, and all awards must be supported by competent evidence concerning the injury, although there need be no evidence which assigns an actual dollar value to the injury. [Emphasis added.]

We also find no justification for allowing awards of punitive damages against publishers and broadcasters held liable under state-defined standards of liability for defamation. In most jurisdictions jury discretion over the amounts awarded is limited only by the gentle rule that they not be excessive. Consequently, juries assess punitive damages in wholly unpredictable amounts bearing no necessary relation to the actual harm caused. And they remain free to use their discretion selectively to punish expressions of unpopular views. Like the doctrine of presumed damages, jury discretion to award punitive damages unnecessarily exacerbates the danger of media self-censorship, but, unlike the former rule, punitive damages are wholly irrelevant to the state interest that justifies a negligence standard for private defamation actions. They are not compensation for injury. Instead, they are private fines levied by civil juries to punish reprehensible conduct and to deter its future occurrence. In short, the private defamation plaintiff who establishes liability under a less demanding standard than that stated by New York Times may recover only such damages as are sufficient to compensate him for actual injury. [Emphasis added.]

Notwithstanding our refusal to extend the New York Times privilege to defamation of private individuals, respondent contends that we should affirm the judgment below on the ground that petitioner is either a public official or a public figure. There is little basis for the former assertion. Several years prior to the present incident, petitioner had served briefly on housing committees appointed by the mayor of Chicago, but at the time of publication he had never held any remunerative governmental position. Respondent admits this but argues that petitioner's appearance at the coroner's inquest rendered him a "de facto public official." Our cases recognized no such concept. Respondent's suggestion would sweep all lawyers under the New York Times rule as officers of the court and distort the plain meaning of the "public official" category beyond all recognition. We decline to follow it.

Respondent's characterization of petitioner as a public figure raises a different question. That designation may rest on either of two alternative bases. In some instances an individual may achieve such pervasive fame or notoriety that he becomes a public figure for all purposes and in all contexts. More commonly, an individual voluntarily injects himself or is drawn into a particular public controversy and thereby becomes a public figure for a limited range of issues. In either case such persons assume special prominence in the resolution of public questions. [Emphasis added.]

Petitioner has long been active in community and professional affairs. He has served as an officer of local civic groups and of various professional organizations, and he has published several books and articles on legal subjects. Although petitioner was consequently well known in some circles, he had achieved no general fame or notoriety in the community. None of the prospective jurors called at the trial had ever heard of petitioner prior to this litigation, and respondent offered no proof that this response was atypical of the local population. We would not lightly assume that a citizen's participation in community and professional affairs rendered him a public figure for all purposes. Absent clear evidence of general fame or notoriety in the community, and pervasive involvement in the affairs of society, an individual should not be deemed a public personality for all aspects of his life. It is preferable to reduce the public-figure question to a more meaningful context by looking to the nature and extent of an individual's participation in the particular controversy giving rise to the defamation. [Emphasis added.]

In this context it is plain that petitioner was not a public figure. He played a minimal role at the coroner's inquest, and his participation related solely to his representation of a private client. He took no part in the criminal prosecution of Officer Nuccio. Moreover, he never discussed either the criminal or civil litigation with the press and was never quoted as having done so. He plainly did not thrust himself into the vortex of this public issue, nor did he engage the public's attention in an attempt to influence its outcome. We are persuaded that the trial court did not err in refusing to characterize petitioner as a public figure for the purpose of this litigation.

We therefore conclude that the New York Times standard is inapplicable to this case and that the trial court erred in entering judgment for respondent. Because the jury was allowed to impose liability without fault and was permitted to presume damages without proof of injury, a new trial is necessary. We reverse and remand for further proceedings in accord with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

Reversed and remanded.

COMMENT

1. Justices Brennan and White wrote strong dissenting opinions for different reasons. Brennan, who authored the landmark opinion for the Court in New York Times v. Sullivan and the opinion for the plurality in Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, did not wish to abandon the actual malice standard of those cases. In his view anyone involved in events of public or general interest should have to show knowing or reckless falsity to win a libel judgment.

Matters of public interest, said Brennan, reiterating his opinion for the Court in Rosenbloom, do not "suddenly become less so merely because a private individual is involved, or because in some sense the individual did not 'voluntarily' choose to become involved."

Brennan had used his opinion for the Court in the landmark privacy case, Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374 (1967), this text, p. 318, to argue for a "public issue" or "newsworthiness" test in all libel and privacy cases. Anything less, for example a "reasonable care" standard is "elusive," said Brennan, and would saddle the press with "the intolerable burden of guessing how a jury might assess the reasonableness of steps taken by it to verify the accuracy of every reference to a name, picture or portrait." The result would be self-censorship.

At the other end of the spectrum, Justice White would have moved the Court back to the common law standard of "strict liability." That is, one who publishes a statement that later turns out to be inaccurate can never be "without fault," for one is not compelled to circulate a falsehood.

White, joined by Chief Justice Warren Burger, objected to the scrapping of state libel laws in favor of a newly announced First Amendment mandate which required private plaintiffs to prove actual injury to their reputations and culpability on the part of the defendant. People would now be powerless to protect their reputations. "No longer," said White, "will the plaintiff be able to rest his case with proof of a libel defamatory on its face or proof of a slander historically actionable per se." And it was the apparent demise of libel per se through a discarding of "history and precedent" that White lamented.

It was also the "severe invasion of the prerogatives of the [s]tates" that exercised Justice White. Whatever the merits of his long and vigorous dissent, he may have been partially correct when he suggested that "judges and juries who must live by these rules [the Gertz rules] will find them * * * incomprehensible."

It is for this reason that we now turn to a second Supreme Court case which attempted to clarify the meaning of Gertz.

The case is Time, Inc. v. Firestone, and it involves the failure of a series of reporters to understand the precise meaning of a court order in a celebrated divorce action. The result was a brief report in Time magazine which declared erroneously that Russell Firestone, the scion of a rubber company, was granted a divorce from his wife, Mary Alice Firestone, on grounds of adultery. When the magazine refused to retract, Mrs. Firestone sued and was awarded a $100,000 libel judgment by a Florida Circuit Court. The judgment was later affirmed by the Supreme Court of Florida, and Time appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

TIME, INC. v. FIRESTONE

Justice REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

Respondent, Mary Alice Firestone, married Russell Firestone, the scion of one of America's wealthier industrial families, in 1961. In 1964, they separated, and respondent filed a complaint for separate maintenance in the Circuit Court of Palm Beach County, Fla. Her husband counter-claimed for divorce on grounds of extreme cruelty and adultery. After a lengthy trial the Circuit Court issued a judgment granting the divorce requested by respondent's husband. In relevant part the court's final judgment read:

This cause came on for final hearing before the court upon the plaintiff wife's second amended complaint for separate maintenance (alimony unconnected with the causes of divorce), the defendant husband's answer and counterclaim for divorce on grounds of extreme cruelty and adultery, and the wife's answer thereto setting up certain affirmative defenses. * * *

* * *

According to certain testimony in behalf of the defendant, extramarital escapades of the plaintiff were bizarre and of an amatory nature which would have made Dr. Freud's hair curl. Other testimony, in plaintiff's behalf, would indicate that defendant was guilty of bounding from one bedpartner to another with the erotic zest of a satyr. The court is inclined to discount much of this testimony as unreliable. Nevertheless, it is the conclusion and finding of the court that neither party is domesticated, within the meaning of that term as used by the Supreme Court of Florida. * * *

* * *

In the present case, it is abundantly clear from the evidence of marital discord that neither of the parties has shown the least susceptibility to domestication, and that the marriage should be dissolved.

* * *

"The premises considered, it is thereupon

"ORDERED AND ADJUDGED as follows:

1. That the equities in this cause are with the defendant; that defendant's counterclaim for divorce be and the same is hereby granted, and the bonds of matrimony which have heretofore existed between the parties are hereby forever dissolved.

4. That the defendant shall pay unto the plaintiff the sum of $3,000 per month as alimony beginning January 1, 1968, and a like sum on the first day of each and every month thereafter until the death or remarriage of the plaintiff.

Time's editorial staff, headquartered in New York, was alerted to the fact that a judgment had been rendered in the Firestone divorce proceeding by a wire service report and an account in a New York newspaper. The staff subsequently received further information regarding the Florida decision from Time's Miami bureau chief and from a "stringer" working on a special assignment basis in the Palm Beach area. On the basis of these four sources, Time's staff composed the following item, which appeared in the magazine's "Milestones" section the following week:

DIVORCED. By Russell A. Firestone, Jr., 41, heir to the tire fortune; Mary Alice Sullivan Firestone, 32, his third wife; a onetime Palm Beach school-teacher; on grounds of extreme cruelty and adultery; after six years of marriage, one son; in West Palm Beach, Fla. The 17-month intermittent trial produced enough testimony of extramarital adventures on both sides, said the judge, "to make Dr. Freud's hair curl."

* * * Petitioner advances several contentions as to why the judgment is contrary to decisions of this Court holding that the First and Fourteenth Amendments of the United States Constitution limit the authority of state courts to impose liability for damages based on defamation.

Petitioner initially contends that it cannot be liable for publishing any falsehood defaming respondent unless it is established that the publication was made "with actual malice," as that term is defined in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 * * * (1964). Petitioner advances two arguments in support of this contention: that respondent is a "public figure" within this Court's decisions extending New York Times to defamation suits brought by such individuals. See, e.g., Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130, * * * (1967); and that the Time item constituted a report of a judicial proceeding, a class of subject matter which petitioner claims deserves the protection of the "actual malice" standard even if the story is proven to be defamatorily false or inaccurate. We reject both arguments.

In Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., we have recently further defined the meaning of "public figure" for the purposes of the First and Fourteenth Amendments:

For the most part those who attain this status have assumed roles of especial prominence in the affairs of society. Some occupy positions of such persuasive power and influence that they are deemed public figures for all purposes. More commonly, those classed as public figures have thrust themselves to the forefront of particular public controversies in order to influence the resolution of the issues involved.

Respondent did not assume any role of especial prominence in the affairs of society, other than perhaps Palm Beach society, and she did not thrust herself to the forefront of any particular public controversy in order to influence the resolution of the issues involved in it. [Emphasis added.]

Petitioner contends that because the Firestone divorce was characterized by the Florida Supreme Court as a "cause célèbre," it must have been a public controversy and respondent must be considered a public figure. But in so doing petitioner seeks to equate "public controversy" with all controversies of interest to the public. Were we to accept this reasoning, we would reinstate the doctrine advanced in the plurality opinion in Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, Inc., 403 U.S. 29 * * * (1971), which concluded that the New York Times privilege should be extended to falsehoods defamatory of private persons whenever the statements concern matters of general or public interest. In Gertz, however, the Court repudiated this position, stating that "extension of the New York Times test proposed by the Rosenbloom plurality would abridge [a] legitimate state interest to a degree that we find unacceptable."

Dissolution of a marriage through judicial proceedings is not the sort of "public controversy" referred to in Gertz, even though the marital difficulties of extremely wealthy individuals may be of interest to some portion of the reading public. Nor did respondent freely choose to publicize issues as to the propriety of her married life. She was compelled to go to court by the state in order to obtain legal release from the bonds of matrimony. *We have said that in such an instance "[r]esort to the judicial process * * * is no more voluntary in a realistic sense than that of the defendant called upon to defend his interests in court."* Her actions, both in instituting the litigation and in its conduct, were quite different from those of General Walker in Curtis Publishing Co. She assumed no "special prominence in the resolution of public questions." We hold respondent was not a "public figure" for the purpose of determining the constitutional protection afforded petitioner's report of the factual and legal basis for her divorce. [Emphasis added.]

For similar reasons we likewise reject petitioner's claim for automatic extension of the New York Times privilege to all reports of judicial proceedings. It is argued that information concerning proceedings in our Nation's courts may have such importance to all citizens as to justify extending special First Amendment protection to the press when reporting on such events. We have recently accepted a significantly more confined version of this argument by holding that the Constitution precludes States from imposing civil liability based upon the publication of truthful information contained in official court records open to public inspection. Cox Broadcasting Corp. v. Cohn, 420 U.S. 469 * * * (1975).

Petitioner would have us extend the reasoning of Cox Broadcasting to safeguard even inaccurate and false statements, at least where "actual malice" has not been established. But its argument proves too much. It may be that all reports of judicial proceedings contain some informational value implicating the First Amendment, but recognizing this is little different from labeling all judicial proceedings matters of "public or general interest," as that phrase was used by the plurality in Rosenbloom. Whatever their general validity, use of such subject matter classifications to determine the extent of constitutional protection afforded defamatory falsehoods may too often result in an improper balance between the competing interests in this area. It was our recognition and rejection of this weakness in the Rosenbloom test which led us in Gertz to eschew a subject matter test for one focusing upon the character of the defamation plaintiff. By confining inquiry to whether a plaintiff is a public officer or a public figure who might be assumed to "have voluntarily exposed themselves to increased risk of injury from defamatory falsehoods," we sought a more appropriate accommodation between the public's interest in an uninhibited press and its equally compelling need for judicial redress of libelous utterances.

Presumptively erecting the New York Times barrier against all plaintiffs seeking to recover for injuries from defamatory falsehoods published in what are alleged to be reports of judicial proceedings would effect substantial depreciation of the individual's interest in protection from such harm, without any convincing assurance that such a sacrifice is required under the First Amendment. And in some instances such an indiscriminating approach might achieve results directly at odds with the constitutional balance intended. Indeed, the article upon which the Gertz libel action was based purported to be a report on the murder trial of a Chicago police officer. Our decision in that case should make it clear that no such blanket privilege for reports of judicial proceedings is to be found in the Constitution.

It may be argued that there is still room for application of the New York Times protections to more narrowly focused reports of what actually transpires in the courtroom. But even so narrowed, the suggested privilege is simply too broad. Imposing upon the law of private defamation the rather drastic limitations worked by New York Times cannot be justified by generalized references to the public interest in reports of judicial proceedings. The details of many, if not most, courtroom battles would add almost nothing towards advancing the uninhibited debate on public issues thought to provide principal support for the decision in New York Times. And while participants in some litigation may be legitimate "public figures," either generally or for the limited purpose of that litigation, the majority will more likely resemble respondent drawn into a public forum largely against their will in order to attempt to obtain the only redress available to them or to defend themselves against actions brought by the State or by others. There appears little reason why these individuals should substantially forfeit that degree of protection which the law of defamation would otherwise afford them simply by virtue of their being drawn into a courtroom. The public interest in accurate reports of judicial proceedings is substantially protected by Cox Broadcasting Co., supra. As to inaccurate and defamatory reports of facts, matters deserving no First Amendment protection, we think Gertz provides an adequate safeguard for the constitutionally protected interests of the press and affords it a tolerable margin for error by requiring some type of fault. [Emphasis added.]

Petitioner has urged throughout this litigation that it could not be held liable for publication of the "Milestones" item because its report of respondent's divorce was factually correct. In its view the Time article faithfully reproduced the precise meaning of the divorce judgment. But this issue was submitted to the jury under an instruction intended to implement Florida's limited privilege for accurate reports of judicial proceedings. By returning a verdict for respondent the jury necessarily found that the identity of meaning which petitioner claims does not exist even for laymen. The Supreme Court of Florida upheld this finding on appeal, rejecting petitioner's contention that its report was accurate as a matter of law. Because demonstration that an article was true would seem to preclude finding the publisher at fault, we have examined the predicate for petitioner's contention. We believe the Florida courts properly could have found the "Milestones" item to be false.

For petitioner's report to have been accurate, the divorce granted Russell Firestone must have been based on a finding by the divorce court that his wife had committed extreme cruelty towards him and that she had been guilty of adultery. This is indisputably what petitioner reported in its "Milestones" item, but it is equally indisputable that these were not the facts. Russell Firestone alleged in his counterclaim that respondent had been guilty of adultery, but the divorce court never made any such finding. Its judgment provided that Russell Firestone's "counterclaim for divorce be and the same is hereby granted," but did not specify that the basis for the judgment was either of the two grounds alleged in the counterclaim. The Supreme Court of Florida on appeal concluded that the ground actually relied upon by the divorce court was "lack of domestication of the parties," a ground not theretofore recognized by Florida law. The Supreme Court nonetheless affirmed the judgment dissolving the bonds of matrimony because the record contained sufficient evidence to establish the ground of extreme cruelty.

Petitioner may well argue that the meaning of the trial court's decree was unclear, but this does not license it to choose from among several conceivable interpretations the one most damaging to respondent. Having chosen to follow this tack, petitioner must be able to establish not merely that the item reported was a conceivable or plausible interpretation of the decree, but that the item was factually correct. We believe there is ample support for the jury's conclusion, affirmed by the Supreme Court of Florida, that this was not the case. There was, therefore, sufficient basis for imposing liability upon petitioner if the constitutional limitations we announced in Gertz have been satisfied. These are a prohibition against imposing liability without fault, and the requirement that compensatory awards "be supported by competent evidence concerning the injury."

As to the latter requirement little difficulty appears. Petitioner has argued that because respondent withdrew her claim for damages to reputation on the eve of trial, there could be no recovery consistent with Gertz. Petitioner's theory seems to be that the only compensable injury in a defamation action is that which may be done to one's reputation, and that claims not predicated upon such injury are by definition not actions for defamation. But Florida has obviously decided to permit recovery for other injuries without regard to measuring the effect the falsehood may have had upon a plaintiff's reputation. This does not transform the action into something other than an action for defamation as that term is meant in Gertz. In that opinion we made it clear that [s]tates could base awards on elements other than injury to reputation, specifically listing "personal humiliation, and mental anguish and suffering" as examples of injuries which might be compensated consistently with the Constitution upon a showing a fault. [Emphasis added.] Because respondent has decided to forgo recovery for injury to her reputation, she is not prevented from obtaining compensation for such other damages that a defamatory falsehood may have caused her.

The trial court charged, consistently with Gertz, that the jury should award respondent compensatory damages in "an amount of money that will fairly and adequately compensate her for such damages," and further cautioned that "It is only damages which are a direct and natural result of the alleged libel which may be recovered." There was competent evidence introduced to permit the jury to assess the amount of injury. Several witnesses<sup>6</sup> testified to the extent of respondent's anxiety and concern over Time inaccurately reporting that she had been found guilty of adultery, and she herself took the stand to elaborate on her fears that her young son would be adversely affected by this falsehood when he grew older. The jury decided these injuries should be compensated by an award of $100,000. We have no warrant for re-examining this determination.

6. These included respondent's minister, her attorney in the divorce proceedings, plus several friends and neighbors, one of whom was a physician and testified to having to administer a sedative to respondent in an attempt to reduce discomfort wrought by her worrying about the article. [Editorial Note: The $100,000 award was premised entirely on the injury of mental pain and anguish. All claims as to injury to reputation were withdrawn prior to trial, and no evidence concerning damage to reputation was presented at trial. Justice Brennan believed this to be in conflict with Gertz and a return to the old rule of presumed damages.]

Gertz established, however, that not only must there be evidence to support an award of compensatory damages, there must also be evidence of some fault on the part of a defendant charged with publishing defamatory material. No question of fault was submitted to the jury in this case, because under Florida law the only findings required for determination of liability were whether the article was defamatory, whether it was true, and whether the defamation, if any, caused respondent harm.

The failure to submit the question of fault to the jury does not, of itself establish noncompliance with the constitutional requirements established in Gertz, however. Nothing in the Constitution requires that assessment of fault in a civil case tried in a state court be made by a jury, nor is there any prohibition against such a finding being made in the first instance by an appellate, rather than a trial, court. The First and Fourteenth Amendments do not impose upon the States any limitations as to how, within their own judicial systems, factfinding tasks shall be allocated. If we were satisfied that one of the Florida courts which considered this case had supportably ascertained petitioner was at fault, we would be required to affirm the judgment below.

But the only alternative source of such a finding, given that the issue was not submitted to the jury, is the opinion of the Supreme Court of Florida. That opinion appears to proceed generally on the assumption that a showing of fault was not required, but then in the penultimate paragraph it recites:

Furthermore, this erroneous reporting is clear and convincing evidence of the negligence in certain segments of the news media in gathering the news. Gertz v. Welch, Inc., supra. Pursuant to Florida law in effect at the time of the divorce judgment (Section 61.08, Florida Statutes), a wife found guilty of adultery could not be awarded alimony. Since petitioner had been awarded alimony, she had not been found guilty of adultery nor had the divorce been granted on the ground of adultery. A careful examination of the final decree prior to publication would have clearly demonstrated that the divorce had been granted on the grounds of extreme cruelty, and thus the wife would have been saved the humiliation of being accused of adultery in a nationwide magazine. This is a flagrant example of "journalistic negligence." 305 So.2d, at 178.

It may be argued this is sufficient indication the court found petitioner at fault within the meaning of Gertz. Nothing in that decision or in the First or Fourteenth Amendments requires that in a libel action an appellate court treat in detail by written opinion all contentions of the parties, and if the jury or trial judge had found fault in fact, we would be quite willing to read the quoted passage as affirming that conclusion. But without some finding of fault by the judge or jury in the Circuit Court, we would have to attribute to the Supreme Court of Florida from the quoted language not merely an intention to affirm the finding of the lower court, but an intention to find such a fact in the first instance.

Even where a question of fact may have constitutional significance, we normally accord findings of state courts deference in reviewing constitutional claims here. But that deference is predicated on our belief that at some point in the state proceedings some factfinder has made a conscious determination of the existence or nonexistence of the critical fact. Here the record before us affords no basis for such a conclusion.

It may well be that petitioner's account in its "Milestones" section was the product of some fault on its part, and that the libel judgment against it was, therefore, entirely consistent with Gertz. But in the absence of a finding in some element of the state court system that there was fault, we are not inclined to canvass the record to make such a determination in the first instance. [Emphasis added.] Accordingly, the judgment of the Supreme Court of Florida is vacated and the case remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

So ordered.

COMMENT

Note that Mrs. Firestone, in spite of her social prominence and her propensity for press conferences and clipping services, was classified by the Court as a private person who was simply availing herself of the legal process. Therefore negligence, a test of fault well below the New York Times v. Sullivan standard of actual malice, was all the plaintiff was required to demonstrate. But Justice William Rehnquist, recognizing perhaps that the court order in the divorce suit was unusually subject to misinterpretation, based as it was on "a ground not thereto recognized by Florida law," held that the Gertz requirement of fault on the part of the publisher had not been addressed by either the Florida jury or the Florida courts.

Ultimately the case centered on the question of how much care the publication took in reading an admittedly ambiguous court order. Should the magazine have known that Florida law denies alimony to an adulterous wife? At least, said Rehnquist, the court cannot ignore such questions. And so the case was sent back to the trial court.

In passing, Rehnquist said that inaccurate reports taken from judicial documents are not protected from civil liability. In Cox Broadcasting Corp. v. Cohn, 420 U.S. 469 (1975), the Court did say that the Constitution precludes states from imposing liability on truthful publication based on official court records open to public inspection. There a father brought a privacy suit following a broadcast identifying his raped and murdered daughter (see this text, p. 337).

The ostensible difference between Cox and Firestone is that a privilege will extend to the press where its judicial reports are true but not when its judicial reports are false.

By requiring a consideration of the degree of negligence or fault, Gertz and Firestone sought to shield the press and broadcast media from a rule of strict liability (libel per se, where fault, damages, and injury are presumed) that could lead to intolerable self-censorship and at the same time to recognize the legitimate state interest in compensating private individuals for wrongful injury from defamatory falsehoods. The Court sought a middle ground. How well it has succeeded in protecting both these values is still a matter of much speculation.

Of the many questions not answered by Gertz and Firestone the most perplexing for the press are: how does an editor, or for that matter a lower court, decide how to distinguish between public and private persons? How can the reporter writing a story know whether the judicial records she is reading are true or false? If the publicity-seeking Mrs. Firestone was not a voluntary public figure, then who is? If the erroneous report had only been published locally, would Mrs. Firestone then have been a public figure? In other words, while not a public figure in a national arena, was she a public figure in Miami, or in Florida?

Firestone is also problematical because, borrowing from Gertz, it sets injury to reputation aside and permits a libel award based on "personal humiliation, and mental anguish and suffering." It was noted at the outset that libel changes the way other people feel and think about a person. In Firestone the Court suggested that the way you come to think about yourself may also support libel damages. Should Firestone, then, have been a privacy suit instead of a libel suit?

USING THE CONSTITUTIONAL DEFENSE: QUESTIONS TO CONSIDER

Falsity

Once it is clear that the threshold elements of libel—defamation, identification, and publication—have been or will be met by plaintiff, a prospective defendant must consider additional elements of the New York Times or constitutional defense, as elaborated in Gertz.

Both private and public-person plaintiffs in at least half the states have the burden of proving the allegedly libelous statements false, since there is no longer a presumption of falsity. The rule with respect to private persons was first stated unequivocally by the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals in Wilson v. Scripps-Howard Broadcasting Co., 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1169, 642 F.2d 371 (1981). In overturning Tennessee's strict liability rule of presuming falsity, the court used Firestone to support its claim that the plaintiff has the burden of proving falsity and "that demonstration that an article was true would seem to preclude finding the publisher at fault." Similarly in Cox Broadcasting v. Cohn (this text, p. 337), Justice Lewis Powell, concurring in the Court's opinion that public-person plaintiffs must prove the falsity of a libel with convincing clarity, noted, "It is fair to say that if the statements are true, the standard contemplated by Gertz cannot be satisfied."

Falsity, then, is an element of the fault that must be demonstrated in some states to prove publisher liability. In other states the burden remains with defendant.

State Standards of Fault

1. Adding great complexity to the tapestry of libel law was Gertz's invitation to the states to define for themselves the appropriate standard of liability for defamation concerning private persons. There would be "no liability without fault," said the Court, and application of this proposition might vary from state to state. A majority of states has adopted the negligence rule of Gertz in private-person libels. Among them are Arkansas, Arizona, California, the District of Columbia, Hawaii, Illinois, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Mississippi, New Mexico, Ohio, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Puerto Rico, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Virginia, Washington, and Wisconsin. In half the states the issue remained unsettled in 1983.

2. Those few states retaining an actual malice test for private-person plaintiffs when they are involved in matters of public interest—Alaska, Colorado, Florida, Indiana, and Michigan—suggest the sturdiness and inexorable logic of Rosenbloom's public issue test. For example, the Michigan Court of Appeals held that a nursing home owner, while neither a public official nor a public figure, was required to show that defendant newspaper and television station had published defamatory reports with actual malice "since defendants have a qualified privilege to report on 'public interest' businesses such as plaintiffs."<sup>90</sup> And a Florida appeals court said that a private plaintiff (lawyer-landlord) whose apartments and rooming houses had been criticized in print would have to show that a newspaper had acted with actual malice because the articles "concerned matters of legitimate public interest."<sup>91</sup>

In an Indiana case, plaintiff, a heating and air conditioning firm, had installed a furnace in a home three weeks before a fatal electrical fire; defendant newspaper publisher had speculated in news reports about the fire and its cause.

In upholding a summary judgment for the newspaper, the Court of Appeals of Indiana specifically drew its standard of "an issue of general and public concern" from the plurality opinion of the Supreme Court in Rosenbloom:

When a general or public interest is recognized, it becomes unimportant in terms of ascertaining whether the public has a legitimate interest in an issue or even, whether the person involved is a famous, large-scale distributor of heating and air-conditioning equipment or a 'private' businessman operating a similar enterprise in a small community. * * * The key analytic determinant in the application of constitutional protections for speech and press in libel actions by 'private' individuals must be whether the communication involved concerns an issue of general or public interest without regard to whether the individual is famous or anonymous.<sup>92</sup> [Emphasis added]

3. New York's somewhat unique private person test, somewhere between negligence and actual malice, echoes the Butts-Walker "prudent-publisher" test. A New York public school teacher sued a Utica newspaper for reporting erroneously that he was part of a trio arrested for a serious drug offense involving heroin. A trial court denied the newspaper's motion for summary judgment, but the appellate division reversed and was affirmed by the court of appeals, New York's highest court. The news report was said to fall within a sphere of legitimate public concern. In such circumstances a plaintiff may recover only if it is established by a preponderance of evidence that the publisher acted in a grossly irresponsible manner and without due consideration for standards of information gathering and dissemination ordinarily followed by responsible journalists. The offending article was written only after two authoritative sources had been consulted, and it was not published until it had been checked by at least two persons other than the writer. Chapadeau v. Utica Observer-Dispatch, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1693, 379 N.Y.S.2d 61 (1975). In Greenberg v. CBS, 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1470, 419 N.Y.S.2d 988, 997 (1979), another New York court used a "gross negligence" standard. Yet another in Karaduman v. Newsday, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2345, 435 N.Y.S.2d 556 (1980) spoke of plaintiffs having to show that an editor acted in a "grossly irresponsible manner."

4. A number of undecided states, among them Alabama, Connecticut, Georgia, Iowa, New Hampshire, and Wyoming, appear to require something less than actual malice but more than negligence for private-libel plaintiffs.

5. Chapadeau would suggest that the standard of fault to be followed is that of the profession of journalism, an industry standard, or what is "normal" publishing practice. In a few cases, notably Troman v. Wood, 340 N.E.2d 292 (Ill.1975) and Memphis Publishing Co. v. Nichols, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 1573, 569 S.W.2d 412 (Tenn.1978), courts were unwilling to allow the press to establish its standard as the norm. Where industry standards have prevailed, journalists and journalism educators are frequently asked to give expert testimony in libel cases.<sup>93</sup> For the latter group, the practice has become controversial.

6. Since the plaintiff's attorney will have to demonstrate fault beyond mere falsity, he or she will want to explore the reporter's motives for publication, the kind, quality, and number of sources,<sup>94</sup> the depth and independence of a reporter's investigation, the existence of contrary information or conflicting sources prior to publication,<sup>95</sup> and the nature of material not included in the story.

7. Normally a publication circulating throughout the country should be prepared to meet the negligence standard of Gertz. Federal courts have followed the case more strictly than state courts,<sup>96</sup> although federal courts will show deference to state libel laws.

Remember that for fault, as frequently for falsity, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff. It is this shifting of the burden from defendant to plaintiff that makes the constitutional defense so much more attractive than the common law defenses. In responding to allegations of either negligence or actual malice, think about your sources and the pains you took to check their information. A single and suspect source will not suffice. Your efforts toward accuracy may determine whether you win a summary judgment or go on to an expensive trial.

"We are not here dealing with the correctness of all of the statements made in the paragraph complained of," said the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals in approving summary judgment for a magazine. "We are concerned with the means by which (the reporter) obtained the basis for the statements and * * * the efforts he made to check the information."<sup>97</sup>

The crux of the ruling of a federal district judge in the fourth trial of a $12½ million libel suit brought against Look magazine by former San Francisco mayor Joseph Alioto is contained in a single paragraph:

Taking into consideration the nature and substance of the reports, the quality of their source, the passage of time since the original statements were said to have been made, and the complete absence of corroboration from law enforcement agencies who for several reasons would have been expected to have received some information about the meetings [allegedly between Alioto and the Cosa Nostra], the Court is compelled to conclude that there were "obvious reasons to doubt the veracity of the informant [and] the accuracy of his reports."<sup>98</sup>

The verdict of the judge was upheld on appeal.

"A failure to make a reasonable investigation into the truth of the statement is obviously a relevant factor," said the Illinois Supreme Court in discussing the negligence standard.<sup>99</sup> Look out for sources with axes to grind or a financial interest in what you publish.

In the meantime, look to your highest state court for guidance on local application of the Gertz rules.

What Is Actual Malice?

1. Since Joseph Alioto was a public person, his burden of proof was actual malice. It was on this question that three earlier juries had failed to agree. It has also been argued that " * * * actual malice is a constitutional issue to be determined initially by the trial judge on motion for summary judgment."<sup>100</sup> But what is actual malice?

Actual malice, a concept well established in common law and much discussed in America at least since passage of the Sedition Act of 1798, had long been defined as "well knowing" or "designed" falsity. In New York Times, Justice Brennan relied on the influential opinion of Judge Rousseau Burch for the Kansas Supreme Court in a 1908 case, Coleman v. MacLennan.<sup>101</sup> Although Burch's thresholds for state interference with freedom of the press are lower than today's courts would allow, he did speak of the need for a plaintiff to show actual malice where matters of public interest were involved. By 1964 and the Supreme Court's landmark ruling, at least six states and a number of legal commentators had adopted, or favored, what had evolved from the nineteenth century as a more liberal but still minority rule of public-person defamation.

A problem remains in distinguishing actual malice from common law malice. "In the context of a libel suit," said a federal district judge in Reliance Insurance Co. v. Barron's,<sup>102</sup> "'actual malice' simply does not mean ill will or spite. Rather, 'malice' must be taken to mean fraudulent, knowing publication of a falsehood or reckless disregard of falsity. And we also note that reckless does not mean grossly negligent, its common use, but rather intentional disregard. When the Supreme Court uses a word, it means what the Court wants it to mean."

Ill will, for example, a prior statement of hatred of plaintiff by defendant, may be relevant and admissible as evidence of a state of mind conducive to reckless disregard of falsity,<sup>103</sup> but it is not itself actual malice. Specific evidence does seem to be needed: fabrication, fictionalization, failure to check with available sources or with parties to your investigation, use of anonymous or unverified phone calls, obviously biased sources, or inherently improbable allegations. An Oklahoma reporter, overhearing a telephone conversation in a sheriff's office and without further checking, assumed and reported that a police officer in breaking up a fight between two boys had kidnapped one at gunpoint. The Oklahoma Supreme Court said that was reckless disregard of truth or falsity.<sup>104</sup>

Protection for defendants will be found in agreement among reputable sources as to what was said to reporters and how accurately it was recounted; by headlines that agree with the possibly defamatory portions of a story; and by prompt publication of retractions, although retractions alone are not sufficient to establish lack of malice.<sup>105</sup> With "hot" news, slight inaccuracies may not constitute actual malice.<sup>106</sup>

Actual malice may simply be negligence or common law malice raised to a higher power. And what a trial judge said about malice in 1898 may still be appropriate:

The jumble in some modern textbooks on slander and libel concerning malice, actual malice, malice in law, malice in fact, implied malice and express malice (all derived from judicial utterances, it is true), is a striking testimony of the limitations of the human mind.<sup>107</sup>

Public or Private Person?

1. Of all the questions dealt with in this section this is the most vexing and the first that has to be addressed directly and in the first instance by the reporter or editor.

Appellate courts have developed three major categories of libel plaintiff: public officials, public figures, and private persons. The distinctions are seldom clear.

Public Officials. Public officials are elected or appointed government officials, law enforcement officers, public school teachers and administrators, city, town, and municipal employees of responsibility, government attorneys, and county medical examiners. But not all public employees. And not all public school teachers. In these and other categories it would seem that to qualify as a public person a public employee must have some policy-making authority and thus some access to the media.

The Texas Supreme Court reversed a summary judgment in favor of a Laredo newspaper and remanded for trial a libel suit brought by an elected county surveyor whom the paper had implied was responsible for a flooding problem. Amid a welter of tortured distinctions the court decided that the surveyor was indeed a public official in the circumstances of the case, but that the complained of publication may not have related to his "official" conduct. Nor could his "limited participation in the controversy" and his reluctance to "engage the public's attention" make him a public figure. So the elected surveyor pursued his libel suit as a private person under Texas law.<sup>108</sup>

Without drawing any precise boundaries, Chief Justice Burger did suggest in footnote 8 in Hutchinson v. Proxmire, 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1279, 443 U.S. 111 (1979) that not all public employees are public officials. In that case the Court also held that Senator Proxmire, in making his often uninformed Golden Fleece award to a publicly funded research behavioral scientist, was not insulated by the Constitution's speech or debate clause from a libel suit based on a press release sent from his office. The speech or debate clause, Proxmire argued, gave absolute immunity to libel committed in the course of one's legislative duties or, more generally, as part of the "informing function" of the Congress. Has the Court overruled, without citing it, Barr v. Matteo (see this text, p. 207) in which it held the "utterance of a federal official to be absolutely privileged if made 'within the outer perimeter' of his duties?" Senator Proxmire retracted erroneous statements contained in his newsletter and paid Dr. Hutchinson $10,000 in a settlement. The United States Senate paid $125,000 out of public funds for Proxmire's defense.

Nor has the Court drawn boundaries between the public and private lives of public officials. Can the two be separated? What aspects of one's private life bear on one's fitness or capacity for public office? Does a stormy marriage negatively affect the decision-making capabilities of a head of state? Does a record of psychiatric treatment disqualify a person for the vice-presidency of the United States?

107. Ullrich v. New York Press Co., 50 N.Y.S. 788 (1898).

108. Foster v. Laredo Newspapers, Inc., 530 S.W.2d 611 (Tex.1976).

Does a state investment board chairman's assignments with a notorious prostitute threaten the public interest?

Public Figures. These may be divided into at least three subcategories:

Pervasive or All Purpose. Public figures of this type are the very famous, the stars of stage and screen and the sports world, the Frank Sinatras and the Mohammed Alis. Those whose positions in the public spotlight are secure.

Vortex or Limited Purpose. Public figures in this category are those who, standing in the wings or sitting in the audience may, voluntarily or involuntarily, make brief appearances on the stage of life. Here today but gone tomorrow.

Gertz defined vortex public figures as those who have "thrust themselves to the forefront of particular public controversies in order to influence the resolution of the issues involved." In Firestone the Court noted, "A person who engages in criminal conduct does not automatically become a public figure for purposes of comment on a limited range of issues relating to his conviction." To hold otherwise would create an "open season" for all who sought to defame persons convicted of crime.

In a companion case to Hutchinson—Wolston v. Reader's Digest Association, Inc., 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1273, 443 U.S. 157 (1979)—a plaintiff who twenty years earlier had pleaded guilty to criminal contempt of court charges during grand jury investigations into spy charges was said not to be a public figure. Although Wolston at a point in time past had consciously and half voluntarily chosen not to appear before a grand jury, he had long since returned to private life and had made no effort at any time to inject himself into a public controversy in order to change its course.

"A private individual," wrote Justice William Rehnquist for the Court, "is not automatically transformed into a public figure by becoming involved in or associated with a matter that attracts public attention. To accept such reasoning would in effect re-establish the doctrine advanced by the plurality opinion in Rosenbloom v. Metromedia."

An older rule—once a public figure always a public figure—was suggested by the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals in Street v. National Broadcasting Co., 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1001, 645 F.2d 1227 (6th Cir. 1981). The plaintiff, whom NBC had assumed to be dead, had been a witness forty years before in the rape prosecutions of the nine young and black Scottsboro Boys. NBC's docudrama depicted a judge setting aside a guilty verdict because he did not believe Street's testimony. The Sixth Circuit held that once a person becomes a public figure in connection with a particular public controversy, that person remains a public figure for purposes of later commentary on the same controversy. Street had given press conferences at the time of the trial. She therefore had access to the media. If she had been raped in 1931, however, her involvement in the case from that point forward could never have been a priori voluntary.

NBC chose to settle out of court before the Supreme Court could hear arguments, leaving only partly resolved the question of whether a public figure can retreat into anonymity and whether the factual accuracy of the broadcast would affect the issue of voluntariness. In other words, what effort was made by the plaintiff to attract public attention during the original episode? The key question seems to be: Can there be any such category as involuntary public figure? Can the media foist public figure status on an unwilling person? If the courts say no, are they making editorial judgments about public figures and public issues? What about potentially newsworthy people—criminals, for example—who take great pains to remain anonymous and behind the scene, or mask their involvement, but nevertheless contribute mightily to the passing parade?

In the meantime, the major question for the journalist in distinguishing public and private people is how intensively and consciously involved in the event reported was the subject of the news story? This and other questions relevant to journalistic procedures are discussed in the case that follows.

REBOZO v. WASHINGTON POST

673 F.2D 375 (5TH CIR. 1981),
CERT. DEN. 454 U.S. 964.

RONEY, Circuit Judge:

This is an appeal from a summary judgment entered for the defendant newspaper in a defamation suit. The district court found that plaintiff was a public figure and that no genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether defendant acted with actual malice. We affirm the court's finding that plaintiff is a public figure. We reverse, however, as to the decision that there was no genuine issue of material fact on the question of whether defendant acted with actual malice in publishing the newspaper article that forms the basis of this suit, and remand for further proceedings.

I. FACTS

Because the case was decided on defendant's motion for summary judgment, we must construe the record most favorably to plaintiff. Wolston v. Reader's Digest Association, Inc., 443 U.S. 157, 162 n. 5, * * (1979); Time, Inc. v. Ragano, 427 F.2d 219, 221 (5th Cir. 1970).

In June 1973 Ronald Kessler, a reporter with substantial financial and reporting experience for defendant's newspaper, The Washington Post, was assigned by his editor to prepare a series of articles on the finances of then-President Richard M. Nixon. As part of his preparation Kessler became interested in plaintiff Charles G. Rebozo because of his relationship with the former President. Rebozo had been, and continues to be, a close friend and financial adviser of the former President, and serves as chairman of the board and president of the Key Biscayne Bank in Miami.

Newsday, a Long Island, New York, newspaper in 1971 had published a series of articles about Rebozo, one of which described a Miami lawsuit involving allegations that the Key Biscayne Bank had converted 900 shares of stock belonging to E.F. Hutton & Co. Some of the stock had apparently been pledged as collateral for a loan at the Key Biscayne Bank, and was later sold when the loan was called. During the course of his investigation, Kessler reviewed the file in the case, which by that time was pending in this Court on appeal, in order to determine whether it contained any subsequent unreported developments. * * *

Among other things Kessler studied the deposition of George H. Riley, Jr., who had been retained to investigate a claim filed by E.F. Hutton with its surety, the Fidelity and Casualty Company of New York. In his deposition, Riley described a meeting he had with Rebozo in October 1968 as follows:

Q Did you tell Mr. Rebozo at the time that the stock had been stolen or was missing from E.F. Hutton & Co.?

A Yes, sir.

Q Can you recall exactly what you told him?

A As I previously stated, I advised Mr. Rebozo that I was investigating the theft of nine 100-share certificates from the vaults of E.F. Hutton & Co. in New York.

Q Did you advise him of the numbers of the certificates that you were investigating?

A Yes. And the numbers corresponded to the numbers he gave me.

It is undisputed that 300 shares of the stock were sold on November 13, 1968, although the parties differ on whether the stock was sold by the Key Biscayne Bank itself, or on Rebozo's personal account.

After Kessler read the court file in Miami and New Orleans, he called Riley on the telephone because, as Kessler described, "I wanted, somehow to get a feeling from him, at least as to whether he understood the possible significance of his testimony." Kessler recounted a portion of his telephone conversation with Riley as follows on deposition:

Q Did you specifically ask him whether his statement in the deposition concerning his conversation with Mr. Rebozo was accurate?

A No.

Q Why not?

A I attach great significance to testimony given under oath and most newspaper articles, of course, are based on statements that are not made under oath. So, when a reporter obtains statements that are made under oath, it is certainly of more significance than otherwise.

Q It would have been significant, wouldn't it Mr. Kessler, if Mr. Riley told you he had made an error or a misstatement in his sworn testimony?

A Yes.

Q You didn't think it important to find out whether he would say whether he was right or wrong in that statement?

A No.

Q You didn't want to know what he wanted to say on that issue?

[Objection omitted]

Kessler also contacted Rebozo's attorney, who told him Rebozo "flatly denies" that Riley told Rebozo during their October 1968 meeting that the stock was stolen.

The attorney followed up the conversation with a letter, repeating that Riley's testimony was false in that respect.

The question whether Rebozo personally, or the Bank, had cashed the stock was the subject of an October 6 internal memorandum from Kessler to his Post editor, Harry Rosenfeld, prompted by the telephone conversation between Kessler and Rebozo's attorney. A portion of that memorandum states:

So who cashed the stock? Neither Rebozo nor other witnesses were asked this question in the depositions. There are no other legal papers in the court file to answer the question.

But there are copies of the bills, receipts, and checks covering the sale transaction. As is clear from the attached, they all bear Rebozo's name.

* * *

The fact that Rebozo's name appears on them, and that the transactions were executed on his personal account, appear to me to be more than sufficient evidence for the purposes of an accurate and fair newspaper account of what appears in the court file that Rebozo technically and substantively cashed the stock.

Kessler and Rosenfeld discussed the content of an article Kessler had prepared on the stock transaction, and reviewed the sources of the information contained in the article.

On October 25, 1973, The Washington Post published a front-page article containing the headline, "Bebe Rebozo Said to Cash Stolen Stock," accompanying a photograph of plaintiff, and the following four paragraphs.

Charles G. (Bebe) Rebozo, President Nixon's close friend, cashed $91,500 in stolen stocks in 1968 after he was told by an insurance investigator it was stolen, the investigator's sworn statement and other records in a Miami court file indicate.

A lawyer for Rebozo conceded the investigator visited Rebozo but said Rebozo "flatly denies" the investigator told him the stock was stolen.

The $91,500 in securities represented 300 of the 900 shares of International Business Machines Corp. stock that federal prosecutors say was stolen by the Mafia in 1968 from the vaults of E.F. Hutton & Co., a New York stock brokerage firm.

The stock came into Rebozo's possession when it was offered as collateral for a loan from Rebozo's bank, Key Biscayne Bank in Florida.

The story continued for a total of 126 paragraphs, with the balance of the article appearing on pages A14 and A15 of defendant's newspaper. The "main point" of the story, according to Kessler, was contained in the "lead," or first paragraph. Farther along in paragraph number 99, the Post article quoted the passage from investigator Riley's deposition, in which Riley was questioned about whether the stock "had been stolen or was missing." [Emphasis added].

Rebozo's complaint contends the article's lead sentence is false in two respects: (1) the investigator did not tell him the stocks were stolen; and (2) the stocks were cashed by the bank, not by him. The question of the article's falsity, however, is not an issue in this appeal.

II. WAS REBOZO A PUBLIC FIGURE?

In New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 * * * (1964), the Supreme Court held that a public official cannot recover damages for defamation relating to official conduct absent a showing of "actual malice"—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not." * * * Three years later the Court held in Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130 * * * (1967), that the New York Times standard is applicable to "public figures" as well. See also Associated Press v. Walker, 388 U.S. 130 * * * (1967). The Court elucidated the applicability of New York Times to public figures, but refused to expand the protection afforded by that standard to actions brought by private persons, in Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 344-47 * * * (1974).

Application of the New York Times rule to public figures, the Court observed, is supported by two factors. First, public figures, because they "enjoy significantly greater access to the channels of effective communication and hence have a more realistic opportunity to counteract false statements than private individuals normally enjoy," are less vulnerable to injury from defamatory statements. Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. at 344, * * *; see Wolston v. Reader's Digest Association, Inc., 443 U.S. at 164, * * *. A second consideration, and one that has been given greater weight by the Court, is that public figures, the news media may assume, "have voluntarily exposed themselves to increased risk of injury from defamatory falsehood concerning them." Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. at 345, * * *. The Court went on to describe two ways in which a person may become a public figure for first amendment purposes.

For the most part those who attain this status have assumed roles of especial prominence in the affairs of society. Some occupy positions of such persuasive power and influence that they are deemed public figures for all purposes. More commonly, those classed as public figures have thrust themselves to the forefront of particular public controversies in order to influence the resolution of the issues involved.

418 U.S. at 345, * * *. See also Wolston v. Reader's Digest Association, Inc., 443 U.S. at 164, * * *; Time, Inc. v. Firestone, 424 U.S. 448, 453 * * * (1976). Thus, under the analysis suggested in Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., two types of public figures emerge: Those who are public figures for all purposes, and those who are public figures for a limited range of issues.

The district court held as a matter of law that plaintiff "had achieved such pervasive fame and notoriety as of * * * the date of publication * * * that he had become a public figure 'for all purposes and in all context'" (quoting Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. at 351 * * *.) Our review of this conclusion requires that we consider, first, whether plaintiff's purported status as a public figure is appropriate for decision on summary judgment and, second, whether the evidence considered in a light most favorable to plaintiff, shows him to be a public figure for the purposes of this litigation.

The Supreme Court has on numerous occasions, treated the public figure and public official questions as matters of law, for the trial court to decide. See, e.g., Time, Inc. v. Firestone, 424 U.S. 448 (1976) * * *; Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323 (1974) * * *; Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75 * * * (1966). This Court has observed in this same context that "where undisputed facts admit to but one conclusion, then, on motion for summary judgment, the court properly decides the issue." Rosanova v. Playboy Enterprises, Inc., 580 F.2d 859, 862 * * * (5th Cir. 1978). Even if summary judgment were improper because of issues of fact that could only be resolved after evidentiary hearing, the trial court, not a jury, must determine whether the evidence showed that plaintiff was a public figure. Brewer v. Memphis Publishing Co., 626 F.2d 1238 * * * (5th Cir. 1980). in the absence of conflicting inferences to be drawn from the record in this case, we conclude the district court was justified in considering the public figure question on summary judgment.

The record in this case contains sufficient undisputed facts to show that Rebozo, at the time of publication, was a public figure. As is well known, Rebozo was President Nixon's closest friend while Nixon was in the White House. While this in and of itself has considerable significance, we need not decide whether a confidential relationship with the President of the United States automatically converts one into a public figure, since the record indicates Rebozo had in other ways voluntarily exposed himself to the risk of close public scrutiny.

Rebozo played a substantial role in the former President's financial affairs, acting as the President's agent in the management of the President's bank accounts at the Key Biscayne Bank, and in the purchase of two homes. Plaintiff also played a role in the purchase and sale of other investments for the former President. In addition Rebozo's relationship with the President was not confined to counseling on business and financial matters. Rebozo freely admitted he offered his opinions to President Nixon on various matters, and transmitted to the former President the views of other important people on certain policy matters. The two discussed the Watergate situation when it began to arise in late 1973.

More significantly for purposes of this case, Rebozo played an active role in the President's 1972 re-election campaign, helping to arrange major contributions for the President's political benefit. The Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities, the so-called Watergate Committee, investigated closely Rebozo's role in the 1972 campaign and his involvement in President Nixon's finances, eventually publishing five volumes of data describing Rebozo's connections with the former President and his campaign.

Press coverage of Rebozo has focused both upon his relationship to the President and upon his own business and personal affairs, although the public's interest in his activities has certainly been enhanced by his connections with the former President. The record indicates that during the six months prior to October 25, 1973, the date of the Washington Post article, The New York Times published 48 articles mentioning Rebozo, while The Miami Herald published 76. Prominent stories in 1968 and 1971, in The New York Times and Newsday, described Rebozo's business and financial dealings in some detail. Rebozo himself recognized, "[W]hen you are traveling in the circles that I have traveled in there are press people all over the place."

In view of the foregoing, Rebozo, met, as a matter of law, both Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., public figure considerations. First, he "enjoy[ed] significantly greater access to the channels of effective communication and hence [had] a more realistic opportunity to counteract false statements than private individuals enjoy." 418 U.S. at 344. * * * There is evidence in the record that following publication of the Post article, both The Miami Herald and a major television network published Rebozo's response.

Second, on the basis of his voluntary activities, "the communications media [were] entitled to act on the assumption" plaintiff "had voluntarily exposed [himself]" to the risk of close public scrutiny. Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. at 345. * * *. Rebozo's activities—including his association with President Nixon, taking part in his financial affairs, and involvement with the re-election effort—made him a prime subject of public comment.

Accordingly, we affirm the district court's conclusion that for the purposes of this litigation plaintiff Rebozo was a public figure at the time this article was published.

III. WAS THE MALICE QUESTION APPROPRIATE FOR RESOLUTION ON SUMMARY JUDGMENT?

The district court, having decided that plaintiff was a public figure, applied the correct standard of liability but held there was no genuine issue of material fact on the question of "actual malice," as defined by New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. at 279–80. * * * Because we conclude that the facts in this case, taken in a light most favorable to Rebozo, raised such an issue of fact, we reverse the summary judgment entered for defendant.

On this record we conclude the district court was confronted with a genuine issue of material fact on the details of investigator Riley's conversation with Rebozo, and reporter Kessler's review of it. In investigating the story, even though Kessler went to the trouble of calling Riley, he failed to review with Riley the words in Riley's earlier deposition upon which Kessler eventually based the article's lead. Regardless of whether Riley knew at the time of his conversation with Rebozo whether the pledged stock had in fact been stolen, the seminal question may be what Riley actually told Rebozo before the stock was sold to cover the loan. We note in passing that on the second appeal in the conversion case, the Court found that not until December 1968, nearly two months after the stock sale, did E.F. Hutton learn that the stock involved in this case was among those shares that had been missing from its vault. Fidelity & Casualty Co. v. Key Biscayne Bank, 501 F.2d 1322, 1324 (5th Cir. 1974). Despite Kessler's professed belief in the veracity of Riley's deposition testimony, Kessler's resolution of the obvious ambiguity whether Riley told Rebozo the stock was (a) missing, (b) stolen, or (c) missing or stolen, in favor of the most potentially damaging alternative creates a jury question on whether the publication was indeed made without serious doubt as to its truthfulness. St. Amant v. Thompson, 390 U.S. at 732. * * *

There is, moreover, a material question of fact suggested by Kessler's October 6, 1973 memorandum to his editor, in which the reporter expressed uncertainty about whether the Key Biscayne Bank or Rebozo himself cashed the stock. Kessler stated in that memorandum that if the bank, rather than Rebozo had actually cashed the stock, the article's proposed lead paragraph would have to be modified. This memorandum, plus the fact that Kessler resolved the uncertainty expressed in it in such a way as to cast plaintiff Rebozo in the worst possible light and to make for Kessler a frontpage story of an episode which otherwise might not have commanded any significant attention, when taken in a light most favorable to Rebozo, could amount to evidence of the reporter's reckless disregard for the truth or falsity of the assertion that "Charles G. (Bebe) Rebozo, President Nixon's close friend, cashed $91,500 in stolen stock. * * * * * Thus we cannot say "the record is devoid of genuine issues of fact as to whether the alleged defamatory statement was published with actual knowledge of its falsity or with reckless disregard of whether it was true or false." Bon Air Hotel, Inc. v. Time, Inc., 426 F.2d at 865. Accordingly, the district court's summary judgment on the question of actual malice is reversed and the case is remanded for further proceedings.

Reversed and remanded.

COMMENT

Rebozo was subsequently settled out of court. Assuming that some agreement is possible on who would qualify as a pervasive public figure, let us look at other examples of those the courts have designated vortex public figures: an author who became embroiled in a controversy as to how intimate he was with Ernest Hemingway;<sup>109</sup> the sons of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg who publicly asserted the innocence of their parents in speeches and a book;<sup>110</sup> persons who voluntarily involved themselves in the fluoridation controversy;<sup>111</sup> a high school coach who verbally assaulted referees;<sup>112</sup> a civil rights activist;<sup>113</sup> a major corporation making a public stock option;<sup>114</sup> a civic organization member who wrote a letter to a newspaper editor on a public issue;<sup>115</sup> advertisers involved in an intensive advertising campaign;<sup>116</sup> a discharged police officer who had complained to the media;<sup>117</sup> and a student senate president who ran for a school board seat.<sup>118</sup>

Public Personality. This has been suggested as an additional public person category, applying to those who appear to be neither pervasive nor vortex public figures. A belly dancer, although her public spotlight may not be very bright, has at least made a deliberate effort to attract public attention and approval. One dancer's mistake may have been to grant an interview which led to a feature story in a Rochester, New York newspaper. The reporter quoted the dancer as saying, "Men is my business." The court placed an innocent construction on that language. The dancer did not. Faced with having to prove actual malice, the dancer contended that the reporter's refusal to permit her to review the article before publication was evidence of reckless disregard for the truth.

Congruent with journalistic norms the court wrote:

It would hardly be conducive to a free press to impose a requirement that all persons quoted or mentioned in a publication be permitted to review the report prior to publication. * * * [P]re-publication review, including a review of direct quotations, would, in effect, impose the equivalent of censorship traditionally anathema in our society. * * * Publications establish their own method of verifying information and the fact that the subject of an article was not offered, prior to publication, an opportunity for review and comment, does not, by itself, establish that the publisher acted maliciously or recklessly. Only where the publisher has, or should have had, reasons to doubt the accuracy of the report or its reporter is there a legal duty to make further inquiry. James v. Gannett Co., Inc., * * * 386 N.Y.S.2d 871 (1976).

A summary judgment in favor of the newspaper was upheld.

When a newspaper article implied that singer Anita Brewer had tried to revive a faltering career on the back of a romantic relationship with Elvis Presley and reported falsely that she and her husband were divorced, the Brewers sued a Memphis newspaper. After three jury verdicts in their favor, the Brewers lost on the actual malice test in a federal appeals court. Brewer v. Memphis Publishing Co., 6 Med. L.Rptr. 2025, 626 F.2d 1238 (5th Cir. 1980).

In a 1976 case involving Playboy magazine and an alleged mobster, a federal district court in Georgia said that "Defining public figures is much like trying to nail a jellyfish to the wall." To rebut Playboy's evidence of extensive contacts over a period of years with underworld figures and criminal prosecutions, Louis Rosanova argued that he was not a public figure because he didn't have access to the media to contradict charges against him and because he had not thrust himself voluntarily into the vortex of any public issue. Again the involuntary public figure. But this time in classic form!

The court defined Rosanova somewhat vaguely as a public figure because of "his voluntary contacts and involvements related to the subject matter of the [offending] article." In the absence of clear and convincing proof of actual malice or reckless disregard of truth, the court granted Playboy summary judgment. Rosanova v. Playboy Enterprises, Inc., 411 F.Supp. 440 (D.Ga.1976).

In each of these cases plaintiffs were suing for statements unrelated to their participation in any kind of public controversy. But each, in his or her own way, was a public personality, a person always with the potential or higher probability of becoming a vortex public figure. And when they do, they fit, though not always very well, the category of involuntary public figure, a category less rare perhaps than the courts have presumed.

Private Persons. Anyone who doesn't fit the categories already discussed may be a private person. For example, a consulting engineer on a public project who had no policy-making authority;<sup>119</sup> an attorney appointed to handle a criminal appeal;<sup>120</sup> a physician who prescribed amphetamines and, beyond publishing scientific articles, sought no media attention;<sup>121</sup> an administrative aide to Spiro Agnew and then political adviser to Senator Orrin Hatch's 1978 campaign, who was called a "bagman" for the former vice-president by then incumbent Senator Frank Moss;<sup>122</sup> a man whose brother was convicted of murdering their parents but who played no part in the event;<sup>123</sup> an historical and archaeological research corporation employed by a county as a scientific fact-finding consultant for the county's water supply;<sup>124</sup> a defendant in a wrongful-death civil action;<sup>125</sup> a former airlines executive whose competence was brought into question;<sup>126</sup> five corporate plaintiffs and two owners of a movie and television production company in a $490 million libel suit against Penthouse magazine;<sup>127</sup> and a Gulf + Western personnel director negligently accused of taking kickbacks.<sup>128</sup>

In instructions to the jury in the Penthouse case, the trial judge said that corporate plaintiffs would be public figures for all purposes only if they had achieved such pervasive fame or notoriety and were so involved in the affairs of society that they had become public figures for all purposes and in all contexts. Selling one's services to the public, buying advertising, and having access thereby to the media alone does not constitute the thrusting of oneself into a public controversy.

In the foregoing Gulf + Western case, a federal district court judge faulted the reporter for using third-hand information and then distorting or misinterpreting what she had. A negligence test was appropriate, said the court, because the plaintiff held no public office, did not have general fame or notoriety in the community, had no pervasive involvement in public affairs, and had not injected himself into a public controversy. All corporate officers were not to be swept under the actual malice rule.

As the public figure definition is narrowed by the courts, it seems more than ever incumbent upon journalists to gauge the voluntariness of a newsmaker's involvement in controversial public events. In most cases, the decision on how to categorize a plaintiff will be a question of law for a judge.<sup>129</sup> If a publisher disagrees with that decision, the onus is on him or her to establish that the plaintiff is indeed a public person. Better at the outset to make the correct threshold judgment as to whether the subject of your allegations is a public or private person.

A final question that might be considered is whether the rules of Gertz apply to nonmedia defendants. In 1976 the Maryland Court of Appeals held in Jacron Sales Co., Inc. v. Sindorf, 350 A.2d 688 (Md.1976) that they did, arguing that it would be a "bizarre result as a matter of tort law to hold individual defendants liable without fault while the media were liable only for negligence. * * * Further, an individual's defamatory statement is, on the whole, likely to create a smaller risk of harm than a media publication. * * Finally, the media are more likely to be aware of the risk of liability, and thus more likely to insure against it. * * * See The Supreme Court, 1973 Term, 88 Harvard L.Rev. 41, 148, fn. 52 (1974); Anderson v. Muscatine, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1726, 304 N.W.2d 239 (Iowa 1981).

Conversely, in Wisconsin, the constitutional protection applicable to a media defendant under Gertz does not apply to a nonmedia defendant. In a 1975 case, Calero v. Del Chemical Corp., 228 N.W.2d 737, the Wisconsin Supreme Court said, "This focus on the media and the matter of public concern which the court makes in this passage is the key to the distinction between constitutional and non-constitutional conditional privileges in defamation law." This view is reiterated in Denny v. Mertz, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1369, 318 N.W.2d 141 (Wis.1982), and must depend upon a constitutional distinction of some kind between speech and press. Denny was also an unfortunate case for defendants in that a corporation's former general counsel, who had been active in a stockholder dispute, was categorized as a private person because the stockholder dispute was held not to be a public controversy.

Has the Plaintiff Suffered Actual Injury?

Actual injury must be proven by plaintiff under the rules of Gertz and Firestone. It may now include personal humiliation and mental anguish as well as injury to reputation. Recall that Mrs. Firestone's physician testified that he had to medicate his patient following the Time magazine publication.

Plaintiff's attorney will look for reader reaction to the defamation in letters to his or her client, in letters to editors, and in articles in other publications. Attorneys will also pursue evidence of damage to business or profession and loss of customers, clients, and profits. Perhaps a plaintiff's pattern of association or community activities have been adversely affected.

At the same time, of course, plaintiff's attorney will be looking for material favorable to his or her client: deletions from notes or outtakes and anything else that suggests the reporter might have had doubts about the veracity of sources or the accuracy of subsequent published reports.

Fact or Opinion?

Does the libel comprise comment or opinion rather than a false allegation of fact? Under Gertz and the First Amendment "there is no such thing as a false idea." This has been interpreted as meaning no liability for pure statements of opinion—the editorial, the book review, the political cartoon. Opinions may place a publisher in jeopardy, however, if they are clearly based on false statements of fact, either explicit or implicit. Obviously the line between fact and opinion is not always clear. In a 1982 case, the New Jersey Supreme Court attempted to make that line more distinct.

A letter-to-the-editor used the pejorative terms "huge cover-up" and "conspiracy" in criticizing a mayor and a tax collector for not revealing the names of property owners who were delinquent in their payment of property taxes. The writer disclosed the facts upon which his opinions were based. And the words "conspiracy" and "cover-up," said the court, were employed here in a loose, figurative sense and as rhetorical hyperbole, much as was the word "blackmail" in the Greenbelt case, 398 U.S. at 14 (see this text, p. 220).

The court relied heavily for its holding on the following useful paragraph from the

Restatement (Second) of Torts, Section 566 (1977):

“Pure” statement of fact is found when the maker of the comment states the facts on which he bases his opinion of the plaintiff and then states a view as to the plaintiff’s conduct, qualification or character. “Pure” expression of opinion occurs also when the maker of the comment does not spell out the alleged facts on which the opinion is based but both parties to the communication know the facts or assume their existence and the statement of opinion is obviously based on those assumed facts as justification for the opinion. The second, or “mixed” type of expression of opinion is one that, while an opinion in form or content, is apparently based on facts about the plaintiff or his conduct that have neither been stated by the defendant nor assumed to exist by the parties to the communication.

Expressions of “pure” opinion on matters of public concern may no longer be the basis of an action for defamation, said the court, and it drew the rule that pejorative statements of opinion are entitled to constitutional protection no matter how extreme, vituperous, or vigorously expressed.

But the court noted that false and defamatory statements of fact are actionable. Language that could reasonably be understood as implying specific criminal acts, though disguised as opinion, would not fall within the Gertz protection; outright charges of illegal conduct, if false, would be protected solely by the actual malice test.

In granting summary judgment for both the writer of the letter and the newspaper, the court symbolized the letter-to-editor column as the last remaining forum of public opinion. Kotlikoff v. Community News, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1549, 444 A.2d 1086 (N.J.1982).

Finally, an illustration in a sociology textbook showing a white police officer prodding a black man with a nightstick to prevent him from falling asleep in a public place, accompanied by a caption asking rhetorically whether the policeman would do the same to a well-dressed, middle-aged white, was said in Cibenko v. Worth Publishers, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1298, 510 F.Supp. 761 (D.N.J.1981) to be an expression of opinion and therefore not subject to either libel or false light privacy claims.

Since the fact/opinion distinction is the basis of the common law defense of fair comment and criticism, it will be addressed again in a subsequent section.

COMMON LAW OR STATUTORY DEFENSES

Common law defenses against libel—namely truth, qualified privilege, and fair comment and criticism—were the primary defenses prior to New York Times. Their lack of attractiveness since 1964 is due to the fact that they place the burden of proof on the defendant, whereas the New York Times or constitutional defense places it on the plaintiff. This means that a publisher will always look first for a New York Times defense.

Although the shifted burden has created conceptual confusion around the traditional defenses, it is safe to say that they have survived. Since a plaintiff must now demonstrate the falsity of a defamatory charge—falsity is no longer presumed—truth remains a central issue and a logical counterclaim for a defendant.

Having established falsity, a plaintiff must in addition demonstrate at least negligence on the defendant’s part. Historically a minority of states required of a defendant not only proof of truth but truth with good motives and for justifiable ends, an additional burden no longer imposed on defendants.

Truth alone would now appear to be a complete defense.

Likewise, the traditional defense of fair comment and criticism has meant that a communication medium may go to the utmost lengths of denunciation, satirization, sarcasm, and condemnation in criticizing men, measures, and institutions seeking public approval, if it is done so without malice.

This is essentially the doctrine of New York Times, except that the burden of proving malice, or lack of malice, has shifted from defendant to plaintiff.

Although the New York Times rule may seem to have subsumed state statutory and common law privileges where media defendants are sued by public persons, the state law privileges—now statutory in most jurisdictions—are still vital in countering a charge of negligent misstatement where the libel plaintiff is a private person.

The Defense of Truth

1. Where truth or justification alone is pleaded as a defense, the proof must be at least as broad as the charge. “[I]t is generally agreed,” said Prosser, an authority on tort law, “that it is not necessary to prove the literal truth of the accusation in every detail, and that it is sufficient to show that the imputation is substantially true, or, as it is often put, to justify the ‘gist,’ the ‘sting,’ or the ‘substantial truth’ of the defamation.”<sup>130</sup>

Where a plaintiff, in testifying before a congressional committee, attacked “political Zionist planners for absolute rule via a one-world government,” a newspaper article charging that the plaintiff had attacked Jews was held substantially true and therefore not actionable.<sup>131</sup>

2. It is important for the press to understand that a truth defense requires proof of a defamatory charge, not simply proof that the charge has been made. For example, when a newspaper charging an architectural firm with the faulty design of a school building based its article on a confidential report, it was faced with proving not only that its informant made the statements attributed to him but with proving that those statements were in fact true.<sup>132</sup>

The defense of truth until recently was never satisfied by simply showing that the report was an accurate repetition of a libelous charge. For the journalist, the basic question was whether the facts he or she had stated were probably true, regardless of where they came from.

3. A publication will be considered in its entirety and in relation to its structure, nuances, implications, and connotations. It is not sufficient to take sentences separately and demonstrate their individual accuracy, detached and wrenched out of context. An allegation of crime need not be established beyond a reasonable doubt, but it must be shown by a fair preponderance of evidence.<sup>133</sup>

4. Sometimes the evidence needed to prove the truth is just not available. Until it is, an alleged defamatory statement is presumed to be false under this common law defense.<sup>134</sup> A defendant may need depositions, affidavits, exhibits—difficult to obtain after the fact. Truth can be a costly and hazardous defense.

When Ben Bagdikian, then a reporter for the Providence Journal-Bulletin, charged that Harold Noel Arrowsmith was a "sophisticated fascist" and "a shy, reticent anti-Semite," the truth was proved by cross-examination in the courtroom. It was demonstrated to the jury that Arrowsmith believed Franklin D. Roosevelt to be part of an international Zionist conspiracy, and that Arrowsmith had had a working relationship with American Nazi leader George Lincoln Rockwell in the dissemination of viciously anti-Jewish propaganda.<sup>135</sup>

Few defendants pleading truth are this fortunate, for truth, an elusive concept at best, is generally of more subtle definition. And it will not do to defend a half-truth or to try to prove the unprovable.

5. The strength of one's belief in a defamatory publication does not constitute truth or justification. Truth may be a dangerous defense also because, if it cannot be proven, its very pleading becomes a republication of the libel and may be interpreted as malice. The courts discourage those who would insist upon defending a falsehood.

When attorneys for the news media suspect a defamation is false or that proof of its truth is unlikely, they look for another defense.

Qualified Privilege

1. The theory of qualified or conditional privilege is that in some situations the public interest in the full disclosure of public business overrides harm to individual reputation. A news medium may publish with impunity a fair and accurate report of any judicial, quasi-judicial, legislative, executive, or other public and official proceeding at any level of government.

Reports and documents relating to such proceedings are also protected. The qualification or condition is an absence of malice.

Qualified privilege—sometimes called the "public record" privilege or the "public eye" doctrine—is statutory in most states, and these laws may differ in detail and interpretation.

In some jurisdictions reports on closed, executive sessions of municipal councils or school boards would be privileged.<sup>136</sup>

Generally the privilege attaches only to fair and accurate republications of statements made in government documents. Gertz v. Welch, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1769, 680 F.2d 527 (7th Cir. 1982). Statements based on nonofficial records, such as personal interviews, are not privileged. Dresbach v. Doubleday, 8 Med. L.Rptr. 1793, 518 F.Supp. 1285 (D.D.C.1982).

In some states, privilege has been expanded to include reports of all public meetings where public issues are discussed. These might include chamber of commerce forums,<sup>137</sup> public meetings of stockholders, union members, church boards, political parties, and medical or bar associations.

States differ in their willingness to protect the informal statements of officials. For example, when a policeman was quoted as saying that a former Marine had threatened to kill his wife, a New York court ruled that assertions by policemen do not constitute official proceedings.<sup>138</sup>

However, when a plaintiff's picture appeared in the Topeka Daily Capital in connection with an article on a grain theft ring, based on an interview with the state attorney general, the Kansas Supreme Court reached a contrary conclusion. The newspaper has a qualified privilege, said the court, to publish in good faith anything involving violations of the law, particularly where the source of information is the highest law enforcement officer of the state. Express malice would have destroyed the privilege.<sup>139</sup> Note, of course, that these are pre-New York Times cases. Since 1964 the qualified privilege doctrine—at least with respect to public figures and public officials—has been given First Amendment status in the form of the actual malice doctrine.

A substantially accurate account of a state auditor's report of "questionable ties" between a school board administrator and the suppliers of educational materials was also said to be protected.<sup>140</sup>

But a police log of "hot line" reports was said to represent only informal arrangements between the police and media and, not being an official record, was not privileged. The newspaper falsely reported that a husband had shot his wife.<sup>141</sup>

2. More complex are the rules of qualified privilege relating to judicial proceedings. In most states privilege depends upon some official action having been taken by a judge or some other officer of the court. A pleading or deposition filed in a case, but not yet acted upon, may not be privileged. The assumption is that these documents, containing possibly false, scurrilous, and uncontradicted charges, are addressed to the courts and not to the public at large.

Beginning in 1927 a significant minority of states began extending qualified privilege to all proceedings in a legal action, including pleadings on file, even though no formal judicial action had been initiated.

Under the headline, "Healer and Inventor Face Swindle Charge: Mrs. Elizabeth Nichols Says They Took $16,000 From Her Through Fraud," a story in the New York

Post quoted Mrs. Nichols, a wealthy widow, as saying that Mrs. Anne McCoy Campbell, a widely known Christian Science practitioner, and a male companion had succeeded in winning control over her mind.

The legal papers in the action had been filed with the clerk of court. But before any judicial action was taken, Mrs. Nichols withdrew her charges and dropped the suit. Mrs. Campbell then brought a libel action against five newspapers: the newspapers pleaded qualified privilege. Mrs. Campbell won in the trial court, but the highest New York court, the court of appeals, turned its back on precedent and in a historic decision wrote:

In this case it appears that the action against plaintiff was discontinued; that Mrs. Nichols thus got her alleged false and scurrilous charges before the public as news and then dropped her case. It is contended that such acts should not be deemed privileged so as to protect the publisher. The contention is too far reaching. Scandalous matter may come before the public in connection with law suits. Personal malice may thus be given a hearing. A complaint withdrawn may not be the vindication that a decision favorable to the accused would be. But complaints are withdrawn after applications have been made to the courts and suits have been dropped before verdicts. Consistency requires us to go forward or we go back. We cannot go back and exclude the publication of daily reports of trials before a final decision is reached. The present distinction is indefensible. Therefore, we proceed to a logical conclusion and uphold the claim of privilege on the ground that the filing of a pleading is a public and official act in the course of judicial proceedings. Campbell v. New York Evening Post, 157 N.E. 153 (N.Y.1927).

139. Beyl v. Capper Publications, Inc., 305 P.2d 817 (Kan.1957)

141. Phillips v. Evening Star Newspaper Co., 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2191, 424 A.2d 78 (D.C.1980), cert. den. 451 U.S. 989.

The Campbell doctrine has been adopted in California, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, for example. Under it a reporter must still be certain that a legal document has been served on the party named as defendant before the contents of that document are divulged; if legal papers are filed in a court clerk's office but the defendant has not been served with process, there is no privilege, for no legal proceeding has begun.

Most states require that some more significant judicial action be taken before privilege can be invoked. See Sanford v. Boston Herald-Traveler Corp., 61 N.E.2d 5 (Mass.1945).

3. In most jurisdictions sealed records and documents withheld from public scrutiny by court order, or affidavits which have not become part of a judicial proceeding, are distinctly not privileged. The woman friend of a convicted robber charged in an affidavit to a district attorney that a police sergeant, searching her home after a robbery, had taken a large sum of money from a clothes closet and had not returned it after her release from arrest. The woman's attorney then passed the document on to a newspaper, and it became part of a general news story. Truth could be the newspaper's only common law defense here, for the affidavit was not part of an official proceeding. The policeman was awarded $1,500 in compensatory damages.<sup>142</sup>

In some states, court rules or statutes provide that papers filed in juvenile, matrimonial, divorce, and morals cases are sealed and are not open to the public generally. Court sessions dealing with such matters, even though closed, may be privileged in the absence of statutory authority for secrecy. A fair and factually accurate report of a judicial proceeding involving a youthful offender not open to the public was nevertheless held privileged by a New York court.<sup>143</sup> But here the terrain is swampy. Ordinarily, the privilege accorded to reports of judicial proceedings relates to judicial proceedings which are public and have retained their public character.

Depositions taken after a suit has begun are privileged in the same way as is evidence in a trial. Even in the absence of the judge and jury, the examination of witnesses is part of the judicial proceeding. And the fact that some of the statements made in such proceedings will not be admissible later in evidence does not bar their use in news stories. If the deposition taking is closed, news stories can be based on the comments of those who were there, but, of course, they must be balanced and fair.

Many statements made from the witness stand in open court are stricken from the record. Generally such testimony was thought not to be privileged, although in rare cases it may have been.

A New York court shed light on this question by declaring that statements made in open court are privileged if they are in any way pertinent to the litigation. In making such a determination the court is not limited to the narrow and technical rules applied to the admissibility of evidence. Nothing that is said in the courtroom may be the subject of a libel suit unless "it is so obviously impertinent as not to admit of discussion, and so needlessly defamatory as to warrant inference of express malice." The court added that "to be outside of privilege, a statement made in open court must be so outrageously out of context as to permit one to conclude, from the mere fact that the statement was uttered, that it was motivated by no other desire than to defame."<sup>144</sup>

143. Gardner v. Poughkeepsie Newspapers, Inc., 326 N.Y.S.2d 913 (1971).

4. A California appeals court ruled that the absolute privilege accorded to judicial proceedings also attaches to any publication that has any reasonable relation to the judicial proceeding even though the publication is made outside the courtroom and no function of the court or its officers is involved. The court added that the defamatory matter need not be relevant, pertinent, or material to any issue before the court; it need only have some connection or some relation to the judicial proceeding. This absolute privilege accorded to judicial and quasi-judicial proceedings extends to preliminary conversations and interviews between a prospective witness and an attorney if they are in some way related to or connected with a pending or contemplated action.<sup>145</sup> This, of course, is a very liberal construction of the privilege to report judicial proceedings. And note that it is an absolute privilege. The difference between a qualified and an absolute privilege is that malice destroys the qualified privilege but does not affect the absolute privilege.

5. All reports of judicial proceedings must be balanced, fair, and substantially accurate, whether or not they are abridgments. Seldom are they verbatim. Nor do such reports have to be technically accurate in a legal sense. The reporter must avoid mistakes in names, embellishments of news accounts of judicial proceedings with facts from the newspaper's own extra-legal "investigation,"<sup>146</sup> reporting what an official document merely stated to be "alleged" as a fact; and, of course, the epitome of malice: reckless disregard of the truth.<sup>147</sup> So as to avoid giving the impression of reporting an official document when it is not official, some courts have held that the source of what is being reported must be included if privilege is to be invoked.<sup>148</sup>

6. It can safely be reported that a crime has been committed and a particular person is being held for questioning. The assumption is that the statement, while not privileged, is provably true. An arrest should not be reported until a suspect is booked, that is, his name has been entered on a police blotter. When a police blotter or log book is an official public record, required by law to be kept, a news story based on the blotter is protected by qualified privilege, if the report is fair and accurate. A Louisiana court ruled in favor of a newspaper whose correspondent, relying on a police log book, reported that the plaintiff had been arrested and charged with possession of narcotics and contributing to the delinquency of a juvenile. There was no presumption of guilt in the news story.

"We feel," said the court, "that since a newspaper may report the fact that a person was arrested and the charge for which he was arrested, it may rely for such a report upon the principal record kept by the arresting authority, which record is a 'public record,' to show accurately whether the arrest was made and the specific charges which were being filed against the arrested person. This is particularly true where there has been nothing to indicate to the publisher that such public record may not be reliable, * * * even though the [l]og [b]ook may have contained an incorrect statement of the charges for which plaintiff was arrested."<sup>149</sup> Good journalistic practice in such cases is to seek a comment from the defamed person or his spokesman, an attorney, for example, in the interests of a balanced story.

Where a newspaper article concerning a suspected counterfeiter gave not only the details of the arrest but added inaccurate additional language about engraving plates hidden in a false panel of the suspect's truck, the newspaper's qualified privilege was lost.<sup>150</sup>

7. Although some states have by statute extended the protection of privilege to reports of arresting officers, police chiefs, county prosecutors, and coroners, collateral details on investigations and speculation on the evidence from these sources are generally not privileged. A newspaper would print at its peril, for example, a statement by an attorney that the victim of his client's alleged rape had consented to it.<sup>151</sup>

Under common law rules a grand jury indictment could be safely reported after it had been delivered to a judge, if it was reported with reasonable precision. Since grand juries are closed, comment on testimony before them from participants must be handled with great care.<sup>152</sup> But by no means is a reporter confined to coverage of the trial alone.

Preliminary proceedings, such as a hearing or the issuance of an injunction, generally may be covered. Conditional privilege applies to any action of a judge in his official capacity.

8. Given the admonitions above, any fair, impartial, and accurate summary of a judicial or quasi-judicial proceeding, whether in a courtroom or not, is qualifiedly privileged. A news story based on a judicial proceeding may be lively and filled with human interest, if it remains substantially correct.<sup>153</sup>

A news story reporting that the plaintiff, driver of an automobile involved in a fatal accident, was indicted on a charge of criminal negligence and prefaced by the headline, "Driver of Death Car Heads Indictment List," was ruled privileged in view of the fact that it was a fair and accurate report of a judicial proceeding.<sup>154</sup>

Any discussion of qualified privilege with respect to liability for defamation in connection with reporting of judicial proceedings must now reckon with Time, Inc. v. Firestone, 424 U.S. 448 (1976). In Firestone the Court said the New York Times rule does not automatically extend to all judicial proceedings. The Court said that there was no reason that libel plaintiffs "should substantially forfeit that degree of protection which the law of defamation would otherwise afford them simply by virtue of their being drawn into a courtroom." With respect to defamation suits involving reports of judicial proceedings, the Court held that the Gertz rules remained generally applicable. In Firestone, the Court said that no New York Times-based privilege would attach to aid the libel defendant because the defamation relied on judicial records which were inaccurate. The case was distinguished from Cox Broadcasting Corp. v. Cohn, 420 U.S. 469 (1975) (this text, p. 337), where the Court held that the First Amendment prevented liability on a right of privacy theory for stating the name of a rape victim on television contrary to Georgia law. The name of the rape victim had been obtained from court documents open to the public, i.e., the indictment in the case. The Court in Firestone distinguished the Cohn case on the ground that the public records relied upon there had been accurate. Would libel defendants in cases involving inaccurate reports of judicial proceedings be able to claim the benefit of the New York Times privilege? What if such reports are ambiguous or unclear?

The refusal of the Court in Firestone to extend the New York Times rule to all reports of judicial proceedings makes the prior cases discussed in this section very important. As a result of Firestone, libel actions involving reports of judicial proceedings will continue to be governed by the relevant state law with respect to qualified privilege.

9. Senator Joseph McCarthy's anti-Communist crusade taught the press that professional ethics dictate that whenever possible a reporter ought to try to get a defamed person's side of the story. It is the reporter's moral duty in every case to weigh the public interest against injury to personal reputation and to be fair and balanced in what is written.

Fair Comment and Criticism

1. Traditionally the defense of fair comment and criticism, which Prosser called a special category of qualified privilege, protected honest criticism of men, measures, and public institutions. Governmental bodies, charitable organizations, businesses, unions, educators, coaches, the creators of books, articles, plays, music, art, film, radio and television programs, scientific discoveries, and all who invite public attention or controversy are open to attack.<sup>155</sup>

Obviously the New York Times doctrine has incorporated this defense, and its rules now apply.

Since fair comment was a defense for the libelous expression of an opinion or intellectual judgment, a perennial problem in most jurisdictions was to distinguish between opinion and fact and to avoid basing opinions on erroneous facts. When you consider that factual innuendos are implicit in opinions—the editorial or review, for example—the task was not an easy one.

New York Times came to the rescue by extending protection to false facts in the absence of actual malice. And Justice Powell held in Gertz that there could be no false ideas [opinions].

The distinction between facts and opinions suggested by Powell, and the lower burden of proof for private-person plaintiffs using a negligence test, means that the distinction is still valid.

A United States court of appeals judge thought the distinction important in a libel suit brought by William F. Buckley, Jr. against an author and Bible scholar.

"Fellow traveler," "Fascist," and "radical right" were terms of opinion, said the judge, but a charge that Buckley had lied about and implicitly libeled several people, who could have taken him to court, was defamatory under both the public and the private law of libel. The most litigious paragraph follows:

Buckley has been caught out for misquotations [with quotation marks!] and for repeating radical right malice and rumor, but he never admits a mistake or apologizes to the victims. Like Westbrook Pegler, who lied day after day in his column about Quentin Reynolds and goaded him into a lawsuit (see Reynolds v. Pegler, 123 F.Supp. 36 (D.N.Y.1954), affirmed 223 F.2d 429 (2d Cir. 1955), Buckley could be taken to court by any one of several people who

155. The privilege apparently came into the common law in Carr v. Hood, 1 Camp. 355, 170 Eng.Rep. 983 (1808). A classic American case is Cherry v. Des Moines Leader, 86 N.W. 323 (Iowa 1901). See also, Outcault v. New York Herald Co., 102 N.Y.S. 685 (1907); Berg v. Printer's Ink Publishing Co., 54 F.Supp. 795 (D.N.Y.1943); *Pearson v. had enough money to hire competent legal counsel and nothing else to do. Reynolds won his suit, of course, but it took all of his time and resources for most of three years, and he died shortly thereafter.

BUCKLEY v. LITTELL

539 F.2D 882 (2D CIR. 1976).

OAKES, Circuit Judge:

* * *

Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., made the distinction—crucial to the issue—between “false statements of fact” which receive no constitutional protection, and “ideas” and “opinions” which by definition can never be “false” so as to constitute false statements which are unprotected when made with actual malice. The district court recognized that the “boundary line” between fact and opinion is not a precise one, and acknowledged that “to call someone a fascist fellow traveler is perhaps not as concrete a statement of facts as to say that someone committed a theft. * * *” Nevertheless the court found that [W]hen Littell speaks of Buckley as a fellow traveler of fascism, indicating that he sympathizes with and promotes conspiracy and subversion * * * we are surely dealing with questions of fact, and not merely ideas.

We find, to the contrary, that the use of “fascist,” “fellow traveler” and “radical right” as political labels in Wild Tongues [Littell’s book] cannot be regarded as having been proved to be statements of fact, among other reasons, because of the tremendous imprecision of the meaning and usage of these terms in the realm of political debate, an imprecision which is simply echoed in the book. * * * The search for the precisely articulable meaning of the statements about Buckley to the ordinary reader could only be, in a sense, an arbitrary one because of the ambiguous and sometimes even contradictory content of the terminology necessarily utilized in Littell’s polemical tract. This is not a case where a person is being accused of being a member of the Communist Party, or a legislative representative of the Communist Party, as in the New York cases relied upon by the district court. * * * Such allegations of membership or well-defined political affiliation are readily perceivable as allegations of fact susceptible to proof or disproof of falsity. They are quite dissimilar to the terms “fellow traveler,” “fascism” and “radical right” which, whether as used by Littell or as perceived by a reader, are concepts whose content is so debatable, loose and varying, that they are insusceptible to proof of truth or falsity. The use of these terms in the present context is in short within the realm of protected opinion and idea under Gertz.

We find further that there was nothing libelous in the statement as it appears in Wild Tongues that the National Review and “On the Right” frequently “print ‘news items’ and interpretations picked up from the openly fascist journals.” The issue of what constitutes an “openly fascist” journal is as much a matter of opinion or idea as is the question what constitutes “fascism” or the “radical right” in Wild Tongues. Buckley himself admitted that he or the National Review had occasionally printed items and interpretations picked up from openly fascist journals even as he defined them, although “for the purpose of denouncing them.” Surely the difference of opinion between Buckley and Littell regarding what is “approval” of what one calls “fascist” and the other calls “radical right” or “denunciation” of the same highly debatable categories cannot give rise to recovery by the one against the other in this case.

We have a different factual context, however, concerned in the third alleged libel. For here appellant’s book says, “Like Westbrook Pegler, who lied day after day in his column about Quentin Reynolds and goaded him into a lawsuit, Buckley could be taken to court by any one of several people who had enough money to hire competent legal counsel and nothing else to do." This is an assertion of fact, namely that Buckley had lied about and implicitly libeled several people who, if they wanted to and could afford it, could take him to court for his lies. [Emphasis added.] As opposed to the loosely definable, variously interpretable statements of opinion above referred to made inextricably in the contest of political, social or philosophical debate, in this instance appellant's comment makes a factual assertion relating to Buckley's journalistic integrity. Even while Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., in effect states that an expression of "pure opinion" may not be the basis of an action for defamation, it also said, that "there is no constitutional value in false statements of fact." Regardless of what other implicit but unelaborated comparisons Littell was attempting to draw between Buckley and Pegler, and regardless of whether he was attempting to say that Buckley lied about individuals precisely in the way that Pegler did, it seems to us that this third remark as it appears on its face states that Buckley was engaging in libelous journalism. Given the proof of falsity which was presented and not successfully rebutted, it is constitutionally as well as tortiously defamatory.

While Littell suggested that he intended in the passage only to criticize Buckley's "goaded, hounding and excessive pursuit" of many people, particularly of certain church men and church women Littell had in mind, as well as of Martin Luther King and Robert Kennedy, he also testified that he equated Buckley's frequent literary attacks as "falling within the general category of lying." Although he testified that he did not remember the specifics of the Pegler libels and did not mean to make a direct analogy between Pegler's libels and Buckley, what is critical is that Littell knew, as is evident from the passage itself, that Pegler's lies had been proved (by Reynolds) to be libels. Littell must have known that when he directly compared Buckley's statements with those of a proven libeler, the clear meaning to be inferred was that he considered Buckley to be a libeler like Pegler.

In response to Buckley's proof of the falsity of this accusation of libelous journalism, appellant's only rebutting proof of the truth of his charge was that Buckley had been sued in the past for libel; only one suit, however, had been successful, and that only by way of settlement. As we read Judge Griesa's findings, he found that Littell's statement that Buckley engaged in libelous journalism was made with knowledge of its falsity or in reckless disregard of its truth or falsity, and this is a finding based in part upon credibility and demeanor which we cannot go behind. In this connection we emphasize that Littell's testimony clearly indicated that he could recall no instances of Buckley's lies about people as matters of fact, and that the lies he had in mind were not really "precise detailed lies" but rather lies on "a theoretical level" involving, as the record makes clear, Buckley's political opinions. Although he denied it, Littell also may have had in mind his own experience with Buckley and the latter's item, "Who Are the Totalitarians?", but that exchange hardly gave Littell license to attack Buckley's personal candor by the accusation of being a regular liar in print as to "several people." Furthermore, Littell's publisher was very much concerned about the paragraph in which the Pegler reference occurs, although not specifically about the sentence here found to be libelous; this concern should have been a red flag to Littell.

In short, whatever might be said of a person's political views, any journalist, commentator or analyst is entitled not to be lightly characterized as inaccurate and dishonest or libelous. We cannot disagree with the finding of the court below that it is "crucial" to such a person's career that he or she not be so treated. To call a journalist a libeler and to say that he is so in reference to a number of people is defamatory in the constitutional sense, even if said in the overall context of an attack otherwise directed at his political views.

COMMENT

Buckley had been awarded $1.00 in compensatory damages by the district court. That judgment was upheld, but $7,500 in punitive damages were reduced to $1,000.

Where there are no misstatements of fact, plaintiffs have no assurance of even this modest success. State courts have held that it is not actionable to characterize a public official as inept, incompetent, and indecisive<sup>156</sup> or a school principal as unsuited for his position.<sup>157</sup>

Given that the distinction, or the relationship, between fact and opinion is not always clear, pure comment is a shaky defense for the columnist, reviewer, or editorialist. Nevertheless the rule has emerged that defamatory opinions are actionable only if they are based on the allegation of undisclosed, false, and defamatory facts. If the facts forming the basis for the opinion are accurately set out, the opinion is protected.<sup>158</sup>

Opinions require no justification and are not a matter for judicial scrutiny or control. But accusations of criminal activity cannot be protected as opinions. An editorial saying of a public securities attorney for a city, "No bond buyer would buy a nickel's worth of securities on McHale's opinion," illustrates the precariousness of the distinction. The Louisiana Supreme Court affirmed that the statement was not an opinion but a false attack on the attorney's competence published with actual malice.<sup>159</sup>

Sometimes communicators are on the receiving end. A letter-to-the-editor asserted that a journalist had conducted the "worst single example of a journalistic smear" in covering the appointment of a college president, and it called him "journalistic scum of the earth." Protected opinion, said the New Hampshire Supreme Court.<sup>160</sup>

Opinion also when a magazine described a newspaper publisher as "near-Neanderthal," as one who has a "stranglehold on the life of an entire state," and whose newspaper is published "by paranoids for paranoids." A federal district court in New York called those remarks rhetorical hyperbole absolutely protected under the First Amendment, a rule of law Publisher William Loeb of Manchester, New Hampshire might have been expected to appreciate.<sup>161</sup>

Finally, magazine statements describing a television announcer as the "worst" sports announcer in Boston and as being "enrolled in a course for remedial speaking" were, said the highest court of Massachusetts, protected statements of opinion, especially in the context of a humorous "best and worst" article. Summary judgment was granted the magazine.<sup>162</sup>

The court referred to the statements as "rhetorical hyperbole" or "the conventional give and take in our economic and political controversies."

It is a question, then, of context and of style and means of delivery. More latitude might be given a heated political debate than a carefully considered newspaper editorial. Leading cases on this point are Gregory v. McDonnell Douglas Corp., 131 Cal.Rptr. 641 (1976); Information Control Corp. v. Genesis One Computer Corp., 611 F.2d 781 (9th Cir. 1980), and *Cole v. Dissenting in a denial of certiorari in Miskovsky v. Oklahoma Pub. Co., 7 Med.L. Rptr. 2607, 654 P.2d 587 (Okl.1982), Justices Rehnquist and White rejected the "no false idea" rule of Gertz, and Gertz itself, opting instead for the old common law rule of strict liability for a publisher.

The "Community of Interests" Privilege

Closely related to the broader defense of qualified privilege is the conditional privilege to publish defamatory matter in defense of one's own reputation or property rights; or to circulate defamation among members of religious, fraternal, labor, corporate, or charitable organizations in pursuit of mutual property, business, or professional interests; among members of one's own family; or in fulfilling one's social obligations to assist in law enforcement.<sup>163</sup> Such activities frequently involve credit agencies, hired investigators, and prospective employers. Seldom does this defense pertain to the press.

A father's letter objecting to the involvement of a suspended policeman in a Boy Scout bus trip in which the father's fifteen-year-old son was a participant was conditionally privileged. The father's complaint was sent to the directors and officers of the corporation planning the trip. The policeman, who was facing trial for burglary, had the burden of showing actual malice on the part of the father in order to win a libel judgment.<sup>164</sup>

Neutral Reportage

1. Court definitions of "reckless disregard" have greatly modified the reporter's liability for simply stating someone else's libelous charges. To have a reliable source and to represent it objectively may be all that is needed.

"While verification of the facts remains an important reporting standard," the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals said in 1966, "a reporter, without a 'high degree of awareness of their probable falsity,' may rely on statements made by a single source even though they reflect only one side of the story without fear of libel prosecution."

And the constitutional rule of Medina v. Time, Inc. in 1971<sup>166</sup> was that news media reports of statements made by participants in a public controversy are protected, where the fact that one participant levels charges against another is itself a newsworthy event.

The difficult but necessary task is to report such charges dispassionately and not to assert them as your own views. Perhaps courts are willing to concede that newspapers are in no position to guarantee the truth of everything they print.

When the Illinois Crime Investigating Commission director said in a published interview that two men were "lieutenants of * * * [a] Southern Illinois crime syndicate chieftan," one of the men filed suit against the Chicago Sun-Times. An appellate court upheld a lower court's granting of a summary judgment to the newspaper and ruled that the news story was an accurate account of a government official's statement and was therefore privileged. Doss v. Field Enterprises, Inc., 332 N.E.2d 497 (Ill.1976). Similarities to the qualified privilege of reporting governmental processes were also noted in Joplin v. WEWS Television Station, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1331 (Ohio App.1980).

2. The defense of neutral reportage came into its own in the framework of a long and heated controversy between opponents and proponents of the use of DDT. While both sides were impugning the honesty of the other, the New York Times got in the middle and in 1972 reported that officials of the National Audubon Society were accusing a number of prominent scientists of being "paid to lie" by pesticide companies.

The reporter, however, contacted as many of the maligned scientists as he could and incorporated their angry responses into his story. Three of them nevertheless brought libel suits against the Society and the New York Times, and a jury awarded them each $20,000 in damages.

Concluding that the jury believed the reporter "reckless" in failing to investigate further when the scientists warned him of the libel potential of the charges, the trial judge let the verdict stand. The court of appeals reversed, dismissing the complaints.

Relying on a series of cases beginning with Time, Inc. v. Pape (see this text, p. 218), as appellant's brief had proposed, Judge Irving R. Kaufman for the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit gave the defense of neutral reportage its initial articulation.

EDWARDS v. NATIONAL AUDUBON SOCIETY

556 F.2D 113 (2D CIR. 1977), CERT. DEN.
434 U.S. 1002.

Irving R. KAUFMAN, Chief Judge:

* * *

At stake in this case is a fundamental principle. Succinctly stated, when a responsible, prominent organization like the National Audubon Society makes serious charges against a public figure, the First Amendment protects the accurate and disinterested reporting of those charges, regardless of the reporter's private views regarding their validity. What is newsworthy about such accusations is that they were made. We do not believe that the press may be required under the First Amendment to suppress newsworthy statements merely because it has serious doubts regarding their truth. Nor must the press take up cudgels against dubious charges in order to publish them without fear of liability for defamation. The public interest in being fully informed about controversies that often rage around sensitive issues demands that the press be afforded the freedom to report such charges without assuming responsibility for them.

The contours of the press's right of neutral reportage are, of course defined by the principle that gives life to it. Literal accuracy is not a prerequisite: if we are to enjoy the blessings of a robust and unintimidated press, we must provide immunity from defamation suits where the journalist believes, reasonably and in good faith, that his report accurately conveys the charges made. It is equally clear, however, that a publisher who in fact espouses or concurs in the charges made by others, or who deliberately distorts these statements to launch a personal attack of his own on a public figure, cannot rely on a privilege of neutral reportage. In such instances he assumes responsibility for the underlying accusations. See Goldwater v. Ginzburg, 414 F.2d 324 (2d Cir. 1969), cert. den., 396 U.S. 1049 (1970). [Emphasis added.]

* * * The Times article * * * was the exemplar of fair and dispassionate reporting of an unfortunate but newsworthy contretemps. Accordingly, we hold that it was privileged under the First Amendment.

COMMENT

1. Publication of a "completely fabricated accusation" and "wholly imagined but supposedly precisely quoted conversations" will destroy any privilege of neutral reportage,<sup>167</sup> as will an admission by a defendant that "he did not know whether what he said was true" and that he "did nothing, or almost nothing, to verify his charges."<sup>168</sup> Such behavior also reflects "reckless disregard" for the truth.

Echoes of Rosenbloom's public issue test ring in Edwards. A newsworthy source, even an irresponsible one, may develop into a libel defense. A year later in Dickey v. CBS, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 1353, 583 F.2d 1221, 1225-6, (3d Cir. 1978), the Third Circuit took pains to repudiate the rule of Edwards. But the rule was adopted by an Illinois appeals court in Krauss v. Champaign News Gazette, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 2507, 375 N.E.2d 1362 (Ill.1978), and rejected by another Illinois court in Catalano v. Pechous, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 2094, 387 N.E.2d 714 (1978), affirmed 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2511, 419 N.E.2d 350 (Ill.1980). Kentucky's Supreme Court disavowed the neutral reportage defense in McCall v. Courier Journal & Louisville Times, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2118, 623 S.W.2d 882 (Ky.1981).

2. Neutral reportage remains a new and half-fashioned common law defense that ought to be approached with caution. Many federal courts—but not the U.S. Supreme Court—have given Edwards some credence, although less enthusiastically, or not at all, where the plaintiff is a private person<sup>169</sup> or where the charges are originated by the media.<sup>170</sup> A New York federal district court judge said pointedly in a 1980 ruling that the Edwards privilege did not apply to investigative reporting: "Unlike Edwards, no controversy raged around the libelous statement before the reporter entered the scene."<sup>171</sup>

There remains substantial disagreement among courts on the constitutional acceptability of the neutral reportage defense. A number of state courts, including those of New York, have said that Edwards does not apply in their jurisdictions. For a time the controlling New York case was Hogan v. Herald Co., 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1137, 446 N.Y.S.2d 836 (1982). In 1983, fewer than ten jurisdictions had clearly accepted the defense. Most had not decided.

TECHNICAL DEFENSES

Consent

Consent, especially if it is in written form, may on occasion be a sturdy defense. Most often, however, consent is simply implied. When a reporter asks a person to comment on a charge someone has made against him or her, it is not possible to write about a denial without mentioning the original charge. A denial alone could be meaningless.

Controversy of any kind obligates the reporter to try hard to get both sides and to tell readers he or she has tried. When successful, consent may be implied in what was reported.

A vice chairman of the Democratic National Committee was fired for negotiating a $9 million tungsten contract with the federal government on behalf of a Portuguese corporation. In his own defense he gave the old New York Herald Tribune a detailed statement for publication, and he issued a statement to the wire services.

One day before the statute of limitations would have run, he brought libel actions against a number of newspapers. In ruling against him a federal appeals court judge, Chief Judge Parker, wrote:

The only portions of the article of which plaintiffs can complain as not being statements of fact is that portion relating to the Herald-Tribune's terming the case "the biggest five percenter deal ever exposed in Washington" and General Eisenhower's referring to it as the "sort of crookedness that goes on and on in Washington." These, however, cannot be deemed unfair comments when read, as they must be, in connection with the remainder of the article, which sets forth in detail the facts to which the comments relate and carries the statement of Westbrook with regard thereto including his denial that he had used or attempted to use his position to influence the awarding of the contract or that his services were of the "so-called 'five percenter' variety." In view of the fact that Westbrook gave this statement to the press in an interview to be published, he is hardly in a position to complain of the publication with it of the charge to which it was an answer, even if the latter were otherwise objectionable. [Emphasis added.] Pulvermann v. A. S. Abell Co., 228 F.2d 797 (4th Cir. 1956).

Similarly, when a Methodist minister and his family were unintentionally libeled in a college humor magazine, the minister found himself without a remedy after granting interviews to two student journalists. Where the plaintiff told the reporters that he wanted publicity, and publicity printed in his own words, and then referred them to his lawyer for legal details, the newspaper publication was absolutely privileged. The Tennessee court of appeals dismissed the minister's libel suit against the college newspaper, and a similar suit against the humor magazine never came to trial. Langford v. Vanderbilt University, 318 S.W.2d 568 (Tenn. 1958).

Similarly, the Rev. Jerry Falwell was unsuccessful in a suit against Penthouse magazine following publication of a concededly accurate account of an interview he had granted. Violation of conditions imposed by the minister did not negate his consent nor constitute publication with actual malice. Falwell v. Penthouse International, Limited, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1891, 521 F.Supp. 1204 (D.Va.1981).

Statute of Limitations

Statutes of limitations define the time span within which legal actions can be brought. Their purpose is to protect an alleged wrongdoer against stale claims which he or she may be totally unprepared to meet. The statutes of limitations for libel are one, two, or three years in all jurisdictions. The one-year states are New York, Caliifornia, New Jersey, Mississippi, and Maryland. Statutes of limitations provide an absolute defense against libel actions.

Parade magazine tried to deny liability in a libel action by arguing that 1,800 advance copies had been sold a month earlier in a particular locale, thus giving the magazine the protection of the statute of limitations. But a federal court said that under such a rule scurrilous articles could be printed without fear of retribution simply by selling a few advance copies and keeping the date secret until a libel action had been brought. This would be particularly easy where the statute is a single year. So the statute starts running, said the court, when the publication goes into general circulation for the first time. Osmer v. Parade Publications, 234 F.Supp. 924 (D.N.Y.1964).

In at least one state, the statute covers an analogous false light invasion of privacy claim. Smith v. Esquire, Inc., 6 Med.L. Rptr., 1825, 494 F.Supp. 967 (D.Md.1980).

Kathy Keeton, associate publisher of Penthouse, sued Hustler and its publisher, Larry Flynt, in Ohio in 1977 for libel and invasion of privacy. The claims were dismissed because of a statute of limitations defense. Keeton then filed suit in New Hampshire because the statute of limitations there had not expired. The federal court found Hustler's contacts with New Hampshire significant, but Keeton's were not. Therefore they dismissed her case. The United State Court of Appeals for the First Circuit affirmed. The issue is whether a publisher should be open to a libel suit "as long as there is any state anywhere with a statute of limitations that has not expired." Keeton v. Hustler, Inc., 682 F.2d 33 (1st Cir. 1982), cert. granted, 103 S.Ct. 813 (1983).

Equal Time in Political Broadcasts

Political Broadcasts. Prior to 1959, radio and television stations granting equal time to political candidates under the provisions of § 315 of the Federal Communications Act of 1934 were liable for any defamation in those broadcasts. At the same time, a station was absolutely prohibited from censoring a political talk:

(a) If any licensee shall permit any person who is a legally qualified candidate for any public office to use a broadcasting station, he shall afford equal opportunities to all other such candidates for that office in the use of such broadcasting station: Provided, That such licensee shall have no power of censorship over the material broadcast under the provisions of this section. No obligation is imposed upon any licensee to allow the use of its station by any such candidate. 47 U.S.C.A. § 315(a).

Surely then, the broadcasting industry had argued for many years, if stations are required to carry libelous speeches and prevented from exerting any editing judgment, they should not be held responsible for damages.

The test case came in North Dakota. On October 29, 1956, A.C. Townley, a colorful remnant of the Progressive movement which had swept the Dakotas like a prairie fire four decades earlier, demanded equal time as an independent candidate for the United States Senate. Equal time was provided, and in a telecast over WDAY-TV, Fargo, a highly reputable station, Townley charged that the North Dakota Farmers Union was Communist controlled. WDAY had warned Townley that it believed his charge was libelous.

It was, and the Farmers Union brought a $100,000 damage suit against Townley and the station. A district court dismissed the complaint against WDAY on the ground that § 315 rendered the station immune from liability. The Farmers Union carried an appeal to the North Dakota Supreme Court, and that court became the first appellate court in the country to consider the question of whether a broadcasting station is liable for defamatory statements made by a political candidate using the station's facilities in accordance with federal law.

Attorneys for the Farmers Union contended that § 315 did not apply in this case because a third party—the Farmers Union—was involved, making the case something more than a heated confrontation between opposing political candidates. They cited a Nebraska case, Sorensen v. Wood, 243 N.W. 82 (Neb.1932), which they interpreted as holding that a station could not willingly join in publication of a libel and that the “no censorship” provision referred only to the political content of the speech.

In a 4–1 decision the North Dakota Supreme Court ruled that radio and television broadcasters are not liable for false or libelous statements made over their facilities by political candidates. Noting that WDAY had advised Townley that his remarks, if false, were libelous, the court said: “We cannot believe that it was the intent of Congress to compel a station to broadcast libelous statements and at the same time subject it to the risk of defending actions for damages.” Farmers Educational & Cooperative Union of America, North Dakota Division v. WDAY, 89 N.W.2d 102, 109 (N.D.1958).

The majority felt the attack on the Farmers Union was “in context” with a candidate's criticism of his opponent since “Communism” was a campaign issue. The majority added that the Farmers Union should have brought action against Townley alone. (The problem here was that Townley's income was a mere $98.50 a month—a promise of little satisfaction to an aggrieved party.)

The Farmers Union carried an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. The American Civil Liberties Union intervened on the side of WDAY and in support of the North Dakota Supreme Court decision. In its appeal, the Farmers Union posed three questions with constitutional implications:

a. Does § 315 relieve radio and television stations from liability for broadcasting libelous statements by candidates when the statements defame a third party not a competing candidate?

b. Did Congress, when it passed the 1934 act, intend to repeal or annul state laws covering liability?

c. Does § 315 deprive the Farmers Union of its liberty and property, including reputation, without due process of law (in violation of the intent of the 5th and 14th amendments)?

In a surprisingly close 5–4 decision, the U.S. Supreme Court answered “yes” to the first two questions and affirmed the North Dakota decision upholding WDAY.

FARMERS EDUCATIONAL AND COOPERATIVE UNION OF AMERICA v. WDAY INC.

Justice BLACK delivered the Opinion of the Court:

* * * Petitioner argues that § 315's prohibition against censorship leaves broadcasters free to delete libelous material from candidates' speeches, and that therefore no federal immunity is granted a broadcasting station by that section. The term censorship, however, as commonly understood, connotes any examination of thought or expression in order to prevent publication of “objectionable” material. We find no clear expression of legislative intent, nor any other convincing reason to indicate Congress meant to give “censorship” a narrower meaning in § 315. In arriving at this view, we note that petitioner's interpretation has not generally been favored in previous considerations of the section. Although the first, and for years the only judicial decision dealing with the censorship provision did hold that a station may remove defamatory statements from political broadcasts, subsequent judicial interpretations of § 315 have with considerable uniformity recognized that an individual licensee has no such power. And while for some years the Federal Communications Commission's views on this matter were not clearly articulated, since 1948 it has continuously held that licensees cannot remove allegedly libelous matter from speeches by candidates. Similarly, the legislative history of the measure both prior to its first enactment in 1927, and subsequently, shows a deep hostility to censorship either by the Commission or by a licensee. More important, it is obvious that permitting a broadcasting station to censor allegedly libelous remarks would undermine the basic purpose for which § 315 was passed—full and unrestricted discussion of political issues by legally qualified candidates. That section dates back to, and was adopted verbatim from, the Radio Act of 1927. In that Act, Congress provided for the first time a comprehensive federal plan for regulating the new and expanding art of radio broadcasting. Recognizing radio's potential importance as a medium of communication of political ideas, Congress sought to foster its broadest possible utilization by encouraging broadcasting stations to make their facilities available to candidates for office without discrimination, and by insuring that these candidates when broadcasting were not to be hampered by censorship of the issues they could discuss. Thus, expressly applying this country's tradition of free expression to the field of radio broadcasting, Congress has from the first emphatically forbidden the Commission to exercise any power of censorship over radio communication. It is in line with this same tradition that the individual licensee has consistently been denied "power of censorship" in the vital area of political broadcasts.

The decision a broadcasting station would have to make in censoring libelous discussion by a candidate is far from easy. Whether a statement is defamatory is rarely clear. Whether such a statement is actionably libelous is an even more complex question, involving as it does, consideration of various legal defenses such as "truth" and the privilege of fair comment. Such issues have always troubled courts. Yet, under petitioner's view of the statute they would have to be resolved by an individual licensee during the stress of a political campaign, often, necessarily, without adequate consideration or basis for decision. Quite possibly, if a station were held responsible for the broadcast of libelous material, all remarks even faintly objectionable would be excluded out of an excess of caution. Moreover, if any censorship were permissible, a station so inclined could intentionally inhibit a candidate's legitimate presentation under the guise of lawful censorship of libelous matter. Because of the time limitation inherent in a political campaign, erroneous decisions by a station could not be corrected by the courts promptly enough to permit the candidate to bring improperly excluded matter before the public. It follows from all this that allowing censorship, even of the attenuated type advocated here, would almost inevitably force a candidate to avoid controversial issues during political debates over radio and television, and hence restrict the coverage of consideration relevant to intelligent political decision. We cannot believe, and we certainly are unwilling to assume, that Congress intended any such result.

Petitioner alternatively argues that § 315 does not grant a station immunity from liability for defamatory statements made during a political broadcast even though the section prohibits the station from censoring allegedly libelous matter. Again, we cannot agree. For under this interpretation, unless a licensee refuses to permit any candidate to talk at all, the section would sanction the unconscionable result of permitting civil and perhaps criminal liability to be imposed for the very conduct the statute demands of the licensee. Accordingly, judicial interpretations reaching the issue have found an immunity implicit in the section. And in all those cases concluding that a licensee had no immunity, § 315 had been construed—improperly as we hold—to permit a station to censor potentially actionable material. In no case has a court even implied that the licensee would not be rendered immune were it denied the power to censor libelous material.

* * * Thus, whatever adverse inference may be drawn from the failure of Congress to legislate an express immunity is offset by its refusal to permit stations to avoid liability by censoring broadcasts. And more than balancing any adverse inferences drawn from congressional failure to legislate an express immunity is the fact that the Federal Communications Commission—the body entrusted with administering the provisions of the Act—has long interpreted § 315 as granting stations an immunity. Not only has this interpretation been adhered to despite many subsequent legislative proposals to modify § 315, but with full knowledge of the Commission's interpretation Congress has since made significant additions to that section without amending it to depart from the Commission's view. In light of this contradictory legislative background we do not feel compelled to reach a result which seems so in conflict with traditional concepts of fairness.

Petitioner nevertheless urges that broadcasters do not need a specific immunity to protect themselves from liability for defamation since they may either insure against any loss, or in the alternative, deny all political candidates use of station facilities. We have no means of knowing to what extent insurance is available to broadcasting stations, or what it would cost them. Moreover, since § 315 expressly prohibits stations from charging political candidates higher rates than they charge for comparable time used for other purposes, any cost of insurance would probably have to be absorbed by the stations themselves. Petitioner's reliance on the stations' freedom from obligation "to allow use of its station by any such candidate," seems equally misplaced. While denying all candidates use of stations would protect broadcasters from liability, it would also effectively withdraw political discussion from the air. Instead the thrust of § 315 is to facilitate political debate over radio and television. Recognizing this, the Communications Commission considers the carrying of political broadcasts a public service criterion to be considered both in license renewal proceedings, and in comparative contests for a radio or television construction permit. Certainly Congress knew the obvious—that if a licensee could protect himself from liability in no other way but by refusing to broadcast candidates' speeches, the necessary effect would be to hamper the congressional plan to develop broadcasting as a political outlet, rather than to foster it. We are aware that causes of action for libel are widely recognized throughout the States. But we have not hesitated to abrogate state law where satisfied that its enforcement would stand "as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress." Here, petitioner is asking us to attribute to § 315 a meaning which would either frustrate the underlying purposes for which it was enacted, or alternatively impose unreasonable burdens on the parties governed by that legislation. In the absence of clear expression by Congress we will not assume that it desired such a result. Agreeing with the state courts of North Dakota that § 315 grants a licensee an immunity from liability for libelous material it broadcasts, we merely read § 315 in accordance with what we believe to be its underlying purpose.

Affirmed.

COMMENT

In a dissent joined by Justices Harlan, Whittaker, and Stewart, Justice Frankfurter appealed broadly for a doctrine of judicial restraint: the Court must not contravene the purpose or play the role of a legislative body. Unable to find evidence that Congress had ever intended immunity for the broadcaster in such situations, Frankfurter gave short shrift to WDAY's dilemma. The state libel laws, he said, merely make political broadcasts potentially less profitable since the station may have to compensate someone libeled during a candidate's broadcast.

Group Libel

1. The question arises as to how small a group must be before a libel against it will permit individual members to sue; or, conversely, how large must a group be before its members become sufficiently anonymous to defy personal identification? Generally speaking, a group must be small enough to permit individual identification of its members. A plaintiff in such circumstances must show that he or she is a member of the defamed group and indicate how the offending words apply to him or her. Journalistic caution is required for groups of less than 100.

2. Jack Lait and Lee Mortimer, authors of U.S.A. Confidential, found themselves in a libel suit as a result of the following paragraphs as reported in Neiman-Marcus Co. v. Lait, 13 F.R.D. 311 (D.N.Y.1952):

He [Stanley Marcus, president of plaintiff Neiman-Marcus Company] may not know that some Neiman models are call girls—the top babes in town. The guy who escorts one feels in the same league with the playboys who took out Ziegfeld's glorified. Price, a hundred bucks a night.

The sales girls are good, too—pretty, and often much cheaper—twenty bucks on the average. They're more fun, too, not as snooty as the models. We got this confidential, from a Dallas wolf.

Neiman-Marcus also contributes to the improvement of the local breed when it imports New York models to make a flash at style shows. These girls are the cream of the crop. Oil millionaires toss around thousand-dollar bills for a chance to take them out.

Neiman's was a women's speciality shop until the old biddies who patronized it decided their husbands should get class, too. So Neiman's put in a men's store. Well, you should see what happened. You wonder how all the faggots got to the wild and woolly. You thought those with talent ended up in New York and Hollywood and the plodders got government jobs in Washington. Then you learn the nucleus of the Dallas fairy colony is composed of many Neiman dress and millinery designers, imported from New York and Paris, who sent for their boy friends when the men's store expanded. Now most of the sales staff are fairies, too.

Houston is faced with a serious homosexual problem. It is not as evident as Dallas', because there are no expensive imported faggots in town like those in the Neiman-Marcus set.

* * *

Nine models, the total number then employed, and fifteen of twenty-five salesmen were allowed to bring suit. But thirty sales girls, acting on behalf of 382, were not, the latter group being too large for individual identification. The case was settled without trial. None of the plaintiffs received compensation, but attorney fees were paid, and the danger signal had flashed. The court in Neiman-Marcus did lay down the following rules:

1) Where the group or class libeled is large, none can sue even though the language used is inclusive; 2) when the group or class libeled is small and each and every member of the group is referred to, then any individual member can sue; and 3) where there is disagreement whether some or all of a group has been libeled, at least an action can be attempted.

3. Circumstances surrounding a publication may focus an attack on a particular party. For example, when a correspondence school was the object of an attack and it was the only enterprise of that kind in the town in which the newspaper was circulated, the impact of the publication became apparent. Certainly pictorial identification would assist plaintiffs suing as members of a large class.<sup>172</sup>

An AP story identifying a murder and robbery suspect as a member of the Socialist Workers Party did not defame either the party or its chief executive officer, said a New York court.<sup>173</sup>

One of many consequences of the controversial network film, "Death of a Princess," was a libel suit on behalf of "all Muslims." A California federal court would not permit it to proceed in view of the size of the class of allegedly defamed persons. Mansour v. Fanning, 6 Med.L. Rptr. 2055, 506 F.Supp. 186 (D.Calif.1980).

Nor were twenty-four of 325 newspaper employees sufficiently identified to support their libel suit against a larger newspaper. In the same case a federal district court also disallowed three of the newspaper's eight editors from bringing suit. Specificity, however, may be easier to demonstrate in a group as small as eight. Care is recommended. Loeb v. Globe Newspaper, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1235, 489 F.Supp. 481 (D.Mass.1980).

4. Since group defamation lends itself to the application of criminal libel laws, and criminal libel has been connected to seditious libel, the uncertainty of the Beauharnais case (see pp. 210, 213) persists. Is more speech preferable to enforced silence, or do verbally oppressed minorities need a champion in the law? The trend has been toward the "more speech" doctrine, and only a few states retain viable group defamation laws.<sup>174</sup> And certainly the doctrine of New York Times runs against the current of group, criminal, or seditious libel statutes.

For a discussion of group libel problems in the broadcast media, see this text, p. 898.

Although not a group libel case per se, the most potentially explosive case of its kind since Beauharnais was the Skokie case. There the American Nazi Party's display of swastikas during planned demonstrations was said by the Illinois Supreme Court not to constitute "fighting words" but symbolic speech entitled to First Amendment protection.

Skokie's large Jewish population, deeply offended and frightened by the Nazi symbols, had gotten an injunction barring their display. Such an injunction was an unconstitutional prior restraint, said the Illinois Supreme Court, on the party's right to freedom of speech. Village of Skokie v. National Socialist Party, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1704, 373 N.E.2d 21 (Ill.1978).

Though sympathetic with survivors of the Nazi holocaust, the Illinois court found the weight of precedent overwhelming. Relying heavily on Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15 (1971), a case in which a defendant's right to wear a jacket bearing the words "Fuck the Draft" in a Los Angeles County courthouse corridor was upheld, the Illinois court found the rationale behind Skokie's injunction "inherently boundless":

Surely the [s]tate has no right to cleanse public debate to the point where it is grammatically palatable to the most squeamish among us. Yet no readily ascertainable general principle exists for stopping short of that result were we to affirm the judgment below. * * * Indeed, governments might soon seize upon the censorship of particular words (emblems) as a convenient guise for banning the expression of unpopular views.

A hostile audience, the court added, is not a basis for restraining otherwise legal First Amendment activity. Interference would be justified only if the speaker were to incite others to immediate unlawful action.

Quoting a New York appellate court in Rockwell v. Morris, 211 N.Y.S.2d 25 (1961), a case involving former American Nazi leader George Lincoln Rockwell, the Illinois Supreme Court concluded:

So, the unpopularity of views, their shocking quality, their obnoxiousness, and even their alarming impact is not enough. Otherwise, the preacher of any strange doctrine could be stopped; the anti-racist himself could be suppressed, if he undertakes to speak in 'restricted' areas.

Case law, said the court, directs the citizens of Skokie to avoid the offensive symbol if they can do so without unreasonable inconvenience. See text, p. 30ff.

For subscribing to this "theory" of the First Amendment, the American Civil Liberties Union lost thousands of members in 1977 and 1978.

Libel of the Dead

1. In an effort to avoid assaults on publishers by sensitive survivors and endless chain suits by brothers, sisters, aunts, uncles, and cousins, only a criminal action is permitted for a libel of the dead, the intention being to prevent breaches of the public peace and good order rather than to protect individual reputation. If direct or indirect defamatory references are made to the living, however, a civil action can be brought, but the defamatory implication has to be clear.

When the New York Daily Mirror confused the name of a recently deceased person with that of a notorious criminal, the deceased's wife and children, who had been listed in the article, brought an action against the newspaper. See Rose v. Daily Mirror, 31 N.E.2d 182 (N.Y.1940). The court of appeals said:

Defendant does not deny that the publication complained of was a libel on the memory of the deceased Jack Rose. Plaintiffs make no claim of any right to recover for that wrong. They stand upon the position that the publication—while it did not affect their reputations in respect of any matter of morals—tended to subject them in their own persons to contumely and indignity and was, therefore, a libel upon them. * * In this state, however, it has long been accepted law that a libel or slander upon the memory of a deceased person which makes no direct reflection upon his relatives gives them no cause of action for defamation.

"To libel the dead is not an offence known to our law; the dead have no rights and can suffer no wrongs." Justice Stephen in R. v. Ensor, 3 L.T.R. 366 (1887).<sup>175</sup>

In most states the same rule applies to privacy claims. Hendrickson v. California Newspapers, Inc., 121 Cal.Rptr. 429 (1975).

2. In 1957, Helen C. Frick, daughter and sole survivor of Pennsylvania industrialist Henry Clay Frick, brought a libel suit against Dr. Sylvester Stevens, chairman of the Pennsylvania Historical Society and author of a widely acclaimed book, Pennsylvania: Birthplace of a Nation. Miss Frick complained that the book misrepresented her father as a stern and autocratic union buster who underpaid and overworked his employees, provided them with minimal safety conditions, pressured them to buy overpriced goods at the company store and to live in shoddy wooden shacks without sanitary facilities at inflated rents. Anything tending to blacken the memory of her father, Miss Frick averred, would tend to lower her in the esteem of the community, for through her philanthropies she had become associated with the memory of her father.

175. See also Meeropol v. Nizer, 381 F.Supp. 29 (D.N.Y.1974), p. 255 this text; Gonzales v. Times Herald Printing Co., 513 S.W.2d 124 (Tex.1974); Casamasina v. Worcester Telegram & Gazette, Inc., 307 N.E.2d 865 (Mass.1974).

A Pennsylvania county court, embarking upon an historical investigation of its own, found the charges either to be true or nondefamatory. The court implied that Stevens's book was a first-rate historical study, and it added:

First, no substantial right of the plaintiff will be impaired to a material degree. * * * [N]o rights of the plaintiff are involved here, only the rights of her deceased father, if any. Her name is not mentioned and her reputation is not involved, so that no right of reputation or privacy of hers is involved.

Second, the remedy at law is not inadequate; there has been no wrong done by defendant and plaintiff has suffered no injury so there is nothing to redress in this case. There being no injury, there is no remedy at law or in equity.

Next, the exercise of previous restraint in a case of this type would impose an impossible burden on the court. It is true the courts are open to redress wrongs, but it would be impossible to exercise previous restraint over the voluminous publications now on the market.

If equity would undertake to decree corrections in a book for every person named therein who sought to obtain corrections satisfactory to his beliefs, a court of equity would be writing the book not the author.

If everyone read a book as plaintiff read this one, by looking into the index for an ancestor's name, and on cursory examination started action to enjoin or correct the book, our bookshelves would either be empty or contain books written only by relatives of the subject. Frick v. Stevens, 43 D. & C.2d 6 (Pa.1964).

For a contrary and decidedly minority view of the rights of deceased persons, see MacDonald v. Time, 9 Med.L.Rptr. 1025 (D.N.J.1983).

A PRACTICAL DEFENSE: INSURANCE

Libel insurance can help restore an editor's flagging courage. Available in one form or another for the past fifty years, it is estimated that only about one-half of publishers and broadcasters carry it. This is probably a mistake. Insurance dims the prospect of devastating losses resulting from frivolous suits and out-of-court settlements.

Leading insurers are Mutual Insurance of Hamilton, Bermuda, organized by the American Newspaper Publishers Association to provide, first, strike insurance in 1939, and then libel insurance in 1963; Continental Casualty, which first specialized in campus publications and is now heavily involved in broadcasting;<sup>176</sup> Fireman's Fund; Employers Reinsurance; Seaboard Surety; Lloyd's of London; and Chubb/Pacific.

Companies are divided on whether and how to cover punitive damages and what exceptions to make for certain kinds of journalistic behavior. Certainly, coverage of punitive damages is the greatest need, and most policies meet it. Twenty-eight states, however, bar insurance protection against punitive damages if a deliberate intent to harm the plaintiff is shown. New York and California are among them. But gross negligence or reckless disregard for truth does not preclude such coverage in 29 of the 39 states that have addressed the question. Costs of defense (lawyer's fees and court costs) must also be included, and these can become very heavy in the pretrial period. Most policies exclude fines and penalties levied against reporters for criminal offenses such as refusing to identify a source when there are no good statutory or constitutional reasons for doing so, e.g., having been a witness to a crime.

Look for policies also with low premiums and deductibles and with initial coverage of at least $1 million per suit. Be certain also that the insurer leaves you, the editor or publisher, in control of the suit. In the past, insurance companies have often been too eager to settle out of court when principled publishers would have preferred to litigate or appeal adverse judgments. And editors should still be able to choose their own counsel, although insurers may be prepared, indeed must be prepared, to provide expert legal advisers.

Although early policies covered privacy, piracy, and copyright as well as libel, insurance firms are now expanding beyond these to cover, in a separate policy, all forms of First Amendment litigation—closed judicial hearings, prior restraints, access to information, newsroom searches, subpoenas, contempt, and antitrust. Few publications or broadcast stations, if they are to serve public interests aggressively, can afford to be without prepaid legal counsel. Courts have recognized, of course, that libel laws are not intended to provide financial windfalls for ingenious plaintiffs; rather, their purpose is to provide a public forum for vindicating a reputation and for gaining just compensation when reputation has been wantonly damaged. Libel laws are not designed to ruin defendants or destroy their publications,<sup>177</sup> although libel awards in the 80s might cause one to question that proposition. From an insurance claim perspective, dangerous states are California, Oklahoma, Florida, Alabama, South Carolina, Hawaii, Alaska, and, to a lesser extent, Vermont and New Hampshire.

MITIGATING FACTORS

Mitigating factors are the last lines of defense and are intended to demonstrate to a judge and jury good faith and lack of malice on the part of the publisher. They do not get a complaint dismissed or a defendant out of court, but they may make a substantial difference in the amount of damages paid.

Retraction and Correction

1. In more than half the states, retraction statutes limit punitive and general (actual) damages when a retraction is requested and published within the time period specified in the law. Some states allow only special damages when a proper retraction has been made. California's statute is an example:

CALIFORNIA CIVIL CODE § 48a

§ 48a. LIBEL IN NEWSPAPER; SLANDER BY RADIO BROADCAST

Special damages; notice and demand for correction. In any action for damages for the publication of a libel in a newspaper, or of a slander by radio broadcast, plaintiff shall recover no more than special damages unless a correction be demanded and be not published or broadcast, as hereinafter provided. Plaintiff shall serve upon the publisher, at the place of publication or broadcaster at the place of broadcast, a written notice specifying the statements claimed to be libelous and demanding that the same be corrected. Said notice and demand must be served within 20 days after knowledge of the publication or broadcast of the statements claimed to be libelous.

General, special and exemplary damages. If a correction be demanded within said period and be not published or broadcast in substantially as conspicuous a manner in said newspaper or on said broadcasting station as were the statements claimed to be libelous, in a regular issue thereof published or broadcast within three weeks after such service, plaintiff, if he pleads and proves such notice, demand and failure to correct, and if his cause of action be maintained, may recover general, special and exemplary damages; provided that no exemplary damages may be recovered unless the plaintiff shall prove that defendant made the publication or broadcast with actual malice and then only in the discretion of the court or jury, and actual malice shall not be inferred or presumed from the publication or broadcast.

Correction prior to demand. A correction published or broadcast in substantially as conspicuous a manner in said newspaper or on said broadcasting station as the statements claimed in the complaint to be libelous, prior to receipt of a demand therefor, shall be of the same force and effect as though such correction had been published or broadcast within three weeks after a demand therefor.

Definitions. As used herein, the terms "general damages," "special damages," "exemplary damages" and "actual malice," are defined as follows:

a "General damages" are damages for loss of reputation, shame, mortification and hurt feelings;

b "Special damages" are all damages which plaintiff alleges and proves that he has suffered in respect to his property, business, trade, profession or occupation, including such amounts of money as the plaintiff alleges and proves he has expended as a result of the alleged libel, and no other;

c "Exemplary damages" are damages which may in the discretion of the court or jury be recovered in addition to general and special damages for the sake of example and by way of punishing a defendant who has made the publication or broadcast with actual malice;

d "Actual malice" is that state of mind arising from hatred or ill will toward the plaintiff; provided, however, that such a state of mind occasioned by a good faith belief on the part of the defendant in the truth of the libelous publication or broadcast at the time it is published or broadcast shall not constitute actual malice. [Added Stats.1931, c. 1018, p. 2034, § 1. As amended Stats.1945, c. 1489, p. 2763, § 5.]

COMMENT

1. Note that California's definition of actual malice in New York Times v. Sullivan-type cases would not now pass constitutional muster and that "correction" without apology is sufficient. In some jurisdictions the terms "correction" and "retraction" are not used interchangeably as in the California statute. A "retraction" is more than a "correction." A "correction" may have nothing to do with libel; a "retraction" always does. But both are voluntary, unlike the right-of-reply statute struck down by the U.S. Supreme Court in Tornillo (see this text, p. 584).

Note also that the California statute does not cover magazines. This has proved advantageous to plaintiffs in libel suits, including Carol Burnett in her suit against the National Enquirer, 7 Med.L. Rptr. 1321 (1981), see p. 306.

2. Read your own state's retraction statute. It may have unique features and stipulations as to form and timing. See Hanson, Libel and Related Torts, Vol. 1, Case and Comment, 1969, § 195 for a chart of retraction statutes in the United States and Canada.

It generally makes good sense to be simple, direct, and apologetic in a retraction. Keep a record of what you do from the moment a retraction is requested.

3. Courts have held that failure to retract, even when it is admitted that parts of a defamatory article are false, is not evidence of actual malice in a public plaintiff suit<sup>178</sup> or evidence of negligence in a private plaintiff suit.<sup>179</sup> At the same time, a retraction may have no bearing on the issue of actual malice and may be insufficient to establish lack of actual malice as a matter of law.<sup>180</sup>

4. To be effective in states with traditional retraction statutes, a retraction must be full, fair, unequivocal, without lurking insinuations or hesitant withdrawals. Otherwise it may simply aggravate the original libel or form the basis of a new suit. Generally the retraction should be given the same emphasis and prominence of display as the original libel.

An apology, said a New Jersey court, to constitute a retraction of a defamatory article, must be frank and full, since a guarded and half-hearted apology will only injure the reporter's position. Mere publication of the defamed person's denial of the original story or a news story about the issues relative to the bringing of a libel action do not amount to a retraction. An apology, the court added, must unreservedly withdraw all imputations and express regret for the libel.<sup>181</sup> In other states a correction of facts is sufficient.

Acceptable procedure for a publisher to follow on both legal and ethical grounds is to call the injured party, express regret, and assure him or her that no malice was intended. Apologize and offer to retract, but point out the possibility of further adverse publicity through the retraction itself. If it can be accomplished diplomatically and with finesse, the publisher might also offer a small sum for a legal release.

Publication of a retraction as part of a written or verbal agreement with an injured person that the publication shall constitute a complete accord and satisfaction—also known as a settlement—will bar the right of a plaintiff to an action for damages.<sup>182</sup> A legal release, then, precludes future action for defamation in a civil case, although such a waiver is not intended as a license for libel.<sup>183</sup>

Settlements, because they sometimes tempt frivolous plaintiffs to sue, are not attractive to the media. At the same time, an unwillingness to settle may be interpreted as arrogance. Media walk a tightrope. They should be prepared to admit and correct mistakes; they should not cave in to threats or other forms of intimidation.

Once an action has begun, a publisher seeking a settlement should do so only through an attorney so as not to cast aspersions on the righteousness of his or her cause.

5. A libel case once decided by a competent tribunal cannot be revived after a decision on appeal has been made. The doctrine of res judicata (things adjudged), applicable in civil litigation generally, establishes the principle of finality in litigation.

6. An offer to retract, whether or not the state has a retraction statute, may also serve to mitigate damages. So will a plaintiff's refusal to accept a retraction offer.

In some states, a written notice to the publisher must precede a libel action, and this may encourage retractions. In other states, failure to give adequate notice may preclude recovery of all but special damages.

7. Courts which have regarded retraction statutes unfavorably have done so because they believe the constitutional protections of life, liberty, and property militate against such laws. They have also argued that the defamed person is denied a speedy recovery for injury to reputation and that retraction statutes represent class legislation favoring the press and denying the equal protection of the laws.

A less philosophical inadequacy of retraction statutes was noted by Justice Brennan in his plurality opinion in Rosenbloom. "Denials, retractions, and corrections," he said, "are not 'hot' news, and rarely receive the prominence of the original story." Nevertheless he implied the constitutionality of retraction statutes in his concurring opinion in Miami Herald

Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974), see p. 592 this text. See generally Speranza, Reply and Retraction In Actions Against the Press for Defamation: The Effect of Tornillo and Gertz, 43 Fordham L.Rev. 223 (1974).

8. As the ethical standards of the press improve, more and more publishers, short of retraction, are printing or broadcasting corrections and clarifications. In perhaps fifty newspapers, ombudsmen of one kind or another intercede with management in behalf of readers.

Tornillo has invalidated mandatory right-of-reply laws and raised at least a doubt about the constitutionality of retraction statutes. Publication of replies, when they are free of defamation, is becoming a mark of good journalism. But like retractions, their publication must remain voluntary.

With the gradual demise of punitive damages, retractions may be losing some of their appeal. Nevertheless, judges and juries will still consider retraction as evidence of no actual malice. As a general rule it is advisable to use the retraction as a potential mitigating factor in those states that have retraction statutes.

Proof of Previous Bad Reputation

A showing that the character and reputation of the plaintiff are so bad that they cannot be further impaired by a fresh accusation will mitigate damages.

In a case involving a bishop, a U.S. district court said: "On the issue of general damages, the reputation of the plaintiff is a definite issue and the defendant may show the plaintiff's bad reputation in order to mitigate such damages." The court added, however, that bad reputation may not be established by showing misconduct at a time and place far removed from the date and situation of the original injury.<sup>184</sup>

The relationship of the demonstrably bad reputation and the libel must be close. Reference to unrelated acts of misbehavior or crime are no more sufficient in mitigating damages than are general rumors and hearsay.

Reliance on a Usually Reliable Source

Since New York Times, reliance on a usually reliable source will contradict a charge of actual malice, but it may only mitigate a charge of negligence. In Time, Inc. v. Pape, 401 U.S. 279 (1971), the Supreme Court said that "Where the source of the news makes bald assertions of fact—such as that a policeman has arrested a certain man on a criminal charge—there may be no difficulty. But where the source itself has engaged in qualifying the information released, complexities ramify. Any departure from full direct quotations of the words of the source, with all its qualifying language, inevitably confronts the publisher with a set of choices."

In this case a Civil Rights Commission report was considered by the Court to be "extravagantly ambiguous," and the reporter's "adoption of one of a number of possible interpretations * * * though arguably reflecting a misconception" was not enough to create liability.

But quotations taken out of context or material selected to fit a publisher's preconceptions, as in Goldwater v. Ginzburg, 414 F.2d 324 (2d Cir. 1969), may not only constitute negligence but actual malice as well. And in Pape the Court warned reporters that the word "alleged" may be better than no qualification at all in reports damaging to reputation or those based on less than authoritative sources.

The reporter should try to confirm all potentially libelous information in wire service and other reports about persons in his or her own circulation area. These efforts may at least mitigate damages.

Miscellaneous Mitigating Factors

1. Anything a defendant can do to demonstrate that the harm done was not as great as claimed or to show regret or a lack of malice will help to mitigate damages. The assumption underlying all efforts to find mitigating factors, of course, is that the publisher is at fault. That is not always an acceptable assumption.

Statements uttered in the heat and passion of the moment or provoked by actions of the plaintiff lend themselves to mitigation.<sup>185</sup> Efforts to correct errors by stopping the presses or seeking to retrieve copies of a newspaper containing errors must be considered by the jury in mitigation of damages, said a Maryland court.<sup>186</sup>

Belief in the truth of the facts, a Nevada court observed, even though the evidence has not convinced a jury, should be considered in mitigation.<sup>187</sup> So should evidence that positive items concerning the plaintiff were published before or with the libel or evidence that other responsible publications had carried the same charge. The libel may be an unintended case of mistaken identity. Evidence of partial truth may help, as will evidence of journalistic care and competence in getting the plaintiff's side of the story and, where justified, in giving it adequate space.

3. Beyond the law, but not divorced from it, are the ethical responsibilities of the journalist. Accuracy, fairness, and a sensitive weighing of private and public needs are the hallmarks of good journalism. Words carry different connotations and meanings. A statement is not necessarily a confession. An indictment is not a finding of guilt.

Anguish and agony photographs do not always serve a public interest. Prior criminal records are not always crucial to a news story. The public in most circumstances may have as much right to know the source of our information as to have the information itself. Bedroom journalism demeans the press; "cheesecake" reflects a sexist preoccupation with stereotyping.

The purpose of this chapter is not to outline what Max Lerner calls a "bottom line" ethic, where minimum attention is paid to minimum standards in order to prevent personal catastrophe. It is instead to arm the reporter with legal guidelines when he or she is right and acting in his or her best perception of the public interest—and that is often!

"To hold a newsperson accountable for his transgressions is not to censor him," said a Louisiana appeals court in upholding a libel judgment in favor of a police chief, "it is merely to make him mindful of the awesome responsibility he has to the public. Accountability is not a clarion call of 'stop the press'; it is but a whisper for respect for the people who make the news."<sup>188</sup>

Should this be the function of the courts? Whatever the case, the journalist will have to write his or her own ethical guidelines.

SEEKING SUMMARY JUDGMENT

1. Once involved in a libel suit, the defendant's primary objective ought to be to secure a favorable summary judgment (see Rebozo v. Washington Post, this text, p. 250). Where facts for jury determination are not in dispute, there is no question of identification, and a case raises constitutional questions, courts appear to favor summary judgments. From the media defendant's point of view, the advantage of availing oneself of summary judgment procedure is that, if successful, the expense, delay, and anxiety of trial are avoided. These policies were well stated by Judge J. Skelly Wright in Washington Post Co. v. Keogh, 365 F.2d 965, 968 (D.C.Cir.1966):

* * *

In the First Amendment area, summary procedures are even more essential. For the stake here, if harassment succeeds, is free debate. One of the purposes of the Times principle, in addition to protecting persons from being cast in damages in libel suits filed by public officials, is to prevent persons from being discouraged in the full and free exercise of their First Amendment rights with respect to the conduct of their government. The threat of being put to the defense of a lawsuit brought by a popular public official may be as chilling to the exercise of First Amendment freedoms as fear of the outcome of the lawsuit itself, especially to advocates of unpopular causes. All persons who desire to exercise their right to criticize public officials are not as well equipped financially as the Post to defend against a trial on the merits. Unless persons, including newspapers, desiring to exercise their First Amendment rights are assured freedom from the harassment of lawsuits, they will tend to become self-censors. And to this extent debate on public issues and the conduct of public officials will become less uninhibited, less robust, and less wide-open, for self-censorship affecting the whole public is "hardly less virulent for being privately administered."

Summary judgment is generally not granted where facts are still at issue. Plaintiff must have an opportunity to challenge defendant's belief in the truth of a statement or to produce evidence of recklessness or intent. That having been done, actual malice becomes "a constitutional issue to be determined initially by the trial judge on motion for summary judgment."<sup>189</sup> "The use of summary judgment to terminate litigation in this fashion prevents all but the strongest libel cases from proceeding to trial, thereby advancing the first amendment policy of shielding the press from harassment."<sup>190</sup> In response to a motion for summary judgment, plaintiff must establish solid evidence, not conjecture, of actual malice to the level of clear and convincing proof. Failure by plaintiff to meet this severe burden of proof with specific evidence will result in dismissal.<sup>191</sup> Statements of opinion generally lend themselves to summary judgment prior to any period of discovery. And summary judgment is more available in some jurisdictions than in others.

2. As troublesome as anything in Hutchinson v. Proxmire, 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1279, 443 U.S. 111 (1979) (this text, p. 248) was footnote 9 in Chief Justice Burger's opinion for the Court. In the body of its opinion the Court noted:

The [d]istrict [c]ourt relied upon the depositions, affidavits, and pleadings before it to evaluate Hutchinson's claim that respondents had acted with "actual malice." The [d]istrict [c]ourt found that there was no genuine issue of material fact on that issue. It held that neither a failure to investigate nor unfair editing and summarizing could establish "actual malice." It also held that there was nothing in the affidavits or depositions of either Proxmire or Schwartz [the [s]enator's aide] to indicate that they ever entertained any doubts about the truth of their statements. Relying upon cases from other courts, the [d]istrict [c]ourt said that in determining whether a plaintiff had made an adequate showing of "actual malice," summary judgment might well be the rule rather than the exception.

Then in somewhat ominous language, footnote 9 follows:

Considering the nuances of the issues raised here, we are constrained to express some doubt about the so-called "rule." The proof of "actual malice" calls a defendant's state of mind into question * * * and does not readily lend itself to summary disposition.

Fortunately for the media, footnote 9 has not been followed generally by state and federal appeals courts, and summary judgment in nearly 75 percent of cases remains the rule rather than the exception. See Kotlikoff v. Community News, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1549, 444 A.2d 1086 (N.J.1982) and Maressa v. New Jersey Monthly, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1473, 445 A.2d 376 (N.J.1982). The Second Circuit Court of Appeals (possibly for the sake of precedent) and nine or ten states are exceptions. In the Second Circuit case, footnote 9's validity was supported in the statement, "We hold that the same principles applicable to normal summary judgment motions are applicable to such motions when made in a public figure libel suit."<sup>192</sup> In line with that principle, a federal district court added, "The Court thus must disregard the chilling effect on expression protected by the First Amendment and simply examine whether, accepting plaintiff's version of contested facts, 'a reasonable jury could find (actual) malice with convincing clarity'." <sup>193</sup>

3. The latter cases reflect the boomerang quality of New York Times' actual malice test, as did Herbert v. Lando, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1257, 73 F.R.D. 387 (D.N.Y. 1977). In Herbert a federal district court held that a public figure who had brought a $45 million libel suit against a "60 Minutes" producer was entitled under the federal rules of civil procedure to undertake pretrial discovery of any documents in the network's files relevant to the broadcast in order to produce evidence of defendant's "slipshod and sketchy investigative techniques."

Plaintiff, a maverick former army colonel, was to be permitted to fathom conclusions reached by CBS reporters during and after their investigations by having access to their informal conversations with one another and with their sources and by plumbing the depths of their states of mind and intentions. A persistent question is how far should the judicial process be allowed to penetrate the editorial process?

"Knowing falsehood" is obviously a state-of-mind question. How else does a plaintiff prove it without enquiry into an editor's state of mind? Will this kind of government intrusion stifle and inhibit the editorial process? In their opinions for the Second Circuit, Judges Kaufman and Oakes, while acknowledging that "knowing falsehood" and its parent concept of malice had always implied the reading of a defendant's mind by hunch, impression, inference, or what Oakes has since called the "inquisition of Galileo," <sup>194</sup> nevertheless closed the door to the kind of judicial probing they found in the record of the case. Exposure of subjective thought processes would chill journalistic endeavor completely.

"A reporter or editor, aware that his thoughts might have to be justified in a court of law," said Kaufman, "would often be discouraged and dissuaded from the creative verbal testing, probing, and discussion of hypotheses and alternatives which are the sine qua non of responsible journalism. * * * We cannot permit inquiry into Lando's thoughts, opinions and conclusions to consume the very values which * * * Sullivan * * * sought to safeguard."

In his concurring opinion Oakes said that standards for granting summary judgment are "somewhat more relaxed in constitutional libel cases." (fn. 24) Herbert v. Lando, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1241, 568 F.2d 974 (2d Cir. 1977)

4. Some journalists were distressed at the quantity and kinds of material CBS had already turned over to Colonel Herbert and his attorneys. Lando's deposition required twenty-six sessions and stretched over a year. The nearly 3,000 pages of transcripts and 240 exhibits included reporters' notes, network memoranda, drafts of scripts, unused film, and videotapes of interviews. Plaintiff's depositions were also unusually substantial in size. Journalists were even more distressed when the United States Supreme Court reversed the Second Circuit.

HERBERT v. LANDO ET AL.

Justice WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

State Government may make any law "abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press * * *." The question here is whether those Amendments should be construed to provide further protection for the press when sued for defamation than has hitherto been recognized. More specifically, we are urged to hold for the first time that when a member of the press is alleged to have circulated damaging falsehoods and is sued for injury to the plaintiff's reputation, the plaintiff is barred from inquiring into the editorial processes of those responsible for the publication, even though the inquiry would produce evidence material to the proof of a critical element of his cause of action.<sup>2</sup>

* * *

We have concluded that the Court of Appeals misconstrued the First and Fourteenth Amendments and accordingly reverse its judgment.

* * *

* * * New York Times and its progeny made it essential to proving liability that plaintiffs focus on the conduct and state of mind of the defendant. To be liable, the alleged defamer of public officials or of public figures must know or have reason to suspect that his publication is false. In other cases proof of some kind of fault, negligence perhaps, is essential to recovery. Inevitably, unless liability is to be completely foreclosed, the thoughts and editorial processes of the alleged defamer would be open to examination.

It is also untenable to conclude from our cases that, although proof of the necessary state of mind could be in the form of objective circumstances from which the ultimate fact could be inferred, plaintiffs may not inquire directly from the defendants whether they knew or had reason to suspect that their damaging publication was in error. In Butts, 388 U.S. 130 (1967), for example, it is evident from the record that the editorial process had been subjected to close examination and that direct as well as indirect evidence was relied on to prove that the defendant magazine had acted with actual malice. The damages verdict was sustained without any suggestion that plaintiff's proof had trespassed upon forbidden areas.<sup>6</sup>

2. The Circuit Court summarized the inquiries to which Lando objected as follows:

"1. Lando's conclusions during his research and investigation regarding people or leads to be pursued, or not to be pursued, in connection with the '60 Minutes' segment and the Atlantic Monthly article;

"2. Lando's conclusions about facts imparted by interviewees and his state of mind with respect to the veracity of persons interviewed;

"3. The basis for conclusions where Lando testified that he did reach a conclusion concerning the veracity of persons, information or events;

"4. Conversations between Lando and Wallace about matter to be included or excluded from the broadcast publication; and,

"5. Lando's intentions as manifested by his decision to include or exclude certain material."

6. See 388 U.S., at 156-159, where Justice Harlan, writing for the Court, reviewed the record under the standard he preferred to apply to public figures, and upheld the verdict for the plaintiff. Chief Justice Warren independently reviewed the record under the "actual malice" standard of New York Times and also concluded in his concurring opinion that the verdict should be upheld. Id., at 168-170. The evidence relied on and summarized in both opinions included substantial amounts of testimony that would fall within the editorial process privilege as defined by respondents. The record before the Court included depositions by the author of the defamatory article, an individual paid to assist the author in preparation, the Sports Editor of The Saturday Evening Post, and both its Managing Editor and Editor-in-Chief. These depositions revealed The Saturday Evening Post's motives in publishing the story, sources, conversations among the editors and author concerning the research and development of the article, decisions and reasons relating to who should be interviewed and what should be investigated, conclusions as to the importance and veracity of sources and information presented in the article, and conclusions about the impact that publishing the article would have on the subject. Justice Brennan, writing for himself and Justice White, also thought the evidence of record sufficient to satisfy Reliance upon such state-of-mind evidence is by no means a recent development arising from New York Times and similar cases. Rather, it is deeply rooted in the common-law rule, predating the First Amendment, that a showing of malice on the part of the defendant permitted plaintiffs to recover punitive or enhanced damages. In Butts, the Court affirmed the substantial award of punitive damages which in Georgia were conditioned upon a showing of "wanton or reckless indifference or culpable negligence" or "ill will, spite, hatred and an intent to injure * *." 388 U.S., at 165-166. Neither Justice Harlan, id., at 156-162,<sup>8</sup> nor Chief Justice Warren, concurring, id., at 165-168, raised any question as to the propriety of having the award turn on such a showing or as to the propriety of the underlying evidence, which plainly included direct evidence going to the state of mind of the publisher and its responsible agents.

Furthermore, long before New York Times was decided, certain qualified privileges had developed to protect a publisher from liability for libel unless the publication was made with malice. Malice was defined in numerous ways, but in general depended upon a showing that the defendant acted with improper motive. This showing in turn hinged upon the intent or purpose with which the publication was made, the belief of the defendant in the truth of his statement, or upon the ill will which the defendant might have borne towards the defendant.

Courts have traditionally admitted any direct or indirect evidence relevant to the state of mind of the defendant and necessary to defeat a conditional privilege or enhance damages. The rules are applicable to the press and to other defendants alike, and it is evident that the courts across the country have long been accepting evidence going to the editorial processes of the media without encountering constitutional objections.

In the face of this history, old and new, the Court of Appeals nevertheless declared that two of this Court's cases had announced unequivocal protection for the editorial process.

In each of these cases, Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974), and Columbia Broadcasting System v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. 94 (1973), we invalidated governmental efforts to pre-empt editorial decision by requiring the publication of specified material. In Columbia Broadcasting System, it was the requirement that a television network air paid political advertisements and in Tornillo, a newspaper's obligation to the New York Times malice standard. It is quite unlikely that the Court would have arrived at the result it did had it believed that inquiry into the editorial processes was constitutionally forbidden.

The Court engaged in similar analysis of the record in reversing the judgments entered in a companion case to Butts, Associated Press v. Walker, 388 U.S., at 158-159; id., at 165 (Warren, C.J., concurring); and in Time v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374, 391-394 (1967). In Hill, the record included the edited drafts of the allegedly libelous article and an examination and cross-examination of the author. During that examination, the writer explained in detail the preparation of the article, his thoughts, conclusions, and beliefs regarding the material, and a line-by-line analysis of the article with explanations of how and why additions and deletions were made to the various drafts. As in Butts, the editorial process was the focus of much of the evidence, and direct inquiry was made into the state of mind of the media defendants. Yet the Court raised no question as to the propriety of the proof.

8. As Justice Harlan noted the jury had been instructed in considering punitive damages to assess "the reliability, the nature of the sources of the plaintiff's information, its acceptance or rejection of the sources, its care in checking upon assertions." 388 U.S., at 156 [emphasis added]. The Justice found nothing amiss either with the instruction or the result the jury reached under it. Justice Brennan, dissenting in the Butts case, id., at 172-174, analyzed the instructions differently but raised no question as to the constitutionality of turning the award of either compensatory or punitive damages upon direct as well as circumstantial evidence going to the mental state of the defendant.

print a political candidate's reply to press criticism. Insofar as the laws at issue in Tornillo and Columbia Broadcasting System sought to control in advance the content of the publication, they were deemed as invalid as were prior efforts to enjoin publication of specified materials.

But holdings that neither a State nor the Federal Government may dictate what must or must not be printed neither expressly nor impliedly suggest that the editorial process is immune from any inquiry whatsoever. It is incredible to believe that the Court in Columbia Broadcasting System or in Tornillo silently effected a substantial contraction of the rights preserved to defamation plaintiffs in Sullivan, Butts and like cases.

Tornillo and Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., were announced on the same day; and although the Court's opinion in Gertz contained an overview of recent developments in the relationship between the First Amendment and the law of libel, there was no hint that a companion case had narrowed the evidence available to a defamation plaintiff. Quite the opposite inference is to be drawn from the Gertz opinion, since it, like prior First Amendment libel cases, recited without criticism the facts of record indicating that the state of mind of the editor had been placed at issue. Nor did the Gertz opinion, in requiring proof of some degree of fault on the part of the defendant editor and in forbidding punitive damages absent at least reckless disregard of truth or falsity, suggest that the First Amendment also foreclosed direct inquiry into these critical elements.<sup>17</sup>

In sum, contrary to the views of the Court of Appeals, according an absolute privilege to the editorial process of a media defendant in a libel case is not required, authorized or presaged by our prior cases, and would substantially enhance the burden of proving actual malice, contrary to the expectations of New York Times, Butts and similar cases.

It is nevertheless urged by respondents that the balance struck in New York Times should now be modified to provide further protections for the press when sued for circulating erroneous information damaging to individual reputation. It is not uncommon or improper, of course, to suggest the abandonment, modification or refinement of existing constitutional interpretation, and notable developments in First Amendment jurisprudence have evolved from just such submissions. But in the 15 years since New York Times, the doctrine announced by that case, which represented a major development and which was widely perceived as essentially protective of press freedoms, has been repeatedly affirmed as the appropriate First Amendment standard applicable in libel actions brought by public officials and public figures. At the same time, however, the Court has reiterated its conviction—reflected in the laws of defamation of all of the States—that the individual's interest in his reputation is also a basic concern.

We are thus being asked to modify firmly established constitutional doctrine by placing beyond the plaintiff's reach a range of direct evidence relevant to proving knowing or reckless falsehood by the publisher of an alleged libel, elements that are critical to plaintiffs such as Herbert. The case for making this modification is by no means clear and convincing, and we decline to accept it.

17. Two years later, in Time, Inc. v. Firestone, 424 U.S. 448 (1976), there was likewise no indication that the plaintiff is subject to substantial evidentiary restrictions in proving the defendant's fault. As Justice Powell and Justice Stewart stated in concurrence, the answer to this question of culpability "depends upon a careful consideration of all the relevant evidence concerning Time's actions prior to the publication of the 'Milestones' article." Id., at 465-466. They suggested that on remand all the evidence of record should be considered, which included evidence going to the beliefs of Time's editorial staff.

In the first place, it is plain enough that the suggested privilege for the editorial process would constitute a substantial interference with the ability of a defamation plaintiff to establish the ingredients of malice as required by New York Times. As respondents would have it, the defendant's reckless disregard of the truth, a critical element, could not be shown by direct evidence through inquiry into the thoughts, opinions and conclusions of the publisher but could be proved only by objective evidence from which the ultimate fact could be inferred. It may be that plaintiffs will rarely be successful in proving awareness of falsehood from the mouth of the defendant himself, but the relevance of answers to such inquiries, which the District Court recognized and the Court of Appeals did not deny, can hardly be doubted. To erect an impenetrable barrier to the plaintiff's use of such evidence on his side of the case is a matter of some substance, particularly when defendants themselves are prone to assert their good-faith belief in the truth of their publications, and libel plaintiffs are required to prove knowing or reckless falsehood with "convincing clarity." New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S., at 285-286.

Furthermore, the outer boundaries of the editorial privilege now urged are difficult to perceive. The opinions below did not state, and respondents do not explain, precisely when the editorial process begins and when it ends. Moreover, although we are told that respondent Lando was willing to testify as to what he "knew" and what he had "learned" from his interviews, as opposed to what he "believed," it is not at all clear why the suggested editorial privilege would not cover knowledge as well as belief about the veracity of published reports.<sup>19</sup> It is worth noting here that the privilege as asserted by respondents would also immunize from inquiry the internal communications occurring during the editorial process and thus place beyond reach what the defendant participants learned or knew as the result of such collegiate conversations or exchanges. If damaging admissions to colleagues are to be barred from evidence, would a reporter's admissions made to third parties not participating in the editorial process also be immune from inquiry? We thus have little doubt that Herbert and other defamation plaintiffs have important interests at stake in opposing the creation of the asserted privilege.

Nevertheless, we are urged by respondents to override these important interests because requiring disclosure of editorial conversations and of a reporter's conclusions about the veracity of the material he has gathered will have an intolerable chilling effect on the editorial process and editorial decision-making. But if the claimed inhibition flows from the fear of damages liability for publishing knowing or reckless falsehoods, those effects are precisely what New York Times and other cases have held to be consistent with the First Amendment. Spreading false information in and of itself carries no First Amendment credentials. "[T]here is no constitutional value in false statements of fact." Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S., at 340.

Realistically, however, some error is inevitable; and the difficulties of separating fact from fiction convinced the Court in New York Times, Butts, Gertz, and similar cases to limit liability to instances where some degree of culpability is present in order to eliminate the risk of undue self-censorship and the suppression of truthful material. Those who publish

19. It was also suggested at oral argument that the privilege would cover questions in the "why" form, but not of the "who," "what," "when," and "where" type. But it is evident from Lando's deposition that questions soliciting "why" answers relating to the editorial process were answered, and that he refused to answer others that did not fall into this category.

defamatory falsehoods with the requisite culpability, however, are subject to liability, the aim being not only to compensate for injury but also to deter publication of unprotected material threatening injury to individual reputation. Permitting plaintiffs such as Herbert to prove their cases by direct as well as indirect evidence is consistent with the balance struck by our prior decisions. If such proof results in liability for damages which in turn discourages the publication of erroneous information known to be false or probably false, this is no more than what our cases contemplate and does not abridge either freedom of speech or of the press.

Of course, if inquiry into editorial conclusions threatens the suppression not only of information known or strongly suspected to be unreliable but also of truthful information, the issue would be quite different. But as we have said, our cases necessarily contemplate examination of the editorial process to prove the necessary awareness of probable falsehood, and if indirect proof of this element does not stifle truthful publication and is consistent with the First Amendment, as respondents seem to concede, we do not understand how direct inquiry with respect to the ultimate issue would be substantially more suspect. Perhaps such examination will lead to liability that would not have been found without it, but this does not suggest that the determinations in these instances will be inaccurate and will lead to the suppression of protected information. On the contrary, direct inquiry from the actors, which affords the opportunity to refute inferences that might otherwise be drawn from circumstantial evidence, suggests that more accurate results will be obtained by placing all, rather than part, of the evidence before the decision-maker. Suppose, for example, that a reporter has two contradictory reports about the plaintiff, one of which is false and damaging, and only the false one is published. In resolving the issue whether the publication was known or suspected to be false, it is only common sense to believe that inquiry from the author, with an opportunity to explain, will contribute to accuracy. If the publication is false but there is an exonerating explanation, the defendant will surely testify to this effect. Why should not the plaintiff be permitted to inquire before trial? On the other hand, if the publisher in fact had serious doubts about accuracy, but published nevertheless, no undue self-censorship will result from permitting the relevant inquiry. Only knowing or reckless error will be discouraged; and unless there is to be an absolute First Amendment privilege to inflict injury by knowing or reckless conduct, which respondents do not suggest, constitutional values will not be threatened.

It is also urged that frank discussion among reporters and editors will be dampened and sound editorial judgment endangered if such exchanges, oral or written, are subject to inquiry by defamation plaintiffs.<sup>22</sup> We do not doubt the direct relationship between consultation and discussion on the one hand and sound decisions on the other; but whether or not there is liability for the injury, the press has an obvious interest in avoiding the infliction of harm by the publication of false information, and it is not unreasonable to expect the media to invoke whatever procedures that may be practicable and useful to that end. Moreover, given exposure to liability when there is knowing or reckless error, there is even more reason to resort to prepublication precautions, such as a frank interchange of fact and opinion. Accordingly, we find it difficult to believe that error-avoiding procedures will be terminated or stifled simply because there is liability for culpable error and because the editorial process will itself be examined in the tiny percentage of instances in which error is claimed and litigation ensues. Nor is there sound reason to believe that editorial exchanges and the editorial process are so subject to distortion and to such recurring misunderstanding that they should be immune from examination in order to avoid erroneous judgments in defamation suits. The evidentiary burden Herbert must carry to prove at least reckless disregard for the truth is substantial indeed, and we are unconvinced that his chances of winning an undeserved verdict are such that an inquiry into what Lando learned or said during editorial process must be foreclosed.

This is not to say that the editorial discussions or exchanges have no constitutional protection from casual inquiry. There is no law that subjects the editorial process to private or official examination merely to satisfy curiosity or to serve some general end such as the public interest; and if there were, it would not survive constitutional scrutiny as the First Amendment is presently construed. No such problem exists here, however, where there is a specific claim of injury arising from a publication that is alleged to have been knowing or recklessly false.<sup>23</sup>

Evidentiary privileges in litigation are not favored,<sup>24</sup> and even those rooted in the Constitution must give way in proper circumstances. The President, for example, does not have an absolute privilege against disclosure of materials subpoenaed for a judicial proceeding. United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974). In so holding, we found that although the President has a powerful interest in confidentiality of communications between himself and his advisers, that interest must yield to a demonstrated specific need for evidence. As we stated, in referring to existing limited privileges against disclosure, "[w]hatever their origins, these exceptions to the demand for every man's evidence are not lightly created nor expansively construed, for they are in derogation of the search for truth." Id., at 710.

With these considerations in mind, we conclude that the present construction of the First Amendment should not be modified by creating the evidentiary privilege which the respondents now urge.

Although defamation litigation, including suits against the press, is an ancient phenomenon, it is true that our cases from New York Times to Gertz have considerably changed the profile of such cases. In years gone by, plaintiffs made out a prima facie case by proving the damaging publication. Truth and privilege were defenses. Intent, motive and malice were not necessarily involved except to counter qualified privilege or to prove exemplary damages. The plaintiff's burden is now considerably expanded. In every or almost every case, the plaintiff must focus on the editorial process and prove a false

23. Justice Brennan would extend more constitutional protection to editorial discussion by excusing answers to relevant questions about in-house conversations until the plaintiff has made a prima facie case of falsity. If this suggestion contemplates a bifurcated trial, first on falsity and then on culpability and injury, we decline to subject libel trials to such burdensome complications and intolerable delay. On the other hand, if, as seems more likely, the prima facie showing does not contemplate a mini-trial on falsity, no resolution of conflicting evidence on this issue, but only a credible assertion by the plaintiff, it smacks of a requirement that could be satisfied by an affidavit or a simple verification of the pleadings. We are reluctant to imbed this formalism in the Constitution.

24. See Elkins v. United States, 364 U.S. 206, 234 (1960) (Frankfurter, J., dissenting): "Limitations are properly placed upon the operation of this general principle [of no testimonial privilege] only to the very limited extent that permitting a refusal to testify or excluding relevant evidence has a public good transcending the normally predominant principle of utilizing all rational means for ascertaining truth." publication attended by some degree of culpability on the part of the publisher. If plaintiffs in consequence now resort to more discovery, it would not be surprising; and it would follow that the costs and other burdens of this kind of litigation have escalated and become much more troublesome for both plaintiffs and defendants. It is suggested that the press needs constitutional protection from these burdens if it is to perform its task,<sup>25</sup> which is indispensable in a system such as ours.

Creating a constitutional privilege foreclosing direct inquiry into the editorial process, however, would not cure this problem for the press. Only complete immunity from liability from defamation would effect this result, and the Court has regularly found this to be an untenable construction of the First Amendment. Furthermore, mushrooming litigation costs, much of it due to pretrial discovery, are not peculiar to the libel and slander area. There have been repeated expressions of concern about undue and uncontrolled discovery, and voices from this Court have joined the chorus. But until and unless there are major changes in the present rules of civil procedure, reliance must be had on what in fact and in law are ample powers of the district judge to prevent abuse.

The Court has more than once declared that the deposition-discovery rules are to be accorded a broad and liberal treatment to effect their purpose of adequately informing the litigants in civil trials. But the discovery provisions, like all of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, are subject to the injunction of Rule 1 that they "be construed to secure the just, speedy, and inexpensive determination of every action." [Emphasis added.] To this end, the requirement of Rule 26(b)(1) that the material sought in discovery be "relevant" should be firmly applied, and the district courts should not neglect their power to restrict discovery where "justice requires [protection for] a party or person from annoyance, embarrassment, oppression, or undue burden or expense. * * *" Fed. Rule Civ.Proc. 26(c). With this authority at hand, judges should not hesitate to exercise appropriate control over the discovery process.

Whether, as a nonconstitutional matter, however, the trial judge properly applied the rules of discovery was not within the boundaries of the question certified under 28 U.S.C.A. § 1292(b) and accordingly is not before us.<sup>27</sup> The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed.

So ordered.

Burger, C.J., and Blackmun, Powell, Rehnquist, and Stevens, JJ., joined the opinion of the Court.

Justice POWELL, concurring.

I join the opinion of the Court, and write separately to elaborate. * * * I do not see my observations as being inconsistent with the Court's opinion; rather, I write to emphasize the additional point that, in supervising discovery in a libel suit by a public figure, a district court has a duty to consider First Amendment inter-

25. It is urged that the large costs of defending lawsuits will intimidate the press and lead to self-censorship, particularly where smaller newspapers and broadcasters are involved. It is noted that Lando's deposition alone continued intermittently for over a year, filled 26 volumes containing nearly 3,000 pages and 240 exhibits. As well as out-of-pocket expenses of the deposition, there were substantial legal fees, and Lando and his associates were diverted from news gathering and reporting for a significant amount of time.

27. Justice Stewart would remand to have the trial court rule once again on the relevance of the disputed questions. But the opinion of the trial judge reveals that he correctly understood that New York Times and Gertz required Herbert to prove either knowing falsehood or reckless disregard for truth. With the proper constitutional elements in mind, the judge went on to rule that the questions at issue were clearly relevant and that no constitutional privilege excused Lando from answering them. We hold that the judge committed no constitutional error but, contrary to Justice Stewart, find it inappropriate to review his rulings on relevancy.

ests as well as the private interests of the plaintiffs.

* * * Whatever standard may be appropriate in other types of cases, when a discovery demand arguably impinges on First Amendment rights a district court should measure the degree of relevance required in light of both the private needs of the parties and the public concerns implicated. On the one hand, as this Court has repeatedly recognized, the solicitude for First Amendment rights evidenced in our opinions reflects concern for the important public interest in a free flow of news and commentary. On the other hand, there also is a significant public interest in according to civil litigants discovery of such matters as may be genuinely relevant to their lawsuit. Although the process of weighing these interests is hardly an exact science, it is a function customarily carried out by judges in this and other areas of the law. In performing this task trial judges—despite the heavy burdens most of them carry—are now increasingly recognizing the “pressing need for judicial supervision.”

* * * I join the Court’s opinion on my understanding that in heeding these admonitions, the district court must ensure that the values protected by the First Amendment, though entitled to no constitutional privilege in a case of this kind, are weighed carefully in striking a proper balance.

Justice STEWART, dissenting.

It seems to me that both the Court of Appeals and this Court have addressed a question that is not presented by the case before us. As I understand the constitutional rule of New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), inquiry into the broad “editorial process” is simply not relevant in a libel suit brought by a public figure against a publisher. And if such an inquiry is not relevant, it is not permissible. Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 26(b).

Although I joined the Court’s opinion in New York Times, I have come greatly to regret the use in that opinion of the phrase “actual malice.” For the fact of the matter is that “malice” as used in the New York Times opinion simply does not mean malice as that word is commonly understood. In common understanding, malice means ill will or hostility, and the most relevant question in determining whether a person’s action was motivated by actual malice is to ask “why.” As part of the constitutional standard enunciated in the New York Times case, however, “actual malice” has nothing to do with hostility or ill will, and the question “why” is totally irrelevant.

Under the constitutional restrictions imposed by New York Times and its progeny, a plaintiff who is a public official or public figure can recover from a publisher for a defamatory statement upon convincingly clear proof of the following elements:

1. the statement was published by the defendant.
2. the statement defamed the plaintiff,
3. the defamation was untrue,
4. and the defendant knew the defamatory statement was untrue, or published it in reckless disregard of its truth or falsity.

The gravamen of such a lawsuit thus concerns that which was in fact published. What was not published has nothing to do with the case. And liability ultimately depends upon the publisher’s state of knowledge of the falsity of what he published, not at all upon his motivation in publishing it—not at all, in other words, upon actual malice as those words are ordinarily understood.

This is not the first time that judges and lawyers have been led astray by the phrase “actual malice” in the New York Times opinion. In Greenbelt Cooperative Publishing Association v. Bresler, 398 U.S. 6 (1970), another defamation suit brought by a public figure against a publisher, the trial judge instructed the jury that the plaintiff could recover if the defendant’s publication had been made with malice, and that malice means "spite, hostility, or deliberate intention to harm." In reversing the judgment for the plaintiff, we said that this jury instruction constituted "error of constitutional magnitude." 398 U.S., at 10.

In the present case, of course, neither the Court of Appeals nor this Court has overtly committed the egregious error manifested in Bresler. Both courts have carefully enunciated the correct New York Times test. But each has then followed a false trail, explainable only by an unstated misapprehension of the meaning of New York Times "actual malice," to arrive at the issue of "editorial process" privilege. This misapprehension is reflected by numerous phrases in the prevailing Court of Appeals opinions: "a journalist's exercise of editorial control and judgments," "how a journalist formulated his judgments," "the editorial selection process of the press," "the heart of the editorial process," "reasons for the inclusion or exclusion of certain material." See 568 F.2d 974, passim. Similar misapprehension is reflected in this Court's opinion by such phrases as "improper motive," "intent or purpose with which the publication is made," "ill will," and by lengthy footnote discussion about the spite or hostility required to constitute malice at common law.

Once our correct bearings are taken, however, and it is firmly recognized that a publisher's motivation in a case such as this is irrelevant, there is clearly no occasion for inquiry into the editorial process as conceptualized in this case. I shall not burden this opinion with a list of the 84 discovery questions at issue.<sup>2</sup> Suffice it to say that few if any of them seem to me to come within even the most liberal construction of Rule 26(b), Fed. Rule Civ. Proc.

* * *

In a system of federal procedure whose prime goal is "the just, speedy, and inexpensive determination of every action," time-consuming and expensive pretrial discovery is burdensome enough, even when within the arguable bounds of Rule 26(b). But totally irrelevant pretrial discovery is intolerable.

Like the Court of Appeals, I would remand this case to the District Court, but with directions to measure each of the proposed questions strictly against the constitutional criteria of New York Times and its progeny. Only then can it be determined whether invasion of the editorial process is truly threatened.

Justice MARSHALL, dissenting.

Although professing to maintain the accommodation of interests struck in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), the Court today is unresponsive to the constitutional considerations underlying that opinion. Because I believe that some constraints on pretrial discovery are essential to ensure the "uninhibited [and] robust" debate on public issues which Sullivan contemplated, id., at 270, I respectfully dissent.

2. The following are some random samples:

"Did you ever come to a conclusion that it was unnecessary to talk to Capt. Laurence Potter prior to the presentation of the program on February 4th?"

"Did you ever come to the conclusion that you did not want to have a filmed interview with Sgt. Carmon for the program?"

"When you prepared the final draft of the program to be aired, did you form any conclusion as to whether one of the matters presented by that program was Col. Herbert's view of the treatment of the Vietnamese?"

"Do you have any recollection of discussing with anybody at CBS whether that sequence should be excluded from the program as broadcast?"

"Prior to the publication of the Atlantic Monthly article, Mr. Lando, did you discuss that article or the preparation of that article with any representative of CBS?"

Yet this standard of liability cannot of itself accomplish the ends for which it was conceived. Insulating the press from ultimate liability is unlikely to avert self-censorship so long as any plaintiff with a deep pocket and a facially sufficient complaint is afforded unconstrained discovery of the editorial process. If the substantive balance of interests struck in Sullivan is to remain viable, it must be reassessed in light of the procedural realities under which libel actions are conducted.

The potential for abuse of liberal discovery procedures is of particular concern in the defamation context. As members of the bench and bar have increasingly noted, rules designed to facilitate expeditious resolution of civil disputes have too often proved tools for harassment and delay. Capitalizing on this Court's broad mandate in Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S. 495, 507 (1947), reaffirmed in Schlagenhauf v. Holder, 379 U.S. 104, 114-115 (1964), that discovery rules be accorded a "broad and liberal" scope, litigants have on occasion transformed Rule 26 devices into tactics of attrition. The possibility of such abuse is enhanced in libel litigation, for many self-perceived victims of defamation are animated by something more than a rational calculus of their chances of recovery.<sup>2</sup> Given the circumstances under which libel actions arise, plaintiffs' pretrial maneuvers may be fashioned more with an eye to deterrence or retaliation than to unearthing germane material.

Not only is the risk of in terrorem discovery more pronounced in the defamation context, but the societal consequences attending such abuse are of special magnitude. Rather than submit to the intrusiveness and expense of protracted discovery, even editors confident of their ability to prevail at trial or on a motion for summary judgment may find it prudent to "'steer far wid[e] of the unlawful zone' thereby keeping protected discussion from public cognizance." Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, Inc., 403 U.S. 29, 53 (1971) [plurality opinion] [citation omitted]. Faced with the prospect of escalating attorney's fees, diversion of time from journalistic endeavors, and exposure of potentially sensitive information, editors may well make publication judgments that reflect less the risk of liability than the expense of vindication.

Although acknowledging a problem of discovery abuse, the Court suggests that the remedy lies elsewhere, in "major changes in the present rules of civil procedure." And somewhat inconsistently, the Court asserts further that district judges already have "in fact and in law * * * ample powers * * * to prevent abuse." I cannot agree. Where First Amendment rights are critically implicated, it is incumbent on this Court to safeguard their effective exercise. By leaving the directives of Hickman and Schlagenhauf unqualified with respect to libel litigation, the Court has abdicated that responsibility.

In my judgment, the same constitutional concerns that impelled us in Sullivan to confine the circumstances under which defamation liability could attach also mandate some constraints on roving discovery. I would hold that the broad discovery principles enunciated in Hickman and Schlagenhauf are inapposite in defamation cases. More specifically, I would require that district courts superintend pretrial disclosure in such litigation so as to protect the press from unnecessarily protracted or tangential inquiry. To that end, discovery requests should be measured against a strict standard of relevance. Further, because the threat of disclosure may intrude with special force on certain aspects of the editorial process, I believe some additional protection in the form of an evidentiary privilege is warranted.

* * * So long as Sullivan makes state of mind dispositive, some inquiry as to the manner in which editorial decisions are made is inevitable. And it is simply implausible to suppose that asking a reporter why certain material was or was not included in a given publication will be more likely to stifle incisive journalism than compelling disclosure of other objective evidence regarding that decision.

External evidence of editorial decision making, however, stands on a different footing. For here the concern is not simply that the ultimate product may be inhibited, but that the process itself will be chilled. Journalists cannot stop forming tentative hypotheses, but they can cease articulating them openly. If pre-publication dialogue is freely discoverable, editors and reporters may well prove reluctant to air their reservations or to explore other means of presenting information and comment. The threat of unchecked discovery may well stifle the collegial discussion essential to sound editorial dynamics. * * * Society's interest in enhancing the accuracy of coverage of public events is ill served by procedures tending to muffle expression of uncertainty. To preserve a climate of free interchange among journalists, the confidentiality of their conversation must be guaranteed.

* * * If full disclosure is available whenever a plaintiff can establish that the press erred in some particular, editorial communication would not be demonstrably less inhibited than under the Court's approach. And by hypothesis, it is precisely those instances in which the risk of error is significant that frank discussion is most valuable.

Accordingly, I would foreclose discovery in defamation cases as to the substance of editorial conversation. Shielding this limited category of evidence from disclosure would be unlikely to preclude recovery by plaintiffs with valid defamation claims. For there are a variety of other means to establish deliberate or reckless disregard for the truth, such as absence of verification, inherent implausibility, obvious reasons to doubt the veracity or accuracy of information, and concessions or inconsistent statements by the defendant. See St. Amant v. Thompson, 390 U.S. 727, 732 (1968). To the extent that such a limited privilege might deny recovery in some marginal cases, it is, in my view, an acceptable price to pay for preserving a climate conducive to considered editorial judgment.

Justice BRENNAN, dissenting in part.

* * * The Court today rejects respondents' claim that an "editorial privilege" shields from discovery information that would reveal respondents' editorial processes. I agree with the Court that no such privilege insulates factual matters that may be sought during discovery, and that such a privilege should not shield respondents' "mental processes." I would hold, however, that the First Amendment requires predecisional communication among editors to be protected by an editorial privilege, but that this privilege must yield if a public figure plaintiff is able to demonstrate to the prima facie satisfaction of a trial judge that the libel in question constitutes defamatory falsehood.

* * * An editorial privilege would thus not be merely personal to respondents, but would shield the press in its function "as an agent of the public at large. * * * The press is the necessary representative of the public's interest in this context and the instrumentality which effects the public's right." Saxbe v. Washington Post Co., 417 U.S. 843, 863-864 (1974) [Powell, J., dissenting].

* * * Through the editorial process expression is composed; to regulate the process is therefore to regulate the expression. The autonomy of the speaker is thereby compromised, whether that speaker is a large urban newspaper or an individual pamphleteer. The print and broadcast media, however, because of their large organizational structure, cannot exist without some form of editorial process. The protection of the editorial process of these institutions thus becomes a matter of particular First Amendment concern.

I find compelling these justifications for the existence of an editorial privilege. The values at issue are sufficiently important to justify some incidental sacrifice of evidentiary material. The Court today concedes the accuracy of the underlying rationale for such a privilege, stating that "[w]e do not doubt the direct relationship between consultation and discussion on the one hand and sound decisions on the other * * *." The Court, however, contented itself with the curious observation that "given exposure to liability when there is knowing or reckless error, there is even more reason to resort to prepublication precautions, such as a frank interchange of fact and opinion." Because such "prepublication precautions" will often prove to be extraordinarily damaging evidence in libel actions, I cannot so blithely assume such "precautions" will be instituted, or that such "frank interchange" as now exists is not impaired by its potential exposure in such actions.

I fully concede that my reasoning is essentially paradoxical. For the sake of more accurate information, an editorial privilege would shield from disclosure the possible inaccuracies of the press; in the name of a more responsible press, the privilege would make more difficult of application the legal restraints by which the press is bound. The same paradox, however, inheres in the concept of an executive privilege: so as to enable the government more effectively to implement the will of the people, the people are kept in ignorance of the workings of their government. The paradox is unfortunately intrinsic to our social condition. Judgment is required to evaluate and balance these competing perspectives.

Judgment is also required to accommodate the tension between society's "pervasive and strong interest in preventing and redressing attacks upon reputation," Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75, 86 (1966), and the First Amendment values that would be served by an editorial privilege. In my view this tension is too fine to be resolved in the abstract. As is the case with executive privilege, there must be a more specific balancing of the particular interests asserted in a given lawsuit. A general claim of executive privilege, for example, will not stand against a "demonstrated, specific need for evidence * * *." United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 713 (1974). Conversely, a general statement of need will not prevail over a concrete demonstration of the necessity for executive secrecy. United States v. Reynolds, 345 U.S. 1, 11 (1953). Other evidentiary privileges are similarly dependent upon the particular exigencies demonstrated in a specific lawsuit. Roviaro v. United States, 353 U.S. 53 (1957), for example, held that the existence of an informer's privilege depends "on the particular circumstances of each case, taking into consideration the crime charged, the possible defenses, the possible significance of the informer's testimony, and other relevant factors." Id., at 62. Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S. 495 (1947), similarly required ad hoc balancing to determine the existence of an attorneys' work product privilege. The procedures whereby this balancing is achieved, so far from constituting mere "formalism," are in fact the means through which courts have traditionally resolved competing social and individual interests.

In my judgment the existence of a privilege protecting the editorial process must, in an analogous manner, be determined with reference to the circumstances of a particular case. In the area of libel, the balance struck by New York Times between the values of the First Amendment and society's interest in preventing and redressing attacks upon reputation must be preserved. This can best be accomplished if the privilege functions to shield the editorial process from general claims of damaged reputation. If, however, a public figure plaintiff is able to establish, to the prima facie satisfaction of a trial judge, that the publication at issue constitutes defamatory falsehood, the claim of damaged reputation becomes specific and demonstrable, and the editorial privilege must yield. Contrary to the suggestion of the Court, an editorial privilege so understood would not create "a substantial interference with the ability of a defamation plaintiff to establish the ingredients of malice as required by New York Times." Requiring a public figure plaintiff to make a prima facie showing of defamatory falsehood will not constitute an undue burden, since he must eventually demonstrate these elements as part of his case-in-chief. And since editorial privilege protects only deliberative and policymaking processes and not factual material, discovery should be adequate to acquire the relevant evidence of falsehood. A public figure plaintiff will thus be able to redress attacks on his reputation, and at the same time the editorial process will be protected in all but the most necessary cases.

Applying these principles to the instant case is most difficult, since the five categories of objectionable discovery inquiries formulated by the Court of Appeals are general, and it is impossible to determine what specific questions are encompassed within each category. It would nevertheless appear that four of the five categories (see fn. 2, Opinion of the Court) concern respondents' mental processes, and thus would not be covered by an editorial privilege. Only the fourth category—"Conversations between Lando and Wallace about matter to be included or excluded from the broadcast publication"—would seem to be protected by a proper editorial privilege. The Court of Appeals noted, however, that respondents had already made available to petitioner in discovery "the contents of preteletcast conversations between Lando and Wallace * * *." 568 F.2d, at 982 [Kaufman, C.J.]. Whether this constitutes waiver of the editorial privilege should be determined in the first instance by the District Court. I would therefore, like the Court of Appeals, remand this case to the District Court, but would require the District Court to determine (a) whether respondents have waived their editorial privilege; (b) if not, whether petitioner Herbert can overcome the privilege through a prima facie showing of defamatory falsehood; and (c) if not, the proper scope and application of the privilege.

COMMENT

Herbert v. Lando got nearly as much attention for its being "leaked" to the press and reported by ABC forty-eight hours before being announced by the Court as it did for its substance.

Some lawyers were quick to note that the ruling did little to disturb the doctrine of New York Times. Yet Justice White, consistent with his dissenting opinion in Gertz, and in an array of authorities dating back to 1837 (see his fn. 15 in the full text), reiterated his belief in the common law standards of "strict liability," libel per se, and broad state definitions of malice.

Justice Powell in a concurring opinion reminded the Court of First Amendment interests, while Justice Stewart, clearly disturbed about White's preferences, especially his flexible definition of actual malice, reminded the Court of what it had done in New York Times v. Sullivan.

Justice Thurgood Marshall's dissent best represented the initial fears of the press that investigative reporting of public matters would be discouraged by the ruling and that the status of existing shield laws would be endangered.

Justice William Brennan, dissenting in part, sought a palliative for an actual malice test, a test that didn't seem to be working. The editorial process writ large, said Brennan, that is, predecisional deliberations and interactions in the newsroom, would be privileged in the absence of prima facie evidence of defamatory falsehood. Under that rubric, what one says in the newsroom may be better protected than what one thinks. One might have expected that if there had to be probing it would have been of the conscious rather than the unconscious mind.

Brennan is indeed the victim of his own formulation. "[I]t would be anomalous," he said with logical consistency, "to turn substantive liability on a journalist's subjective attitude and at the same time shield from disclosure the most direct evidence of that attitude."

The near hysterical response of the press to Herbert v. Lando offended Brennan. It had been a difficult case. It seemed that the press misunderstood the actual malice concept. Brennan, in a speech at Rutgers University, moderately rebuked the press and attempted to rehabilitate the concept.<sup>195</sup> But he remained entangled in it.

Brennan's 1965 invocation of Meiklejohn's theory had largely been in vain. Meiklejohn would have extended, at the very least, an absolute, or near absolute, privilege to all communication bearing on the public behavior of public officials and quite likely to the utterances of public figures involved in controversial issues of public importance as well. Political libel is seditious libel and should not be subject to governmental control.

A final thought on Lando. Does Lando reflect an aversion on the part of the Supreme Court to creating new First Amendment-based privileges where media liability is concerned? One of the coauthors of this text has stated the issue this way:

The question for the future is whether Lando suggests that when the Supreme Court actually passes on specific lower court holdings recognizing qualified first amendment-based journalist privilege in civil litigation, the Court will reverse the lower court rulings that have moved in this direction and declare that there is no justification for the creation of a first amendment-based qualified journalist's privilege.

See Barron, The Rise and Fall of a Doctrine of Editorial Privilege: Reflections on Herbert v. Lando, 47 Geo.Wash.L. Rev. 1002 at 1016 (1979). For more on this issue, see this text, p. 410ff.

SPECULATION ON THE FUTURE OF LIBEL

Many questions addressed in preceding sections remain unanswered. In the meantime, two contrary impressions about libel seem supportable. First, libel suits remain a critical and cost-escalating concern of the media. Second, plaintiffs, generally speaking, have a miserable success rate against the press and lose suits by summary judgment, on motions to dismiss, or on appeal from jury verdicts.<sup>196</sup>

The first impression is supported by those sensational cases that involve ruinous damage awards, labeled "megaverdicts," and large and protracted legal fees. The second is based on evidence compiled by a Stanford University law professor. Both impressions are reflected in the case Rancho La Costa v. Penthouse International Ltd., 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1865 (Cal.1982), still only partly decided in 1983, seven years after plaintiffs filed an initial claim for $630 million and defendant had spent an estimated $8 million in court and lawyer costs.

Penthouse had identified a California resort with organized crime. Early stages of the case were taken up with deciding which of nine plaintiffs (four persons and five corporations) were public figures. Two founders of the resort, both of whom had criminal records, were finally so designated. After a five-month trial and fifteen days of deliberation, a jury voted 9-3 against the person-plaintiffs, 10-2 against La Costa and three of its corporate affiliates, and unanimously against its management corporation. 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1351, 165 Cal.Rptr. 347 (1980), cert.den. 450 U.S. 902. But that would not be the end of it.

Amid charges of misbehavior on the part of the jury and defendant's attorneys, the trial judge granted two of the resort owner plaintiffs a new trial. 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1865. Then it was alleged that the same trial judge had been associated with Aladena "Jimmy the Weasel" Fratianno, an admitted Mafia hit man and one of Penthouse's chief witnesses. By 1983 California appellate judges were deciding whether, under those circumstances, the trial judge had jurisdiction to order the rehearing of the case. In seven years there had been eleven appeals in the case, two of them to the United States Supreme Court.

Bad luck may run in streaks. At the same time that a California court was truncating Penthouse's temporary victory, a federal district court in Pennsylvania was awarding a lawyer $30,000 in compensatory and $537,500 in punitive damages for an article entitled, "The Stoning of America," in which Penthouse had referred to him as an example of "attorney criminals" trafficking in drugs. Plaintiff, said the court, was a private person who, though he had been indicted by a grand jury on drug charges, had not been tried and found guilty. It was libelous per se to presume that he had. Marcone v. Penthouse International, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1444, 533 F.Supp. 353 (D.Pa.1982).

Meanwhile, Penthouse was having serious problems with Kimerli Jayne Pring, a former "Miss Wyoming" to whom a jury had awarded $26 million ($25 million of it in punitive damages) for the magazine's fictitious account of a young woman's quite fantastic and physically impossible sexual exploits. In reducing the judgment to $14 million, the trial judge took the publication's insurance coverage into consideration.<sup>197</sup>

Whether it was proper for the trial judge to do that and whether "Miss Wyoming's" blue costumes and baton-twirling talent constituted sufficient identification were part of the argument heard by the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals. That court reversed on grounds that what was published was pure fantasy incapable of being applied to any individual or of being believed by a reader. While gross, unpleasant, and crude, said the court, the magazine should not be tried for its moral standards. The First Amendment, after all, is not limited to socially redeeming prose, and it certainly covers parody and satire. Pring v. Penthouse International Limited, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 2409, 695 F.2d 438 (1982).

Also on the brighter side for Penthouse was Publisher Robert Guccione's success in persuading a jury to award him $40 million in damages against Hustler magazine and its publisher Larry Flynt. Hustler had depicted Guccione in a lewd homosexual pose. Although judgment of a trial court was upheld on the issue of liability, the case was remanded for a new trial on the issue of damages.<sup>198</sup>

Although it may have been an atypical case, a libel suit reduced the Alton, Illinois

Telegraph to bankruptcy. Information not solid enough for publication was turned over to federal prosecutors by reporters for the newspaper—a questionable practice at best—and that correspondence formed the basis for the suit. In April 1982, an Illinois appellate court dismissed an appeal of jury awards to plaintiff of $6.7 million in compensatory and $2.5 million in punitive damages on grounds that not it but the U.S. Bankruptcy Court had jurisdiction in the case since the Telegraph had filed for corporate reorganization under the Bankruptcy Code in order to protect its assets during the appeals process.<sup>199</sup>

Plaintiff, a contractor and real estate developer, complained that he was driven out of business when federal prosecutors, unable to uncover evidence of organized crime connections, in turn passed the memo on to banking officials. A $1.4 million settlement was finally approved by the Bankruptcy Court, but not before plaintiff had attempted to trade control of the newspaper for his dropping the suit.

There is evidence that a good number of cases—perhaps as many as 25 percent—are settled out of court for reasonable sums ranging from $300 to $50,000.<sup>200</sup>

Libel laws, most courts would agree, are meant to punish, not to destroy. "Megaverdicts" invite suits and may encourage a timidity in reporters that fails the public interest. Reporters, editors, and publishers must be able to choose their own ground, to know when there are risks, and to decide when those risks are worth taking. General Westmoreland's $120 million suit against CBS News may have been a case where the risks were worth taking. One can be less certain that benefits outweighed risks in the Washington Post's allegations that William Tavoulaareas, president of Mobil Corporation, had set his son up in business.

In its initial stages the case was controversial enough to divide the press on the question of the Post's standards of performance. One damaging piece of evidence against the newspaper was an editor's memo suggesting that the story was impossible to believe. But there was sharp disagreement on how many and how credible were the sources for the story. Even those who thought the Post had the law on its side in the case felt that it should have been prepared to admit error rather than ignore a prospective plaintiff for nearly a year.

Tavoulaareas, in what was described as a persuasive speech to the 1982 national convention of Sigma Delta Chi in Milwaukee, uncovered a strategic weakness in the Post's case: "In opting for a jury rather than a bench trial, they [the Post] apparently were arrogant enough to rely on a public opinion poll which they commissioned and which told them an oil executive would be so unpopular he was unlikely to prevail over the Post."

That same jury, misunderstanding the judge's instructions and, according to close observers of the case, an unclear summation by defendant's attorney, confused the truth/falsity dichotomy with the test of actual malice. The result: an award of $250,000 in compensatory damages and $1.8 million in punitive damages to Tavoulaareas. See Tavoulaareas v. Washington Post, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 2262, 527 F.Supp. 676 (D.D.C.1981).

On May 2, 1983, a federal appeals panel reversed The Tavoulaareas judgment on the basis of his not showing clear and convincing evidence of actual malice. Bad reporting, perhaps, but no actual malice. Tavoulaareas v. Washington Post, 9 Med.L.Rptr. 1553 (1983). Tavoulaareas appealed.

One lesson of the case may be to avoid injuries wherever possible because of the inexplicability of libel concepts, or at least to avoid them in environments that appear hostile to media defendants. See Legal Defense Resource Center Bulletin, Spring-Summer, 1983.

While there may continue to be debate on the justifications for the Tavoulaareas story, one cannot easily justify National Enquirer's treatment of Carol Burnett. Although Penthouse, Hustler, and the Enquirer are not the standardbearers of American journalism, their travails, because they involve principles of constitutional law common to all publications, can be instructive. Newspeople generally bewailed the outcome of the Burnett case. It is not difficult, however, in light of New York Times, Gertz, and their progeny, to understand that result. A substantial portion of a Los Angeles County Superior Court's holding follows.

BURNETT v. NATIONAL ENQUIRER

7 MED.L.RPTR. 1321 (1981).

SMITH, J.:

It is not the intention of the court to deal at great length with every issue raised by defendant in its motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict and motion for new trial, but simply to articulate the reasons for denying defendant's motions, save and except the motion for new trial as it relates to the issue of damages.

Initially, defendant contends that its publication of March 2, 1976 about plaintiff was not libelous per se. It is clear to the court that the average reader, viewing the article in its entirety, would conclude that plaintiff was intoxicated and causing a disturbance. The evidence is undisputed that the article was false. There can be little question that the described conduct of plaintiff holds her up to ridicule within the meaning of California Civil Code section 45.

The National Enquirer's protestation that it was not guilty of actual malice borders on absurdity. Not only did plaintiff establish actual malice by clear and convincing evidence, but she proved it beyond a reasonable doubt. At the very minimum Brian Walker, the de facto gossip columnist, had serious doubts as to the truth of the publication. There is a high degree of probability that Walker fabricated part of the publication—certainly that portion relating to plaintiff's row with Henry Kissinger.

Walker received information from Couri Hay, a free lance tipster for the National Enquirer, that Carol Burnett had been in the Rive Gauche restaurant, that she ordered a Grand Marnier souffle and that she passed her dessert to other parties in a boisterous or flamboyant manner, that she had been drinking, but was not drunk. Hay contends that this was verified through the maitre'd. On the other hand, Hay related to Walker that he had received unverified information that Burnett had spilled wine on a customer and the customer had returned the favor by spilling water on her.

Shortly after receiving the information from Hay, Walker called Steve Tinney, the nominal gossip columnist, to see if he had any contacts in Washington who could verify Hay's tip. Walker expressed doubts to Tinney about Hay's trustworthiness. Tinney agreed with Walker's assessment of Hay, but told him he had no contacts in Washington.

Next Walker asked Greg Lyon, defendant's employee, to verify the "incident at the Rive Gauche". Walker told Lyon he had a one hour deadline to meet even though the publication was not due to "hit the streets" for thirteen days.

Lyon was asked to verify the following information: That Carol Burnett had been in a Washington, D.C. restaurant, that she had some sort of interchange with other customers and that an altercation took place with another customer—to wit, “the wine spilling and water throwing incident”.

Lyon reported to Walker that he had not been able to verify anything other than the fact that plaintiff had passed dessert to other patrons. Additionally, he told Walker a fact not previously disclosed to him by Hay—that Henry Kissinger and plaintiff had carried on a good-natured conversation at the Rive Gauche that same night.

Confronted with this disappointing revelation, Walker expressed concern to Lyon as to whether he should publish the article. He kept pushing Lyon for his opinion. Lyon became angry and told him that he (Walker) was being paid to make those decisions.

At this point, it is fair to infer that Walker decided that there was little news value in the fact that Burnett and Kissinger had a good-natured conversation and that Burnett distributed her dessert to other patrons. A little embellishment was needed to “spice up” the item.

An entire afternoon was devoted to the issue of whether the National Enquirer was a newspaper or magazine. The court reaffirms its finding that the defendant does not qualify for the protection of California Civil Code section 48a [California's retraction statute] because, * * * the predominant function of the publication is the conveying of news which is neither timely nor current. Additionally, the defendant has been registered as a magazine with the Audit Bureau of Circulation since 1963, and carries a designation as a magazine or periodical in eight mass media directories.

In Werner v. Southern California Associated Newspapers, 216 P.2d 825 (1950) our Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of California Civil Code section 48a against an attack that it unfairly discriminated in favor of newspaper and radio stations. The court articulated its rationale as follows:

In view of the complex and far flung activities of the news services upon which newspapers and radio stations must largely rely and the necessity of publishing news while it's new [emphasis mine], newspapers and radio stations may in good faith publicize items that are untrue but whose falsity they have neither the time nor the opportunity to ascertain.

Since the defendant rarely deals with “news while it's new”, it is not entitled to the protection of Civil Code section 48a.

Defendant has gone to great lengths to blame the adverse jury verdict on prejudicial trial publicity and, in particular, the blast by entertainer Johnny Carson. Some will question the sagacity of Carson's timing, but no one can question his constitutional right to air his grievance with defendant. [Carson defended Burnett against the Enquirer in his nighttime show.] While the defendant had the right to publish an article about Carson, it exercised incredibly poor judgment in publishing the article on the eve of the trial.

The National Enquirer successfully challenged two jurors who viewed or heard the Carson tirade. It did not see fit to challenge any others even though the trial could have proceeded with as few as eight jurors. Accordingly, defendant cannot now complain about three other jurors being tainted. The court questioned all jurors individually in chambers in the presence of counsel. Counsel were afforded an opportunity to question the jurors. The court denied the defendant's motion for a mistrial because it was satisfied, without any reservation whatsoever, that the remaining eleven jurors could render a fair trial to defendant.

DAMAGES

Preliminary to the subject of general and punitive damages is the question of whether defendant published an adequate correction since that is an issue relating to the mitigation of damages. In the present case, two critical questions must be answered:

1. Was the correction published with prominence substantially equal to the statement claimed to be libelous?

2. Did the correction without uncertainty and ambiguity, honestly and fully and fairly correct the statement claimed to be libelous?

The answer to both questions is in the negative. Had the defendant published a slightly modified version of Exhibit 154 [plaintiff's request for retraction in copy format, dated 3-15-76] * * * it would not be before the court in its present predicament. The correction would have passed muster even if the reference to defendant's negligence had been deleted. Should the defendant have chosen not to print a headline relating to the retraction, a photo of plaintiff in the gossip column next to the correction would have been sufficient to call attention to the retraction.

Instead, defendant tendered to plaintiff and published a "half hearted" correction that had a tendency to aggravate any reasonable person who had been previously libeled. The correction was buried at the bottom of the gossip column.

One can infer from the evidence that the National Enquirer's failure to publish an adequate correction was primarily motivated by an unwillingness to engage in some form of self deprecation which conceivably might adversely affect its circulation.

Ian Calder, the president of National Enquirer, knew shortly after March 2, 1976 that none of the libelous material in the article could be substantiated. Both he and Generoso Pope, the sole stockholder and Chairman of the Board of the defendant, approved the copy of the "correction" that appeared in the April 13, 1976 edition of the National Enquirer.

Despite the fact that Calder knew that none of the libelous material could be substantiated, he insisted on using the words "we understand" as a modifier so that a reader could conclude that even though the defendant had no personal knowledge of the events—that the incident could have occurred. It should be noted in passing that the March 2, 1976 gossip column contains an apology to Steve Allen for falsely accusing him of smashing in a glass door of the William Morris Agency. The columnist unequivocally observed that Steve Allen is not the window breaking type without prefacing the phrase with the words "we understand."

Calder and Pope's cavalier approach to plaintiff's demand for retraction was simply another manifestation of bad faith and malice.

COMPENSATION DAMAGES

Included within the sum of $300,000 compensatory damages was the sum of $299,750 general damages<sup>1</sup>, representing the jury's award for plaintiff's emotional distress. Plaintiff correctly felt that the article portrayed her as being drunk, rude, uncaring and abusive. This portrayal was communicated to approximately sixteen million readers nationally.

Burnett testified, "What really hurts is that I know most people believe what they read." This belief was reinforced when she was taunted by a New York cab driver, whom she never met before, "Hey, Carol, I didn't know you like to get into fights."

Plaintiff is a person who is very sensitive to the problems of alcoholism. Both her parents died at the age of 46 from complications brought about by alcohol abuse. As a result of her tragic experience,

1. Plaintiff claimed special damages of $250.00, a sum expended for attorneys fees in order to obtain a retraction.

Carol Burnett became active in anti-alcohol work. Since the defendant's publication, she has worried about being viewed by the public as a hypocrite if and when she spoke out against alcohol abuse.

While the record is clear that she suffered no actual pecuniary loss as a result of the libelous article, she had every right to suffer anxiety reactions in the immediate aftermath of the March 2, 1976 article and the ineffectual correction. Emotional distress is more difficult to quantify than pain and suffering, but it is no less real. A review of other verdicts for emotional distress is not particularly helpful since the facts of each case vary significantly. The fact that defendant's false publication was communicated to sixteen million readers coupled with an inadequate correction, is of substantial significance in measuring the extent of plaintiff's emotional distress. Finally, the only residual aspect of emotional distress which has lingered with plaintiff since the immediate aftermath of the publication is the fact she occasionally gets a little paranoid about talking too loudly in restaurants.

Defendant points to the fact that Burnett never sought the services of a psychiatrist, psychologist or counselor. Plaintiff acknowledged that she was able to set aside her anxiety to the point where she was able to function in her profession. Miss Burnett should be commended for not seeking the unnecessary services of some "phony build up artist" in order to inflate her damages. She should not be penalized for self-treating.

The court finds that plaintiff was a highly credible witness who did not exaggerate her complaints. Nevertheless, the jury award is clearly excessive and is not supported by substantial evidence. The court finds that the sum of $50,000.00 is a more realistic recompense for plaintiff's emotional distress and special damage.

PUNITIVE DAMAGES

In reviewing the award of $1,300,000 in punitive damages the court must consider the reprehensibility of defendant's acts, the wealth of the defendant and whether punitive damages bear a reasonable relationship to actual damages.

The evidence before the court cries out for a substantial award of punitive damages. The conduct of the defendant was highly reprehensible. The acts of fabrication and reckless disregard by Brian Walker are both clearly proscribed by California Civil Code section 3294. Failure by top management to publish an adequate correction is substantial evidence of malice and bad faith.

The defendant's net worth amounted to approximately $2,600,000 and it had earnings of $1,300,000 after taxes for the last ten month period. The court will not consider any evidence not before the jury, to wit: Mr. Pope's salary and dividends. The function of deterrence will not be served if the wealth of the defendant will allow it to absorb the award with little or no discomfort and by the same token, the function of punitive damages is not served by an award that exceeds the level necessary to properly punish and deter.

This court has the distinct impression, after listening to the testimony of certain officers and employees of the National Enquirer, that the defendant has absolutely no remorse for its misdeeds. The only issue defendant has not seriously contested is that the libelous statements were, in fact, false. Couri Hay, the admittedly untrustworthy tipster, whose misinformation started this travesty, was promoted to gossip columnist shortly after the article in question was published—a position he still held during the trial. Brian Walker only recently left the employ of defendant. Haydon Cameron, the spokesman for the defendant, asserts that it is the policy of the National Enquirer to publish two or three unflattering articles about celebrities every week.

The defendant engages in a form of legalized pandering designed to appeal to the readers' morbid sense of curiosity. This style of journalism has been enormously profitable to the defendant. While the First Amendment to the United States Constitution permits such journalistic endeavor, it does not immunize the defendant from accountability when the rules are broken in such a flagrant manner.

An award of $1,300,000 will probably not amount to "capital punishment" (bankruptcy), as publicly espoused by defendant's counsel after the jury verdict, because of the defendant's strong cash position. The court finds that it is excessive because it does not bear a reasonable relationship to the compensatory damages that amount to only $50,000. A review of California case law indicates that appellate courts have not sanctioned any particular ratio of general and punitive damages. Each case turns on its own set of facts.

The court finds that there is substantial evidence in the record to support an award of $750,000 in punitive damages, a sum which should be sufficient to deter the defendant from further misconduct.

The motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict is denied. The motion for new trial is denied because plaintiff accepted the remittitur in open court reducing actual damages to $50,000 and punitive damages to $750,000.

COMMENT

A California appeals court later reduced the punitive damages award to $150,000. See Burnett v. National Enquirer, 9 Med.L.Rptr. 1921 (1983). In response to higher temperatures in the libel area, media, journalists, and insurance companies have organized the Libel Defense Resource Center. Located in New York, the Center provides both research and practical assistance to libel and privacy defendants. An annual state-by-state survey presents useful data in a number of libel and privacy categories.

Privacy and the Press

WHAT IS PRIVACY?

Definitions of privacy are necessarily subjective, abstract, elusive. Invasion of privacy may be by publication of a nondefamatory falsehood or a true but embarrassing personal fact, by intrusion into one's home with a hidden camera or tape recorder, by unauthorized access to a confidential file, or by appropriation of another's name or photograph for commercial gain. Privacy may also be violated by interfering with a person's beliefs<sup>1</sup> or membership preferences.<sup>2</sup> Whatever its form, an invasion of privacy is presumed to have an adverse effect on an identifiable person's psychological well-being.

Unlike defamation, a privacy violation does not depend upon the altered attitudes of other persons toward you. Rather it depends upon how you are made to feel about yourself. It involves your self-esteem, your sense of inviolate personality.

"The injury is to our individuality," says Professor Edward Bloustein, "to our dignity as individuals, and the legal remedy represents a social vindication of the human spirit thus threatened rather than a [dollar and cents] recompense for the loss suffered."<sup>3</sup>

Others are not so sure. Harry Kalven, Jr. thought privacy a petty tort when measured against First Amendment freedoms.<sup>4</sup> Professor Don Pember is concerned about the number of frivolous privacy claims.<sup>5</sup> Clearly, definition remains a problem. In the absence of evidence of an intent to injure or observable symptoms of pain on the part of the victim, one is seldom certain that real damage has been done. How, then, is an invasion of privacy to be measured? There is no clear answer.

Nevertheless there has been in the past two decades an explosion of interest in protecting privacy in its myriad guises against private, governmental, and press encroachments. Privacy is widely recognized in American jurisdictions.

Justice Louis Brandeis, who with a law partner introduced the right to American law, saw it as the "most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men."<sup>6</sup> "The right to be let alone," said Justice William O. Douglas, "is indeed the beginning of all freedom."<sup>7</sup> Milton Konvitz, a constitutional scholar, described privacy as "a kind of space that a man may carry with him into his bedroom or into the street."<sup>8</sup>

Alan Westin defined privacy as "the voluntary and temporal withdrawal of a person from the general society through physical or psychological means, either in a state of solitude or small-group intimacy or, when among larger groups, in a condition of anonymity or reserve." Each person, says Westin, must find an acceptable balance between solitude and companionship, intimacy and broader social participation, anonymity and visibility, reserve and disclosure. And a free society will leave these choices to the individual, with only extraordinary exceptions allowed in the general interest of society.<sup>9</sup> It is the extraordinary exceptions that require judicial weighing of privacy claims against freedom of the press.

"It is at least a hypothesis worth testing," said Professor Paul Freund, "that privacy, though in its immediate aspect an individual interest, serves an important socializing function. An unwillingness to suffer disclosure of what has been discreditable in one's life, of one's most intimate thoughts and feelings, reflects an intuitive sense that to share everything would jeopardize the sharing of anything. Complete openness in social life would encounter misunderstandings, inability to forgive, unlimited tolerance for differences. The inner sense of privacy, and mutual respect for it, may be a mechanism that helps to secure the condition for living fraternally in a world where men are not gods, where to know all is not to understand and forgive all."<sup>10</sup>

First Amendment scholar Thomas Emerson defines privacy as a set of rules which cut across any opposing rules of the collectivity and which constitute "a sphere of space that has not been dedicated to public use or control." He would include in that space, at the very least, the privacy of bodily functions—such as procreation and contraception,<sup>11</sup> rights of privacy which have been recognized in recent years by the United States Supreme Court.<sup>12</sup>

Within this concept, privacy would protect the woman in childbirth, the couple privately engaged in sexual intercourse, the sleeper from raucous sound trucks operating in residential neighborhoods in the middle of the night.<sup>13</sup>

The rule would certainly cover the woman in York v. Story, 324 F.2d 450 (9th Cir. 1963) who, when she came to a police station complaining of an assault, was asked to undress and was photographed in the nude; her picture was then circulated among policemen for their amusement. It would also have protected the woman who found herself without a legal remedy when she was photographed in the rest room of Sad Sam's tavern in Delafield,

In their separate works on privacy, Westin and Arthur R. Miller<sup>16</sup> were primarily concerned with governmental assaults on privacy for the sake of law enforcement and national security. Computer assisted, government is capable of watching, wiretapping, and data-banking information about the citizenry in a frighteningly Orwellian manner. Everyone—almost—has been reduced to a file.

Electronic snooping by government and business poses a far greater threat to the liberal tradition of individual freedom than vigorous journalism, and, where the press is concerned, courts will continue to be generous in permitting a defense of newsworthiness against privacy claims. We shall see, however, that newsworthiness itself is a perplexing idea which frequently gets tangled with notions such as public interest and the public's right to know, notions that are themselves fighting for clarification.<sup>17</sup> Who has ultimate responsibility for defining the term, the editor, the legislator, or the judge? It is not clear. Probing journalism will nevertheless continue to be one of the pressures that wears against privacy.

The distinction, however, between invasions of privacy by government and invasions of one person's privacy by another person or by a nongovernmental entity is important. It is protection against governmental infringements of privacy that has been accorded constitutional status. See Griswold v. Connecticut, this text, p. 314. Nongovernmental infringements of privacy, such as those by the press, are still treated, for the most part, as a form of tort or common law injury depending, of course, on the extent to which a particular jurisdiction has recognized privacy as a right.

THE ORIGINS OF PRIVACY

A legal right of privacy was first proposed by Louis Brandeis and Samuel Warren in what was to become a seminal law review article (The Right to Privacy, 4 Harv.L. Rev. 193, 1890). The two young Boston lawyers were reacting to what they considered graceless newspaper gossip about the private social affairs of the patrician Warren family. Although there is an aura of "injured gentility" about their rhetoric, Brandeis and Warren were prophetic and perhaps thinking beyond the press of their day when they observed that someday "mechanical devices [would] threaten to make good the prediction that 'what is whispered in the closet shall be proclaimed from the house-tops'."

More important, Brandeis and Warren for the first time wrenched privacy from the domain of property, where it had resided in the common law, and defined it strictly in terms of "inviolable personality."

See, also, Note, Privacy and Efficient Government: Proposals for a National Data Center, 82 Harv.L.Rev. 400 (1968); Report, Databanks in a Free Society (Alan Westin, project director), 1972; Rule, Private Lives and Public Surveillance, 1974.

They were still prepared to exempt publications of general interest from their law of privacy but, diverging from the rules of libel, would not generally permit truth as a defense in a privacy suit. Again it is important to recognize that privacy originated in the common law and not in constitutional interpretation.

Privacy gained momentum when New York in 1903 passed a law making it a misdemeanor and a tort to use someone's name or picture for trade purposes without authorization (New York Civil Rights Law, §§ 50, 51). The legislature was responding to the plight of a young woman who, finding her portrait on posters advertising flour in stores, warehouse walls, and saloons, could invoke no legal remedy.<sup>18</sup> But the right remained one of property, analogous to a breach of contract or copyright.

Two years later, the Georgia Supreme Court, in a similar case of appropriating one's photograph for trade purposes—this time by an insurance company—became the first court to recognize a personal right of privacy.<sup>19</sup> Under the influence of Brandeis and Warren's arguments, the tort was stretched by courts and commentators to accommodate other kinds of invasions of privacy. The influential Dean William Prosser finally organized the case law into the four categories—appropriation, intrusion, false light, and embarrassing private facts—which today provide a popular framework of analysis. Prosser, Privacy 48 Calif.L.Rev. 389 (1960). For a study of the coalescing quality of the four-category typology, see Ellis, Damages and the Privacy Tort: Sketching a Legal Profile, 64 Iowa L.Rev. 1111 (1979).

In 1965 some aspects of privacy found protection in the penumbras of the First, Third, Fourth, and Ninth Amendments to the Constitution and in the Bill of Rights' guarantees generally. This "penumbral" right of privacy was set forth in Griswold

v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965) when the U.S. Supreme Court struck down a state law making it a crime for even married couples to use contraceptives and, in this case, for the Planned Parenthood League to give advice on such use. Governmental invasions of privacy clearly confront constitutional barriers; private violations do not, even though corporate power has assumed some of the coercive capabilities of government. In Griswold the state rather than the press had invaded privacy, and the Court was galled by the prospect of the long arm of government reaching into the marital chamber.

In his opinion for the Court, Justice Douglas began by citing the broad protection afforded speech and press in the First and Fourteenth Amendments.

"[T]he [s]tate may not," he said, "consistently with the spirit of the First Amendment, contract the spectrum of available knowledge. The right of freedom of speech and press includes not only the right to utter or to print, but the right to distribute, the right to receive, the right to read and freedom of inquiry, freedom of thought, and freedom to teach. * * * Without these peripheral rights, the specific rights would be less secure."

"[S]pecific guarantees in the Bill of Rights," Douglas added, "have penumbras, formed by emanations from those guarantees that help give them life and substance. Various guarantees create zones of privacy. The right of association contained in the penumbra of the First Amendment is one. * * * The Third Amendment in its prohibition against the quartering of soldiers 'in any house' in time of peace without the consent of the owner is another facet of that privacy. The Fourth Amendment explicitly affirms the 'right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures.' The Fifth Amendment in its Self Incrimination Clause enables the citizen to create a zone of privacy which government may not force him to surrender to his detriment. The Ninth Amendment provides: 'The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.' * * * We have had many controversies over these penumbral rights of 'privacy and repose.' * * * These cases bear witness that the right of privacy which presses for recognition here is a legitimate one." [Emphasis added.]

In a concurring opinion Justice Arthur Goldberg strongly endorsed Douglas's interpretation of the Ninth Amendment. Justices Black and Stewart dissented, Black because here and in earlier cases he could find no language in the Constitution specifically protecting a "broad, abstract and ambiguous" right of privacy.

Some Court watchers viewed the case as a shocking example of judicial improvisation; others saw it as an affirmation of the Doctrine of Judicial Review whereby the Court could invalidate a noxious law which Connecticut representatives dared not repeal.

Justice Harry Blackmun leaned on Griswold in his opinion for the Court in its historic 1973 abortion ruling, Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973). "The Constitution does not explicitly mention any right of privacy," said Blackmun. "In a line of decisions, however, going back perhaps as far as Union Pacific Railway Co. v. Botsford, 141 U.S. 250 (1891), the Court has recognized that a right of personal privacy, or a guarantee of certain areas or zones of privacy, does exist under the Constitution. In varying contexts the Court or individual justices have indeed found at least the roots of that right in the First Amendment; in the Fourth and Fifth Amendments; in the penumbras of the Bill of Rights; in the Ninth Amendment; or in the concept of liberty guaranteed by the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment. These decisions make it clear that only personal rights that can be deemed 'fundamental' or 'implicit in the concept of ordered liberty' are included in this guarantee of personal privacy. They also make it clear that the right has some extension to activities relating to marriage, procreation, contraception, family relationships, and child rearing and education." [case citations are omitted.]

"This right of privacy," Blackmun added, "* * * is broad enough to encompass a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy. * * * We therefore conclude that the right of personal privacy includes the abortion decision, but that this right is not unqualified and must be considered against important state interests in regulation."

Most states and the District of Columbia today give common law recognition to some or all of Prosser's four privacy torts. For a state-by-state listing, see Communications Law 1982 (New York: Practising Law Institute, 1982), Vol. One, pp. 789-819, and subsequent editions. New York, Virginia, Massachusetts, Oklahoma, California, Utah, Florida, Nebraska, and Wisconsin have privacy statutes and by inference, therefore, may not recognize a common law or constitutional right. This view was clearly articulated in Arrington v. New York Times, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2354, 433 N.Y. S.2d 164 (1980) when a New York appeals court would recognize no common law or constitutional right of privacy, beyond its statute. A false light claim, a category not expressly covered by the New York law, was rejected by the court.

There is no clear authority on the matter in North Dakota and Nevada. Minnesota neither recognizes nor rejects a right of privacy, although it does have one of a few state data privacy laws protecting personal information in official records. Some states recognize one or more of the torts but call them by a different name.

The Federal Privacy Act of 1974 (5 U.S.C.A. § 552a) is designed to safeguard individual privacy from the misuse of federal records and to provide individuals a right of access to data about themselves. In this act, Congress defines privacy as a fundamental constitutional right.

While the older and more general common law right of privacy appears to protect us from one another, the more recently developed constitutional right establishes barriers against violations by government. Infringements by the press generally fall in the first category, although, as we shall see in the next section, one common law category of privacy—"false light"—was constitutionalized in a landmark Supreme Court case.

Still, much of what the press would do to personal privacy is a matter of ethics and good taste rather than of law. Of the agony-and-anguish news photographers, editor Carl Lindstrom once said:

The picture which creates in the beholder the feeling of intrusion upon grief or private anguish, the feeling of "here I should not be," ought never to be taken.<sup>20</sup>

Press photography is by no means the only journalistic activity that raises ethical questions, but it is a key element in many privacy claims.

Since we cannot deal here with every aspect of what Professor Freund calls the "greedy" concept of privacy, we shall settle on those dimensions of privacy that engage the press. Omitted then are at least the following contexts in which privacy claims arise, claims that are sometimes more urgent and significant than those brought against the press: eavesdropping; surveillance; unreasonable searches and seizures; the reasonable expectation of some privacy in public places or in the public mails against obscenity, inappropriate advertising, or certain forms of picketing; door-to-door solicitation; the privacy of a business office or a college dormitory; bodily privacy, for example, hair length or sexual preference; euthanasia; psychosurgery; self-incrimination; and statutory relational privileges as between husband and wife, doctor and patient, lawyer and client, and priest and penitent.

For a comprehensive review of privacy questions, see The Report of the Privacy Protection Study Commission, Personal Privacy in an Information Society (July 1977); and Shattuck, Rights of Privacy (ACLU, 1977).

CONSTITUTIONALIZING THE TORT: "FALSE LIGHT" INVASIONS FROM HILL TO GERTZ AND CANTRELL

1. Privacy may be invaded by placing a person in a false light through the coincidental use of names, fictionalization, distortion, embellishment, or the misuse of names and pictures in otherwise legitimate news stories. The docudrama has become a troublesome format for broadcasters and their lawyers.

Under the common law, damage awards in false light privacy cases were based, as in libel cases, upon false statements of fact, that is, upon nondefamatory falsehoods.

For example, in 1948 a federal district court granted relief to an honest taxi driver whose photograph had been used by the Saturday Evening Post to illustrate a story about crooked cabbies.<sup>21</sup> And an invasion of privacy was acknowledged by a New York court in 1955 when a law-abiding slum child's photo was used in a story about juvenile delinquents.<sup>22</sup> A more frequently cited case, and one which gave impetus to the false light category of suits, is Leverton v. Curtis Publishing Co., 192 F.2d 974 (3d Cir. 1951).<sup>23</sup> A newspaper photo of a child being helped to her feet after a car ran a stoplight and knocked her down was reprinted twenty months later in the Saturday Evening Post under the caption, "They Asked To Be Killed." Although the article was concerned with pedestrian carelessness, it erroneously implied that this particular child pedestrian had been at fault. A trial court judgment of $5,000 was sustained.

The original publication of the photo was not actionable because its legitimate news interest overbalanced any claim to privacy. But the magazine's use of the photo, said the court, exceeded the bounds of privilege and would be offensive to persons of ordinary sensibilities.

Since the Post had purchased the photograph from a commercial agency, was it aware of the misleading impression it would create? False light cases today turn on the answers to questions of this kind. How will a publisher know when an unaltered photograph has the capacity of placing someone in a false light, or when something omitted from an article may embarrass? Uncertainty of this magnitude raises First Amendment questions.

2. In 1967 the United States Supreme Court, imbued perhaps with the spirit of New York Times, invoked the First Amendment's right of free press to defeat a privacy suit and in doing so tied together false light privacy and defamation with the actual malice test.

The case began in 1952 when James Hill, his wife, and five children were held hostage in their suburban Philadelphia home by three escaped convicts. The Hills were not harmed; in fact they were treated surprisingly well by the intruders. A year later, a novel, Desperate Hours, purported to describe the dramatic episode but with the fictionalized addition of captor violence against the father and a son, and a verbal sexual assault on a daughter.

The novel led to a Broadway play and the play to a promotional picture-story review in Life magazine. By this time the Hill family had moved to Connecticut, supposedly for the purpose of avoiding any further public attention. Hill's privacy suit, though brought under New York's privacy statute, might have been pursued as a common law false light case.

Hill found particularly offensive to his desire for anonymity Life's characterization of the play as "a heart-stopping account of how a family rose to heroism in a crisis." The play was set in the actual house the Hills had occupied in suburban Philadelphia; otherwise there was little resemblance between the docile captivity of the family and the sensationalized story line of the play. The incident inevitably became a Hollywood film starring a commandolike Frederick March as the father and Humphrey Bogart as the convict leader.

Both litigants depended on the New York privacy law. Time, Inc. argued that the family had involuntarily become subjects of public interest. But, said Hill, the portrayal of the family's frightening experience had been flamboyantly inaccurate. Hill won a $75,000 judgment from a jury. The Appellate Division of the New York Supreme Court (which despite its name is the trial court) upheld the verdict for Hill but ordered a new trial on the question of damages. A second jury awarded Hill $30,000 in compensatory damages. That judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeals, New York's highest court. Time, Inc. appealed to the United States Supreme Court and argued that the rules pertaining to the standards of newsworthiness had not been measured against guidelines which, since 1964 under New York Times v. Sullivan, were required under the First Amendment.

A majority of the Court agreed and applied the New York Times rule of actual malice to the Life article. Was the publication made with knowledge of its falsity or with reckless disregard as to whether it was false or not? No, said the Court. The judgment of the New York Court of Appeals was reversed and remanded for further proceedings.

TIME, INC. v. HILL

Justice BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question in this case is whether appellant, publisher of Life Magazine, was denied constitutional protections for speech and press by the application by the New York courts of §§ 50-51 of the New York Civil Rights Law, McKinney's Consol.Laws, c. 6 to award appellee damages on allegations that Life falsely reported that a new play portrayed an experience suffered by appellee and his family.

Although "Right to Privacy" is the caption of § 51, the term nowhere appears in the text of the statute itself. The text of the statute appears to proscribe only conduct of the kind involved in Roberson, that is, the appropriation and use in advertising or to promote the sale of goods, of another's name, portrait or picture without his consent. An application of that limited scope would present different questions of violation of the constitutional protections for speech and press.

The New York courts have, however, construed the statute to operate much more broadly. * * * Specifically, it has been held in some circumstances to authorize a remedy against the press and other communications media which publish the names, pictures, or portraits of people without their consent. Reflecting the fact, however, that such applications may raise serious questions of conflict with the constitutional protections for speech and press, decisions under the statute have tended to limit the statute's application. "[E]ver mindful that the written word or picture is involved, courts have engrafted exceptions and restrictions onto the statute to avoid any conflict with the free dissemination of thoughts, ideas, newsworthy events, and matters of public interest."

In the light of questions that counsel were asked to argue on reargument, it is particularly relevant that the Court of Appeals made crystal clear in the Spahn opinion [Spahn v. Julian Messner, Inc., * * 274 N.Y.S.2d 877, 221 N.E.2d 543 (1966), gross fictionalization in an unauthorized biography of a famous baseball player] that truth is a complete defense in actions under the statute based upon reports of newsworthy people or events. * * *

But although the New York statute affords "little protection" to the "privacy" of a newsworthy person, "whether he be such by choice or involuntarily" the statute gives him a right of action when his name, picture, or portrait is the subject of a "fictitious" report or article. Spahn points up the distinction. Spahn was an action under the statute brought by the well-known professional baseball pitcher, Warren Spahn. He sought an injunction and damages against the unauthorized publication of what purported to be a biography of his life. The trial judge had found that "[t]he record unequivocally establishes that the book publicizes areas of Warren Spahn's personal and private life, albeit inaccurate and distorted, and consists of a host, a preponderant percentage, of factual errors, distortions and fanciful passages. * * *" 250 N.Y.S.2d 529, 542.

The Court of Appeals sustained the holding that in these circumstances the publication was proscribed by § 51 of the Civil Rights Law and was not within the exceptions and restrictions for newsworthy events engrafted on the statute. * * *

The opinion goes on to say that the "establishment of minor errors in an otherwise accurate" report does not prove "fictionalization." Material and substantial falsification is the test. However, it is not clear whether proof of knowledge of the falsity or that the article was prepared with reckless disregard for the truth is also required. In New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, we held that the Constitution delimits a State's power to award damages for libel in actions brought by public officials against critics of their official conduct. Factual error, content defamatory of official reputation, or both, are insufficient to an award of damages for false statements unless actual malice—knowledge that the statements are false or in reckless disregard of the truth—is alleged and proved. The Spahn opinion reveals that the defendant in that case relied on New York Times as the basis of an argument that application of the statute to the publication of a substantially fictitious biography would run afoul of the constitutional guarantees. The Court of Appeals held that New York Times had no application. The court, after distinguishing the cases on the ground that Spahn did not deal with public officials or official conduct, then says, "The free speech which is encouraged and essential to the operation of a healthy government is something quite different from an individual's attempt to enjoin the publication of a fictitious biography of him. No public interest is served by protecting the dissemination of the latter. We perceive no constitutional infirmities in this respect." 274 N.Y. S.2d at 880.

If this is meant to imply that proof of knowing or reckless falsity is not essential to a constitutional application of the statute in these cases, we disagree with the Court of Appeals. We hold that the constitutional protections for speech and press preclude the application of the New York statute to redress false reports of matters of public interest in the absence of proof that the defendant published the report with knowledge of its falsity or in reckless disregard of the truth. [Emphasis added.]

The guarantees for speech and press are not the preserve of political expression or comment upon public affairs, essential as those are to healthy government. One need only pick up any newspaper or magazine to comprehend the vast range of published matter which exposes persons to public view, both private citizens and public officials. Exposure of the self to others in varying degrees is a concomitant of life in a civilized community. The risk of this exposure is an essential incident of life in a society which places a primary value on freedom of speech and of press. * * * Erroneous statement is no less inevitable in such case than in the case of comment upon public affairs, and in both, if innocent or merely negligent, " * * * it must be protected if the freedoms of expression are to have the 'breathing space' that they 'need * * * to survive' * * *." New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, supra. * * * We create grave risk of serious impairment of the indispensable service of a free press in a free society if we saddle the press with the impossible burden of verifying to a certainty the facts associated in news articles with a person's name, picture or portrait, particularly as related to nondefamatory matter. Even negligence would be a most elusive standard, especially when the content of the speech itself affords no warning of prospective harm to another through falsity. A negligence test would place on the press the intolerable burden of guessing how a jury might assess the reasonableness of steps taken by it to verify the accuracy of every reference to a name, picture or portrait.

In this context, sanctions against either innocent or negligent misstatement would present a grave hazard of discouraging the press from exercising the constitutional guarantees. Those guarantees are not for the benefit of the press so much as for the benefit of all of us. A broadly defined freedom of the press assures the maintenance of our political system and an open society. Fear of large verdicts in damage suits for innocent or mere negligent misstatement, even fear of the expense involved in their defense, must inevitably cause publishers to "steer far wider of the unlawful zone." New York Times Co. v. Sullivan. * * *

But the constitutional guarantees can tolerate sanctions against calculated falsehood without significant impairment of their essential function. We held in New York Times that calculated falsehood enjoyed no immunity in the case of alleged defamation of a public official's official conduct. Similarly calculated falsehood should enjoy no immunity in the situation here presented us. * * *

The appellant argues that the statute should be declared unconstitutional on its face if construed by the New York courts to impose liability without proof of knowing or reckless falsity. Such a declaration would not be warranted even if it were entirely clear that this is the view of the New York courts. The New York Court of Appeals, as the Spahn opinion demonstrates, has been assiduous to construe the statute to avoid invasion of the constitutional protections for speech and press. We therefore confidently expect that the New York courts will apply the statute consistently with the constitutional command. Any possible difference with us as to the thrust of the constitutional command is narrowly limited in this case to the failure of the trial judge to instruct the jury that a verdict of liability could be predicated only on a finding of knowing or reckless falsity in the publication of the Life article.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is set aside and the case is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

COMMENT

1. Time, Inc. v. Hill required that actual malice be proven in all false light privacy cases involving a matter of public interest, no matter whether the plaintiff was a private or public person. Damages might be won in the egregious case. For example, a surviving husband was awarded $5,000 compensatory and $15,000 punitive damages when a National Enquirer story under the headline, "Happiest Mother Kills Her Three Children and Herself," was held sufficiently untruthful and offensive to constitute an invasion of privacy. The plaintiff pleaded that he had suffered mental anguish to the extent of requiring psychiatric treatment, unemployment, and the disdain of his friends and acquaintances, the latter offense suggesting the affinity of libel and privacy. The "happiest" mother in reality had been extremely depressed and unstable, and only fictitious dialogue in the story could make her appear otherwise. The actual malice standard of knowing falsehood or reckless disregard of truth or falsity had been met. Varnish v. Best Medium Publishing Co., 405 F.2d 608 (2d Cir. 1968).

For false light claims involving television reporting, see the following, Clark v. ABC, 8 Med.L.Reptr. 2049, 684 F.2d 1208 (6th Cir. 1982) and Cantrell v. ABC, 8 Med.L.Reptr. 1239, 529 F.Supp. 746 (D.Ill.1981). The former involved passers-by in an investigative report on prostitution, the latter a building manager interviewed at the scene of a suspected case of arson.

The Court's plurality in Rosenbloom, text, p. 221, would eventually establish the same public interest or public issue standard for defamation. But Rosenbloom was to be superseded by Gertz and Fire- stone, two cases which brought the idea of the private person back under the protective cloak of libel law, particularly when the private person's involvement in a matter of public interest was involuntary. What was the effect of the two cases on the law of privacy? Should a negligence test supplant the actual malice test in privacy as it has in libel for private person plaintiffs? Since a public interest test has been rejected as the focal point for the application of the actual malice test of the public law of libel, it is, arguably, illogical to use a newsworthiness test to invoke the actual malice rule in privacy law. In short, shouldn't Gertz be read to replace the rule of Time, Inc. v. Hill as well as the rule of Rosenbloom v. Metromedia?

2. An opportunity either to merge or to distinguish defamation and false light invasions of privacy was provided the Court in an earlier Cantrell case, Cantrell v. Forest City Publishing Co., 419 U.S. 245 (1974). In that case a story in the Cleveland Plain Dealer Sunday Magazine purported to describe an interview with Margaret Cantrell whose husband had died in a bridge collapse, leaving her and her four children in proud but abject poverty. Mrs. Cantrell, however, had been absent when a reporter and photographer entered the home and talked with one of her children. Inaccuracies and false characterizations such as "She wears the same mask of non-expression she wore at the funeral" were inevitable in the story that followed, and the Court reversed the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit and upheld a district court award of compensatory damages. On these facts alone the case may represent two other categories of privacy—intrusion and true but embarrassing private facts, frequently referred to as public disclosure.

Since the actual malice test of New York Times had again been met, the Court found "no occasion to consider whether a state may constitutionally impose a more severe standard of liability for a publisher or broadcaster of false statements injurious to a private individual under a false-light theory of invasion of privacy, or whether the constitutional standard announced in Time, Inc. v. Hill applies to all false-light cases." [Emphasis added.]

"In essence," Justice Potter Stewart wrote, joined by seven of his colleagues, "the theory of the case was that by publishing the false feature story about the Cantrells and thereby making them the objects of pity and ridicule, the respondents damaged Mrs. Cantrell and her son William by causing them to suffer outrage, mental distress, shame and humiliation. * * * These were 'calculated falsehoods,' and the jury was plainly justified in finding that [the reporter] had portrayed the Cantrells in a false light through knowing or reckless untruth." The photographer was exonerated.

3. Margaret Cantrell, though clearly a private person, had no opportunity to charge negligence on the part of the Plain Dealer because its "calculated falsehoods" had already reached the level of actual malice which subsumes negligence and makes the lesser standard superfluous. Since Cantrell, courts have disagreed on the degree to which Time, Inc. v. Hill should track with Gertz: a negligence test in false light privacy cases for private persons, an actual malice test for public persons.

A California appeals court dared resurrect the public interest test of Rosenbloom in a 1981 libel and privacy suit.<sup>23</sup> In 1979 an Arkansas court held that a nonpublic, i.e., a private person, must prove actual malice in a false light case if the publication is a matter of public concern.<sup>24</sup> An earlier case, Rinsley v. Brandt, 446 F.Supp. 850 (D.Kan.1977), stood for the rule that Gertz limits the actual malice standard to false light claims brought by public persons and thus infers that private persons need only show negligence. Another federal district court crystallized that inference in Dresbach v. Doubleday, 7 Med.L. Rptr. 2105, 518 F.Supp. 1285 (D.D.C.1981) by applying the District of Columbia's negligence standard for libel to false light actions brought by private persons.<sup>25</sup> It is expected that the latter rule, in the interest of legal symmetry, will eventually prevail.<sup>26</sup>

Fictionalization

How can publishers anticipate fictional characters coming to life? There seems to be a proliferation of cases in this transection of the false light category. Newsworthiness or public interest arguments provide the best defense. Sometimes they work; sometimes they don't.

Senator Joseph McCarthy's former aides were portrayed without their consent in a television movie, with their actual names used in advertising and promotion for the program. Their privacy claims were dismissed on public interest grounds.<sup>27</sup> On the other hand, a false light claim was sustained when the real name of an attorney who had represented gangster Lucky Luciano was used in a wholly fictionalized, although nondefamatory, episode in a novel.<sup>28</sup>

Frequently, a prior issue is identification. Did baton-twirling skill and costume color equate Miss Wyoming with the fictitious sex-driven character in the Penthouse story? An author was unwise to use the real name and physical description of a casual acquaintance for a fictional transsexual character.<sup>29</sup> Where there is no earlier connection between author and plaintiff the risk may not be as great.<sup>30</sup> In any case, identification if in doubt, will be a question for a jury.

Traditional disclaimers (all characters portrayed in this novel, film, broadcast are wholly fictional, and any resemblance to persons living or dead is purely coincidental.) are useful, but they may not cover every conceivable kind of character. Perhaps disclaimers ought to be more explicit and emphatic. Central characters need to be obscured more fully than bit players. Conversely, the better known a claimant, the potentially stronger the privacy claim. Generally speaking, the rarer a work of imagination, the less vulnerable it will be to false light privacy suits. Composite characters constructed from pseudonymous sources (Janet Cooke's "Jimmy's World", Michael Daly's Northern Irish assassins) have proved damaging to the credibility of journalism and to the doctrine of journalist's privilege. Reporters owe readers a full report at the outset on what they are doing and why. Disclaimers, therefore, ought to be explicit.

For the Gertz application, see also Roberts v. Dover, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2296, 525 F.Supp. 987 (Tenn.1981). Fitzgerald v. Penthouse International, Limited, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2385, 525 F.Supp. 585 (D.Md.1981) held that a limited purpose public figure must also show actual malice.

A disclaimer was said not to indicate that all names had been changed. A New York trial court nevertheless thought injunctive relief too drastic a remedy.

Few fictionalized conversations will be held privileged as fair comment on the life of actual public figures.<sup>31</sup>

In Frosch v. Grosset & Dunlap, 4 Med.L. Rptr. 2307 (N.Y.Sup.Ct.1979), affirmed 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1271, 427 N.Y.S.2d 828 (1980), claims by the executors of Marilyn Monroe's estate against the publisher of Norman Mailer's biography Marilyn were dismissed on grounds that false light claims do not survive the death of an individual.

The most ominous example of a case of failed fictionalization and one that exercised the literary world, is Bindrim v. Mitchell, 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1113, 155 Cal.Rptr. 29 (1979), cert. den., 444 U.S. 984, rehearing den. 444 U.S. 1040 (1980). Author Gwen Davis Mitchell not only lost a libel suit (the libel claim here being indistinguishable from a false light claim) to a "nude-encounter" therapist but was also sued by her publisher which, under its contract with her, had a right to recover whatever costs might result from a libel suit. Doubleday had stuck with its author until she finally lost her case. Mitchell, who claimed that she had gone to great pains to change, disguise, and transmute—partly with vulgar dialogue—events at a nude therapy marathon into her novel Touching, maintains that there can be no libel in fiction.

The case was complicated by the fact that the plaintiff's appearance and academic credentials had changed to resemble those of the fictional character of "Dr. Herford" between publication and trial.

Moreover, Mitchell had signed a contract with the plaintiff not to disclose in any manner what was to take place in the therapy sessions.

Essentially, Mitchell's disguise was inadequate. So again the question of identification. How many persons have to relate the fictional character to an actual person? In Bindrim, the California court said that one would suffice. Although technically a libel rather than a false light privacy case, it may be instructive to present here portions of the court's opinion and a dissent from it.

BINDRIM v. MITCHELL

5 MED.L.RPTR. 1113, 92 CAL.APP.2D 61, 155 CAL.RPTR. 29 (1979).

There is clear and convincing evidence to support the jury's finding that defendant Mitchell entertained actual malice, and that defendant Doubleday had actual malice when it permitted the paperback printing of Touching, although there was no actual malice on the part of Doubleday in its original printing of the hardback edition.

Mitchell's reckless disregard for the truth was apparent from her knowledge of the truth of what transpired at the encounter, and the literary portrayals of that encounter.<sup>2</sup> Since she attended sessions there can be no suggestion that she did not know the true facts. Since "actual malice" concentrates solely on defendants' attitude toward the truth or falsity of the material published * * * and not on malicious motives,<sup>3</sup> certainly defendant 31. For an exception to this rule, see Rosemount Enterprises, Inc. v. Random House, 366 F.2d 303 (2d Cir. 1966) where the court said that even the imaginary ramblings of Howard Hughes were of interest to the public.

2. The fact that Touching was a novel does not necessarily insulate Mitchell from liability for libel, if all the elements of libel are otherwise present.

3. There is no suggestion that Mitchell was being malicious in the fabrication; her intent may have been to be colorful or dramatic.

Mitchell was in a position to know the truth or falsity of her own material, and the jury was entitled to find that her publication was in reckless disregard of that truth or with actual knowledge of falsity.

However, plaintiff failed to prove by clear and convincing evidence that the original hardback publication by Doubleday was made with knowledge of falsity or in reckless disregard of falsity. McCormick of Doubleday cautioned plaintiff that the characters must be totally fictitious and Mitchell assured McCormick that the characters in Touching were incapable of being identified as real persons. McCormick arranged to have the manuscript read by an editor knowledgeable in the field of libel. The cases are clear that reckless conduct is not measured by whether a reasonably prudent person would have published or would have investigated before publishing. There must be sufficient evidence to permit the conclusion that defendant in fact entertained serious doubts as to the truth of his publication, (St. Amant v. Thompson (1968) * * * 390 U.S. 727, 731), and there is nothing to suggest that Doubleday entertained such doubts prior to the hardback publication.

Plaintiff suggests that, since the book did not involve "hot news," Doubleday had a duty to investigate the content for truth. Courts have required investigation as to truth or falsity of statements which were not hot news (Widener v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co. (1977) * * * 75 Cal. App.3d 445, Carson v. Allied News Co. (1976) * * * 529 F.2d 206), but those cases involved factual stories about actual people. In the case at bar, Doubleday had been assured by Mitchell that no actual, identifiable person was involved and that all the characters were fictitious in the novel. Where the publication comes from a known reliable source and there is nothing in the circumstances to suggest inaccuracy, there is no duty to investigate. (See Baldine v. Sharon Herald Co. (1968) 391 F.2d 703, 707.) There was nothing in the record to suggest that, prior to the hardback printing defendant Doubleday in fact entertained serious doubts as to the truth or falsity of the publication, and investigatory failure alone is insufficient to find actual malice.

However, prior to the paperback printing there were surrounding circumstances to suggest inaccuracy, such that at that point Doubleday had a duty to investigate. Plaintiff did show that Doubleday sold the rights to the New American Library after receiving a letter from plaintiff's attorney explaining that plaintiff was Herford and the inscription in the paperback said, "This is an authorized edition published by Doubleday and Company." Although, after the receipt of the plaintiff's attorney's letter, Doubleday again inquired of Mitchell as to whether plaintiff was the character in the book, the jury was entitled to find that Mitchell's assurance to Doubleday was not sufficient to insulate Doubleday from liability and that Doubleday had some further duty to investigate. The jury could have inferred that at that point Doubleday either had serious doubts, or should have had serious doubts, as to the possibility that plaintiff was defamed by "Touching" and that at that point Doubleday had some duty to investigate.

Appellants claim that, even if there are untrue statements, there is no showing that plaintiff was identified as the character, Simon Herford, in the novel Touching.

Appellants allege that plaintiff failed to show he was identifiable as Simon Herford, relying on the fact that the character in Touching was described in the book as a "fat Santa Claus type with long white hair, white sideburns, a cherubic rosy face and rosy forearms" and that Bindrim was clean shaven and had short hair. Defendants rely in part on Wheeler v. Dell Publishing Co. (1962) 300 F.2d 372, which involved an alleged libel caused by a fictional account of an actual murder trial. The Wheeler court said (at p. 376):

"In our opinion, any reasonable person who read the book and was in a position to identify Hazel Wheeler with Janice Quill would more likely conclude that the author created the latter in an ugly way so that none would identify her with Hazel Wheeler. It is important to note that while the trial and locale might suggest Hazel Wheeler to those who knew the Chenoweth family, suggestion is not identification. In Levey [Levey v. Warner Bros. Pictures (S.D.N.Y. 1944) 57 F.Supp. 40] the court said those who had seen her act may have been reminded of her by songs and scenes, but would not reasonably identify her."

However, in Wheeler the court found that no one who knew the real widow could possibly identify her with the character in the novel. In the case at bar, the only differences between plaintiff and the Herford character in Touching were physical appearance and that Herford was a psychiatrist rather than psychologist. Otherwise, the character Simon Herford was very similar to the actual plaintiff. We cannot say, as did the court in Wheeler, that no one who knew plaintiff Bindrim could reasonably identify him with the fictional character. Plaintiff was identified, as Herford by several witnesses and plaintiff's own tape recordings of the marathon sessions show that the novel was based substantially on plaintiff's conduct in the nude marathon.

Defendant also relies on Middlebrooks v. Curtis Publishing Co. (1969) 413 F.2d 141, where the marked dissimilarities between the fictional character and the plaintiff supported the court's finding against the reasonableness identification. In Middlebrooks, there was a difference in age, an absence from the locale at the time of the episode, and a difference in employment of the fictional character and plaintiff; nor did the story parallel the plaintiff's life in any significant manner. In the case at bar, apart from some of those episodes allegedly constituting the libelous matter itself, and apart from the physical difference and the fact that plaintiff had a Ph.D., and not an M.D., the similarities between Herford and Bindrim are clear, and the transcripts of the actual encounter weekend show a close parallel between the narrative of plaintiff's novel and the actual real life events. Here, there were many similarities between the character, Herford, and the plaintiff Bindrim and those few differences do not bring the case under the rule of Middlebrooks. (See Fetler v. Houghton Mifflin Co. (1966) 364 F.2d 650.) There is overwhelming evidence that plaintiff and "Herford" were one.

However, even though there was clear and convincing evidence to support the finding of "actual malice," and even though there was support for finding that plaintiff is identified as the character in Mitchell's novel, there still can be no recovery by plaintiff if the statements in Touching were not libelous. There can be no libel predicated on an opinion. The publication must contain a false statement of fact. (Gregory v. McDonnell Douglas Corp. (1976) 17 Cal.3d 596.)

Plaintiff alleges that the book as a whole was libelous and that the book contained several false statements of fact. Plaintiff relies in part on [a] conversation between plaintiff and the minister as one libelous statement of fact. Plaintiff also argues that a particular incident in the book is libelous. That incident depicts an encounter group patient as so distressed upon leaving from the weekend therapy that she is killed when her car crashes. Plaintiff also complains of an incident in the book where he is depicted as "pressing," "clutching," and "ripping" a patient's cheeks and "stabbing against a pubic bone." Plaintiff complains, too, of being depicted as having said to a female patient, "Drop it, bitch." There are also other incidents alleged to be libelous.

Our inquiry then, is directed to whether or not any of these incidents can be considered false statements of fact. It is clear from the transcript of the actual encounter weekend proceeding that some of the incidents portrayed by Mitchell are false: i.e., substantially inaccurate description of what actually happened. It is also clear that some of these portrayals cast plaintiff in a disparaging light since they portray his language and conduct as crude, aggressive, and unprofessional.

Defendants here rely on the cases which have considered the difference in published materials between factual statements and matters of mere opinion. While, as we discuss below, we do not feel that those cases necessarily express the rules applicable where, as here, the published material purports to state actual facts concerning the characters in a novel, we proceed, first, to examine the cases on which defendants rely. [Cases discussed are omitted.]

If viewed as a case involving an issue of "opinion," those cases, and other cases involving that issue, make it clear that, since there was evidence that people had identified plaintiff with the Dr. Herford of the book, the jury's finding against defendants is conclusive on that issue.

However, as we have indicated above, we regard the case at bench as involving a different issue. Defendants contend that the fact that the book was labeled as being a "novel" bars any claim that the writer or publisher could be found to have implied that the characters in the book were factual representations not of the fictional characters but of an actual non-fictional person. That contention, thus broadly stated, is unsupported by the cases. The test is whether a reasonable person, reading the book, would understand that the fictional character therein pictured was, in actual fact, the plaintiff acting as described. (Middlebrooks v.

Curtis Publishing Co. (1969) * * * 413 F.2d 141, 143.) Each case must stand on its own facts. In some cases, such as Greenbelt Pub. Assn. v. Bresler (1970) * * 398 U.S. 6, an appellate court can, on examination of the entire work, find that no reasonable person would have regarded the episodes in the book as being other than the fictional imaginings of the author about how the character he had created would have acted. Similarly, in Hicks v. Casablanca Records (D.C.S.D.N.Y.1978) 4 Med.L.Rptr. 1497, 464 F.Supp. 426, a trier of fact was able to find that, considering the work as a whole, no reasonable reader would regard an episode, in a book purporting to be a biography of an actual person, to have been anything more than the author's imaginative explanation of an episode in that person's life about which no actual facts were known. We cannot make any similar determination here. Whether a reader, identifying plaintiff with the "Dr. Herford" of the book, would regard the passages herein complained of as mere fictional embroidering or as reporting actual language and conduct, was for the jury. Its verdict adverse to the defendants cannot be overturned by this court.

Defendants raise the question of whether there is "publication" for libel where the communication is to only one person or a small group of persons rather than to the public at large. Publication for purposes of defamation is sufficient when the publication is to only one person other than the person defamed. (Brauer v. Globe Newspaper Co. (1966) 217 N.E.2d 736, 739.) Therefore, it is irrelevant whether all readers realized plaintiff and Herford were identical.

FILES, P.J., dissenting:

This novel, which is presented to its readers as a work of fiction, contains a portrayal of nude encounter therapy, and its tragic effect upon an apparently happy and well-adjusted woman who subjected herself to it. Plaintiff is a practitioner of this kind of therapy. His grievance, as described in his testimony and in his briefs on appeal, is provoked by that institutional criticism.<sup>1</sup> Plaintiff's "concession" that he is a public figure appears to be a tactic to enhance his argument that any unflattering portrayal of this kind of therapy defames him.

The decision of the majority upholding a substantial award of damages against the author and publisher poses a grave threat to any future work of fiction which explores the effect of techniques claimed to have curative value.

The majority opinion rests upon a number of misconceptions of the record and the law of libel. I mention a few of them.

Defamation. Libel is a false and unprivileged publication which exposes any person to hatred, contempt, ridicule or obloquy, or which causes him to be shunned or avoided or which has a tendency to injure him in his reputation. (Civ. Code, § 45.) A libel which is defamatory without the necessity of explanatory matter is said to be a libel on its face. Language not libelous on its face is not actionable unless the plaintiff alleges and proves that he has suffered special damage as a result thereof. (Civ. Code, § 45a.)

Whether or not matter is on its face reasonably susceptible of a libelous meaning is a question of law. (McLeod v. Tribune Publishing Co. (1959) 52 Cal.2d 536, 546.)

The complaint in this action quotes verbatim the portions of the defendant's novel which are alleged to be libelous. No explanatory matter or special damages are alleged. The only arguably defamatory matter I can find in that complaint is in the passages which portray the fictional therapist using coarse, vulgar and insulting language in addressing his patients. Some of the therapeutic techniques described in the quoted passages may seem bizarre, but a court cannot assume that such conduct is so inappropriate that a reputable therapist would be defamed if that technique were imputed to him. The alleged defamation therefore is limited to the imputation of vulgar speech and insulting manners.

The defendants asked the trial court to give an instruction to the jury identifying the matter which it could consider as defamatory. The trial court refused. Instead, the court sent the case to the jury without distinction between actionable defamation and constitutionally protected criticism. In addition, the trial court's instructions authorized the jury to award special damages for loss of income which could have resulted from the lawful expression of opinion.

Identification. Whether or not an allegedly defamatory communication was made "of and concerning the plaintiff" is an issue involving constitutional rights. (New York Times v. Sullivan (1964) 376 U.S. 254, 288 * * * see Rest. Torts, 2d, § 580A Com. (g).) Criticism of an institution, profession or technique is protected by the First Amendment; and such criticism may not be suppressed merely because it may reflect adversely upon someone who cherishes the institution or is a part of it.

Defendants' novel describes a fictitious therapist who is conspicuously different

1. The record demonstrates the essential truth of the author's thesis. A tape recording of an actual encounter session conducted by plaintiff contains this admonition to the departing patients:

"* * * Now, to top that off, you're turned on, that is you're about as turned on as if you've had 50 to 75 gammas of LSD. That's the estimate of the degree of the turn-on is. And it doesn't feel that way, because you're /sic/ been getting higher a little bit at a time. So don't wait to find out, take my word for it, and drive like you've had three or four martinis. Drive cautiously."

from plaintiff in name, physical appearance, age, personality and profession.

Indeed the fictitious Dr. Herford has none of the characteristics of plaintiff except that Dr. Herford practices nude encounter therapy. Only three witnesses, other than plaintiff himself, testified that they "recognized" plaintiff as the fictitious Dr. Herford. All three of those witnesses had participated in or observed one of plaintiff's nude marathons. The only characteristic mentioned by any of the three witnesses as identifying plaintiff was the therapy practiced.

Plaintiff was cross-examined in detail about what he saw that identified him in the novel. Every answer he gave on this subject referred to how the fictitious Dr. Herford dealt with his patients. * * *

Plaintiff has no monopoly upon the encounter therapy which he calls "nude marathon." Witnesses testified without contradiction that other professionals use something of this kind. There does not appear to be any reason why anyone could not conduct a "marathon" using the style if not the full substance of plaintiff's practices.

Plaintiff's brief discusses the therapeutic practices of the fictitious Dr. Herford in two categories: Those practices which are similar to plaintiff's technique are classified as identifying. Those which are unlike plaintiff's are called libelous because they are false. Plaintiff has thus resurrected the spurious logic which Professor Kalven found in the position of the plaintiff in New York Times v. Sullivan * * * 376 U.S. 254. Kalven wrote: "There is revealed here a new technique by which defamation might be endlessly manufactured. First, it is argued that, contrary to all appearances, a statement referred to the plaintiff; then, that it falsely ascribed to the plaintiff something that he did not do, which should be rather easy to prove about a statement that did not refer to plaintiff in the first place. * * *" Kalven, The New York Times Case: A Note on "The Central Meaning of the First Amendment," 1964 The Supreme Court Review 191, 199.

Even if we accept the plaintiff's thesis that criticism of nude encounter therapy may be interpreted as libel of one practitioner, the evidence does not support a finding in favor of plaintiff.

Whether or not a publication to the general public is defamatory is "whether in the mind of the average reader the publication, considered as a whole, could reasonably be considered as defamatory." [Patton v. Royal Industries, Inc. (1968) 263 Cal.App.2d 760, 765. See Good Government Group of Seal Beach, Inc. v. Superior Court (1978) 22 Cal.3d 672, 682; Rest.Torts, 2d, § 559, comment (e).]

The majority opinion contains this juxtaposition of ideas: "Secondly, defendants' [proposed] instructions that the jury must find that a substantial segment of the public did, in fact, believe the Dr. Simon Herford was, in fact, Paul Bindrim * * * was properly refused. For the tort of defamation, publication to one other person is sufficient, * * *."

The first sentence refers to the question whether the publication was defamatory of plaintiff. The second refers to whether the defamatory matter was published. The former is an issue in this case. The latter is not. Of course, a publication to one person may constitute actionable libel. But this has no bearing on the principle that the allegedly libelous effect of a publication to the public generally is to be tested by the impression made on the average reader.

The jury instruction on identification. The only instruction given the jury on the issue of identification stated that plaintiff had the burden of proving "That a third person read the statement and reasonably understood the defamatory meaning and that the statement applied to plaintiff."

That instruction was erroneous and prejudicial in that it only required proof that one "third person" understood the defamatory meaning.

The word "applied" was most unfortunate in the context of this instruction. The novel was about nude encounter therapy. Plaintiff practiced nude encounter therapy. Of course the novel "applied to plaintiff," particularly insofar as it exposed what may result from such therapy. This instruction invited the jury to find that plaintiff was libeled by criticism of the kind of therapy he practiced. The effect is to mulct the defendants for the exercise of their first amendment right to comment on the nude marathon.

MALICE.

The majority opinion adopts the position that actual malice may be inferred from the fact that the book was "false." That inference is permissible against a defendant who has purported to state the truth. But when the publication purports to be fiction, it is absurd to infer malice because the fiction is false.

As the majority agrees, a public figure may not recover damages for libel unless "actual malice" is shown. Sufficiency of the evidence on this issue is another constitutional issue. (St. Amant v. Thompson (1968) 390 U.S. 727, 730.) Actual malice is a state of mind, even though it often can be proven only by circumstantial evidence. The only apparent purpose of the defendants was to write and publish a novel. There is not the slightest evidence of any intent on the part of either to harm plaintiff. No purpose for wanting to harm him has been suggested.

The majority opinion seems to say malice is proved by Doubleday's continuing to publish the novel after receiving a letter from an attorney (not plaintiff's present attorney) which demanded that Doubleday discontinue publication "for the reasons stated in" a letter addressed to Gwen Davis. An examination of the latter demonstrates the fallacy of that inference.

The letter to Davis [Mitchell] asserted that the book violated a confidential relationship, invaded plaintiff's privacy, libelled him and violated a "common law copyright" by "using the unpublished words" of plaintiff. It added "From your said [television] appearances, as well as from the book, it is unmistakable that the 'Simon Herford' mentioned in your book refers to my client."

The letters did not assert that any statement of purported fact in the book was false. The only allegation of falsity was this:

"In these [television] appearances you stated, directly or indirectly, that nude encounter workshops, similar to the one you attended, are harmful. The truth is that those attending my client's workshops derive substantial benefit from their attendance at such workshops."

These letters gave Doubleday no factual information which would indicate that the book libelled plaintiff.

The letters did not put Doubleday on notice of anything except that plaintiff was distressed by the expression of an opinion unfavorable to nude encounter therapy—an expression protected by the First Amendment. (See Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc. (1974) 418 U.S. 323, 339 * * *; Gregory v. McDonnell Douglas Corp (1976) 17 Cal.3d 596, 600.]

From an analytical standpoint, the chief vice of the majority opinion is that it brands a novel as libelous because it is "false," i.e., fiction; and infers "actual malice" from the fact that the author and publisher knew it was not a true representation of plaintiff. From a constitutional standpoint the vice is the chilling effect upon the publisher of any novel critical of any occupational practice, inviting litigation on the theory "when you criticize my occupation, you libel me." [Emphasis added.]

I would reverse the judgment.

COMMENT

Although recognizing that rebuttal or retraction, as well as a pleading of truth, would exacerbate an invasion of privacy,<sup>32</sup> Justice Brennan in Time, Inc. v. Hill observed that "Many 'right of privacy' cases could in fact have been brought as 'libel per quod' actions * * * all libel cases concern public exposure of false matter, but the primary harm being compensated is damage to reputation. In the 'right of privacy' cases the primary damage is the mental distress from having been exposed to public view, although injury to reputation may be an element bearing upon such damage."

Brennan nevertheless kept libel and privacy distinct, although, as Rosenbloom would demonstrate later, their protection would depend on parallel lines of reasoning based on the "public interest" or "public issue" test first suggested by Warren and Brandeis in their Harvard Law Review article. Arguably, if determining when a "libel" involves material which affects the "public interest" is an unsuitable task for courts in a regime governed by the First Amendment, it is a similarly unsuitable task for courts to decide when a publication is "newsworthy" in a privacy case since by doing so they interfere with journalistic prerogatives.

Gertz discarded the "public interest" standard for libel, a standard that focused essentially on the subject matter of the defamatory report, in favor of a test based on the private/public status of the plaintiff.

Under the rules of Gertz there may then be advantages to the press of a future merger of libel and false light privacy. For one, the plaintiff would clearly carry the burden of proving the falsity of the publication. At least one lower court has held that the burden of proof in a false light case is on the defendant.<sup>33</sup> On the other hand, Cantrell would permit punitive damages based, not on the New York Times definition of actual malice, but on the lesser standard of common law malice, defined frequently as spite or ill will. "In false light cases," Justice Stewart wrote in Cantrell, "common-law malice * * * would focus on the defendant's attitude toward the plaintiff's privacy, not toward the truth or falsity of the material published." Since the Cantrells were unable to show that the Cleveland Plain Dealer had an intentionally negative attitude toward their privacy, punitive damages were properly disallowed by the district court. But the topsy-turvy effect of making common law malice a more serious breach of duty than the constitutional standard of actual malice was not lost on the press and Court watchers.

Obviously false light invasions do not always carry reputational harm. Baseball pitcher Warren Spahn was given a fictional Bronze Star by his admiring biographer, and the dramatizers of Hill's captivity depicted him as a hero. Humiliation may still follow this kind of fictionalization, although fictionalization seems inevitable in book and documentary treatment of popular heroes and villains.

32. Nimmer in The Right to Speak from Times to Time: First Amendment Theory Applied to Libel and Misapplied to Privacy, 56 Calif.L.Rev. 935 (1968) contends, as have others, that there should be liability for invasions of privacy in spite of the First Amendment. There is an area of intimate privacy to which freedom of the press does not apply, and the "more speech" doctrine of the First Amendment does not provide a remedy for an invasion of privacy. The Court erred conceptually, he believes, in connecting libel and privacy in Time, Inc. v. Hill.

33. Corabi v. Curtis Publishing Co., 273 A.2d 899 (Pa.1971). For a discussion of the availability of a privacy action as a substitute for a libel action when success under libel theory seems unlikely, see Greenawalt, New York's Right of Privacy—The Need for Change, 42 Brooklyn L.Rev. 159 (1975). A Maryland district court said that its one-year statute of limitations for libel applied also to false light since the claims are "essentially analogous." Smith v. Esquire, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1825, 494 F.Supp. 967 (D.Md. 1980).

Ordinary people may feel their privacy violated even when accurate information about them is disclosed. Gossip when presented as news can be more objectionable to some than a credit bureau leak; it is also the lifeblood of celebrity, even when that celebrity is fleeting. And there remains the problem here, as in libel, of the involuntary public figure.

Mrs. Firestone, though described as an adulteress, withdrew her claim of injury to reputation and relied solely on a claim of mental pain and anguish. By doing so, she may have brought libel and privacy closer together. In the meantime, the press can only hope that the actual malice bond that joins the two areas of mass communication law will remain sturdy and that, as a corollary, truth will remain a defense against both libel and false light privacy claims.

EMBARRASSING PRIVATE FACTS: "PURE" PRIVACY AND THE DEFENSE OF NEWSWORTHINESS

Public disclosure of embarrassing private facts, while the purest form of an invasion of privacy, the one which Warren and Brandeis had in mind, and the one to which most current definitions of privacy best apply, is the most difficult for a plaintiff to pursue.

Why? Because the defense of newsworthiness intervenes to protect the publisher, a defense so broad that Professor Kalven believed it would virtually "swallow the tort." Newsworthiness, as has been noted, means different things to different people. And for legal purposes, it may not cover everything an editor elects to print. A British parliamentary committee attempted definition—although it came out against a law of privacy—when it suggested that a distinction might be made between published material which is in the public interest, and that is a concomitant of informed citizenship, and that which is merely of public interest, that is an appeal to a general desire for vicarious experience or entertainment.<sup>34</sup>

The problem with such Meiklejohnian interpretations is that they tend to underestimate the significance of nonpolitical and unclassifiable forms of speech. Newsworthiness has been applied to privacy claims with a broad brush anyway, and where plaintiffs have succeeded, they have done so at the cost of additional publicity.

A classic case in point. In 1940, a federal court rejected the privacy claim of William James Sidis, a one-time child prodigy, whose later life as an unknown recluse had been exposed, albeit sympathetically, by a writer for The New Yorker<sup>35</sup>. Sidis has been talked about ever since he filed that suit in the late thirties.

The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reasoned as follows.

SIDIS v. F-R PUBLISHING CORP.

113 F.2D 806 (2D CIR. 1940).

CLARK, Circuit Judge

34. Report of the Committee on Privacy, Kenneth Younger, Chairman, London, July, 1972, p. 47. See also, Bloustein, Individual and Group Privacy (1978); Bezanson, Public Disclosures as News: Injunctive Relief and Newsworthiness in Privacy Actions Involving the Press, 64 Iowa L.Rev. 1073 (1979).

35. Manley, Where Are They Now? April Fool! The New Yorker, August 14, 1937. Herbert Strentz, dean of the School of Journalism at Drake University, speculates from evidence contained in James Thurber's The Years With Ross that Thurber may have been the author of the Sidis article. April Fool's Day was Sidis's birthdate.

Warren and Brandeis realized that the interest of the individual in privacy must inevitably conflict with the interest of the public in news. Certain public figures, they conceded, such as holders of public office, must sacrifice their privacy and expose at least part of their lives to public scrutiny as the price of the powers they attain. But even public figures were not to be stripped bare. "In general, then, the matters of which the publication should be repressed may be described as those which concern the private life, habits, acts, and relations of an individual, and have no legitimate connection with his fitness for a public office. * * * Some things all men alike are entitled to keep from popular curiosity, whether in public life or not, while others are only private because the persons concerned have not assumed a position which makes their doings legitimate matters of public investigation."

It must be conceded that under the strict standards suggested by these authors plaintiff's right of privacy has been invaded. Sidis today is neither politician, public administrator, nor statesman. Even if he were, some of the personal details revealed were of the sort that Warren and Brandeis believed "all men alike are entitled to keep from popular curiosity."

But despite eminent opinion to the contrary, we are not yet disposed to afford to all of the intimate details of private life an absolute immunity from the prying of the press. Everyone will agree that at some point the public interest in obtaining information becomes dominant over the individual's desire for privacy. Warren and Brandeis were willing to lift the veil somewhat in the case of public officers. We would go further, though we are not yet prepared to say how far. At least we would permit limited scrutiny of the "private" life of any person who has achieved, or has had thrust upon him, the questionable and indefinable status of a "public figure."

William James Sidis was once a public figure. As a child prodigy, he excited both admiration and curiosity. Of him great deeds were expected. In 1910, he was a person about whom the newspapers might display a legitimate intellectual interest, in the sense meant by Warren and Brandeis, as distinguished from a trivial and unseemly curiosity. But the precise motives of the press we regard as unimportant. And even if Sidis had loathed public attention at that time, we think his uncommon achievements and personality would have made the attention permissible. Since then Sidis has cloaked himself in obscurity, but his subsequent history, containing as it did the answer to the question of whether or not he had fulfilled his early promise, was still a matter of public concern. The article in The New Yorker sketched the life of an unusual personality, and it possessed considerable popular news interest.

We express no comment on whether or not the newsworthiness of the matter printed will always constitute a complete defense. Revelations may be so intimate and so unwarranted in view of the victim's position as to outrage the community's notions of decency. [Emphasis added.] But when focused upon public characters, truthful comments upon dress, speech, habits, and the ordinary aspects of personality will usually not transgress this line. Regrettably or not, the misfortunes and frailties of neighbors and "public figures" are subjects of considerable interest and discussion to the rest of the population. And when such are the mores of the community, it would be unwise for a court to bar their expression in the newspapers, books, and magazines of the day.

Plaintiff in his first "cause of action" charged actual malice in the publication, and now claims that an order of dismissal was improper in the face of such an allegation. We cannot agree. If plaintiff's right of privacy was not invaded by the article, the existence of actual malice in its publication would not change that result. Unless made so by statute, a truthful and therefore non-libelous statement will not become libelous when uttered maliciously.

* * *

The second "cause of action" charged invasion of the rights conferred on plaintiff by §§ 50 and 51 of the N.Y. Civil Rights Law. Section 50 states that "A person, firm or corporation that uses for advertising purposes, or for the purposes of trade, the name, portrait or picture of any living person without having first obtained the written consent of such person, or if a minor of his or her parent or guardian, is guilty of a misdemeanor." Section 51 gives the injured person the right to an injunction and to damages.

* * * In this context, it is clear that "for the purposes of trade" does not contemplate the publication of a newspaper, magazine, or book which imparts truthful news or other factual information to the public. Though a publisher sells a commodity, and expects to profit from the sale of his product, he is immune from the interdict of §§ 50 and 51 so long as he confines himself to the unembroidered dissemination of facts. Publishers and motion picture producers have occasionally been held to transgress the statute in New York, but in each case the factual presentation was embellished by some degree of fictionalization. * * *

The case as to the newspaper advertisement announcing the August 14 article is somewhat different, for it was undoubtedly inserted in the World-Telegram "for advertising purposes." But since it was to advertise the article on Sidis, and the article itself was unobjectionable, the advertisement shares the privilege enjoyed by the article. Besides, the advertisement, quoted above, did not use the "name, portrait or picture" of the plaintiff.

COMMENT

The rule of Sidis—that revelations so intimate and so unwarranted in view of the victim's position as to outrage the community's notions of decency are actionable under privacy standards—has stood the test of time. Truthful publication may be punished in some circumstances.

"One who gives publicity to a matter concerning the private life of another is subject to liability to the other for invasion of privacy, if the matter publicized is of a kind that (a) would be highly offensive to a reasonable person and (b) is not of legitimate concern to the public." Restatement (Second) of Torts § 652D (1977).

As in libel, where the Supreme Court extended substantial latitude to the states to develop their own standards of fault, the Court in privacy has developed what is essentially a community standards test, or what one commentator has called the unconscionability rule.<sup>36</sup>

Application of the test is illustrated in a case involving an eccentric body surfer and Sports Illustrated. Plaintiff permitted himself to be interviewed but revoked all consent when he learned that the picture-story would include truthful details of what can only be called weird behavior. The article was published anyway and included the following paragraphs:

He is somewhat of a mystery to most of the regular personnel, partly because he is quiet and withdrawn, usually absent from their get-togethers, and partly because he is considered to be somewhat abnormal.

Virgil's carefree style at the Wedge appears to have emanated from some escapades in his younger days, such as the time at a party when a young lady approached him and asked where she might find an ashtray. "Why, my dear, right here," said Virgil, taking her lighted cigarette and extinguishing it in his mouth. He also won a small bet one time by burning a hole in a dollar bill that was resting on the back of his hand. In the process he also burned two holes in his wrist.

The article quoted a statement Virgil made to the author about a trip to Mammoth Mountain:

I quit my job, left home and moved to Mammoth Mountain. At the ski lodge there one night I dove headfirst down a flight of stairs—just because. Because why? Well, there were these chicks all around. I thought it would be groovy. Was I drunk? I think I might have been.

The article quotes Virgil as saying:

Every summer I'd work construction and dive off billboards to hurt myself or drop loads of lumber on myself to collect unemployment compensation so I could surf at the Wedge. Would I fake injuries? No, I wouldn't fake them. I'd be damn injured. But I would recover. I guess I used to live a pretty reckless life. I think I might have been drunk most of the time.

Again quoting Virgil, the author relates:

I love tuna fish. Eat it all the time. I do what feels good. That's the way I live my life. If it makes me feel good, whether it's against the law or not, I do it. I'm not sure a lot of the things I've done weren't pure lunacy. Cherilee [plaintiff's wife] says, "Mike also eats spiders and other insects and things."

Virgil was further quoted as saying,

I've always been determined to find a sport I could be the best in. I was always aggressive as a kid. You know, competitive, mean. Real mean. I bit off the cheek of a Negro in a six-against-30 gang fight. They had tire irons with them. But that was a long time ago. At the Wedge, there are a lot of individualists.

The article notes: "Perhaps because most of his time was spent engaged in such activity, Virgil never learned how to read."

A photo caption reads: "Mike Virgil, the wild man of the Wedge, thinks it possible his brain is being slowly destroyed."

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals wrote no brief for the press when it said:

To hold that privilege extends to all true statements would seem to deny the existence of "private" facts, for if facts be facts—that is, if they be true—they would not (at least to the press) be private, and the press would be free to publicize them to the extent it sees fit. The extent to which areas of privacy continue to exist, then, would appear to be based not on rights bestowed by law but on the taste and discretion of the press. We cannot accept this result.

Nevertheless, the court added that news of legitimate concern to the public is protected by the First Amendment, and "in determining what is a matter of legitimate public interest, account must be taken of the customs and conventions of the community; and in the last analysis what is proper becomes a matter of the community mores. The line is to be drawn when the publicity ceases to be the giving of information of which the public is entitled, and becomes a morbid and sensational prying into private lives for its own sake, with which a reasonable member of the public, with decent standards, would say that he had no concern. * * * But if there is room for differing views as to the state of community mores or the manner in which it would operate upon the facts in question, there is room for the jury function." [Emphasis added.] Virgil v. Time, Inc., 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1835, 527 F.2d 1122 (9th Cir. 1975).

The Ninth Circuit in Virgil thus concluded that no First Amendment privilege attaches to publication of private facts, even though true, when the facts are not in themselves newsworthy. An order denying summary judgment to Time, Inc. was vacated, and the case was remanded to the district court so that it, applying what at best is a vague and subjective test, could sift private from public facts and decide whether a person of ordinary sensibilities would be offended by the publication of these particular private facts.

The Ninth Circuit had directed the federal district court to consider the case under the "outrageousness" or "unconscionability" standard. The federal district court found that the publication in controversy did not violate that test. Noting that the Ninth Circuit had held that the First Amendment privilege to publish newsworthy information "is controlled by federal rather than state law," the district court granted summary judgment to Time, Inc. and included the following comments of its own:

The above facts are generally unflattering and perhaps embarrassing, but they are simply not offensive to the degree of morbidity or sensationalism. In fact they connote nearly as strong a positive image as they do a negative one. On the one hand Mr. Virgil can be seen as a juvenile exhibitionist, but on the other hand he also comes across as the tough, aggressive maverick, an archetypal character occupying a respected place in the American consciousness. Given this ambiguity as to whether or not the facts disclosed are offensive at all, no reasonable juror could conclude that they were highly offensive.

Even if the Court had reached the opposite conclusion that the facts disclosed were highly offensive, Time would still be entitled to summary judgment. For highly offensive facts, i.e., those having a degree of offensiveness equivalent to "morbid and sensational," to be denied protection as newsworthy, the revelation of them must be "for its own sake." Both parties agree that bodysurfing at the Wedge is a matter of legitimate public interest, and it cannot be doubted that Mike Virgil's unique prowess at the same is also of legitimate public interest. Any reasonable person reading the Sports Illustrated article would have to conclude that the personal facts concerning Mike Virgil were included as a legitimate journalistic attempt to explain Virgil's extremely daring and dangerous style of bodysurfing at the Wedge. Virgil v. Sports Illustrated & Time, Inc., 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1271, 424 F.Supp. 1286 (D.Cal.1976).

Iowa's Supreme Court held that a newspaper report of a patient subjected to sterilization was not an invasion of privacy because it was newsworthy and insufficiently intimate to outrage the community's notions of decency, and it was part of a public record. Of the story the court said:

[I]t offered a personalized frame of reference to which the reader could relate, fostering perception and understanding * * * the editors also had a right to buttress the force of their evidence by naming names. We do not say it was necessary for them to do so, but we are certain they had a right to treat the identity of victims of involuntary sterilization as matters of legitimate public concern. * * * The specificity of the report would strengthen the accuracy of the public perception of the merits of the controversy. Howard v. Des Moines Register and Tribune Co., 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1667, 283 N.W.2d 289 (Ia. 1979), cert. den. 445 U.S. 904 (1980).<sup>37</sup>

When the photo of a formerly fat woman, taken on a beach, was published without consent in an article about obesity, claims of emotional distress and false light were dismissed as insufficiently outrageous to support actions for damages.<sup>38</sup> Nor did a story about a woman's divorce from her police officer husband who had been traumatically injured while working on a bomb squad support a private facts claim.<sup>39</sup>

Indeed, successful private facts suits have been difficult to find since Time, Inc. v. Hill in 1967. A federal district court thought it had reached the outer boundaries when it denied a prominent Twin Cities television station copies of videotapes that had been shown to a jury in a kidnap-murder trial. The tapes made by defendant, recorded his multiple rape of his former high school teacher and rambling conversations with her while she lay blindfolded and bound on the floor. The victim and her daughter later escaped their captor. A small boy picked up during their abduction was murdered.

"Release of the tapes for public dissemination," said the court, "would impinge upon the precious rights of * * *, the unfortunate victim of the crime and would lend the court's approval to the commercial exploitation of a voice and photographic display catering to prurient interest without proper public purpose or corresponding assurance of public benefit. * * There must be some point where the public's right to information must bow to the dignity of the individual person." In Re Application of KSTP-TV for Video Tapes in the Case of United States v. Ming Sen Shiue, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2249, 504 F.Supp. 360 (D.Minn.1980).

The ruling appears to be based on the presumption that the television station would broadcast everything the jury had seen submitted in evidence. The issue is what access should the public have to an evidentiary record? Traditionally persons caught up in the criminal justice process, even innocently, have found their privacy in jeopardy. Television news film of a holdup suspect being frisked by police did not support a claim for invasion of privacy, even though plaintiff had not participated in any crime and was released without charge.<sup>40</sup> If an event is newsworthy, even innocent bystanders may lose their right of privacy.<sup>41</sup>

When a temporarily deranged man was arrested at his home by Boise, Idaho police for using a shotgun in a threatening manner, he was framed in his doorway and he was naked. TV cameras filmed the arrest, and for a fraction of a second the man's buttocks and genitals appeared on the evening news. The news editor was fired. The arrested man, claiming embarrassment and humiliation, sued the television station for invasion of privacy, and a jury awarded him $15,000. On appeal to the Supreme Court of Idaho, the judgment was reversed and the case remanded for retrial. The state supreme court went astray, however, by directing the trial court to decide the case on the issue of actual malice, an issue not governing private facts cases but reserved for false light suits.<sup>42</sup>

An outcome similarly disappointing to plaintiff was predictable in the case of the Vietnam veteran who, although confined to a wheelchair, reached out and deflected Sarah Moore's shot at President Gerald Ford. While his heroism was being acclaimed, leaders of San Francisco's gay community identified the veteran as one of them, information which he did not wish to have published and which, he said, exposed him to contempt and ridicule. His $15 million suit against newspapers, magazines, and wire services could not succeed while presidential assassination and homosexuality remain newsworthy public issues.<sup>43</sup> Editorial sensitivity, taste, and judgment, of course, will determine how cases of this kind are handled.

Even in cases of egregious bad taste and faulty editorial judgment the public interest defense will protect a publisher. A newspaper printed photos of a murdered child's body, wrapped in chains, being pulled from a lake. Additional prints showing the gruesome effects of the crime were sold to the public. But a privacy claim brought by the parents was rejected because, said a Georgia court, the crime, at least until its perpetrator was apprehended, was a matter of urgent public interest. Waters v. Fleetwood, 91 S.E.2d 344 (Ga.1956).

A Cocoa Beach, Florida jury ordered a newspaper to pay $10,000 to a woman who, after being held captive by her estranged husband, was photographed fleeing from her home naked except for a hand towel. The editor thought the published photo "best capsulized the dramatic and tragic event." Plaintiff's lawyer said it simply violated good taste. Cape Publications v. Bridges, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1884, 387 So.2d 436 (Fla.1980).

Records of the court itself are least vulnerable to private facts suits. In spite of a Georgia statute protecting the identity of rape victims, the privacy claim of a father whose daughter was raped and murdered by six fellow high school students was rejected. A broadcast reporter got the name from a clerk of court since it was included in an official indictment record open to public inspection.

COX BROADCASTING CORP. v. COHN

L.ED.2D 328 (1975).

Justice WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * *

Georgia stoutly defends both § 26-9901 and the State's common-law privacy action challenged here. Its claims are not without force, for powerful arguments can be made, and have been made, that however it may be ultimately defined, there is a zone of privacy surrounding every individual, a zone within which the State may protect him from intrusion by the press, with all its attendant publicity. Indeed, the central thesis of the root article by Warren and Brandeis, "The Right To Privacy", 4 Harv.L.Rev. 193, 196 (1980), was that the press was overstepping its prerogatives by publishing essentially private information and that there should be a remedy for the alleged abuses.

More compellingly, the century has experienced a strong tide running in favor of the so-called right of privacy. * * * Nor is it irrelevant here that the right of privacy is no recent arrival in the jurisprudence of Georgia, which has embraced the right in some form since 1905 when the Georgia Supreme Court decided the leading case of Pavesich v. New England Life Insurance Co. * * * 50 S.E. 68 (Ga.1905).

These are impressive credentials for a right of privacy, but we should recognize that we do not have at issue here an action for the invasion of privacy involving the appropriation of one's name or photograph, a physical or other tangible intrusion into a private area, or a publication of otherwise private information that is also false although perhaps not defamatory. The version of the privacy tort now before us—termed in Georgia "the tort of public disclosure,"—is that in which the plaintiff claims the right to be free from unwanted publicity about his private affairs, which, although wholly true, would be offensive to a person of ordinary sensibilities. Because the gravamen of the claimed injury is the publication of information, whether true or not, the dissemination of which is embarrassing or otherwise painful to an individual, it is here that claims of privacy most directly confront the constitutional freedoms of speech and press. The face-off is apparent, and the appellants urge upon us the broad holding that the press may not be made criminally or civilly liable for publishing information that is neither false nor misleading but absolutely accurate, however damaging it may be to reputation or individual sensibilities.

It is true that in defamation actions, where the protected interest is personal reputation, the prevailing view is that truth is a defense; and the message of New York Times Co. v. Sullivan; Garrison v. Louisiana; Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, and like cases is that the defense of truth is constitutionally required where the subject of the publication is a public official or public figure. What is more, the defamed public official or public figure must prove not only that the publication is false but that it was knowingly so or was circulated with reckless disregard for its truth or falsity. Similarly, where the interest at issue is privacy rather than reputation and the right claimed is to be free from the publication of false or misleading information about one's affairs, the target of the publication must prove knowing or reckless falsehood where the materials published, although assertedly private, are "matters of public interest." Time, Inc. v. Hill.

The Court has nevertheless carefully left open the question whether the First and Fourteenth Amendments require that truth be recognized as a defense in a defamation action brought by a private person as distinguished from a public official or public figure. [In a concurring opinion, Justice Powell disputes this interpretation of Gertz: "It is fair to say that if the statements are true, the standard contemplated by Gertz cannot be satisfied. * * * I view that opinion as requiring that the truth be recognized as a complete defense." ] Garrison held that where criticism is of a public official and his conduct of public business, "the interest in private reputation is overborne by the larger public interest, secured by the Constitution, in the dissemination of truth," but recognized that "different interests may be involved where purely private libels, totally unrelated to public affairs, are concerned; therefore, nothing we say today is to be taken as intimating any views as to the impact of the constitutional guarantees in the discrete area of purely private libels." In similar fashion, Time, Inc. v. Hill, expressly saved the question whether truthful publication of very private matters unrelated to public affairs could be constitutionally proscribed.

Those precedents, as well as other considerations, counsel similar caution here. In this sphere of collision between claims of privacy and those of the free press, the interests on both sides are plainly rooted in the traditions and significant concerns of our society. Rather than address the broader question whether truthful publications may ever be subjected to civil or criminal liability consistently with the First and Fourteenth Amendments, or to put it another way, whether the State may ever define and protect an area of privacy free from unwanted publicity in the press, it is appropriate to focus on the narrower interface between press and privacy that this case presents, namely, whether the State may impose sanctions on the accurate publication of the name of a rape victim obtained from public records—more specifically, from judicial records which are maintained in connection with a public prosecution and which themselves are open to public inspection. We are convinced that the State may not do so.

In the first place, in a society in which each individual has but limited time and resources with which to observe at first hand the operations of his government, he relies necessarily upon the press to bring to him in convenient form the facts of those operations. Great responsibility is accordingly placed upon the news media to report fully and accurately the proceedings of government, and official records and documents open to the public are the basic data of governmental operations. Without the information provided by the press most of us and many of our representatives would be unable to vote intelligently or to register opinions on the administration of government generally. With respect to judicial proceedings in particular, the function of the press serves to guarantee the fairness of trials and to bring to bear the beneficial effects of public scrutiny upon the administration of justice. See Sheppard v. Maxwell, 384 U.S. 333 (1966). [This text, p. 492.]

Appellee has claimed in this litigation that the efforts of the press have infringed his right to privacy by broadcasting to the world the fact that his daughter was a rape victim. The commission of crime, prosecutions resulting from it, and judicial proceedings arising from the prosecutions, however, are without question events of legitimate concern to the public and consequently fall within the responsibility of the press to report the operations of government.

* * *

The developing law surrounding the tort of invasion of privacy recognizes a privilege in the press to report the events of judicial proceedings. The Warren and Brandeis article, supra, noted that the proposed new right would be limited in the same manner as actions for libel and slander where such a publication was a privileged communication: "the right to privacy is not invaded by any publication made in a court of justice * * * and (at least in many jurisdictions) reports of any such proceedings would in some measure be accorded a like privilege."

The Restatement of Torts, § 867, embraced an action for privacy. Tentative Draft No. 13 of the Second Restatement of Torts, §§ 652A–652E, divides the privacy tort into four branches; and with respect to the wrong of giving unwanted publicity about private life, the commentary to § 652D states: "There is no liability when the defendant merely gives further publicity to information about the plaintiff which is already public. Thus there is no liability for giving publicity to facts about the plaintiff's life which are matters of public record. * * *" The same is true of the separate tort of physically or otherwise intruding upon the seclusion or private affairs of another. Section 652B, Comment c, provides that "there is no liability for the examination of a public record concerning the plaintiff, or of documents which the plaintiff is required to keep and make available for public inspection." According to this draft, ascertaining and publishing the contents of public records are simply not within the reach of these kinds of privacy actions.

Thus even the prevailing law of invasion of privacy generally recognizes that the interests in privacy fade when the information involved already appears on the public record. The conclusion is compelling when viewed in terms of the First and Fourteenth Amendments and in light of the public interest in a vigorous press. The Georgia cause of action for invasion of privacy through public disclosure of the name of a rape victim imposes sanctions on pure expression—the content of a publication—and not conduct or a combination of speech and nonspeech elements that might otherwise be open to regulation or prohibition. * * *

By placing the information in the public domain on official court records, the State must be presumed to have concluded that the public interest was thereby being served. Public records by their very nature are of interest to those concerned with the administration of government, and a public benefit is performed by the reporting of the true contents of the records by the media. The freedom of the press to publish that information appears to us to be of critical importance to our type of government in which the citizenry is the final judge of the proper conduct of public business. In preserving that form of government the First and Fourteenth Amendments command nothing less than that the States may not impose sanctions on the publication of truthful information contained in official court records open to public inspection.

We are reluctant to embark on a course that would make public records generally available to the media but forbid their publication if offensive to the sensibilities of the supposed reasonable man. Such a rule would make it very difficult for the media to inform citizens about the public business and yet stay within the law. The rule would invite timidity and self-censorship and very likely lead to the suppression of many items that would otherwise be published and that should be made available to the public. At the very least, the First and Fourteenth Amendments will not allow exposing the press to liability for truthfully publishing information released to the public in official court records. If there are privacy interests to be protected in judicial proceedings, the States must respond by means which avoid public documentation or other exposure of private information. Their political institutions must weigh the interests in privacy with the interests of the public to know and of the press to publish.<sup>26</sup> Once true information is disclosed in public court documents open to public inspection, the press cannot be sanctioned for publishing it. In this instance as in others reliance must rest upon the judgment of those who decide what to publish or broadcast.

Appellant Wassell based his televised report upon notes taken during the court proceedings and obtained the name of the victim from the indictments handed to him at his request during a recess in the hearing. Appellee has not contended that the name was obtained in an improper fashion or that it was not on an official court document open to public inspection. Under these circumstances, the protection of freedom of the press provided by the First and Fourteenth Amendments bars the State of Georgia from making appellants' broadcast the basis of civil liability.

COMMENT

1. Is the difference between Cox where the First Amendment interest was upheld and Firestone where it was not that Cox involved the publication of accurate information while Firestone did not? See discussion of Firestone, text, pp. 239, 243. The High Court has not decided whether truth is an absolute defense.

2. Is the Court suggesting in its footnote 26 that rape trials be closed to the public so as to avoid a public record? If it is, there may be no need for such Draconian measures. In normal circumstances most newspapers will not publish the names of rape victims anyway.

But what about juveniles, drug offenders, morals violators, and all kinds of persons who may have been rehabilitated? Legislators can decide within constitutional limits, what hearings shall be closed and what records purged.

3. In the meantime, what will the Court do if a true and accurate report which invades someone's privacy comes from sources other than public records? The name of a rape victim, for example?

26. We mean to imply nothing about any constitutional questions which might arise from a state policy not allowing access by the public and press to various kinds of official records, such as records of juvenile-court proceedings.

In Campbell v. Seabury Press, 5 Med.L. Rptr. 2612, 614 F.2d 395 (5th Cir. 1980), a federal appeals court seemed to answer that question when it decided that private facts based on references to a former sister-in-law in a civil rights leader's biography were nonactionable. Citing Cox, the court extended the public interest or newsworthiness privilege to entirely private persons because of a "logical nexus * * * between the complaining individual and the matter of legitimate public interest." The complainant, who asserted that her virtue had been impugned, would pay for her brother-in-law's notoriety, and he, by inference, would have no private facts claim whatsoever.

In Gilbert v. Medical Economics, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2372, 665 F.2d 305 (10th Cir. 1981), the subject of an article entitled "Who Let This Doctor in the O.R.?" found no remedy in privacy law because accurate personal facts about the doctor again were closely related to his malpractice suit.

Dresbach v. Doubleday, discussed earlier in a false light context, stretched the Campbell rule to the rehabilitation of a criminal and, in the process, summarized a number of important private facts cases. The case involves a book about a son who had murdered his parents twenty years earlier. Plaintiff was the rehabilitated murderer's brother who had played no role in the crime.

GREEN, J.

Despite the Supreme Court's requirement that not just falsity, but negligent, reckless or intentional falsity, be a defense to a defamation action, the Court has not ruled out a cause of action based upon true statements constituting an unwarranted invasion of privacy. Cox Broadcasting

Corp. v. Cohn, 420 U.S. 469, 487-491 (1975); Time, Inc. v. Hill, 382-384 and n. 7; Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64, 70-75 and n. 9 (1964). In order to protect First Amendment values regarding such statements (which would seem more deserving of protection than the false statements which are the subject of defamation actions), the lower courts have given broad latitude to the exception applied to publications which although possibly revealing private information offensive to the ordinary person, are of public or general interest. E.g. Sidis v. F-R Publishing Corp., 113 F.2d 806, 809-810 (2d Cir. 1940), cert. den., 311 U.S. 711; Campbell v. Seabury Press, 614 F.2d 395 (5th Cir.1980). In fact it has been suggested that the exception has swallowed the rule. Kalven, Privacy in Tort Law-Were Warren and Brandeis Wrong? 31 Law & Contemporary Problems 326, 335-336 (1966); Time, Inc. v. Hill, at n. 7 and cases cited therein.

In our case, plaintiff asserts that there was no public interest in the subject matter of the Book at the time of its publication in 1980, as opposed to the time of the events described, and that the issues of public interest claimed by defendants to be explored in the Book, such as child abuse, violent youth, and the functioning of the criminal justice system, have nothing to do with plaintiff, and do not justify publication of private facts about him. Facts which plaintiff believes cast him in a bad light and are unnecessary to the stated purposes of the Book include the limited number of visits he made to his brother in jail, his "abandonment" of his brother, his failure to render financial assistance to his brother, the fact that he did not share his inheritance from his parents with his brother, and his concealment of his whereabouts from him. In addition, plaintiff objects generally to the inclusion of private facts about his childhood and his life after the murders, as well as to his appearance as a "central character" in the Book.

While plaintiff disputes the accuracy of some of these disclosures, the truth of some, such as the fact that he did not share his inheritance with his brother, is undenied. The cause of action as to true statements will be discussed first, followed by the false light aspect of the claim.

In support of the argument that the passage of time has rendered private subject matter which was admittedly at one time a legitimate subject of public interest, plaintiff cites cases holding that a cause of action may be stated where a publication identifies a rehabilitated criminal with his crime of many years past. Melvin v. Reid, 297 P. 91 (1931); Bernstein v. National Broadcasting Co., 129 F.Supp. 817 (D.D.C. 1955), affirmed 232 F.2d 369 (D.C.Cir.1956), cert. den., 352 U.S. 945; Briscoe v. Readers Digest Association, 93 Cal.Rptr. 866, 483 P.2d 34 (1971). Melvin v. Reid involved a movie about a woman who eight years previous had been a prostitute and was tried for murder and acquitted. She had since reformed and become a respectable member of society. Many of her present acquaintances did not know of her past. The Court found that although the republication of events in the public record was not actionable, a cause of action for invasion of privacy was stated based upon the use of plaintiff's correct maiden name in connection with unsavory incidents of her past life. A major reason for allowing such an action, in the eyes of the Court, was society's interest in the "rehabilitation of the fallen and the reformation of the criminal." Melvin v. Reid, supra, 297 P. at 93. In Bernstein, while finding no privacy cause of action on the facts of that case, the Court stated that there could be a cause of action for unreasonable public identification of a person in his present setting referring to earlier actions which took place at a time when the plaintiff was a legitimate object of public interest. Briscoe held that the plaintiff has a cause of action for a publication concerning his involvement in a truck hijacking incident eleven years earlier. Plaintiff alleged that he had been completely rehabilitated since, and that he had many friends, as well as a daughter, who were not previously aware of his involvement in that offense. The Court stated that truthful reports about recent crimes are privileged, as are the facts about past crimes. However, identification of the actors in long past crimes, where the actors had done nothing to reattract public attention, could be found by a jury to be without legitimate public interest and grossly offensive to the average person. The Court believed that a jury could find that the article in question concerning truck hijacking would have lost none of its value by deleting the plaintiff's name. An important factor in the decision was the State's interest in the rehabilitative process.

The State interest in the rehabilitative process was characterized as "most important" in the Briscoe case in a recent California Supreme Court case, Forsher v. Bugliosi, 163 Cal.Rptr. 628, 608 P.2d 716 (1980), stating that Briscoe was "an exception to the more general rule that 'once a man has become a public figure, or news, he remains a matter of legitimate recall to the public mind to the end of his days.'" Forsher, 608 P.2d at 726, quoting Prosser, Privacy, 48 Cal.L.Rev. 383, 418 (1960).

In our case we must decide whether true matters in the Book were matters of public interest at the time they were published, and whether the inclusion of plaintiff in connection with those matters was legitimate, or whether the countervailing interest in plaintiff's privacy concerning those matters many years after the events renders the publication actionable.

Given the generally broad public interest exception to the right of privacy action, and the fact that the few cases plaintiff has been able to cite in his favor rest strongly upon the plaintiffs' status as rehabilitated criminals, there is no doubt that for the purpose of a privacy action, the subject matter of this Book was of legitimate public interest at the time it was published. (We need not decide whether Wayne Dresbach, as a rehabilitated criminal, could have brought a privacy action concerning this Book, as he has given his consent to its publication). The public has a legitimate interest in the facts about past crimes and their investigation and prosecution, as well as the possible motivating forces in the background of the criminal. Plaintiff cannot prevail on a theory that the subject matter of the Book had become private with the passage of time. He also cannot object to republication of matters which are in the public record of the trial and related proceedings, no matter how private or offensive, as information in the public record is absolutely privileged. Cox Broadcasting Corp. v. Cohn; Harrison v. Washington Post Co., 391 A.2d 781 (D.C. 1978). Nor could the Book have been written, with its implication that the circumstances of Wayne's home life drove him to murder, without including private facts about plaintiff's home life, which obviously was intimately bound up with his brother's. This is even more true here than in the usual case of brothers growing up in the same home, since much of the friction between Wayne and his parents concerned their unfavorable comparison of him with Lee.

Plaintiff's relationship with his brother after the murders and plaintiff's own subsequent history are less obviously integral to the subject matter of the Book. However, we tread on dangerous ground deciding exactly what matters are sufficiently relevant to a subject of legitimate public interest to be privileged. First Amendment values could obviously be threatened by the uncertainty such decisions could create for writers and publishers. "Only in cases of flagrant breach of privacy which has not been waived or obvious exploitation of public curiosity where no legitimate public interest exists should a court substitute its judgment for that of the publisher." Cantrell v. Forest City Publishing Co., 484 F.2d 150 (6th Cir. 1973), reversed on other grounds, 419 U.S. 245 (1974). This is not such a case. The subject matter of Wayne's rehabilitation after his murder conviction, focusing both on prison conditions and the support or lack thereof he received from friends and family, cannot be said to be without legitimate public interest, and facts about Wayne's relationship with his brother are clearly related to that subject. In Campbell v. Seabury Press, 614 F.2d 395 (5th Cir. 1980), the plaintiff was found not to have a cause of action for invasion of privacy for the disclosure of private facts regarding her marriage and home life. The book in question was the autobiography of a man whose brother, plaintiff's former husband, was a religious and civil rights leader. The challenged disclosures were included in the context of plaintiff's relationship with the brother and the impact of that relationship upon the author. The Court held that there is a constitutional privilege to publish news or other matters of public interest, and that the privilege "extends to information concerning interesting phases of human activity and embraces all issues about which information is needed or appropriate so that individuals may cope with the exigencies of their period. * * * [The privilege applies even to] information relating to individuals who have not sought or have attempted to avoid publicity. * * * The privacy of such individuals is protected, however, by requiring that a logical nexus exist between the complaining individual and the matter of legitimate public interest." Id. at 397. The Court found that the accounts of the brother's marriage as they impacted upon the author had the requisite logical nexus to fall within the ambit of constitutional protection. Although this Court might not go as far as the Campbell court in extinguishing the right to privacy, clearly here, where the important public issues of crime, the criminal justice system, and rehabilitation are concerned, the defendants have shown an adequate nexus between matters of legitimate public interest and the disclosures about the plaintiff to merit constitutional protection.

We are not without compassion for Lee Dresbach's plight. The exercise of defendants' First Amendment rights has imposed a heavy burden upon plaintiff. It is easy to sympathize with his objection to the Book having been written at all, and certainly to his inclusion in it. In his own words in response to the question, "What else do you find objectionable?", he replied, "Me being in the book at all. I asked not to be in the book. I have a right to my own privacy. I can go probably weeks without thinking about seeing two people murdered. Every day since then all I do is think about it." * * * Additionally, a great deal of very sensitive information about plaintiff's past which he has chosen to keep secret is now available to friends, employers, customers, his wife, and in-laws. Yet, there is no doubt that a cause of action based upon truthful material in the Book cannot be permitted consistent with the First Amendment. Clearly, this society has put a higher value on open criminal proceedings and on public discussion of all issues than on the individual's right to privacy. To guard against the possible evils of abuse of power if the criminal justice system were to operate away from the public eye, and of suppression of freedom of thought if writers could not freely explore the causes and handling of past crimes of public interest, the plaintiff's right to bury the past must be sacrificed. Freedom of speech would be crippled if discussions of matters of public interest were narrowly circumscribed in the manner suggested by plaintiff to protect privacy. Summary judgment must be granted in favor of both defendants on plaintiff's privacy claim as to accurate material in the Book.

A cause of action may be stated for a false light invasion of privacy even where the subject matter is of legitimate public interest. * * * Insofar as plaintiff can point to specific passages of the Book which are alleged to be inaccurate, placing him in a false light before the public, which are an offensive invasion of his privacy, and which were written without the exercise of ordinary care to determine their accuracy, a jury issue is created. However, plaintiff has not clearly delineated in his pleadings what portions of the Book he claims meet these requirements. In his deposition testimony, he appears to concede the substantial accuracy of the statements concerning his inheritance, the frequency of his visits to his brother in prison, and his failure to inform his brother of his whereabouts. He does deny the accuracy of some of the incidents described in the Book, such as that regarding Wayne's efforts to borrow money from him to fix his teeth, * * *, and that concerning the will plaintiff made before leaving for Viet Nam, in which according to the Book, he left his brother $5.00. * * * He also denied generally that he was abused by his parents as described in the Book, * * *, and states to the contrary that his father treated him kindly. * * * In order to withstand the motion for summary judgment, plaintiff must make a further submission to the Court delineating precisely which passages in the Book are alleged to invade plaintiff's privacy and place him in a false light, including the manner in which they are claimed to be inaccurate.

COMMENT

1. Another dimension of the newsworthiness rule, implied in Sidis and applied in Dresbach, is once a public figure always a public figure, in spite of the Supreme Court's reasoning in Wolston v. Reader's Digest Association, Inc. (this text, p. 249) that a public figure's status could dissipate over time. The retention of a newsworthy image will, it seems, depend upon the significance of the public facts with which the individual was involved. "The public has a legitimate interest in the facts about past crimes and their investigation and prosecution," said the D.C. Circuit Court in Dresbach, "as well as the possible motivating forces in the background of the criminal."

In noncriminal cases of notoriety the rule is not as clear and caution is advised, although the Fifth Circuit in Campbell v. Seabury Press did note that the privilege to publish news or other matters of public interest "extends to information concerning interesting phases of human activity and embraces all issues about which information is needed or appropriate so that individuals may cope with the exigencies of their period. * * *

2. As shall be noted in the section on the intrusion category of invasion of privacy, it does make a difference how information is obtained. In Smith v. Daily Mail Publishing Co., 443 U.S. 97 (1979), the Supreme Court said, "[I]f a newspaper lawfully obtains truthful information about a matter of public significance, then state officials may not constitutionally punish publication of the information, absent a need to further a state interest of the highest order." In the cases discussed so far, information was obtained openly.<sup>44</sup>

3. The question that remains only partially answered is what does it take today to outrage a community's sense of decency. Have our sensitivities toward personal privacy diminished? We do know what has outraged some communities and their judicial systems in the past. For example, a woman's disfigured face photographed without her consent while she was semi-conscious,<sup>45</sup> a published photograph of an employee's mangled thigh,<sup>46</sup> a photograph of a woman with her skirt blown over her head as she entered a county fair "fun house,"<sup>47</sup> and a newspaper piece which contained the words, "Wanna hear a sexy telephone voice? Call * * * and ask for Louise."<sup>48</sup> In the latter case, the court compared the objectionable language of the newspaper with that commonly found on the walls of public lavatories.

Shocking also to the judicial temperament, if not to community mores, was the picture in Time magazine of a hospital patient who was photographed against her will, while her attention was diverted, and presented to the world as the "starving glutton," "Insatiable-Eater Barbara," who "eats for ten." Due apparently to a pancreas disorder, the more she ate the more weight she lost.

"Certainly if there is any right of privacy at all," said the Supreme Court of Missouri, "it should include the right to obtain medical treatment at home or in a hospital for an individual personal condition (at least if it is not contagious or dangerous to others) without personal publicity. To enable a physician to treat his patient to advantage, it is often necessary that the patient communicate information which it would be both embarrassing and harmful to have circulated generally through the community." At least her name and photograph could have been omitted from the report. Barber v. Time, Inc., 159 S.W.2d 291 (Mo.1942).

Rancocas Valley Hospital*, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1760 (1982), a New Jersey court held that publication of the name and address of a sexual assault victim, obtained from police and hospital sources despite victim's request that the information not be released, was not an invasion of privacy. The court relied on Smith v. Daily Mail which involved the naming of a juvenile murder suspect.

46. Lambert v. Dow Chemical Co., 215 So.2d 673 (La.1968).

Any iota of voluntariness would seem to invoke the defense of newsworthiness. A news report identifying a twelve-year-old mother, despite her objections, was protected.<sup>49</sup> So was a news review ridiculing an inventor's invention,<sup>50</sup> and a photograph of corpulent women exercising in a gymnasium.<sup>51</sup> A group of young Americans who allowed themselves to be interviewed and photographed living in a communal cave in Crete had no privacy claim.<sup>52</sup> Neither did a casino customer who got caught in a photograph which was later used to dress up an article on gambling and organized crime.<sup>53</sup> The Boston "Strangler's" notoriety and the fact that he had consented to a film portrayal of his life, and had even offered technical advice to the film maker, left him without a privacy claim.<sup>54</sup> A Pennsylvania court held that public figures have no exclusive right to their own biographies and could not claim an invasion of privacy when their life stories were published.<sup>55</sup>

Nathan Leopold was unable to protect his privacy from invasion by a book and motion picture, the fictionalized aspects of which were reasonably true to the record in the celebrated Leopold and Loeb murder case of many years before. Leopold had pleaded guilty, had served a life sentence, and his participation in the murder of Bobby Franks was a matter of public and historical interest, said an Illinois court, even though the plaintiff had since become a useful citizen.<sup>56</sup>

When the photograph of a plaintiff attempting to dissuade a young woman from committing suicide by jumping off a bridge was used two years later, with plaintiff's name, in an article on different forms of suicide, a federal district court in California said the picture was newsworthy and privileged when first published, and the passage of time would not destroy that privilege.<sup>57</sup>

4. Embarrassing facts or public disclosure cases will continue to require a sensitive balancing by the media of competing rights—if not by legal means, then by ethical standards. The courts are especially weak in theory in this area of the law. And if truth is recognized as a defense in this category of privacy, the tort, as Kalven observed, will simply disappear, and any truthful publication will be deemed newsworthy.

Where can a line be drawn between legitimate news and the public's seemingly insatiable appetite for sensational intimacies? Should a line be drawn at all? And, if so, by whom? These questions must await further academic analysis, legislative determination, and case law. In the meantime, there will continue to be uneasiness here, as in other areas of media law, in permitting community norms to determine the application of the broad constitutional principles of freedom of speech and press or to define the boundaries of one's innermost private life.

INTRUSION: A NEWS-GATHERING OFFENSE

Intrusion upon one's solitude or seclusion is an invasion of privacy likely to occur while news is being gathered but may not result in a lawsuit until the news is published, although publication is not essential to the tort. Surveillance and trespass are forms of intrusion. The Restatement includes them both plus a third category.<sup>58</sup> And intrusion may overlap other categories of privacy. In the "Starving Glutton" case, for example, Ms. Barber was photographed against her will in her hospital bed while she was momentarily distracted but her suit was for public disclosure of embarrassing private facts.

Surveillance

A clear case of intrusion occurred when a Life magazine reporter and photographer gained access to a "healer's" home by pretending to be the friends of a friend, then surreptitiously took pictures and relayed tape recordings to law enforcement officials waiting outside while the subject of their investigation examined one of them for breast cancer.

Since the district attorney's office and the state department of health were in on the ruse, although they were not totally dependent upon Life's evidence, it did seem that the magazine was acting as an agent of law enforcement.

The "healer," who specialized in clay, minerals, herbs, and gadgetry, was subsequently arrested and charged with practicing medicine without a license. He pleaded nolo contendere and was cited for a number of misdemeanors. The basis of a subsequent privacy suit was Life's illustrated article entitled "Crackdown on Quackery."

A federal district court awarded the plaintiff $1,000 for an invasion of his privacy, and Life appealed. The judgment was affirmed by a federal appeals court.

DIETEMANN v. TIME, INC.

449 F.2D 245 (9TH CIR. 1971).

HUFSTEDLER, Circuit Judge:

* * *

In jurisdictions other than California in which a common law tort for invasion of privacy is recognized, it has been consistently held that surreptitious electronic recording of a plaintiff's conversation causing him emotional distress is actionable. Despite some variations in the description and the labels applied to the tort, there is agreement that publication is not a necessary element of the tort, that the existence of a technical trespass is immaterial, and that proof of special damages is not required.

Although the issue has not been squarely decided in California, we have little difficulty in concluding that clandestine photography of the plaintiff in his den and the recordation and transmission of his conversation without his consent resulting in his emotional distress warrants recovery for invasion of privacy in California. * * *

Concurrently, with the development of privacy law, California had decided a series of cases according plaintiffs relief from unreasonable penetrations of their mental tranquility based upon the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. [Citations omitted.] Although these cases are not direct authority in the privacy

58. One who intentionally intrudes, physically or otherwise, upon the solitude or seclusion of another or his private affairs or concerns, is subject to liability to the other for invasion of his privacy, if the intrusion would be highly offensive to a reasonable person. (a) surreptitious surveillance, (b) trespass, (c) consent to enter secluded setting has been exceeded. Restatement (Second) of Torts § 652B.

area, they are indicative of the trend of California law to protect interests analogous to those asserted by plaintiff in this case.

We are convinced that California will "approve the extension of the tort of invasion of privacy to instances of intrusion, whether by physical trespass or not, into spheres from which an ordinary man in plaintiff's position could reasonably expect that the particular defendant should be excluded." (Pearson v. Dodd, 410 F.2d at 704.)

Plaintiff's den was a sphere from which he could reasonably expect to exclude eavesdropping newsmen. He invited two of defendant's employees to the den. One who invites another to his home or office takes a risk that the visitor may not be what he seems, and that the visitor may repeat all he hears and observes when he leaves. But he does not and should not be required to take the risk that what is heard and seen will be transmitted by photograph or recording, or in our modern world, in full living color and hi-fi to the public at large or to any segment of it that the visitor may select. A different rule could have a most pernicious effect upon the dignity of man and it would surely lead to guarded conversations and conduct where candor is most valued, e.g., in the case of doctors and lawyers.

The defendant claims that the First Amendment immunizes it from liability for invading plaintiff's den with a hidden camera and its concealed electronic instruments because its employees were gathering news and its instrumentalities "are indispensable tools of investigative reporting." We agree that newsgathering is an integral part of news dissemination. We strongly disagree, however, that the hidden mechanical contrivances are "indispensable tools" of newsgathering. Investigative reporting is an ancient art; its successful practice long antecedes the invention of miniature cameras and electronic devices. The First Amendment has never been construed to accord newsmen immunity from torts or crimes committed during the course of newsgathering. [Emphasis added.] The First Amendment is not a license to trespass, to steal, or to intrude by electronic means into the precincts of another's home or office. It does not become such a license simply because the person subjected to the intrusion is reasonably suspected of committing a crime.

Defendant relies upon the line of cases commencing with New York Times Co. v. Sullivan and extending through Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, Inc. to sustain its contentions that (1) publication of news, however tortiously gathered, insulates defendant from liability for the antecedent tort, and (2) even if it is not thus shielded from liability, those cases prevent consideration of publication as an element in computing damages.

As we previously observed, publication is not an essential element of plaintiff's cause of action. Moreover, it is not the foundation for the invocation of a privilege. Privilege concepts developed in defamation cases and to some extent in privacy actions in which publication is an essential component are not relevant in determining liability for intrusive conduct antedating publication. Nothing in New York Times or its progeny suggests anything to the contrary. Indeed, the Court strongly indicates that there is no First Amendment interest in protecting news media from calculated misdeeds. (E.g., Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. at 389-390 and 384 n. 9.)<sup>1</sup>

No interest protected by the First Amendment is adversely affected by permitting damages for intrusion to be en-

1. "Nor do we intimate," said Justice Brennan in footnote 9, "any view whether the Constitution limits state power to sanction publication of matter obtained by an intrusion into a protected area, for example, through use of electronic listening devices."

hanced by the fact of later publication of the information that the publisher improperly acquired. Assessing damages for the additional emotional distress suffered by a plaintiff when the wrongfully acquired data are purveyed to the multitude chills intrusive acts. It does not chill freedom of expression guaranteed by the First Amendment. A rule forbidding the use of publication as an ingredient of damages would deny to the injured plaintiff recovery for real harm done to him without any countervailing benefit to the legitimate interest of the public in being informed. The same rule would encourage conduct by news media that grossly offends ordinary men.

The judgment is affirmed.

COMMENT

Dietemann illustrates that in actions for intrusive invasions of privacy a First Amendment defense is very weak. The court failed to consider the news value of the publication itself. Seldom is intrusion as clear-cut as it was when Life photographed and "bugged" the about-to-be-convicted quack. What if the plaintiff is a very public person, a celebrity, or a government official suspected of corruption?

The first part of the question was addressed by federal courts in New York in an incredible case involving a peripatetic photographer, said to be America's only paparazzo, and Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis. Ronald Galella, a free lance, made a modest living photographing celebrities. But his specialty was Mrs. Onassis. His strategy was aggressive pursuit, described by Jackie as a continual stalking of her, popping up everywhere while emitting a curious "grunting" sound which, she said, terrified her.

Galella argued that his subject was simply a camera-shy and uncooperative public person. When she asked the Secret Service and other police officers to intervene on her behalf, the photographer, claiming that he had been roughed up, brought a $1.3 million damage suit and a plea for an injunction against interference with his making a living. Mrs. Onassis then filed a counterclaim for $1.5 million in compensatory and punitive damages and for injunctive relief. The United States joined her to seek injunctive relief against Galella's interference with the activities of Secret Service agents assigned to protect the former first lady and her children.

The two cases were joined, and a federal district court held that the photographer's antics were not protected by the First Amendment but constituted actionable assault, battery, and harassment, violation of the civil rights statute, and tortious infliction of emotional distress. Both Mrs. Onassis and the government were granted injunctive relief in a ruling in which the court expressed enormous distaste for Galella and rejected his claim along with what it called his perjured testimony. A portion of the ruling follows.

GALELLA v. ONASSIS

353 F.SUPP. 196 (S.D.N.Y.1972).

COOPER, District Judge:

* * * [T]wenty further episodes are summarized in our supplemental findings of fact. These include instances where the children were caused to bang into glass doors, school parents were bumped, passage was blocked, flashbulbs affected vision, telephoto lenses were used to spy, the children were imperilled in the water, a funeral was disturbed, plaintiff pursued defendant into the lobby of a friend's apartment building, plaintiff trailed defendant through the City hour after hour, plaintiff chased defendant by automobile, plaintiff and his assistants surrounded defendant and orbited while shouting, plaintiff snooped into purchases of stockings and shoes, flashbulbs were suddenly fired on lonely black nights—all accompanied by Galella jumping, shouting and acting wildly. Many of these instances were repeated time after time; all preceded our restraining orders.

He was like a shadow: everywhere she went he followed her and engaged in offensive conduct; nothing was sacred to him whether defendant went to church, funeral services, theatre, school, restaurant, or board a yacht in a foreign land. While plaintiff denied so deporting himself, his admissions clearly spell out his harassment of her and her children.

Mrs. Onassis' severe emotional distress is evident and reasonable.

When Galella rushed her limousine on September 21, 1969, she was terrified. Galella's pursuit of her and the children at the horse show in Gladstone, New Jersey, caused her concern and anxiety for fear that his activities would frighten the horse and thereby endanger her children. Galella's sudden appearance behind bursting flash bulbs at 2 o'clock in the morning at Oliver Smith's house in Brooklyn Heights stunned and startled her. When Galella crashed about in the tunnel beneath Lincoln Center and tried to push his way through a revolving door with Mrs. Onassis and her children she was frightened that someone would be injured in the door. Galella's antics in the theatre at 40 Carats so upset Mrs. Onassis that she covered her face with Playbill. When Galella cruised around Mrs. Onassis in a power boat as she was swimming off Ischia, he was so close that she was afraid she would be cut by the propeller. Galella's dogging of Mrs. Onassis' footsteps throughout her shopping trip in Capri left her terrified and upset. Galella's taxicab chase with Joyce Smith on October 7, 1971 left Mrs. Onassis a "wreck."

When Galella suddenly jumped from behind the wall in Central Park, frightening John and causing him to lose control of his bicycle, Mrs. Onassis described her state of mind as having been "terrorized." The Santa Claus pursuit in and around the Collegiate School in December 1970 left Mrs. Onassis extremely upset. Galella's outrageous pursuit of Mrs. Onassis on the night of Two Gentlemen of Verona terrified her and left her in an "anguished," "humiliated" and "terribly upset" state. Numerous times, and at dangerous speeds, he has followed cars in which the children were passengers, violating the rules of the road, and the Secret Service agents assigned to protect the children have frequently expressed concern for the safety of their principals as a result of Galella's activities.

Additionally, Mrs. Onassis and her children are people who have a very special fear of startling movements, violent activity, crowds and other hostile behavior. It is clear that the assassinations of the first husband of Mrs. Onassis and of her brother-in-law (Senator Robert F. Kennedy) are matters of common knowledge to virtually every citizen. These matters were certainly known to Galella who "specializes" in the affairs of Mrs. Onassis and who chronicled her brother-in-law's funeral. These events make Mrs. Onassis and her children particularly susceptible to Galella's erratic behavior and make his acts all the more outrageous and utterly devoid of any sensitivity whatever for his subjects.

The proposition that the First Amendment gives the press wide liberty to engage in any sort of conduct, no matter how offensive, in gathering news has been flatly rejected.

* * *

We conclude that the First Amendment does not license Galella to trespass inside private buildings, such as the children's schools, lobbies of friends' apartment buildings and restaurants. Nor does that Amendment command that Galella be permitted to romance maids, bribe employees and maintain surveillance in order to monitor defendant's leaving, entering and living inside her own home.

* * *

In any event, we said at trial, and now repeat, that she is a public figure. Nevertheless, the First Amendment does not immunize all conduct designed to gather information about or photographs of a public figure. There is no general constitutional right to assault, harass, or unceasingly shadow or distress public figures.

* * *

We venture to suggest that faced with a factual situation comparable to the distressing one before us, with a torrent of almost unrelieved abuse into the privacy of every day activity, the New York Court of Appeals would complete the mission it has already begun of determining what should be actionable under the developing common law right of privacy. Nader v. General Motors Corp., * * * 307 N.Y. S.2d 647, 255 N.E.2d 765 (1970), in which the Court applied District of Columbia law.

First let us reconsider plaintiff's close-shadowing of defendant. Continuously he has had her under surveillance to the point where he is notified of her every movement. He waits outside her residence at all hours. He follows her about irrespective of what she is doing: trailing her up and down the streets of New York, chasing her out of the city to neighboring places and foreign countries when she leaves for recreation or vacation, haunting her at restaurants (recording what she eats), theatres, the opera and other places of entertainment, and pursuing her when she goes shopping, getting close to her at the counter and inquiring of personnel as to her clothing purchases. His surveillance is so overwhelmingly pervasive that he has said he has not married because he has been unable to "get a girl who would be willing to go looking for Mrs. Onassis at odd hours."

He studies her habits, the operations of her household and the procedures of the Secret Service in guarding her children. He has kept her under such close observation for so long a period of time that he has commented at considerable length on her personality, her shopping tastes and habits, and her preferences for entertainment. With evident satisfaction, he referred, while testifying, to his "usual habitual observation." He has intruded into her children's schools, hidden in bushes and behind coat racks in restaurants, sneaked into beauty salons, bribed doormen, hatcheck girls, chauffeurs, fishermen in Greece, hairdressers and schoolboys, and romanced employees. In short, Galella has insinuated himself into the very fabric of Mrs. Onassis' life and the challenge to this Court is to fashion the tool to get him out.

We return now to Nader. The Court there sustained the sufficiency of allegations to the effect that plaintiff's "right of privacy" under District of Columbia law had been violated by defendant's activities which consisted of surveillance, shadowing, eavesdropping, and others not here relevant.

Chief Judge Fuld, for the Court, wrote:

There are * * * allegations that the appellant hired people to shadow the plaintiff and keep him under surveillance. In particular, he claims that, on one occasion, one of its agents followed him into a bank, getting sufficiently close to him to see the denomination of the bills he was withdrawing from his account. From what we have already said, it is manifest that the mere observation of the plaintiff in a public place does not amount to an invasion of his privacy. But, under certain circumstances, surveillance may be so "overzealous" as to render it actionable. * * * A person does not automatically make public everything he does merely by being in a public place, and the mere fact that Nader was in a bank did not give anyone the right to try to discover the amount of money he was withdrawing.

As we see it, Galella's conduct falls within the formulation of the right of privacy as expressed in the opinion. The surveillance, close-shadowing and monitoring were clearly "overzealous" and therefore actionable. Moreover, Galella's corruption of doormen, romancing of the personal maid, deceptive intrusions into children's schools, and return visits to restaurants and stores to inquire about purchases were all exclusively for the "purpose of gathering information of a private and confidential nature" which Judge Fuld found to be actionable.

Does the law of New York differ from the law of the District of Columbia as declared by New York's highest court? The dictum in Roberson v. Rochester Folding-Box Co., * * * 64 N.E. 442 (1902), does not support the conclusion that invasion of privacy is not actionable under New York law. * * * Roberson involved the commercial appropriation of a likeness, which, Dean Prosser teaches has "almost nothing in common" with intrusion, the gravamen of the case at bar.

Since the Roberson dictum was enunciated, freedom from extensive shadowing and observation has come to be protected in most other jurisdictions.

* * *

The essence of the privacy interest includes a general "right to be left alone," and to define one's circle of intimacy; to shield intimate and personal characteristics and activities from public gaze; to have moments of freedom from the unremitting assault of the world and unfettered will of others in order to achieve some measure of tranquility for contemplation or other purposes, without which life loses its sweetness. The rationale extends to protect against unreasonably intrusive behavior which attempts or succeeds in gathering information, and includes, but is not limited to, such disparate abuses of privacy as the unreasonable seeking, gathering, storing, sharing and disseminating of information by humans and machines.

It has been cogently suggested that the right to privacy proscribes dehumanizing conduct which assaults, "liberty, personality and self-respect." Fried, Privacy, 77 Yale L.J. 475, 485 (1960).

COMMENT

Galella and his agents were enjoined by the district court from approaching within 300 feet of the Onassis and Kennedy homes and the schools attended by the children; they were also required to remain 225 feet from the children and 150 feet from Mrs. Onassis at all other locations. Galella was also prohibited from putting the family under surveillance or trying to communicate with them.

The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit essentially upheld the lower court decision, noting that the First Amendment does not set up a wall of immunity to protect newsmen from any liability for their conduct while gathering news. Crimes and torts committed in news gathering, said the court, are not protected, and it cited Branzburg v. Hayes (this text, p. 379), Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, and Dietemann v. Time, Inc.

The appeals court did something else. It sharply scaled down the distances Galella was to keep from Mrs. Onassis and her children. It reduced from 150 to 25 feet the distance the photographer must put between himself and Mrs. Onassis; from 225 to 30 feet the distance he must stay from Caroline and John; and it lifted the restriction on Mrs. Onassis's Fifth Avenue home. Galella v. Onassis, 487 F.2d 986 (2d Cir. 1973).

The court of appeals ruling essentially put Galella back in business. But it wasn't until 1982 that the original New York federal district court, more impatient with Galella than ever, held that the photographer's flagrant, deliberate, and persistent violations of federal court orders restricting coverage of Jacqueline Onassis and her children constituted a contempt of court. He had violated the courts' orders on distance-from-subject at least twelve times. Galella v. Onassis, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1321, 533 F.Supp. 1076, (D.N.Y.1982). The agglutinate Galella had earlier promised a federal district judge following a harassment complaint, never again to take pictures of Onassis or her children "as long as you draw breath." This time Galella would pay his subject $10,000.

Trespass

1. An action for a trespass form of invasion of privacy and for wrongful intentional infliction of emotional distress was brought against Florida news media by a mother whose daughter died in a fire in her home. So badly was she burned that, after removal of the body, a silhouette of her body remained on a bedroom floor. The mother learned of the tragedy by reading a news story and seeing a picture of the silhouette in the Florida Times-Union.

Lower courts refused to grant summary judgment to the newspaper's publisher on the trespass count. On appeal the Florida Supreme Court held that where there was an implied consent by custom and usage authorizing a news photographer to accompany police and fire marshals into a home, there was no trespass. In fact a fire marshal had requested that the photographer take the "silhouette" picture for his official file.

Television networks, newspapers, wire services, and professional organizations had provided the court with affidavits attesting to the common practice of reporters accompanying officials into homes where there has been crime or tragedy. The court agreed that "as a matter of law an entry, that may otherwise be an actionable trespass, becomes lawful and non-actionable when it is done under common usage, custom and practice."

The court's opinion can be read to imply that had the plaintiff been present and objected to the photographer's entry, she would have had a stronger case. Florida Publishing Co. v. Fletcher, 340 So.2d 914 (Fla.1976), cert. den. 431 U.S. 930 (1977). But see, Prahl v. Brosamle, 295 N.W.2d 768 (Wis.1980).

Support for that conclusion is contained in the holding of a New York trial court that the First Amendment right to gather news did not authorize television reporters and photographers to enter a private home without the consent of the homeowner, even though entry was at the invitation of a humane society investigator who was executing a search warrant. Anderson v. WROC-TV, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1987, 441 N.Y.S.2d 220 (1981).

Reporters and photographers who entered "Son of Sam's" apartment after his arrest on suspicion of murder were not guilty of criminal trespass, said a New York city court. Although police had earlier entered the apartment with a warrant, they had no "possessory interest." Only Berkowitz himself, or the apartment owner, could have withheld consent from the newsmen. Police, however, could have excluded persons from the premises while a lawful criminal search was being conducted. People v. Berliner, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1942 (N.Y.City Ct.1978).

2. CBS News was less fortunate when one of its reporters and a camera crew "with cameras rolling" entered a posh French restaurant, Le Mistral, as a follow-up to a New York City Health Service Administration press release alleging health code violations at several city restaurants. Le Mistral sued for defamation and trespass following a WCBS-TV news report which included film clips of the restaurant's staff attempting to eject the CBS crew.

The trial court judge dismissed the defamation suit on "fair comment" grounds but granted a trial on the trespass count since, he said, "the right to publish does not include the right to break and enter upon and trespass upon the property of these plaintiffs." A year later a jury awarded Le Mistral $250,000 in punitive and $1,200 in compensatory damages for trespass. On CBS's motion the trial court upheld the trespass verdict but set aside the damage awards. "Patronizing a restaurant," said the court, "does not carry with it an obligation to appear on television.

In March 1978 an appeals court reinstated the compensatory damages and directed a new trial solely on the issue of punitive damages. Under New York law, punitive or exemplary damages require a showing of malice (evil or wrongful motive). CBS, the court added, is entitled to explain its motive. One judge, dissenting in part, thought CBS overly aggressive but not malicious in pursuing the story. Le Mistral, Inc. v. CBS, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1913, 402 N.Y.S.2d 815 (N.Y.1978).

Le Mistral falls somewhere between the news-gathering offenses complained of in Dietemann and Fletcher.

Should the First Amendment limit liability by media defendants in these circumstances as it does in the law of privacy and the law of libel? Why or why not?

3. A more dramatic form of trespass referred to earlier—that is, where the plaintiff is a public official suspected of corruption—arose in a case involving columnist Drew Pearson and Senator Thomas

Dodd. A number of significant questions came into focus in the case.

What is the journalist's liability when he or she receives information "lifted" from the files of a public official? Is receiving information taken without authorization from government files the equivalent of receiving stolen property? In short, how far can the right to gather news be extended?

In the Pentagon Papers case, Justices White and Stewart underlined the power of Congress to enact specific criminal laws to protect government property. Justice Marshall also recognized the power of Congress to make criminal the receipt or purchase of certain classifications of official documents. Chief Justice Burger and Justice Blackmun agreed with White that penal sanctions were an appropriate way of protecting government secrets. See text, p. 110ff. In general, the government cannot protect its records by copyright, although it has tried.<sup>59</sup>

In the Dodd case, four former employees removed documents from the Senator's office, gave photostats to Drew Pearson and his associate Jack Anderson, then returned the originals to the files. Stories appeared based on the documents, and Dodd sued for libel. A United States district court, invoking the New York Times rule, disallowed the libel action.

Dodd's lawyers came back with an invasion of privacy plea and an inventive argument based on the common law tort of trover and conversion—"an unauthorized assumption and exercise of the right of ownership over goods or personal chattels belonging to another, to the alteration of their condition or the exclusion of an owner's rights."<sup>60</sup>

Because of the public interest inherent in the documents, the privacy claim was rejected; but the court granted partial summary judgment to Senator Dodd on the theory of conversion. A portion of the district court opinion follows.

DODD v. PEARSON

279 F.SUPP. 101 (D.D.C.1968) AFF'D IN PART
REV'D IN PART 410 F.2D 701.

HOLTZOFF, District Judge. * * *

On the uncontroverted facts, the individuals who without authority entered the plaintiff's office, rifled his files, removed documents and made copies of them, which they turned over to the defendants, would be liable for damages in trespass and conversion. They are not being sued. It is well settled, however, that a person who receives and uses the property of another that has been wrongfully obtained, knowing that it was so obtained, is likewise guilty of conversion and liable for damages. * * *

It would be a work of supererogation to multiply authorities for this proposition of law, which is almost elementary. It is clear, therefore, that on the undisputed facts, the defendants are liable to the plaintiff for damages on the theory of conversion. The mere fact that the defendants received copies of the documents from the trespassers who purloined the originals, instead of the originals themselves, is, of course, immaterial. What the measure of damages should be and whether substantial damages may be recovered under the circumstances, is a matter to be determined at a later stage of this litigation.

Plaintiff's counsel advance an additional alternative theory on which they seek to predicate the plaintiff's right to recover, namely, violation of the right of privacy. The right of privacy has been developed and has gradually gained recognition in the law of torts since the turn of the century. This Court in Peay v. Curtis Pub. Co., D.C., 78 F.Supp. 305, held that it formed a part of the law of the District of Columbia. As this Court stated in the Peay case, the right of privacy has been broadly described as "the right to be let alone." The publication of a photograph of a private individual without his sanction, or depicting events in his personal life that are of no public interest, are illustrative violations of the right of privacy. It is a right to keep the noiseless tenor of one's way along the cool sequestered vale of life without intrusion on the part of the public. There are those who shun publicity and who deplore and even resent any attempt to cast a public gaze on any aspect of their personal life. The law respects this attitude and lends sanction to it by way of an action for damages for its infringement. There are, however, important limitations on the right of privacy. It does not extend to matters of public interest, or to persons properly in the public eye, at least as to matters other than features of their intimate life, Bernstein v. NBC, 129 F.Supp. 817, 828, affirmed * * * 232 F.2d 369.

The Court concludes that the publication of the material of which the plaintiff complains is not protected by the cloak of the right of privacy, because the publications relate to his activities as a high-ranking public officer, namely, Senator of the United States, in which the public has an interest.

It follows hence that the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages in this case, but only on the theory of a conversion and not on the theory of a violation of a right of privacy. The distinction is not purely theoretical, as a more liberal, flexible and broad measure of damages may perhaps be applicable to actions for invasion of privacy, than govern actions for conversion. * * * In this instance, apparently the plaintiff seeks to recover damages for injury to reputation, personal embarrassment and mental anguish. Whether recovery of such damages may be had in an action for conversion and, in fact, whether on the facts of this case the plaintiff may recover substantial damages at all, must be left for determination at the trial. * *

COMMENT

1. Shouldn't the same First Amendment considerations which made it almost impossible for Dodd to recover from Pearson on either the tort of libel or the tort of invasion of right of privacy make it equally difficult for Dodd to recover from Pearson on a theory of conversion? What, if anything, is there about a conversion theory which makes the First Amendment less compelling?

2. The editors of the Georgetown Law Journal pointed out that allowing an action in conversion to substitute for a libel or right of privacy suit runs counter to the underlying premises of New York Times v. Sullivan and Time, Inc. v. Hill. The Dodd case extended the tort of conversion ("any distinct act of dominion wrongfully exercised over another's property, in denial of or inconsistent with his right") to the delivery by former employees of Senator Dodd of copies of purloined documents to Jack Anderson. See Note, Conversion As a Remedy for Injurious Publication—New Challenge to the New York Times Doctrine? 56 Geo.L.J. 1223 at 1224 (1968). The editors noted that Judge Holtzoff observed that "'Anderson was aware of the manner in which the copies had been obtained.'" Id. at 1224.

The extension by the court of the tort of conversion to information and ideas was criticized on the ground that the court made the liability of the publisher hinge on whether the information in question was known by the publisher to have been wrongfully obtained.

The editors further pointed out that guilty knowledge is not usually a critical factor in imposing liability for conversion and that, unlike New York Times and Hill, the definition of knowledge revolved around the "source of the speech rather than its content." Note, supra, 56 Geo.L.J. 1223 at 1229 (1968). Thus liability was imposed in Dodd because of the manner in which the information was obtained rather than because the information was not "newsworthy" or because it was published in "reckless disregard of its truth or falsity."

Is the extension of a conversion theory to these circumstances a completely inconsistent defiance of that vigorous and intense criticism of government which the New York Times case was designed to assure?

Should conversion theory never be used in situations like Dodd v. Pearson?

The editors of the Georgetown Law Journal made the following compromise suggestion:

If a columnist actively participates in the commission of a tort, he would obviously be held to have exceeded the bounds of constitutionally protected activity. When the tort directly relates to the publication of information concerning official misconduct, however, the sine qua non for liability should be active participation by the publisher in the commission of the tortious act. Such a rule would comport with the policy and spirit underlying similar privileges to other areas, and allow the protection of a well-informed public to outweigh considerations of individual interests.

Does this suggested approach focus on the content rather than the source of the speech?

From a First Amendment point of view, i.e., vigorous and robust criticism of government, what are the advantages of the suggested approach over that actually used by Judge Holtzoff in Dodd v. Pearson?

3. Judge Holtzoff's decision in the district court granting partial summary judgment to Senator Dodd on a theory of conversion and denying partial summary judgment to Senator Dodd on a right of privacy theory were brought by interlocutory appeal to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. The Court of Appeals affirmed the district court's ruling on the privacy issue but reversed the same court on its grant of summary judgment for conversion. Pearson v. Dodd, 410 F.2d 701 (D.C.Cir.1969), cert. den. 395 U.S. 947 (1969).

With respect to the privacy point, Dodd's counsel argued that the district court had misunderstood his claim and that his privacy objection was based not on the content of the columns published by Pearson but on the manner in which he obtained the information published. Judge Skelly Wright for the appeals court distinguished intrusion from other invasions of privacy by noting that intrusion does not require the publication of the information obtained. For the tort of intrusion to be accomplished, it is only necessary that the information be obtained "by improperly intrusive means."

Judge Wright concluded that Pearson received the documents from Senator Dodd's files with knowledge that they had been removed from the files without authorization. Should the court hold that Pearson is liable for invasion of privacy since he had received information from an intruder? Judge Wright answered the question in the negative:

In an untried and developing area of tort law, we are not prepared to go so far. A person approached by an eavesdropper with an offer to share in the information gathered through the eavesdropping would perhaps play the nobler part should he spurn the offer and shut his ears. However, it seems to us that at this point it would place too great a strain on human weakness to hold one liable in damages who merely succumbs to temptation and listens.

Of course, appellants did more than receive and peruse the copies of the documents taken from appellee's [Dodd's] files: they published excerpts from them in the national press. But in analyzing a claimed breach of privacy, injuries from intrusion and injuries from publication should be kept clearly separate. Where there is intrusion, the intruder should generally be liable whatever the content of what he learns. An eavesdropper to the marital bedroom may hear marital intimacies, or he may hear statements of fact or opinion of legitimate interest to the public; for purposes of liability that should make no difference. On the other hand, where the claim is that private information concerning plaintiff has been published, the question of whether that information is genuinely private or is of public interest should not turn on the manner in which it has been obtained. Of course, both forms of invasion may be combined in the same case.

Here we have separately considered the nature of appellant's (Pearson and Anderson) publications concerning appellee, and have found that the matter published was of obvious public interest. The publication was not itself an invasion of privacy. Since we have also concluded that appellant's role in obtaining the information did not make them liable for intrusion to appellee, their subsequent publication, itself no invasion of privacy, cannot reach back to render that role tortious.

4. The Court of Appeals also concluded that Drew Pearson and his colleague Jack Anderson were not guilty of conversion. The court reasoned: "The most significant feature of conversion is the measure of damages, which is the value of the goods converted." Since the documents in Dodd's files were photocopied and the originals returned, the court stated that Dodd was therefore not deprived of his files: "Insofar as the documents' value to appellee resided in their usefulness as records of the business of his office, appellee was clearly not substantially deprived of his use of them." But the court then acknowledged that "documents often have value above and beyond that springing from their physical possession." On the conversion point Judge Wright stated:

Appellee [Dodd] complains, not of the misappropriation of property bought or created by him, but of the exposure of information either (1) injurious to his reputation or (2) revelatory of matters which he believes he has a right to keep to himself. Injuries of this type are redressed at law by suit for libel and invasion of privacy respectively, where defendants' liability for those torts can be established under the limitations created by common law and by the Constitution.

Because no conversion of the physical contents of appellee's files took place, and because the information copied from the documents in those files has not been shown to be property subject to protection by suit for conversion, the District Court's ruling that appellants are guilty of conversion must be reversed.

Judge Wright's opinion clearly closes the opening wedge of media liability in a Dodd-type fact situation which Judge Holtzoff's opinion in the district court had created. Holtzoff had sketched the outlines of a theory of media liability on a conversion theory even though Time, Inc. v. Hill and the New York Times doctrine precluded such liability on a right of privacy or libel theory.

5. Do the classifications between injuries from publication and injuries from intrusion separate quite as tidily as Judge Wright suggests? When did the most serious consequence of the intrusion into Dodd's files occur: when the confidential files were removed by the "intruder" or when Pearson published them? What is the real basis for refusal to hold that Pearson's role in the affair was not passive (merely reading and receiving the documents), but active (publishing them)? Is the basic problem that without injury from intrusion there would be no publication and therefore no injury from such publication? But the court wished to separate the intrusion from publication apparently because candid recognition of their interconnection cannot be accomplished without returning to the basic issue of whether an elected public official such as Dodd has any basis for a right of privacy claim against Pearson. In the light of this analysis, note Judge Wright's remark in his Court of Appeals opinion, fn. 6: "Since under common law principles appellants' publication does not amount to an invasion of privacy, we need not reach the serious constitutional questions suggested by Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374 (1967)."

6. Judge Wright pointed out that files in Dodd's senate office are maintained in an office owned by the United States. Wright noted that this question was not briefed by the parties, but he speculated that it was not entirely clear as to whether the Senator had title to the contents of his files. Assume that Dodd has no "title" to the content of the files. Whose legal position would such an assumption strengthen?

7. Judge Edward Tamm concurred in the result reached by Judge Wright, but he filed a separate concurring opinion:

Some legal scholars will see in the majority opinion—as distinguished from its actual holding—an ironic aspect. Conduct for which a law enforcement officer would be soundly castigated is, by the phraseology of the majority opinion, found tolerable; conduct which, if engaged in by government agents would lead to the suppression of evidence obtained by these means, is approved when used for the profit of the press. There is an anomaly lurking in this situation: the news media regard themselves as quasi-public institutions yet they demand immunity from the restraints which they vigorously demand be placed on government. That which is regarded as a mortal taint on information secured by any illegal conduct of government would appear from the majority opinion to be permissible as a technique or modus operandi for the journalist. Some will find this confusing, but I am not free to act on my own views under the doctrine of stare decisis which I consider binding upon me.

8. Is it really inconsistent, however, to permit the use of information as evidence (which presumably would be inadmissible in a criminal prosecution) for "profit by the press" in view of the fact that such information as used by the press is also quite damaging to the party against whom it is used? Does Judge Tamm take too great a legal leap when he styles the news media as "quasi-public institutions"? On the other hand, Judge Wright in the majority opinion appeared to take an even greater leap when he suggested that the requirements of the Fourth Amendment should extend to private as well as to governmental conduct: "Just as the Fourth Amendment has expanded to protect citizens from government intrusions where the intrusion is not reasonably expected, so should tort law protect citizens from other citizens."

The Fourth Amendment requires that,

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

But how helpful and how basic are Fourth Amendment references in a case permeated with First Amendment considerations? In the light of this conflict between competing constitutional values, reflect on which appears to be the approach which identifies most clearly the fundamental issues involved? Is it the approach of Judge Wright for the majority in the court of appeals or the approach suggested by the editors of the Georgetown Law Journal? Why? See Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, 436 U.S. 547 (1978), this text, p. 428. Press objections to unannounced police searches may be weakened when one considers that the public's interest in gaining access to all available evidence of crime, wherever it is to be found, may be equal to the public's interest in knowing about corruption in government. If the press rejects this proposition, is it applying a double standard? Which is more to be feared and which does the Constitution more clearly proscribe: intrusion by the press or intrusion by government?

9. The issue of conversion was raised in another case involving Drew Pearson after he had obtained copies of personal letters from the plaintiff's files. Here the court preferred to ground its ruling on the firmer base of prior restraint. Writing for the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, then Circuit Court Judge Warren Burger said:

Upon a proper showing the wide sweep of the First Amendment might conceivably yield to an invasion of privacy and deprivation of rights of property in private manuscripts. But that is not this case; here there is no clear showing as to ownership of the alleged private papers or of an unlawful taking and no showing that Appellees had any part in the removal of these papers or copies from the offices of Appellants or any act other than receiving them from a person with a colorable claim to possession. Liberty Lobby, Inc. v. Pearson, 390 F.2d 489 (D.C.Cir.1968).

Of no advantage to plaintiffs was the fact they were engaged in political lobbying of a highly controversial nature, rendering their affairs a matter of public interest.

What is important about the Pearson cases is that they do not preclude the application of conversion theory to First Amendment questions.

10. The second major case involving stolen property arose in California when a reporter for the Los Angeles Free Press received and paid for a list of names (with addresses and telephone numbers) of undercover narcotics agents from a young man identifying himself as an employee of the California Attorney General's office.

Two months later in August 1969, to the horror of state officials, the complete list was published under headlines such as "Know Your Local Narc." Publisher Arthur Kunkin and the reporter who had bought the list were indicted by a Los Angeles grand jury on a charge of violating the California Penal Code which places criminal liability on "Every person who buys or receives any property that has been stolen or which has been obtained in any manner constituting theft or extortion, knowing the property to be so stolen or obtained, or who conceals, withholds or aids in concealing or withholding any such property from the owner. * * * Unlike conversion, which Prosser has called the "forgotten tort," receiving stolen property is an active concept in American law.

Convicted in a jury trial, the two newspapermen were fined and placed on probation. The California Court of Appeals affirmed the convictions in a detailed March 1972 ruling. People v. Kunkin, 100 Cal.Rptr. 845 (1972). Citing the United States Supreme Court in Zemel v. Rusk, 381 U.S. 1 (1965), a freedom of travel case, Associate Justice Fleming noted for the California court that "the right to speak and publish does not carry with it the unrestrained right to gather information." Moreover, he was not willing to condone what he called a "Constitutional thieves market"; and he distinguished Dodd which, he emphasized, had not held that documents were not property.

"We think a restriction on traffic in stolen documents," said Justice Fleming, "is a valid restriction, even though it may have some impact on news gathering. We think a state is constitutionally warranted in adopting laws against receipt of stolen documents and uniformly enforcing those laws against all persons, including newsmen and publishers, who knowingly receive stolen documents."

The case strengthens the idea of a property right restriction on freedom of the press and reinforces Chief Justice Burger's belief, expressed in his Pentagon Papers dissent, that the press has an obligation to report the theft of government papers to the proper authorities, once having verified their origin. The press thus becomes handmaiden to police. Does such an alliance offend the public interest?

"The press as a watchdog on government," says Professor Everette Dennis, "has always depended on disgruntled public officials for leaks and internal memoranda. Such sources of information have often led to the exposure of government corruption and wrongdoing. A mandatory legal verification of all information would quickly close information sources." Dennis, The Case of the Purloined Papers, Rights (June/July 1973), p. 11. Purloined Information as Property: A New First Amendment Challenge, 50 Journalism Quarterly 456 (Autumn 1973).

In the Kunkin case the Supreme Court of California came to the rescue on a technicality. Since the newspaper's informant had not indicated that he was no longer employed by the Attorney General, had insisted that the roster of agents be returned, and had asked to remain anonymous in order to avoid trouble, there was no substantial evidence, said the court, from which the jury could reasonably have inferred that the list was stolen and that the newspapermen therefore had a guilty knowledge. The more substantive question of whether the newspaper has a constitutional right to publish information reaching it through diverse and unorthodox channels was never reached. People v. Kunkin, 107 Cal.Rptr. 184 (1973).

11. Just as a reasonable qualification to a reporter's privilege to protect his sources would be his actual involvement in a crime either as a participant or an observer and thereby an accessory before the fact, a reasonable qualification to permitting the publication of purloined papers might be whether the reporter himself had broken in and rifled personal files. This distinguishes between intrusion and publication and in doing so honors both freedom of press and the right of privacy. The distinction is implied in Pearson v. Dodd, and it appears to be the theory of Dietemann v. Time, Inc., 449 F.2d 245 (9th Cir. 1971) in which the court would not countenance a physical invasion of privacy by a news reporter whether it be by breaking and entering, theft of personal or professional documents, or surreptitious photography or recording. Intrusion may be the one form of invasion of privacy which the press in the future may clearly not engage in with any sense of constitutional security.

Pearson v. Dodd has generally been followed. There was no intrusion, said a Maryland appeals court, when newspaper reporters received the academic files of University of Maryland basketball players from an unnamed source. The press itself had not sought out, inspected, or solicited the files.<sup>61</sup>

12. Implicit in Pearson v. Dodd is the defense of newsworthiness or public interest. It remains a prodigious defense. In spite of the fact that Wayne Williams's parents were practically prisoners in their own home and reporters themselves found the stakeout "gross" and "repellent," close coverage of the murder suspect was not enough to support a privacy claim.<sup>62</sup> Williams was convicted of the murders of two of twenty-eight young blacks slain in Atlanta.

On the other side of the law, a policeman had no privacy claim after being filmed by a television camera through a two-way mirror while investigating a massage parlor. Imagine the policeman's consternation when a door opened and someone suddenly cried, "Channel 7 News" and the camera crew exited filming the scene before them. After making suggestive remarks and physical advances to a "lingerie" model and after she had responded with "sufficient physical contact," the officer arrested her for solicitation.<sup>63</sup> His being a public official served to distinguish this case from Dietemann and his homemade gadgetry.

Less dramatic forms of news gathering, especially those involving mundane events, are normally protected by their newsworthiness. A District of Columbia district court rejected a claim against the Washington Post for reporting that an undercover police officer had participated in a narcotics therapy program. But it did permit an embarrassing private facts action against another federal officer who had made the information about his colleague-patient available in violation of federal law and the confidentiality of the doctor-patient relationship.<sup>64</sup>

A federal district court dismissed a privacy claim brought by undercover narcotic agents who had been photographed entering a courthouse, but permitted an award of damages for "emotional distress" brought about by their being identified. That award was reversed by the Sixth Circuit which found the publication insufficiently outrageous—"so extreme in degree as to go beyond all possible bounds of decency, and to be regarded as atrocious, and utterly intolerable in a civilized community."<sup>65</sup>

Finally a Washington state appeals court held that filming the interior of a pharmacy from a location open to the public, even though private property, was not actionable. The story was about medic-aid fraud.<sup>66</sup>

It has been suggested that in a Dietemann case, or in any other situation where there is criminal activity going on, the press should not be liable for intrusion. Public interest would override physical intrusion. But should the press—except in exceptional circumstances—be given immunity for tortious conduct based on its own conclusions as to guilt or innocence prior to any formal charge? The question is a difficult one. Doesn't the press again assume the role of police or the courts when it argues for such immunity? And government, it should be recalled, is specifically bound by constitutional limitations.

Given the rule that intimate details of the private lives of public figures—whether criminal or not—must bear public scrutiny, the question becomes: what limitations, if any, should be placed on the methods used by reporters to gain access to those details? Do the ends always justify the means? In both the ethical and legal sense the tentative answer must be no! But there will always be cases when an intrusive, irritating, and cantankerous press will be society's last and best defense. And where criminality and official corruption are suspected, intrusion may be worth the risks to both ethical and legal standards. Generally, however, reporters would do well to avoid those techniques of surveillance and information gathering (taping, bugging, peeking, and recording) for which their newspapers have criticized government agencies.

Exceeding Consent by Recording Telephone Conversations

1. Is a reporter liable to wiretap charges when he or she records telephone conversations with sources without their consent? More and more states—there were thirteen at this writing<sup>67</sup>—bar consensual (one-party-consent) recording either of a person or of telephone conversations. Illinois was the first state to do so, but only in Florida has such a law been upheld against a press challenge. There a reporter's tape recording of a caller who was unaware that the conversation was being recorded constituted an illegal wire intercept under Florida's Security of Communication Act, even though the reporter was using the recording only to help her write a news story.<sup>68</sup> The constitutionality of Florida's law requiring that all parties to an interception give prior consent was affirmed by the Florida Supreme Court in Shevin v. Sunbeam Television, 351 So.2d 723 (Fla.1977). The United States Supreme Court declined review. A number of state courts, however, have construed their statutes so as to permit one-party participant recording of telephone conversations.<sup>69</sup>

Journalists have not appreciated finding themselves at the other end of the tape recorder. In 1978 a D.C. Circuit Court panel held that the First Amendment was not violated by law enforcement officials' good faith inspection of the toll-call records of reporters released by the telephone company without prior notice. Any First Amendment news-gathering right, said the court, is subject to those general and incidental burdens that arise from good faith

66. Mark v. KING Broadcasting, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2224, 618 P.2d 512 (Wash.1980).

68. News-Press v. Florida, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1240, 345 So.2d 865 (Fla.1977). The Florida statute is Fla.Stat. Ann. § 943.03 (Supp.1978).

Federal court decisions have interpreted § 2510 of Title III of the Omnibus Crime Control Act of 1968 to mean that if one party to a conversation records it, there is no illegal intercept. United States v. Turk, 526 F.2d 654 (5th Cir. 1976).

2. The FCC, in its supervisory capacity over broadcasting, prohibits the monitoring and divulging of nonpublic radio broadcasts such as police radios, a hallmark of most newsrooms, but it has not enforced the rule. It has admonished broadcasters to respect the rule and has pointed out the danger of attracting crowds to scenes of crime and disaster.<sup>70</sup>

The FCC also prohibits the private use of radio devices to monitor conversations without the consent of all parties (13 Fed. Reg. 3397, 1966);<sup>71</sup> and it requires broadcasters to give advance warning if a recorded telephone conversation is intended for broadcast.<sup>72</sup> This has superseded the earlier "beep-tone" requirement.

Unannounced recording for broadcast purposes is not permitted, but the federal agency has made notable exceptions for reporters investigating crime.

3. Wiretapping and bugging by the media is illegal. Eavesdropping or recording conversations that are within hearing distance in public or quasi-public places is legal for both print and broadcast reporters. A Kentucky court had an opportunity in 1980 to address this question. An indicted drug dealer had given two reporters the impression that a lawyer had agreed to "fix" her case for $10,000. The reporters agreed to provide money to the suspect, if necessary, and asked her to meet with the lawyer in his office and record their conversation with a concealed recording device. When the slightly suspicious lawyer asked her if she was recording, she denied it, and a conversation ensued in which it was clear that the lawyer was not breaking the law or clearly violating his professional code. Nevertheless, part of the recorded conversation was published by the newspaper, and the attorney brought suit. His privacy claims of intrusion by trespass and false light were rejected by the court, as were libel claims. The intrusion portions of the ruling follow.

MCCALL v. COURIER-JOURNAL

6 MED.L.RPTR. 1112 (KY.CT. OF APP.1980).

HOWERTON, Judge. McCall appeals from a summary judgment of the Jefferson Circuit Court dismissing his complaint for damages due to two allegedly libelous newspaper articles appearing in The Louisville Times, written by reporters, Krantz and Van Howe. McCall presents two allegations of error; (1) that genuine issues of material fact are yet to be resolved, and (2) that the trial court misconstrued and misapplied the law. Four theories of liability were presented to the trial court, but McCall now relies on only two of these theories, invasion of privacy—intrusion/trespass, and libel.

McCall is an attorney. He counseled with Kristie Frazier concerning two criminal charges. Frazier began spreading insinuations that she could buy her way out of her trouble. The appellees, Krantz and

Van Howe, reporters for The Louisville Times, met with Frazier. In Frazier's words, McCall told her that "for $10,000.00 he would guarantee me that I'd walk in, but I would turn around and walk back out with him."

Krantz and Van Howe decided to investigate the possibility of bribery in the judiciary and met with Frazier again. They furnished her with a tape recorder and asked her to return to McCall's office. They also instructed her as to what questions to ask. They agreed to provide the $10,000.00 for her, if the dismissal of the criminal charges could be fixed.

On March 10, 1976, Frazier returned to McCall's office with the recorder. She asked the prearranged questions. The attorney told her there would be no "fix" and then inquired as to whether she had a recording device on her person. After Frazier's denial, McCall then stated that if he was able to keep Frazier out of jail, his fee would be $10,000.00, but if not, $9,000.00 would be returned to her. Although McCall's conduct was questionable in relation to the professional code, there was no evidence of bribery in the judicial system. Nevertheless, on March 17, 1976, The Louisville Times published and circulated a news article based on these events. On August 19, 1976, the newspaper carried an account of the lawsuit which resulted.

McCall argues that there are disputes regarding several material facts. As to his first meeting with Frazier, he denies her allegations and further contends that the recording of the second meeting confirms this denial. He argues that the articles were unfair since they failed to mention points in the taped conversation favorable to his character and demeanor. It is also argued that the reporters were not justified in suspecting bribery after hearing Frazier's version of the first meeting and that they most certainly should have had doubts as to her credibility. McCall states that Frazier did not return to his office to legitimately discuss employment or her case. In addition, he outlines his own version of what occurred at the taped meeting since he disputes the accuracy of the transcription. Even if we consider all of these facts in a manner most favorable to McCall, this Court must affirm the summary judgment as a matter of law.

The first tort theory argued is labeled by McCall as invasion of privacy—intrusion/trespass. The appellees claim the nonexistence of this tort, stating that McCall created a hybrid cause of action. Prosser labels the tort "intrusion," which consists of "intrusion upon the plaintiff's physical solitude or seclusion, as by invading his home or other quarters * * *," W. Prosser, Torts § 117, at 807 (4th ed. 1971). Prosser extends the tort to include eavesdropping upon private conversations through wiretaps or microphones. Necessary elements of the tort include an intrusion in the nature of prying which is offensive or objectionable to a reasonable man. Also, the thing into which there is an intrusion must be private. Id. at 808.

In this case, nothing was learned about McCall which was private or personal. The conversation dealt with Frazier and her legal problems and with how McCall proposed to resolve them. McCall spoke to her at his own risk, and Frazier was free to reveal the conversation to anyone. It is well settled that the attorney-client privilege "is not personal to the attorney but for the protection of the client." Carter v. West, * * *, 19 S.W. 592, 593 (1892). Accord, Prichard v. United States, 181 F.2d 326 (6th Cir. 1950), affirmed 339 U.S. 975.

As to the allegation of trespass, we must conclude that neither the conduct of Frazier nor that of the newspaper or its reporters was sufficient under this theory. 75 Am.Jur.2d, Trespass, § 14, states:

The fact that a professional man, merchant, or other person opens an office to transact business with and for the public is a tacit invitation to all persons having business with him, and a permission for such persons to enter, unless forbidden. Nevertheless, a person has the right, in his private business, to control it, and may select such persons as he chooses with whom to transact such business. He can prevent whom he pleases from entering his office; and when a person under an implied license has entered, he has the right to request such person to depart, and the latter thereafter has no legal right to remain. Id. at 18.

Thus, Frazier cannot be considered a trespasser. When McCall suspected a recorder on her person, he should have asked her to depart. By continuing the conversation, McCall consented to her presence and continued to discuss legal services for a fee. McCall argued that even if Frazier is considered an invitee, the newspaper and its reporters are trespassers. Any person who causes another to trespass is also liable therefor. 75 Am.Jur.2d, Trespass, § 32, at 31. However, since Frazier was not a trespasser, this argument must fail.

The appellees justify their means of investigation by stating that the tape recording was the only way to verify or dispell Ms. Frazier's allegations. Certainly, the public has a right to know if illegality exists in the judicial system. We at least applaud the effort to investigate. However, once it was determined that there was no foundation for the alleged bribery, it appears totally unnecessary for the newspaper to have published the initial article, which cast McCall in a bad, although not false, light. If the appellees sincerely believed a breach of legal ethics or professional conduct had occurred, various remedies were available rather than a public spanking by newspaper.

Undoubtedly, Mr. McCall's professional reputation has been damaged, but the judgment of the Jefferson Circuit must be affirmed.

All concur.

COMMENT

It is important to note that the lower court in McCall distinguished Dietemann on grounds that no fraud or deception was involved in gaining access to the lawyer's office. As a client, the indicted drug dealer suspect was neither a trespasser nor an intruder. How about the reporters? But were the reporters in Dietemann also clients who, at least by implication, had been invited into the "healer's" laboratory? Dietemann may be an unusual case, but it does establish one-party (consensual) recording or filming in news gathering as the basis for a tort.

A year later the Kentucky Supreme Court reinstated the lawyer's libel and false light invasion of privacy suits while, at the same time, declining to discuss the intrusion claim. The court seemed to be saying that publication wrongs, i.e., libel and false light privacy violations, were more deserving of a jury's attention than the news-gathering wrong of intrusion. McCall v. Courier-Journal, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2118, 623 S.W.2d 882 (Ky.1981).

The two parties later reached a settlement and McCall brought a libel suit against the newspaper for its report of the settlement. That suit was dismissed by a circuit court and McCall appealed again seven years after the original publication.

Legislators and judges generally bar tape recorders and other electronic news-gathering devices from their chambers, although, as shall be noted, television cameras and radio microphones are increasingly being admitted to courtrooms.

"APPROPRIATION" AND THE DEFENSE OF CONSENT

1. Appropriation of a name or a picture for commercial purposes without written consent is an offense committed more frequently by advertising and promotion personnel than by news reporters or news photographers.

In denying summary judgment to a pharmaceutical firm which had used a forty-year-old photo of actress Pola Negri (The Vamp) in a drug ad without her consent, a federal district court held that, although her appearance had changed since 1922, the New York statute was designed to protect "any living person" against the unauthorized use of his or her name or picture for commercial exploitation.

The picture, which appeared in ads in seven medical journals, depicted the actress in a traumatic pose. Friends, fans, and her physician recognized her. Negri claimed severe emotional and mental distress and humiliation, unjust appropriation of her rights of publicity, and defendant's enrichment at her expense. The court was sympathetic and said that the drug company was liable for any injuries the jury might decide she had suffered. Negri v. Schering Corp., 333 F.Supp. 101 (D.N.Y. 1971).

The first right of publicity case, Haelan Laboratories, Inc. v. Topps Chewing Gum, Inc., 202 F.2d 866 (2d Cir. 1953), cert. den. 346 U.S. 816, involved bubble gum and baseball cards. Federal courts have since recognized a common law as well as a statutory right of publicity in New York.

Had written consent been given for the specific use to which the Negri photo was put, no suit could have ensued. Written consent may be required in states with privacy statutes and is preferable to any kind of oral or implied consent in all jurisdictions.<sup>73</sup>

Many news organizations have standard release forms that may be applicable to any category of privacy. They are particularly important where private persons are the subject of news or promotional activities. Where minors or incompetents are involved, their guardians should be asked to sign the release. A signed release constitutes consent, if it truthfully reflects how a fact or a photograph is going to be used.

Major alterations in a photo or its use in a manner not agreed to, of course, would violate an agreement. And since circumstances may alter the disposition of consent, renewed consent should be sought if a picture or a name is to be used for trade purposes after a long period of time has elapsed.

How far beyond the terms of consent a user may go before nullifying consent and whether such misuse is a breach of contract or a tort of appropriation was discussed in Shields v. Gross, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2349 (Sup.Ct.N.Y.1981), reversed 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1928, 451 N.Y.S.2d 419 (1982).

The first rule is to get permission from celebrities past or present—and from the representatives of deceased celebrities—before using their "personae" in advertising or for any other purely commercial purpose.

But of what benefit to a plaintiff is a claim of nonconsent where the invasion of privacy occurs in the realm of the newsworthy? Newsworthiness may depreciate all categories of privacy. Should it make a difference if the plaintiff is a voluntary news figure? An involuntary news figure? Is the public person/private person distinction of Gertz too refined for a defense as broad and formless as newsworthiness? Does it matter if the alleged invasion of privacy casts the plaintiff in an enviable rather than detractive light? Is identification of a person always necessary to convey legitimate news values? Case law has just begun to answer these questions. Although it applies best in cases of misappropriation, consent is clearly a defense in embarrassing private facts and intrusion cases as well.

2. Newsworthiness occupies even firmer ground when a publication involves parody, satire, educational, or informative material or biography in books, plays, motion pictures, newspapers, and magazines.<sup>74</sup> Even though all media ultimately depend on a market, their primary purpose may be something other than a purely commercial return. Politics, for example. Use of the photo of a murder suspect in a gubernatorial candidate's campaign commercial was held not to be "for trade purposes" under New York's statute. The First Amendment privilege of political discussion outweighed individual injury.<sup>75</sup>

A shoe-on-the-other-foot situation occurred when a WCBS reporter, who had done a story on home insulation, found herself being used to promote a particular product. She brought a $4.5 million damage suit and asked for an injunction against the unauthorized use of the original news film.

"To be effective," said a New York appellate court in permitting the suit to continue, "a news reporter must maintain an image of absolute integrity and impartiality. The commercial exploitation of an impartial report by the use of a video tape or other reproduction of the name or picture of such reporter, for advertising or trade purposes, will not only tarnish the reporter's reputation for objectivity, but will have a chilling effect on reporters now involved in a field of expanding concern—consumer protection." Reilly v. Rapperswill Corp., 377 N.Y.S.2d 488 (1975).

Isolated references to television news reporters in the book The Amityville Hor- ror did not support their invasion-of-privacy claims under New York's law since reports of psychic phenomena were matters of public interest.<sup>76</sup> Following allegations of fraud, they also became matters of public debate.

Joe Namath failed in a suit against Sports Illustrated when the magazine used a Super Bowl picture of the football hero it had published in 1969 to promote its subscriptions in other publications. The New York statute permits incidental use of once newsworthy photographs for trade purposes but not their direct or collateral use. The distinction is sometimes a fine one. But then newsworthiness is a broad and compassing defense. Namath v. Sports Illustrated, 371 N.Y.S.2d 10 (1975), affirmed 386 N.Y.S.2d 397, 352 N.E.2d 584 (1976).

Nor were the book and movie Dog Day Afternoon an invasion of the privacy of the unidentified wife and children of the actual bank robber in that real life story. Their pictures were not used in promoting the film and the plaintiffs had chosen to identify themselves. Wojtowicz v. Delacorte Press, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1992, 395 N.Y.S.2d 205 (1977).

Actress Shirley Booth was denied damages for Holiday magazine's incidental use of her photo, taken on a public beach, for its cover, Booth v. Curtis Publishing Co., 223 N.Y.S.2d 737 (1961); and for an imitation of her voice in a television commercial depicting the copyrighted cartoon character "Hazel," portrayed on TV by Booth. Booth v. Colgate-Palmolive Co., 362 F.Supp. 343 (D.N.Y.1973).

74. Garner v. Triangle Publications Co., 97 F.Supp. 546 (D.N.Y.1951); Dallesandro v. Henry Holt & Co., 166 N.Y.S.2d 805 (1957); Murray v. New York Magazine, 318 N.Y.S.2d 474 (1971). In Estate of Presley v. Russen, 513 F.Supp. 1339 (D.N.J.1981), "The Big El Show," a theatrical imitation of Presley's work and style, was found "predominantly to commercially exploit the likeness" of Presley without containing any parody, burlesque, satire, or criticism of the singer. Since informational content was limited, the court found valid a right-of-publicity infringement claim.

76. Bauman v. Anson, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1487 (Sup.Ct.N.Y.1980).

But a race car driver was permitted to pursue his case for damages against a tobacco company which had used an obscured but identifiable photograph of his famous car in an advertisement. Clearly, this is an example of collateral use of a photograph for advertising purposes. Motschenbacher v. R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., 498 F.2d 821 (9th Cir. 1974).

The intricate connections between the defenses of consent and newsworthiness and an invasion of privacy by appropriation of one's name or picture for commercial purposes were illustrated in what has come to be known as the "human cannonball" case. It was the first case in the misappropriation category to have reached the United States Supreme Court.

Entertainer Hugo Zacchini's act was to shoot himself from a cannon into a net 200 feet away. By all reports it was a dramatic act lasting about fifteen seconds. While performing at an Ohio county fair, Zacchini was approached by a free-lance reporter for a television station who appeared to be going to film the act. Zacchini asked him not to. A day later, on his employer's instructions, the reporter returned, filmed the entire act, and a segment was shown on an evening news program.

Zacchini sued for $25,000 in damages, contending that WEWS-TV, Cleveland, had without consent appropriated his professional property. A trial court granted summary judgment to the television station. An appeals court reversed. Although it recognized Zacchini's "right to the publicity value of his performance," the Supreme Court of Ohio in turn reversed the intermediate court on the grounds of "legitimate public interest." In a fourth judicial step, the United States Supreme Court reversed the Supreme Court of Ohio. Zacchini had won his case. The Court held that, although Ohio might choose under its own law to extend a privilege to the media in a case presenting the facts of Zacchini, Ohio was not obliged to afford the media such a privilege on the basis of the First Amendment.

ZACCHINI v. SCRIPPS-HOWARD

433 U.S. 562, 97 S.Ct. 2849, 53 L.Ed.2d 965 (1977).

Justice WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * *

The Ohio Supreme Court held that respondent is constitutionally privileged to include in its newscasts matters of public interest that would otherwise be protected by the right of publicity, absent an intent to injure or to appropriate for some non-privileged purpose. If under this standard respondent had merely reported that petitioner was performing at the fair and described or commented on his act, with or without showing his picture on television, we would have a very different case. But petitioner is not contending that his appearance at the fair and his performance could not be reported by the press as newsworthy items. His complaint is that respondent filmed his entire act and displayed that film on television for the public to see and enjoy. This, he claimed, was an appropriation of his professional property. The Ohio Supreme Court agreed that petitioner had "a right of publicity" that gave him "personal control over the commercial display and exploitation of his personality and the exercise of his talents." This right of "exclusive control over the publicity given to his performance" was said to be such a "valuable part of the benefit which may be attained by his talents and efforts" that it was entitled to legal protection. It was also observed, or at least expressly assumed, that petitioner had not abandoned his rights by performing under the circumstances present at the Geauga County Fair Grounds.

The Ohio Supreme Court nevertheless held that the challenged invasion was privileged, saying that the press "must be accorded broad latitude in its choice of how much it presents of each story or incident, and of the emphasis to be given to such presentation. No fixed standard which would bar the press from reporting or depicting either an entire occurrence or an entire discrete part of a public performance can be formulated which would not unduly restrict the 'breathing room' in reporting which freedom of the press requires." 351 N.E.2d 454 (1976). Under this view, respondent was thus constitutionally free to film and display petitioner's entire act.

The Ohio Supreme Court relied heavily on Time, Inc. v. Hill, but that case does not mandate a media privilege to televise a performer's entire act without his consent. * * *

Time, Inc. v. Hill, which was hotly contested and decided by a divided court, involved an entirely different tort than the "right of publicity" recognized by the Ohio Supreme Court. * * * It is also abundantly clear that Time, Inc. v. Hill did not involve a performer, a person with a name having commercial value, or any claim to a "right of publicity." This discrete kind of "appropriation" case was plainly identified in the literature cited by the Court and had been adjudicated in the reported cases.

The differences between these two torts are important. First, the State's interests in providing a cause of action in each instance are different. "The interest protected" in permitting recovery for placing the plaintiff in a false light "is clearly that of reputation, with the same overtones of mental distress as in defamation." Prosser, 48 Calif.L.Rev., at 400. By contrast, the State's interest in permitting a "right of publicity" is in protecting the proprietary interest of the individual in his act in part to encourage such entertainment. As we later note, the State's interest is closely analogous to the goals of patent and copyright law, focusing on the right of the individual to reap the reward of his endeavors and having little to do with protecting feelings or reputation. Second, the two torts differ in the degree to which they intrude on dissemination of information to the public. In "false light" cases the only way to protect the interests involved is to attempt to minimize publication of the damaging matter, while in "right of publicity" cases the only question is who gets to do the publishing. An entertainer such as petitioner usually has no objection to the widespread publication of his act as long as he gets the commercial benefit of such publication. Indeed, in the present case petitioner did not seek to enjoin the broadcast of his act; he simply sought compensation for the broadcast in the form of damages.

Nor does it appear that our later cases, such as Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, Inc.; Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc.; and Time, Inc. v. Firestone, require or furnish substantial support for the Ohio court's privilege ruling. These cases, like New York Times, emphasize the protection extended to the press by the First Amendment in defamation cases, particularly when suit is brought by a public official or a public figure. None of them involve an alleged appropriation by the press of a right of publicity existing under state law.

Moreover, Time, Inc. v. Hill, New York Times, Metromedia, Gertz, and Firestone all involved the reporting of events; in none of them was there an attempt to broadcast or publish an entire act for which the performer ordinarily gets paid. It is evident, and there is no claim here to the contrary, that petitioner's state-law right of publicity would not serve to prevent respondent from reporting the newsworthy facts about petitioner's act. Whenever the line in particular situations is to be drawn between media reports that are protected and those that are not, we are quite sure that the First and Fourteenth Amendments do not immunize the media when they broadcast a performer's entire act without his consent. The Constitution no more prevents a State from requiring respondent to compensate petitioner for broadcasting his act on television than it would privilege respondent to film and broadcast a copyrighted dramatic work without liability to the copyright owner. Copyrights Act, Pub.L.No.94-553, 90 Stat. 2541 (1976); or to film and broadcast a prize fight or a baseball game, where the promoters or the participants had other plans for publicizing the event. There are ample reasons for reaching this conclusion.

The broadcast of a film of petitioner's entire act poses a substantial threat to the economic value of that performance. As the Ohio court recognized, this act is the product of petitioner's own talents and energy, the end result of much time, effort and expense. Much of its economic value lies in the "right of exclusive control over the publicity given to his performance"; if the public can see the act for free on television, they will be less willing to pay to see it at the fair. The effect of a public broadcast of the performance is similar to preventing petitioner from charging an admission fee.

"The rationale for [protecting the right of publicity] is the straight-forward one of preventing unjust enrichment by the theft of good will. No social purpose is served by having the defendant get for free some aspect of the plaintiff that would have market value and for which he would normally pay." Kalven, Privacy in Tort Law—Were Warren and Brandeis Wrong?, 31 Law and Contemporary Problems 326, 331 (1966). Moreover, the broadcast of petitioner's entire performance, unlike the unauthorized use of another's name for purposes of trade or the incidental use of a name or picture by the press, goes to the heart of petitioner's ability to earn a living as an entertainer. Thus in this case, Ohio has recognized what may be the strongest case for a "right of publicity"—involving not the appropriation of an entertainer's reputation to enhance the attractiveness of a commercial product, but the appropriation of the very activity by which the entertainer acquired his reputation in the first place.

Of course, Ohio's decision to protect petitioner's right of publicity here rests on more than a desire to compensate the performer for the time and effort invested in his act; the protection provides an economic incentive for him to make the investment required to produce a performance of interest to the public. This same consideration underlies the patent and copyright laws long enforced by this Court. As the Court stated in Mazer v. Stein, 347 U.S. 201, 219 (1954),

"The economic philosophy behind the clause empowering Congress to grant patents and copyrights is the conviction that encouragement of individual effort by personal gain is the best way to advance public welfare through the talents of authors and inventors in 'Science and useful Arts.' Sacrificial days devoted to such creative activities deserve rewards commensurate with the services rendered."

These laws perhaps regard the "reward to the owner [as] a secondary consideration," United States v. Paramount Pictures, 334 U.S. 131, 158 (1948), but they were "intended definitely to grant valuable, enforceable rights" in order to afford greater encouragement to the production of works of benefit to the public. Washingtonian Publishing Co. v. Pearson, 306 U.S. 30, 36 (1939). The Constitution does not prevent Ohio from making a similar choice here in deciding to protect the entertainer's incentive in order to encourage the production of this type of work.

There is no doubt that entertainment, as well as news, enjoys First Amendment protection. It is also true that entertainment itself can be important news. Time, Inc. v. Hill. But it is important to note that neither the public nor respondent will be deprived of the benefit of petitioner's performance as long as his commercial stake in his act is appropriately recognized. Petitioner does not seek to enjoin the broadcast of his performance; he simply wants to be paid for it. Nor do we think that a state-law damages remedy against respondent would represent a species of liability without fault contrary to the letter or spirit of Gertz. Respondent knew exactly that petitioner objected to televising his act, but nevertheless displayed the entire film.

We conclude that although the State of Ohio may as a matter of its own law privilege the press in the circumstances of this case, the First and Fourteenth Amendments do not require it to do so.

COMMENT

1. The Court's opinion is troublesome on a number of counts. Did the news program in fact present all of Zacchini's act? It is unlikely that the suspense-building fanfare usually associated with this kind of performance could have been included in the complained about fifteen seconds. So how is the press to be sure in the future whether it is filming all or part of a public performance?

And Zacchini's act was very public. He performed out in the open, and no additional admission charge to see him was levied on fair goers.

Justice Powell, joined by Brennan and Marshall, not infrequently White's antagonists in libel and privacy cases, raised these questions and others in a brief but persuasive dissent. On the question of commercial profit to the broadcaster, Powell wrote:

* * * I do not view respondent's action as comparable to unauthorized commercial broadcasts of sporting events, theatrical performances, and the like where the broadcaster keeps the profits. There is no suggestion here that respondent made any such use of the film. Instead, it simply reported on what petitioner concedes to be a newsworthy event, in a way hardly surprising for a television station—by means of film coverage. * * * It is a routine example of the press fulfilling the informing function so vital to our system.

With regard to the "appropriation" category of invasion, the commercial purpose of the television station is the key consideration. Could the cannonball film have made any difference to the news program's normal advertising revenue? Might not the fifteen-second film be considered "free" advertising for Zacchini? Is it necessarily true, as the Court states, that once having seen the act free on television, the public would be less willing to pay to see it at the fair? Certainly general admission to the fair promised the public much more than the "human cannonball" show.

Faulting White's mode of analysis, Powell returned to what was essentially the position of the Supreme Court of Ohio:

When a film is used, as here, for a routine portion of a regular news program, I would hold that the First Amendment protects the station from a "right of publicity" or "appropriation" suit, absent a strong showing by the plaintiff that the news broadcast was a subterfuge or cover for private or commercial exploitation.

Justice White pointed out that the television station ignored Zacchini's objection to having his act filmed. Did the withdrawal of consent, followed by WEWS-TV's total disregard of Zacchini's wishes, influence the Court?

Note also how the Court's opinion connects "appropriation" with violations of patent and copyright. Could this simply have been a breach of contract case between Zacchini and the park owners?

The unusual facts of Zacchini and the narrow grounds upon which it was decided limit its usefulness. Like Cox and Cantrell it leaves many interesting privacy questions unanswered. But it does appear that in Zacchini the Court found a chink in the armor of newsworthiness.

2. Consent may either be implicit or explicit. Actress Ann-Margret claimed privacy violation under the New York statute and a common law right of publicity when a magazine published a partially nude photo taken from one of her movies. Both claims were rejected because she was a public figure and the photo had come from a film already seen by millions.<sup>77</sup>

Without authorization, the New York Times published another plaintiff's photo on the cover of its Sunday Magazine to illustrate an article about upward mobility in the black middle class. Under the New York statute there was no remedy for the subject of the photo. It was just as well that no false light invasion was asserted because the New York Court of Appeals questioned the very existence of that tort in New York. But plaintiff's allegations that a free-lance photographer and an agency took the pictures without consent and then sold them to the newspaper, again without consent and without knowing that they would be used in a newsworthy context, at least withstood defendant's motion to dismiss. Arrington v. New York Times, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2354, 433 N.Y. S.2d 164 (N.Y.1980). An amendment to Section 51 would later protect freelance photographers and agencies in the sale and transfer of photographs.

Betty Friedan's husband claimed invasion-of-privacy damages for a twenty-five-year-old family portrait used in articles and advertisements. A New York federal court said that public interest in a leader of the feminist movement overcame the claimed privacy interests. Furthermore, the primary purpose of publication was not commercial, nor was the publication fiction. No consent, therefore, was required. Friedan v. Friedan, 414 F.Supp. 77 (D.N.Y.1976).

Summary judgment was denied Newsweek magazine in a privacy suit brought by a man whose photograph had been taken to illustrate what he was told would be a "patriotic article." To his dismay he became part of an October 6, 1969 cover story, "The Troubled American—A Special Report on the White Majority," in which he was represented as a typical "troubled American"—"angry, uncultured, crude, violence prone, hostile to both rich and poor, and racially prejudiced." Only his address was used, and none of these characterizations was attributed directly to him. But a federal district court felt that his friends and neighbors would have no trouble identifying him standing in his front yard by his American flag and that they would presume him to fit the stereotype.

There could be no libel action, said the court, since it is not libelous to call a person a "bigot" or other appropriate names descriptive of political, religious, economic, or sociological philosophies under Pennsylvania law. Anyway such charges might fit half the population. There was a privacy issue, however. It would turn on whether the defendant could show that the plaintiff had consented, and in what sense he had consented, to having his picture taken. And that would be a question for a jury. Raible v. Newsweek, Inc., 341 F.Supp. 804 (D.Pa. 1972).

Massachusetts was able to get an injunction to block general distribution of Frederick Wiseman's critically acclaimed film, Titicut Follies, because, contrary to an agreement between Wiseman and state authorities, persons identified in the film had not signed releases giving their consent or else were not competent to do so.

Finding that identifiable inmates of an institution for the criminally insane had been depicted naked or exhibiting the painful aspects of mental disease, a trial judge ruled the film an unwarranted intrusion into the right to privacy of each inmate beyond any legitimate public concern. Any releases that may have been obtained would be a nullity, said the judge, and the State had the responsibility to protect persons in its custody from exploitation.

Again the categories of privacy overlap. And in spite of the fact that Massachusetts did not then recognize a legally protected right of privacy, the state's Supreme Judicial Court upheld the trial court on privacy grounds.

Even though the film was originally intended to arouse public interest toward improving mental health facilities, the court would not countenance Wiseman's abuse of the conditional permission granted him and the closeup depiction of individual inmates in degrading situations. The court did, however, permit distribution of the film to specialized audiences, and it eventually made the "film society" circuit around the country. In what could be described as an elitist declaration the court said:

The effect upon inmates of showing the film to persons with a serious interest in rehabilitation, and with potential capacity to be helpful, is likely to be very different from the effect of its exhibition merely to satisfy general public curiosity. There is a possibility that showings to specialized audiences may be of benefit to the public interest, to the inmates themselves, and to the conduct of an important State institution. Because of the character of such audiences, the likelihood of humiliation, even of identifiable inmates, is greatly reduced. Commonwealth v. Wiseman, 249 N.E.2d 610 (Mass.1969).

Similarly, what a New York court called "commercial exploitation" of a state mental hospital patient in a CBS documentary narrated by Bill Moyers was held to violate both that person's right of privacy and right of publicity (a difficult concept to visualize in these circumstances) under the New York statute. And a signed consent form was void because no conscious consent was possible. Commercial advantage to CBS was said to outweigh its newsworthiness argument. Delan v. CBS, 7 Med.L. Rptr. 2465 (Sup.Ct.N.Y.1981).

Ruling in a different institutional setting, the United States Supreme Court in Saxbe v. Washington Post, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 2314, 417 U.S. 843 (1974) held that prison regulations prohibiting face-to-face interviews by reporters of individually designated inmates did not violate the First Amendment. Prison regulations did not deny press access to sources of information available to the general public. Moreover, information on prison conditions was available elsewhere.

Consistent with Saxbe, a federal district court in Utah rejected the Salt Lake Tribune's demand for access to the execution of Gary Gilmore and upheld a state law which bans press and public from witnessing executions because of "concerns for institutional discipline and security as well as reasonable deference to the privacy of the condemned man."

A few days earlier a federal judge in Dallas held that television reporters had a constitutional right to film executions and broadcast them to the public. Private executions, said the court, were unthinkable. On appeal, however, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, citing Saxbe, ruled that Texas's policy of allowing news reporters access to executions in state prisons but banning audio or visual recordings of executions did not violate the First Amendment news-gathering rights of a television reporter who sought to film the execution for later broadcast.<sup>78</sup>

First Amendment questions are inescapable in the foregoing cases, especially where injunctive relief is granted to plaintiffs.

78. Garrett v. Estelle, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 2265, 556 F.2d 1274 (5th Cir. 1977).

A question is whether in light of the emphasis on the First Amendment right of the press to gather information in Richmond Newspapers, text, p. 513, Saxbe is still the dominant precedent in this area.

4. Recall the Bindrim case, used earlier to illustrate fictionalization. Identification of plaintiff was an issue there, and it may also be an issue in appropriation cases.

A New York City psychiatrist, Dr. Emanuel Peterfreund, claimed violation of his statutory right to privacy by the film Rich Kids, based on a novel of the same title, in which the stepfather of one of two lead characters is a New York psychiatrist named Simon Peterfreund. The claim was dismissed on grounds that similarity in surnames and profession were insufficient to identify plaintiff with the film character who made only limited appearances in both film and novel.<sup>79</sup>

A New York appeals court dismissed Guy Lombardo's appropriation suit under the New York privacy law because neither his name nor his likeness had been used in a television commercial. It did allow him, however, a common law claim for appropriation of his "public personality" as "Mr. New Year's Eve" which the commercial had depicted.<sup>80</sup>

Portable toilets called "Here's Johnny" were said by a trial court not to exploit entertainer Johnny Carson's "public personality." The Sixth Circuit reversed, however, noting that there was a clearer appropriation here of Carson's persona than if his full proper name had been used.<sup>81</sup>

Descendability

1. A federal district court in the Pola Negri case interpreted the New York statute as protecting the right of publicity of any living person. It did not resolve conflict among New York courts, both state and federal, as to whether 1) misappropriation and the right of publicity are two separate rights, the first, a traditional right to be let alone, the second, a property right, and whether 2) the right of publicity is descendable and assignable, that is, it can be passed on to heirs and beneficiaries.<sup>82</sup>

In a comprehensive review of state law, a New York appellate court held in Brinkley v. Casablancas, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1457, 438 N.Y.S.2d 1004 (1981) that the two rights were one and the same. But federal courts in New York have found an assignable common law right of publicity apart from the statutory right to be let alone. Factors Etc., Inc. v. Pro Arts, Inc., 4 Med.L.Rptr. 1144, 579 F.2d 215 (2d Cir. 1978), cert. den., 440 U.S. 908 (1979). See also, Price v. Hal Roach Studios, Inc., 400 F.Supp. 836 (D.N.Y.1975), a case involving the images of Laurel and Hardy.

Survivability, in which a right of publicity is recognized, is a matter of state law. In diversity suits, federal courts will be guided by state law. At this writing, the Second and Third Circuit Courts of Appeal and five state laws make the right of publicity assignable to heirs or survivors. Seven state laws and the Sixth Circuit expressly do not. There are other dimensions of the right.

California's Supreme Court held that a right of publicity will survive only for those opportunities exercised or exploited by a celebrity during his or her lifetime. The case involved Bela Lugosi, the original Hollywood "Count Dracula."<sup>83</sup> On the other hand, a Broadway musical's unauthorized use of the appearance and style of the Marx Brothers act—even in parody—violated the entertainers' common law right of publicity, which they had exploited during their lifetimes so as to create a valuable asset which had survived their deaths.<sup>84</sup> California, less hospitable to descendability than New York, has wondered, in its judicial ruminations, how many generations ought to benefit from what would seem to be a personal right? How is the worth or value of publicity measured at the time of death? Is it a taxable value? Does it apply to public officials? Military heroes? Does the claimant seek economic gain or personal gratification? And does injunctive relief, as provided for in the New York statute, raise litigable First Amendment issues?

Before Tennessee had occasion to recognize a right of publicity, and therefore to rule on its descendability, a good deal of court discussion focused on the publicity rights of survivors of Tennessee-based country singers and of Elvis Presley. For example, when Bluegrass singer Lester Flatt's likeness was used in a Coors beer campaign, a chancery court in Tennessee, citing a Tennessee federal district court in a Presley case,<sup>85</sup> held that Flatt had an enforceable right of publicity that was descendable.<sup>86</sup> Subsequently, the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals had reversed the Tennessee federal district court's ruling, holding that, in the absence of Tennessee's having specifically recognized descendability, the assignment of a right of publicity terminates at death.<sup>87</sup> And the Second Circuit Court of Appeals had reversed a New York District Court's holding which the Tennessee chancery court had found persuasive.<sup>88</sup> The Tennessee chancery court in the Flatt case said that it was not bound by the federal circuit court rulings.

Tennessee's belated recognition of descendability in the Flatt case had the result of unhinging earlier Presley holdings, and that case was reopened on motion of the original Presley plaintiffs. The cruel complexities of the case are discussed in a 1982 opinion of the New York federal district court granting a rehearing.<sup>89</sup>

2. Another form of privacy that sometimes conflicts with the information needs of the public is the privacy of data on individual citizens held in government files. State and federal data privacy laws confront state and federal open records or freedom of information laws. This conflict is discussed in a subsequent chapter. And a property right not dissimilar to the right of publicity is discussed in a section on copyright.

Journalist's Privilege

IS THERE A COMMON LAW OR CONSTITUTIONAL PRIVILEGE TO PROTECT NOTES, TAPES, AND THE IDENTITY OF SOURCES?

Traditionally the common law has firmly exempted compelled testimony concerning a lawyer-client relationship; and, in some circumstances, husbands and wives, priests and penitents, and doctors and patients have been accorded a similar privilege. Even government informers have enjoyed anonymity unless their identity goes to the central issue of guilt or innocence.<sup>1</sup> Limited privilege has also been granted against disclosure of religious beliefs, political votes, trade secrets, state secrets, and other categories of official information. Most of the latter are now governed by state and federal statutes.

Similar recognition of the journalist's claim that a privilege to protect the identity of sources and what is contained in unpublished notes, tapes, and photographs will assure the flow of vital information has been slower to emerge.

When Paul Corsetti of the Boston Herald American refused in 1982 to testify in court as to what an identified source had told him in a telephone conversation, he was sentenced to three months in jail. He served eight days. The source had implicated himself in a murder. The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, holding to the common law precept that the state has a right to every person's evidence,<sup>2</sup> found Corsetti guilty of criminal contempt.

Corsetti asserted a constitutional as well as a common law justification for his refusal to testify. In rejecting both common law and constitutional arguments, the Massachusetts court nevertheless implied that in some circumstances it might recognize such a privilege when it said:

Where the source is disclosed and the testimony sought from the reporter concerns information already made public, the [s]tate's interest in the use of that information overrides the reporter's claim that the use of that information should be restricted. This is not a case where the Commonwealth has used a reporter to obtain an indictment or to do its investigative work.<sup>3</sup>

Even though Massachusetts, claiming a judicial need for full disclosure of the truth, has been more resistant than most states to a privilege for journalists, its highest court reflects the judicial willingness across the land to balance what the courts perceive as the needs of justice against the reporter's perception of what it takes to serve the public's informational needs.

Indeed, in denying Corsetti's application for a stay of the Massachusetts court's judgment, Justice William Brennan noted that in a close case it may be appropriate to "balance the equities"—to explore the relative harms to applicant and respondent, as well as the interest of the public at large. Brennan doubted that the United States Supreme Court would take the case or find for Corsetti if it did grant certiorari.<sup>4</sup>

On the other hand, flat assertions of either common law or constitutional protection for journalist's privilege have generally been rejected. The Constitution extends no such privilege beyond the Fifth Amendment's provision against self-incrimination.

In 1972, a divided United States Supreme Court in Branzburg v. Hayes, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 2617, 408 U.S. 665 (1972) struck the balance in favor of everyone having a duty—including the president of the United States—to testify in a court of law when called upon to do so. The Court, through Justice Byron White, refused to find either an absolute or a qualified journalist's privilege in the First Amendment.

A minority of four justices, led by Justice Potter Stewart, vigorously pressed divergent views. Stewart modified a position he took in a 1958 case in which Marie Torre, a columnist for the New York Herald Tribune, went to jail in spite of her then novel First Amendment justification for refusing to name a source. The source, who remained unidentified, was responsible for a statement that had provoked Judge Garland into bringing a $1 million libel suit against CBS.

Then Second Circuit Judge Stewart held for a unanimous court of appeals that the duty of a witness to testify in a court of law had roots fully as deep in our history as the guarantee of free press. The question asked of Ms. Torre, said the court, went to the heart of the plaintiff's claim, and there were no alternate sources. "The right to sue and defend in the courts," said Stewart, "is the alternative of force. In an organized society it is the right conservative of all other rights, and lies at the foundation of orderly government."<sup>5</sup> But, again, the clear suggestion that balancing in these kinds of cases is possible.

Long after Garland but before Branzburg, Stewart was clearly influenced by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in the Caldwell case, a case involving a New York Times reporter and his Black Panther sources. A ruling in favor of Caldwell's privilege to protect his sources by not answering the summons of a grand jury on First Amendment grounds would be reversed by the Supreme Court when the case was joined by two others to become the Branzburg case.

But the Ninth Circuit had delivered what ultimately would become a key ruling in the realm of journalist's privilege. In reversing a federal district court and recognizing Caldwell's privilege to protect his journalistic integrity and the free flow of information by refusing to appear before the grand jury, the court declared:

To convert news gatherers into Department of Justice investigators is to invade the autonomy of the press by imposing a governmental function upon them. To do so where the result is to diminish their future capacity as news gatherers is destructive of their public function. To accomplish this where it has not been shown to be essential to the Grand Jury inquiry simply cannot be justified in the public interest. Further it is not unreasonable to expect journalists everywhere to temper their reporting so as to reduce the probability that they will be required to submit to interrogation. The First Amendment guards against governmental action that induces self-censorship.<sup>6</sup>

4. Corsetti v. Massachusetts, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 2117, 438 N.E.2d 805 (Mass.1982), stay denied 103 S.Ct. 3. In Lynch v. Riddell, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 2290 (Mass.1982) disclosure was forced against a TV station in a products liability suit. But the court intimated that it might protect confidential sources and information not shown to be relevant to the defendant's needs.

5. Garland v. Torre, 259 F.2d 545 (2d Cir. 1958), cert.den. 358 U.S. 910.

And on the question of Caldwell's attending the grand jury hearing, the circuit court of appeals saw the cost to the public as slight (Caldwell stated in an affidavit that there was nothing to which he could testify beyond what he had already made public) but the cost to the news-gathering process unacceptably high.

The Ninth Circuit did something else. It began to fashion a three-part test to balance these interests which, in the following decade, would permeate the common law of both state and federal courts and find its way directly into the shield laws of Minnesota, New Jersey, and Tennessee. The test of 1) relevance, 2) lack of alternate sources, and 3) a compelling public need would also appear a year later in Alexander Bickel's oral arguments before the Supreme Court on behalf of the New York Times in the Pentagon Papers case.

Stewart's dissenting opinion in Branzburg legitimized the test, or something close to it, so that by the early 80s eight circuit courts of appeal, plus the District of Columbia circuit, recognized a qualified privilege; district courts in the two other circuits recognized it, and it was arguably recognized in a third. At the same time, a three-part test, or some variation of it, had been accepted by the courts of at least twenty-one states, in spite of the fact that half of them had no shield law. In states without shield laws, nearly 75 percent of their courts have applied some or all of Justice Stewart's three-part test of Branzburg, and in almost the same percentage of those cases journalist's privilege was upheld.

But first the landmark Branzburg decision.

33 L.ED.2D 626 (1972).

[Editorial Note

Certiorari was granted to review judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, 434 F.2d 1081, upholding refusal of a newsman to appear and testify before a grand jury with respect to confidential sources, and judgments of the Court of Appeals of Kentucky, 461 S.W.2d 345, and the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 266 N.E.2d 297, rejecting claimed rights of newsmen to refuse to testify before grand juries with respect to confidential sources. The Supreme Court, per Justice White, held that requiring journalists to appear and testify before state or federal grand juries does not abridge the freedom of speech and press guaranteed by the First Amendment; and that a journalist's agreement to conceal criminal conduct of his news sources, or evidence thereof, does not give rise to any constitutional testimonial privilege with respect thereto.]

Opinion of the Court by Justice WHITE, announced by The Chief Justice.
* * *

The writ of certiorari in Branzburg v. Hayes and Branzburg v. Meigs, brings before us two judgments of the Kentucky Court of Appeals, both involving petitioner Branzburg, a staff reporter for the Courier-Journal, a daily newspaper published in Louisville, Jefferson County, Kentucky.

---

6. Caldwell v. United States, 434 F.2d 1081 (9th Cir. 1970).

On November 15, 1969, the Courier-Journal carried a story under petitioner's by-line describing in detail his observations of two young residents of Jefferson County synthesizing hashish from marijuana, (sic) an activity which, they asserted, earned them about $5,000 in three weeks. The article included a photograph of a pair of hands working above a laboratory table on which was a substance identified by the caption as hashish. The article stated that petitioner had promised not to reveal the identity of the two hashish makers. Petitioner was shortly subpoenaed by the Jefferson County grand jury; he appeared, but refused to identify the individuals he had seen possessing marijuana or the persons he had seen making hashish from marijuana. A state trial court judge ordered petitioner to answer these questions and rejected his contention that the Kentucky reporters' privilege statute, Ky.Rev.Stat. 421.100, the First Amendment of the United States Constitution, or §§ 1, 2, and 8 of the Kentucky Constitution authorized his refusal to answer. Petitioner then sought prohibition and mandamus in the Kentucky Court of Appeals on the same grounds that the Court of Appeals denied the petition. It held that petitioner had abandoned his First Amendment argument in a supplemental memorandum he had filed and tacitly rejected his argument based on the Kentucky Constitution. It also construed Ky.Rev.Stat. 421.100 as affording a newsman the privilege of refusing to divulge the identity of an informant who supplied him with information but held that the statute did not permit a reporter to refuse to testify about events he had observed personally, including the identities of those persons he had observed.

The second case involving petitioner Branzburg arose out of his later story published on January 10, 1971, which described in detail the use of drugs in Frankfort, Franklin County, Kentucky. The article reported that in order to provide a comprehensive survey of the "drug scene" in Frankfort, petitioner had "spent two weeks interviewing several dozen drug users in the capital city" and had seen some of them smoking marijuana. A number of conversations with and observations of several unnamed drug users were recounted. Subpoenaed to appear before a Franklin County grand jury "to testify in the matter of violation of statutes, concerning use and sale of drugs," petitioner Branzburg moved to quash the summons; the motion was denied although an order was issued protecting Branzburg from revealing "confidential associations, sources or information" but requiring that he "answer any questions which concern or pertain to any criminal act, the commission of which was actually observed by [him]." Prior to the time he was slated to appear before the grand jury, petitioner sought mandamus and prohibition from the Kentucky Court of Appeals, arguing that if he were forced to go before the grand jury or to answer questions regarding the identity of informants or disclose information given to him in confidence, his effectiveness as a reporter would be greatly damaged. The Court of Appeals once again denied the requested writs, reaffirming its construction of Ky. Rev.Stat. 421.100, and rejecting petitioner's claim of a First Amendment privilege. It distinguished Caldwell v. United States, 434 F.2d 1081 (9th Cir. 1970), and it also announced its "misgivings" about that decision, asserting that it represented "a drastic departure from the generally recognized rule that the sources of information of a newspaper reporter are not privileged under the First Amendment." It characterized petitioner's fear that his ability to obtain news would be destroyed as "so tenuous that it does not, in the opinion of this court, present an abridgement of freedom of the press within the meaning of that term as used in the Constitution of the United States."

Petitioner sought a writ of certiorari to review both judgments of the Kentucky Court of Appeals, and we granted the writ.

In the Matter of Paul Pappas originated when petitioner Pappas, a television newsman-photographer working out of the Providence, Rhode Island, office of a New Bedford, Massachusetts, television station, was called to New Bedford on July 30, 1970, to report on civil disorders there which involved fires and other turmoil. He intended to cover a Black Panther news conference at that group's headquarters in a boarded-up store. Petitioner found the streets around the store barricaded, but he ultimately gained entrance to the area and recorded and photographed a prepared statement read by one of the Black Panther leaders at about 3:00 p.m. He then asked for and received permission to re-enter the area. Returning at about 9:00 p.m. that evening, he was allowed to enter and remain inside Panther headquarters. As a condition of entry, Pappas agreed not to disclose anything he saw or heard inside the store except an anticipated police raid which Pappas, "on his own," was free to photograph and report as he wished. Pappas stayed inside the headquarters for about three hours, but there was no police raid, and petitioner wrote no story and did not otherwise reveal what had transpired in the store while he was there. Two months later, petitioner was summoned before the Bristol County Grand Jury and appeared, answered questions as to his name, address, employment, and what he had seen and heard outside Panther headquarters, but refused to answer any questions about what had taken place inside headquarters while he was there, claiming that the First Amendment afforded him a privilege to protect confidential informants and their information. A second summons was then served upon him, again directing him to appear before the Grand Jury and "to give such evidence as he knows relating to any matters which may be inquired of on behalf of the commonwealth before * * * the Grand Jury." His motion to quash on First Amendment and other grounds was denied by the trial judge who, noting the absence of a statutory newsman's privilege in Massachusetts, ruled that petitioner had no constitutional privilege to refuse to divulge to the Grand Jury what he had seen and heard, including the identity of persons he had observed. The case was reported for decision to the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts. The record there did not include a transcript of the hearing on the motion to quash nor did it reveal the specific questions petitioner had refused to answer, the expected nature of his testimony, the nature of the grand jury investigation, or the likelihood of the grand jury securing the information it sought from petitioner by other means. The Supreme Judicial Court, however, took "judicial notice that in July, 1970, there were serious civil disorders in New Bedford, which involved street barricades, exclusion of the public from certain streets, fires, and similar turmoil. We were told at the arguments that there was gunfire in certain streets. We assume that the grand jury investigation was an appropriate effort to discover and indict those responsible for criminal acts." The Court then reaffirmed prior Massachusetts holdings that testimonial privileges were "exceptional" and "limited," stating that "[t]he principle that the public 'has a right to every man's evidence'" had usually been preferred, in the Commonwealth, to countervailing interests. The Court rejected the holding of the Ninth Circuit in Caldwell v. United States, and "adhere[d] to the view that there exists no constitutional newsman's privilege, either qualified or absolute, to refuse to appear and testify before a court or grand jury." Any adverse effect upon the free dissemination of news by virtue of petitioner's being called to testify was deemed to be only "indirect, theoretical, and uncertain." The court concluded that "The obligation of newsmen * * * is that of every citizen, * * * to appear when summoned, with relevant written or other material when required, and to answer relevant and reasonable inquiries." The court nevertheless noted that grand juries were subject to supervision by the presiding judge, who had the duty "to prevent oppressive, unnecessary, irrelevant, and other improper inquiry and investigation," to insure that a witness' Fifth Amendment rights were not infringed, and to assess the propriety, necessity, and pertinence of the probable testimony to the investigation in progress. The burden was deemed to be on the witness to establish the impropriety of the summons or the questions asked. The denial of the motion to quash was affirmed and we granted a writ of certiorari to petitioner Pappas.

United States v. Caldwell arose from subpoenas issued by a federal grand jury in the Northern District of California to respondent Earl Caldwell, a reporter for the New York Times assigned to cover the Black Panther Party and other black militant groups. A subpoena duces tecum [a subpoena seeking notes, tapes, documents, or other physical evidence] was served on respondent on February 2, 1970, ordering him to appear before the grand jury to testify and to bring with him notes and tape recordings of interviews given him for publication by officers and spokesmen of the Black Panther Party concerning the aims, purposes, and activities of that organization. Respondent objected to the scope of this subpoena, and an agreement between his counsel and the government attorneys resulted in a continuance. A second subpoena was served on March 16, which omitted the documentary requirement and simply ordered Caldwell "to appear * * * to testify before the Grand Jury." Respondent and his employer, the New York Times, moved to quash on the ground that the unlimited breadth of the subpoenas and the fact that Caldwell would have to appear in secret before the grand jury would destroy his working relationship with the Black Panther Party and "suppress vital First Amendment freedoms * * * by driving a wedge of distrust and silence between the news media and the militants." Respondent argued that "so drastic an incursion upon First Amendment freedoms" should not be permitted "in the absence of a compelling governmental interest—not shown here—in requiring Mr. Caldwell's appearance before the grand jury." The motion was supported by amicus curiae memoranda from other publishing concerns and by affidavits from newsmen asserting the unfavorable impact on news sources of requiring reporters to appear before grand juries. The Government filed three memoranda in opposition to the motion to quash, each supported by affidavits. These documents stated that the grand jury was investigating, among other things, possible violations of a number of criminal statutes, including 18 U.S.C.A. § 871 [threats against the President], 18 U.S.C.A. § 1751 [assassination, attempts to assassinate, conspiracy to assassinate the President], 18 U.S.C.A. § 231 [civil disorders], 18 U.S.C.A. § 2101 [interstate travel to incite a riot], and 18 U.S.C.A. § 1341 [mail frauds and swindles]. It was recited that on November 15, 1969, an officer of the Black Panther Party made a publicly televised speech in which he had declared that "We will kill Richard Nixon" and that this threat had been repeated in three subsequent issues of the Party newspaper. Also referred to were various writings by Caldwell about the Black Panther Party, including an article published in the New York Times on December 14, 1969, stating that "[i]n their role as the vanguard in a revolutionary struggle the Panthers have picked up guns" and quoting the Chief of Staff of the Party as declaring that "We advocate the very direct overthrow of the Government by way of force and violence. By picking up guns and moving against it because we recognize it as being oppressive and in recognizing that we know that the only solution to it is armed struggle [sic]." The Government also stated that the Chief of Staff of the Party had been indicted by the grand jury on December 3, 1969, for uttering threats against the life of the President in violation of 18 U.S.C.A. § 871 and that various efforts had been made to secure evidence of crimes under investigation through the immunization of persons allegedly associated with the Black Panther Party.

On April 6, the District Court denied the motion to quash, Application of Caldwell, 311 F.Supp. 358 (D.C.Cal.1970), on the ground that "every person within the jurisdiction of the government" is bound to testify upon being properly summoned. [Emphasis in original]. Nevertheless, the court accepted respondent's First Amendment arguments to the extent of issuing a protective order providing that although respondent must divulge whatever information had been given to him for publication, he "shall not be required to reveal confidential associations, sources or information received, developed or maintained by him as a professional journalist in the course of his efforts to gather news for dissemination to the public through the press or other news media." The court held that the First Amendment afforded respondent a privilege to refuse disclosure of such confidential information until there had been "a showing by the Government of a compelling and overriding national interest in requiring Mr. Caldwell's testimony which cannot be served by any alternative means." 311 F.Supp. at 362.

Subsequently, the term of the grand jury expired, a new grand jury was convened, and a new subpoena ad testificandum [a subpoena seeking direct oral testimony] was issued and served on May 22, 1970. A new motion to quash by respondent and memorandum in opposition by the Government were filed, and by stipulation of the parties, the motion was submitted on the prior record. The court denied the motion to quash, repeating the protective provisions in its prior order but this time directing Caldwell to appear before the grand jury pursuant to the May 22 subpoena. Respondent refused to appear before the grand jury, and the court issued an order to show cause why he should not be held in contempt. Upon his further refusal to go before the grand jury, respondent was ordered committed for contempt until such time as he complied with the court's order or until the expiration of the term of the grand jury.

Respondent Caldwell appealed the contempt order, and the Court of Appeals reversed. Caldwell v. United States, 434 F.2d 1081 (9th Cir. 1970). Viewing the issue before it as whether Caldwell was required to appear before the grand jury at all, rather than the scope of permissible interrogation, the court first determined that the First Amendment provided a qualified testimonial privilege to newsmen; in its view, requiring a reporter like Caldwell to testify would deter his informants from communicating with him in the future and would cause him to censor his writings in an effort to avoid being subpoenaed. Absent compelling reasons for requiring his testimony, he was held privileged to withhold it. The court also held, for similar First Amendment reasons, that absent some special showing of necessity by the Government, attendance by Caldwell at a secret meeting of the grand jury was something he was privileged to refuse because of the potential impact of such an appearance on the flow of news to the public. We granted the United States' petition for certiorari.

Petitioners Branzburg and Pappas and respondent Caldwell press First Amendment Claims that may be simply put: that to gather news it is often necessary to agree either not to identify the source of information published or to publish only part of the facts revealed, or both; that if the reporter is nevertheless forced to reveal these confidences to a grand jury, the source so identified and other confidential sources of other reporters will be measurably deterred from furnishing publishable information, all to the detriment of the free flow of information protected by the First Amendment. Although petitioners do not claim an absolute privilege against official interrogation in all circumstances, they assert that the reporter should not be forced either to appear or to testify before a grand jury or at trial until and unless sufficient grounds are shown for believing that the reporter possesses information relevant to a crime the grand jury is investigating, that the information the reporter has is unavailable from other sources, and that the need for the information is sufficiently compelling to override the claimed invasion of First Amendment interests occasioned by the disclosure. * * *

We do not question the significance of free speech, press or assembly to the country's welfare. Nor is it suggested that news gathering does not qualify for First Amendment protection; without some protection for seeking out the news, freedom of the press could be eviscerated. But this case involves no intrusions upon speech or assembly, no prior restraint or restriction on what the press may publish, and no express or implied command that the press publish what it prefers to withhold. No exaction or tax for the privilege of publishing, and no penalty, civil or criminal, related to the content of published material is at issue here. The use of confidential sources by the press is not forbidden or restricted; reporters remain free to seek news from any source by means within the law. No attempt is made to require the press to publish its sources of information or indiscriminately to disclose them on request.

The sole issue before us is the obligation of reporters to respond to grand jury subpoenas as other citizens do and to answer questions relevant to an investigation into the commission of crime. [Emphasis added.] Citizens generally are not constitutionally immune from grand jury subpoenas; and neither the First Amendment nor other constitutional provision protects the average citizen from disclosing to a grand jury information that he has received in confidence. The claim is, however, that reporters are exempt from these obligations because if forced to respond to subpoenas and identify their sources or disclose other confidences, their informants will refuse or be reluctant to furnish newsworthy information in the future. This asserted burden on news gathering is said to make compelled testimony from newsmen constitutionally suspect and to require a privileged position for them.

It is clear that the First Amendment does not invalidate every incidental burdening of the press that may result from the enforcement of civil or criminal statutes of general applicability. * * *

The prevailing view is that the press is not free with impunity to publish everything and anything it desires to publish. Although it may deter or regulate what is said or published, the press may not circulate knowing or reckless falsehoods damaging to private reputation without subjecting itself to liability for damages, including punitive damages, or even criminal prosecution. See New York Times Co. v. Sullivan. * * *

Despite the fact that news gathering may be hampered, the press is regularly excluded from grand jury proceedings, our own conferences, the meetings of other official bodies gathered in executive session, and the meetings of private organizations. Newsmen have no constitutional right of access to the scenes of crime or disaster when the general public is excluded, and they may be prohibited from attending or publishing information about trials if such restrictions are necessary to assure a defendant a fair trial before an impartial tribunal.

It is thus not surprising that the great weight of authority is that newsmen are not exempt from the normal duty of appearing before a grand jury and answering questions relevant to a criminal investigation. At common law, courts consistently refused to recognize the existence of any privilege authorizing a newsman to refuse to reveal confidential information to a grand jury. * * * These courts have applied the presumption against the existence of an asserted testimonial privilege, and have concluded that the First Amendment interest asserted by the newsman was outweighed by the general obligation of a citizen to appear before a grand jury or at trial, pursuant to a subpoena, and give what information he possesses. * *

The prevailing constitutional view of the newsman's privilege is very much rooted in the ancient role of the grand jury which has the dual function of determining if there is probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed and of protecting citizens against unfounded criminal prosecutions. Grand jury proceedings are constitutionally mandated for the institution of federal criminal prosecutions for capital or other serious crimes, and "its constitutional prerogatives are rooted in long centuries of Anglo-American history." The Fifth Amendment provides that "No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury." The adoption of the grand jury "in our Constitution as the sole method for preferring charges in serious criminal cases shows the high place it held as an instrument of justice." Although state systems of criminal procedure differ greatly among themselves, the grand jury is similarly guaranteed by many state constitutions and plays an important role in fair and effective law enforcement in the overwhelming majority of the States. Because its task is to inquire into the existence of possible criminal conduct and to return only well-founded indictments, its investigative powers are necessarily broad. "It is a grand inquest, a body with powers of investigation and inquisition, the scope of whose inquiries is not to be limited narrowly by questions of propriety or forecasts of the probable result of the investigation, or by doubts whether any particular individual will be found properly subject to an accusation of crime." Hence the grand jury's authority to subpoena witnesses is not only historic, but essential to its task. Although the powers of the grand jury are not unlimited and are subject to the supervision of a judge, the long standing principle that "the public has a right to every man's evidence," except for those persons protected by a constitutional, common law, or statutory privilege, 8 J. Wigmore, Evidence § 2192 (McNaughton rev. 1961), is particularly applicable to grand jury proceedings.

A number of States have provided newsmen a statutory privilege of varying breadth, but the majority have not done so, and none has been provided by federal statute. Until now the only testimonial privilege for unofficial witnesses that is rooted in the Federal Constitution is the Fifth Amendment privilege against compelled self-incrimination. We are asked to create another by interpreting the First Amendment to grant newsmen a testimonial privilege that other citizens do not enjoy. This we decline to do. * * *

Thus, we cannot seriously entertain the notion that the First Amendment protects a newsman's agreement to conceal the criminal conduct of his source, or evidence thereof, on the theory that it is better to write about crime than to do something about it. Insofar as any reporter in these cases undertook not to reveal or testify about the crime he witnessed, his claim of privilege under the First Amendment presents no substantial question. The crimes of news sources are no less reprehensible and threatening to the public interest when witnessed by a reporter than when they are not.

There remain those situations where a source is not engaged in criminal conduct but has information suggesting illegal conduct by others. Newsmen frequently receive information from such sources pursuant to a tacit or express agreement to withhold the source's name and suppress any information that the source wishes not published. Such informants presumably desire anonymity in order to avoid being entangled as a witness in a criminal trial or grand jury investigation. They may fear that disclosure will threaten their job security or personal safety or that it will simply result in dishonor or embarrassment.

The argument that the flow of news will be diminished by compelling reporters to aid the grand jury in a criminal investigation is not irrational, nor are the records before us silent on the matter. But we remain unclear how often and to what extent informers are actually deterred from furnishing information when newsmen are forced to testify before a grand jury. The available data indicates that some newsmen rely a great deal on confidential sources and that some informants are particularly sensitive to the threat of exposure and may be silenced if it is held by this Court that, ordinarily, newsmen must testify pursuant to subpoenas, but the evidence fails to demonstrate that there would be a significant constriction of the flow of news to the public if this Court reaffirms the prior common law and constitutional rule regarding the testimonial obligations of newsmen. Estimates of the inhibiting effect of such subpoenas on the willingness of informants to make disclosures to newsmen are widely divergent and to a great extent speculative. It would be difficult to canvass the views of the informants themselves; surveys of reporters on this topic are chiefly opinions of predicted informant behavior and must be viewed in the light of the professional self-interest of the interviewees. Reliance by the press on confidential informants does not mean that all such sources will in fact dry up because of the later possible appearance of the newsman before a grand jury. The reporter may never be called and if he objects to testifying, the prosecution may not insist. Also, the relationship of many informants to the press is a symbiotic one which is unlikely to be greatly inhibited by the threat of subpoena: quite often, such informants are members of a minority political or cultural group which relies heavily on the media to propagate its views, publicize its aims, and magnify its exposure to the public. Moreover, grand juries characteristically conduct secret proceedings, and law enforcement officers are themselves experienced in dealing with informers and have their own methods for protecting them without interference with the effective administration of justice. There is little before us indicating that informants whose interest in avoiding exposure is that it may threaten job security, personal safety, or peace of mind, would in fact, be in a worse position, or would think they would be, if they risked placing their trust in public officials as well as reporters. We doubt if the informer who prefers anonymity but is sincerely interested in furnishing evidence of crime will always or very often be deterred by the prospect of dealing with those public authorities characteristically charged with the duty to protect the public interest as well as his.

Accepting the fact, however, that an undetermined number of informants not themselves implicated in crime will nevertheless, for whatever reason, refuse to talk to newsmen if they fear identification by a reporter in an official investigation we cannot accept the argument that the public interest in possible future news about crime from undisclosed, unverified sources must take precedence over the public interest in pursuing and prosecuting those crimes reported to the press by informants and in thus deterring the commission of such crimes in the future.

Of course, the press has the right to abide by its agreement not to publish all the information it has, but the right to withhold news is not equivalent to a First Amendment exemption from the ordinary duty of all other citizens to furnish relevant information to a grand jury performing an important public function. Private restraints on the flow of information are not so favored by the First Amendment that they override all other public interests. As Justice Black declared in another context, "[f]reedom of the press from governmental interference under the First Amendment does not sanction repression of that freedom by private interests." Associated Press v. United States. [See this text, p. 639.]

Neither are we now convinced that a virtually impenetrable constitutional shield, beyond legislative or judicial control, should be forged to protect a private system of informers operated by the press to report on criminal conduct, a system that would be unaccountable to the public, would pose a threat to the citizen's justifiable expectations of privacy, and would equally protect well-intentioned informants and those who pay for or otherwise betray their trust to their employer or associates. The public through its elected and appointed law enforcement officers regularly utilizes informers, and in proper circumstances may assert a privilege against disclosing the identity of these informers. * * * Such informers enjoy no constitutional protection. Their testimony is available to the public when desired by grand juries or at criminal trials; their identity cannot be concealed from the defendant when it is critical to his case. Clearly, this system is not impervious to control by the judiciary and the decision whether to unmask an informer or to continue to profit by his anonymity is in public, not private, hands. We think that it should remain there and that public authorities should retain the options of either insisting on the informer's testimony relevant to the prosecution of crime or of seeking the benefit of further information that his exposure might prevent.

* * *

The requirements of those cases, which hold that a State's interest must be "compelling" or "paramount" to justify even an indirect burden on First Amendment rights, are also met here. As we have indicated, the investigation of crime by the grand jury implements a fundamental governmental role of securing the safety of the person and property of the citizen, and it appears to us that calling reporters to give testimony in the manner and for the reasons that other citizens are called "bears a reasonable relationship to the achievement of the governmental purpose asserted as its justification." If the test is that the Government "convincingly show a substantial relation between the information sought and a subject of overriding and compelling state interest," it is quite apparent (1) that the State has the necessary interest in extirpating the traffic in illegal drugs, in forestalling assassination attempts on the President, and in preventing the community from being disrupted by violent disorders endangering both persons and property; and (2) that, based on the stories Branzburg and Caldwell wrote and Pappas' admitted conduct, the grand jury called these reporters as they would others—because it was likely that they could supply information to help the Government determine whether illegal conduct had occurred, and, if it had, whether there was sufficient evidence to return an indictment.

Similar considerations dispose of the reporters' claims that preliminary to requiring their grand jury appearance, the State must show that a crime has been committed and that they possess relevant information not available from other sources, for only the grand jury itself can make this determination. The role of the grand jury as an important instrument of effective law enforcement necessarily includes an investigatory function with respect to determining whether a crime has been committed and who committed it. To this end it must call witnesses, in the manner best suited to perform its task. "When the grand jury is performing its investigatory function into a general problem area, * * * society's interest is best served by a thorough and extensive investigation." Wood v. Georgia. A grand jury investigation "is not fully carried out until every available clue has been run down and all witnesses examined in every proper way to find if a crime has been committed." Such an investigation may be triggered by tips, rumors, evidence proffered by the prosecutor, or the personal knowledge of the grand jurors. It is only after the grand jury has examined the evidence that a determination of whether the proceeding will result in an indictment can be made. * * * We see no reason to hold that these reporters, any more than other citizens, should be excused from furnishing information that may help the grand jury in arriving at its initial determinations.

The privilege claimed here is conditional, not absolute; given the suggested preliminary showings and compelling need, the reporter would be required to testify. Presumably, such a rule would reduce the instances in which reporters could be required to appear but predicting in advance when and in what circumstances they could be compelled to do so would be difficult. Such a rule would also have implications for the issuance of compulsory process to reporters at civil and criminal trials and at legislative hearings. If newsmen's confidential sources are as sensitive as they are claimed to be, the prospect of being unmasked whenever a judge determines the situation justifies it is hardly a satisfactory solution to the problem. For them, it would appear that only an absolute privilege would suffice.

We are unwilling to embark the judiciary on a long and difficult journey to such an uncertain destination. The administration of a constitutional newsman's privilege would present practical and conceptual difficulties of a high order. Sooner or later, it would be necessary to define those categories of newsmen who qualified for the privilege, a questionable procedure in light of the traditional doctrine that liberty of the press is the right of the lonely pamphleteer who uses carbon paper or a mimeograph just as much as of the large metropolitan publisher who utilizes the latest photocomposition methods. Freedom of the press is a "fundamental personal right" which "is not confined to newspapers and periodicals. It necessarily embraces pamphlets and leaflets * *." The informative function asserted by representatives of the organized press in the present cases is also performed by lecturers, political pollsters, novelists, academic researchers, and dramatists. Almost any author may quite accurately assert that he is contributing to the flow of information to the public, that he relies on confidential sources of information, and that these sources will be silenced if he is forced to make disclosures before a grand jury.

In each instance where a reporter is subpoenaed to testify, the courts would also be embroiled in preliminary factual and legal determinations with respect to whether the proper predicate had been laid for the reporters' appearance: Is there probable cause to believe a crime has been committed? Is it likely that the reporter has useful information gained in confidence? Could the grand jury obtain the information elsewhere? Is the official interest sufficient to outweigh the claimed privilege?

Thus, in the end, by considering whether enforcement of a particular law served a "compelling" governmental interest, the courts would be inextricably involved in distinguishing between the value of enforcing different criminal laws. By requiring testimony from a reporter in investigations involving some crimes but not in others, they would be making a value judgment which a legislature had declined to make, since in each case the criminal law involved would represent a considered legislative judgment, not constitutionally suspect of what conduct is liable to criminal prosecution. The task of judges, like other officials outside the legislative branch is not to make the law but to uphold it in accordance with their oaths.

At the federal level, Congress has freedom to determine whether a statutory newsman's privilege is necessary and desirable and to fashion standards and rules as narrow or broad as deemed necessary to address the evil discerned and, equally important, to re-fashion those rules as experience from time to time may dictate. There is also merit in leaving state legislatures free, within First Amendment limits, to fashion their own standards in light of the conditions and problems with respect to the relations between law enforcement officials and press in their own areas. It goes without saying, of course, that we are powerless to erect any bar to state courts responding in their own way and construing their own constitutions so as to recognize a newsman's privilege, either qualified or absolute. [Emphasis added.]

In addition, there is much force in the pragmatic view that the press has at its disposal powerful mechanisms of communication and is far from helpless to protect itself from harassment or substantial harm. Furthermore, if what the newsmen urged in these cases is true—that law enforcement cannot hope to gain and may suffer from subpoenaing newsmen before grand juries—prosecutors will be loath to risk so much for so little. Thus, at the federal level the Attorney General has already fashioned a set of rules for federal officials in connection with subpoenaing members of the press to testify before grand juries or at criminal trials.<sup>41</sup> These rules are a major step in the direction petitioners desire to move. They may prove wholly sufficient to resolve the bulk of disagreements and controversies between press and federal officials.

Finally, as we have earlier indicated, news gathering is not without its First Amendment protections, and grand jury investigations if instituted or conducted other than in good faith, would pose wholly different issues for resolution under the First Amendment. Official harassment of the press undertaken not for purposes of law enforcement but to disrupt a reporter's relationship with his news sources would have no justification. Grand juries are subject to judicial control and subpoenas to motions to quash. We do not expect courts will forget that grand juries must operate within the limits of the First Amendment as well as the Fifth.

We turn, therefore, to the disposition of the cases before us. From what we have said, it necessarily follows that the decision in United States v. Caldwell must be reversed. If there is no First Amendment privilege to refuse to answer the relevant and material questions asked during a good-faith grand jury investigation, then it is a fortiori true that there is no privilege to refuse to appear before such a grand jury until the Government demonstrates some "compelling need" for a newsman's testimony. Other issues were urged upon us, but since they were not passed upon by the Court of Appeals, we decline to address them in the first instance.

41. Guidelines for Subpoenas to the News Media were first announced in a speech by the Attorney General on August 10, 1970, and then were expressed in Department of Justice Memo. No. 692 (Sept. 2, 1970), which was sent to all United States Attorneys by the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Criminal Division. [New guidelines were promulgated in 1980. See Guidelines on News Media Subpoenas, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2153 (1980)].

The decisions in Branzburg v. Hayes and Branzburg v. Meigs must be affirmed. Here, petitioner refused to answer questions that directly related to criminal conduct which he had observed and written about. The Kentucky Court of Appeals noted that marihuana is defined as a narcotic drug by statute, and that unlicensed possession or compounding of it is a felony punishable by both fine and imprisonment. It held that petitioner "saw the commission of the statutory felonies of unlawful possession of marijuana and the unlawful conversion of it into hashish." Petitioner may be presumed to have observed similar violations of the state narcotics laws during the research he did for the story which forms the basis of the subpoena in Branzburg v. Meigs. In both cases, if what petitioner wrote was true, he had direct information to provide the grand jury concerning the commission of serious crimes.

The only question presented at the present time in In the Matter of Paul Pappas is whether petitioner Pappas must appear before the grand jury to testify pursuant to subpoena. The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court characterized the record in this case as "meager," and it is not clear what petitioner will be asked by the grand jury. It is not even clear that he will be asked to divulge information received in confidence. We affirm the decision of the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court and hold that petitioner must appear before the grand jury to answer the questions put to him, subject, of course, to the supervision of the presiding judge as to "the propriety, purposes, and scope of the grand jury inquiry and the pertinence of the probable testimony."

So ordered.

Justice POWELL, concurring in the opinion of the Court.

I add this brief statement to emphasize what seems to me to be the limited nature of the Court's holding. The Court does not hold that newsmen, subpoenaed to testify before a grand jury, are without constitutional rights with respect to the gathering of news or in safeguarding their sources. Certainly, we do not hold, as suggested in the dissenting opinion, that state and federal authorities are free to "annex" the news media as "an investigative arm of government." The solicitude repeatedly shown by this Court for First Amendment freedoms should be sufficient assurance against any such effort even if one seriously believed that the media—properly free and untrammelled in the fullest sense of these terms—were not able to protect themselves.

As indicated in the concluding portion of the opinion, the Court states that no harassment of newsmen will be tolerated. If a newsman believes that the grand jury investigation is not being conducted in good faith he is not without remedy. Indeed, if the newsman is called upon to give information bearing only a remote and tenuous relationship to the subject of the investigation, or if he has some other reason to believe that his testimony implicates confidential source relationships without a legitimate need of law enforcement, he will have access to the Court on a motion to quash and an appropriate protective order may be entered. The asserted claim to privilege should be judged on its facts by the striking of a proper balance between freedom of the press and the obligation of all citizens to give relevant testimony with respect to criminal conduct. The balance of these vital constitutional and societal interests on a case-by-case basis accords with the tried and traditional way of adjudicating such questions.

In short, the courts will be available to newsmen under circumstances where legitimate First Amendment interests require protection.

Justice STEWART, with whom Justice Brennan and Justice Marshall join, dissenting.

The Court's crabbed view of the First Amendment reflects a disturbing insensitivity to the critical role of an independent press in our society. The question whether a reporter has a constitutional right to a confidential relationship with his source is of first impression here, but the principles which should guide our decision are as basic as any to be found in the Constitution. While Justice Powell's enigmatic concurring opinion gives some hope of a more flexible view in the future, the Court in these cases holds that a newsman has no First Amendment right to protect his sources when called before a grand jury. The Court thus invites state and federal authorities to undermine the historic independence of the press by attempting to annex the journalistic profession as an investigative arm of government. Not only will this decision impair performance of the press' constitutionally protected functions, but it will, I am convinced, in the long run, harm rather than help the administration of justice.

I respectfully dissent.

The reporter's constitutional right to a confidential relationship with his source stems from the broad societal interest in a full and free flow of information to the public. It is this basic concern that underlies the Constitution's protection of a free press because the guarantee is "not for the benefit of the press so much as for the benefit of all of us."

Enlightened choice by an informed citizenry is the basic ideal upon which an open society is premised, and a free press is thus indispensable to a free society. * * As private and public aggregations of power burgeon in size and the pressures for conformity necessarily mount, there is obviously a continuing need for an independent press to disseminate a robust variety of information and opinion through reportage, investigation and criticism, if we are to preserve our constitutional tradition of maximizing freedom of choice by encouraging diversity of expression.

In keeping with this tradition, we have held that the right to publish is central to the First Amendment and basic to the existence of constitutional democracy.

A corollary of the right to publish must be the right to gather news. The full flow of information to the public protected by the free press guarantee would be severely curtailed if no protection whatever were afforded to the process by which news is assembled and disseminated. We have, therefore, recognized that there is a right to publish without prior governmental approval.

No less important to the news dissemination process is the gathering of information. News must not be unnecessarily cut off at its source, for without freedom to acquire information the right to publish would be impermissibly compromised. Accordingly, a right to gather news, of some dimensions, must exist. * * *

The right to gather news implies, in turn, a right to a confidential relationship between a reporter and his source. This proposition follows as a matter of simple logic once three factual predicates are recognized: (1) newsmen require informants to gather news; (2) confidentiality—the promise or understanding that names or certain aspects of communications will be kept off-the-record—is essential to the creation and maintenance of a news-gathering relationship with informants; and (3) the existence of an unbridled subpoena power—the absence of a constitutional right protecting, in any way, a confidential relationship from compulsory process—will either deter sources from divulging information or deter reporters from gathering and publishing information.

It is obvious that informants are necessary to the news-gathering process as we know it today. If it is to perform its constitutional mission, the press must do far more than merely print public statements or publish prepared handouts. Familiarity with the people and circumstances involved in the myriad background activities that result in the final product called "news" is vital to complete and responsible journalism, unless the press is to be a captive mouthpiece of "newsmakers."

It is equally obvious that the promise of confidentiality may be a necessary prerequisite to a productive relationship between a newsman and his informants. An officeholder may fear his superior; a member of the bureaucracy, his associates; a dissident, the scorn of majority opinion. All may have information valuable to the public discourse, yet each may be willing to relate that information only in confidence to a reporter whom he trusts, either because of excessive caution or because of a reasonable fear of reprisals or censure for unorthodox views. The First Amendment concern must not be with the motives of any particular news source, but rather with the conditions in which informants of all shades of the spectrum may make information available through the press to the public. * * *

* * *

Finally, and most important, when governmental officials possess an unchecked power to compel newsmen to disclose information received in confidence, sources will clearly be deterred from giving information, and reporters will clearly be deterred from publishing it, because uncertainty about exercise of the power will lead to "self-censorship." The uncertainty arises, of course, because the judiciary has traditionally imposed virtually no limitations on the grand jury's broad investigatory powers. See Antell, The Modern Grand Jury: Benighted Supergovernment, 51 A.B.A.J. (1965).

After today's decision, the potential informant can never be sure that his identity or off-the-record communications will not subsequently be revealed through the compelled testimony of a newsman. A public spirited person inside government, who is not implicated in any crime, will now be fearful of revealing corruption or other governmental wrong-doing, because he will now know he can subsequently be identified by use of compulsory process. The potential source must, therefore, choose between risking exposure by giving information or avoiding the risk by remaining silent.

The reporter must speculate about whether contact with a controversial source or publication of controversial material will lead to a subpoena. In the event of a subpoena, under today's decision, the newsman will know that he must choose between being punished for contempt if he refuses to testify, or violating his profession's ethics and impairing his resourcefulness as a reporter if he discloses confidential information.

Again, the common sense understanding that such deterrence will occur is buttressed by concrete evidence. The existence of deterrent effects through fear and self-censorship was impressively developed in the District Court in Caldwell. Individual reporters and commentators have noted such effects. Surveys have verified that an unbridled subpoena power will substantially impair the flow of news to the public, especially in sensitive areas involving governmental officials, financial affairs, political figures, dissidents, or minority groups that require in-depth, investigative reporting. And the Justice Department has recognized that "compulsory process in some circumstances may have a limiting effect on the exercise of First Amendment rights." No evidence contradicting the existence of such deterrent effects was offered at the trials or in the briefs here by the petitioners in Caldwell or by the respondents in Branzburg and Pappas.

The impairment of the flow of news cannot, of course, be proven with scientific precision, as the Court seems to demand. Obviously, not every news-gathering relationship requires confidentiality. And it is difficult to pinpoint precisely how many relationships do require a promise or understanding of nondisclosure. But we have never before demanded that First Amendment rights rest on elaborate empirical studies demonstrating beyond any conceivable doubt that deterrent effects exist; we have never before required proof of the exact number of people potentially affected by governmental action, who would actually be dissuaded from engaging in First Amendment activity.

Rather, on the basis of common sense and available information, we have asked, often implicitly, (1) whether there was a rational connection between the cause (the governmental action) and the effect (the deterrence or impairment of First Amendment activity) and (2) whether the effect would occur with some regularity, i.e., would not be de minimus. * * * And, in making this determination, we have shown a special solicitude towards the "indispensable liberties" protected by the First Amendment for "freedoms such as these are protected not only against heavy-handed frontal attack, but also from being stifled by more subtle government interference." Once this threshold inquiry has been satisfied, we have then examined the competing interests in determining whether there is an unconstitutional infringement of First Amendment freedoms.

Thus, we cannot escape the conclusion that when neither the reporter nor his source can rely on the shield of confidentiality against unrestrained use of the grand jury's subpoena power, valuable information will not be published and the public dialogue will inevitably be impoverished.

* * *

Accordingly, when a reporter is asked to appear before a grand jury and reveal confidences, I would hold that the government must (1) show that there is probable cause to believe that the newsman has information which is clearly relevant to a specific probable violation of law; (2) demonstrate that the information sought cannot be obtained by alternative means less destructive of First Amendment rights; and (3) demonstrate a compelling and overriding interest in the information. [Emphasis added.]

This is not to say that a grand jury could not issue a subpoena until such a showing were made, and it is not to say that a newsman would be in any way privileged to ignore any subpoena that was issued. Obviously, before the government's burden to make such a showing were triggered, the reporter would have to move to quash the subpoena, asserting the basis on which he considered the particular relationship a confidential one.

The crux of the Court's rejection of any newsman's privilege is its observation that only "where news sources themselves are implicated in crime or possess information relevant to the grand jury's task need they or the reporter be concerned about grand jury subpoenas." But this is a most misleading construct. For it is obviously not true that the only persons about whom reporters will be forced to testify will be those "confidential informants involved in actual criminal conduct" and those having "information suggesting illegal conduct by others." As noted above, given the grand jury's extraordinarily broad investigative powers and the weak standards of relevance and materiality that apply during such inquiries, reporters, if they have no testimonial privilege, will be called to give information about informants who have neither committed crimes nor have information about crime. It is to avoid deterrence of such sources and thus to prevent needless injury to First Amendment values that I think the government must be required to show probable cause that the newsman has information which is clearly relevant to a specific probable violation of criminal law.

Similarly, a reporter may have information from a confidential source which is "related" to the commission of crime, but the government may be able to obtain an indictment or otherwise achieve its purposes by subpoenaing persons other than the reporter. It is an obvious but important truism that when government aims have been fully served, there can be no legitimate reason to disrupt a confidential relationship between a reporter and his source. To do so would not aid the administration of justice and would only impair the flow of information to the public. Thus, it is to avoid deterrence of such sources that I think the government must show that there are no alternative means for the grand jury to obtain the information sought.

Both the "probable cause" and "alternative means" requirements would thus serve the vital function of mediating between the public interest in the administration of justice and the constitutional protection of the full flow of information. These requirements would avoid a direct conflict between these competing concerns, and they would generally provide adequate protection for newsmen. No doubt the courts would be required to make some delicate judgments in working out this accommodation. But that, after all, is the function of courts of law. Better such judgments, however difficult, than the simplistic and stultifying absolutism adopted by the Court in denying any force to the First Amendment in these cases.

The error in the Court's absolute rejection of First Amendment interests in these cases seems to me to be most profound. For in the name of advancing the administration of justice, the Court's decision, I think, will only impair the achievement of that goal. People entrusted with law enforcement responsibility, no less than private citizens, need general information relating to controversial social problems. Obviously, press reports have great value to government, even when the newsman cannot be compelled to testify before a grand jury. The sad paradox of the Court's position is that when a grand jury may exercise an unbridled subpoena power, and sources involved in sensitive matters become fearful of disclosing information, the newsman will not only cease to be a useful grand jury witness; he will cease to investigate and publish information about issues of public import. I cannot subscribe to such an anomalous result, for, in my view, the interests protected by the First Amendment are not antagonistic to the administration of justice. Rather, they can, in the long run, only be complementary, and for that reason must be given great "breathing space."

In deciding what protection should be given to information a reporter receives in confidence from a news source, the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed the holding of a District Court that the grand jury power of testimonial compulsion must not be exercised in a manner likely to impair First Amendment interests "until there has been a clear showing of a compelling and overriding national interest that cannot be served by alternative means." Caldwell v. United States, 434 F.2d 1081, 1086 (9th Cir. 1970). * * *

I think this decision was correct. On the record before us the United States has not met the burden which I think the appropriate newsman's privilege should require.

* * *

In the Caldwell case, the Court of Appeals further found that Caldwell's confidential relationship with the leaders of the Black Panther Party would be impaired if he appeared before the grand jury at all to answer questions, even though not privileged. On the particular facts before it, the Court concluded that the very appearance by Caldwell before the grand jury would jeopardize his relationship with his sources, leading to a severance of the news-gathering relationship and impairment of the flow of news to the public.

* * *

I think this ruling was also correct in light of the particularized circumstances of the Caldwell case. Obviously, only in very rare circumstances would a confidential relationship between a reporter and his source be so sensitive that mere appearance before the grand jury by the newsman would substantially impair his news-gathering function. But in this case, the reporter made out a prima facie case that the flow of news to the public would be curtailed. And he stated, without contradiction, that the only nonconfidential material about which he could testify was already printed in his newspaper articles.

* * *

Accordingly, I would affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals in United States v. Caldwell. In the other two cases before us, Branzburg v. Hayes and Branzburg v. Meigs, and In the Matter of Paul Pappas, I would vacate the judgments and remand the cases for further proceedings not inconsistent with the views I have expressed in this opinion.

Justice DOUGLAS, dissenting.

It is my view that there is no "compelling need" that can be shown which qualifies the reporter's immunity from appearing or testifying before a grand jury, unless the reporter himself is implicated in a crime. His immunity in my view is therefore quite complete, for absent his involvement in a crime, the First Amendment protects him against an appearance before a grand jury and if he is involved in a crime, the Fifth Amendment stands as a barrier. [Emphasis added.] Since in my view there is no area of inquiry not protected by a privilege, the reporter need not appear for the futile purpose of invoking one to each question. And, since in my view a newsman has an absolute right not to appear before a grand jury it follows for me that a journalist who voluntarily appears before that body may invoke his First Amendment privilege to specific questions. The basic issue is the extent to which the First Amendment * * * must yield to the Government's asserted need to know a reporter's unprinted information.

The starting point for decision pretty well marks the range within which the end result lies. The New York Times, whose reporting functions are at issue here, takes the amazing position that First Amendment rights are to be balanced against other needs or conveniences of government. My belief is that all of the "balancing" was done by those who wrote the Bill of Rights. By casting the First Amendment in absolute terms, they repudiated, the timid, watered-down, emasculated versions of the First Amendment which both the Government and the New York Times advances in the case.

A reporter is no better than his source of information. Unless he has a privilege to withhold the identity of his source, he will be the victim of governmental intrigue or aggression. If he can be summoned to testify in secret before a grand jury, his sources will dry up and the attempted exposure, the effort to enlighten the public, will be ended. If what the Court sanctions today becomes settled law, then the reporter's main function in American society will be to pass on to the public the press releases which the various departments of government issue.

The intrusion of government into this domain is symptomatic of the disease of this society. As the years pass the power of government becomes more and more pervasive. It is a power to suffocate both people and causes. Those in power, whatever their politics, want only to perpetuate it. Now that the fences of the law and the tradition that has protected the press are broken down, the people are the victims. The First Amendment, as I read it, was designed precisely to prevent that tragedy.

COMMENT

1. Long before courts ruled in either Caldwell or Branzburg, journalists had contended that the First Amendment implied at least a qualified or conditional right of confidentiality. For at least 100 years, reporters and editors had argued that testimony compelled to discover the identity of a source would violate their employers' rules and perhaps cause them to lose their jobs, or it would contradict their own professional codes of ethics. Self-incrimination and irrelevancy were also used as arguments to deflect subpoenas.

In the tumultuous political period between the 1968 Democratic Convention in Chicago and the Watergate scandal, a cloudburst of subpoenas hit the press. In a typical case, Will Lewis, manager of station KPFK-FM in Los Angeles, was held in contempt and jailed in 1973 for refusing to turn over to a federal grand jury the originals of a letter and tape recording sent him by two radical groups claiming to have inside information on the Patty Hearst affair.

After sixteen days in solitary confinement at Terminal Island Federal Prison, Lewis was released by Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas pending appeal. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the contempt conviction, Lewis appealed, and the U.S. Supreme Court denied review. That left Lewis with the choice of going back to jail or turning over the subpoenaed material to federal prosecutors.

Lewis chose the latter.<sup>7</sup> Other reporters have chosen either to remain in or to go back to jail.

William Farr of the Los Angeles Herald-Examiner, for example, refused to disclose to a county court judge the names of prosecution attorneys who had supplied him with a copy of a witness's deposition in the gruesome Charles Manson case, this after the judge had forbidden officers of the court to publicize the case. Farr spent two months in jail.<sup>8</sup>

Judges—especially in California it would seem—take umbrage when their direct orders are defied. In the Rosato case,<sup>9</sup> bribery-conspiracy indictments had been handed down by a Fresno County grand jury against three accused. A day before the grand jury transcripts would have become public documents, the judge sealed the record for the duration of the trial and issued a restrictive order prohibiting public communications by attorneys, parties, public officials, and witnesses. Stories replete with quotations from the sealed transcript nevertheless appeared in the Fresno Bee, and the judge demanded to know where they came from. When he asked reporters to name their sources, he was met with silence. Two reporters, the city editor, and the managing editor of the Bee were then cited for contempt.

The court's rationale was that in enforcing its power over its own officers, the concomitant interest of journalists in protecting their sources was irrelevant and the California "shield" law inapplicable. The journalists went to jail. Their sentences were upheld by the California Supreme Court, and the U.S. Supreme Court again denied review. They were released a short time later, however, when the sentencing judge decided that "they had acted in good faith and continued imprisonment would not cause them to reveal their sources."

Frequently punishment has resulted from refusals to cooperate with grand juries. In a celebrated case of yesteryear, Peter Bridge of the Newark News was jailed for three weeks because he would not reveal to a grand jury unpublished details of an interview with a state bureaucrat who alleged she had been offered a bribe. Bridge had forfeited protection under the New Jersey shield law, as it stood in 1972, by naming the source in this article. New Jersey's highest court declined to hear the case, and the U.S. Supreme Court denied a stay of his contempt sentence.<sup>10</sup>

Television news reporter Stewart Dan and cameraman Roland Barnes of WGR-TV, Buffalo, were pressed to tell a grand jury what they had seen and heard inside Attica prison during the 1971 riot. They refused, and later Dan was sentenced to thirty days in jail. Reporter Joe Pennington of KAKZ-TV, Wichita, was sentenced to sixty days for criminal contempt after he refused to turn over information believed by defendant's counsel to be relevant to the issue of guilt or innocence.<sup>11</sup>

The Meaning of BRANZBURG

In Branzburg the Court held narrowly that the First Amendment, because it is silent on the privilege, does not immunize the journalist from the ordinary duty of any citizen to respond to a grand jury subpoena seeking evidence or testimony in a criminal case. A journalist witnessing a crime, moreover, would clearly have no testimonial privilege.

In Justice White's opinion for the Court an explicit invitation was extended to Congress and the state legislatures to create, within constitutional limits, a statutory privilege. Led by Maryland in 1896, twenty-five state legislatures had done just that—six since the Branzburg decision was announced. "At the federal level," said White, "Congress has freedom to determine whether a statutory newsman's privilege is necessary and desirable * * * [and] there is also merit in leaving state legislatures free, within First Amendment limits, to fashion their own standards in light of the relations between law enforcement officials and the press in their own areas."

Pressing the latter point, White added, "It goes without saying, of course, that we are powerless to erect any bar to state courts responding in their own way and construing their constitutions so as to recognize a newsman's privilege, either qualified or absolute."

Aside from legislative resolution, Justice Stewart's arguments in his dissent for a qualified privilege, bulwarked by Justice Powell's equivocal concurrence with the majority, have come to be interpreted by lower courts as a Supreme Court preference for a qualified privilege. At least that is the direction in which the law is moving. But only a qualified privilege. Courts, legislatures, and executive agencies are not prepared to recognize an absolute privilege. In some circumstances journalists will always be required to testify or submit evidence to governmental bodies, or pay the consequences.

As long ago as 1857 a select committee of the United States House of Representatives summoned reporter James Simonton of the New York Times to reveal the sources of information for a series of articles about congressmen who appeared willing to sell their votes. Using arguments with a contemporary ring to them to defend his privilege, Simonton refused to cooperate and spent nineteen days in the custody of the House sergeant at arms.

10. In re Bridge, 295 A.2d 3 (N.J.1972), cert. den. 410 U.S. 991 (1973).

Note that none of the Court's opinions discusses the constitutional status of notes, tapes, or other raw materials of a reporter's work-a-day world. The single question, Justice White emphasized in a footnote, is "whether a newspaper reporter who has published articles about an organization can, under the First Amendment, properly refuse to appear before a grand jury investigating possible crimes by members of that organization who have been quoted in the published articles." Nor did Justice Stewart believe that a subpoena could simply be ignored.

2. Both leading opinions showed an awareness of the available empirical evidence as to the effect of subpoenas on the flow of news, whatever the quality of that evidence. In a footnote Justice Stewart responding to White's concern about the "speculative nature" of the newsman's claim, elaborated on the relationship between empirical studies and constitutional decision making:

Empirical studies, after all, can only provide facts. It is the duty of courts to give legal significance to facts; and it is the special duty of this Court to understand the constitutional significance of facts. We must often proceed in a state of less than perfect knowledge, either because the facts are murky or the methodology used in obtaining the facts is open to question. It is then that we must look to the Constitution for the values that inform our presumptions. And the importance to our society of the full flow of information to the public has buttressed this Court's historic presumption in favor of First Amendment values.

3. Justice White said that a subpoena is just another example of the application to the press of valid general laws like tax laws or labor-management laws, but these laws are enforced neutrally and impose no particular burden on First Amendment freedoms. Justice White also observed that prosecutors risk a great deal when they subpoena newsmen. Does the press, as White suggests, have powerful means of protecting itself?

What do reporters actually risk when, having assured their sources that they will go to jail rather than reveal their identities, they ignore subpoenas or refuse to testify? James Reston, perhaps facetiously, sees jail sentences as providing reporters much needed respite from the hurly-burly. But should jail be an occupational hazard of journalism?

4. Does the journalist have a right to gather information beyond that of the ordinary citizen? Justice White said that reporters have no constitutional right of access to scenes of crime or disaster. Can you visualize, as he does, reporters constituting part of a private system of informers, reporting on crime, but really quite unaccountable to the public or anyone else?

5. The greatest puzzle perhaps of the various opinions in Branzburg was presented by the dispositive concurring opinion of Justice Powell. Powell, although he joined in the result in Branzburg, did not reject a First Amendment-based qualified privilege. Powell suggested that such claims of privilege should be judged on their precise facts "by the striking of a proper balance between freedom of the press and the obligations of all citizens to give relevant testimony with respect to criminal conduct." Powell emphasized that the courts would be open to journalists "under circumstances where legitimate First Amendment interests require protection."

Why didn't Powell join the dissenters? He did not think journalists had a First Amendment right to refuse the summons of a grand jury. In other contexts, would Powell's approach then be the same as that of Justice Stewart? No. Powell's approach differed from that of Stewart. For Powell, the Stewart three-fold test placed too heavy a burden on the government. A balancing approach, on the other hand, placed the clashing and "vital constitutional and societal interests" in a more desirable state of rough equivalence.

6. Do you agree with Justice Powell that a newsman should at least appear before the grand jury and that his rights to confidentiality should be determined after questions have been put to him? In Caldwell the court emphasized that a reporter would not always be in as sensitive a relationship with his sources as was Caldwell with the Black Panthers. An interesting sidelight on the Caldwell case is the fact that the New York Times, although paying legal expenses, did not wholeheartedly support the appeal.

"We are not joining the appeal," said Managing Editor A.M. Rosenthal in a memo to his staff, "because we feel that when a reporter refuses to authenticate his story, the Times must, in a formal sense, step aside. Otherwise some doubt may be cast upon the integrity of the Times news stories." How does this square with the position of the Times in the Pentagon Papers case? In the Farber case? See text, p. 420ff.

7. Enactment of an unqualified federal shield law seems unlikely, as does the enactment of any federal shield law at all. The great surprise of the Branzburg decision was that its most influential feature has not been Justice White's plurality decision but Justice Stewart's dissent advocating a qualified First Amendment-based journalist's privilege. The Stewart approach now governs much of the law of journalist's privilege in the context of civil proceedings. The three-part test of Stewart's Branzburg dissent has thus become enormously important. Governmental demands for information from journalists should be based, Stewart said, on the following three-part test: 1) relevance to a specific probable violation of law; 2) that the information cannot be obtained by alternative means less destructive of First Amendment rights; and 3) compelling and overriding interest in the information.

The fact that the Stewart dissent has become so influential is really not that remarkable if a careful count of how the justices actually voted in Branzburg is undertaken. The plurality opinion authored by Justice White, refusing to acknowledge the existence of a First Amendment-based privilege, either absolute or qualified, in the context of the criminal grand jury, was supported by three justices in addition to Justice White. Justice Powell, however, filed a concurring opinion which did acknowledge that courts would be "available to newsmen under circumstances where legitimate First Amendment interests require protection." Two justices (Brennan and Marshall) joined Justice Stewart in his dissent in Branzburg in support of a qualified First Amendment-based journalist's privilege to be applied according to the three-part test. Justice Douglas, in a separate dissent, advocated even greater First Amendment protection in the way of a First Amendment-based privilege for journalists than that advocated by Justice Stewart. As a result, if a careful count of the justices in Branzburg is made it becomes clear that a majority were ready to support some basis in the First Amendment for the establishment of a constitutionally based journalist's privilege. The paradox, then, of Branzburg—a happy paradox for journalists—is that far from being the death knell of a First Amendment-based journalist's privilege, Branzburg, in retrospect, may be seen as having inaugurated the basis for such privilege, at least on a qualified basis.

8. When a murder defendant sought documents from reporters for the University of New Hampshire student newspaper that would have identified their sources, the state supreme court affirmed a lower court order quashing the subpoena. Even though the state had no shield law, a qualified privilege based on both the First Amendment and the state constitution was held to exist. This qualified privilege could be overcome only by the following showing on the part of the defendant: 1) exhaustion of alternative sources, 2) relevance, and 3) a reasonable probability that information sought would affect the verdict. The third qualification or condition had not been met. New Hampshire v. Siel, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1265, 444 A.2d 499 (N.H. 1982).

Variations on the three-part test are sometimes semantic. At other times, they either expand or contract the test. Where "information going to the heart of the claim" subsumes "relevance" and "compelling public need," we have a two-part test. Where the information seeker's purpose must be more than "frivolous," we may have a four-part test. In Ohio "relevance" and "exhaustion of alternate sources" are standard parts of the test, but the information seeker also must make an effort to examine a reporter's nonconfidential information first and request an in camera inspection of anything confidential. People v. Monica (Ohio Ct. of Appeals, 8th Dist., No. 39950, April 12, 1979). In Florida "less chilling" means of getting information have to be tried, and there has to be a showing that failure to produce the information sought will result in a miscarriage of justice or substantially prejudice a defendant's case. Florida v. Reid, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1249 (Fla.1982).

Washington state's qualified privilege, said to be part of its common law, at least in civil cases, requires all or part of a five-part test. The privilege can be defeated by showing that the request for information is necessary, there are no alternative sources, the purpose is non-frivolous, the reporter got the information by unacceptable means, and the source had no reasonable expectation of confidentiality. Senear v. Daily Journal-American, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1151, 641 P.2d 1180 (Wash.1982). Why do some courts rely on a common law-based privilege rather than a constitutional privilege? In West Virginia, the burden may be placed on the reporter to show harm to the news-gathering process in support of a motion to quash. Maurice v. NLRB, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2221, 691 F.2d 182 (4th Cir.1981).

9. Some of these qualifications have themselves been subject to litigation, and there have been differences of definition and application from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. On the question of the exhaustion of alternative sources, for example, Justice William Brennan granted a stay of a civil contempt conviction because he thought the information could have been obtained by "other—albeit roundabout—methods." He feared that First Amendment interests were being weighed to their detriment against the court's convenience.

The case—In re Roche, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1551, 448 U.S. 1312 (1980)—had to do with information about a state judge that led to an investigation by the Massachusetts Commission on Judicial Conduct and formal charges. Sixty-five witnesses, including Roche, a television reporter, were identified. Roche refused to identify any of his sources or disclose what they had said to him unless the judge could independently uncover them on the list, for they were on the list. A judge of Massachusetts' Supreme Judicial Court ordered Roche to testify. He refused and the full court upheld a civil contempt citation. But the citation was not based on the journalist's refusal to identify confidential sources. The court saw the central issue as whether a reporter could determine the sequence of discovery and by that means delay the release of information.

Justice Brennan granted the reporter's petition for a stay of enforcement of the Massachusetts judge's order holding him in civil contempt pending petition for writ of certiorari. Brennan described the matter as follows:

If I am correct, therefore, that a majority of the Court recognizes at least some degree of constitutional protection for newsgatherers' confidences it is reasonably probable that four of my Brothers will vote to grant certiorari, and there is a fair prospect that the Court will reverse the decision below.

Interestingly enough, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court picked up the gauntlet thrown down by Justice Brennan and subsequently upheld the Massachusetts judge's denial of the journalist's motion for a protective order against disclosure. The Massachusetts court said a protective order would only delay the disclosure of sources and thus the danger to the free flow of information was negligible. See In re Roche, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2121, 411 N.E.2d 466 (Mass.1980).

10. Justice White's opinion for the Court in Branzburg does raise at least one problem with shield laws that has not been resolved. Who is a newsman, a journalist, a reporter? Daniel Ellsberg? Underground, minority, and student editors? Pollsters, pamphleteers, book writers, free lancers, researchers? Justice White believes that shield laws require the courts to define categories of qualified, legitimate, or "respectable" newsmen, a process that offends a First Amendment tradition hostile to any form of state certification.

11. The question was put in memorable language in the case of Annette Buchanan, a college editor who on May 24, 1966 wrote a story for the University of Oregon Daily Emerald about pot smoking on the campus. The story quoted seven unidentified marijuana users under the unfortunate headline, "Students Condone Marijuana Use." A district attorney subpoenaed Buchanan, and she twice refused to identify her sources before the grand jury. She was cited for contempt, tried, and convicted. Upholding her conviction the Oregon Supreme Court addressed the problem of adjusting the definition of newsman to the implications of the First Amendment:

Assuming that legislators are free to experiment with such definitions, it would be dangerous business for courts, asserting constitutional grounds, to extend to an employe of a 'respectable' newspaper a privilege which would be denied to an employe of a disreputable newspaper; or to an episodic pamphleteer; or to a free-lance writer seeking a story to sell on the open market; or, indeed, to a shaggy nonconformist who wishes only to write out his message and nail it to a tree. If the claimed privilege is to be found in the Constitution, its benefits cannot be limited to those whose credentials may, from time to time, satisfy the government. State v. Buchanan, 436 P.2d 729 (Or.1968).

12. In September 1977, Karen Silkwood, a nuclear industry worker, died under mysterious circumstances while driving to meet a reporter to whom she apparently was to divulge information alleging unsafe working conditions at a Kerr-McGee nuclear power plant. The administrator of Silkwood's estate brought a civil action against the company claiming violation of her civil rights by conspiring to prevent her from organizing a labor union and from filing complaints against the company under the Atomic Energy Act and by willfully and wantonly contaminating her with plutonium radiation.

The company subpoenaed Arthur Hirsch, a documentarist who, while not a party to the suit, had investigated Silkwood's death and had received confidential information in the course of his filmmaking. The federal district court denied Hirsch's claim of privilege because he was not a newsman regularly engaged in obtaining, editing, or otherwise preparing news.

The Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals concluded that Hirsch was an investigative reporter as far as the film was concerned and noted that the Supreme Court had not limited the privilege to newspaper reporters. "[The Court] has in fact held that the press comprehends different kinds of publications which communicate to the public information and opinion."

The Tenth Circuit remanded the case so that the trial court could reconsider the demand to enforce the subpoena in terms of the nature of the evidence sought, its relevance and significance to the case, and the availability of alternative sources—the three-part test. On remand, Kerr-McGee formally abandoned further discovery of Hirsch and made no additional attempt to enforce its subpoena against him. Silkwood v. Kerr-McGee, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1087, 563 F.2d 433 (10th Cir.1977).

STATE SHIELD LAWS: THE STATUTORY BASIS FOR JOURNALIST'S PRIVILEGE

In the absence of either black letter common law or constitutional protection of the confidentiality of journalists' sources or the raw materials of their work, twenty-five states have passed laws extending some degree of privilege to reporters and editors. Another eleven states have recognized a common law or qualified privilege.

The shield law states are Alabama, Alaska, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Delaware, Illinois, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland,<sup>12</sup> Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey, New York, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island and Tennessee. New Mexico passed a shield law in 1975, but a year later it was declared unconstitutional by the state supreme court as an interference with judicial prerogatives concerning evidence.<sup>13</sup>

States without shield laws that have nevertheless recognized a common law or qualified privilege are Connecticut, Florida, Iowa, Kansas, New Hampshire, Texas, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, and Wisconsin. Wisconsin, for example, in 1971 implied a qualified common law privilege based upon its constitutional guarantees of freedom of speech and press. The case, State v. Knops, 183 N.W.2d 93 (Wis.1971), grew out of a grand jury investigation into the bombing of a research center on the University of Wisconsin-Madison campus in which a young research assistant was killed.

A Madison "underground" newspaper, Kaleidoscope, had printed a front page story entitled "The Bombers Tell Why and What Next—Exclusive to the Kaleidoscope." The editor, Mark Knops, was subpoenaed, appeared, asserted his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination, was granted immunity, and then pleaded that he had a First Amendment privilege against revealing his confidential informants.

Wisconsin's Supreme Court rejected his claim and upheld a contempt sentence on the ground that the answers sought carried an overriding need of the public to protect itself against attack. Relevance was discussed when the court, comparing the case with Caldwell, noted that unlike that case Knops did not face "an unstructured fishing expedition composed of questions which will meander in and out of his private affairs without apparent purpose or direction."

A telling admission was made, however, in Justice Heffernan's dissenting opinion. Could the compelling state interest in obtaining Knop's testimony have been achieved by alternative means? It was a comment on the times that, according to Heffernan, both state and federal officials had stated under oath that they knew who had bombed Sterling Hall and that federal warrants had been issued for the arrest of the suspects. Did official action in the case reflect anathema toward editor Knops and his newspaper more than a concern for criminal justice?

Seven years later in Zelenka v. Wisconsin, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 1055, 266 N.W.2d 279 (Wis.1978), the Wisconsin Supreme Court squarely based a qualified privilege on its constitutional guarantee of freedom of speech and press.

Other states citing state and/or federal constitutions as protective of the privilege are Florida,<sup>14</sup> New Hampshire,<sup>15</sup> Texas (at least by implication),<sup>16</sup> Vermont,<sup>17</sup> Virginia (First Amendment only),<sup>18</sup> and Washington (common law only).<sup>19</sup>

State shield laws, a firmer form of protection perhaps, may be written in absolute or conditional terms. But even the most absolutist privilege laws may fall before the Sixth Amendment rights of a defendant.<sup>20</sup> In civil cases absolute privilege applications are more likely to be made.<sup>21</sup> There are complex variations from state to state. One among many proposals for a federal shield law, the News Media Privacy Act of 1982 (HR 6230), would have attempted to establish some uniformity among states.

Some state laws protect unpublished information, even when the source is known.<sup>22</sup> Others do not. Some forbid in camera review in civil cases.<sup>23</sup> Others do not. Some states, Florida and Illinois for example, will not protect reporters who are defendants in libel suits. California's law has been amended to prohibit contempt citations against reporters who refuse to disclose privileged information.<sup>24</sup> This is not to suggest that California media and California courts are compatible. They have frequently been at odds, and, like most courts, California's would prefer to construe the state shield law or have it construed, as narrowly as possible. For example, in a case involving old Look magazine and a libel action against it by baseball player Orlando Cepeda, the law since amended to include magazines, was interpreted literally.

15. Opinion of the Justices, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1083, 373 A.2d 644 (N.H.1977). In Downing v. Monitor Publishing Co., 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1193, 415 A.2d 683 (N.H.1980) the New Hampshire Supreme Court decided that disclosure was required where plaintiff had no other way to demonstrate that a newspaper had reason to doubt its source under the rule of St. Amant (see text p. 217). In the absence of disclosure, the court could assume the newspaper had no source. California did the same in Rancho La Costa, Inc. v. Penthouse, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1249, 165 Cal.Rptr. 347 (1980).

NFL*, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2380, 89 F.R.D. 489 (C.D.Cal.1981); KSDO v. Riverside Superior Court, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 2360, 186 Cal.Rptr. 211 (1982).

Cepeda's petition asked that the Look writer identify San Francisco Giants officials who he alleged had defamed him. California had had a journalist's privilege law since 1965. Cepeda's attorney deftly submitted that the state statute must be strictly construed to include only "persons connected with or employed upon a newspaper or by a press association or wire service," * * * or "a radio or television news reporter. * * *" In accepting this narrow interpretation, excluding protection for magazines, the judge observed that only three of the then eleven other states with shield laws had seen fit to include "journals," "periodicals" or "other publications." He also noted that when the California law was amended to include other classes of news media, only "press association or wire service" and "radio or television news reporter" were added. And he concluded:

In the absence of specific statutory language creating it, (the privilege) should not be extended to cover other situations not specifically included in the actual terminology of the statute. Application of Cepeda, 233 F.Supp. 465 (D.C.N.Y.1964). In New York v. Le Grand, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 2524, 415 N.Y.S.2d 252 (1979), New York's statute was held not to protect book authors.

The Look magazine writer's offer to answer the question after "all possible means of eliciting that information from other sources have been exhausted" was rejected. A witness, said the court, may not decide when it will be convenient for him to make a deposition and thereby interfere with the orderly judicial process.

California's shield law did not protect William Farr while he was between newspaper jobs, even though the information he was ordered to produce was gathered while he was employed as a reporter. A New York court ruled that its law did not cover a television cameraman. In 1981, amendments extended that law's protection to freelancers, photographers, book authors, employers of journalists and non-establishment media. It also protects information not solicited by a reporter, and thereby from nonconfidential sources, and information that may be highly relevant to a judicial proceeding.<sup>25</sup> Minnesota's statute protects all persons communicating with the public. Does it trivialize the privilege to extend it to those on the periphery of public affairs?

Since sources may be inferred from a journalist's work product, the hazard of state laws that protect only sources should be recognized.<sup>26</sup> Some laws require that there be publication and an implied or express agreement of confidentiality between source and reporter for the privilege to be invoked.<sup>27</sup> The privilege may attach to a reporter but not to his or her employer.<sup>28</sup>

Obviously shield laws must be carefully drafted if they are to avoid judicial interpretations that puncture them. Minnesota's statute provides an example of both comprehensiveness, notably in its broad definition of news gatherer and its incorporation of the three-part test, and an economy of language that discourages strained constructions. Note also its exception for libel suits:

MINNESOTA FREE FLOW INFORMATION ACT

MINNESOTA STATUTES 595.021-025, 1973.

Section 1. (Citation.) Sections 1 and 4 may be cited as the Minnesota free flow of information act.

25. People v. Iannaccone, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1103, 447 N.Y.S.2d 989 (1982).

26. State v. Sheridan, 236 A.2d 18 (Md.1967); Ohio v. Geis, 7 Med.L.Rptr.1675, 441 N.E.2d 803 (Ohio 1981).

27. Lightman v. State, 294 A.2d 149 (Md.1972); Andrews v. Andreoli, 400 N.Y.S.2d 442 (1977).

28. In re Investigative File, No. 40 SPL (Mont.Dist.Ct. 10/2/78).

Sec. 2 (Public Policy.) In order to protect the public interest and the free flow of information, the news media should have the benefit of a substantial privilege not to reveal sources of information or to disclose unpublished information. To this end, the freedom of press requires protection of the confidential relationship between the news gatherer and the source of information. The purpose of this act is to insure and perpetuate, consistent with the public interest, the confidential relationship between the news media and its (sic) sources.

Sec. 3 (Disclosure Prohibited.) No person who is or has been directly engaged in the gathering, procuring, compiling, editing, or publishing of information for the purpose of transmission, dissemination or publication to the public shall be required by any court, grand jury, agency, department or branch of the state, or any of its political sub-divisions or other public body, or by either house of the legislature or any committee, officer, member, or employee thereof, to disclose in any proceeding the person or means from or through which information was obtained, or to disclose any unpublished information procured by him in the course of his work or any of his notes, memoranda, recording tapes, film or other reportorial data which would tend to identify the person or means through which the information was obtained.

Sec. 4 (Exception and Procedure.) Subdivision 1. A person seeking disclosure may apply to the district court of the county where the person employed by or associated with a news media resides, has his principal place of business or where the proceeding in which the information sought is pending.

Subd. 2. The application shall be granted only if the court determines after hearing the parties that the person making application, by clear and convincing evidence, has met all three of the following conditions:

1. that there is probable cause to believe that the source has information clearly relevant to a specific violation of the law other than a misdemeanor,

2. that the information cannot be obtained by any alternative means or remedy less destructive of first amendment rights, and

3. that there is a compelling and overriding interest requiring the disclosure of the information where the disclosure is necessary to prevent injustice.

Subd. 3. The district court shall consider the nature of the proceedings, the merits of the claims and defenses, the adequacies of alternative remedies, the relevancy of the information sought, and the possibility of establishing by other means that which the source is expected or may tend to prove. The court shall make its appropriate order after making findings of fact, which order may be appealed directly to the Supreme Court according to the appropriate rule of appellate procedure. The order is stayed and non-disclosure shall remain in full force and effect during the pendency of the appeal.

Sec. 5 (Defamation.) Subdivision 1. The prohibition of disclosure provided in Section 3 shall not apply in any defamation action where the person seeking disclosure can demonstrate that the identity of the source will lead to relevant evidence on the issue of actual malice.

Subd. 2. Notwithstanding the provisions of Subdivision 1 of this Section, the identity of the source of information shall not be ordered disclosed unless the following conditions are met:

a. that there is probable cause to believe that the source has information clearly relevant to the issue of defamation;

b. that the information cannot be obtained by any alternative means or remedy less destructive of First Amendment rights.

Subd. 3. The court shall make its order on the issue of disclosure after making findings of fact, which order may be appealed directly to the Supreme Court according to the rules of appellate procedure. During the appeal the order is stayed and nondisclosure shall remain in full force and effect.

AN EXCEPTION FOR LIBEL: THE NEW YORK TIMES DOCTRINE v. JOURNALIST'S PRIVILEGE

1. Two of the mighty currents in modern media law flow against each other in that field of litigation where the principles of New York Times v. Sullivan, text, p. 203, and the First Amendment philosophy of the Stewart dissent in Branzburg collide. In short, how can a New York Times v. Sullivan-type libel plaintiff establish "actual malice" if access to the sources and information behind a story is denied because of a journalist's First Amendment-based claim of privilege? What if a plaintiff in a libel suit can make a concrete demonstration that the identity of a news source will lead to persuasive evidence of actual malice on the part of a defendant, a showing that public officials and public figures must make in order to win damages?

Does a risk to the reporter and the news media of an exception for libel suits lie in the fact that suits may be filed primarily for the purpose of discovering the identity of confidential sources and not for compensation for damage to reputation?

These issues were joined in a suit for $2 million general and $10 million punitive damages brought by Mayor Alfonso Cervantes of St. Louis against Life magazine. The Mayor sought to identify specific FBI and Department of Justice sources which had provided information for a Life story connecting Cervantes with the underworld.

Except for the identity of sources the story was heavily documented. The Mayor took issue with only four of eighty-seven paragraphs comprising the article, but he argued that he could not prove malice if the reporter's sources remained anonymous.

"These arguments in behalf of compulsory disclosure of confidential news sources," said the U.S. Court of Appeals in a narrow ruling, "* * * do not strike us as frivolous. Especially is this so when much of the information supplied by the anonymous informants has been obtained from the private files of Government. Nevertheless, on the facts of the particular case, we believe that in his preoccupation with the identity of Life's news sources, the mayor has overlooked the central point involved in this appeal: that the depositions and other evidentiary materials comprising this record establish, without room for substantial argument, facts that entitled both defendants to judgment as a matter of law, viz., that, quite apart from the tactics employed in collecting data for the article, the mayor has wholly failed to demonstrate with convincing clarity that either defendant acted with knowledge (of falsity) or reckless disregard of the truth."

The court added that "to routinely grant motions seeking compulsory disclosure of anonymous news sources without first inquiring into the substance of a libel allegation would utterly emasculate the fundamental principles that underlay the line of cases articulating the constitutional restrictions to be engrafted upon the enforcement of state libel laws.

"Where there is a concrete demonstration that the identity of the defense news source will lead to persuasive evidence on the issue of malice, a [d]istrict [c]ourt should not reach the merits of a defense motion for summary judgment until and unless the plaintiff is first given a meaningful opportunity to cross-examine these sources, whether they be anonymous or known." Cervantes v. Time, Inc., 464 F.2d 986, 992-993 (8th Cir. 1972), cert. den. 409 U.S. 1125 (1973).

The Mayor's dilemma was not dissimilar to that of Mayor Joseph Alioto of San Francisco who sued Look magazine for a story also based on anonymous governmental files and charging personal interactions with the West Coast Mafia. See text, p. 246. Both mayors had the burden of showing that the defendants' published assertions were inherently improbable or that they in fact entertained serious doubts as to their truth, whether the sources were identified or not. Alioto would eventually succeed.

Do you consider the Cervantes ruling a fair compromise, or does it place an impossible burden upon the plaintiff in a libel suit? How does one decide when the suit is frivolous and brought simply to unearth a source who, in the case of a public official, may be someone close to him or in his employ; or when a suit is a legitimate response to an unfair and irresponsible report which perhaps has no source at all or a notoriously unreliable one?

None of the proposed federal shield statutes would confer immunity on fictitious stories because the reporter still must reveal whether she had a source. Furthermore, a motion for summary judgment filed by a newspaper in a libel suit is usually supported by a set of affidavits showing that the publisher had good reason to believe that the story was true. Where the source is confidential, a newspaper has great difficulty in making such a showing. For this reason newspapers try to avoid relying solely on confidential sources. Moreover such stories are less believable. In Cervantes, Life had corroboration for what its confidential sources had said. Under the New York Times doctrine plaintiffs would have had little probability of success. In Alioto, corroboration was missing.

Is it likely, then, that the identity of a source will be critical to many libel suits? And when the source is identified, the plaintiff must still meet the standard of New York Times. On the other hand, does journalist's privilege make a mockery of the "actual malice" requirement of the New York Times doctrine?

2. The problems that arose in Cervantes have become more critical, and there is now a significant body of case law, as the cases that follow will illustrate, grappling with the claim of journalist's privilege in libel litigation. The courts faced with the problem, have had varying reactions to it. Some have been more concerned about the erosion recognition of journalist's privilege might work on the "actual malice" standard of New York Times v. Sullivan. Others have found recognition of a qualified First Amendment-based journalist's privilege—even in public law of libel cases—to be entirely consistent with the First Amendment interest in vigorous robust debate and public criticism which led to the creation of the Sullivan doctrine in the first place.

An illustrative and significant case in this area is Carey v. Hume, 492 F.2d 631 (D.C.Cir.1974), where a qualified First Amendment-based journalist's privilege was recognized in a civil libel suit even though, on the facts of the case, the court required Jack Anderson, the journalist who had refused to identify his sources, to make disclosure. The court noted that "there may be discernible degrees of difference in the social interests attaching to the exaction of testimony in the one [civil] field as compared with the other [criminal]." Yet the court concluded "that civil litigation has its entitlements on proper occasion to the pursuit of truth wherever it may be found."

In Carey, the union official plaintiff brought an action for libel based on defendant's newspaper column report that union official had removed documents from the union president's office and then complained to the police that burglars had stolen a box full of items from the office. The court of appeals held that the district court did not abuse its discretion in requiring the journalist who wrote the item to reveal the names of eyewitnesses to the alleged removal. The libel plaintiff in Carey was bound by the standard of liability set forth in New York Times v. Sullivan. Carey gave forceful expression to the conflict which recent cases now increasingly reveal between the application of the "actual malice" standard of the Sullivan case and a qualified journalist's privilege based on the First Amendment:

"In the context of an asserted newsman's privilege to protect confidential news sources, the Sullivan rule is a source of tension. On the one hand, the Court's concern that the spectre of potential libel actions might have an inhibiting effect on the exercise of press freedom militates against compulsory disclosure of sources. Contrarily, the heavy burden of proof imposed upon the plaintiff in such a case will often make discovery of confidential sources critical to any hope of carrying that burden."

In an interesting passage, Judge McGowan rejected the idea that, with the advent of the Sullivan doctrine and its imposition of new burdens on some libel plaintiffs, the journalist's First Amendment interest in nondisclosure was the weightier interest in case of conflict:

In striking the constitutional balance contemplated in Garland [see p. 378ff], it could perhaps be argued that, although the Sullivan decision did not eliminate civil libel suits entirely, it has so downgraded their social importance that a plaintiff's interest in pressing such a claim can rarely, if ever, outweigh a newsman's interest in protecting his sources. The tenor of the Court's opinion in Sullivan may be thought to reflect an attitude toward libel actions palpably different from its approach to grand jury proceedings in Branzburg. There is, however, the matter of the Court's continuing post-Sullivan citations of Garland. This strongly suggests the continuing vitality of the latter case, and negates any inference that the Court does not consider the interest of the defamed plaintiff an important one.

In a passage that contrasts sharply with the decision of the Idaho Supreme Court in Caldero, which follows, the federal court of appeals in Carey concluded that a qualified First Amendment-based privilege endured as far as civil litigation was concerned after Branzburg:

Branzburg, in language, if not in holding, left intact, insofar as civil litigation is concerned, the approach taken in Garland. That approach essentially is that the court will look to the facts on a case-by-case basis in the course of weighing the need for the testimony in question against the claims of the newsman that the public's right to know is impaired.

The court then explained why it thought that on balance the qualified privilege protecting the journalist had to yield under the facts of Carey:

Turning to the facts of the case before us, the information sought appears to go to the heart of appellee's libel action, certainly the most important factor in Garland. It would be exceedingly difficult for appellee to introduce evidence beyond his own testimony to prove that he did not at any time of day or night over an indefinite period of several weeks, remove boxfuls of documents from the UMW offices. Even if he did prove that the statements were false, Sullivan also requires a showing of malice or reckless disregard of the truth. That further step might be achieved by proof that appellant in fact had no reliable sources, that he misrepresented the reports of his sources, or that reliance upon those particular sources was reckless.

Knowledge of the identity of the alleged sources would logically be an initial element in the proof of any of such circumstances. Although it might be possible to submit the question of malice to the jury simply on the basis of the conflicting allegations of the parties, that procedure would seem to provide the plaintiff little prospect of success in view of his heavy burden of proof. Consequently, we find that the identity of appellant's sources is critical to appellee's claim. See also, Zerilli v. Smith, 656 F.2d 705 (D.C.Cir.1981).

3. A case which contrasts sharply with Carey is Caldero v. Tribune Publishing Co., 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1490, 562 P.2d 791 (Idaho 1977), cert. den. 434 U.S. 930 (1977). In Caldero, the Idaho Supreme Court gave the opinion for the court in Branzburg a harsh reading indeed—at least from the point of view of journalist's privilege. The Caldero court apparently was of the opinion that recognition of a First Amendment-based journalist's privilege, whether absolute or qualified, was as inadmissible in civil litigation as in the grand jury context.

Michael Caldero brought a libel suit against the publisher of the Lewiston Morning Tribune. Caldero alleged that a story about him contained an "'unfair, false and malicious account'" of an incident involving Caldero while he was employed as an undercover agent for the Idaho Bureau of Narcotic Enforcement. Caldero and another agent were in the process of arresting one Booth who had tried to sell them narcotics. Johnson was a companion of Booth's. While the two agents were struggling with Booth, Johnson tried to flee the scene in an automobile. Caldero fired three shots through the windshield of Johnson's car, two of which struck and injured Johnson. More than a year later an article by reporter Jay Shelledy discussing the matter appeared in the Tribune. The article focused on the "professional propriety of Caldero's conduct." A statement in the article which was of critical importance for the fortunes of the libel suit was the following: "One police expert, in an off-the-record interview with the Tribune, said Caldero's justification for shooting didn't add up. His reasoning was derived mainly from logistical facts." The "logistical facts" were then described.

Shelledy was deposed by counsel for the plaintiff and asked questions concerning the part of the article dealing with the opinions of the "police expert." Although Shelledy answered some questions concerning his conversation with his police expert source, he refused to identify him, relying for his refusal on the First Amendment and the professional code of ethics. Reporter Shelledy was then judged in contempt and ordered jailed for thirty days. At the end of that time, the court said it would re-examine him as to the identity and source of his information. The execution of that judgment was stayed pending appeal to the Idaho Supreme Court. That Court affirmed the order, judgment, and sentence below. Contrary to the dominant theme of the civil cases dealing with whether a qualified First Amendment-based journalist's privilege had survived Branzburg, the Idaho Supreme Court concluded that "our reading of Branzburg v. Hayes, is to the effect that no newsman's privilege against disclosure of confidential sources founded on the First Amendment exists in an absolute or qualified version." The harshness of this ruling was perhaps somewhat moderated by the following statement:

The only restrictions against compelled disclosure appear to be in those cases where it is demonstrably intended to unnecessarily harass members of the news media on a broad scale by means having an unnecessary impact on protected rights of speech, press or association. Caldero v. Tribune Publishing Co., 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1490, 562 P.2d 791 (Idaho 1977), cert. denied 434 U.S. 930.

In a controversial reading of Garland v. Torre, the Idaho Supreme Court appeared to believe that Garland had rejected a First Amendment-based privilege, whether qualified or absolute. The Idaho Supreme Court made no distinction between the interest of the state in seeking information from a journalist in a criminal context with a request for disclosure from a journalist where one civil litigant is suing another. Many of the civil cases involving journalist's privilege have recognized a qualified First Amendment-based privilege in the civil area on the ground that Branzburg involved the grand jury context. The state interest in the integrity of its system of criminal justice was seen as superior to the journalist's interest in nondisclosure. In civil litigation, the strength of the state interest in requiring disclosure is seen as inferior to the First Amendment interest in nondisclosure by the journalist. The opinion in the Caldero case, however, was remarkably insensitive to the First Amendment dimensions of the journalist's interest in nondisclosure. Despite the breadth of the Caldero court's rejection of even a qualified First Amendment based journalist's privilege in civil litigation, or at least in a defamation context, the United States Supreme Court refused to review the case.

Close to the trial date the widow of the reporter's source consented to disclosure. The source was Caldero's boss.

Contemporaneous cases took a far less hostile approach to privilege claims in libel cases. For example, in Winegard v. Oxberger, 258 N.W.2d 847 (Iowa 1977), cert. den., 436 U.S. 905 (1978), the Iowa Supreme Court, even though it disallowed journalist's privilege in the particular case, recognized a variation at least of the original three-part test. The information sought, said the court, ought to be crucial, alternative sources should have been exhausted, and the purpose of the information seeker must not be "patently frivolous."

Before Herbert v. Lando<sup>29</sup> was decided by the United States Supreme Court, a qualified privilege of confidentiality for reporters and editors was increasingly assumed. That assumption also holds since Herbert v. Lando. Confidential sources cannot generally be used to support an argument by the press of "no actual malice."<sup>30</sup> If a newspaper bases its defense on confidential sources, its privilege may be waived.<sup>31</sup> But a showing by the information seeker of some or all of the three-part test will generally be prerequisite to a court order to disclose.

4. Recall Herbert v. Lando in the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.<sup>32</sup> The court's decision there gave renewed legitimacy to a qualified First Amendment-based privilege. And once again a constitutionally based assertion of journalist's privilege collided with a libel plaintiff's attempt to prove "actual malice" under the New York Times v. Sullivan standard of liability. The case arose out of an exposure on "60 Minutes" of some infirmities in Colonel Anthony Herbert's campaign to publicize war crimes committed by the American military in Vietnam. "60 Minutes" producer Barry Lando then wrote an article in the Atlantic Monthly in which he detailed some of the weaknesses in Herbert's story. Herbert responded by bring a libel suit against Lando for what was then a breathtaking $45 million. Counsel for Herbert undertook truly massive pretrial discovery, and Lando was questioned in no less than twenty-six separate pretrial depositions.

However, Lando refused to answer certain questions put to him on the ground that they impermissibly inquired into his "beliefs, opinions, intent and conclusions in preparing the program." As such, Lando contended the questions trespassed on the editorial function which was entitled to First Amendment protection. The Lando case, therefore, raised a novel problem in the collision between libel law and journalist's privilege. Lando was not protecting his sources. Instead, he was seeking to protect his role as editor.

Judge Haight for the federal district court, Herbert v. Lando, 73 F.R.D. 387 (S.D. N.Y.1977), rejected Lando's claim that he had a First Amendment right to refuse disclosure under these circumstances. The lower federal court did not see how a libel plaintiff, already bound by the rigors of the New York Times v. Sullivan standard of liability, could prove actual malice without being able to make use of the fullest discovery available to him under the rules of civil procedure. To the extent that a conclusion of whether actual malice existed turned on the defendant's state of mind, the lower federal court thought that discovery could not be thwarted by the assertion of a new qualification to the New York Times v. Sullivan standard of liability which would preclude inquiry into actual malice when such inquiry might infringe on a newly created doctrine of editorial privilege.

Chief Judge Kaufman for the Second Circuit Court of Appeals in Lando declared that press "freedom to cull information is logically antecedent and necessary to any effective exercise of the right to distribute news." Relying on Branzburg, he found that protection had been accorded by the Supreme Court to the news-gathering process. Judge Kaufman then relied on Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974) and Columbia Broadcasting System v. Democratic Na- tional Committee, 412 U.S. 94 (1973), for the proposition that the First Amendment protected the editorial process:

The unambiguous wisdom of Tornillo and CBS is that we must encourage, and protect against encroachment, full and candid discussion within the newsroom itself. In the light of these constitutional imperatives, the issue presented by this case is whether, and to what extent, inquiry into the editorial process, conducted during discovery in a New York Times v. Sullivan type libel action, impermissibly burdens the work of broadcasters and reporters.

Making clear that in his view First Amendment considerations should impact on civil discovery procedures in libel cases, Judge Kaufman sketched the broad outlines of an editorial rationale for an editorial process privilege for the media defendant in Sullivan-type libel cases:

[W]e must permit only those procedures in libel actions which least conflict with the principle that debate on public issues should be robust and uninhibited. If we were to allow selective disclosure of how a journalist formulated his judgments on what to print or not to print, we would be condoning judicial review of the editor's thought processes. Such an inquiry, which on its face would be virtually boundless, endangers a constitutionally protected realm, and unquestionably puts a freeze on the free interchange of ideas within the newsroom. A reporter or editor, aware that his thoughts might have to be justified in a court of law, would often be discouraged and dissuaded from the creative verbal testing, probing, and discussion of hypotheses and alternatives which are the sine qua non of responsible journalism. Indeed, the ratio decidendi for Sullivan's restraints on libel suits is the concern that the exercise of editorial judgment would be chilled.

Kaufman emphasized the exhaustive discovery that had already taken place: "Of course, [Herbert] has already discovered what Lando knew, saw, said and wrote during his investigation." Judge Kaufman believed that it would still be possible for a libel plaintiff in a case governed by New York Times v. Sullivan to "find that Lando acted with actual malice or in reckless disregard of the truth." But a deeper probe by use of discovery into Lando's subjective state of mind could not be permitted: "The answers [Herbert] seeks strike to the heart of the vital human component of the editorial process. Faced with the possibility of such an inquisition, reporters and journalists would be reluctant to express their doubts."

The court concluded that Lando did not have to answer the questions which he considered would impermissibly penetrate his editorial judgment: "We cannot permit inquiry into Lando's thoughts, opinions and conclusions to consume the very values which the Sullivan landmark decision sought to safeguard."

The scope of the Lando decision was left in doubt since exactly how "editorial privilege" was to be defined was left unclear. Further, the holding of the case was equally murky. Did Judge Kaufman recognize a qualified First Amendment privilege in the Lando case? Or did he create an absolute privilege? Since the journalist's judgment about which questions were editorially privileged was upheld, without a requirement of prior scrutiny by the court, the privilege created in Lando was, arguably, an absolute one. On the other hand, the Lando decision's constant references to the massive discovery that had already taken place may suggest that the editorial process privilege will be allowed to be asserted by a journalist only in a context where the discovery has been so complete that application of the actual malice standard is possible without inquiry into questions which are said to fall under a category of editorial privilege.

In a separate concurring opinion Judge Oakes described three possible solutions to the problem of the Lando case. The first option was to view the New York Times ruling as having resolved the issue of reconciling the interest of the libel plaintiff, on the one hand, and the First Amendment interest in untrammelled expression on the other. In this view, the "actual malice" standard is seen as reflecting the compromise the Court has already struck. Therefore, the media defendant would have to make any disclosure which the discovery rules permitted and which proof of the "actual malice" standard required. The second alternative would grant the libel plaintiff liberal discovery except where such discovery would unnecessarily impinge on First Amendment values. In other words, discovery would be permitted in this context only where the material sought was not otherwise available and was critical to the case. The third alternative—and the one Judge Oakes opted for—was to engraft a constitutionally based editorial function privilege on the "actual malice" standard and limit the discovery available to a libel plaintiff bound by the rigors of the "actual malice" standard to the limits set by the new privilege. This would mean that a New York Times v. Sullivan-type libel plaintiff would have to prove "actual malice" "by evidence other than that obtained through compelled disclosure at the heart of the editorial process."

Judge Oakes's approach appeared to limit the nature of proof of "actual malice" and removed the editor's state of mind from inquiry since such a line of questioning may be said to intrude on editorial judgment and decision-making. In dissent in Lando, Judge Meskill complained that the Sullivan-type libel plaintiff already had a heavy burden—he must prove "actual malice" on the part of the defendant by clear and convincing evidence. If his burden must still be sustained while inquiry into the media defendant's state of mind is off limits, the basic compromise between free expression and the reputational interest protected by the libel law has been radically revised.

Was the result in the Lando case a two-edged sword for the media? Some communication lawyers worried that the result in the case could lead to precluding any inquiry into state of mind in "actual malice" determinations. However, in some libel cases objective evidence may show reckless disregard whereas an inquiry into the journalist's state of mind may conclusively show the opposite. The Supreme Court reversed the Second Circuit. See text, p. 289.

Although the Supreme Court decision in Lando was a disappointment to the press, the consequences have not been all that bad for journalist's privilege. While there has been a resurgence in the number of subpoenas issued, in about equal numbers in criminal cases, civil cases generally, and libel cases specifically, the media win more cases than they lose. On appeal, courts are less likely now than in the past to make doctrinaire judgments against the privilege, a consequence of gradual acceptance of the three-part test and its balance of equities.

Under most court interpretations of Branzburg, state statutes, or state common law, lower courts will require disclosure in libel suits if the libel suit is valid, especially in terms of its falsity, if other possible sources have been exhausted, and if the information sought is relevant and of critical importance to the information seeker's case and so outweighs any privilege granted to the press. If the trial court is uncertain about these points, it can defer disclosure pending further discovery and the possibility of a summary judgment. It can also require the exhaustion of nonconfidential sources. It can seal notes and documents and forbid attorneys to discuss evidence with their clients. And it can limit attendance at the taking of depositions.

There may come a time when a reporter's string runs out. That person may then have to comply with the court's order or face a contempt citation. Or, if a libel suit, the reporter will be assumed to have had no source<sup>33</sup> and will be prohibited from entering any evidence of the existence of sources. The consequences may be to lose the suit by default.

5. Since the Washington Post's Janet Cooke episode, editors are looking to reporters to share information with them, especially where there is a possibility of libel. This sharing will often include the identity of sources.

Some states remain relatively absolutist in their protection of confidential sources in any legal proceeding, including libel litigation. Pennsylvania is one of them. In applying Pennsylvania's shield law in a libel action, a federal district court noted:

Pennsylvania's legislative determination to grant almost absolute protection to a reporter from disclosure of his source impinges upon no constitutionally protected right. * * * The legislature's decision then to favor the public's interest in access to information over an individual's [s]tate common law right to vindicate his reputation is a matter over which the [s]tate has almost complete control and in the circumstances of this case has exercised in a manner adverse to plaintiff's interests. Mazzella v. Philadelphia Newspapers, 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1983, 479 F.Supp. 523 (E.D.N.Y.1979).

JOURNALIST'S PRIVILEGE IN THE CRIMINAL CONTEXT

1. Consistent with Branzburg, a journalist who witnesses a crime remains highly vulnerable to subpoena. Typically, a trial court in Pankratz v. Colorado District

33. DeRoburt v. Gannett, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2473, 548 F.Supp. 1370 (D.Haw.1981).

Court, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1269, 609 P.2d 1101 (Colo.1980), held that there were no state or federal constitutional or common law privileges when a witness observes a crime. While a common law and/or a three-part test may be argued, chances are the reporter will have to comply.

2. Reporters called to testify before grand juries will also rely on the three-part test, on state and federal constitutions, and on state and federal common law in support of motions to quash. In addition they may interpose state shield laws in those states that have passed them, and the state laws may be influential in federal cases. Grand jury subpoenas may also be attacked on grounds of overbreadth, prematurity, duplication, and harassment. The Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination may be asserted in appropriate cases, although a grant of immunity will negate it.

In federal cases the Justice Department's Guidelines on News Media Subpoenas<sup>34</sup> and the Federal Rules of Evidence may be added to the list. The Guidelines attempt to strike a balance between news flow and justice, between negotiation and demand, especially where a reporter's telephone toll records are being sought.<sup>35</sup> In such cases the express authorization of the attorney general is required. In every case involving the news media, alternative sources are to be pursued. In at least one 1982 case a subpoena was quashed because the guidelines were not followed.<sup>36</sup>

vant evidence or quash subpoenas designed to collect that evidence, if it is needlessly cumulative.<sup>37</sup> Rule 501 provides for federal court recognition of state law. It would also permit application of a federal common law journalist's privilege where there is no state law or the state law is weak. It has been held, however, that where the state law provides greater protection for the reporter's privilege than the common law or the First Amendment, Branzburg requires that state law govern the case.<sup>38</sup>

Under rule 17(c) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure only "evidentiary materials" may be subpoenaed, in other words, material that would be admissible at trial. States may have analogous rules of criminal procedure. The case which follows illustrates the application of rule 17(c) and the impediment that the Sixth Amendment right of "compulsory process for obtaining witnesses" poses to a federal shield law and to the concept of journalist's privilege generally.

The case, known as Cuthbertson I and Cuthbertson II, involved CBS "60 Minutes" outtakes and transcripts of interviews with trial witnesses which had been subpoenaed by defendants in their criminal fraud and conspiracy trial. What follows is an edited version of Cuthbertson II.

38. Mazzella v. Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc., 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1983, 479 F.Supp. 523 (E.D.N.Y.1979).

Because the facts are detailed in Cuthbertson I, we need set forth only a synopsis. On December 3, 1978, CBS presented on its news program "60 Minutes" an investigative report describing fast-food franchising by an organization known as Wild Bill's Family Restaurants. The report was based on interviews with a number of persons, including certain franchisees and former employees of Wild Bill's, and local government officials. On September 5, 1979, a federal grand jury returned an indictment against several principals of Wild Bill's charging them with fraud and conspiracy in the operation of the company. On February 4, 1980, on the eve of trial, the defendants served on CBS a subpoena pursuant to rule 17(c) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure demanding production of all reporters' notes, file "out takes," audiotapes, and transcripts of interviews prepared in connection with the "60 Minutes" program. The district court's denial of CBS' motion to quash the subpoena and its subsequent order holding CBS in contempt were before us in the previous appeal.

In Cuthbertson I, we held that "journalists possess a qualified privilege not to divulge confidential sources and not to disclose unpublished information in their possession in criminal cases." 630 F.2d at 147. We recognized that "compelled production of a reporter's resource materials can constitute a significant intrusion into the newsgathering and editorial processes." Id. We concluded that this qualified privilege may be superseded by "countervailing interests" in particular cases, requiring the district courts to "balance the defendant's need for the material against the interests underlying the privilege . . . ." Id. at 148.

We also established guidelines for the district courts to use in applying rule 17(c) to subpoenas duces tecum directed to third parties. Rule 17(c) was not intended to be a broad discovery device, and only materials that are "admissible as evidence" are subject to subpoena under the rule. See Bowman Dairy Co. v. United States, 341 U.S. 214, 221 (1951). To obtain pretrial production and inspection of unprivileged materials from a third party witness, a party must show:

(1) that the documents are evidentiary and relevant; (2) that they are not otherwise procurable reasonably in advance of trial by exercise of due diligence; (3) that the party cannot properly prepare for trial without such production and inspection in advance of trial and that the failure to obtain such inspection may tend unreasonably to delay the trial; and (4) that the application is made in good faith and is not intended as a general "fishing expedition." 630 F.2d at 145 (quoting United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 699-700 (1974)). * * *

Because the district court had ordered in camera review rather than presentation to the moving party, however, we deemed the second and third elements of this test inapplicable. 630 F.2d at 145.

Defendants had requested previous statements by persons whose names did not appear on the government's witness list as well as statements by persons whose names did appear. They asserted no basis for admissibility of the non-witness statements other than a hope that they would contain some exculpatory material. Accordingly, we held the district court's order to be invalid under rule 17(c) to the extent it sought non-witness material. 630 F.2d at 146. We found, however, that statements of persons on the government's witness list may be inconsistent with trial testimony and admissible for impeachment purposes. 630 F.2d at 144. We recognized that "because such statements ripen into evidentiary material for purposes of impeachment only if and when the witness testifies at trial, impeachment statements, although subject to subpoena under rule 17(c), generally are not subject to production and inspection by the moving party prior to trial." Id.

Nevertheless, because in camera review would aid the district court's trial preparation, we held that the district court's order to produce statements by witnesses for in camera inspection before trial was not an abuse of discretion under rule 17(c). Id. at 145.

After remand from this court, CBS submitted to the district court for in camera review transcripts and audio tapes of three interviews with two persons whose names appear on the government witness list. After some skirmishing over and a hearing on related matters, the court ruled that the witness statements would materially aid the defendants and therefore would be turned over to them before trial under the rationale of Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963).

The present conflict emerged from that decision. This court had approved in camera inspection of witness statements for the purpose of deciding whether they would have impeachment value; if so, they could be turned over to the defendants during the trial after the particular government witness had testified. On remand, however, the district court determined that these statements could be turned over to the defendants after commencement of trial but before the witnesses testified because they qualified as exculpatory evidence. It entered an order on March 24, 1981, directing disclosure of the materials to defendants on March 30, 1981. The district court's ruling is the subject of the appeal at No. 81-1467 and the mandamus petition at No. 81-1470. On March 25, Judge Gibbons granted a stay of the order, and on March 28, a motions panel consisting of Chief Judge Seitz and Judge Adams extended the stay pending a decision on the merits. The other petition for writ of mandamus, at No. 81-1485, challenges the district court's ruling of March 23, 1981, which required CBS to submit certain non-witness material to enhance intelligibility of the witness statements. Although no formal order directing this submission has been filed, CBS filed this second petition for writ of mandamus on March 28.

[There follows a discussion on the technicalities of appellate jurisdiction and review.] * * *

In Cuthbertson I, CBS sustained a contempt citation by refusing to comply with a subpoena. On appeal, we also ordered CBS to submit some documents to the district court for in camera review, and the Supreme Court denied defendants' petition for a writ of certiorari. After denial of the petition for writ of certiorari, CBS had no alternative but to comply by submitting the documents. CBS is not challenging, and indeed under the law of the case it is foreclosed from challenging, the order to submit the witness materials to the district court for an in camera inspection. Other issues regarding actual disclosure of the materials to the defendants and use of the materials at trial had not yet arisen at the time of the first appeal, and therefore were not before this court.

We conditioned our mandate, however, by limiting in camera inspection to examination of the documents to determine their possible value in impeaching government witnesses. Only after the district court had the materials in its possession did it announce its intention to allow the defendants to examine them prior to the witnesses' trial testimony. Because the trial court was already in possession of the materials as a result of the earlier appeal, it was impossible for CBS to generate an appealable order by resisting production and incurring contempt sanctions.

In the absence of the more lenient methods of appealing interlocutory orders available to civil litigants under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) and Fed.R.Civ.P. 54(b), a steadfast requirement that CBS incur contempt before appealing would foreclose it from obtaining review of important issues likely to arise after it submits the documents to the district court. Such a rule would be disadvantageous both to CBS and to the development of this uncertain area of the law. In addition, an invariable requirement of a contempt citation as a ticket to appellate review would work at cross purposes with our earlier admonition that "trial courts should be cautious to avoid an unnecessary confrontation between the courts and the press." Riley v. City of Chester, 612 F.2d 708, 718 (3d Cir.1979). * * We therefore conclude that the district court's order releasing these materials to defendants was a final order for purposes of appeal. We now address the merits of the CBS appeal.

CBS contends that the materials do not qualify as exculpatory evidence retrievable under rule 17(c), and that the defendants have not met the standards for compelling disclosure of press materials under our decisions in Riley, Cuthbertson, and Criden [see this text, p. 533] because they have not demonstrated that this privileged material is the only source of the desired information. We agree on both points.

Rule 17(c) provides:

A subpoena may also command the person to whom it is directed to produce the books, papers, documents or other objects designated therein. The court on motion made promptly may quash or modify the subpoena if compliance would be unreasonable or oppressive. The court may direct that books, papers, documents or objects designated in the subpoena be produced before the court at a time prior to the trial or prior to the time when they are to be offered in evidence and may upon their production permit the books, papers, documents or objects or portions thereof to be inspected by the parties and their attorneys.

The Supreme Court has determined that a rule 17(c) subpoena reaches only evidentiary materials. "In short, any document or other materials, admissible as evidence, obtained by the Government by solicitation or voluntarily from third persons is subject to subpoena." Bowman Dairy Co. v. United States, 341 U.S. at 221 (emphasis added). The Court extended the admissibility requirement of rule 17(c) to materials held by third parties in United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. at 699-700, 699 n. 12. See also United States v. Iozia, 13 F.R.D. 335, 338, 340-41 (S.D.N.Y.1952). Neither the government nor the defendants have explained how the CBS materials could be admissible as evidence, unless the interviewees testified and made inconsistent statements.

We believe that the basic error of the district court in its discussion of the statements' potential lay in its failure to discriminate between potential exculpatory material in the possession of the prosecution, generally available under the teachings of Brady v. Maryland, and exculpatory evidence in the possession of third parties. Only the latter is retrievable under a rule 17(c) subpoena; naked exculpatory material held by third parties that does not rise to the dignity of admissible evidence simply is not within the rule. That is the teaching of Bowman Dairy and Nixon, and we applied it in Cuthbertson I.

The appellees in this case have not demonstrated, nor does our research disclose, any potential use of the present materials as evidence in the trial other than for purposes of impeachment. On their face, these materials are simply hearsay. Neither the government nor defendants have asserted a relevant exception to the hearsay rule. See Fed.R.Ev. 802. Only after a witness has testified will his prior inconsistent statement cease to be hearsay, see Fed.R.Ev. 801(c), but we are unable to speculate on the likelihood of that occurrence.

Accordingly, as a matter of law the materials may not be obtained at this time by a rule 17(c) subpoena. Because the district court's in camera possession is based on the necessity of evaluating the material against the evidentiary requirement of rule 17(c), it may not release the material to the parties unless that requirement is met. It failed to make such a determination of admissibility in this case, and we therefore reverse its order releasing the materials to the defendants.

We also reverse the district court's order for a separate and independent reason. We are persuaded that the defendants failed to meet the test consistently announced in this court's Riley-Cuthbertson-Criden trilogy of fair trial-free press cases. We have held that to overcome the media's federal common law qualified privilege the seeker of the information must demonstrate that his only practical means of access to the information sought is through the media. In our most recent decision in the reporters' privilege context, United States v. Criden, 633 F.2d 346 (3d Cir.1980), cert. denied sub nom. Schaffer v. United States, U.S., 49 U.S.L.W. 3512 (Jan. 20, 1981), we reviewed our prior decisions in Cuthbertson I and Riley and cited three criteria that must be met before a reporter may be compelled to disclose confidential information:

First, the movant must demonstrate that he has made an effort to obtain the information from other sources. Second, he must demonstrate that the only access to the information sought is through the journalist and her sources. Finally, the movant must persuade the Court that the information sought is crucial to the claim, 633 F.2d at 358-359.

In this case, the identities of the possible witnesses are available from the witness list. The statements were made by franchisees and potential franchisees, with whom the defendants have had business relationships. Defense counsel have conceded that "[w]e know because of the dealings that the defendants have had with all the franchisees, who all of these people are."

Appellees have not indicated, and we do not perceive, why the defendants may not themselves interview these same interviewees, whose identities they know, to obtain the desired information. In contrast, the defendants in Criden had already cross-examined the self-avowed source, and the testimony of the reporter in that case was relevant to the source's credibility. In this case, the sources have not yet testified. If their testimony at trial differs from their statement to CBS, the defendants will have the opportunity to obtain the materials for impeachment purposes. As we have heretofore observed in this respect, prior statements of prospective witnesses are "unique bits of evidence that are frozen at a particular place and time." Cuthbertson I, 630 F.2d at 148.

Accordingly, even if the defendants could have met the requirements under rule 17(c), the materials would not be available to defendants in this case because defendants failed to prove an element necessary to overcome the media's qualified privilege: that the only practical access to the information sought is through the media source.

Our conclusion that the evidentiary potential of the witness statements will arise only when the witnesses testify governs our disposition of the second petition for writ of mandamus, at No. 81-1485. It is our understanding that, at the time the second petition was filed in this court, no formal order on this issue had been entered by the district court. * * * Moreover, the threshold determination giving rise to the appeal and the first petition—that the materials contain exculpatory information to which defendants are entitled—was not made with regard to the non-witness materials. Therefore, the second petition for writ of mandamus is not ripe, and we need not now address it.

Accordingly, in appeal No. 81-1467, the district court's order of March 24, 1981, releasing the witness materials to the defendants, will be reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. In No. 81-1470, the petition for writ of mandamus will be dismissed as moot; in No. 81-1485, the petition for writ of mandamus will be dismissed as not ripe.

COMMENT

Essentially the Third Circuit reversed the federal district court order that tapes which would materially aid defendants be conveyed to defendants prior to trial because there had been no showing that 1) the tapes would be admissible at trial as required by Rule 17(c) and 2) that alternate sources had been exhausted. Clearly the court recognized a qualified journalist's privilege.

An earlier state case running somewhat parallel to Cuthbertson II was Brown v. Commonwealth of Virginia, 204 S.W.2d 429, (Va.1974) cert. den. 419 U.S. 966. In Brown, it was held that the journalist's claim that a First Amendment privilege protected his confidential sources could be pierced in the following circumstances: If there were reasonable grounds to believe that information in a journalist's possession was "material to proof of a criminal offense, or to proof of the defense asserted by the defendant, or to a reduction in the classification or gradation of the offense charged, or to a mitigation of the penalty attached, [or] the defendant's need to acquire such information is essential to a fair trial; when such information is not otherwise available, the defendant has a due process right to compel disclosure of such information and the identity of the source and any privilege of confidentiality claimed by the newsman must, upon pain of contempt, yield to that right."

In Brown, the information sought from a journalist by the defense concerned inconsistent statements of a prosecution witness. The state court in Brown had required that the information sought be "essential" if the First Amendment-based journalist's privilege was to be put aside. The information sought in Brown was held by the court to be nonessential:

(T)he record fails to show that either the statements made at trial or the prior statements were material to proof of the crime, to proof of Brown's defense, or to a reduction in the classification or penalty of the crime charged. Since the inconsistent statements were collateral and not material, the identity of the source was irrelevant.

As a result, the Virginia Supreme Court ruled that the trial court did not err when it declined to compel disclosure. The Brown case has been summarized as follows:

In Brown, the court thus adopted an "essentiality" test based upon (1) a determination whether information sought was material to the disposition of the guilt or innocence of the accused, and (2) whether there were alternative sources available. Again, no specific mention was made of Justice Stewart's additional (or third) requirement that there be a compelling interest for disclosure. Perhaps, this was included in the "materiality" requirement. Perhaps, the Sixth Amendment rights of the accused to all evidence in his favor were simply assumed to satisfy in themselves the compelling interest standard. The court does indicate that the defendant's interests in obtaining evidence in his favor "are rights of no less dignity than the right of the government to prosecute". See Barron and Dienes, Handbook of Free Speech and Free Press 447 (1979).

Similarly, in State of Vermont v. St. Peter, 315 A.2d 254 (Vt.1974), a television news reporter was held to be entitled to refuse to answer questions put to him in a deposition proceeding in a criminal case "unless the interrogator can demonstrate to the judicial officer appealed to that there is no other adequately available source for the information and that it is relevant and material on the issue of guilt or innocence." As these cases illustrate, a qualified First Amendment privilege survived Branzburg, following the rough outlines of Justice Stewart's Branzburg dissent, in spite of the unequivocal dictates of the Sixth Amendment.

3. In jurisdictions less sympathetic to a journalist's privilege—notably California and New York—neither state shield laws nor the First Amendment will protect the privilege in all circumstances. Recall that in the Rosato case (this text, p. 396) a judge anxious to learn who had defied his orders not to discuss a case would recognize neither a privilege for unpublished information nor the idea of having first to exhaust alternative sources, although the former is clearly protected by the California statute.

Similarly in CBS v. Superior Court, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 1568, 149 Cal.Rptr. 421 (1978), the California Court of Appeal would not protect "60 Minutes" outtakes showing negotiations for narcotics sales between defendants and undercover agents because the identities of the officers had been revealed at a hearing on a motion to quash the subpoena. This is sometimes called the "exposure to view" theory: reveal part of your confidential information and you reveal it all. The court, balancing First and Sixth Amendment rights, ordered in camera inspection.

Sometimes the balance tips the other way. In United States v. Burke, 7 Med.L. Rptr. 2019 (E.D.N.Y.1981), a federal court, under color of state law, thought that the "integrity of [Sports Illustrated's] news-gathering and editorial functions" outweighed the defendant's Sixth Amendment right to the "broadest possible opportunity to cross-examine adverse witnesses." The case revolved around a nonconfidential participant in a college sports point-shaving scandal. Defendant failed to meet the three-part test for what the court said was a qualified First Amendment privilege. The magazine reporter was required to testify after his witness-source had testified, but he did not have to submit any of his work product.

In the "Abscam" cases the question of the role played by investigative reporters in bringing indictments against defendants came up again, as it had in the Farber case which follows. At an early stage in the investigation, NBC and newspapers in New York and Philadelphia were privy to prosecutorial strategies in the cases. Defendants wanted to know more about the relationship between press and prosecutors and were able to support their requests for subpoenas ad testificandum by meeting the conditions of the three-part test. Justice Department employees were subsequently punished for disclosures made to the press, but reporter testimony was held to a minimum. In re Schaffer, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1554 (E.D.Pa.1980), affirmed sub nom. United States v. Criden, 6 Med.L. Rptr. 1993, 633 F.2d 346 (3d Cir. 1980), cert. den., 449 U.S. 1113 (1981).

The Special Case of New Jersey: In Re Farber

A much publicized case for a time sounded a retreat from the effort to erect a qualified First Amendment privilege on the ashes of the plurality opinion in Branzburg. This was the famous Farber case.<sup>39</sup> Investigative work of New York Times reporter, Myron Farber, led to the indictment and prosecution of Dr. Mario E. Jascalevich for murder. Jascalevich subpoenaed Farber's notes on the ground that this might enable him to establish his innocence. Farber and his employer, the New York Times, contended that its subpoena was overbroad and that the material sought was privileged under both the new New Jersey and New York shield laws and the First Amendment. The trial judge ruled that the notes in controversy were "necessary and material." Farber and the New York Times requested a hearing to air their arguments that the material sought was privileged prior to having to produce it. The trial court judge, William Arnold, rejected this request and ordered that the subpoenaed material be produced for in camera inspection by the court.

39. Farber, "Somebody is Lying": The Story of Dr. X (1982).

Farber and the Times sought unsuccessfully to stay the trial judge's order for in camera or private inspection of Farber's notes in the New Jersey state courts. Both Justices White and Marshall separately declined to stay the trial court's order requiring compliance with the subpoena. Judge Trautwein then determined that Judge Arnold's order for in camera inspection had been "willfully condemned" and found Farber and the Times guilty as charged.

Judge Trautwein imposed a $100,000 fine on the New York Times and ordered Myron Farber to serve six months in the Bergen County jail and to pay a fine of $1,000. In addition, a fine of $5,000 for every day that Judge Arnold's production order was disobeyed was imposed on the Times. Farber was confined to the Bergen County jail for forty days. The Times and Farber then sought and obtained review of the judgments of civil and criminal contempt against them for their contumacy in refusing to comply with the subpoenas issued against them. The New Jersey Supreme Court affirmed the judgments below. See In re Farber, 394 A.2d 330 (N.J. 1978).

The New Jersey Supreme Court, per Justice Fountain, rejected the contention that the New York Times and Myron Farber had a "privilege to remain silent with respect to confidential information and the sources of such information by virtue of the First Amendment.

"In our view the Supreme Court of the United States (in Branzburg) has clearly rejected this claim and has squarely held that no such First Amendment right exists." At the same time, it was conceded that "despite the holding in Branzburg, those who gather and disseminate news are by no means without First Amendment protections." Among these protections was the right to refrain from revealing sources except upon legitimate "demand."

What was illegitimate demand? "Demand is not legitimate when the desired information is patently irrelevant to the needs of the inquirer or his needs are not manifestly compelling." However, among the protections afforded by the First Amendment to the press, "there is not to be found the privilege of refusing to reveal relevant and confidential information and its sources to a grand jury." The New Jersey Supreme Court concluded as follows:

The important and conclusive point is that five members of the Court [in Branzburg] have all reached the conclusion that the First Amendment affords no privilege to a newsman to refuse to appear before a grand jury and testify as to relevant information he possesses, even though in so doing he may divulge confidential sources. The particular path that any Justice may have followed becomes unimportant when once it is seen that a majority has reached the same destination.

Thus, we do no weighing or balancing of societal interests in reaching our determination that the First Amendment does not afford appellants the privilege they claim. The weighing and balancing has been done by a higher court. Our conclusion that appellants cannot derive the protection they seek from the First Amendment rests upon the fact that the ruling in Branzburg is binding upon us and we interpret it as applicable to, and clearly including, the particular issue framed here. It follows that the obligation to appear at a criminal trial on behalf of a defendant who is enforcing his Sixth Amendment rights is at least as compelling as the duty to appear before a grand jury.

The New Jersey Supreme Court's decision in Farber was hard to evaluate. Unlike the cases discussed earlier, it appeared to take the position that no First Amendment-based newsman's privilege may ever attach in a grand jury context or where a criminal defendant seeks information from a reporter relevant to his case. The New Jersey court stressed that in its view a majority of the United States Supreme Court in Branzburg declined to take a balancing approach in the criminal context. In this situation, the New Jersey Supreme Court considered Justices White and Powell to be in agreement.

At the same time, the New Jersey Supreme Court emphasized that the journalist's duty to provide information to a grand jury, spoken of in Branzburg, related to "relevant information he possesses." If we speak of "relevant" information, isn't the implication that a privilege would attach to information sought which would not be "relevant?"

A fascinating aspect of the Farber case was that it presented a direct clash between the state and federal constitutions and the state shield law. The New Jersey Supreme Court described its shield law, N.J.S.A., 2A:84A-21 and 21A, as one which was "as strongly worded as any in the country." Approached as a matter of statutory construction, the "appellants come fully within the literal language of the enactment." But it was successfully argued in Farber that if the shield law was enforced, the Sixth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution as well as Art. I, § 110 of the New Jersey Constitution would be violated:

Essentially, the argument is this: The Federal and State Constitutions each provide that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall have the right "to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor." Dr. Jascalevich seeks to obtain evidence to use in preparing and presenting his defense in the ongoing criminal trial in which he has been accused of multiple murders. He claims to come within the favor of these constitutional provisions—which he surely does. Finally, when faced with the shield law, he invokes the rather elementary but entirely sound proposition that where Constitution and statute collide, the latter must yield. Subject to what is said below, we find this argument unassailable.

An important part of the decision of the New Jersey Supreme Court involved its rejection of the contention of Farber and the Times that permitting in camera inspection by the trial court of the information in controversy would be a violation of the shield law. While agreeing with Farber and the Times that "they are entitled to a full hearing on the issues of relevance, materiality, and overbreadth of the subpoena," the New Jersey Supreme Court defended preliminary in camera inspection of the information "to determine whether, and if so to what extent, the statutory privilege must yield to the defendant's constitutional rights: * * * Judge Arnold refused to give ultimate rulings with respect to relevance and other preliminary matters until he had examined the material. We think he had no other course. It is not rational to ask a judge to ponder the relevance of the unknown."

The appellants had objected that the subpoena was vague and uncertain and that the data sought under it might not be relevant and material. This was all the more reason "for the trial court to inspect in camera the subpoenaed items." The court then pivoted in the direction of the appellants by saying that they, and others who might be similarly situated in the future, "were entitled to a preliminary determination by the trial judge before they would have to submit subpoenaed materials to the trial judge for inspection."

IN RE FARBER

394 A.2D 330 (N.J.1978)

FOUNTAIN, J.

While we agree, then, that appellants should be afforded the hearing they are seeking, one procedural aspect of which calls for their compliance with the order for in camera inspection, we are also of the view that they, and those who in the future may be similarly situated, are entitled to a preliminary determination before being compelled to submit the subpoenaed materials to a trial judge for such inspection. Our decision in this regard is not, contrary to the suggestion in some of the briefs filed with us, mandated by the First Amendment; for in addition to ruling generally against the representatives of the press in Branzburg, the Court particularly and rather vigorously, rejected the claims there asserted that before going before the grand jury, each of the reporters, at the very least, was entitled to a preliminary hearing to establish a number of threshold issues. Rather, our insistence upon such a threshold determination springs from our obligation to give as much effect as possible, within ever-present constitutional limitations, to the very positively expressed legislative intent to protect the confidentiality and secrecy of sources from which the media derive information. To this end such a determination would seem a necessity.

The threshold determination would normally follow the service of a subpoena by a defendant upon a newspaper, a reporter or other representative of the media. The latter foreseeably would respond with a motion to quash. If the status of the movant—newspaper or media representative—were not conceded, then there would follow the taking of proofs leading to a determination that the movant did or did not qualify for the statutory privilege. Assuming qualification, it would then become the obligation of the defense to satisfy the trial judge, by a fair preponderance of the evidence including all reasonable inferences, that there was a reasonable probability or likelihood that the information sought by the subpoena was material and relevant to his defense, that it could not be secured from any less intrusive source, and that the defendant had a legitimate need to see and otherwise use it.

The manner in which the obligation of the defendant is to be discharged in the proceedings leading to this threshold determination will depend largely upon the facts of the particular case. We wish to make it clear, however, that this opinion is not to be taken as a license for a fishing expedition in every criminal case where there has been investigative reporting, nor as permission for an indiscriminate rummaging through newspaper files.

Although in this case the trial judge did not articulate the findings prescribed above, it is perfectly clear that on the record before him a conclusion of materiality, relevancy, unavailability of another source, as well as need was quite inescapable. A review of the record in the exercise of our original jurisdiction, reveals that the knowledge possessed by the trial judge and the material before him at the time he made his determination to conduct an in camera inspection afforded a more than adequate factual basis upon which to rest a conclusion that the threshold prerequisites set forth above were in fact fully met. We deem it quite unnecessary to remand the case in order to have the judge set forth formally what we find to be abundantly clear. We set forth below our reasons for this conclusion.

As of June 30, 1978, the date of the challenged decision to examine the materials in camera, Judge Arnold had been trying the case for about 18 weeks. He had dealt with earlier pretrial motions. His knowledge of the factual background and of the part Farber had played was intimate and pervasive. Perhaps most significant is the trial court's thorough awareness of appellant Farber's close association with the Prosecutor's office since a time preceding the indictment. This glaring fact of their close working relationship may well serve to distinguish this case from the vast majority of others in which defendants seek disclosure from newsmen in the face of the shield law. Two and a half months before his June 30th decision, Judge Arnold observed,

The facts show that Farber has written articles for the New York Times about this matter, commencing in January 1976. According to an article printed in the New York Times (hereinafter the Times) on January 8, 1976, Farber showed Joseph Woodcock, the Bergen County Prosecutor at that time, a deposition not in the State's file and provided additional information that convinced the prosecution to reopen an investigation into some deaths that occurred at Riverdell Hospital. [Emphasis added.] [State v. Jascavevich; In the Matter of the Application of Myron Farber and the New York Times Company re: Sequestration, 158 N.J. Super. 488, 490 (Law Div. 1978).]

And

The court has examined the news stories in evidence and they demonstrate exceptional quality, a grasp of intricate scientific knowledge, and a style of a fine journalist. They, also, demonstrate considerable knowledge of the case before the court and deep involvement by Farber, showing his attributes as a first-rate investigative reporter. [Emphasis added.] However, if a newspaper reporter assumes the duties of an investigator, he must also assume the responsibilities of an investigator and be treated equally under the law, unless he comes under some exception. [Id. at 493-94.]

In the same vein is a letter before the trial court dated January 14, 1977 from Assistant Prosecutor Moses to Judge Robert A. Matthews, sitting as a Presiding Judge in the Appellate Division, undertaking to explain "how the investigation, from which the [Jascavevich] indictment resulted, came to be reopened." In the course of that explanation it is revealed that sometime in the latter part of 1975 "a reporter for the New York Times began an investigation into the 1965-66 deaths and circumstances surrounding them. The results of the New York Times inquiry were made available to the Prosecutor. It was thus determined that there were certain items which were not in the file of the Prosecutor." [Emphasis added.]

Further support for the determination that there is a reasonable probability that the subpoenaed materials meet the test formulated above appears in the * * * factual circumstances pointed to by the defendant and supported by documents and transcripts of testimony found in the appendix filed by the defendant. * * *

We hasten to add that we need not, and do not, address (much less determine) the truth or falsity of these assertions. The point to be made is that these are the assertions of the criminal defendant supported by testimonial or documentary proof; and based thereon it is perfectly clear that there was more than enough before Judge Arnold to satisfy the tests formulated above. Of course all of this information detailed above has long been known to appellants. Accordingly we find that preliminary requirements for in camera inspection have been met.

We have considered appellants' other contentions as to lack of jurisdiction and the like. So far as they are relevant to the matters herein decided we find them to lack merit.

The judgment of conviction of criminal contempt and that in aid of litigant's rights are affirmed. Stays heretofore entered are vacated effective as of 4:00 p.m., Tuesday September 26, 1978.

COMMENT

1. Chief Justice Hughes, concurring, characterized the press claim that in camera inspection of the material sought should not be permitted as follows:

Their claim to a final adjudication without an in camera scrutiny by the court upon which to base its decision would project the absurd proposition that the press, and not the courts should be the final arbiter of the constitutional mandate.

2. Justice Pashman, in a strong dissent, rejected the New Jersey Supreme Court's "assertion that appellants were indeed accorded a due process hearing prior to an in camera hearing. * * *" Pashman contended that "appellants were to be afforded an opportunity to contest the legality of in camera disclosure only after the materials had been so disclosed." Pashman continued:

Farber has therefore never received the hearing to which he is constitutionally entitled. I find it totally unimaginable that the majority can even consider allowing a man to be sent to jail without a full and orderly hearing at which to present his defenses. Mr. Farber probably assumed, as did I, that hearings were supposed to be held and findings made before a person went to jail and not afterwards.

Pashman's dissent also referred to a much publicized aspect of the Farber case. Farber was writing a book on the Jascalevich case (see fn. 39) and had received a $75,000 advance from a publisher. Writing is what writers do, said some journalists in Farber's defense. Pashman challenged the majority's intimation that if a reporter could be categorized as an investigator he could lose shield law protection: "To hold therefore that the Shield Law is not applicable to a reporter who is also an investigator is to hold that the Shield Law will never be applicable."

As for the intimation of defense counsel that a reporter "who informs the public by authoring a book is somehow less deserving of Shield Law protection than one who articulates his findings in a newspaper," Pashman responded: "Publishing journalistic books for money is no less an illustrious way to perform the function of the press than is writing newspaper articles for a salary."

The differences in the procedure held appropriate by the majority in the Farber case and the procedure that Justice Pashman thought necessary are summed up as follows:

"The majority suggests that a hearing can be dispensed with, or that its outcome will be foreordained, in every case in which a reporter possesses 'considerable knowledge of [a criminal] case.' Such a conclusion nullifies the provisions of the Media Privilege Act. In effect, the majority has ruled that shield law protection will be withdrawn from reporters who perform their jobs competently—that is, those who gain 'considerable knowledge' concerning a criminal case. A hearing as to relevance, materiality and necessity must be conducted in all cases in which the privilege is invoked. Compelled in camera disclosure must be prohibited unless and until the defendant has met this his threshold burden in accordance with the procedures to be discussed below."

"First and Fourteenth Amendments afford journalists a qualified privilege to refuse to give testimony or produce documents in civil and criminal actions to which they are not a party," said a federal district court in Florida, unless the party issuing the subpoena has demonstrated a compelling need for the information and exhaustion of alternative sources.<sup>40</sup>

3. Iowa Beef Producers suing union officers were unable to enforce a subpoena duces tecum against the Wall Street Journal because the information sought did not go to the "heart of the claim" and "alternative sources had not been exhausted."<sup>41</sup>

As in the criminal context, a qualified privilege for communicators is now widely recognized in civil litigation. And in civil cases where the reporter is not a party, the chances of not having to comply with a subpoena are very good indeed.

40. Brown v. Okeechobee, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2579 (S.D.Fla.1981).

41. In re IBP Litigation, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2127, 491 F.Supp. 1359 (N.D.Iowa 1981).

4. The Farber case became a cause célèbre in communication law. The majority opinion for the New Jersey Supreme Court clearly placed the Sixth Amendment rights of the defendant and his equivalent state constitutional rights above the interests of the journalist in maintaining the confidentiality of sources or materials.

The court also approved an order requiring Farber's compliance with in camera inspection by the trial court prior to a hearing on the relevance or importance of the material believed to be in the reporter's possession.

Was the case unique in that investigative reporter Farber had become the expert on the case and could be assumed to hold information vital to the defense? That assumption was part of the New Jersey court's holding.

In a fittingly dramatic finale, the jury acquitted Dr. Jaslavich. The need for information was gone, and Farber was released from jail. With heavy fines still outstanding against it, the New York Times sought review in the Supreme Court. The Court refused to take the case.

On January 18, 1982, New Jersey Governor Brendan Byrne pardoned the New York Times and Myron Farber and returned $101,000 in criminal penalties to the newspaper.

New Jersey must have felt uncomfortable about the Farber case for its legislature soon amended its law to provide for a hearing prior to an in camera inspection when a journalist is subpoenaed in a criminal proceeding. Once the journalist's status is certified, a defendant in New Jersey must now meet a four-part test of 1) relevance, 2) no alternative sources, 3) substantiality to the issue of guilt or innocence, and 4) that the subpoena is not overbroad or unreasonably burdensome.<sup>42</sup> The law has been interpreted to protect both sources and information, as well as eyewitness news-gathering, unless the crime witnessed involves "physical violence or property damage."<sup>43</sup>

While some New Jersey courts have used the word "absolute" in describing the state's amended shield law, it is less than that. Given that Farber was a low point in the development of the privilege, it is a vast improvement. But New Jersey still can't make up its mind. In Maressa v. New Jersey Monthly, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1473, 445 A.2d 376 (N.J.1982), the court held that partial disclosure does not affect the absolute privilege accorded by the state statute—a rejection of the "exposure to view" doctrine. Nor would the assertion by a media defendant in a libel suit of an affirmative defense such as truth, fair comment, or lack of malice void the privilege. The privilege, said the court, could be waived only by voluntary disclosure. At about the same time, another New Jersey court in Central New Jersey Home v. New York Times, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1456, 444 A.2d 80 (N.J.1982) ruled that neither the state shield law nor New Jersey's constitution protected a newspaper from disclosing preliminary drafts of an allegedly libelous article during pretrial discovery. Nor would they protect the reporter from answering deposition questions about her knowledge and use of state agency reports that might have exonerated plaintiffs of the charges mentioned in her article. So much for "absolute" shield laws.

JOURNALIST'S PRIVILEGE IN THE CIVIL CONTEXT

1. Claims of privilege in civil cases are much easier to sustain, especially where

42. N.J.Stat. Ann. 2A-21-29 (1980).

43. In re Vrazo, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2410, 423 A.2d 695 (N.J.1980).

the journalist is a third party and not, for example, defendant in a libel suit. There is often a less compelling need for a journalist's information in civil suits and, at the same time, a greater array of alternative sources.

One of the earliest and most influential post-Branzburg cases recognizing the existence of a qualified First Amendment-based privilege in civil litigation was Baker v. F. & F. Investment, 339 F.Supp. 942 (S.D.N.Y.1972), affirmed 470 F.2d 778 (2d Cir. 1972), cert. den. 411 U.S. 966 (1973). Black class suitors, alleging racially discriminatory housing practices on the part of the defendant, sought through pretrial discovery proceedings to extract from Alfred Balk, a Columbia Journalism Review editor, his source for an article written by him in the July 4, 1962 issue of the Saturday Evening Post entitled "Confessions of A Block-Buster." The federal district court refused to compel journalist Balk to reveal his source. The plaintiffs, said the court, had not shown that all other sources of information such as title and mortgage records had been exhausted or that the disclosure of his source by Balk was essential to the protection of the public interest involved.

In a significant passage the court of appeals, which affirmed the decision below, indicated that the interest in protecting the journalist's sources will be weightier in civil litigation than might be the case where the needs of the grand jury, "the investigative arm of the criminal justice system" are not involved. Judge Kaufman emphasized, as had the lower court, that alternative sources of information to determine the identity of the source sought from the journalist had not been exhausted. As a result the material sought from the journalist did not, to use the famous phrase from Garland v. Torre, go to the "heart of the claim."

2. Another case where a qualified First Amendment-based privilege was recognized was Democratic National Committee

v. McCord, 356 F.Supp. 1394 (D.D.C.1973). On motions to quash the subpoenas by news organizations, Federal District Judge Charles Richey granted their request and refused to enforce the subpoenas. Even though the issue was raised after the Supreme Court decision in Branzburg had declined to create a newsman's privilege in grand jury proceedings based on the First Amendment, Judge Richey held that in these circumstances the news people concerned were entitled to a qualified privilege under the First Amendment. The federal district court, reflecting Justice Stewart's dissent in Branzburg, stated that absent a showing that alternative sources of evidence had been exhausted and absent a showing of the materiality of the documents sought, an order quashing the subpoenas was warranted. The federal district court appeared to confine Branzburg to the grand jury setting. Judge Richey read Branzburg as permitting a qualified First Amendment privilege to protect newsman's privilege in the civil litigation area.

McCord involved subpoenas arising out of civil litigation. In what might be called a "fishing expedition," the Committee for the Re-election of the President (Nixon) seemed to be looking for anything that might help them in a number of civil suits against the opposition party.

Judge Richey in quashing the subpoenas noted that the federal district court in Washington was faced with a constitutional issue of the first magnitude, "What is involved," said Richey, "is the right of the press to gather and publish, and that of the public to receive, news from widespread, diverse, and oftentimes confidential sources."

The news media had presented affidavits from prominent reporters asserting that enforcement of the subpoenas would lead to disclosure and subsequent depletion of confidential news sources without which investigative reporting would be severely, if not totally, hampered. The competing consideration, of course, is the right of the parties to procure evidence in civil litigation.

Recognizing the reluctance of other courts in civil and criminal cases, including the Supreme Court, to recognize even a qualified newsman's privilege, Judge Richey distinguished the present case as being not a criminal case but an action for monetary damages. Moreover the media were not parties but were simply being used to produce documents. More important, the parties on whose behalf the subpoenas had been issued had not demonstrated that the testimony represented by the documents would go to the "heart of their claim." Note the recurrence of this concept.

"Without information concerning the workings of the [g]overnment," said the Judge, "the public's confidence in its integrity will inevitably suffer. This is especially true where, as here, strong allegations have been made of corruption within the highest circles of government and in a campaign for the presidency itself. This court cannot blind itself to the possible 'chilling effect' the enforcement of the subpoenas would have on the flow of information to the press and, thus, to the public. This court stands convinced that if it allows the discouragement of investigative reporting into the highest levels of government, no amount of legal theorizing could allay the public's suspicions. * * *"

Richey appeared to be following the recommendation in Justice Powell's concurring opinion in Branzburg that a newsman's claim of privilege should be judged "on its facts by the striking of the proper balance between freedom of the press and the obligation of all citizens to give relevant testimony."

3. But seemingly lesser suits have been lost. Although a federal district court in Texas recognized a qualified privilege, it held a reporter in contempt for refusing to testify in camera in a civil action brought by a suspended employee against the Dallas school district. The employee alleged that the school district had released incriminating information to the reporter. The reporter wrote a story, and the school district then used that story to justify its suspension. In light of the employee's due process rights and his effort to exhaust alternative sources, the court, rejecting any notion of an absolute privilege for reporters in civil cases, ordered the reporter to testify.<sup>44</sup>

4. Chilling effect "is a paramount consideration," said a federal district court in New York. A drug company sought the identity of a source that had been consulted for evaluation of a drug in a medical newsletter article but had not met the three-part test.<sup>45</sup> United States Steel, however, was successful in getting outtakes from ABC on its coverage of an underground coal mine fire since there were no confidential sources and ABC had already shown outtakes to one of its outside consultants.<sup>46</sup>

THE STANFORD DAILY OR "INNOCENT" SEARCH CASE

1. One response to odds favoring journalists was a circumvention of the subpoena process altogether and the use of search warrants to permit the ransacking of an "innocent" third-party newspaper. Although there were fewer than thirty of these in ten states between the first and most famous Standard Daily case in 1978

44. Trautman v. Dallas School District, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1088 (N.D.Texas 1982).

45. Apicella v. McNeil Laboratories, Inc., 66 F.R.D. 78 (E.D.N.Y.1975).

46. Davis v. United States Steel, Civ. No. 79-3318 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 13, 1980).

and ameliorating intervention by federal legislation in 1981, they did represent one of the most serious ruptures ever in press-bench relationships.

Student reporters for The Stanford Daily at Stanford University had covered a student demonstration at a hospital which had resulted in violence and injuries to police officers. The newspaper published articles and photographs about the demonstration. A municipal court judge at the request of the police issued a warrant authorizing a search of The Stanford Daily. He found probable cause to believe that photographs and negatives would be found on the newspaper premises which would help to identify the demonstrators who had assaulted the police officers. The warrant was issued even though the newspaper's personnel were not suspected of having committed a crime or of having participated in any unlawful acts.

The students brought an action in federal district court against the municipal judge and the law enforcement officers on the ground that their rights under the First and Fourth Amendments had been violated. The federal district court agreed with the students and rendered a declaratory judgment. Where the subject of the search is innocent of wrongdoing and First Amendment considerations are present, the court ruled a search warrant could be issued "only in the rare circumstances where there is a clear showing that (1) important materials will be destroyed or removed from the jurisdiction; and (2) a restraining order would be futile." Since these unusual circumstances had not been found to exist in The Stanford Daily case, the federal district court ruled that the search of the newspaper's premises was unconstitutional. The United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed. The federal district court opinion was one that much of the American press would have supported although even that opinion declined to view the newsroom as a First Amendment sanctuary. But the Supreme Court resolution of the issue left the press angry and disturbed. The Court upheld the search of a newspaper's premises even though no one on the paper's staff was suspected of any crime.

The line-up of the justices was reminiscent of that in Branzburg. Justice White wrote the opinion for the Court. He subjected the newsroom to the mandates of the Fourth Amendment with the same egalitarian philosophy he had employed in Branzburg. There he had declared that the journalist, like any other witness, could be required to breach his confidences at the request of a grand jury in pursuit of relevant information. Powell, by means of a separate concurring opinion, tried to steer a middle course, as he tried to do in Branzburg, and Stewart dissented just as he had in Branzburg.

ZURCHER v. THE STANFORD DAILY

436 U.S. 547, 98 S.Ct. 1970,
56 L.Ed.2d 552 (1978).

Justice WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * *

But presumptively protected materials are not necessarily immune from seizure under warrant for use at a criminal trial. Not every such seizure, and not even most, will impose a prior restraint. And surely a warrant to search newspaper premises for criminal evidence such as the one issued here for news photographs taken in a public place carries no realistic threat of prior restraint or of any direct restraint whatsoever on the publication of the Daily or on its communication of ideas. The hazards of such warrants can be avoided by a neutral magistrate carrying out his responsibilities under the Fourth Amendment, for he has ample tools at his disposal to confine warrants to search within reasonable limits.

* * *

We accordingly reject the reasons given by the District Court and adopted by the Court of Appeals for holding the search for photographs at The Stanford Daily to have been unreasonable within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment and in violation of the First Amendment. Nor has anything else presented here persuaded us that the Amendments forbade this search. It follows that the judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed.

So ordered.

Justice Brennan took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

Justice POWELL, concurring.

While there is no justification for the establishment of a separate Fourth Amendment procedure for the press, a magistrate asked to issue a warrant for the search of press offices can and should take cognizance of the independent values protected by the First Amendment—such as those highlighted by Justice Stewart—when he weighs such factors. If the reasonableness and particularity requirements are thus applied, the dangers are likely to be minimal.

In any event, considerations such as these are the province of the Fourth Amendment. There is no authority either in history or in the Constitution itself for exempting certain classes of persons or entities from its reach.

Justice Stewart, with whom Justice Marshall joins, dissenting.

Watergate and the Pentagon Papers case had it been in place then? Suddenly, subpoenas didn't look so bad; at least you could see them coming.

Following Stanford Daily a printer's office was searched in Flint, Michigan, a television newsroom in Boise, Idaho, the Associated Press in Butte, Montana, the home of an editor in Albany, Georgia. On October 13, 1980, Congress passed the Privacy Protection Act (18 U.S.C.A. § 793 ff). While media organizations had lobbied Congress to prevent surprise invasions of the newsroom, they had asked for a ban on searches of the premises of all innocent third parties. What they got was legislation specific to them. Many journalists are uncomfortable with these kinds of laws since they permit lawmakers to intrude themselves into the realm of the First Amendment.

Nevertheless the law, which went into effect for federal searches on January 1, 1981 and for state searches on October 14, 1981, made it unlawful for law enforcement officers to search for or seize raw materials (photos, audio and videotapes, interview notes) or work products (drafts of articles and notes) possessed by anyone engaged in the dissemination of news or information to the public through newspapers, books, or electronic broadcasts unless there was probable cause to believe that the person with the material was committing a crime.

Exceptions were threats to national defense, the theft of classified or restricted information, and seizures that would be necessary to prevent death or serious injury. Searches would also be permitted if there was reason to believe that a subpoena would lead to the destruction of material that would serve the needs of justice. Police are expected to request voluntary cooperation from news organizations and scholars or, if that fails, to seek a subpoena before going after a search warrant.

COMMENT

Press commentary on the case was bitter, as it would be later in Herbert v. Lando. How would the ruling have affected

State laws incorporating some or all of these provisions in ways having both more and less impact than the parent federal law have been passed in California, Connecticut, Illinois, Nebraska, New Jersey, Oregon, Texas, Washington, and Wisconsin. And the Department of Justice Guidelines followed in December of 1980.

POSTSCRIPT

Shield laws and the thought of shield laws have provoked much debate among news people. Many prefer a First Amendment stand to legislative enactment, even when the legislature acts with the best of intentions. Others have argued vigorously for no special privileges at all.<sup>47</sup> Surprisingly in light of Branzburg, a qualified First Amendment-based journalist's privilege has emerged. Most jurisdictions, both state and federal, recognize a qualified privilege. In addition, half the states have shield laws.

Estimates of from 30 to 50 percent have been made for the amount of news gathered from confidential sources.<sup>48</sup> Many reporters are prepared to go to jail to protect those sources, and the law has evolved toward what reporters in one pre-Branzburg survey thought it ought to—a flexible, ad hoc qualified privilege.<sup>49</sup>

However the privilege is applied, it appears to be a privilege for the communicator, narrowly or broadly defined, and not a privilege for the source. In New Jersey v. Boiardo, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1195, 414 A.2d 14 (N.J.1980), the court held that the privilege could be invoked by a reporter regardless of whether confidentiality had been waived by the sources or whether the source's identity had been discovered by other means. Only the reporter could waive the privilege, said the court, because it belongs to him and him alone. A broken promise by a reporter raises an ethical question but provides no legal cause of action. When the name of a rape victim obtained from a prosecutor was published despite an alleged promise of confidentiality, the court found the publication constitutionally privileged despite the promise and the newspaper's prior policy of withholding the names of victims of sex crimes.<sup>50</sup>

Casual assurances of confidentiality may be dangerous to a reporter.<sup>51</sup> A court may wish to know how confidentiality was established with a source. A reporter, therefore, ought to have some fairly unambiguous method of establishing the relationship before having to testify in court. Employers are not protected under some state laws. The Associated Press was required to produce a tape recording of a reporter's telephone conversation with a suspected kidnapper that contained an admission that he had shot a police officer because Montana law covered only the reporter.<sup>52</sup>

Journalists are most at risk when their refusals to testify or submit evidence before grand juries or petit juries in criminal cases are weighed against the Sixth Amendment rights of defendants. Civil cases carry less risk, especially where the reporter is an innocent third party. The one exception is the libel suit in which the plaintiff may carry the heavy burden of proving actual malice and, on occasion, may need the defendant-reporter's help in doing so.

As has been noted, there are many tactics the reporter may adopt in order to deflect subpoenas. As the three-part test continues to permeate the judicial system, the privilege will gain wider recognition, limiting the need for additional state or federal laws.

Zechariah Chafee may have unintentionally set the standard nearly forty years ago when he said:

This power to make reporters disclose their confidential sources of information should be exercised with great caution. * * * It is * * * desirable to respect the reporter's claim of confidence except in cases of great necessity where he clearly possesses knowledge which is otherwise unobtainable. # Access to Government: Executive and Legislative Branches

THE RIGHT TO GATHER NEWS

1. Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, text p. 513, undoubtedly gave momentum to what might be eventual clarification, if not emergence, of a broad constitutional right to gather news or to have access to places and people where news is being made. There remains, however, a good deal of judicial ambivalence about how far this right ought to be extended beyond the criminal trial courtroom.

It was, after all, only in 1965 that the Court noted in a case upholding the government's refusal to validate passports for reporters traveling to Cuba that "the right to speak and publish does not carry with it the unrestrained right to gather information."<sup>1</sup> And in Pell and Saxbe, two cases in which the issue was special access for the press to prison inmates, the Court held that "newsmen have no constitutional right of access to prisons or their inmates beyond that afforded the general public."<sup>2</sup>

Even Justice Brennan, who dissented in the prison cases, was not quite sure what ought to be the scope of a right to gather news. "The Constitution does not require all public acts to be done in a town meeting or an assembly of the whole," he said, concurring in a 1977 case. "[T]his Court's 'own conferences [and] meetings of other official bodies gathered in executive session' may be closed to the public without implicating any constitutional rights whatever."<sup>3</sup>

Nor was the Supreme Court to relent in a 1977 ruling in Houchins v. KQED.<sup>4</sup> Speaking of press and public, the Ninth Circuit had observed that, "Although both groups have an equal constitutional right of access to jails, because of differing needs and administrative problems, common sense mandates that the implementation of those correlative rights not be identical. * * * As the eyes and ears of the public, newsmen are entitled to see and to hear everything within the institution about which the general public is entitled to be informed. * * * However, it does not follow that regulations that are reasonable under the circumstances as applied to touring groups of the public are also reasonable as applied to news media personnel."<sup>5</sup> These views stirred something deep in the minds of at least concurring and dissenting Supreme Court justices in Houchins.

In the prison access cases the Court relied heavily on the language of Justice White in Branzburg: "It has generally been held that the First Amendment does not guarantee the press a constitutional right of special access to information not available to the public generally. * * * Newsmen have no constitutional right of access to the scenes of crime or disaster when the general public is excluded. * * *"

In a concurrence Justice Stewart, who had written the opinions for the Court in Pell and Saxbe, spoke of "flexibility" and the "practical distinctions between the press and the general public." Justice Stevens in dissent, joined by Brennan and Powell, spoke of prison conditions and the public's right to know about them and seemed to think some kind of "effective access" ought to be available to the press:

An official prison policy of concealing such knowledge from the public by arbitrarily cutting off the flow of information at its source abridges the freedom of speech and of the press protected by the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution.

But the Court in Houchins, through Chief Justice Burger, favored a more general proposition: "This Court has never intimated a First Amendment guarantee of a right of access to all sources of information within government control." Relying in part upon the landmark journalist's privilege case, Branzburg v. Hayes<sup>6</sup> the Court denied the press any constitutional rights of access not available to the general public.

2. Press passes are tickets to scenes of crimes and disasters. Refusing to "sell" tickets to alternative media can be a way of "certifying" the orthodox, legitimate, or establishment press. For example, the Los Angeles Free Press was denied press passes by police and sheriff because eligibility was judged on the "regular gathering and distribution of hard core news generated through police and fireman activities." What law enforcement officers called "sociological" coverage—riots, demonstrations, and assassinations—didn't qualify one for a press pass.<sup>7</sup>

A federal court in Iowa, however, held that denying an "underground newspaper" access to police department records available to other media constituted a denial of equal protection, unless officials could show a compelling governmental interest in such discrimination. Here the government blatantly excluded news media that were not "established" or "legitimate." Access to records depended on a press pass, and, in the absence of any written policies or regulations, passes went to those media who, in the view of the police, were "responsible" because they "cooperated" in publishing what the department believed to be appropriate. The court added a compelling paragraph:

The history of this nation and particularly of the development of the institutions of our complex federal system of government has been repeatedly jarred and reshaped by the continuing investigation, reporting and advocacy of independent journalists unaffiliated with major institutions and often with no resource except their wit, persistence, and the crudest mechanisms for placing words on paper.<sup>8</sup>

Press passes have been denied where the reporter had a criminal record.<sup>9</sup> But even in the case of admission to the White House, an access situation at the complete discretion of the Secret Service, courts expect evenhandedness in official decisions as to which reporters to admit and which to exclude; and they prefer an established policy and a procedure for giving notice of and reasons for exclusion so an appeal can be carried forward.<sup>10</sup>

When television reporters failed to develop a "pool" coverage plan, the White House Press Office excluded all TV representatives. The three major networks sought and were awarded a preliminary injunction. Even though a post-Richmond case, the court could find no more than a "qualified" right of access "subject to limiting considerations such as confidentiality, security, orderly process, spatial limitations, and doubtless many others."<sup>11</sup> Total exclusion of TV, however, did deny public and press their limited right of access to the White House guaranteed by the First Amendment.

For similar reasons, a federal appeals court in Massachusetts rejected a National Transportation Safety Board order that limited press access to an airplane crash site on public property to one hour a day.<sup>12</sup> Balancing tests? Yes, but with increased weight given to press rights of access.

What of access claims to private property? In 1975 a New Jersey Superior Court ordered photographs returned to staffers of the Daily Princetonian after they had been confiscated by state police at the request of a farmer on whose land the pictures had been taken. Since the reporter and photographer were covering migrant worker housing conditions, and they did so reasonably, their activities were clothed with a public interest.<sup>13</sup>

skating championships, even though they were held in a civic center operated by Hartford, Connecticut. Having entered into the commercial marketplace and having made contractual arrangements whereby anyone entering the civic center with a television camera was to refrain from broadcasting the event until ABC, which had exclusive rights to coverage, had concluded its broadcast, the city, said a federal district court, was operating in its proprietary rather than its governmental capacity. Hartford therefore did not violate the plaintiff's First or Fourteenth Amendment rights.<sup>14</sup>

3. Questions of due process and equal protection have also arisen where legislative bodies have capriciously discriminated against certain reporters but not others. For example, exclusion of a particular reporter and his newspaper from the floor of the Tennessee Senate by a Senate resolution was enjoined.<sup>15</sup> And a federal district court in Massachusetts held that access to city council meetings must be granted equally to all reporters.<sup>16</sup> The mayor of Honolulu was enjoined from denying a reporter he didn't like access to city hall press conferences.<sup>17</sup> A federal court in Alabama recognized a limited First Amendment right of reasonable access to news of state government and to public galleries, press rooms, and press conferences when it prevented enforcement of a law requiring state house reporters to file a "statement of economic interest" detailing their employment status and promising that they would not work for lobbyists.<sup>18</sup>

Finally, in Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) and common law suits brought against the Department of Justice and Chairman Peter Rodino of the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States House of Representatives, the District of Columbia District Court held that Congress is subject to the common law rule guaranteeing the public's right to inspect and copy public records:

The historic common law right to inspect and copy public records is recognized in this jurisdiction. The general rule is that all three branches of government, legislative, executive, and judicial, are subject to the common law right. Defendant Rodino has set forth no persuasive reason why Congress should be exempted from the common law rule. It is true that Congress has exempted itself from the requirements of the Freedom of Information Act. That [a]ct, however, is not coextensive with the common law rule under discussion. It applies to all matters in [g]overnment files; the common law rule applies only to "public records." Moreover, we can find no inconsistency or conflict between the Freedom of Information Act and the common law rule. Even if there were an inconsistency or conflict, the [a]ct would have to be construed narrowly, favoring application of the common law, because the Freedom of Information Act is in derogation of the common law.

Accordingly, we hold the Congress is subject to the common law rule which guarantees the public a right to inspect and copy public records. Absent a showing that the matters sought by plaintiff are not "public records" within the meaning of the common law rule or that plaintiff does not possess any "interest" required by the rule, we cannot grant defendant Rodino's motion for dismissal.

If Congress wishes to exempt itself from the common law rule or to impose standards for its application, it has the means to do so readily at its disposal. It has, however, not done so and therefore remains subject to the common law rule. Schwartz v. Justice Department, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1335, 435 F.Supp. 1203 (D.D.C.1977), affirmed 595 F.2d 888 (D.C.Cir.1978). See also, Relyea, Access to Congressional Records, Columbia, Mo.: Freedom of Information Center Report No. 428, October 1980.

This is not to say that Congress and the state legislatures don't have a great deal of latitude in determining and enforcing their own rules of access. After all, state legislators write state open meetings and records laws and frequently exempt themselves. The United States Constitution (Art. I, § 5) gives both House and Senate authority to dictate their own levels of secrecy and openness. Floor meetings of both houses have been open to the public almost without exception. Many committee meetings remain closed, but the trend is toward greater openness. The House permits radio and television coverage of its floor proceedings on a restricted basis. Cameras are run by House staff, and they are not permitted to pan the chamber.

The reluctance of courts to interfere with legislative prerogatives was illustrated by the Consumers Union case. The Periodical Correspondents' Association led by Neil MacNeil of Time magazine voted not to admit correspondents for Consumer Reports to the Periodical Press Galleries. An Association rule against nonprofit publications was designed to protect Congress from lobbyists, and Consumer Reports technically fit the category.

District of Columbia federal trial Judge Gerhard Gesell was obviously annoyed, and he held the rule of the "regular" reporters violative of Consumers Union's First Amendment right to freedom of the press and its Fifth Amendment right to due process and the equal protection of the laws. Wrote Gesell:

There should be no glossing over what this record discloses. Under a broad, generalized congressional delegation, authority has been given certain newsmen to prevent other newsmen from having access to news of vital consequence to the public. As a result, a group of established periodical correspondents have undertaken to implement arbitrary and unnecessary regulations with a view to excluding from news sources representatives of publications whose ownership or ideas they consider objectionable. * * *

The fact that the galleries for newspapermen and radio and television correspondents have operated with much greater liberality and consequent regard for the demands of the First Amendment serve simply to emphasize the arbitrariness of those managing the periodical galleries. All types of news compete and all types of publications are entitled to an equal freedom to hear and publish the official business of the Congress.

The situation disclosed by this undisputed record flaunts the First Amendment. It matters not that elements of the press as well as Congress itself appear to have been the instruments for denial of constitutional rights in this instance, for those rights limit the actions of legislative agents and instrumentalities as surely as those of Congress itself. * * *

A free press is undermined if the access of certain reporters to the facts relating to the public's business is limited merely because they advocate a particular viewpoint. This is a dangerous and self-defeating doctrine. Consumers Union of United States, Inc. v. Periodical Correspondents' Association, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 2534, 365 F.Supp. 18 (D.D.C.1973).

The association appealed, and the D.C. Circuit Court reversed by relying on, among other things, the speech and debate clause. The court of appeals declared that what the Periodical Correspondents had done was "within spheres of legislative power committed to Congress and the legislative immunity granted by the Constitution [under the speech and debate clause]." 515 F.2d 1341 (D.C.Cir.1975). The Supreme Court denied certiorari a year later. 423 U.S. 1051 (1976).

MacNeil remained adamant in his view that Consumers Union and its Washington representatives were lobbyists, though they may not have been of the "pure" variety, and under an internal rule of Congress were properly excluded from the press galleries.

Both houses of the Maryland legislature were upheld in excluding tape recorders from their sessions. While recognizing some First Amendment protection for news gathering, a Maryland court held that the legislative rule did not interfere with the usual pencil-and-pad duties of reporters. The reporters had based their claim on a speed and accuracy argument and had relied on an earlier case, Nevens v. City of Chino, 44 Cal.Rptr. 50 (1965), in which a similar rule had been struck down. The Maryland court said there was no violation of due process in a rule intended to preserve order and decorum, even if at the expense of increased press efficiency. As to equal protection, the court held that the tape recorder ban was against equipment, not a class of persons. Sigma Delta Chi v. Speaker, Maryland House of Delegates, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 2375, 310 A.2d 156 (1973).

After many years of litigation, the Supreme Court in late 1982 rejected all efforts by Richard M. Nixon to block public access to his infamous White House tapes. The decision applied to thousands of hours of Oval Office conversations unrelated to Watergate and the trials that followed.

In United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974), the Court recognized a constitutionally based privilege of confidentiality for presidential communications to the extent that such a privilege was necessary to the effective discharge of the president's powers. In 1982, the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals permitted the General Services Administration to segregate private and public material in the tapes and to allow public access to "presidential historical material." Nixon v. Freeman, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1001, 670 F.2d 346 (D.C.Cir.1982).

4. Since discussion of what levels of access to information ought to be available to public and press proceeds largely in judicial forums, access to the courtroom is obviously crucial. Which is not to depreciate the importance of the everyday business of government. But courts, sitting as final arbiters, will decide both abstract and concrete questions of access to all branches of government.

"A popular government without popular information or the means of acquiring it is but a Prologue to a Farce or Tragedy; or perhaps both," said James Madison.<sup>19</sup>

Of late, an interesting dialogue has centered on whether denials of access constitute prior restraint and whether access and publication are of equal constitutional weight. In the landmark prior restraint cases—Near, Pentagon Papers, and Nebraska Press—the information suppressed by state statute, a court injunction, initiated by the federal government, and a judicial order, respectively, was information already in hand. Access may or may not lead a reporter to publishable material. A denial of access is not necessarily a proscription against publication. Yet when access is regularly or systematically denied, the effects on the communication process are the same.

While academics and judges have identified a right of access or a right to know, whereby government is said to have an affirmative constitutional obligation to furnish information to the populace,<sup>20</sup> courts have been slow to expand the doctrine. Others consider the doctrine dangerous, even pernicious, because it derogates the rights of speakers and invites government censorship: the rights of audiences become paramount, and, if the public has a right to know, by definition there are things that it has no right to know.<sup>21</sup> In such cases, courts are in the position of deciding what the public has a right to know or not to know,<sup>22</sup> a function not intended for government.

Communication lawyers, recognizing the complex interface of prior restraint and access rights, also warn against pushing access too far. Hostile courts in denying access may impose prior restraints, either intentionally or unintentionally. The right to gather information is by no means as sweeping as the right to publish information once gathered.<sup>23</sup>

Professor Steven Helle holds that the dichotomy between news gathering and publication is specious. Government has a general obligation to provide unrestricted access to information. It has no right not to speak. The press should not have to assert the public's right to know to exercise its own right of expression while the government need cite only its own interests as justification for not speaking. The failure of the government to release information that furthers self-government is contrary to the broad command of the First Amendment.

It is because analysis of governmental expression, which is subject to different limitations and obligations regarding its dissemination, is beginning to control analysis of nongovernment expression through means of the news-gathering artifice that the libertarian foundations of nongovernment speech are imperiled.

In a word, Helle faults the courts for defining press rights in terms of the public's rights:

By orienting the analysis in terms of the public right rather than the private right, the Court has eschewed resort to a body of law founded on libertarian principles and has given itself great latitude to substitute the judgment of the [s]tate for that of the individual in deciding the extent to which rights exist.<sup>24</sup>

If it is the natural tendency of government to compile and conceal information, it is the role of the press to dig it out and put it into circulation. The press cannot expect the government to be its handmaiden.

"There is no constitutional right to have access to particular government information, or to require openness from bureaucracy * * *," said Justice Stewart in his Yale Law School address. "The Constitution itself is neither a Freedom of Information Act nor an Official Secrets Act."<sup>25</sup> That has been the view of the courts. While preserving their own autonomy, except where courts have been made aware of violations of due process or equal protection, Congress and the state legislatures have found ways to open up the executive branches to public scrutiny. Congress did it in 1966 with passage of the Freedom of Information Act.

THE FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACT

1. In 1966, section 3 of the Administrative Procedure Act of 1946 was amended to incorporate the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C.A. § 552. The act became law on July 4, 1967. FOIA was a major blow to the developing doctrine of "executive privilege," a doctrine nurtured by two world wars, by the continuously agglomerating powers of the presidency, and brought to maturity by burgeoning theories and laws of privacy. However short the act may fall in implementing the public's right to know, federal government agencies are no longer able to withhold information on the arbitrary ground that its release would be contrary to the public interest.

Underlying the act is the premise that executive branch records are by definition open to public inspection, to any person for whatever purpose, unless agencies can give specific reasons why they should be closed. Nine exemptions in the act make the protection against disclosure of some categories of information "discretionary" with agencies or the federal courts—only one circuit court of appeals has said "mandatory." Westinghouse v. Schlesinger, 542 F.2d 1190 (4th Cir. 1976). The act, then, does not forbid disclosure of exempted categories of information. Nor can promises of confidentiality by an agency in and of themselves defeat the public's right to disclosure. Petkas v. Staats, 501 F.2d 887 (D.C. Cir. 1974).

A federal district court expressed well and simply the broad principle of FOIA: Freedom of information is now the rule and secrecy is the exception. Later the United States Supreme Court would say that "these limited exemptions do not obscure the basic policy that disclosure, not secrecy is the dominant objective of the

2. FOIA has been crucial to the disclosure of huge quantities of information held by federal agencies that might not otherwise have been available. In its first sixteen years, the act was amended at least four times, and nearly 1,000 court decisions construed its provisions.<sup>27</sup> Amendments in 1974, for example, required agencies to promulgate request procedures, expedited appeal guidelines, uniform search and duplicating costs, and to provide detailed indexes of their holdings. Courts could rule that the government pay court costs and attorney fees for successful FOIA plaintiffs. Judges were also empowered to review at their discretion government documents in camera to decide whether or not one or more of the nine exemptions to the Act had been properly applied.<sup>28</sup>

Proposals to amend the act most frequently focus on FBI, CIA, and Secret Service records since information about those agencies accounts for about half of the news stories and columns written as a direct consequence of FOIA. Other law enforcement organizations and business institutions would also be the beneficiaries of proposed amendments. Any plan to curtail the scope of the act leaves the public the loser. Of course, amendments to FOIA can be accomplished indirectly by amending other federal statutes such as those having to do with product safety and tax rules, often without public hearings.

Additional amendments would expand time limits on agency response; increase the costs to requesters; "clarify," tighten, and add exemptions; and limit use of FOIA to citizens and resident aliens. (See § 1730 the Freedom of Information Reform Act.) A million requests each year at a cost to the government of perhaps $60 million may not be too high a price for an open society. For a review of the Reagan Administration's activities in this area see Floyd Abrams, The New Effort to Control Information, New York Times Magazine, Sept. 25, 1983.

FOIA applies to every agency, department regulatory commission, and government-controlled corporation in the executive branch of the federal government, including cabinet offices such as departments of State, Defense, Transportation, Interior, Treasury, Justice, etc. It would include independent regulatory agencies such as FCC and FTC, the Post Office, NASA, and the Civil Service Commission and executive offices under presidential control such as the Office of Management and Budget. It does not apply to the president himself or to his immediate staff.

FOIA deals with "agency records," not information in the abstract or information that might be anticipated from an interview. The law applies to "records which have been in fact obtained," and not to 28. The in camera provision of the 1974 amendments was meant to overcome the effects of the Supreme Court decision in Environmental Protection Agency v. Mink, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 2448, 410 U.S. 73 (1973). There the Court upheld Exemption 1 (national defense) and Exemption 5 (intra- and interagency memos) arguments blocking requests by Congresswoman Patsy Mink and colleagues for release of recommendations and reports of a divided interdepartmental committee considering the advisability of underground nuclear tests on Amchitka Island in the Aleutians. The Court could not find any grounds for discretionary judicial review of classified material in the legislative history of Exemption 1.

See also, Alfred A. Knopf, Inc. v. Colby, 509 F.2d 1362 (4th Cir. 1975), in which the court of appeals permitted the CIA to make 168 deletions in a book by Victor Marchetti and John Marks, The CIA and the Cult of Intelligence. The book was published that way on grounds that any part of a classifiable document may be classified, without any need for in camera review.

records which merely could have been obtained. In Forsham v. Harris, 5 Med.L. Rptr. 2473, 445 U.S. 169, 185-186 (1980), the Court held that records of a federally funded university research project were not records subject to disclosure under FOIA unless they had been taken over by a government agency for its own review or use. Nor does the act require an agency to retrieve or create records (Kissinger v. Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 1001, 445 U.S. 136, 153, 1980). Both Forsham and Kissinger support the principle that materials created by or in the physical custody of an agency are not always "records" for purposes of FOIA.

In Kissinger, FOIA requests by the Military Audit Project, the Reporters Committee, and New York Times columnist William Safire for copies of transcripts of telephone conversations made by Henry Kissinger while he was assistant to the president for national security and secretary of state were turned down on appeal to the State Department.

After Kissinger left office, the transcripts were donated to the Library of Congress on condition that they not be released for a specified period. A federal district court ordered the Library to return transcripts relating to Kissinger's role as Secretary of State to the State Department because they were agency records subject to disclosure and were wrongly removed without permission. In the case of notes prepared in his role as national security adviser to the president, relief was denied. The court of appeals affirmed, and the Supreme Court granted certiorari.

Justice William Rehnquist for the Court found a way to block access to all parties. Courts may devise remedies and enjoin agencies, he said, only if an agency has 1) improperly 2) withheld 3) agency records. Safire sought a presidential adviser's notes, not agency records. MAP and the Reporters Committee sought records that were no longer in the control or custody of the agency, and the agency, in this case the State Department, was not obliged to retrieve documents that had escaped its possession. What Safire sought was in the possession of the State Department but outside of its control as material belonging to the president's immediate personal staff and, therefore, not agency material subject to FOIA. Possession without control was insufficient to make the documents records for purposes of the act.

Brennan and Stevens dissented in part because they disagreed with the majority's definition of "custody or control." Stevens feared that the ruling would encourage outgoing officials to remove damaging information from their files. An agency retains custody over anything it has a legal right to possess.

Others saw in Rehnquist's opinion a reversal of the presumption that the burden under FOIA is on the agency to prove that the withholding of information was justified. It may be very difficult, as a threshold requirement, for an FOIA plaintiff to show that agency records were improperly withheld. And how does a requester prove that records, if indeed they were under agency control in the first place, are subject to the required degree of agency control?

The Washington Post was denied access to the secretary of state's "emergency fund" since Congress, in exercising its authority under the Constitution's "statement and account" clause, has expressed its intent to maintain secrecy in expenditure of funds affecting foreign relations. Washington Post v. Department of State, 6 Med.L.Rptr. 2253, 501 F.Supp. 1152 (D.D.C. 1980).

Court records are not subject to the act, even if located in the U.S. attorney's office.<sup>29</sup> Congressional records are also exempt. An example would be CIA records generated in direct response to the specific request of a congressional committee exercising oversight authority and where Congress had expressed a clear intent to retain control.<sup>30</sup>

Records of state and local government are not subject to disclosure under FOIA, although all states now have their own open records laws. Private corporate records become public only when filed with the federal government. Much pressure has been put on Congress to limit or discontinue altogether disclosure of corporate information.

Interpol (International Criminal Police Organization) is not an agency subject to FOIA. The National Center Bureau, America's liaison with Interpol, is an agency under the act.<sup>31</sup>

USING THE FOIA

Records are defined broadly as to form but would not normally include physical objects which cannot be reproduced. Requesters should identify themselves and describe records with as much specificity as possible as to kind and quantity. Avoid blanket requests.

Any person—U. S. citizen or not—may use the act. So may corporations, public interest groups, and media, and no reason for a request need be given. Persons planning to communicate with the public sometimes get priority attention.

Informal requests ought to be the first step. Each agency, bureau, or department will have a public information or press officer who by telephone or certified mail can be notified of a request for information under FOIA. Your letter may be referred to a more knowledgeable FOIA officer. If informal approaches don't work, the next step is to file a formal written FOIA request. The agency now has a legal duty to reply within ten working days. If the denial persists, you may appeal in writing, preferably within thirty days, to the agency head. That person must reply within twenty working days, although continuing efforts are made to lengthen these time periods. Due to the volume of requests, the FBI, CIA, and departments of State and Justice contend that they are unable to meet these deadlines. Another denial, or no response at all, entitles you under the Act to bring suit in the most convenient federal court with the expectation of an expedited hearing. The burden of proof for nondisclosure will rest squarely on government.

Before filing a lawsuit, you may ask the Office of Information Law and Policy of the Department of Justice, a federal agency responsible for overall administration of FOIA, for a review of your case to date. The office could advise the recalcitrant agency to reverse its decision and release the documents you requested.

The Washington-based Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, in a valuable handbook<sup>32</sup> prepared jointly with the Society of Professional Journalists, provides sample letters for formal request, appeals, waivers of fee, and a federal district court complaint form. Suggestions are made as to who, besides yourself, ought to get copies of your letters if you have been unable to pinpoint a record holder. Use registered mail, with return receipts, and envelopes marked "FOI Act Request." Even agency addresses and telephone numbers are included in the handbook.

Agencies are authorized to charge reasonable fees for searching and copying and estimates are available. State your pecuniary limits if funds are in short supply. Fee schedules for the various agencies are published in the Federal Register. If they are prohibitive for you and you are a journalist, author, or scholar, indicate your publication plans and ask that fees be waived or at least reduced. FOIA recognizes such requests where a public benefit is being served—although you shouldn't expect any uniformity of response across units of government. Possibly, a trip to inspect documents could be less expensive and more expeditious to your needs than having documents copied.

HOW SUCCESSFUL IS FOIA?

Litigation under the Exemptions

FOIA has created new attitudes toward public information in the minds of both record keepers and record seekers. In the beginning, businessmen and their agents and public interest groups, notably those led by Ralph Nader, made more use of the act than individual citizens or the press. That has been changing over the years.

Brief comments on the nine Exemptions and the kinds of cases they have generated, particularly those involving the press, may be the key to understanding the Act and its significance to media access and the public's right to know.

Exemption 1

This exemption is designed to prevent disclosure of properly classified records, the release of which would cause at least some "identifiable damage" to the national security, "(A) specifically authorized under criteria established by an Executive Order to be kept secret in the interest of national defense or foreign policy and (B) are in fact properly classified pursuant to such Executive Order."

An executive order (Exec. Order No. 12356) which took effect August 1, 1982 eliminated the Carter Administration requirement that officials consider the public interest in disclosure when deciding whether to classify.<sup>33</sup>

Under the new order, information may not be classified "unless its disclosure reasonably could be expected to cause damage to national security. * * * If there is reasonable doubt about the need to classify information, it shall be safeguarded as if it were classified" pending a determination within thirty days "by an original classification authority." If there is a "reasonable doubt" about the appropriate level of classification (top secret, secret, or confidential), the document is to be safeguarded at the highest level of classification—"top secret"—pending a decision within thirty days by the original classification authority.

Initial press interpretation of the order was that it would greatly increase the authority of the executive branch to classify documents where there was only the vaguest threat to national security. One might recall Justice Stewart's admonition in the Pentagon Papers case that "when everything is classified, then nothing is classified." A sense of what is or what should be truly secret is lost, and leaks replace honest classification.

33. In re National Security Information, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1306 (1982).

Certainly the order eliminates the standard of "identifiable damage" to the national security and the discretionary "public interest" balancing of the earlier Carter order. It also retards the declassification process.<sup>34</sup>

The order tracks with congressional passage in June 1982 of the Intelligence Identities Protection Act which, although forsaking prior restraints, makes it a crime to reveal the names of U. S. intelligence agents. Broad enough to ensnare unwary journalists, the law does require the showing of a pattern of activities "intending to expose covert agents." So keep a paper record of your purpose or intent.

It also tracks with the Supreme Court's holding in Haig v. Agee.<sup>35</sup> There the Court upheld the power of the State Department to revoke the passport of a citizen whose travels abroad might damage U. S. policy through exposure of CIA operations and agents. Chief Justice Burger, writing for the Court, placed such information outside the protection of the First Amendment.

"The protection accorded beliefs standing alone," said Burger, "is very different from the protection afforded conduct. Here, beliefs and speech are only part of respondent's campaign, which presents a serious danger to American officials abroad and to the national security."

Theoretically, the 1974 amendment to FOIA, meant to overcome the Court's reflexive deference to a federal agency's classification of information in EPA v. Mink,<sup>36</sup> permits federal judges to determine in the first instance (de novo) whether information classified under executive order has been done so properly. Under the new order, it can be expected that even greater weight will be accorded agency "expertise" in the realm of national security.<sup>37</sup>

A later presidential directive required prepublication review of all manuscripts written by federal employees and former employees with access to highly classified information. Political opponents denounced the order as "an official secrets act," a move that would prevent publication of information without national security significance but embarrassing to the government.

In Snepp v. United States, 5 Med.L. Rptr. 2409, 444 U.S. 507 (1980) the Supreme Court, without written or oral arguments, had reinstated a federal district court ruling (456 F.Supp. 176 (E.D.Va.1978)) stripping the author of Decent Interval, an account of America's undignified flight from Saigon, of all royalties and enjoining further disclosures of his CIA experiences. Snepp, said the Court, had entered into a secrecy agreement with the intelligence agency and had a "fiduciary obligation" to submit his manuscript for prepublication review. There was wide comment on the implications of the case for informed public debate.

Presumptions in favor of government expertise are not hard to find in the case law. Access to full documentation of the secret "Glomar Project," a project jointly financed by the CIA and the late Howard 36. 1 Med.L.Rptr. 2448, 410 U.S. 73 (1973). See fn. 28.

37. For example, in Weismann v. CIA, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1276, 565 F.2d 6792 (D.C.Cir.1977), the court said that when satisfied that an agency's classification is reasonable and made in good faith, a court "need not go further to test the expertise of the agency. * * *" The court also thought in camera inspections burdensome and without benefit of adversary proceedings. Judges, said the court, don't have expertise to make national security determinations. And in Bell v. United States, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1154, 563 F.2d 484 (1st Cir. 1977), the court held that before in camera inspection is ordered Congress intended that an agency be given an opportunity to demonstrate by affidavit or testimony that the documents at issue are clearly exempt from disclosure. The court is expected to accord "substantial weight" to the agency affidavit.

Hughes apparently to raise an outmoded Russian submarine from the floor of the Pacific but presented to the public as a deep sea mining project, was effectively blocked by the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals.

To justify withholding the requested documents, the government submitted extensive affidavits detailing the nature of the material withheld and the implications for national security should it be released. The district court found the affidavits sufficient to establish the government's right to withhold and granted summary judgment. On the question of in camera judicial review, the circuit court said:

Throughout their briefs, the appellants suggest that affirmance by us of the district court's grant of summary judgment would be tantamount to a subversion of the statutory requirement that courts conduct de novo review of agency classification decisions. An affirmance, they claim, would de facto substitute the more deferential "reasonable basis" standard rejected by Congress over a presidential veto in 1974 [the 1974 FOIA amendments]. This is simply not so.

It is well established that summary judgment is properly granted in Exemption 1 cases without an in camera inspection or discovery by the plaintiffs when the affidavits submitted by the agency are adequate to the task. We agree with the district court that the lengthy detailed affidavits submitted by the defendants in this case satisfy the well-settled requirements for summary judgment. They describe the sensitive documents at issue with reasonably specific detail; the justifications for non-disclosure are detailed and persuasive. * * * Military Audit Report v. Casey, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1708, 656 F.2d 724 (D.C.Cir.1981).

Apparently the government sought to protect the identity of other corporations involved in the project, their technology, their business abroad, and the safety of their employees.

When Joan Baez was refused part of her Justice Department file, she sued under FOIA and lost. Upholding the government's use of Exemption 1, the D.C. Circuit stated that "if the description in the affidavits demonstrates that the information logically falls within the claimed exemption and if the information is neither controverted by contrary evidence nor agency bad faith, then summary judgment for the government is warranted." Baez was required to pay the court costs of the Justice Department since it was the prevailing party.<sup>38</sup>

And in Hayden v. National Security Agency<sup>39</sup> the same court, rejecting the argument that because some sensitive information was public all of it should be, noted that "This is precisely the sort of situation where Congress intended reviewing courts to respect the expertise of an agency; for us to insist that the agency's rationale here is implausible would be to overstep the proper limits of the judicial role in FOIA review."

The Navasky case which follows, while it engages Exemptions 3 and 5 as well as the national security exemption, summarizes a good deal of case law and expresses the supportive mood of federal courts toward Exemption 1 claims.

METZNER, D.J.:

This matter is before the court on defendant's motion for summary judgment.

uments relating to clandestine book publishing activities of the defendant, Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), throughout the world. Such activity was briefly discussed in the Final Report of the Select Committee to Study Governmental Operations with Respect to Intelligence Activities. S.Rep. No. 94-755, 94th Cong.2d Sess. (1976) (Church Committee Report), vol. 1 at 192-95, 198-99, 453-54.

For the reasons discussed below, partial summary judgment is granted at this time.

In 1977, after plaintiff's initial request for the subject documents had been denied through administrative appeal, plaintiff filed this suit to require production of three categories of documents: (1) "The titles, authors and publishers of the 'well over a thousand books' referred to in Volume I" of the Church Committee report; (2) "All CIA materials made available to the members of the staff of the Church Committee relating to books produced, subsidized or sponsored by the CIA up to the present time;" and (3) "All other CIA materials and files relating to" such books "whether or not made available to the Church Committee."

The CIA in its answer claimed exemption under the statute. Plaintiff then filed a motion for a detailed justification and index of the CIA's claims of exemption pursuant to Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F.2d 82 (D.C.Cir.1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 977 (1974). The CIA responded with an index of 85 documents in answer to the first two categories of plaintiff's request for production. A 20-page affidavit of John H. Stein, Associate Deputy Director of the Directorate of Operations of the CIA, accompanying the index, set forth the justification for withholding the documents. Expurgated copies of 61 of the 85 documents were attached to the index, with all substantive content deleted. On the basis of these submissions, the CIA now moves for summary judgment.

Before turning to the merits of the instant motion, the court will dispose of the question of in camera inspection that has arisen as a result of the order of October 12, 1979. At that time the court ordered production of certain of the indexed documents for in camera inspection. After further consideration, however, it has become clear that in camera inspection would serve no useful purpose at this time.

There is no doubt that, subsequent to the 1974 amendments to the FOIA, a court may order in camera inspection of exemption 1 and 3 materials. See, e.g., Lead Industries Association, Inc. v. Occupational Safety and Health Administration, 610 F.2d 70, 87 (2d Cir.1979); Ray v. Turner, 587 F.2d 1187, 1194, 1195 (D.C.Cir.1978); Weissman v. CIA, 565 F.2d 692, 696 * * * (D.C.Cir.1977); Bell v. United States, 563 F.2d 484, 487 (1st Cir.1977).

The ultimate criterion is simply this: whether the district judge believes that in camera inspection is needed in order to make a responsible de novo determination on the claims of exemption. Ray v. Turner, supra at 1195.

In camera inspection is essential to responsible de novo determination where the agency's public description of the withheld material is insufficient to allow the court to determine whether its nature is such as to justify nondisclosure under the claimed exemption, or where the court, based on the record before it, wishes to satisfy an "uneasiness" or "doubt" that the exemption claim may be overbroad. Ray v. Turner, supra at 1195; Lamont v. Department of Justice, 475 F.Supp. 761, 768-69 (D.N.Y.1979).

In the instant case, there is no issue as to the nature of the items deleted by the CIA. Plaintiff's argument is that the materials as described by the agency are not properly withheld. Furthermore, for the reasons discussed below, it is premature for the court to determine whether some of the defendant's claims are overbroad and whether nonexempt portions can be segregated. Resolution of these questions demands more complete agency justification of certain of its exemption claims. See Founding Church of Scientology v. National Security Agency, 610 F.2d 824, 833 * * (D.C.Cir.1979). The court therefore withdraws the order for in camera inspection.

Defendant justifies its nondisclosure of the material on the basis of FOIA exemptions 1, 3 and 5. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1), (3) and (5).

Exemption 1 excludes matters that are "(A) specifically authorized under criteria established by an Executive order to be kept secret in the interest of national defense or foreign policy and (B) are in fact properly classified pursuant to such Executive order." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1). The CIA claims that the deleted material is currently and properly classified pursuant to Executive Order 12065, 3 Fed.Reg. 190 (June 28, 1978) (the EO), under which information concerning "intelligence activities, sources or methods" or "foreign relations or foreign activities of the United States" may be classified if "an original classification authority * * * determines that its unauthorized disclosure reasonably could be expected to cause at least identifiable damage to the national security." EO 12065 § 1-301(c), (d), § 1-302.

Exemption 3 excludes "matters that are * * * specifically exempted from disclosure by statute * * *." The CIA relies on the final proviso of section 102(d)(3) of the National Security Act of 1947 (sometimes referred to as the CIA charter), 50 U.S.C. § 403(d)(3), which states that "the Director of Central Intelligence shall be responsible for protecting intelligence sources and methods from unauthorized disclosure."

Exemption 5 exempts "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency."

The principal issues raised herein involve the question of whether exempt status should be accorded to the focal item of plaintiff's request, namely, "the list of English language books, published in the United States with secret CIA funds," and more specifically, "the authors and titles of American-made books where the author was unaware of CIA involvement." Plaintiff requested the other materials "only to insure that the request would encompass [his] chief interest * * *" and the issues arising with respect to them do not require extended discussion.

Several general principles guide the court in its review of the CIA's exemption claims herein. First, the court must make a de novo determination, but in doing so it must accord "substantial weight" to agency affidavits. Hayden v. National Security Agency/Central Security Service, 608 F.2d 1381, 1384 (D.C.Cir.1979). * * * Second, the agency has the burden of justifying nondisclosure by establishing the applicability of the exemption to the particular material. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3); Hayden, supra at 1386; Vaughn v. Rosen, supra at 823. Specifically, "[i]f the exemption is claimed on the basis of national security, the District Court must * * * be satisfied that proper procedures have been followed and that by its sufficient description the contested document logically falls into the category of the exemption indicated." Ray, supra at 1195; Weissman, supra at 697. See also, Hayden, supra at 1387. Third, the FOIA exemptions are to be construed narrowly, "in such a way as to provide the maximum access consonant with the overall purposes of the Act." Vaughn, supra at 823. See also, Hayden, supra at 1386; Phillippi v. Central Intelligence Agency, 546 F.2d 1009, 1011 n. 2 (D.C.Cir.1976). Finally, "[i]t is well settled in Freedom of Information Act cases as in any others that '[s]ummary judgment may be granted only if the moving party proves that no substantial and material facts are in dispute and that he is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.'" Founding Church of Scientology, 610 F.2d at 836, quoting from National Cable Television

Ass'n v. FCC, 479 F.2d 183, 186 (D.C.Cir. 1973).

With these principles in mind, we turn now to the contentions of the parties.

We will first discuss exemption 3. Plaintiff contends that the activities concerning which he is seeking information were ultra vires the CIA charter. The court is aware of four cases in which illegal CIA activity was claimed as the basis for denying the exemption. In Weissman v. CIA, 565 F.2d 692 (D.C.Cir. 1977), the court found that there was no basis for justification under exemption 7 where the action was illegal under the CIA charter. However, that holding was predicated on the limitation in exemption 7 to a "lawful national security intelligence investigation * * *." [Emphasis added.] However, the court remanded the matter to the district court to determine whether the same nondisclosures were justified under exemption 3. The inference to be drawn from such action is that illegality is not a bar to an otherwise valid justification under exemption 3.

A similar inference flows from the remand in Marks v. Central Intelligence Agency, 590 F.2d 997 (D.C.Cir.1978).

This position has been confirmed, albeit somewhat cryptically, in the footnote of a recent decision involving an exemption 3 claim by the National Security Agency (NSA). Founding Church of Scientology, supra at 829 n. 49. The court, after citing the plaintiff's reliance in that case on the "recent investigation by the Church Committee of gross illegalities on the part of intelligence agencies," noted in passing that:

Although NSA would have no protectable interest in suppressing information simply because its release might uncloak an illegal operation, it may properly withhold records gathered illegally if divulgence would reveal currently viable information channels. * * *

The court offered no further discussion of the point. However, it seems clear that it considered the question of illegality irrelevant to the exemption claims, which it found to turn on the sole issue of whether intelligence sources, illegal or legal, would be revealed.

Finally, on a motion to compel answers to interrogatories requesting a specification whether a CIA intelligence source or method was "domestic," one district court has ruled that "[t]o the extent that such a source may be used, unlawfully, in a domestic investigatory or intelligence activity, the clear implication of Weissman is that the lawfulness of the activity is not relevant to the CIA's successful invocation of exemption (b)(3)." Marks v. Turner, Docket No. 77-1108 (D.D.C. June 6, 1978) at 3.

Consequently, I find that a claim of activities ultra vires the CIA charter is irrelevant to an exemption 3 claim.

There still remains under exemption 3, however, the questions of whether the book publishing activities described the Church Committee Report constitute "intelligence methods" and whether the authors and publishers of the books are "intelligence sources" within the meaning of section 403(d)(3). Defendant has flatly asserted that they are, while plaintiff strenuously urges that they are not, without further elaboration.

There is a paucity of information regarding the phrase "intelligence sources and methods." It is not defined in the National Security Act of 1947, and it received very little treatment in the congressional debates. See Church Committee Report at 138-139. Nevertheless, defendant bears the burden of justifying nondisclosure, and it has not convinced the court that authors, publishers and books logically fall into the categories of "intelligence sources and methods."

Section 403(d)(3) empowers the CIA "to correlate and evaluate intelligence relating to the national security and provide for the appropriate dissemination of such intelligence within the Government," and provides that the other agencies "shall continue to collect, evaluate, correlate and disseminate departmental intelligence."

The Church Committee defines "intelligence" as "the product resulting from the collection, collation, evaluation, analysis, integration, and interpretation of all collected information." Church Committee Report, vol. 1 at 624.

Indeed, nothing in the legislative history of the Act indicates that covert propaganda activities of the kind involved here were contemplated by Congress. See Church Committee Report at 132, 476-492. It is therefore doubtful that the term "intelligence" as used in Section 403(d)(3) was intended to include such activities.

Finally, the National Security Council directive which first authorized the CIA to conduct covert "psychological" (propaganda) operations under the authority of the National Security Act of 1947 justified that authorization as follows: "The similarity of operational methods involved in covert psychological and intelligence activities * * * renders the CIA the logical agency to conduct such operations." NSC-4-A, 12/17/47. Church Committee Report at 490. This directive recognizes that it is dealing with separate and distinct activities related solely by the similarity of methods used in each.

I accept the definition of "intelligence" as formulated by the Church Committee and apply it to the word as used in section 403(d)(3). Essentially it is a product resulting from the original collection of information. The "intelligence sources and methods" language of section 403(d)(3), therefore, cannot be applied to protect authors, publishers and books involved in clandestine propaganda activities from disclosure.

This conclusion is bolstered by the general rule that FOIA exemptions are to be construed narrowly, Vaughn, supra at 823; Hayden, supra at 1386; Phillippi, supra at 1011 n. 2; Founding Church of Scientology, supra at 829.

Of course, it may be that, although authors, publishers and books themselves are not intelligence sources and methods, their disclosure in some or all cases could reasonably be expected to lead to disclosure of intelligence sources and methods. Similarly, disclosure may lead to the disclosure of the names of CIA personnel exempted under section 403g. In either case, nondisclosure would be proper. See, e.g., Phillippi, supra at 1015 n. 14. However, because defendant has justified nondisclosure on the assumption that authors, publishers and books were intelligence sources and methods, it is impossible for the court, on the basis of the affidavit presently before it, to distinguish the valid from the invalid exemption claims. Therefore, summary judgment is inappropriate at this time on the basis of exemption 3.

Exemption 1 requires separate analysis. Although both section 403(d)(3) and the EO protect "intelligence sources and methods" (EO § 1-301(c)), the EO also permits classification of documents concerning "foreign relations or foreign activities of the United States" (EO § 1-301(d)). For the reasons discussed above in conjunction with exemption 3, Section 1-301(c) does not sustain a claim under exemption 1 on the basis of the affidavit submitted by defendant. However, documents shown to concern foreign relations or activities of the United States could properly be classified if their disclosure "reasonably could be expected to cause at least identifiable damage to the national security." EO § 1-302.

Plaintiff's ultra vires challenge based on EO § 1-601 has no relevance for the very same reason that this challenge fails as to exemption 3. Section 1-601 prohibits "classification to conceal violations of law * * *." The only issue to be considered here is whether the withheld document concerns foreign relations or activities of the United States and whether disclosure reasonably could be expected to cause identifiable damage to the national security. See, Bennett v. United States Department of Defense, 419 F.Supp. 663, 666 (D.N.Y.1976). If properly classified under sections 1-301(d) and 1-302, then by definition it has not been classified "to conceal violations of law" as prohibited by section 1-601. Furthermore, any documents properly classified under EO § 1-301(c) as intelligence sources, activities and methods, as "intelligence" has been defined, would be subject to protection under exemption 3, regardless of their ultra vires nature.

Plaintiff challenges the exemption 1 claim on the ground that Stein failed to balance the public interest in disclosure against the need for classification. Such balancing, however, is not a requisite of classification. It is used only in reviewing presently classified documents to determine whether the classification should be continued.

When making such review, section 3-303 requires the agency to weigh the public interest in disclosure only when "questions arise" as to whether the interest in disclosure outweighs the further need for classification. The EO does not specify how such questions "arise"; that issue was left to the agencies. * * * The CIA regulation implementing section 3-303 enumerates five circumstances in which a question is deemed to arise as to whether the public interest in disclosure outweighs continued classification. These criteria seem perfectly reasonable. Stein has determined that none of these circumstances exist in the present case and therefore that a balancing is not required here. The court agrees.

We turn then to the question remaining as to whether defendant's "foreign relations and activities" claim has sufficiently set forth a "reasonable basis for finding potential harm from disclosure." Hayden, supra at 1387.

This aspect of de novo review, especially in the area of national security, is circumscribed by the congressional mandate that a court accord "substantial weight" to agency affidavits. S.Rep. No. 1200, 93d Cong., 2d Sess. 12 (1974). The court, in examining the Agency's arguments, is not to substitute its judgment for that of the Agency in this area of agency expertise, for "[f]ew judges have the skill or experience to weigh the repercussions of disclosure" of such information. Weissman, supra at 697. [Emphasis added.]

After review of the Stein affidavit the court finds that plausible justifications of identifiable damage to the national security have been made with respect to the following: (1) information identifying a foreign country involved; (2) the existence of a liaison with foreign governments or foreign intelligence services; (3) the location of CIA overseas installations; (4) the identities of individuals in foreign countries, disclosure of which would endanger their lives; (5) United States sponsorship of covert operations in foreign countries; (6) information disclosure of which would otherwise subvert foreign covert operations; (7) information disclosure of which would disrupt foreign relations; (8) information regarding intelligence activities, sources and methods, as "intelligence" has been defined herein; (9) information from foreign intelligence services (see EO § 1-303); (10) cryptonyms and pseudonyms.

The court expressly rejects the defendant's claims of identifiable harm based on possible loss of employment, harm to reputation, or embarrassment resulting to those exposed. The EO does not exempt material due to the possibility of such consequences. See EO § 1-601. Such claims are more properly raised under the privacy provisions of exemption 6—a route which defendant has expressly declined to follow.

Plaintiff argues, however, that prior disclosure of several of the titles and operational details of the CIA's book publishing activities in the Church Committee Report and in the media belies the defendant's claim of present threat of identifiable harm required by the EO. Certainly, the fact that titles already have been released, whether officially or unofficially, disposes of defendant's "blueprint" theory, i.e., that the disclosure of one title will allow persons interested in exposing CIA activities to uncover the general modus operandi of such projects. Suppressing information on that theory would frustrate the policies of the FOIA without even arguably advancing countervailing considerations. See, Founding Church of Scientology, supra at 832.

However, the CIA also asserts that Agency disclosure would constitute official acknowledgment of its involvement in foreign clandestine book publishing activities, and, as such, could have serious foreign relations consequences. This argument appears eminently reasonable; in the area of international diplomacy there is a difference between unofficial speculation and official acknowledgment of government action. Marks v. Central Intelligence Agency, 426 F.Supp. 708, 712 (D.D.C.1976), aff'd, 590 F.2d 997 (D.C.Cir. 1978). * * *

Since in this case proper nondisclosure under exemption 1 has been limited to information which would have foreign relations consequences if released (EO § 1-301(d)), plaintiff's attack based on prior disclosure must fail.

The fact that some of the documents pertain to activities over thirteen to thirty years old does not per se divest them of current national security significance. Bell v. United States, 563 F.2d at 486. Stein has found that disclosure of the material withheld would pose present national security risks. "This is precisely the sort of situation where Congress intended reviewing courts to respect the expertise of an agency. * * *." Hayden v. National Security Agency, supra at 1388. * * * Therefore plaintiff's bald assertion to the contrary cannot defeat defendant's exemption claim.

Plaintiff's reiteration of the arguments of prior disclosure and alleged staleness in the exemption 3 context is clearly improper. A showing of potential harm is generally not required to sustain an exemption 3 claim. Baker v. Central Intelligence Agency, supra; Goland v. Central Intelligence Agency, 607 F.2d 339 (D.C.Cir.1978); Marks v. Turner, supra.

Plaintiff attacks the claims for exemption under 1 and 3 on the ground that the justification submitted by the government is descriptively insufficient. This contention brings the court to a consideration of the requirement in de novo review that "by its sufficient description, [each] contested document logically falls into the category of the exemption indicated." Ray v. Turner, supra at 1195; Weissman, supra at 697; Hayden, supra at 1387.

The agency's affidavit will pass muster in this regard if it (1) shows in nonconclusory and detailed fashion that the deleted material involves an exempted category of material; (2) lists the deletions; (3) makes clear which exemptions are claimed for the deletions; and (4) explains why the deleted material fits in with the exemption claimed. Goland v. Central Intelligence Agency, supra at 351-52. Mere recitation of the statutory standards or vague and sweeping claims will not suffice. Hayden, supra at 1387; Founding Church of Scientology, supra at 830; Goland, supra at 351.

The court has already found that, with respect to the ten specific types of deleted material enumerated above, the agency has justified, in sufficiently detailed fashion, its claim of exemption under exemption 1. Thus, for those enumerated justifications, the agency has complied with the first of the four Goland criteria.

As to the other three conditions, the court, with certain exceptions noted below, finds sufficient the method adopted by the CIA in its index of keying specific deletions from each of the documents to the categories of deletions justified in the Stein affidavit. This method is sufficiently detailed as to each document because it indicates, on a deletion-by-deletion—rather than a document-by-document—basis the nature of the information from each document that has been withheld. Since nondisclosure of each category of deleted information has been justified in the Stein affidavit, the result is a description of how disclosure of each deletion would have untoward national security results, in a way that avoids the risk of overbroad exemption. Cf. Lamont v. Department of Justice, 475 F.Supp. 761 (S.D.N.Y.1979).

Of course, the adequacy of this procedure does not make valid the justifications which the court has rejected. Most importantly, as to the exemption 1 and 3 claims based on the "intelligence sources and methods" language of section 403(d)(3) of the National Security Act of 1947 and section 1-301(c) of the EO, the Agency has not made a sufficient showing. The affidavit must provide additional information from which the court can conclude that release of the withheld material can reasonably be expected to lead to disclosure of intelligence sources and methods. * *

It is impossible for the court to offer further guidance at this stage as to what would constitute a sufficient showing. The court therefore merely refers defendant to the fourth Goland criterion listed above. If defendant determines that it cannot offer further public explanation of such claims without risking disclosure of the withheld information, it may submit an affidavit for in camera inspection by the court. The court can then release any information in the affidavit which it finds to be nonsensitive. Hayden, supra at 1385; Founding Church of Scientology, supra at 833; Ray, supra at 1218 n. 81; Phillipi, supra at 1013.

In addition to its exemption 1 and 3 claims, defendant has withheld certain documents which were prepared in response to specific questions from the Church Committee as congressional records not subject to FOIA requests under 5 U.S.C. § 551(1)(A), or alternatively under exemption 5, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5). The latter provision exempts "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency."

Plaintiff argues that the documents are not congressional materials and therefore not exempt from FOIA, nor are they "inter-agency memorandums," since the term "agency" is expressly defined to exclude Congress, 5 U.S.C. § 551(1)(A).

The justification for exemption 5 fails because Congress is not an "agency." Insofar as "intra-agency" action is concerned, Congress still controls the documents.

The court in Goland v. Central Intelligence Agency, supra at 347, set forth three factors to be considered when an agency withholds a congressionally generated document in its possession: (1) the congressional prerogative to prevent disclosure of its own confidential materials; (2) the danger of inhibiting legislative and judicial branches from making documents available to the executive; and (3) Congress' interest in exchanging documents with agencies as part of its oversight authority. Goland, supra at 346, 347 n. 48.

Clearly, the documents at issue here were generated by the Agency, not Congress. But they were generated in direct response to the specific request of the Church Committee as part of its exercise of congressional oversight authority. Moreover, the Committee has expressed its wish that no material prepared for it in response to its express interests or resulting from its specific requests be released unless disclosure is approved by vote of the Committee.

Such a clear indication of congressional intention to retain control over the documents, coupled with the proper judicial deference to the congressional oversight process mandated by Goland convinces the court that the documents at issue should be deemed exempt from disclosure under the Goland rule.

Of course, portions of documents not generated at the direction of the Church Committee which contain information also appearing in the documents that were so generated are not exempt under the Goland rationale.

For the reasons discussed above, summary judgment is granted to defendant with respect to all deletions in the index. * * *

Summary judgment is denied with respect to all deletions under [other] categories * * * without prejudice to a renewal on sufficient showing of exemption. * *

So ordered.

Exemption 2

This provision exempts matters "related solely to the internal personnel rules and practices of an agency."

A public interest test has been promulgated in the major Supreme Court decision involving Exemption 2, Department of the Air Force v. Rose, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 2509, 425 U.S. 352 (1976). The Court was prepared to exempt trivial matters "in which the public could not reasonably be expected to have an interest," and this would relieve an agency from having to maintain unnecessary public files. But where there is "a genuine and significant public interest" (perhaps as reflected in editorial judgments) disclosure is compelled except "where disclosure may risk circumvention of agency regulation." That is, material may be exempt if disclosure would reveal investigative or prosecutorial strategies.

Rose involved an attempt by law review editors to compel disclosure of case summaries of honors and ethics hearings at the Air Academy with names and other personal references deleted. The district court without in camera inspection granted the Department's motion for summary judgment on the ground that the summaries were "matters * * * related solely to the internal personnel rules and practices of an agency." The court of appeals reversed on the ground that in camera inspection must precede either an Exemption 2 or an Exemption 6 (a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy) application.

Circuit courts, as the Hardy case below illustrates, are divided on whether those parts of agency staff manuals which reveal investigative or prosecutorial strategies are protected under Exemption 2 because their publication would show people how to circumvent agency regulations or because they could not reasonably be expected to have any legitimate public interest.

HARDY v. BUREAU OF ALCOHOL, TOBACCO AND FIREARMS

6 MED.L.RPTR. 2236, 631 F.2D 653 (9TH CIR. 1980).

FARRIS, Circuit Judge:

The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms appeals the district court's order requiring it to disclose, pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552, certain portions of its manual entitled "Raids and Searches (Special Agent Basic Training—Criminal Enforcement)." We reverse and remand.

This suit was brought under the Freedom of Information Act by an attorney, David T. Hardy, who sought disclosure of the manual, "Raids and Searches," allegedly for research purposes. On Hardy's initial request the Bureau had disclosed parts of the manual, but had withheld portions concerning techniques used in making law enforcement raids and in conducting searches. The Bureau submitted a detailed affidavit to the district court outlining the subject of each withheld portion; the affidavit explained how disclosure would enable violators to evade or hinder law enforcement personnel. The Bureau claimed that these portions were exempt under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(2). The district court disagreed but used its equitable powers to protect certain of the withheld portions from disclosure on the theory that disclosure would "significantly impede the enforcement process." The court ordered the Bureau to disclose the rest of the withheld portions.

We base our holding on 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(2). Under this provision, referred to as "Exemption 2," an agency may refuse to disclose materials "related solely to the internal personnel rules and practices of an agency." From its wording, this exemption would appear to apply to the contested portions of the manual here, were it not for the differing interpretations given by the reports of the two Houses of Congress. See Caplan v. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco & Firearms, 587 F.2d 544, 546 * * * (2d Cir. 1978). But see 1 K. Davis, Administrative Law Treatise § 5.30 (2d ed. Supp. 1980). * * *

Supreme Court guidance on interpreting this exemption is found in Department of Air Force v. Rose, 425 U.S. 352 * * * (1976). There a student researcher sought disclosure of case summaries of the Air Force Academy's honor and ethics hearings. The Air Force had argued that the summaries were exempt under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(2). The Court found that the "primary focus of the House Report was on exemption of disclosures that might enable the regulated to circumvent agency regulation. * * *." 425 U.S. at 366-67. The Court specifically declined to consider whether the exemption would apply where a risk of circumvention existed, and indicated that the Senate report should be followed only when this was not a concern. The Court concluded:

In sum, we think that, at least where the situation is not one where disclosure may risk circumvention of agency regulation, Exemption 2 is not applicable to matters subject to such a genuine and significant public interest. Id. at 369.

Assuming that disclosure of the contested portions of the "Raids and Searches" manual would "risk circumvention of agency regulation," we are squarely presented with the issue that the Supreme Court declined to consider in Rose.

While no circuit has considered the specific issue which squarely confronts us, five other circuits have considered whether materials similar to those contested here would be subject to disclosure. They have all indicated that such materials would not be subject to disclosure. See Caplan v. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco & Firearms, 587 F.2d 544, 547 (2d Cir. 1978) (discussion of the issue; same holding); Stokes v. Brennan, 476 F.2d 699, 702 (5th Cir. 1973); Hawkes v. Internal Revenue Service, 467 F.2d 787, 795 (6th Cir. 1972); Cox v. United States Dept. of Justice, 601 F.2d 1, 4 * * * (D.C.Cir.1979); Sladek v. Bensinger, 605 F.2d 899, 901 (5th Cir. 1979) (indicating that the question is as yet undecided in the Fifth Circuit). See also 1 K. Davis, Administrative Law Treatise § 5.30, at 36 (2d ed. Supp.1980). Although these circuits agree that law enforcement materials like those contested here need not be disclosed, they use three different interpretations of the act to reach this result. After considering the three alternative interpretations, we adopt that of the Second Circuit, which has held that law enforcement materials, the disclosure of which may risk circumvention of agency regulation, are exempt under Exemption 2, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(2). Caplan v. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco & Firearms, 587 F.2d 544, 547 (2d Cir. 1978).<sup>2</sup> The Supreme Court opinion in Rose not only does not preclude but furnishes support for this interpretation. As the House report indicates, the language of Exemption 2 is susceptible of this interpretation. Materials instructing law enforcement agents on how to investigate violations concern internal personnel practices. Further, this interpretation is in keeping with the structure of the statute, requiring everything to be disclosed except that which falls within the specific exemptions of subsection (b). See 5 U.S.C. § 552(c); NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 136 * * * (1975).

Our interpretation is buttressed by the 1967 amendment to § 552(b)(7). That amendment exempts investigatory records to the extent that production would "disclose investigatory techniques and procedures." This exemption would be pointless unless the manuals instructing agents in those techniques and procedures were also exempt from disclosure.

In adopting the Second Circuit's interpretation of the act, we necessarily reject those of the District of Columbia and Eighth Circuits. While the District of Columbia Circuit has held that similar materials are exempt under Exemption 2, it based its decision not on the risk of circumvention of agency regulation but on the ground that they are materials "in which the public could not reasonably be expected to have a legitimate interest." Cox v. United States Department of Justice, 601 F.2d 1, 4 * * * (D.C.Cir.1979). This "legitimate interest" test is based on an interpretation of the Senate report's discussion of Exemption 2. See Jordan v. United States Department of Justice, 591 F.2d 753, 771 * * * (D.C.Cir.1978) (en banc). Although this approach may reach the same result as the one we adopt, it places courts in the difficult position of determining when the interest of the pub- lic in governmental matters is "legitimate." [Emphasis added.] * * *

We hold that law enforcement materials, disclosure of which may risk circumvention of agency regulation, are exempt from disclosure. In so ruling we recognize the distinction between "law enforcement" and "administrative" materials. See, e.g., Hawkes v. Internal Revenue Service, 467 F.2d 787, 794-95 (6th Cir.1972). "Law enforcement" materials involve methods of enforcing the laws, however interpreted, and "administrative" materials involve the definition of the violation and the procedures required to prosecute the offense. All administrative materials, even if included in staff manuals that otherwise concern law enforcement, must be disclosed unless they come under one of the other exemptions of the act. Such materials contain the "secret law" which was the primary target of the act's broad disclosure provisions. Cox v. United States Department of Justice, 601 F.2d 1, 5 * * * (D.C.Cir.1979). Further, as the Supreme Court observed in Department of the Air Force v. Rose, 425 U.S. 352, 369 (1976), the thrust of Exemption 2 is not to limit disclosure to "secret law" but to relieve agencies of the burden of disclosing information in which the public does not have a legitimate interest. Materials that solely concern law enforcement are exempt under Exemption 2 if disclosure may risk circumvention of agency regulation.

When an agency believes that materials sought in a Freedom of Information Act suit are within the exempt category of law enforcement materials herein described, it should submit to the district court a detailed affidavit describing how disclosure would risk circumvention of agency regulation. See Cuneo v. Schlesinger, 484 F.2d 1086, 1092 (D.C.Cir.1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 977 (1974). If the explanation is reasonable, the district court should find the materials exempt from disclosure, unless in camera examination shows that they contain secret law or that the agency has not fairly described the contents in its affidavit. See Cox v. United States Dept. of Justice, 576 F.2d 1302, 1311-12 (8th Cir. 1978). In such a case, those portions not covered by the affidavit or containing secret law may be ordered disclosed. Whether the agency's explanation is reasonable is a question of law and rulings by other courts concerning the same materials should be given weight.

2. But see Jordan v. Department of Justice, 591 F.2d 753, 771 * * * (D.C.Cir.1978) (considering the issue and reaching an opposite result).

We remand to the district court for a review of the affidavit of the Bureau and the contested portions of the manual to determine whether they involve law enforcement material, the disclosure of which would risk circumvention of agency regulation. If so, the material is exempt from disclosure.

Reversed and remanded.

COMMENT

A week after Hardy was announced, that part of the same Bureau's training manual dealing with surveillance of premises and persons was held by the D. C. Circuit not to be exempt under Exemption 2. Relying on its own en banc decision in Jordan v. United States Department of Justice<sup>40</sup> (discussed in Hardy), the court, basing its decision on the proposition alternative to that applied in Hardy, concluded:

There can be little doubt that citizens have an interest in the manner in which they may be observed by federal agents. * * * Neither exemption (b)(2) nor any other exemption prevents a citizen from satisfying his curiosity on these matters. The contents of this document sought by Crooker [the plaintiff] pertaining to surveillance of the public cannot possibly be assimilated to mere "internal housekeeping" concerns. Crooker v. Bureau of Alco- hol, Tobacco and Firearms, 6 Med.L. Rptr. 2327, 670 F.2d 1051 (D.C.Cir.1981).

Exemption 3

Under this exemption, called by the Reporters Committee the "catch-all" exemption and a major access loophole, information need not be disclosed if "specifically exempted from disclosure by statute * * * provided that such statute (A) [clearly] requires that the matters be withheld from the public or (B) establishes particular criteria for [discretionary] withholding or [narrowly specifies] particular types of [informational] matters to be withheld."

The Supreme Court liberally construed Exemption 3 in Administrator, FAA v. Robertson, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 2465, 422 U.S. 255 (1975). There the plaintiff sought FAA reports analyzing the operation and maintenance performance of commercial airlines. Section 1104 of the Federal Aviation Act permitted the administrator to withhold reports if disclosure was not in the public interest and if a person contributing information objected. The Air Transport Association objected, arguing that without confidentiality the performance program would be endangered.

Robertson won at district and appeals court levels, but the Supreme Court reversed. Chief Justice Burger wrote for the Court that the information sought was expressly exempt by statute, and the statute, because it ensured a flow of information to the agency, was not inconsistent with the disclosure policy of FOIA. In a concurring opinion, Justice Stewart said that the only determination "in a district court's de novo inquiry is the factual existence of such a statute, regardless of how unwise, self-protective, or inadvertent the enactment might be."

Congress reacted to Robertson by amending FOIA in 1976 to narrow the scope of the information it shielded. As amended, Exemption 3 requires that the government show 1) that the requested information falls within the scope of the statute cited, and 2) that the statute either vests no discretion to disclose (that is that it mandates secrecy), or that the information fits criteria delineated to authorize withholding.

Exemption 3's legislative history does specify some of the statutes that can or cannot be used to justify the use of this section of FOIA. Federal agencies have cited approximately 100 statutes to justify withholding. Courts have held records exempt under the Consumer Product Safety Act,<sup>41</sup> the National Security Act,<sup>42</sup> federal laws allowing the CIA to prevent unauthorized disclosure,<sup>43</sup> and federal rules protecting material related to grand jury proceedings.<sup>44</sup> Courts have also upheld Exemption 3 claims in cases involving Census Bureau records, tax returns, patent applications, the Privacy Act, and the Postal Reorganization Act.

In these cases, courts are often faced with the difficult task of weighing one federal law against another and rationalizing their choice.

Exemption 4

Exempted under 4 are "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential."

Trade secrets would be, for example, secret formulae or customer lists, valuable in day-to-day transactions and not generally known in the trade. Commercial or financial information covered by the Exemption is confidential material, the disclosure of which "would be likely to cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the information was obtained" or "impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future." National Parks and Conservation Association v. Morton, 498 F.2d 765 (D.C.Cir.1974).

"Specific factual or evidentiary material"<sup>45</sup> must be submitted to sustain the burden of proof under Exemption 4, a burden borne by the federal agency. "Conclusory and generalized allegations are * * * unacceptable as a means of sustaining the burden of nondisclosure under the FOIA, since such allegations necessarily elude the beneficial scrutiny of adversary proceedings, prevent adequate appellate review and generally frustrate the fair assertion of rights under the [a]ct."<sup>46</sup>

Moreover, substantial competitive harm can only be shown by proving that persons from whom documents have been obtained by the government actually face competition.<sup>47</sup>

Before 1979, persons supplying information to the government would frequently sue to block disclosure to third parties. These were called reverse FOIA suits. In Chrysler Corporation v. Brown, 4 Med.L. Rptr. 2441, 441 U.S. 281 (1979), the U. S. Supreme Court held that FOIA does not create a private right of action to enjoin or prevent an agency from releasing documents covered by one of the nine exemptions. Information suppliers could, of course, review an agency's decision to release Exemption 4 documents under Section 10(e) of the Administrative Procedures Act, 5 U.S.C. § 706(2)(A). That section authorizes a court to set aside agency action that is "arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law."

A decision to assert an FOIA exemption is at the discretion of an agency; it is not mandatory that an agency do so, as a reverse FOIA suit would imply. But it would be an abuse of discretion to release documents covered by the Trade Secrets Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1905. A submitter of confidential business information, such as customer lists, can invoke the Trade Secrets Act to bar disclosure by an agency unless that disclosure is authorized by law or by some agency regulation that is in turn authorized by Congress.

Neither the FOIA nor the Housekeeping Statute, 5 U.S.C. § 301, are congressional grants of authority for an agency to issue regulations exempting materials from the Trade Secrets Act's nondisclosure rule. The Court held essentially that a statute authorizing an agency to collect information is, by definition, authorization to disclose that information.

Justice Rehnquist's opinion for the Court in Chrysler is a complex analysis of FOIA's legislative history, especially with reference to Exemption 4, but its essence is probably contained in footnote 12's allusion to a 1965 Senate Report on the bill:

It is not an easy task to balance the opposing interests [secrecy v. disclosure], but it is not an impossible one either. It is not necessary to conclude that to protect one of the interests, the other, must of necessity, either be abrogated or substantially subordinated. Success lies in providing a workable formula which encompasses, balances, and protects all interests, yet places emphasis on the fullest possible disclosure. [Emphasis added.]<sup>48</sup>

Section 6(f) of the FTC Act, 15 U.S.C. § 46(f), provides that the Commission has power to make public all information it has obtained, except trade secrets and names of customers. In Interco v. FTC, 478 F.Supp. 103 (D.D.C.1979), both district and circuit courts held that § 6(f) was authorization for the FTC to release materials within the scope of FOIA Exemption 4 unless such materials constitute trade secrets or customer lists. The Trade Secrets Act, therefore, does not prevent the FTC from releasing to the public confidential business information other than trade secrets and business lists.

The FTC has defined trade secrets to mean only information with enduring, intrinsic value, primarily secret product formulae, processes, or other secret technical information. The courts in Interco accepted that definition.

It should not be surprising that concerted efforts are continually made to exempt business information from the disclosure requirements of FOIA. In the first four years of the act, corporations were by far its largest users. In the fall of 1980, a House-Senate Conference Committee amended the Federal Trade Commission Act to exempt large areas of FTC documents relating to pricing policies, product safety, and truth-in-advertising. In June 1981, another Conference Committee exempted large areas of documents held by the Consumer Products Safety Commission, including information relating to safety and warranty data. And in July 1981, Congress amended the Omnibus Tax Bill, exempting from disclosure the auditing standards and rules adopted by the Internal Revenue Service.

In December of 1981, the Senate Subcommittee on the Constitution reported on S.1730, the Freedom of Information Reform 48. S.Rep.No.813, 89th Cong., 1st Sess., 3 (1965).

Act which then went before the Senate Judicial Committee. The act sought generalized and comprehensive changes in FOIA.

Exemption 5

This exemption prevents disclosure of "interagency or intra-agency memoranda or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency."

As construed in NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 1 Med.L.Rptr. 2471, 421 U.S. 132 (1975), Exemption 5 is intended to protect "predecisional communications," but not "communications made after the decision and designed to explain it." The Court reasoned that disclosure of memoranda generated before the deliberative process was complete might diminish the quality of decision making. Advisers might be less candid if their recommendations were subject to public scrutiny.

Renegotiation Board v. Grumman Aircraft Engineering Corp., 1 Med.L.Rptr. 2487, 421 U.S. 168 (1975), also gave the exemption a broad construction. Only the report of an agency vested with the final decisional authority is releasable. Memos, recommendations, opinions, policy statements expressly mentioned in a report may be releasable (barring a legitimate Exemption 7 claim) because they constitute the basis for final decision.

If no memorandum or other document explains the final decision, the agency has no obligation to prepare one under FOIA.

Exemption 5 has been called the "executive privilege" exemption. It protects working papers, studies, and reports circulated among agency personnel prior to the making of a decision. Its purpose is to encourage frank discussion. For example, FOIA requires that university research grant applications and progress reports submitted to the federal government be made public on demand. Letters of evaluation, however, that are part of the peer review process, may be kept secret as intra-agency memoranda.<sup>49</sup> Purely factual information, such as names and addresses of unsuccessful applicants for federal funds, is not exempt from disclosure. Nor are factual portions of predecisional documents generally exempt, unless their disclosure would breach a promise of confidentiality and diminish the agency's ability to obtain similar information in the future or unless a compilation of facts would expose the deliberative process itself.

Federal district courts, in camera, may decide whether predecisional policy statements, proposals, and letters between agency officials contain factual material that is not exempt.<sup>50</sup>

The distinction between predecisional and postdecisional material is the key to understanding Exemption 5. A Watergate Special Prosecution Force memorandum, expressly incorporated into the group's required report to Congress recommending that Richard Nixon not be indicted, was held disclosable, Exemption 5 notwithstanding, because it was part of a final opinion. Standing alone, it would have been exempt as a "predecisional intra-agency legal memorandum."<sup>51</sup>

In Bristol-Myers Co. v. FTC, 4 Med.L.Rptr. 1379, 598 F.2d 18 (D.C.Cir.1978) the court of appeals held that the FTC's "Blue Minutes," which included written explanations by commissioners of their decisions not to include certain charges in a complaint or not to proceed by rulemaking, would have to be disclosed.

49. Washington Research Project v. HEW, 504 F.2d 238 (D.C.Cir.1974).

50. Union of Concerned Scientists v. Atomic Energy Commission, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1458, 499 F.2d 1069 (D.D.C.1974).

51. Niemeier v. Watergate Special Prosecution Force, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 1321, 565 F.2d 967 (7th Cir. 1977).

But Exemption 5 does protect against disclosure the attorney-client privilege—communications between an agency and its attorney or another agency acting as attorney, such as the U.S. Department of Justice—or an attorney's work-product if disclosure would reveal trial strategies.

National Public Radio reporter Barbara Newman found herself blocked by Exemption 5 when she tried to get information from the Department of Justice concerning its investigation into the mysterious death of Karen Silkwood, employee of a plutonium manufacturer. Silkwood, suspected of being contaminated by plutonium, was killed in a car accident while on her way to conduct business on behalf of her labor union and to talk with a New York Times reporter. There were suspicions that her car had been forced off the highway, and a file of documents she was carrying was never recovered. (See p. 401.)

Using FOIA, Newman sought access to files marked "death investigation" and "contamination." The former was denied on grounds of Exemption 5, the latter on grounds of Exemption 7.

Portions of the "death investigation" file consisted of the working papers of Department of Justice attorneys, including notes and observations for personal use in analyzing evidence and legal issues, said a federal district court. They were clearly exempt under the NLRB v. Sears standard applicable to "memoranda prepared by an attorney in contemplation of litigation which set forth the attorney's theory of the case, his litigation strategy." National Public Radio v. Bell, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1808, 431 F.Supp. 509 (D.D.C.1977)

When Rolling Stone magazine tried to find out why so many major news media could be persuaded by the CIA not to publish information about the "Glomar Project"—Jack Anderson was not and broke the story—it was denied access to the full record on the basis of Exemptions 1, 3, 5, and 6. The material was said to contain information properly classified and therefore within the scope of Exemption 1, an argument similar to that pressed in Military Audit Report v. Casey (see p. 445). Because release of the information could reasonably be expected to lead to "disclosure of intelligence sources and methods," protected by separate federal statutes, it was also exempt under FOIA Exemption 3. As to Exemption 5, the court explained as follows.

PHILLIPPI v. CIA

6 MED.L.RPTR. 1673 (D.D.C.1980).

GASCH, J.:

* * *

This exemption is intended to give the government the same privilege in FOIA cases that it would enjoy in the civil discovery context. NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 152 * * * (1975). While Exemption 5 is multi-faceted, the defendants are claiming only the protection of that branch of the privilege which protects the "deliberative process."

This privilege is unique to government and is intended to prevent the fear of subsequent disclosure from inhibiting the frank expression of views among government officials to the detriment of the decisionmaking process. Jordan v. Department of Justice, 591 F.2d 753, 772 * * * (D.C.Cir.1978). To qualify for the privilege, a communication first, must be predecisional and second, contain advice or opinion of a deliberative nature. Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, 644 F.2d 969 (D.C.Cir.1981). Factual matter contained in such communications is not exempt and must be disclosed unless it is inextricably intertwined with the decisionmaking process. EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 93 (1973); Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy. * * *

Documents * * * being withheld in reliance on Exemption 5, are summarized transcripts of conversations between then

CIA Director Colby and other high level government officials concerning the agency's efforts to prevent publication of HGE [Hughes Glomar Explorer] stories. Of these six documents, four relate conversations between Mr. Colby and then Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, General Brent Scowcroft. Of the remaining two, one reports a conversation with an unidentified official apparently in the Executive branch and the other reports a conversation with a member of Congress. Because the agency's affidavits left some doubt as to whether these documents were wholly exempt from disclosure, the Court has examined these documents in camera. See EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. at 93.

Having examined these documents, the Court has concluded that they are of the type protected by Exemption 5. The disclosure of these documents would reveal the frank exchange of views among high level government officials and would inhibit the candid expression of ideas crucial to the decisionmaking process. Mead Data Central, Inc. v. United States Department of the Air Force, 566 F.2d 242, 256 (D.C.Cir.1977). While some of the information contained in these documents is of a factual nature, the disclosure of any meaningful parts of the documents would impinge upon policymaking processes within the protection of Exemption 5. EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. at 92. For these reasons, the Court has concluded that documents * * * are being properly withheld pursuant to Exemption 5.

Exemption 6

Exempted are "personnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy."

In the reports accompanying the original FOIA, Congress explicitly authorized the courts to employ a balancing of interests test. The Supreme Court obliged in Department of the Air Force v. Rose where it held that mere storage of information in a personnel or related file did not insulate it. "Rather, Congress sought to construct an exemption that would require a balancing of the individual's right of privacy against the preservation of the basic purpose of the Freedom of Information Act 'to open agency action to the light of public scrutiny.' The device adopted to achieve that balance was the limited exemption, where privacy was threatened—for 'clearly unwarranted' invasions of personal privacy." Not all invasions of privacy are meant to be unlawful under FOIA.

Litigation under this exemption thus devolves upon a de novo judicial weighing of the public interest served by disclosure against the private interest served by non-disclosure. Several considerations may tip the balance one way or the other:

a. Some courts gauge public interest by the purpose to which information will be put. For example, disclosure which would further the requester's commercial interests (Wine Hobby U.S.A., Inc. v. IRS, 502 F.2d 133 (3d Cir.1974)) has been accorded less weight than disclosure for less materialistic purposes. The Supreme Court did emphasize in Rose that FOIA should be applied evenhandedly "to any purpose." The use in Wine Hobby of a "properly and directly concerned" test for disclosure is not supported by the legislative history of FOIA, and it blunts the purpose of the act.

b. "Clearly unwarranted invasions of privacy" have been narrowed to protect only "intimate personal details" in personnel, medical, or related files, and the courts may determine de novo whether exempt portions can be segregated.

c. That a promise of confidentiality would be breached by disclosure adds weight to a claim of exemption. But the mere fact that a supplier was assured confidentiality is insufficient in itself, Ackerly v. Ley, 420 F.2d 1336 (D.C.Cir.1969). This is also true in Exemption 4 cases where the issue of confidentiality arises more frequently. See also, Kurzton v. Health and Human Services, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 1591, 649 F.2d 65 (1st Cir.1981). Names and addresses of unsuccessful research grant applicants said not exempt as "personnel, medical or similar" files.

A 1982 case expanded the scope of the language "personnel, medical and similar files." State Department records indicating whether or not a person holds a U.S. passport were said to be "similar" files and exempt where a privacy interest would outweigh the public interest in disclosure. The Washington Post was trying to establish the citizenship of two former Iranian officials. The government, in invoking Exemption 6, said that it was concerned about the safety of the two men. Department of State v. Washington Post, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1521, 595 U.S. 456, 102 S.Ct. 1957 (1982).

Small Business Administration records that contain the names of noncorporate recipients of funds under one of its programs and that reveal amounts and balances of noncorporate loans classified as "delinquent," "in liquidation," or "charge off," but are not subject to public legal proceedings, were said not to be "similar" files protected against disclosure under Exemption 6. Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. SBA, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1284, 670 F.2d 610 (5th Cir. 1982).

In an earlier case involving the Small Business Administration, a federal district court awarded attorney's fees to the Miami Herald in view of the public benefit derived from publication of the information and the unreasonableness of the government in trying to withhold it.<sup>52</sup>

ture. Sometimes this can be achieved by deleting names or otherwise identifying data before a document is released. Those applying for government contracts, research funds, or other government benefits are deemed to have waived their rights to privacy.

In the Exemption 6 portion of Rolling Stone's effort to get "Glomar Project" information, the D.C. District Court held that CIA documents identifying news media personnel contacted by the agency in order to prevent publication, but that did not reveal any personal details on character or integrity, were not "personnel, medical or similar files" exempt under FOIA. But documents in the same file that ambiguously identified certain persons connected with Glomar and would significantly invade personal privacy were exempt under Exemption 6.

PHILLIPPI v. CIA

6 MED.L.RPTR. 1673 (D.D.C.1980).

GASCH, J.:

The Court's inquiry in Exemption 6 cases must proceed in two steps. The threshold question is whether the documents in issue are the type contemplated by the exemption's reference to personnel, medical and similar files. Board of Trade v. CFTC, No. 77-0560, slip op. at 11 (D.C. Cir.1980); Plain Dealer Publishing Co. v. Department of Labor, 471 F.Supp. 1023, 1026 (D.D.C.1979). While it is a relatively simple task to determine that documents are properly considered personnel or medical files, the reference to "similar files" is slightly more vague. It is, however, fairly clear that Exemption 6 protection is intended for files that implicate the same values as personnel or medical files. That is, the information being withheld must be the type that, if disclosed, would subject individuals to the potential embarrassment or imposition of publicly revealing details about their personal lives. Board of Trade v. CFTC, slip op. at 10-11; Ditlow v. Schultz, 517 F.2d 166, 170 (D.C. Cir.1975).

---

The Court's inquiry does not end with a finding that the documents are "similar files" within the meaning of Exemption 6. The exemption does not protect all such files from disclosure but only such as would "constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." It is only where the public interest in disclosure is clearly outweighed by the individual's interest in privacy that the former must yield to the latter. This determination necessitates a case by case balancing of the respective interests. Department of the Air Force v. Rose, 425 U.S. 352, 370 * * * (1976); Getman v. NLRB, 450 F.2d 670, 673 (D.C.Cir.1971).

Applying these considerations to the present case, the Court has determined that the documents as they pertain to media personnel, * * * are not the type contemplated by the Exemption 6 reference to "similar files" and must be revealed to the plaintiff. On the other hand, the revelation of the identities of the individuals * * * and withheld pursuant to Exemption 6 would compromise the privacy of those individuals while advancing no identifiable public interest in disclosure. These deletions are being properly withheld pursuant to Exemption 6 of the FOIA.

It is undisputed that [some] deletions represent the names of media personnel which appear in the documents. Each of these deletions is separately designated by a numeral. A total of forty-two names were initially in dispute. One of the documents had made reference to the individual designated "E-14" [the files were designated by letters and numerals] having a "drinking problem" and plaintiff withdrew her request for the identity of that individual. The defendants agreed to contact the remaining forty-one individuals and ask if they had any objection to the revelation of their identities. Of these, thirty responded that they had no objection and their names have been released to the plaintiff. Two, "E-16" and "E-14", responded that they would prefer that their names not be disclosed and plaintiff is no longer seeking these. The remaining nine individuals made no response and disclosure of their identities is now in dispute.

The Court has examined the redacted documents in which these deletions appear. The documents do not reveal any personal details about these individuals. They do not cast suspicion on the character or integrity of these individuals. The documents merely report in unambiguous terms that these individuals had in the course of their own journalistic investigations uncovered the government's involvement with the HGE [Hughes Glomer Experiment] and/or had been contacted by the CIA in its efforts to prevent publication of these stories.

The defendants' position seems to be that revelation of the fact that these individuals suppressed stories at the urging of the CIA would damage their professional reputations. This assertion is belied by the fact that thirty of thirty-two individuals stated that they had no objection to revelation of their identities.

The Court has determined that the identities of these individuals as they appear in the documents are not within the intended scope of Exemption 6 and should be disclosed to the plaintiff. Because the Court has determined that these documents are not "personnel," "medical" or "similar files" within the meaning of Exemption 6, there is no need to inquire further into the relative weight of the interests in disclosure and privacy. Board of Trade v. CFTC, slip op. at 13; Plain Dealer Publishing Co. v. Department of Labor, 471 F.Supp. at 1026, n. 4 (D.D.C.1979).

The affidavits indicate that all of the "J" deletions refer to the names of private individuals not related to the HGE project.

Unlike the individuals designated by the "E" deletions, however, the documents are not unambiguous as to the extent that individuals designated by the letter "J" participated with the CIA in the HGE project. The mere mention of an individual in a CIA file may be insufficient to warrant the protection of Exemption 6, Ray v. Turner, 587 F.2d at 1198 (per curiam); Fonda v. CIA, 434 F.Supp. 498, 506 (D.D.C.1977), but the mention of an individual which unfairly leads to the suggestion that the individual participated in a covert intelligence operation with the CIA clearly warrants weighing that individual's interest in privacy against the public interest in disclosure. Cf. Ray v. Turner, 468 F.Supp. 730, 737 (D.D.C.1979) (on remand) (names of individuals found on the person of a narcotics smuggler held exempt from disclosure).

The Court cannot discern any identifiable interest which would be advanced by disclosure of these names. The plaintiff asserts that there is a substantial public interest in the relationship between the CIA and the press and that these deletions detract "from the informative value of these documents." Assuming that this interest exists, it is still impossible to ascertain how the identities of these individuals will make any significant contribution to the public beyond the information already contained in the redacted documents.

The Court has determined that disclosure of the identities of these individuals would be a significant invasion of their personal privacy and would advance no public interest in disclosure. For the reasons stated above, the deletions designated by the letter "J" are being properly withheld pursuant to Exemption 6 of the FOIA.

COMMENT

The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia upheld the district court on all counts, although its discussion focused almost entirely on Exemption 3, material the disclosure of which would compromise intelligence sources and methods.<sup>53</sup>

Since the "clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy" language of Exemption 6 connects it with the Federal Privacy Act of 1974, we shall encounter that ill-defined concept again. It is also part of the language of Exemption 7.

Exemption 7

This exemption protects "investigatory records compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such records would (A) interfere with enforcement proceedings, (B) deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or an impartial adjudication, (C) constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy, (D) disclose the identity of a confidential source and, in the case of a record compiled by a criminal law enforcement authority in the course of a criminal investigation, or by an agency conducting a lawful national security intelligence investigation, confidential information furnished only by the confidential source, (E) disclose investigative techniques and procedures, or (F) endanger the life or physical safety of law enforcement personnel."

More economical language in the original exemption was expanded in the 1974 amendments to FOIA specifically to override increasingly broad interpretations which were bringing more and more information under the protective umbrella of Exemption 7.

To qualify under this exemption, the government must first show that the record is both "investigatory" and contained in a file "compiled for law enforcement purposes." Law enforcement embraces civil, criminal, administrative, and judicial proceedings. If the material passes this threshold to qualify as exempt, then it must in addition fall within one of the six enumerated categories causing a specified harm. Clauses (A), (C), and (D) have generated the most litigation.

53. Phillippi v. CIA, 7 Med.L.Rptr. 2006, 655 F.2d 1325 (D.C.Cir.1981).

While most records having to do with current investigations of specific crimes or administrative enforcement proceedings (interviews, affidavits, agency notes) are exempt, rap sheets, arrest and conviction records, department manuals, personnel rosters, and other routine compilations and records are not.

In NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 3 Med.L.Rptr. 2473, 437 U.S. 214 (1978), the Supreme Court held that copies of witness statements which NLRB rules preclude from discovery prior to unfair labor practices hearings were exempt under FOIA Exemption 7(A).

When a plaintiff in an FTC antitrust suit filed an FOIA request for documents that it had failed to request during discovery, a federal district court, discussing Exemption 7(A) said:

"It is clear that where there is an ongoing administrative enforcement proceeding during which plaintiff has been provided with an opportunity to engage in discovery, plaintiff may not use the FOIA to augment the material produced by discovery."<sup>54</sup> So records on the case in FTC investigatory files were properly exempted from disclosure.

All FBI investigatory records are, for purposes of satisfying FOIA Exemption 7, "compiled for law enforcement purposes." The legality of a particular investigation or the sufficiency of a connection between the investigation and federal law enforcement goals generally do not matter. The FBI, however, must still satisfy Exemption 7's remaining criteria in order to withhold disclosure.<sup>55</sup>

Clause (A) exemptions generally apply only when an enforcement proceeding has actually begun or when it is clear that an ongoing investigation will lead to an enforcement proceeding. When an enforcement proceeding has concluded, for example, after trial, conviction and sentencing, the exemption does not apply.

Clause (C) exemptions are designed to prevent unwarranted invasions of personal privacy through disclosure of investigatory records compiled for law enforcement purposes. But the seriousness of the invasion is to be weighed against the public interest to be served by disclosure.<sup>56</sup> For example, the Sixth Circuit approved the redacting or obliteration of information contained in file material collected during the discovery process in civil cases arising out of the 1970 killings by the National Guard of four Kent State University students. The court balanced First Amendment interests against privacy rights and the interests of the law enforcement agencies involved.<sup>57</sup>

A hard blow against access was struck by the U.S. Supreme Court in May 1982 when it upheld Exemption 7(C) claims by the FBI against requests of an independent journalist that FBI documents on Nixon Administration critics be made public. The D.C. Circuit, reversing the district court, had held that FBI information on certain public personalities, which was prepared at the request of the White House and which had not been shown to have been compiled for law enforcement purposes, even though invasive of privacy, was not exempt from disclosure under 7(C). A divided Supreme Court in turn reversed the court of appeals.

Among those on the "enemies list" were Kenneth Galbraith, Reinhold Niebuhr, Benjamin Spock, and Cesar Chavez. The crux of the Court's holding seemed to be that material originally exempt under 7(C) doesn't lose that exemption simply because it is transmitted to a second agency in slightly different form. And, of course, the Court assumed that the original compilation was for law enforcement purposes. To what extent does the ruling expand Exemption 7 by creating a "born classified" category of information? The Court is also concerned about the flow of essential information to the government being slowed down by the court of appeals' position (see fn. 12).

FBI v. ABRAMSON

Justice WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

As the case comes to us, it is agreed that the information withheld by the Bureau was originally compiled for law enforcement purposes. It is also settled that the name check summaries were developed pursuant to a request from the White House for information about certain public personalities and were not compiled for law enforcement purposes. Finally, it is not disputed that if the threshold requirement of Exemption 7 is met—if the documents were compiled for law enforcement purposes—the disclosure of such information would be an unwarranted invasion of privacy. The sole question for decision is whether information originally compiled for law enforcement purposes loses its Section 7 exemption if summarized in a new document not created for law enforcement purposes.

No express answer is provided by the statutory language or by the legislative history. The Court of Appeals resolved the question in favor of Abramson by construing the threshold requirement of Exemption 7 in the following manner. The cover letter to the White House, along with the accompanying summaries and attachments, constituted a "record". Because that "record" was not compiled for law-enforcement purposes, the material within it could not qualify for the exemption, regardless of the purpose for which that material was originally gathered and recorded and regardless of the impact that disclosure of such information would produce. The Court of Appeals supported its interpretation by distinguishing between documents and information. "The statutory scheme of the FOIA very clearly indicates that exemptions from disclosure apply only to documents, and not to the use of the information contained in such documents." — U.S.App.D.C. —, 658 F.2d at 813. A "record" is a "document" and, for the Court of Appeals, the document must be treated as a unit for purposes of deciding whether it was prepared for law enforcement purposes. The threshold requirement for qualifying under Exemption 7 turns on the purpose for which the document sought to be withheld was prepared, not on the purpose for which the material included in the document was collected. The Court of Appeals would apply this rule even when the information for which the exemption is claimed appears in the requested document in the form essentially identical to the original memorialization.

The Court of Appeals' view is a tenable construction of Exemption 7, but there is another interpretation, equally plausible on the face of the statute, of the requirement that the record sought to be withheld must have been prepared for law enforcement purposes. If a requested document, such as the one sent to the White House in this case, contains or essentially reproduces all or part of a record that was previously compiled for law enforcement reasons, it is reasonably arguable that the law enforcement record does not lose its exemption by its subsequent inclusion in a document created for a non-exempt purpose. The Court of Appeals itself pointed the way to this alternative construction by indicating that Exemption 7 protected attachments to the name check summaries that were duplicates of original records compiled for law enforcement purposes. Those records would not lose their exemption by being included in a later compilation made for political purposes. Although in this case the duplicate law enforcement records were attached to the name check summaries, the result hardly should be different if all or part of the prior record were quoted verbatim in the new document. That document, even though it may be delivered to another agency for a non-exempt purpose, contains a "record" qualifying for consideration under Exemption 7.

The question is whether FOIA permits the same result where the exempt record is not reproduced verbatim but is accurately reflected in summary form. The Court of Appeals would have it that because the FBI summarized the relevant records rather than reproducing them verbatim, the identical information no longer qualifies for the exemption. The originally compiled record and the derivative summary would be treated completely differently although the content of the information is the same and although the reasons for maintaining its confidentiality remain equally strong. We are of the view, however, that the statutory language is reasonably construable to protect that part of an otherwise non-exempt compilation which essentially reproduces and is substantially the equivalent of all or part of an earlier record made for law enforcement uses. Moreover, that construction of the statute rather than the interpretation embraced by the Court of Appeals, more accurately reflects the intention of Congress, is more consistent with the structure of the Act, and more fully serves the purposes of the statute.

FOIA contains no definition of the term "record". Throughout the legislative history of the 1974 amendments, representatives and senators used interchangeably such terms as "documents", "records", "matters", and "information". Furthermore, in determining whether information in a requested record should be released, the Act consistently focuses on the nature of the information and the effects of disclosure. After enumerating the nine exemptions from the FOIA, Congress expressly directed that "any reasonably segregable portion of a record" be "provided to any person requesting such record after deletion of the portions which are exempt. * * *" § 552(b). This provision requires agencies and courts to differentiate among the contents of a document rather than to treat it as an indivisible "record" for FOIA purposes. When a record is requested, it is permissible for an agency to divide the record into parts that are exempt and parts that are not exempt, based on the kind of information contained in the respective parts.

The 1974 amendments modified Exemption 7 in two ways. First, by substituting the word "records" for "files," Congress intended for courts to "consider the nature of the particular document as to which exemption was claimed, in order to avoid the possibility of impermissible 'commingling' by an agency's placing in an investigatory file material that did not legitimately have to be kept confidential." NLRB v. Robins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 229-230 (1978). Second, by enumerating six particular objectives of the exemption, the amendments required reviewing courts to "look to the reasons" for allowing withholding of information. Id., at 230. The requirement that one of six types of harm must be demonstrated to prevent production of a record compiled for law enforcement purposes was a reaction to a line of cases decided by the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit which read the original Exemption 7 as protecting all law enforcement files.<sup>11</sup> The amendment requires that the government "specify some harm in order to claim the exemption" rather than "affording all law enforcement matters a blanket exemption." * * * The enumeration of these categories of undesirable consequences indicates Congress believed the harm of disclosing this type of information would outweigh its benefits. There is nothing to suggest, and no reason for believing, that Congress would have preferred a different outcome simply because the information is now reproduced in a non-law enforcement record.

The Court of Appeals would protect information compiled in a law enforcement record when transferred in original form to another agency for non-exempt purposes but would withdraw that protection if the same information or record is transmitted in slightly different form. In terms of the statutory objectives, this distinction makes little sense.<sup>12</sup> If the Court of Appeals is correct that this kind of information should be disclosed, its position leaves an obvious means of qualifying for the exemption—transmittal of the law enforcement records intact. Conversely, to the extent that Congress intended information initially gathered in the course of a law enforcement investigation to remain private, the Court of Appeals' decision creates a substantial prospect that this purpose, the very reason for Exemption 7's existence, will no longer be served.

Neither are we persuaded by the several other arguments Abramson submits in support of the decision below.

First, we reject the argument that the legitimate interests in protecting information from disclosure under Exemption 7 are satisfied by other exemptions when a record has been recompiled for a non-law

11. Senator Hart, the sponsor of the 1974 Amendment, stated specifically that the amendment's purpose was to respond to four decisions of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit which cumulatively held that all material found in an investigatory file compiled for law enforcement purposes was exempt, even if an enforcement proceeding were neither imminent nor likely. Weisberg v. United States Department of Justice, 489 F.2d 1195, 1198 (D.C.Cir.1973), cert. denied, 416 U.S. 993 (1974); Aspin v. Department of Defense, 491 F.2d 24, 30 (D.C.Cir.1973); Ditlow v. Brinegar, 494 F.2d 1073 (D.C.Cir.1974); Center for National Policy Review on Race and Urban Issues v. Weinberger, 502 F.2d 370 (D.C.Cir.1974). These four cases, in Senator Hart's view, erected a "stone wall" preventing public access to any material in an investigatory file.

12. Information transmitted for a non-law enforcement purpose may well still be used in an ongoing investigation. Moreover, by compromising the confidentiality of information gathered for law enforcement purposes, the Court of Appeals' decision could result in restricting the flow of essential information to the government. Deputy Attorney General Schmults stated before the Second Circuit Judicial Conference (May 9, 1981) that "[t]he risk of disclosure of FBI records has made private persons, nonfederal law enforcement officials, and informants reticent about providing vital information. Many informants have actually stopped cooperating with the FBI, for example, because they feared that their identities would be disclosed under the Act." Quoted in 16 Harv.Civil Rights-Civil Liberties L.Rev., at 315 (1981). See FOIA Update (Dept. of Justice, Sept. 1981) 1 ("[E]xperience of the FBI and DEA indicate that there is a widespread perception among confidential information sources that federal investigators cannot fully guarantee the confidentiality of information because of FOIA") The Drug Enforcement Administration claims that 40% of FOIA requests come from convicted felons, many of whom are seeking information with which to identify the informants who helped to convict them. Freedom of Information Act Oversight Hearings before Subcomm. of Comm. on Govt. Operations, 97th Cong., 1st Sess., 165 (Statement of Jonathan Rose, Dept. of Justice); see also Dept. of Justice, Attorney General's Task Force on Violent Crime, at 32 (1981).

The Court has previously recognized that the purposes of the exemptions do not disappear when information is incorporated in a new document or otherwise put to a different use. See NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 166 (1975) (Document protected by exemption 7 does not become discloseable solely because it is referred to in a final agency opinion; "reasons underlying Congress' decision to protect investigatory files remain applicable.") enforcement purpose. In particular, Abramson submits that Exemption 6 suffices to protect the privacy interest of individuals. Even if this were so with respect to the particular information requested in this case, the threshold inquiry of what constitutes compilation for law enforcement purposes must be considered with regard for all six of the types of harm stemming from disclosure that Congress sought to prevent. Assuming that Exemption 6 provided fully comparable protection against disclosures which would constitute unwarranted invasions of privacy, a questionable proposition itself, no such companion provision in the FOIA would halt the disclosure of information that might deprive an individual of a fair trial, interrupt a law enforcement investigation, safeguard confidential law enforcement techniques, or even protect the physical well-being of law enforcement personnel. No other provision of FOIA could compensate for the potential disruption in the flow of information to law enforcement agencies by individuals who might be deterred from speaking because of the prospect of disclosure. It is therefore critical that the compiled-for-law-enforcement requirement be construed to avoid the release of information that would produce the undesirable results specified.

For much the same reason, the result we reach today is fully consistent without holding in NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 148-154 (1975), that Exemption 5, § 552(b)(5), an exemption protecting from mandatory disclosure pre-decisional communications within an agency and the other internal documents, does not protect internal advisory communication when incorporated in a final agency decision. The purposes behind Exemption 5, protecting the give-and-take of the decisional process, were not violated by disclosure once an agency chooses expressly to adopt a particular text as its official view. As we have explained above, this cannot be said here. The reasons for a § 7 exemption may well remain intact even though information in a law enforcement record is recompiled in another document for a non-law enforcement function.

The result is also consistent with the oft-repeated caveat that FOIA exemptions are to be narrowly construed, Department of Air Force v. Rose, 425 U.S. at 361. While Congress established that the basic policy of the Act is in favor of disclosure, it recognized the important interests served by the exemptions. We are not asked in this case to expand Exemption 7 to agencies or material not envisioned by Congress: "It is * * * necessary for the very operation of our Government to allow it to keep confidential certain material such as the investigatory files of the Federal Bureau of Investigation." S.Rep.No. 813, 89 Cong. 1st Sess. 3 (1965). Reliance on this principle of narrow construction is particularly unpersuasive in this case where it is conceded that the information as originally compiled is exempt under Exemption 7 and where it is the respondent, not the Government, who urges a formalistic reading of the Act.

We are not persuaded that Congress's undeniable concern with possible misuse of governmental information for partisan political activity is the equivalent of a mandate to release any information which might document such activity. Congress did not differentiate between the purposes for which information was requested. NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., supra 421 U.S. at 149. Rather, the Act required assessment of the harm produced by disclosure of certain types of information. Once it is established that information was compiled pursuant to a legitimate law enforcement investigation and that disclosure of such information would lead to one of the listed harms, the information is exempt. Congress thus created a scheme of categorical exclusion; it did not invite a judicial weighing of the benefits and evils of disclosure on a case-by-case basis.

We therefore find that the construction adopted by the Court of Appeals, while plausible on the face of the statute, lacks support in the legislative history and would frustrate the purposes of Exemption 7. We hold that information initially contained in a record made for law-enforcement purposes continues to meet the threshold requirements of Exemption 7 where that recorded information is reproduced or summarized in a new document prepared for a non-law-enforcement purpose. Of course, it is the agency's burden to establish that the requested information originated in a record protected by Exemption 7. The Court of Appeals refused to consider such a showing as a sufficient reason for withholding certain information. The judgment of the Court of Appeals is therefore reversed and the case is remanded to that court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

So ordered.

COMMENT

Joined by Justices Blackmun, Brennan, and Marshall, Justice Sandra O'Connor dissented and charged the majority with rewriting FOIA's Exemption 7 to conform to its concept of public policy. The Exemption's legislative history, she said, left the Court "no reason for overriding the usual presumption that the plain language of a statute controls its construction." Furthermore, doubts ought to be resolved in favor of full agency disclosure. With her three dissenting colleagues, O'Connor agreed with the district court that the documents in the case had been compiled for political, not "law enforcement," purposes.

Taking umbrage and rejecting the premise that the meaning of the statute was plain, Justice White, in a footnote (fn. 7), called much of Justice O'Connor's dissent "rhetorical and beside the point."

Not all FOIA suits turn out as badly for access rights as Abramson. When Playboy sued the Justice Department for disclosure of a task force report on Gary Thomas Rowe, an FBI informant within the Ku Klux Klan, the department interposed Exemptions 2, 3, 5, 6, and 7 (A-D). The D.C. District Court found that Exemptions 2 (internal rules and practices of an agency) and 6 (unwarranted invasion of personal privacy) did not apply to any portion of the report. Nor would Exemption 5 block full disclosure since factual and informational portions of the report were reasonably segregable from those portions which contained the task force's advice, conclusions, and recommendations. Similarly, Exemption 3 was said to apply only to that information contained in the report which related solely to a grand jury proceeding and could be excised.

In view of the department's failure to show that the report itself was an investigatory record compiled for law enforcement purposes, Exemption 7 could not be invoked. Confidential information obtained solely from confidential sources, however, could be withheld. Playboy v. United States Justice Department, 7 Med.L. Rptr. 1269, 516 F.Supp. 233 (D.D.C.1981).

Exemption 8

This exemption protects federal agency reports about the condition of banks and other federally regulated financial institutions. Specifically it refers to records "contained in or related to examination, operating or condition reports prepared by, on behalf of, or for the use of an agency responsible for the regulation or supervision of financial institutions."

In part, Exemption 8 affirms the intention of Congress to protect confidential information similar to that protected by Exemption 4. In one of the few reported Exemption 8 cases, the District of Columbia District Court held that a Securities and Exchange Commission study of a broker-dealer trading problem did not fall within Exemption 8.<sup>58</sup> On the other hand, a New York federal district court noted in dicta that correspondence between a bank and the Federal Reserve Board would probably fall under the Exemption.<sup>59</sup>

Exemption 9

To inhibit speculation based on information about the location of private oil and gas wells, this Exemption incorporates "geological and geophysical information and data, including maps, concerning wells. * * *" The Federal Power Commission used Exemption 9 to deny Ralph Nader access to FPC and American Gas Association estimates of natural gas reserves. Nader contended that the Exemption only applied to geological data and maps that could benefit a competitor. The FPC countered that estimates of reserves were based on such data and indeed could be useful to competing firms.<sup>60</sup>

In 1972 Congress passed the Federal Advisory Committee Act, 5 U.S.C.App. 1, to provide access to information exchanges between the Executive branch of the federal government and outside interest groups that had proffered advice. Again there are exemptions to public access.<sup>61</sup>

The Family Education Rights and Privacy Act of 1974, 20 U.S.C. 1232g (sometimes referred to as the Buckley Amendments), gives parents and students right of access to their own educational records maintained by institutions which received federal funds.

GOVERNMENT-IN-SUNSHINE: THE FEDERAL OPEN MEETINGS LAW

On March 12, 1977, a Government-In-Sunshine Act requiring some fifty federal agencies, commissions, boards, and councils to hold their deliberative meetings in public became law. Any meeting—formal, regular, or bare quorum—in which business is discussed is presumed to be open. Ex parte communications occurring between interested persons and agency members with decision-making power are to be recorded and made part of the public record. Public notice of a meeting is to be made at least one week in advance, preferably with a meaningful agenda.

Since agencies under the new law were permitted to formulate their own rules for open meetings, some extended that process for as long as possible in order to remain tentative about implementation of the law. Even those agencies which were quick to implement the act soon found it more expedient to conduct business between and without regular meetings.

Closed meetings are permitted under ten exemptions, the first nine of which parallel FOIA's exemptions. A Common Cause study of the first three months of the Sunshine Act revealed that 39 percent of agency meetings were closed, 37 percent fully open, and 24 percent partially open. Those figures have since improved for most agencies, although there is frequent litigation over claimed loopholes. Exemption 10, covering an agency's involvement in litigation or adjudication, is invoked often to save a case or a reputation.

The case that follows involved an attempt by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to close its budget preparation process. In deciding for the plaintiff, Common Cause, the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals noted that, unlike FOIA, the Sunshine Act was designed to open, not close, the pre-decisional deliberative process. Here the government unit cited a clause of Exemption 9, an exemption generally closing meetings where disclosure would lead to significant financial speculation or endanger the stability of a financial institution or interfere with a proposed agency action. It also cited Exemptions 2 and 6.

COMMON CAUSE v. NUCLEAR REGULATORY COMMISSION

8 MED.L.RPTR. 1190, 674 F.2D 921 (D.C.Cir.1982).

WRIGHT, J.:

* * *

The language of the exemption is not self-explanatory; we therefore turn to the legislative history for guidance. The House and Senate committee reports give four concrete examples of Exemption 9(B) situations. First, an agency might consider imposing an embargo on foreign shipment of certain goods; if this were publicly known, all of the goods might be exported before the agency had time to act, and the effectiveness of the proposed action would be destroyed. * * * Second, an agency might discuss whether to approve a proposed merger; premature public disclosure of the proposal might make it impossible for the two sides to reach agreement. * * * Third, disclosure of an agency's proposed strategy in collective bargaining with its employees might make it impossible to reach an agreement. * * * Fourth, disclosure of an agency's terms and conditions for purchase of real property might make the proposed purchase impossible or drive up the price.

We construe Exemption 9(B) to cover those situations delineated by the narrow general principles which encompass all four legislative examples. In each of these cases, disclosure of the agency's proposals or negotiating position could affect private decisions by parties other than those who manage the federal government—exporters, potential corporate merger partners, government employees, or owners of real property. The private responses of such persons might damage the regulatory or financial interests of the government as a whole, because in each case the agency's proposed action is one for which the agency takes final responsibility as a governmental entity.

The budget process differs substantially from the examples given by the House and Senate reports. Disclosure of the agency's discussions would not affect private parties' decisions concerning regulated activity or dealings with the government. Rather, the Commission contends that opening budget discussions to the public might affect political decisions by the President and OMB [Office of Management and Budget, which has an oversight responsibility for access laws]. In addition, disclosure would not directly affect "agency action" for which the Commission has the ultimate responsibility. Instead, the Commission fears that disclosure of its time-honored strategies of item-shifting, exaggeration, and fallback positions would give it less leverage in its "arm's length" dealings with OMB and the President, who make the final budget decisions within the Executive Branch. The Commission argues that it would thereby be impaired in its competition with other government agencies—which also serve the public and implement federal legislation—for its desired share of budgetary resources. It is not clear, however, whether the interests of the government as a whole, or the public interest, would be adversely affected.

Moreover, in the budget context the public interest in disclosure differs markedly from its interest in the four situations described in the committee reports. In those cases disclosure would permit either financial gain at government expense or circumvention of agency regulation. In contrast, disclosure of budget deliberations would serve the affirmative purposes of the Sunshine Act: to open government deliberations to public scrutiny, to inform the public "what facts and policy considerations the agency found important in reaching its decision, and what alternatives it considered and rejected," and thereby to permit "wider and more informed public debate of the agency's policies * * *." S.Rep. No. 94-354, at 5-6.

The budget deliberation process is of exceptional importance in agency policy-making. The agency heads must review the entire range of agency programs and responsibilities in order to establish priorities. According to the Commission, a budget meeting "candidly consider[s] the merits and efficiencies of on-going or expected regulatory programs or projects" and then "decides upon the level of regulatory activities it proposes to pursue * * *." * * * These decisions, the government contends, have a significant impact on "the Commission's ability to marshal regulatory powers in a manner which insures the greatest protection of the public health and safety with the most economical use of its limited resources." * * *

If Congress had wished to exempt these deliberations from the Sunshine Act—to preserve the prior practice of budget confidentiality, to reduce the opportunities for lobbying before the President submits his budget to Congress, or for other reasons—it would have expressly so indicated. Absent any such statement of legislative intent, we will not construe Exemption 9(B) of the Sunshine Act to allow budget deliberations to be hidden from the public view.

Thus, the Sunshine Act contains no express exemption for budget deliberations as a whole. Specific items discussed at budget meetings might, however, be exempt and might justify closing portions of commission meetings on an individual and particularized basis.

1. EXEMPTION 9(B)

Exemption 9(B), as we have discussed, protects agency discussions of material whose premature disclosure could affect the decisions or actions of third parties acting in a nongovernmental capacity, thus causing a significant adverse effect upon the government's financial or regulatory interests. * * * Budget meetings might include discussions of specific topics within the coverage of the exemption. Premature disclosure of possible elimination of a program involving private contracts might make it difficult for the contractor to retain key personnel, frustrating the Commission's ability to implement the program effectively if it is not ultimately eliminated. * * * Premature disclosure of proposed cutbacks in joint research projects with foreign governments might adversely affect the United States government's position in negotiations concerning the foreign government's commitment. Premature disclosure of collective bargaining negotiation strategies might adversely affect labor negotiations with the Commission's own employees.

Even if a budget meeting is likely to discuss these topics, however, it may not be closed under Exemption 9(B) "in any instance where the agency has already disclosed to the public the content or nature of its proposed action[.]" 5 U.S.C. § 552b(c)(9)(B) (1976). The Senate report explained that the exemption "only applies when an agency feels it must act in secret[.]" S.Rep. No. 94-354, supra, at 25. Therefore if the private contractor, foreign government, or labor union has already been informed by the Commission that budget cutbacks are being considered in the programs with which they are concerned, then Exemption 9(B) might no longer apply.

Our in camera inspection of the transcripts of the July 27, 1981 and October 15, 1981 Commission meetings leads us to conclude that Exemption 9(B) does not support withholding of any portion of the transcripts.

2. EXEMPTION 2

The Commission also relies on Exemption 2—matters that “relate solely to the internal personnel rules and practices of an agency[.]” 5 U.S.C. § 552b(c)(2) (1976)—to justify closing portions of budget meetings. Under the Commission’s interpretation, Exemption 2 includes discussions of allocation of personnel among programs, evaluations of the performance of offices and projects within the Commission, and consideration of more economical schemes of “internal management.” * * * This construction is belied by the statutory language and legislative history of Exemption 2.

The language in Exemption 2 to the Government in the Sunshine Act is virtually identical with that in Exemption 2 to the Freedom of Information Act. * * * The conference report on the Sunshine Act expressly adopts the standards of Department of Air Force v. Rose, 425 U.S. 352 * * * (1976), the leading Supreme Court decision interpreting Exemption 2 of FOIA. * * * Under this standard, personnel-related discussions at budget meetings fall squarely outside the scope of the exemption.

Budget allocations inevitably impinge on personnel matters, because government cannot implement programs without personnel. Salaries and wages are a sizable proportion of the Commission’s budget. But budget decisions regarding personnel cutbacks, and evaluations of the prior performance of offices and programs, do not relate solely to “internal personnel rules and procedures.” Discussions of possible administrative cost savings through adoption of new “internal management” techniques also fall beyond the narrow confines of Exemption 2, because they deal with the impact of budget cuts on the Commission’s ability to carry out its responsibilities.

Throughout this litigation the Commission has emphasized the importance of the budget process. An affidavit submitted by the Commission asserts that budget discussions lead to presidential recommendations reflecting the President’s “best judgment of how the nation’s fiscal resources should be allocated to meet its future economic and social needs.” * * * The affidavit recognizes that “vital policies and billions of dollars [are] at issue every year[.]” The public can reasonably be expected to have an interest in matters of such importance. Exemption 2 does not permit the Commission to close budget discussions relating to personnel cutbacks or performance.

In some budget meetings the exemption might permit the Commission to close specific portions of the discussion relating “solely to internal personnel rules and practices.” However, in camera inspection shows that Exemption 2 does not apply to any portion of either the July 27, 1981 or the October 15, 1981 meeting.

3. EXEMPTION 6

The government invoked Exemption 6 to justify its decisions to close both meetings at issue; it no longer claims that the exemption protects any of the deliberations at the October 15 meeting. Exemption 6 protects information of a personal nature whose disclosure would constitute “an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy[.]” 5 U.S.C. § 552b(c)(6) (1976). The agency contends that this exemption protects discussion of “an individual manager’s particular qualifications, characteristics and professional competence in connection with a budget request for that particular manager’s program.” * * * This contention is unsupported by the legislative history of the Sunshine Act.

Exemption 6 applies to information of a personal nature, including discussions of a person's health, drinking habits, or financial circumstances. It provides greater protection to private individuals, including applicants for federal grants and officials of regulated private companies, and to low-level government employees, than to government officials with executive responsibilities. * * * S.Rep. No. 94-354, supra, at 21-22. It was not intended to shelter substandard performance by government executives. The Senate report expressly noted that "if the discussion centered on the alleged incompetence with which a Government official has carried out his duties it might well be appropriate to keep the meeting open, since in that case the public has a special interest in knowing how well agency employees are carrying out their public responsibilities." Exemption 6, the report added, "must not be used by an agency to shield itself from political controversy involving the agency and its employees about which the public should be informed." Id. at 21-22. These policy considerations apply a fortiori in the budget process, in which the performance of individual executives may affect the Commission's willingness to allocate budgetary resources to particular regulatory programs.

Given the narrow scope of Exemption 6 as applied to managerial officials, we hold that no portion of the discussion at the July 27, 1981 meeting was covered by Exemption 6. The Commission's discussion of individual performance was limited to managerial officials with executive responsibility.

E. COMPLIANCE WITH THE SUNSHINE ACT

Our in camera inspection of the transcripts of the July 27, 1981 and October 15, 1981 Commission meetings does not show that any portion of either meeting may be withheld from the public under any of the asserted exemptions to the Sunshine Act. We therefore order the Commission to release the transcripts to the public. * * * The transcripts shall be made available in a place readily accessible to the public, and copies shall be furnished to any person at the actual cost of duplication.

If in the future the Commission wishes to close all or any portion of a budget meeting, the statute requires it to announce its intention and to give a brief statement of its reasons. If any person objects to closing of the meeting, he may file a civil action in the District Court to compel the Commission to comply with the statute. He may include an application for interlocutory relief in his complaint, if the meeting has not yet been held. The District Court should act promptly on any motion for interim relief to avoid frustration of the purposes of the Sunshine Act through delay. In its decision on the merits the District Court may examine in camera the transcripts of closed agency meetings and may issue such relief as it deems appropriate, with due regard for orderly administration and the public interest. * * *

OPEN RECORDS AND MEETINGS IN THE STATES

Open Records

1. In 1982, fifty states, the District of Columbia, and the Virgin Islands had open records (freedom of information) laws of some kind. They vary widely, change rapidly, and are therefore difficult to summarize.<sup>62</sup> State courts may construe them broadly or narrowly. Some are more effective than others. Since it is difficult to generalize about them, journalists must know the law of the state in which they work.

---

62. The best such effort is Braverman and Heppler, A Practical Review of State Open Record Laws, 49 George Washington L.Rev. 720 (May 1981).

If one were designing a model statute, the following elements and issues would be important to consider:

a. How are public records defined and by whom? The more expansive the definition, the better for information seekers. State law definitions generally depend on two factors—physical form and the origin of the public record. Physical form may be stated in the law or implied. A Minnesota Supreme Court decision held that agency records (state subsidized abortions) stored on computer tapes were public records subject to the law.<sup>63</sup> In an Ohio case, microfilm was similarly defined.<sup>64</sup> As to origin, most state laws and court rulings consider the source of the record and the reason for its being kept. On this point, some laws are expansive,<sup>65</sup> some restrictive, covering, for example, only material “required to be kept by law”<sup>66</sup> or “pursuant to law.”<sup>67</sup>

As with FOIA, agencies are not required to create or acquire records in response to a request; they are responsible only for existing, identifiable records in their possession and subject to the law.

Definitions of agencies subject to the law are broad and sometimes tied to public funding, in whole or in part. Nongovernmental agencies receiving public funds may also be included. A state-created agency that is federally funded and performs federal functions could be subject to both state open records laws and FOIA.

A majority of states have separate open records laws for their courts and legislatures, and case law appears to support courts' being defined as public agencies.<sup>68</sup> There is no comparable case law for access to legislatures.

Of all restrictions on access to records, the broadest is a “public interest nondisclosure” provision as found in the laws of California<sup>69</sup> and Colorado.<sup>70</sup> Arizona and New York courts, among others, have held that a common law nondisclosure privilege survives if the law does not speak to it.

Ideally, all records, whether required to be kept or not and for whatever purpose, ought to be included in a definition of records. And they should be defined as to content as well as to source (custodial officer or agency).

b. Who may use the laws and for what purpose? In most states the right applies to “any person,” as is the case with FOIA. But some eighteen state laws restrict access to citizens of the state. No state retains the common law requirement that a requester have a “special interest.” Corporations, partnerships, firms, citizens groups, and associations are included as requesters in state statutes and in their interpretation by the courts. In three states—Arizona, Rhode Island, and Washington—the requester must have “no commercial purpose.” State courts have considered a requester's purpose in determining whether an exemption covers the material, but usually the record keeper has no discretion over "purpose."

c. What exemptions ought to be allowed? In all states, prior statutes exempt from disclosure specific kinds of information, but state open records laws rarely specify which earlier laws are overriding. Generally they fall in the categories of welfare, tax, bank, education, medical, unemployment compensation, child placement or abuse, and law enforcement and criminal history records.

The last-named category has been unusually problematical for reporters. When a newspaper requested records under New York's Freedom of Information Law, records having to do with complaints of police harassment and use of force, the information was said to constitute personnel records and was therefore exempt.<sup>71</sup> A Missouri Sunshine Law amendment provided for expungement of certain arrest records. When the St. Louis Globe Democrat challenged the amendment on grounds of both the First Amendment and the Missouri constitution, it was turned back. Richmond Newspapers was said by a Missouri federal district court not to apply because that decision was based on a "tradition" of public attendance at trials. There was no such "tradition" of public access to arrest records.<sup>72</sup>

Exemptions are often those included in the federal FOIA, and courts are expected to resolve conflicts with the public interest in favor of disclosure. State laws are divided between those which make disclosure mandatory and those which make it discretionary. In the absence of legislative guidance, state courts could follow FOIA's Chrysler Corp. v. Brown, making agency disclosure discretionary even though an exemption has been shown to apply.

Some state laws contain myriad exemptions. Michigan's Freedom of Information Act has twenty. Wisconsin, Alabama, and North Dakota laws have none. New York's open records law specifies what records are to be open instead of assuming that all governmental records are open by definition, except those expressly exempted.

The most common exemptions found in state laws are the familiar categories of information made confidential by state or federal law, law enforcement and investigatory files, trade secrets and commercial information, predecisional departmental communications, personal privacy, and information relating to litigation against a public body. Ten states have added tax return data and land value information. A few state laws exempt test and examination scores.

FOIA's requirement that "reasonably segregable" portions of a record be disclosed even if other portions are exempt is followed in only five states. State courts have interpreted state laws, however, to meet the federal requirement, illustrating once again that the well-developed body of federal law provides precedent for state cases.

d. Is agency information indexed, and is there a right to copy government documents? Most state laws would permit an index; a few require them. And all state laws, except Indiana's, provide for copying at specified and reasonable rates. Only South Carolina's law follows FOIA in waiving search and copy costs when it is in the "public interest" to do so.<sup>73</sup>

e. What procedures must a citizen, or the press, follow in gaining access to records, and how are state open records laws enforced? Only California's law provides FOIA-type guidance for a requester.<sup>74</sup> Time limits for an agency response to a request for information vary from three days in Kentucky to no limit in most states. Rhode Island and District of Columbia laws specify the consequences of failure to comply within their time limits: this would constitute a denial indicating that the requester has exhausted administrative remedies and may seek judicial review. In other states the requester could seek a writ of mandamus to compel a response or assume that inaction is a denial of a request warranting judicial review.

Some state laws allow courts to grant injunctive relief or to require agencies to show cause why such relief should not be granted. In all but sixteen states the laws specifically provide for judicial review, and most provide for de novo review of denials and a right of in camera inspection by the courts. Here a court may determine the applicability of a claimed exemption unfettered by any presumption in favor of the legitimacy of the agency determination.

Many state laws provide for action intermediate to an agency decision or a court ruling such as appeal to the agency, to the state attorney general, or a state FOI commission. Some are optional, some mandatory.

As with FOIA, the burden of proof in state open records laws is on the agencies. And as to penalties for noncompliance, eighteen states provide criminal sanctions, eight civil fines, and fifteen no penalties at all. Ten state laws have provisions for reimbursing attorney's fees where there has been improper denial by an agency. Many state access procedures need to be streamlined in terms of expense and delay.

However fluid the foregoing figures may be, and in spite of sanctions in some state laws, there remains a great deal of de facto classification and denial of access by state agencies. Reporters, their editors, their organizations, and their attorneys must be watchful of those in government who would close, often capriciously and arbitrarily, public records and meetings to public scrutiny.

Denials of access to records which appear to be illegal should be challenged. The journalist should speak to supervisors, ask for written authority for denial, write down reasons given for denial, and generally do what is necessary to develop a record covering the incident. When exceptions or exemptions are cited, they should be presented with precision.

2. In the 80s, state legislators sought to amend or repeal many state open records laws by introducing a Uniform Information Practices Act, brainchild of the National Association of Uniform Laws Commissions. An omnibus records/privacy statute, its effect would be to complicate easily understood records laws and to give almost unlimited discretion to agency heads as to when and when not to release information.

The stated purpose of the law, of course, was to protect the privacy interests of individuals who, in a complex society, increasingly become the subjects of governmental record-keeping systems.

Open Meetings

1. All states, the District of Columbia, and the Virgin Islands have open meetings

73. S.C. Code § 30-4-30(b) (Cum.Supp.1980).

74. Cal.Govt. Code § 6257 (Derring 1973).

laws or constitutional provisions guaranteeing some degree of access to public meetings. Again there are substantial differences from state to state, and these laws are frequently amended. An ideal and comprehensive open meetings law would contain the following provisions:

a. Access would apply to both houses of the legislature and its committees, and to all state agencies, boards, commissions, and other political subdivisions of the state, including county boards and city councils. Some statutes use a "public funds" or "public functions" test.

b. Executive sessions, and other evasive techniques involving the transaction of public business, should not be exempted. A rule of reason, however, may attach to purely informal or social interactions between members of a public body. A quorum should not be a condition of access. Since preliminary steps in the deliberative process may be important to a final outcome, meetings of advisory committees ought to be included within the law. Minutes ought to be kept, and all votes recorded.

c. Exemptions ought to be stated precisely, although many state statutes do not allow them. Where exemptions are not included, state attorneys general and courts have made advisory or judicial determinations that consultations between an agency and its attorney regarding pending litigation, some disciplinary hearings, and public employee collective bargaining sessions are exempt.

d. Enforcement procedures must be available to press and public, and they must be expeditious. A few statutes declare null and void any official actions taken in secret sessions. Again, injunction or writ of mandamus is the appropriate recourse, and it should be written into the law.

e. Sanctions should be imposed on those officials who violate the law. Most open meeting laws contain a provision making violation of the act a misdemeanor. Others impose a civil fine. Criminal penalties are rare. Minnesota alone makes a third violation of its open meeting law punishable by forfeiture of the right to serve on the public body or in the public agency for a period of time equal to the term of office the person was then serving.

2. Many problems remain. Some open meetings laws lack definitions and penalties for noncompliance. Unannounced, irregular, or informal meetings are not covered. Other laws are riddled with loopholes or specified exemptions. Courts are frequently reluctant to breach the separation of powers doctrine by interpreting open meetings laws to apply to the legislative branch of government, and courts protect their own prerogatives as well.

Nevertheless, the open meetings situation is decidedly better than it was a decade ago, and a survey of state cases indicates that when secret meetings are challenged by press and public—and they must be—, under state laws, plaintiffs prevail in a very high proportion of cases. Of course, many closed-door meetings are never challenged.

When denied attendance, ask for reasons and a vote, and try to get it all recorded in the minutes. Be respectful, but do not leave a meeting until ordered to do so. Know what the exceptions are, of course, in your state.

THE CONFLICT BETWEEN OPENNESS AND DATA PRIVACY

The Federal Privacy Act of 1974

In 1974 Congress passed a comprehensive federal Privacy Act. Although its drafters did express concern about nongovernmental record-keeping, the statute deals only with the vast record-creating and computer storage capabilities of federal agencies. The law seeks to protect individual rights against government misuse of personal data by letting citizens know what kinds of files and record systems are being kept and by allowing individuals a right of access to those files so that they can be corrected or challenged if necessary.<sup>75</sup>

Use the FOI Service Center sample Privacy Act request letter (see fn. 32) in making a request. Unlike FOIA, the Privacy Act does not permit agencies to charge for search time, but you will have to pay for duplication. The agency supervising the administration of the act, the Office of Management and Budget, expects other agencies to acknowledge receipt of your request within ten working days and to provide access, if access is to be granted, within thirty days.

Of special interest is that part of the act which prohibits federal agencies from maintaining any records concerning an exercise of First Amendment rights unless authorized by statute, part of an authorized law enforcement activity, or based upon an individual's own consent. This rule prevented the Internal Revenue Service, for example, from keeping records of its surveillance of speeches made by nuclear war protestors, and all records of that kind already in its keeping had to be expunged.<sup>76</sup> It might be assumed that journalists, authors, scholars, and researchers would be primarily engaged in First Amendment activities. And the rule covers peaceful protesting and pamphlet-eering.

Unless a record is open to public inspection under FOIA, or under one of the Privacy Act's 11 exemptions, a government agency must have a file subject's written consent before it can disclose that file to a third party. An agency must also notify a file subject if it intends to disclose, and it must keep an accounting of certain kinds of disclosure.

Scores of recommendations have been made for amending the act.<sup>77</sup> While the data-collecting activities of an agency are not limited by the act, failure to comply with its specific provisions on disclosure permits an individual to bring a civil suit in a federal district court. To recover damages, attorney's fees and court costs a plaintiff must show that the agency "acted in a manner which was intentional and willful"—a rather heavy burden.

While FOIA's purpose was to increase public access to governmental information, the Privacy Act was designed to provide individuals more control over the gathering, dissemination, and accuracy of information kept by government about them. The latter is an FOIA for the individual. Surveillance by the government in the name of the public, or surveillance by public and press for its own sake, inevitably collides with personal privacy. How can the two social values be articulated? Can an informed public tolerate insulated individuals? A newspaper's demand for arrest records may be motivated by a desire to assess the performance of a police department, but the consequences may be exposure of individual third-party transgression. It is important to know when denials of disclosure are based on the long tradition of official secrecy and suppression of information and when they are based on a genuine concern for a legal or constitutional right of personal privacy.

The Privacy Act of 1974, as has been noted, contains eleven exemptions to its general prohibition of disclosure of personal files. These apply to entire systems of records rather than to specific requests for particular documents as under FOIA. One of the exemptions, (2), provides that a record may be disclosed without written consent of the person about whom the record is kept if disclosure "would be * * * required under Section 552 of this title." Section 552 is the Freedom of Information Act.

At the same time, FOIA's Exemption 6 states that FOIA disclosure does not apply to matters that are "personnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy."

If it is required that a document be made public by FOIA, then it cannot be suppressed by the Privacy Act. As Judge David Bazelon of the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals put it: "We must conclude * * * that section (b)(2) of the Privacy Act represents a Congressional mandate that the Privacy Act not be used as a barrier to FOIA access." Greentree v. Customs Service, 8 Med.L.Rptr. 1510, 515 F.Supp. 1145 (D.C.Cir.1981). Privacy defers to openness. Government policy has been to allow individuals access to their own files through both FOIA and the Privacy Act. Greentree supported the notion that what is exempt from disclosure to an individual under the Privacy Act is not necessarily exempt from the same person under FOIA.

An agency may not use FOIA exemptions as a technicality to deny citizens access to their own files: the Privacy Act states that "no agency shall rely on any exemption contained [in FOIA] to withhold from an individual any record which is otherwise accessible to such individual under the provisions of this section."

Requests for disclosures to third parties are made under FOIA rather than under the Privacy Act. "When the two Acts are read together," said the Privacy Protection Study Commission, "any disclosure of a record about an individual in a system of records as defined by the Privacy Act to any member of the public other than the individual to whom the record pertains is forbidden if the disclosure would constitute a 'clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy.'" The reverse obligation also holds: even though a record is about an individual, it cannot be withheld from any member of the public who requests it if the disclosure would not constitute "a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy."<sup>78</sup>

There are critics of the way in which the two social interests have been connected. And there is some truth in the words of one that "conflicts between the confidentiality approach of the Privacy Act and the disclosures requirements of the Freedom of Information Act are resolved entirely in favor of the latter."<sup>79</sup>

Openness and privacy represent an almost natural conflict: add to one and you subtract from the other. Courts will have to decide what constitutes a "clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." So far the advantage has gone to openness. This bias was reflected in the Supreme Court's language in Cox Broadcasting v. Cohn, although that case dealt with a category of common law privacy rather than data privacy, and the offending information was held in a judicial record:

Thus even the prevailing law of invasion of privacy generally recognizes that the interests in privacy fade when the information involved already appears on the public record. * * * The freedom of the press to publish that information appears to be of critical importance to our type of government in which the citizenry is the final judge of the proper conduct of public business.<sup>80</sup>

As has been noted, for file subjects the Privacy Act functions as an FOIA statute. Prior to its passage, access refusals under FOIA Exemption 6 (personnel and medical files) were discretionary, not mandatory. An agency could withhold information the disclosure of which would constitute a "clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy," but it was not required to do so. Since passage of the Privacy Act, an agency must disclose to a file subject where there is no invasion of personal privacy.

In some circumstances FOIA provides more access to individual files than does the Privacy Act. Because the latter provides blanket exemptions for whole systems of records kept by CIA and other investigative and law enforcement agencies, FOIA may be more useful for gaining access to one's own files. In addition, there is no "relevance" requirement for information sought under FOIA.

It should be noted that what might be exempt from disclosure under the Privacy Act as "specifically exempted from disclosure by statute," would also be exempt for the same reason under FOIA's Exemption 3.

There is still much confusion about the articulation of both state and federal access and privacy laws, the latter often being cited as authority for withholding information when in fact such withholding is improper.

Data Privacy in the States

California's Information Practices Act of 1977 is in effect a privacy act and is called that by officials. This act and others like it suffer the same definitional deficiencies of other records statutes and, as would be expected, clash with state open records laws. Only perfunctory efforts have been made at the state level to synchronize the two kinds of records laws.

Taking a cue from the federal Privacy Act of 1974, at least twenty states led by Minnesota, have since passed data practices or privacy laws. Among the leaders, in addition to California, were Arkansas, Connecticut, Indiana, Massachusetts, Ohio, Utah, and Virginia. These are variably called data practices acts, fair information practices acts, or confidentiality of data acts, but they are all designed to protect particular categories of personal privacy. Since they are frequently amended, public access advocates have to remain alert.

State privacy commission studies preceded passage of the Minnesota, Massachusetts, and Indiana statutes, and similar study groups have been established in other states, including Iowa and New Jersey. By 1980 the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws had developed a Uniform Information Practices Code. Although premised on openness of public records except where there is a strong presumption of privacy (employment applications and evaluations, for example), there are serious problems of overbreadth in the proposal. Criminal investigation information, especially arrest records, would fall in the protected category.

All existing data privacy laws do protect from disclosure criminal investigation records, either directly or by implication. They also require that record system descriptions be published, that individually identifiable information be relevant, accurate, timely and complete, and that the use and disclosure of information be restricted. Access and the right to challenge the accuracy of file contents rests only with persons about whom the files are kept. Most state statutes comply with the federal requirement that records kept in connection with federally funded assistance programs remain confidential. In Minnesota's law, "confidential" means that neither the person named nor anyone else outside government can get the information; "private" information is available to the file subject or that person's agent.

80. Law and Public Policy, 1979. 420 U.S. 469 (1975), see p. 337 this text.

In Kentucky, openness and data privacy are dealt with in a single statute. Similar efforts made in successive sessions of the Minnesota legislature have created much confusion and threatened public access.

Violations of data privacy resemble the common law privacy offense of intrusion in that both are news-gathering offenses. The difference is that the federal Privacy

Act of 1974 and its state counterparts are designed chiefly to protect the "inviolate personality" from the power of government or governmental procedures. One might speculate on the degree to which corporate power, including that of the media, might match the government in jeopardizing personal privacy.

Should defining categories of privacy be a legislative or judicial task? The Minnesota legislature has done it with its categories of public, private, and confidential. At the federal level, the courts will eventually do it by deciding what is meant by "clearly unwarranted invasions of personal privacy."

Access to the Judicial Process: Free Press and Fair Trial

THE PARAMETERS OF THE CONFLICT

1. "I remember one of those sorrowful farces, in Virginia," Mark Twain recounts in Roughing It, "which we call a jury trial. A noted desperado killed Mr. B., a good citizen, in the most wanton and cold-blooded way. Of course the papers were full of it, and all men capable of reading read about it. And of course all men not deaf and dumb and idiotic talked about it. A jury list was made out, and Mr. B.L., a prominent banker and a valued citizen, was questioned precisely as he would have been questioned in any court in America:

'Have you heard of this homicide?'

'Yes.'

'Have you held conversations upon the subject?'

'Yes.'

'Have you formed or expressed opinions about it?'

'Yes.'

'Have you read the newspaper accounts of it?'

'Yes.'

'We do not want you.'

"A minister, intelligent, esteemed, and greatly respected; a merchant of high character and known probity; a mining superintendent of intelligence and unblemished reputation; a quartz-mill owner of excellent standing, were all questioned in the same way, and all set aside. Each said the public talk and the newspaper reports had not so biased his mind but that sworn testimony would overthrow his previously formed opinions and enable him to render a verdict without prejudice and in accordance with the facts. But of course such men could not be trusted with the case. Ignoramuses alone could mete out unsullied justice.

"When the peremptory challenges were all exhausted, a jury of twelve men was impaneled—a jury who swore they had neither heard, read, talked about, nor expressed an opinion concerning a murder which the very cattle in the corrals, the Indians in the sage-brush, and the stones in the streets were cognizant of! It was a jury composed of two desperadoes, two low beer-house politicians, three barkeepers, two ranchmen who could not read, and three dull, stupid, human donkeys! It actually came out afterward, that one of these latter thought that incest and arson were the same thing.

"The verdict rendered by this jury was, Not Guilty. What else could one expect?

"The jury system puts a ban upon intelligence and honesty, and a premium upon ignorance, stupidity, and perjury. It is a shame that we must continue to use a worthless system because it was good a thousand years ago. In this age, when a gentleman of high social standing, intelligence, and probity, swears that testimony given under solemn oath will outweigh, with him, street talk and newspaper reports based upon mere hearsay, he is worth a hundred jurymen who will swear to their own ignorance and stupidity, and justice would be far safer in his hands than in theirs. Why could not the jury law be so altered as to give men of brains and honesty an equal chance with fools and miscreants? Is it right to show the present favoritism to one class of men and inflict a disability on another, in a land whose boast is that all its citizens are free and equal? I am a candidate for the legislature. I desire to tamper with the jury law. I wish to so alter it as to put a premium on intelligence and character, and close the jury-box against idiots, blacklegs, and people who do not read newspapers. But no doubt I shall be defeated—every effort I make to save the country 'misses fire.'"

Twain's seriocomic reference is not intended to foreclose debate on the clash between reporter and suspect interests in free press and fair trial, but rather to focus attention on what is still the central question of a contentious dialogue: what is the effect of trial and pretrial information on jury verdicts?

Judge Charles Clark, writing for the Second Circuit Court of Appeals in 1951, might have had Twain's admonition in mind when he said:

Trial by newspaper may be unfortunate, but it is not new and, unless the court accepts the standard judicial hypothesis that cautioning instructions are effective, criminal trials in the metropolitan centers may well prove impossible.

During trial, a copy of the New York Times, containing an inaccurate report, had found its way into the jury room. The trial judge reasoned that, since he had given explicit instructions to the jury to disregard the newspaper and had pointed out how the offenses set forth in the indictment differed from those described in the article, there was no error in allowing the trial to proceed.

In a bristling dissent in the same case, Judge Jerome Frank did invoke Mark Twain. "My colleagues admit that 'trial by newspaper' is unfortunate," he declared. "But they dismiss it as an unavoidable curse of metropolitan living (like, I suppose, crowded subways). They rely on the old 'ritualistic admonition' to purge the record. The futility of that sort of exorcism is notorious. As I have elsewhere observed, it is like the Mark Twain story of the little boy who was told to stand in a corner and not to think of a white elephant."<sup>1</sup>

"The naive assumption," said Justice Robert Jackson of the United States Supreme Court in an earlier case, "that prejudicial effects can be overcome by instructions to the jury, all practicing lawyers know to be unmitigated fiction."<sup>2</sup>

Unwilling to rely on this kind of speculation, social scientists in recent years have attempted to measure by survey and experiment the real effects of trial and pretrial publication on jury verdicts. Their findings have been equivocal and contradictory. Their methodologies have been faulted for failing to replicate the actual world of the juror.<sup>3</sup> If a hesitant conclusion might be drawn from these studies, it is that juries or prospective jurors are prejudiced when news that a defendant has confessed or has a criminal record comes to their attention. And even on those questions there is less than perfect agreement.

Social science findings, whatever their value in helping to put juror behavior within the bounds of human comprehension, may be academic anyway. Courts, relying on their own impressions of psychological effects, have decided that where press coverage contributes to what appears to be a deep and bitter pattern of community prejudice, convictions will be reversed or mistrials declared.

2. Early cases to reach the Supreme Court in which the issue was wholly or in part the impartiality of the jury stretch back for at least 130 years. Their compound holding appeared to be that the existence of preconceived notions as to guilt or innocence was not enough if a juror could attest to his or her capability of laying aside a bias and deciding a case on its evidence. Subtle doubts were expressed about the influence of the press on jury verdicts in the first place. The burden of proof was clearly on the defendant to demonstrate essential unfairness.<sup>4</sup>

Not until 1961 did the United States Supreme Court reverse a state criminal conviction solely on the grounds that prejudicial pretrial publicity had made a fair trial before an impartial jury impossible.

On April 8, 1955, Leslie Irvin, a parolee, was arrested by Indiana state police on suspicion of burglary and bad check writing. A few days later Evansville, Indiana police and the county prosecutor issued press releases proclaiming that their burglary suspect, "Mad Dog" Irvin, had confessed to six murders, including the killing of three members of a single family. Irvin went to trial in November, was found guilty, and sentenced to death.

Bothersome was the fact that of 430 prospective jurors questioned by the court before trial, 370 said they believed Irvin guilty.<sup>5</sup> Defense counsel was never satisfied with the level of impartiality of the twelve jurors finally accepted by the court. Theoretically the jury selection process is designed to identify bias-free persons. In fact the selection proceeds on radically

5. After veniremen are sworn, a defendant is allowed a limited number of challenges to the impartiality of those who will decide his fate in a process called voir dire ("to speak the truth"). If there appears to be prejudice in either direction or if for some other reason a prospective juror appears unfit to serve, he or she is excused. Once the jury is sworn, a defendant still has a number of peremptory challenges—usually fifteen to twenty in a criminal case—by means of which a juror may be rejected without cause or for the most intuitive of reasons.

Federal court judges rather than attorneys control the examination of prospective federal court jurors. Empaneling is faster, but the procedure is often less thorough than its counterpart in state courts. Defense attorneys in criminal cases are especially critical of the federal procedure because they believe lawyers are better equipped than judges to elicit answers that accurately reflect a potential juror's opinion. For example, see Garry and Riordan, Gag Orders: Cui Bono? 29 Stan.L.Rev. 575, at 583 (1977).

different grounds, each attorney scrupulously dedicated to finding jurors whose biases will favor his client's cause.<sup>6</sup>

The Chicago Jury Project estimated that 60 percent of the lawyers' voir dire time was spent in indoctrinating jurors and only 40 percent in asking questions to differentiate partial from impartial jurors.<sup>7</sup> In recent years social scientists have been permitted to help lawyers choose jurors. The Harrisburg 13 trial was an example. And a University of California sociologist conducted a telephone survey to support a change of venue for Angela Davis; black psychologists assisted her lawyers in choosing jurors.<sup>8</sup> In 1972 a federal district court in Puerto Rico took notice of a psychologist's expert testimony on attitude formation and the results of a study on jury influence.<sup>9</sup> In addition, a University of Puerto Rico faculty member learned by questionnaire and interview that 59 percent of prospective jurors in the case were highly prejudiced against persons accused of acts of terrorism (the defendant was charged with violating the Explosives Law of Puerto Rico); the court thought it reasonable to draw jurors from the 41 percent in the survey who were conservatively liberal in their attitudes toward terrorists.

Leslie Irvin didn't have the benefit of sophisticated social science techniques. Nevertheless, after six years of legal maneuvering—and a successful prison break—his case reached the United States Supreme Court for a second time. In a unanimous decision the Court, considering Irvin's constitutional claims in terms of prejudicial news reporting, concluded that he had not been accorded a fair trial before an impartial jury. Moreover he should have been granted a second change of venue, said the Justices, in spite of an Indiana law allowing only a single change in the place of the trial; and it was the duty of the court of appeals to evaluate independently the voir dire testimony of the jurors.

366 U.S. 717, 81 S.Ct. 1639,
6 L.Ed.2d 751 (1961).

Justice CLARK delivered the opinion of the Court:

* * *

It is not required that jurors be totally ignorant of the facts and issues involved, * * * and scarcely any of those best qualified to serve will not have formed some impression or opinion as to the merits of the case. * * * To hold that the mere existence of any preconceived notions as to the guilt or innocence of an accused, without more, is sufficient to rebut the presumption of a prospective juror's impartiality would be to establish an impossible standard. It is sufficient if the juror can lay aside his impression or opinion and render a verdict based on the evidence presented in court.

Here the build-up of prejudice is clear and convincing. An examination of the * Although Irvin was the first reversal of a state court conviction, two years earlier in Marshall v. United States, 360 U.S. 310 (1959), the Court for the first time reversed a conviction in a federal court solely on grounds of prejudicial pretrial publicity. Jurors were exposed to newspapers containing defendant's criminal record.

then current community pattern of thought as indicated by the popular news media is singularly revealing. For example, petitioner's first motion for a change of venue from Gibson County alleged that the awaited trial of petitioner had become the cause célèbre of this small community—so much so that curbstome opinions, not only as to petitioner's guilt but even as to what punishment he should receive, were solicited and recorded on the public streets by a roving reporter, and later were broadcast over the local stations. A reading of the 46 exhibits which petitioner attached to his motion indicates that a barrage of newspaper headlines, articles, cartoons and pictures was unleashed against him during the six or seven months preceding his trial. The motion further alleged that the newspapers in which the stories appeared were delivered regularly to approximately 95% of the dwellings in Gibson County and that, in addition, the Evansville radio and TV stations, which likewise blanketed that county, also carried extensive newscasts covering the same incidents. These stories revealed the details of his background, including a reference to crimes committed when a juvenile, his convictions for arson almost 20 years previously, for burglary and by a court-martial on AWOL charges during the war. He was accused of being a parole violator. The headlines announced his police lineup identification, that he faced a lie detector test, had been placed at the scene of the crime and that the six murders were solved but petitioner refused to confess. Finally, they announced his confession to the six murders and the fact of his indictment for four of them in Indiana. They reported petitioner's offer to plead guilty if promised a 99-year sentence, but also the determination, on the other hand, of the prosecutor to secure the death penalty, and that petitioner had confessed to 24 burglaries (the modus operandi of these robberies was compared to that of the murders and the similarity noted). * * *

On the day before the trial the newspapers carried the story that Irvin had orally admitted the murder of Kerr (the victim in this case) as well as "the robbery-murder of Mrs. Mary Holland; the murder of Mrs. Wilhelmina Sailer in Posey County, and the slaughter of three members of the Duncan family in Henderson County, Ky."

It cannot be gainsaid that the force of this continued adverse publicity caused a sustained excitement and fostered a strong prejudice among the people of Gibson County. In fact, on the second day devoted to the selection of the jury, the newspapers reported that "strong feelings, often bitter and angry, rumbled to the surface," and that "the extent to which the multiple murders—three in one family—have aroused feelings throughout the area was emphasized Friday when 27 of the 35 prospective jurors questioned were excused for holding biased pretrial opinions. * * * A few days later the feeling was described as "a pattern of deep and bitter prejudice against the former pipe-fitter." Spectator comments, as printed by the newspapers, were "my mind is made up"; "I think he is guilty"; and "he should be hanged."

Finally, and with remarkable understatement, the headlines reported that "impartial jurors are hard to find." * * * An examination of the 2,783-page voir dire record shows that 370 prospective jurors or almost 90% of those examined on the point (10 members of the panel were never asked whether or not they had any opinion) entertained some opinion as to guilt—ranging in intensity from mere suspicion to absolute certainty. A number admitted that, if they were in the accused's place in the dock and he in theirs on the jury with their opinions, they would not want him on a jury.

Here the "pattern of deep and bitter prejudice" shown to be present throughout the community, was clearly reflected in the sum total of the voir dire examination of a majority of the jurors finally placed in the jury box. [Emphasis added.] Eight out of the 12 thought petitioner was guilty. With such an opinion permeating their minds, it would be difficult to say that each could exclude this preconception of guilt from his deliberations. The influence that lurks in an opinion once formed is so persistent that it unconsciously fights detachment from the mental processes of the average man. * * * Where one's life is at stake—and accounting for the frailties of human nature—we can only say that in the light of the circumstances here the finding of impartiality does not meet constitutional standards. Two-thirds of the jurors had an opinion that petitioner was guilty and were familiar with the material facts and circumstances involved, including the fact that other murders were attributed to him, some going so far as to say that it would take evidence to overcome their belief. One said that he “could not * * * give the defendant the benefit of the doubt that he is innocent.” Another stated that he had a “somewhat” certain fixed opinion as to petitioner's guilt. No doubt each juror was sincere when he said that he would be fair and impartial to petitioner, but psychological impact requiring such a declaration before one's fellows is often its father. Where so many so many times admitted prejudice, such a statement of impartiality can be given little weight. As one of the jurors put it, “You can't forget what you hear and see.” With his life at stake, it is not requiring too much that petitioner be tried in an atmosphere undisturbed by so huge a wave of public passion and by a jury other than one in which two-thirds of the members admit, before hearing any testimony, to possessing a belief in his guilt.

COMMENT

1. Irvin's case was remanded to the district court, and he was retried by Indiana in a less emotional atmosphere. He was found guilty and sentenced to life imprisonment—a sentence for which, he confided to his attorney, he was grateful.

2. Justice Felix Frankfurter, long a proponent of curbing pretrial press reports, helped define the parameters of the conflict between free press and fair trial. In a concurring opinion in Irvin he said:

Not a term passes without this Court being importuned to review convictions, had in [s]tates throughout the country, in which substantial claims are made that a jury trial has been distorted because of inflammatory newspaper accounts—too often, as in this case, with the prosecutor's collaboration—exerting pressure upon potential jurors before trial, thereby making it extremely difficult if not impossible to secure a jury capable of taking in, free of prepossessions, evidence submitted in open court. Indeed such extraneous influences, in violation of the decencies guaranteed by our Constitution, are sometimes so powerful that an accused is forced, as a practical matter, to forego trial by jury.

In the same opinion, Frankfurter said that a per curiam reversal of a federal court conviction a week earlier turned on a single article in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch linking the defendant in an income tax evasion trial with a local “rackets boss” and describing him as a “former convict.”<sup>10</sup>

“The Court has not yet decided,” Frankfurter warned the press, “that, while convictions must be reversed and miscar-

Florida*, 341 U.S. 50 (1951), where Justice Jackson for the Court concluded that the press, in the trial of three black defendants, had dictated the verdict through inflammatory news reports including the report of a confession. But in Murphy v. Florida, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1252, 421 U.S. 794 (1975), the Court concluded that press reports had not caused bias to permeate the community. Murphy can be read to reject the idea that bias should be implied from the very fact of publicity which, arguably, Irvin and later Estes may suggest. Or can Murphy be distinguished from Irvin on the ground that the voir dire in Irvin disclosed prejudice while in Murphy it did not?

riages of justice result because the minds of jurors or potential jurors were poisoned, the poisoner is constitutionally protected in plying his trade."

THE TRADITION OF CRIME REPORTING

Although the fourth chief justice of the United States, John Marshall, took note in 1807 of extralegal newspaper comment in a reference to the Alexandria, Virginia Expositor's coverage of the treason trial of Aaron Burr, crime reporting probably came into its own when London's Bow Street police reporters discovered that crime news, when presented sensationally, had mass appeal.

Benjamin Day's New York Sun, the first successful penny press, specialized in news of crime and violence. Day hired George Wisner, a Bow Street veteran, to cover the courts, and within a year Wisner was co-owner of the paper.<sup>11</sup> Charles Dickens was a Bow Street reporter par excellence, and in 1846 his own paper, the Daily News, carried a series of articles by Dickens on the brutalizing effects of the death penalty.

Crime news contributed to the success of Pulitzer's World; and James Gordon Bennett's Herald had no equal in sensational, aggressive, and even fictional crime coverage. William Randolph Hearst's Journal led America's "yellow" tabloids into the Jazz Age of journalism.

In 1907, Irwin S. Cobb wrote 600,000 words on the dramatic Harry K. Thaw murder trial for the World. Twelve years later the renowned stylist William Bolitho shocked the nation with his accounts in the World of the Paris trial of Henri Landru, better known as Bluebeard.

Ben Hecht and the Daily News were just right for Chicago in the roaring 20s. Bernarr Macfadden's Graphic, nicknamed the "pornographic," promoted the execution of Ruth Snyder in its inimitable style:

Don't fail to read tomorrow's Graphic. An installment that thrills and stuns. A story that fairly pierces the heart and reveals Ruth Snyder's last thoughts on earth; that pulses the blood as it discloses her final letters. Think of it! A woman's final thoughts just before she is clutched in the deadly snare that sears and burns and FRIES AND KILLS! Her very last words! Exclusively in tomorrow's Graphic.<sup>12</sup>

Journalistic history was made when a New York Daily News photographer strapped a tiny camera to his leg, smuggled it into Sing Sing's execution chamber, and took a picture of Snyder straining at the thongs of the electric chair moments after the current had been turned on. The picture was a front-page sensation. It sold 250,000 extra copies of the paper.

No wonder Damon Runyon compared the big murder trial with a sporting event. "The trial," he wrote, "is a sort of game, the players on the one side the attorneys for the defense, and on the other side the attorneys for the State. The defendant figures in it merely as the prize."<sup>13</sup>

With the Lindbergh kidnaping trial, American crime reporting perhaps reached its zenith. As many as 800 newsmen and photographers joined by the great figures of stage and screen, United States senators, crooners, social celebrities, and 20,000 curious nobodies turned the little town of Flemington, New Jersey into a midsummer Mardi Gras. The small courtroom became a twenty-four hour propaganda bureau spewing out headlines such as "Bruno Guilty, But Has Aids, Verdict of Man in Street," and story references to Bruno Hauptmann as "a thing lacking human characteristics." One report had it that the jury was seriously considering an offer to go into vaudeville.

From Hauptmann's trial to the present, America has never for very long lacked a case cause célèbre. Lawyers and police officers remain the surest sources of information about pending cases, and reporters and editors rush into print, sometimes without even a passing thought for the presumption of innocence. The trial of Dr. Samuel Sheppard was such a case. After he had spent twelve years in prison, Sheppard's attorneys were able to get his case heard before the United States Supreme Court. He was given a new trial and acquitted. He died of undetermined causes a short time later.

There had long been agreement among parties on both sides of the case that the responsibility for preventing "trial by newspaper" and the resultant contamination of jurors rested in the first instance on judges, prosecutors, and policemen and not on the press. For the second reversal of a state court conviction on due process grounds, the Supreme Court in Sheppard v. Maxwell affirmed that judgment. A suspenseful, detailed story, in which Cleveland newspapers played a voracious part, was retold by the court in the Sheppard case which follows.

SHEPPARD v. MAXWELL

384 U.S. 333, 86 S.Ct. 1507.
16 L.ED.2D 600 (1966).

Justice CLARK delivered the opinion of the Court:

* * *

The principle that justice cannot survive behind walls of silence has long been reflected in the "Anglo-American distrust for secret trials." In re Oliver, 333 U.S. 257, 268 (1948). A responsible press has always been regarded as the handmaiden of effective judicial administration, especially in the criminal field. Its function in this regard is documented by an impressive record of service over several centuries. The press does not simply publish information about trials but guards against the miscarriage of justice by subjecting the police, prosecutors, and judicial processes to extensive public scrutiny and criticism. This Court has, therefore, been unwilling to place any direct limitations on the freedom traditionally exercised by the news media for "[w]hat transpires in the court room is public property." Craig v. Harney, 331 U.S. 367 (1947). * * * But the Court has also pointed out that "[l]egal trials are not like elections, to be won through the use of the meeting-hall, the radio, and the newspaper." Bridges v. State of California, 314 U.S. at 271 (1941). * * * And we cited with approval the language of Justice Black for the Court in In re Murchison, 349 U.S. 133, 136 (1955), that "our system of law has always endeavored to prevent even the probability of unfairness."

It is clear that the totality of circumstances in this case also warrant such an approach. * * * Sheppard was not granted a change of venue to a locale away from where the publicity originated; nor was his jury sequestered. * * * [T]he Sheppard jurors were subjected to newspaper, radio and television coverage of the trial while not taking part in the proceedings. They were allowed to go their separate ways outside of the courtroom, without adequate directions not to read or listen to anything concerning the case. * * * At intervals during the trial, the judge simply repeated his "suggestions" and "requests" that the jury not expose themselves to comment upon the case. Moreover, the jurors were thrust into the role of celebrities by the judge's failure to insulate them from reporters and photographers. The numerous pictures of the jurors, with their addresses, which appeared in the newspapers before and during the trial itself exposed them to expressions of opinion from both cranks and friends. The fact that anonymous letters had been received by prospective jurors should have made the judge aware that this publicity seriously threatened the jurors' privacy. * * * Sheppard stood indicted for the murder of his wife; the State was demanding the death penalty. For months the virulent publicity about Sheppard and the murder had made the case notorious. Charges and countercharges were aired in the news media besides those for which Sheppard was called to trial. In addition, only three months before trial, Sheppard was examined for more than five hours without counsel during a three-day inquest which ended in a public brawl. The inquest was televised live from a high school gymnasium seating hundreds of people. Furthermore, the trial began two weeks before a hotly contested election at which both Chief Prosecutor Mahon and Judge Blythin were candidates for judgeships.

While we cannot say that Sheppard was denied due process by the judge's refusal to take precautions against the influence of pretrial publicity alone, the court's later rulings must be considered against the setting in which the trial was held. In light of this background, we believe that the arrangements made by the judge with the news media caused Sheppard to be deprived of that "judicial serenity and calm to which [he] was entitled." The fact is that bedlam reigned at the courthouse during the trial and newsmen took over practically the entire courtroom, hounding most of the participants in the trial, especially Sheppard. At a temporary table within a few feet of the jury box and counsel table sat some 20 reporters staring at Sheppard and taking notes. The erection of a press table for reporters inside the bar is unprecedented. The bar of the court is reserved for counsel, providing them a safe place in which to keep papers and exhibits, and to confer privately with client and co-counsel. It is designed to protect the witness and the jury from any distractions, intrusions or influences, and to permit bench discussions of the judge's rulings away from the hearing of the public and the jury. Having assigned almost all of the available seats in the courtroom to the news media the judge lost his ability to supervise that environment. The movement of the reporters in and out of the courtroom caused frequent confusion and disruption of the trial. And the record reveals constant commotion within the bar. Moreover, the judge gave the throng of newsmen gathered in the corridors of the courthouse absolute free rein. Participants in the trial, including the jury, were forced to run a gantlet of reporters and photographers each time they entered or left the courtroom. The total lack of consideration for the privacy of the jury was demonstrated by the assignment to a broadcasting station of space next to the jury room on the floor above the courtroom, as well as the fact that jurors were allowed to make telephone calls during their five-day deliberation.

There can be no question about the nature of the publicity which surrounded Sheppard's trial. * * *

* * * Indeed, every court that has considered this case, save the court that tried it, has deplored the manner in which the news media inflamed and prejudiced the public.

* * *

Nor is there doubt that this deluge of publicity reached at least some of the jury. On the only occasion that the jury was queried, two jurors admitted in open court to hearing the highly inflammatory charge that a prison inmate claimed Sheppard as the father of her illegitimate child. Despite the extent and nature of the publicity to which the jury was exposed during trial, the judge refused defense counsel's other requests that the jury be asked whether they had read or heard specific prejudicial comment about the case, including the incidents we have previously summarized. In these circumstances, we can assume that some of this material reached members of the jury.

The court's fundamental error is compounded by the holding that it lacked power to control the publicity about the trial. From the very inception of the proceedings the judge announced that neither he nor anyone else could restrict prejudicial news accounts. And he reiterated this view on numerous occasions. Since he viewed the news media as his target, the judge never considered other means that are often utilized to reduce the appearance of prejudicial material and to protect the jury from outside influence. We conclude that these procedures would have been sufficient to guarantee Sheppard a fair trial and so do not consider what sanctions might be available against a recalcitrant press nor the charges of bias now made against the state trial judge. [Emphasis added.]

The carnival atmosphere at trial could easily have been avoided since the courtroom and courthouse premises are subject to the control of the court. * * * Bearing in mind the massive pretrial publicity, the judge should have adopted stricter rules governing the use of the courtroom by newsmen, as Sheppard's counsel requested. The number of reporters in the courtroom itself could have been limited at the first sign that their presence would disrupt the trial. They certainly should not have been placed inside the bar. Furthermore, the judge should have more closely regulated the conduct of newsmen in the courtroom. For instance, the judge belatedly asked them not to handle and photograph trial exhibits laying on the counsel table during recesses.

Secondly, the court should have insulated the witnesses. All of the newspapers and radio stations apparently interviewed prospective witnesses at will, and in many instances disclosed their testimony. A typical example was the publication of numerous statements by Susan Hayes, before her appearance in court, regarding her love affair with Sheppard. Although the witnesses were barred from the courtroom during the trial the full verbatim testimony was available to them in the press. This completely nullified the judge's imposition of the rule.

Thirdly, the court should have made some effort to control the release of leads, information, and gossip to the press by police officers, witnesses, and the counsel for both sides. Much of the information thus disclosed was inaccurate leading to groundless rumors and confusion. That the judge was aware of his responsibility in this respect may be seen from his warning to Steve Sheppard, the accused's brother, who had apparently made public statements in an attempt to discredit testimony for the prosecution.

Defense counsel immediately brought to the court's attention the tremendous amount of publicity in the Cleveland press that "misrepresented entirely the testimony" in the case. Under such circumstances, the judge should have at least warned the newspapers to check the accuracy of their accounts. And it is obvious that the judge should have further sought to alleviate this problem by imposing control over the statements made to the news media by counsel, witnesses, and especially the Coroner and police officers. The prosecution repeatedly made evidence available to the news media which was never offered in the trial. Much of the "evidence" disseminated in this fashion was clearly inadmissible. The exclusion of such evidence in court is rendered meaningless when a news media (sic) makes it available to the public.

The fact that many of the prejudicial news items can be traced to the prosecution, as well as the defense, aggravates the judge's failure to take any action. Effective control of these sources—concededly within the court's power—might well have prevented the divulgence of inaccurate information, rumors, and accusations that made up much of the inflammatory publicity, at least after Sheppard's indictment.

More specifically, the trial court might well have proscribed extra-judicial statements by any lawyer, party, witness, or court official which divulged prejudicial matters, such as the refusal of Sheppard to submit to interrogation or take any lie detector tests; any statement made by Sheppard to officials; the identity of prospective witnesses or their probable testimony; any belief in guilt or innocence; or like statements concerning the merits of the case. * * * Being advised of the great public interest in the case, the mass coverage of the press, and the potential prejudicial impact of publicity, the court could also have requested the appropriate city and county officials to promulgate a regulation with respect to dissemination of information about the case by their employees. In addition, reporters who wrote or broadcast prejudicial stories, could have been warned as to the impropriety of publishing material not introduced in the proceedings. The judge was put on notice of such events by defense counsel's complaint about the WHK broadcast on the second day of trial. In this manner, Sheppard's right to a trial free from outside interference would have been given added protection without corresponding curtailment of the news media. Had the judge, the other officers of the court, and the police placed the interest of justice first, the news media would have soon learned to be content with the task of reporting the case as it unfolded in the courtroom—not pieced together from extra-judicial statements.

From the cases coming here we note that unfair and prejudicial news comment on pending trials has become increasingly prevalent. Due process requires that the accused receive a trial by an impartial jury free from outside influences. Given the pervasiveness of modern communications and the difficulty of effacing prejudicial publicity from the minds of the jurors, the trial courts must take strong measures to ensure that the balance is never weighed against the accused. And appellate tribunals have the duty to make an independent evaluation of the circumstances. Of course, there is nothing that proscribes the press from reporting events that transpire in the courtroom. [Emphasis added.] But where there is a reasonable likelihood that prejudicial news prior to trial will prevent a fair trial, the judge should continue the case until the threat abates or transfer it to another county not so permeated with publicity. In addition, sequestration of the jury was something the judge should have raised sua sponte with counsel. If publicity during the proceedings threatens the fairness of the trial, a new trial should be ordered. But we must remember that reversals are but palliatives; the cure lies in those remedial measures that will prevent the prejudice at its inception. The courts must take such steps by rule and regulation that will protect their processes from prejudicial outside interferences. [Emphasis added.] Neither prosecutors, counsel for defense, the accused, witnesses, court staff nor enforcement officers coming under the jurisdiction of the court should be permitted to frustrate its function. Collaboration between counsel and the press as to information affecting the fairness of a criminal trial is not only subject to regulation, but is highly censurable and worthy of disciplinary measures.

Since the state trial judge did not fulfill his duty to protect Sheppard from the inherently prejudicial publicity which saturated the community and to control disrupt-tive influences in the courtroom, we must reverse the denial of the habeas petition. The case is remanded to the District Court with instructions to issue the writ and order that Sheppard be released from custody unless the State puts him to its charges again within a reasonable time.

It is so ordered.

Justice Black dissents.

THE REARDON REPORT

1. If Justice Clark spoke sternly to the trial judge in the case, mandating him to be master in his own courtroom and use available remedies to counteract unfairness, he also had something to say to the press. It would require self-delusion not to interpret his painstaking account of press coverage in the case as anything but disgust for journalism's obliviousness to fairness. The case would be parent to hundreds of "gag" orders directed at the press by lower court judges, culminating ten years later in the 1976 case Nebraska Press Ass'n v. Stuart.

2. In the interim, and partly as a response to criticism in the Warren Report<sup>14</sup> of how the press had dealt with Lee Harvey Oswald, the American Bar Association established an Advisory Committee on Fair Trial and Free Press under the chairmanship of Paul C. Reardon, then associate justice of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts.<sup>15</sup> While the Reardon Report, as it came to be called, addressed itself primarily to officers of the court, it recommended that judges use their long discredited power to cite for constructive contempt<sup>16</sup>—that is for contempt committed outside of the courtroom—anyone who disseminated extrajudicial statements willfully designed to influence the outcome of a trial or who violated a valid order not to reveal information from a closed judicial hearing. The report also favored closing pretrial hearings to press and public on defendant's motion if it appeared to the court that fair trial was in jeopardy. Ninety percent of cases are disposed of in the pretrial stage.

Laying down categories of prohibited and publishable information, the controversial report was soon exerting nationwide influence on both press and bar. Prohibited comment was to include prior criminal records, character references, confessions, test results, and out-of-court speculation on guilt or innocence or on the merits of evidence. Publishable information would be the fact and circumstances of an arrest, the identity of the arrested person and the arresting officer or agency, descriptions of physical evidence once in hand, the charge and other facts from public court records, and the next probable steps in the judicial process.

Where there was a threatened interference with the right to a fair trial, the report agreed with Justice Clark in Sheppard that motions should be granted for change of venue or venire, severance, continuance, waiver of the right to trial by jury, sequestration, new trial, mistrial, and habeas corpus. Under voir dire, jurors could be challenged, and once seated, judges could take pains to instruct them on what and what not to consider.

To be sure, these judicial remedies are useful, but there are some obvious problems. The ubiquity of mass media, especially broadcasting, casts a shadow on the effectiveness of changes of venue and venire. A continuance, or postponement, may lead to the disappearance of witnesses and evidence, and, if unable to raise bail, a defendant remains in jail. A mistrial subjects a defendant to the expense and trauma of a new trial. There is some debate over the usefulness of peremptory challenges to jurors and of challenges for cause, both part of voir dire proceedings.<sup>17</sup> Jurors as a rule don't like being sequestered, or locked up, and may react adversely to the party initiating such a motion; moreover they have, in most cases, already been exposed to pretrial publicity.<sup>18</sup> Judicial instructions to ignore inflammatory press reports may not overcome pervasive community prejudice, although the University of Chicago Jury Project found that jurors take the admonitions of a judge very seriously.<sup>19</sup>

One survey reported that judges favored most of the above remedies appropriate to the pretrial period. Once the trial had begun, motion for a new trial on due process grounds was their choice. Most agreed that the reporting of criminal records, confessions, and the results of pretrial tests, such as the lie detector, were the most damaging forms of pretrial coverage.<sup>20</sup>

The Contempt Power

1. While the news media were predictably negative toward broad prohibitions against publication of information in public records (criminal records, for example) and toward being excluded from pretrial hearings, given the fact that only a very small percentage of cases ever get to trial, their most vocal condemnation was reserved for that part of the Reardon Report that seemed to propose revival of the contempt power to punish editors for what appeared in their news columns.

As early as 1788, Americans began having doubts about the summary procedure (the judge acts as complainant, jury, and judge in his or her own case) for punishing contempts by publication.<sup>21</sup> Pennsylvania passed a law limiting its use in 1809, followed by New York in 1829. Congress enacted the Federal Contempt Act of 1831 limiting punishable contempt to disobedience to any judicial process or decree and to misbehavior in the presence of the court, "or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice."<sup>22</sup>

In 1918 judges were still disagreeing on whether the "so near thereto" phrase should be given a geographical (in the courtroom) or causal construction.<sup>23</sup> Until 1941 the "immemorial" power of judges to punish summarily out-of-court contempt prevailed. Then in Nye v. United States, 313 U.S. 33 (1941), the United States Supreme Court did a right about face and ruled that "so near thereto" meant physical proximity and should be applied geographically rather than causally. It also rejected the "reasonable tendency" rule as applied in earlier cases as the standard against which potentially prejudicial out-of-court statements were to be measured.

That same year in Bridges v. California, 314 U.S. 252 (1941), the power of judges to punish publication was severely limited. The case involved labor leader Harry Bridges and the Los Angeles Times, both of whom had admonished and criticized a judge and the judicial process while a case was pending. The Court declared in this and subsequent cases<sup>24</sup> that the contempt power could be used against out-of-court comment only when such comment created a "clear and present danger" that justice would be impaired.

"The assumption that respect for the judiciary can be won by shielding judges from published criticism wrongly appraises the character of American public opinion," Justice Hugo Black said in his opinion for the Court. "For it is a prized American privilege to speak one's mind, although not always with perfect good taste, on all public institutions. And an enforced silence, however limited, solely in the name of preserving the dignity of the bench, would probably engender resentment, suspicion, and contempt much more than it would enhance respect."

As for the judicial process, Black observed that "Legal trials are not like elections, to be won through the use of the meeting-hall, the radio, and the newspaper." "But," he said, "we cannot start with the assumption that publications of the kind here involved actually do threaten to change the nature of legal trials, and that to preserve judicial impartiality, it is necessary for judges to have a contempt power by which they can close all channels of public expression to all matters which touch upon pending cases."

In a dissent concurred in by three of his colleagues, Justice Frankfurter argued in defense of the right of the states to decide by law what protection should be afforded their courts:

[T]hat the conventional power to punish for contempt is not a censorship in advance but a punishment for past conduct and, as such, like prosecution for a criminal libel, is not offensive either to the First or Fourteenth Amendments, has never been doubted throughout this Court's history.

While these cases rejected the protection of judges from press comment in pending cases, they did not speak to the issue of protecting jurors. Justice Frankfurter was so disturbed when his colleagues denied review to a case in which that issue was paramount [State of Maryland v. Baltimore Radio Show, cert. den. 338 U.S. 912, (1950)] that he wrote a personal memorandum in which he discussed the leading English cases on constructive contempt as if to recommend their doctrine to American courts.

Although unresolved,<sup>25</sup> it is highly probable that use of the contempt power to protect jurors against press comment would invite condemnation on First Amendment grounds. But, as we shall see, contempt has again become an urgent concern of the journalist where what is published is done so in direct violation of 24. Pennekamp v. Florida, 328 U.S. 331 (1946). Zechariah Chafee, Jr., an eminent commentator on freedom of speech and press, would have made Justice Frankfurter's concurring opinion in the case required reading in every school of journalism, newspaper office, and broadcasting station. See Chafee, Government and Mass Communications, Vol. 2, 1947, p. 433. Frankfurter argued that, ultimately, freedom of the press would depend for its survival on an independent judiciary. "To deny," he said, "that bludgeoning or poisonous comment has power to influence, or at least to disturb, the task of judging is to play make-believe and to assume that men in gowns are angels." And he contended that every right carries with it a concomitant responsibility.

In Craig v. Harney, 331 U.S. 367 (1947), the third in a series of cases denying the contempt power to judges, Justice Douglas said: "Judges are supposed to be men of fortitude, able to thrive in a hardy climate."

a judicial order.<sup>26</sup>

2. The Reardon Report had a positive side. It gave its imprimatur and thus momentum to a developing dialogue among and a set of pretrial guidelines for journalists, lawyers, and judges that by the late 70s had led to bilateral free press-fair trial councils either in place or pending in as many as thirty-four states. A dozen or more of these would become moribund or, as in Arizona, Pennsylvania, and Washington, would be loudly disavowed. In late 1982, guidelines remained somewhat viable in only eighteen states. In spite of these efforts, tension continued between the press and the judicial system with the Reardon Report getting the blame for whatever restrictions judges placed on reporters.

A 1971 Baton Rouge murder-conspiracy case reminded reporters that judges were not helpless when it came to enforcing their orders. At a preliminary hearing designed to determine whether the state had a legitimate motive in prosecuting a VISTA worker on a charge of conspiring to murder the city's mayor or whether its action was based on racial prejudice, a federal district judge prohibited the publication of testimony taken at a public hearing. Two State-Times reporters ignored the order, wrote their stories, and were adjudged guilty of criminal contempt of court. The reporters appealed to the Fifth Circuit, and, in what may have been a turning point in press-bar cooperation, that court upheld the principle that even an unconstitutional court order must be obeyed pending appeal. The court refused to make the First Amendment question of prior restraint the dispositive issue in the case. And it relied heavily on a United States Supreme Court ruling, Walker v. Birmingham, 388 U.S. 307 (1967)—see p. 45 this text—which required obedience even to a court order in violation of the First Amendment pending appeal of the order.

Noting that no jury was yet involved in the case and the press had not created a carnival atmosphere, the Fifth Circuit court observed that the public's right to know the facts brought out in the hearing was particularly compelling since the issue being litigated was a charge that elected state officials had trumped up charges against an individual solely because of his race and civil rights activities. The federal district court's cure, said the federal appeals court, was worse than the disease. But it went on to say the following.

UNITED STATES
v. DICKINSON

1 MED.L.RPTR. 1338, 465 F.2D 596 (5TH CIR. 1972).

John R. BROWN, Chief Judge:

* * *

The conclusion that the District Court's order was constitutionally invalid does not necessarily end the matter of the validity of the contempt convictions. There remains the very formidable question of whether a person may with impunity knowingly violate an order which turns out to be invalid. We hold that in the circumstances of this case he may not.

We begin with the well-established principle in proceedings for criminal contempt that an injunction duly issuing out of a court having subject matter and personal jurisdiction must be obeyed, irrespective of the ultimate validity of the order. Invalidity is no defense to criminal contempt. * * * Walker v. City of Birmingham, 388 U.S. 307 (1967). * * * "People simply cannot have the luxury of knowing that they have a right to contest the correctness of the judge's order in deciding whether to wilfully disobey it. * * Court orders have to be obeyed until they are reversed or set aside in an orderly fashion."

* * *

The criminal contempt exception requiring compliance with court orders, while invalid non-judicial directives may be disregarded, is not the product of self-protection or arrogance of Judges. Rather it is born of an experience-proved recognition that this rule is essential for the system to work. Judges, after all, are charged with the final responsibility to adjudicate legal disputes. It is the judiciary which is vested with the duty and the power to interpret and apply statutory and constitutional law. Determinations take the form of orders. The problem is unique to the judiciary because of its particular role. Disobedience to a legislative pronouncement in no way interferes with the legislature's ability to discharge its responsibilities (passing laws). The dispute is simply pursued in the judiciary and the legislature is ordinarily free to continue its function unencumbered by any burdens resulting from the disregard of its directives. Similarly, law enforcement is not prevented by failure to convict those who disregard the unconstitutional commands of a policeman.

On the other hand, the deliberate refusal to obey an order of the court without testing its validity through established processes requires further action by the judiciary, and therefore directly affects the judiciary's ability to discharge its duties and responsibilities. Therefore, "while it is sparingly to be used, yet the power of the courts to punish for contempts is a necessary and integral part of the independence of the judiciary, and is absolutely essential to the performance of the duties imposed on them by law. Without it they are mere boards of arbitration whose judgments and decrees would be only advisory."

[P]articular language in the recent Supreme Court decision of New York Times Co. v. United States, 1971, 403 U.S. 713 suggests that that Court would not sanction disobedience of a court order, even where the injunction unconstitutionally restrains publication of news. In the Times case, the lower courts had issued temporary restraining orders prohibiting further publication of the Pentagon Papers pending judicial determination of the merits of the Government's objections. Six of the Justices agreed that these injunctions were violative of the First Amendment. Nevertheless, no one suggested that the injunctions could have been ignored with impunity.

* * *

Where the thing enjoined is publication and the communication is "news," this condition presents some thorny problems. Timeliness of publication is the hallmark of "news" and the difference between "news" and "history" is merely a matter of hours. Thus, where the publishing of news is sought to be restrained, the incontestable inviolability of the order may depend on the immediate accessibility of orderly review. But in the absence of strong indications that the appellate process was being deliberately stalled—certainly not so in this record—violation with impunity does not occur simply because immediate decision is not forthcoming, even though the communication enjoined is "news." Of course the nature of the expression sought to be exercised is a factor to be considered in determining whether First Amendment rights can be effectively protected by orderly review so as to render disobedience to otherwise unconstitutional mandates nevertheless contemptuous. But newsmen are citizens, too. They too may sometimes have to wait. They are not yet wrapped in an immunity or given the absolute right to decide with impunity whether a Judge's order is to be obeyed or whether an appellate court is acting promptly enough.

* * * As a matter of jurisdiction, the District Court certainly has power to formulate Free Press-Fair Trial orders in cases pending before the court and to enforce those orders against all who have actual and admitted knowledge of its prohibitions. Secondly, as the District Court's findings of fact establish, both the District Court and the Court of Appeals were available and could have been contacted that very day, thereby affording speedy and effective but orderly review of the injunction in question swiftly enough to protect the right to publish news while it was still "news." Finally, unlike the compelled testimony situations the District Court's order required that information be withheld—not forcibly surrendered—and accordingly, compliance with the Court's order would not require an irrevocable, irretrievable or irreparable abandonment of constitutional privileges.

Under the circumstances, reporters took a chance. As civil disobedients have done before they ran a risk, the risk being magnified in this case by the law's policy which forecloses their right to assert invalidity of the order as a complete defense to a charge of criminal contempt. Having disobeyed the Court's decree, they must, as civil disobeyers, suffer the consequences for having rebelled at what they deem injustice, but in a manner not authorized by law. They may take comfort in the fact that they, as their many forerunners, have thus established an important constitutional principle—which may be all that was really at stake—but they may not now escape the inescapable legal consequence for their flagrant, intentional disregard of the mandates of a Court.

[I]t is appropriate to remand the case to the District Court for a determination of whether the judgment of contempt or the punishment therefor would still be deemed appropriate in light of the fact that the order disobeyed was constitutionally infirm.

Vacated and remanded.

COMMENT

1. The case was returned to the district court judge, and again he convicted the two reporters and upheld their $300 fines. The appeals court affirmed for a second time. 476 F.2d 373 (5th Cir. 1973).

Although the court of appeals seemed to appreciate the reporters' need for a speedy review, nine months had passed between the initial appeal and the final court ruling.

On October 23, 1973, over the objection of Justice Douglas, the Supreme Court refused to review the case. Dickinson v. United States, cert. den. 414 U.S. 979 (1973). Lawyers for the reporters had argued before the High Court that if the decision were allowed to stand, it would arm courts with the power to authorize patently impermissible prior restraints on the exercise of First Amendment rights through the use of the contempt power and so allow them to accomplish indirectly what the Constitution flatly prohibits them from doing directly.

It may be important to distinguish restrictive orders issued by state courts and those issued by federal courts. Until it is overruled, Dickinson, and federal cases upon which it rests, holds that no disobedience to a court order will be permitted, even when the order violates the First Amendment. State law, however, may favor an attack on such orders, particularly where they violate state constitutional guarantees.<sup>27</sup>

27. See, for example, State ex rel. Superior Court of Snohomish Co. v. Sperry, 483 P.2d 608 (Wash.1971), cert. den. 404 U.S. 939.

An examination of cases since at least the turn of the century indicates that "gag" orders have generally not found favor with state courts and that contempt convictions based upon them have often been reversed on appeal. Cases supporting this conclusion include orders not to publish open court testimony;<sup>28</sup> the names of grand jurors or witnesses before grand juries;<sup>29</sup> testimony in preliminary hearings;<sup>30</sup> the identity of juvenile offenders;<sup>31</sup> criminal records;<sup>32</sup> a jury verdict;<sup>33</sup> a change of plea;<sup>34</sup> out-of-court comment;<sup>35</sup> the photograph of a defendant;<sup>36</sup> trial statement of a defendant implicating others;<sup>37</sup> and a copy of a judge's charge to a jury in a murder case.<sup>38</sup>

If a reporter must disobey a written federal court order directed specifically to him or her, a move ought to be made toward the appeals process, even though a story's timeliness may be jeopardized. And that effort should be continued right up to press or broadcast deadlines. Dickinson implies that such appeals will get speedy review.

2. Dickinson nevertheless gave impetus to the issuing of protective or restraining orders—what the press prefers to call "gag" orders—in criminal cases. Court proceedings and court records were closed. Names of jurors and witnesses, criminal records, and arrest records were sealed. Prior restraints were imposed by forbidding publication of information about exhibits, pleas, jury verdicts, and editorial comment on guilt or innocence.

With Sheppard, the Reardon Report, and Dickinson as a base, restrictive orders were bolstered by dicta in the landmark journalist's privilege case, Branzburg v. Hayes, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 2617, 408 U.S. 665 (1972):

Newsman have no constitutional right of access to the scenes of crime or disaster when the general public is excluded, and they may be prohibited from attending or publishing information about trials if such restrictions are necessary to assure a defendant a fair trial before an impartial tribunal.

The American Bar Association continued to articulate influential guidelines permitting restrictions on the press, at least in extreme cases.

In 1976, under pressure from the Washington-based Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, the ABA agreed that no restraining order should be issued without the media being afforded the basic elements of due process—prior notice, the right to be heard, and an opportunity for speedy appellate review. Direct restraints on the press would generally be avoided, and any kind of restraint would be tailored to the specific circumstances of a criminal case.<sup>39</sup>

In 1978 the ABA's Committee on Fair Trial and Free Press proposed that there be no direct restraints on the news media, that press and public be excluded from hearings, and that records be sealed only on clear evidence of a clear and present danger to jury impartiality and a lack of alternative judicial remedies. The committee further recommended that reporters not be subject to the contempt power unless their potentially prejudicial information was acquired by means of bribery, theft, or fraud. Any judicial order affecting the press, said the committee, ought to be preceded by prior notice, a hearing, and, if the order is issued, an opportunity for prompt appellate review of the validity of the order. In proposing that no person be punished for violating an order later invalidated by an appellate court, the committee, in effect, rejected the Fifth Circuit's holding in United States v. Dickinson.

At its annual meeting later that year, the ABA's House of Delegates in large part adopted these proposals. The lawyers would categorically forbid a judge to issue an order prohibiting reporters from publishing information in their possession—"Rather than invite courts to probe the limits of the First Amendment in this area and thereby intensify conflicts with the press, it is preferable to close the door entirely to the alternative of prior restraints."

And the clear and present danger test was recommended for gagging lawyers and for closing pretrial hearings and court records.<sup>40</sup>

It was in this somewhat more conciliatory atmosphere that Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart came to the Supreme Court.

NEBRASKA PRESS CASE

1. On October 18, 1975 in the tiny prairie town of Sutherland, Nebraska, Erwin Simants walked across his yard to a neighbor's, raped and fatally shot ten-year-old Florence Kellie, then murdered all possible witnesses—her grandparents, her father, a brother, and a sister.<sup>41</sup>

The thirty-year-old Simants, after spending the night in a corn field, turned himself in to authorities. A terrified community was relieved. At his arraignment on six counts of first degree murder a few days later, County Judge Ronald Ruff, with an eye on the Nebraska Bar-Press Guidelines and without notice to the press, issued a broad order prohibiting publication of anything from public pretrial proceedings. In Nebraska, pretrial hearings must be open to the public. Because of an alleged confession and possibly incriminating medical tests relating to sexual assault, Judge Ruff feared that publicity might affect the fairness of the trial that Simants surely faced.

Within nine days a district court judge in Lincoln County, seeing a clear and present danger to a fair trial, set down essentially the same rules and said he would screen reporters to determine their "suitability" to be in the courtroom. Judge Hugh Stuart did something else. He incorporated the Nebraska Bar-Press Guidelines—or at least his interpretation of them—in his order and then forbade the press to talk about what he had done. Note how easily "voluntary" guidelines had become mandatory ones.

Suggestions for making procedures for formulation and review of such guidelines or protective orders statutory came from the ABA's Legal Advisory Committee on Fair Trial-Free Press, the Twentieth Century Fund Task Force on Justice, Publicity and the First Amendment, Rights in Conflict (1976), and from Fair Trial and Free Expression, a report to the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights of the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate (1976).

A by now infuriated press saw this as a "gag on a gag." To the chagrin of those who had called for compromise, "voluntary guidelines" had become part of a formal judicial order. The press of Nebraska rallied, soon to be joined by colleagues across the country. Some reporters boycotted the jury selection process, and much of the evidence presented at the preliminary hearing went unreported.

The Nebraska Press Association, firmly supported by broad elements of the national press, sped to the state supreme court and presented that body with a 120-hour ultimatum for extraordinary relief. But the Nebraska Supreme Court was in no hurry and told the press not to expect a ruling before February. The next step was an appeal to U.S. Supreme Court Justice Harry Blackmun who is the overseeing Circuit Justice for the region which includes Nebraska. On November 13, in an almost unprecedented order, Blackmun told the Nebraska Supreme Court to consider the case "forthwith and without delay," since freedom of the press was being irreparably infringed by each passing day.

The state supreme court, now aware that the press was seeking parallel relief from the High Court, still did not do anything. After a few days, Justice Blackmun, in what is known as a chambers opinion, reassured the state court by postponing a stay sought by the press of the original court order until the state supreme court had had time to act.<sup>42</sup>

The judicial minuet was not over. Five days after Blackmun's opinion was issued, the Nebraska Supreme Court set November 25 to hear arguments. Appalled at how much time was passing, the press filed a reapplication for a stay with Blackmun. On November 20, finding that Nebraska court delays had exceeded "tolerable limits," Justice Blackmun handed down a second chambers opinion in which he granted the press a partial stay of the original trial court order.

Blackmun told Judge Stuart that the language of his order was too vague for First Amendment purposes and that prohibitions on the reporting of details of the crime, the identities of the victims, and the testimony of a pathologist at a public preliminary hearing were unjustified. But the rest of Stuart's order stood.<sup>43</sup> With their numbers swelling, the media now asked the full United States Supreme Court to strike down what was left of Judge Stuart's restrictive order.

Meanwhile the Nebraska Supreme Court had heard arguments in the case on November 25 as scheduled. Still reluctant to exercise concurrent jurisdiction with the High Court, the Nebraska Supreme Court nevertheless upheld crucial parts of the original order in a 5-2 decision. Noting that "under some circumstances prior restraint may be appropriate," the state court concluded that a "clear and present danger" to a fair trial in North Platte, Lincoln, or even Denver overcame "the heavy presumption of unconstitutionality of the prior restraint." Missing in the court's analysis was evidence of how press coverage influences jury verdicts or any consideration of why rumors in this case were better for prospective jurors than facts.<sup>44</sup>

42. Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart, 1 Med.L.Rptr. 1059, 423 U.S. 1319 (1975).

43. Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart, 423 U.S. 1327 (1975).

44. State v. Simants, 236 N.W.2d 794 (Neb.1975).

The state supreme court agreed with Justice Blackmun, however, that voluntary press-bar guidelines were not intended to be contractual or mandatory and could not be enforced as though they were. That part of Judge Stuart's order was overturned. But any information implying guilt or a confession was not to be published. The Nebraska court was obviously influenced by Justice Blackmun's second chambers opinion.

On December 12, 1975, the United States Supreme Court agreed to review the Nebraska court's order, but not with the speed Justices Marshall, Brennan, and Stewart thought necessary. The three would have lifted the Nebraska Supreme Court's order pending final resolution of the issue. Justice Blackmun, on the other hand, seemed to have forgotten his own earlier admonition that with each passing day there is a "separate and cognizable infringement of the First Amendment."

Simants was convicted on six counts of first-degree murder on January 17, 1976 and sentenced to death.

2. Twenty-five newspapers, led by the Washington Post, and the ABC network filed an amicus curiae brief which was to influence the Court.

"Approval of what the Nebraska courts have done here," said the brief, "would restrict the editorial freedom of the press, and indeed would make judges into editors." Judicial remedies available to the court were not considered. Its orders were unconstitutionally vague and overbroad. The question presented in the case, the brief noted, is whether a second (national security being the first), wholly novel, exception to the prior restraint doctrine should be created to apply to the reporting of crimes and the administration of criminal justice. There should not, the brief concluded.

The Supreme Court was not to go quite so far. On June 30, 1976, in an otherwise unanimous decision striking down the Nebraska court's gag order in the Simants case, six justices held that in exceptional circumstances prior restraints might be constitutional in a criminal case. Surprisingly the Chief Justice, speaking for the Court, used a test for prior restraint which had become symbolic of the repression of First Amendment rights: whether "the gravity of the 'evil,' discounted by its improbability, justifies such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger." The language is Federal District Court Judge Learned Hand's reformulation of the clear and present danger test which was applied by the Supreme Court in Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951), the landmark, and since discredited, Communist conspiracy case.

It is also worth noting that every justice writing an opinion in Nebraska makes his own intuitive estimate of the effects of reporting on the fairness of a trial. The empirical literature is ignored.

After reviewing the leading free press-fair trial and prior restraint cases and emphasizing the responsibility of the trial judge in applying, short of prior restraint, the "strong measures" outlined in Sheppard to protect the defendant, the Court announced the decision below.

NEBRASKA PRESS ASSOCIATION v. STUART

1 MED.L.RPTR. 1059, 427 U.S. 539, 96 S.C.T. 2791, 49 L.ED.2D 683 (1976).

Chief Justice BURGER delivered the opinion of the Court:

* * *

The thread running through all these cases is that prior restraints on speech and publication are the most serious and the least tolerable infringement on First Amendment rights. A criminal penalty or a judgment in a defamation case is subject to the whole panoply of protections afforded by deferring the impact of the judgment until all avenues of appellate review have been exhausted. Only after judgment has become final, correct or otherwise, does the law's sanction become fully operative.

A prior restraint, by contrast and by definition, has an immediate and irreversible sanction. If it can be said that a threat of criminal or civil sanctions after publication "chills" speech, prior restraint "freezes" it at least for the time.

The damage can be particularly great when the prior restraint falls upon the communication of news and commentary on current events. Truthful reports of public judicial proceedings have been afforded special protection against subsequent punishment. For the same reasons the protection against prior restraint should have particular force as applied to reporting of criminal proceedings, whether the crime in question is a single isolated act or a pattern of criminal conduct.

* * *

The extraordinary protections afforded by the First Amendment carry with them something in the nature of a fiduciary duty to exercise the protected rights responsibly—a duty widely acknowledged but not always observed by editors and publishers. It is not asking too much to suggest that those who exercise First Amendment rights in newspapers or broadcasting enterprises direct some effort to protect the rights of an accused to a fair trial by unbiased jurors.

Of course, the order at issue—like the order requested in New York Times—does not prohibit but only postpones publication. Some news can be delayed and most commentary can even more readily be delayed without serious injury, and there often is a self-imposed delay when responsible editors call for verification of information. But such delays are normally slight and they are self-imposed. Delays imposed by governmental authority are a different matter. * * * As a practical matter, moreover, the element of time is not unimportant if press coverage is to fulfill its traditional function of bringing news to the public promptly.

* * *

The Nebraska courts in this case enjoined the publication of certain kinds of information about the Simants case. There are, as we suggested earlier, marked differences in setting and purpose between the order entered here and the orders in Near, Keefe, and New York Times, but as to the underlying issue—the right of the press to be free from prior restraints on publication—those cases form the backdrop against which we must decide this case.

We turn now to the record in this case to determine whether, as Learned Hand put it, "the gravity of the 'evil,' discounted by its improbability, justifies such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger." [Emphasis added.] United States v. Dennis, 183 F.2d 201, 212 (1950), aff'd, 341 U.S. 494 (1951); see also L. Hand, The Bill of Rights 58–61 (1958). To do so, we must examine the evidence before the trial judge when the order was entered to determine (a) the nature and extent of pretrial news coverage; (b) whether other measures would be likely to mitigate the effects of unrestrained pretrial publicity; (c) how effectively a restraining order would operate to prevent the threatened danger. The precise terms of the restraining order are also important. We must then consider whether the record supports the entry of a prior restraint on publication, one of the most extraordinary remedies known to our jurisprudence.

In assessing the probable extent of publicity, the trial judge had before him newspapers demonstrating that the crime had already drawn intensive news coverage, and the testimony of the County Judge, who had entered the initial restraining order based on the local and national attention the case had attracted. The District Judge was required to assess the probable publicity that would be given these shocking crimes prior to the time a jury was selected and sequestered. He then had to examine the probable nature of the publicity and determine how it would affect prospective jurors.

Our review of the pretrial record persuades us that the trial judge was justified in concluding that there would be intense and pervasive pretrial publicity concerning this case. He could also reasonably conclude, based on common human experience, that publicity might impair the defendant's right to a fair trial. He did not purport to say more, for he found only "a clear and present danger that pretrial publicity could impinge upon the defendant's right to a fair trial." [Emphasis added.] His conclusion as to the impact of such publicity on prospective jurors was of necessity speculative, dealing as he was with factors unknown and unknowable. [Emphasis added.]

We find little in the record that goes to another aspect of our task, determining whether measures short of an order restraining all publication would have insured the defendant a fair trial. Although the entry of the order might be read as a judicial determination that other measures would not suffice, the trial court made no express findings to that effect; the Nebraska Supreme Court referred to the issue only by implication.

* * *

We have therefore examined this record to determine the probable efficacy of the measures short of prior restraint on the press and speech. There is no finding that alternative measures would not have protected Simants' rights, and the Nebraska Supreme Court did no more than imply that such measures might not be adequate. Moreover, the record is lacking in evidence to support such a finding.

* * *

Finally, we note that the events disclosed by the record took place in a community of 850 people. It is reasonable to assume that, without any news accounts being printed or broadcast, rumors would travel swiftly by word of mouth. One can only speculate on the accuracy of such reports, given the generative propensities of rumors; they could well be more damaging than reasonably accurate news accounts. But plainly a whole community cannot be restrained from discussing a subject intimately affecting life within it.

Given these practical problems, it is far from clear that prior restraint on publication would have protected Simants' rights.

Finally, another feature of this case leads us to conclude that the restrictive order entered here is not supportable. At the outset the County Court entered a very broad restrictive order, the terms of which are not before us; it then held a preliminary hearing open to the public and the press. There was testimony concerning at least two incriminating statements made by Simants to private persons; the statement—evidently a confession—that he gave to law enforcement officials was also introduced. The State District Court's later order was entered after this public hearing and, as modified by the Nebraska Supreme Court, enjoined reporting of (1) "[c]onfessions or admissions against interests made by the accused to law enforcement officials"; (2) "[c]onfessions or admissions against interest, oral or written, if any, made by the accused to third parties, excepting any statements, if any, made by the accused to representatives of the news media"; and (3) all "[o]ther information strongly implicative of the accused as the perpetrator of the slayings."

To the extent that this order prohibited the reporting of evidence adduced at the open preliminary hearing, it plainly violated settled principles: "there is nothing that proscribes the press from reporting events that transpire in the courtroom." The County Court could not know that closure of the preliminary hearing was an alternative open to it until the Nebraska

Supreme Court so construed state law; but once a public hearing had been held, what transpired there could not be subject to prior restraint.

The third prohibition of the order was defective in another respect as well. As part of a final order, entered after plenary review, this prohibition regarding "implicative" information is too vague and too broad to survive the scrutiny we have given to restraints on First Amendment rights. The third phase of the order entered falls outside permissible limits.

The record demonstrates, as the Nebraska courts held, that there was indeed a risk that pretrial news accounts, true or false, would have some adverse impact on the attitudes of those who might be called as jurors. But on the record now before us it is not clear that further publicity, unchecked, would so distort the views of potential jurors that 12 could not be found who would, under proper instructions, fulfill their sworn duty to render a just verdict exclusively on the evidence presented in open court. We cannot say on this record that alternatives to a prior restraint on petitioners would not have sufficiently mitigated the adverse effects of pretrial publicity so as to make prior restraint unnecessary. Nor can we conclude that the restraining order actually entered would serve its intended purpose. Reasonable minds can have few doubts about the gravity of the evil pretrial publicity can work, but the probability that it would do so here was not demonstrated with the degree of certainty our cases on prior restraint require.

Of necessity our holding is confined to the record before us. But our conclusion is not simply a result of assessing the adequacy of the showing made in this case; it results in part from the problems inherent in meeting the heavy burden of demonstrating, in advance of trial, that without prior restraint a fair trial will be denied. The practical problems of managing and enforcing restrictive orders will always be present. In this sense, the record now before us is illustrative rather than exceptional. It is significant that when this Court has reversed a state conviction, because of prejudicial publicity, it has carefully noted that some course of action short of prior restraint would have made a critical difference. However difficult it may be, we need not rule out the possibility of showing the kind of threat to fair trial rights that would possess the requisite degree of certainty to justify restraint. This Court has frequently denied that First Amendment rights are absolute and has consistently rejected the proposition that a prior restraint can never be employed.

Our analysis ends as it began, with a confrontation between prior restraint imposed to protect one vital constitutional guarantee and the explicit command of another that the freedom to speak and publish shall not be abridged. We reaffirm that the guarantees of freedom of expression are not an absolute prohibition under all circumstances, but the barriers to prior restraint remain high and the presumption against its use continues intact. [Emphasis added.] We hold that, with respect to the order entered in this case prohibiting reporting or commentary on judicial proceedings held in public, the barriers have not been overcome; to the extent that this order restrained publication of such material, it is clearly invalid. To the extent that it prohibited publication based on information gained from other sources, we conclude that the heavy burden imposed as a condition to securing a prior restraint was not met and the judgment of the Nebraska Supreme Court is therefore Reversed.

COMMENT

1. Prior restraints, the Court seemed to be saying, must be preceded by a clear demonstration of the harmful effects of publicity on the jury, a relationship which the Chief Justice at the same time considered "unknown and unknowable." There must be a showing that the prior restraint would be effective and that no alternatives, e.g., judicial remedies, less destructive of First Amendment rights, are available. It is difficult to imagine these preliminary barriers ever being hurdled. Trial judges were being asked to make judgments about juror prejudice before jurors were examined on the question.

In Nebraska Press, Burger said there was a heavy First Amendment presumption against the validity of "gag orders."

Finally the Court seemed to be saying that the effectiveness of a prior restraint must be assured before such an order is issued. (A media organization could only be bound by a court whose jurisdiction it was in.) Again this is a tall order, given the difficulty of predicting how a restraining order would work to protect fair trial.

For a discussion of the impact of Nebraska Press on the doctrine of prior restraint, see this text, p. 126.

2. Burger spoke for a Court which was unanimous with respect to the result. Justice White in a concurring opinion doubted, however, whether the Nebraska-type restraining order would ever be justifiable. And if that were so, he thought it might be wiser in the long run simply to declare "gag orders" against the press violative of the First Amendment. Justice Brennan, joined by Stewart and Marshall, flatly declared "gag orders" would never be constitutional if applied to the press. Brennan advocated what is sometimes called a per se rule: i.e., "gag orders" are per se invalid under the First Amendment.

"Settled case law concerning the impropriety and constitutional invalidity of prior restraints on the press," Brennan said in a comprehensive review of the conflict, "compels the conclusion that there can be no prohibition on the publication by the press of any information pertaining to pending judicial proceedings or the operation of the criminal justice system, no matter how shabby the means by which the information is obtained."

Brennan then spoke to the futility of a prior restraint:

A judge importuned to issue a prior restraint in the pretrial context will be unable to predict the manner in which the potentially prejudicial information would be published, the frequency with which it would be repeated or the emphasis it would be given, the context in which or purpose for which it would be reported, the scope of the audience that would be exposed to the information, or the impact, evaluated in terms of current standards for assessing juror impartiality, the information would have on that audience. These considerations would render speculative the prospective impact on a fair trial of reporting even an alleged confession or other information "strongly implicative" of the accused. Moreover, we can take judicial notice of the fact that given the prevalence of plea bargaining, few criminal cases proceed to trial, and the judge would thus have to predict what the likelihood was that a jury would even have to be impaneled. Indeed, even in cases that do proceed to trial, the material sought to be suppressed before trial will often be admissible and may be admitted in any event. And, more basically, there are adequate devices for screening from jury duty those individuals who have in fact been exposed to prejudicial pretrial publicity.

Brennan feared that the overemployment of restrictive orders would burden the press and the First Amendment so as to discourage crime and court coverage, especially by economically marginal media that might elect not to contest even blatantly unconstitutional restraints. The argument appeared to be taken from a letter written by the editor and publisher of the Anniston (Ala.) Star and included in the media's amicus brief to the Court.

Simants's first conviction was overturned on the basis of evidence that a sheriff had lobbied a sequestered jury. On retrial he was found not guilty by reason of insanity, a verdict that did not sit well in some Nebraska circles.

Why didn't Chief Justice Burger support a rule that "gag orders" were per se invalid?

The Court bolstered Nebraska Press when in Oklahoma Publishing Co. v. District Court, 2 Med.L.Rptr. 1456, 430 U.S. 308 (1977), it held that news media could not be prohibited from publishing the name or picture of a juvenile where the name had been reported in open court proceedings and the photograph taken without objection as the juvenile was being escorted from the courthouse. "Once a public hearing has been held," said the court, "what transpired there could not be subject to prior restraint."

Two terms later in Smith v. Daily Mail Publishing Co., 5 Med.L.Rptr. 1305, 443 U.S. 97 (1979), the Court reached an identical conclusion. The First Amendment was violated, said the Court, by a West Virginia statute that imposed criminal sanctions on a newspaper for truthful publication of a juvenile offender's name that had been lawfully obtained. The state interest in protecting the anonymity of a juvenile was insufficient to justify the encroachment on freedom of press. The Court relied on Landmark Communications, Inc. v. Virginia, 3 Med.L.Rptr. 2153, 435 U.S. 829 (1978). There a state law making it a crime to publish information about confidential proceedings before a legislatively authorized judicial review committee hearing complaints against a judge was struck down.

The First Amendment protects the publication of truthful information, and only the highest form of state interest would condone prior restraints.

3. There is yet another problem. How does a judge in a case that attracts wide attention control media coverage outside of his jurisdiction? Before her trial on a charge of attempting to murder Gerald Ford, Lynette Fromme asked a federal district court to enjoin the showing of a "Manson" film in twenty-six California counties. She argued that her depiction coddling a rifle would deny her right to a fair trial. The court agreed but members of the prospective audience did not, and they fought the order until it was mooted by selection of the jury.

4. Wasn't the court's use of a modified clear and present danger test disingenuous? The Simants facts, objectively, seemed to meet a clear and present danger standard. The fact that the Court thought otherwise only suggests the impropriety of the standard and the wisdom of invalidating "gag orders" against the press per se. The difficulty with relying on the clear and present danger test in such circumstances is that it will mislead trial courts into issuing "gag orders" which will not survive on appeal.

5. It should be noted that the opinions of the justices in Nebraska Press mentioned without comment two alternatives to "gag orders" against the press: 1) "gag orders" against nonmedia personnel such as lawyers, accused, officers of the court,<sup>45</sup>
